The actual ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries was begun and ended in the courſe of this year [p]. The commiſſioners, appointed for that purpoſe, ſettled every thing relating thereto. They awarded penſions to the abbots, priors, monks, and nuns, for their livelihood. They valued the plate, goods, ornaments of the prieſts, of the altars, of the churches, and ordered what buildings ſhould be demoliſhed, and what left ſtanding. I have already obſerved that the rents of all the ſuppreſſed monaſteries amounted to one hundred ſixty thouſand one hundred pounds ſterling. But if it be true that this valuation was made only upon the foot of the laſt leaſes, and that theſe were not above the tenth part of the real value, as ſome affirm, it follows, that theſe rents were worth above ſixteen hundred thouſand pounds [q], beſides the ready money which accrued to the king by the ſale of the effects [r]. Here was wherewithal to make uſeful foundations to the church and ſtate, had all theſe riches been employed that way. The king ſeemed at firſt to have formed ſuch a deſign. Nay, this is what had ſerved for the principal ground of the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries; but the greedineſs of the courtiers and favourites allowed but a very ſmall part to be expended on things uſeful and neceſſary. Henry had at firſt reſolved to erect eighteen new biſhoprics [s]; but as the money was laviſhed away, he found reaſons to reduce them to a much ſmaller number. In ſhort, he contented himſelf with founding ſix, and eſtabliſhing canons in ſome cathedrals which the monks had poſſeſſed. In all this he employed but a revenue of eight thouſand pounds. He laid out likewiſe part of the money in fortifying ſome ports, and all the reſt was ſquandered away in preſents, and other needleſs expences. For this cauſe he could not avoid the blame of having plundered the church; whereas, had he employed the beſt part of theſe lands in things uſeful to the church and ſtate, he would have gained the bleſſings of his ſubjects and their poſterity. As to the parliament, they are inexcuſable for having put into the king's hands ſuch immenſe riches, deſigned for pious uſes, without taking care how they were to be employed. This is no ſlender evidence of what has been already obſerved, that the parliaments met in this reign only to be inſtrumental in gratifying the king's paſſions, without ever examining either the motives or conſequences of what he required. Henry had alſo formed the project of founding a college for young ſtudents, that they might be qualified for the ſervice of the ſtate, either in embaſſies or other affairs of the government [t]. But this project miſcarried, with many others, becauſe the king, having ſold the lands of his admiral, upon which the duke, ſaid that it was a lie. This troubled Cranmer extremely, who did all he could to reconcile them. But they were never afterwards hearty friends. Burnet, tom. I. p. 265.

[n] Cranmer's ſecretary having wrote out of the book in a fair hand, and returning with it from Croydon, where the archbiſhop was then, to Lambeth, found the key of his chamber carried away by Cromwell's almoner; ſo, being obliged to go over to London, and not daring to truſt the book with any one, carried it with him. Some that were in the wherry with him, would needs go to Southwark ſide to ſee a bear-baiting, where the king was in perſon. The bear broke looſe into the river, and the dogs after him. They that were in the boat leaped out, and left the ſecretary alone. The bear got into the boat with the dogs about her, and ſunk it. The ſecretary ſhifting for himſelf, loſt the book in the water. But being brought to land, he ſaw his book floating upon the water. So he deſired the bear-ward to bring it to him; who taking it up, gave it to a prieſt that ſtood there, to ſee what it might contain. The prieſt, finding it to be a confutation of the ſix articles, told the bear-ward, whoever claimed it would be hanged for his pains. The ſecretary, thinking to mend the matter, ſaid it was his lord's book. This made the fellow more untractable, being a ſpiteful papiſt, and an enemy to the archbiſhop. So that he would not give it back. Whereupon the ſecretary applied to Cromwell, who was then going to court, where he expected the bear-ward would be, in order to deliver the book to ſome of Cranmer's enemies. And ſo it happened, whereupon Cromwell called to him, and took the book out of his hands, threatening him for meddling with a privy counſellor's papers. Burnet tom. I. p. 265, 266.

[o] The ſubſtance of the commiſſion was: that ſince all juriſdiction, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, flowed from the king as ſupreme head, it became thoſe, who exerciſed any power only by the king's courteſy, gratefully to acknowledge, that they had it only of his bounty; and to declare they would deliver it up again when it ſhould pleaſe him to call for it. And ſince his vice-gerent could not look into all matters, therefore the king did empower Bonner in his own ſtead to exerciſe all the parts of epiſcopal authority, for which he was duly commiſſioned; and this to laſt during the king's pleaſure only. See the original in Burnet, tom. I. Collect. p. 184.

[p] There are fifty-ſeven ſurrenders upon record this year; and the originals of about thirty of theſe are yet to be ſeen. Thirty-ſeven of them were abbies, or priories, and twenty nunneries; among the reſt, Godſtow, Weſtminſter, St. Alban's, Waltham, Glaſtenbury, St. Peter's in Gloceſter, &c. The method uſed in the ſuppreſſion of theſe houſes may be ſeen in Burnet, tom. I. Collect. p. 151, &c. The hoſpital of St. Thomas, in Southwark, was alſo ſuppreſſed this year. See Burnet, tom. I. p. 267, 268.

[q] Some compute, that the lands taken from the monaſteries, at twenty years purchaſe, would amount, at this preſent time, to thirty millions five hundred and three thouſand four hundred pounds. Thoſe formerly belonging to the abbey of St. Alban's, being worth at this day, about two hundred thouſand pounds a year; and thoſe belonging to Glaſtenbury abbey, above three hundred thouſand pounds yearly. See Stevens's Hiſt. of Taxes, p. 188—216.

[r] The treaſure found in the monaſteries was valued at one hundred thouſand pounds. Ibid. p. 217. As for an account of the other valuable effects found there, ſee Monaſticon Anglic.

[t] As this was the nobleſt deſign that ever was projected in England, it will not be amiſs to give ſome ſhort account of it. Sir Nicholas Bacon (who was afterwards one of the wiſeſt miniſters that ever this nation bred) together

the ſuppreſſed abbies, was very loth to put to ſuch uſes the ready money raiſed by the ſale. He choſe rather to laviſh it upon his pleaſures or his courtiers, who uſed all ſorts of artifices, condeſcenſions, and baſe flatteries, to procure ſome part of theſe vaſt treaſures.

Whilſt Henry was employed in his domeſtic affairs, he had an eye however to what paſſed abroad. The emperor feigned the laſt year a firm intention to adjuſt the religious differences which occaſioned troubles in Germany. But this was only to draw money from the proteſtants, to be expended in his war with the Turk. He expected that, upon the bare hopes he was pleaſed to give them of redreſſing their grievances, they would drain themſelves of men and money, and ſo become leſs formidable. But the proteſtants would not ſuffer themſelves to be deceived to ſuch a degree. They plainly anſwered to his demand, that they could do nothing for him, without ſufficient ſecurity of being left in peace.

Henry, finding that a rupture between the emperor and the proteſtants was not very remote, ſent freſh embaſſadors to Germany, to ſtrengthen the reſolutions of the Smalcaldick league, by hopes of his coming into it, and being declared protector. But the Germans had now diſcovered his deſign, which was to amuſe them, and keep the emperor in continual fear of his uniting with them. They returned therefore the ſame anſwer as before, that the ſole intent of their league was to maintain the Augſburg confeſſion, and if the king refuſed to admit that confeſſion, it was in vain to treat of other points: that moreover, they heard with extreme grief, that he perſecuted in his realm ſuch as held the ſame opinions with them on ſundry articles of religion, and therefore, ſo long as the act of the ſix articles ſubſiſted, there was no likelihood that he really intended to join with them. Melancthon even wrote him a letter in very ſtrong, though reſpectful terms, to ſhew him the unreaſonableneſs of that ſtatute.

Henry, to whom all was obedient in England, and whoſe will was a law, was offended at the firmneſs of the German princes. On the other hand, Gardiner, who dreaded of all things the king's union with the Smalcaldick league, failed not to uſe this occaſion to divert him from it, by flattering his vanity. He repreſented to him, that it was very ſtrange petty princes ſhould pretend to be a pattern to a great monarch, and dictate to the moſt learned prince in Europe, in matters of religion. He added, that whatever the proteſtants might pretend, they would never approve of his ſupremacy in England, becauſe it would be a tacit engagement to own that the emperor had the ſame right in Germany. This was falſe reaſoning, ſince there was a wide difference between the authority which the king had over his ſubjects, and that which the emperor could claim over the ſovereigns and free cities of Germany. However, he attained his ends, that is, he begot a great coldneſs between the king and the proteſtants.

Gardiner's artifices might have been more prejudicial to the reformation, if, on the other ſide, the reformers had not raiſed a counter battery, of which they made wonderful uſe. The king was ſo jealous of his ſupremacy, that he neglected nothing to ſupport it. Indeed the abſolute power acquired over his ſubjects placed him above all oppoſition; but he wiſhed, of all things, the nation was convinced of the juſtice of that prerogative. Hence the reformers took occaſion to remonſtrate to him, that nothing but the reading of the holy ſcriptures could undeceive the people of their falſe notion of the papal authority. By this means they had already obtained, that there ſhould be a bible faſtened with a chain in every church, to be freely peruſed by all perſons. But as many ſcrupled publicly to read the ſcriptures, for fear of being ſuſpected of hereſy, Cranmer, meeting with a favourable opportunity, repreſented to the king that it was neceſſary to give his ſubjects leave to have a bible in their houſes. He inſinuated to him, that every one, having liberty to read it, would eaſily be convinced that the pope's pretended authority had no foundation in the ſcriptures. This was an innocent ſtratagem to procure the people an opportunity to inſtruct themſelves in many other articles, though the king had only one in view. Gardiner readily perceived the conſequence of the archbiſhop's requeſt, and ſeeing the king inclined to grant it, did all he could to divert it. He diſputed upon this ſubject with Cranmer in the king's preſence, who heard them very attentively. At laſt, perceiving ſolid learning in what Cranmer ſaid, and nothing but vanity in the reaſonings of his adverſary, he ſuddenly roſe up, ſaying to Gardiner, that ſuch a novice as he, was not fit to contend with an old experienced general [u]. Shortly after, he iſſued out a proclamation, declaring he was deſirous to have his ſubjects attain the knowlege of true religin in God's word; and therefore he would take care they ſhould have an exact tranſlation of the bible. He forbid, however, in order to prevent the inconveniences which might ariſe from the difference of the verſions, the ſelling of any bible but what ſhould be approved by the vicegerent [w].

About the end of this year was ſeen a freſh effect of the mutual confidence which appeared between Charles V. and Francis I. A mutiny ariſing in Gaunt, by reaſon of a tax laid upon wine by the governor of the Low Countries, the mutineers applied to the king of France to implore his protection, and even offered to ſubmit to him. But he did not think proper to accept of their offers. On the contrary, he informed the emperor of what was plotting againſt him. This ſeems very ſtrange, conſidering that hitherto he had never profeſſed much generoſity to that monarch. But the reaſon of this proceeding was, the emperor ſtill allured him with the hopes of the duchy of Milan, and ſo diverted him from the thoughts of recovering it by arms. However, the emperor's preſence in Flanders being alone capable of appeaſing the ſedition of Gaunt, he was at ſome loſs which way to get thither in time. It was dangerous going by ſea, as well on account of the ſeaſon, as becauſe he had no fleet to convoy him. The way through Italy was no ſafer, by reaſon he could not afterwards croſs Germany, without paſſing through the territories of the proteſtant princes. There remained no other way but by France, which he reſolved upon, though he had as much reaſon to ſuſpect that kingdom as Germany. But he hoped to amuſe the king by means of the duchy of Milan, as he did in effect. He ſet out therefore, and entered France with a ſmall train, upon the bare ſecurity of a ſafe conduct. Nay, he refuſed to take in hoſtage the dauphin and his brother the duke of Orleans, who came and received him at Bayonne, offering to ſtay in Spain ſo long as he ſhould be in the king's dominions. Wherever he came, the ſame reſpect was paid to him as to the king himſelf, and he arrived at Paris the 1ſt of January 1540.

Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves, being at length concluded by Cromwell's diligence, who had been charged with the negotiation, the princeſs arrived in England about the end of the year 1539 [x], at the time the emperor was travelling through France, in his way to the Low Countries. Henry, receiving advice of her arrival at Rocheſter, went down incognito, being very impatient to ſee whether he had been deceived. But to his ſorrow, he found her very different from what her picture, drawn by Hans Holbin, had cauſed him to expect. This firſt ſight gave him ſuch an averſion for her, that he would have immediately broke off the marriage, if he had not been prevented by ſtrong reaſons [y]. The ſame conſiderations which had made him conclude it, ſubſiſted, and there were others which obliged him to conſummate it. The duke of Cleves was the emperor's ther with Thomas Denton and Robert Carey, were ordered to make a full project of the nature and orders of ſuch a houſe, which they brought to the king in writing, the original whereof is ſtill extant. The deſign of it was, that there ſhould be frequent pleadings, and other exerciſes, in the Latin and French tongues; and when the king's ſtudents were brought to ſome ripeneſs, they ſhould be ſent with his embaſſadors to foreign parts, and trained up in the knowledge of foreign affairs; and ſo the houſe ſhould be the nurſery for embaſſadors. Some were alſo appointed to write the hiſtory of all embaſſies, treaties, and foreign tranſactions; as alſo of arraignments and public trials at home. But, before any of them might write on theſe ſubjects, the lord chancellor was to give them an oath, that they ſhould do it truly, without reſpect of perſons, or any other corrupt affection. This noble deſign miſcarried; but if it had been well regulated, it is eaſy to gather what great and public advantages might have flowed from it. Among which it is not inconſiderable, that we ſhould have been delivered from a rabble of ill writers of hiſtory, who have, without due care and enquiry, delivered to us the tranſactions of that time ſo imperfectly, that there is ſtill need of enquiring into regiſters and papers for theſe matters; which in ſuch a houſe had been more clearly conveyed to poſterity, than can now be expected after ſuch a razure of records, and other confuſions, in which many of theſe papers have been loſt. Burnet, tom. I. p. 269.

[u] Gardiner challenged Cranmer to ſhew any difference between the authority of the ſcriptures, and of the apoſtolical canons, which he pretended were equal to the other writings of the apoſtles. Upon which they diſputed ſome time. Burnet, tom, I. p. 270.

[w] And about the ſame time iſſued out a proclamation for uniformity in religion; which the reader may ſee in Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 354. Col. p. 295.

[x] On December 27 ſhe landed at Deal, William Fitzwilliams, earl of Southampton, being ſent with a fleet of fifty ſail, to bring her over. Hall, fol. 238.—This ſame month king Henry renewed his guard of fifty gentlemen penſioners, with a ſalary of fifty pounds a year; they had been diſcontinued ſince the firſt year of his reign. Hall, fol. 237. Hollingſhead, p. 948.

[y] He ſwore, when he firſt ſaw her, they had brought over a Flanders mare to him. Nicholas Wotton, doctor of law, employed in this buſineſs, gives her this character: ſhe could both write and read in her own language, and few very well; but for muſic (in which the king delighted) it was not the manner of the country to learn it. Herbert, p. 221.

Cromwell

neighbour in Flanders, and had alſo a pretenſion, as well as he, to the duchy of Guelders, after the death of the duke of that name. Conſequently, in caſe of a war between the emperor and England, that prince could give the emperor a very troubleſome diverſion in Flanders. On the other hand, his ſiſter was married to the duke of Saxony, head of the Smalcaldick league, with whom it was of great moment to the king to live in good underſtanding. But this was not all. The emperor, then in France, was labouring with all his power to diſengage Francis I. from the intereſts of England. Nay, Henry had private intelligence, that the emperor offered to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans upon that conſideration. If therefore, in ſuch a juncture, he had ſent back the princeſs of Cleves without marrying her, he ran the hazard of an entire rupture with the princes of Smalcald, at a time when he ſaw himſelf upon the point of being forſaken by the king of France, who by degrees forgot the aſſiſtance he had received from him in his moſt urgent occaſions.

[1540] So, lamenting his misfortune to be forced to marry a princeſs for whom he had conceived an averſion, he reſolved to make this ſacrifice the 6th of January 1540. But he was ſtill leſs pleaſed after his marriage than before, and from that very moment was determined to be divorced from her. He concealed his ſentiments, however, as much as poſſible, though it was eaſy for all to ſee his vexation and trouble. Cromwell, who had drawn him into this marriage, quickly felt the effects of his reſentment, though the king was very careful to hide it from him [z].

The parliament, meeting the 12th of April, Cromwell made a ſpeech to both houſes, informing them that the king ſeeing, with extreme concern, ſo great diviſion among his ſubjects in matters of religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the points in diſpute, that the articles of faith might be be fixed without reſpect of parties, by the word of God: that he was very deſirous his people ſhould have the knowledge of the truth; but then he was reſolved to puniſh, without mercy, ſuch as ſhould preſume to prefer their private, before the eſtabliſhed, opinions. The commiſſioners named by the king were approved of, and had orders to begin this examination without delay [a]. Two days after, the king created Cromwell earl of Eſſex [b].

During this ſeſſion, the parliament ſuppreſſed the order of the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, who are now called knights of Malta. Their dependence on the pope and the emperor was the cauſe or pretence of their ruin. There is no doubt, the deſire of enjoying their ſpoils induced alſo the king to procure their ſuppreſſion. And, indeed, the parliament gave him all their lands, as they had given him thoſe of the abbies. Though they had large revenues, both in Ireland and England, the king allowed, however, but three thouſand pounds for their maintenance after their ſuppreſſion [c]. The affair being ended, the parliament was prorogued to the 25th of May.

A few days after there fell upon Cromwell a ſtorm, which probably had been gathering ſome time before. This miniſter had many enemies and enviers. He was ſon of a farrier or lock-ſmith; and though his birth was ſo mean, he was raiſed to great honour, even to the having the precedence of all the lords in the kingdom, except the royal family. All the nobility envied him. The whole popiſh party alſo hated him mortally, deeming him the firſt adviſer of the ſuppreſſion of the abbies, and one of the principal encouragers of the king to all the innovations he had made in religion. Among theſe, who were very numerous, the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner were the perſons that could do him moſt hurt, becauſe they had free acceſs to the king. Theſe two courtiers, perceiving the king's coldneſs for the new queen, doubted not of his ill-will to Cromwell, for engaging him in that marriage, and reſolved to make uſe of this occaſion to ruin him. They hoped, when he was removed, it would not be impoſſible to procure an agreement between the emperor and the king, and then a reconciliation with the pope, which Cromwell had always oppoſed to the utmoſt of his power. Two other things greatly contributed to the downfal of this miniſter. The king had always employed him in his correſpondence with the Smalcaldick league, and ſo long as he thought he wanted that league, he could not be without his aſſiſtance. But growing cold at length to the German princes, as I before obſerved, and knowing the dreaded union between Charles V. and Francis I. was only a chimera, and conſequently he ſhould have no need of Germany, Cromwell became leſs neceſſary. The ſecond thing which helped to ruin Cromwell was, the king fell in love with Catherine Howard, the duke of Norfolk's niece. Norfolk, finding his credit conſiderably increaſed, made uſe of it to procure the miniſter's deſtruction. As ſoon as he had a fair opportunity, he repreſented to the king, "That there were many malcontents in the kingdom, and good men could not be perſuaded that a prince like him would willingly give any occaſion of diſcontent to his people: that they inferred from thence, he muſt have been ill ſerved by his miniſter, who doubtleſs had abuſed his confidence: that as the people ſeemed diſſatisfied only with regard to religion, it was natural to think, this happened through the vice-gerent's fault, whoſe conduct, perhaps, it would be proper to examine: that he was accuſed by the public of many things, which if true, rendered him the moſt guilty of all others, conſidering the favours heaped on him by the king: that beſides, though no particular fact could be proved upon him, it was however a very great crime to rob the king of the hearts of of good part of his ſubjects: that he took the freedom therefore to tell him, in order to quiet their minds, there was no better way than to ſacrifice to them ſo odious a miniſter." Theſe inſinuations, which were doubtleſs ſeconded by Gardiner and other enemies of Cromwell, produced at length the deſired effect. The king, prejudiced againſt him, reſolved to diſpatch him out of the way, without knowing yet of what he was guilty. But he found in his death a double advantage: firſt, he diſcovered his reſentment againſt him on account of the marriage he had drawn him into. Secondly, he believed to make his people a ſacrifice capable of ſilencing all the murmurs [d]. This reſolution being taken, and the parliament meeting the 13th of June, the duke of Norfolk accuſed Cromwell of high treaſon at the council-board, and received orders to arreſt him [e], and ſend him to the Tower. This illuſtrious priſoner had the common fate of all diſgraced miniſters. In a moment he was forſaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the king in his favour, though to no purpoſe.

Cromwell being in the Tower, the articles of his impeachment were drawn, conſiſting in generals, of which not ſo much as the leaſt proof was offered to be given. The king knew if his proceſs was made according to the uſual forms, he might produce warrants which would fully clear him, and which could not be diſclaimed. For this reaſon it was thought proper to bring his affair before the parliament, and cauſe a bill of attainder to be paſſed againſt him, without allowing him to make his defence [f]. In this manner had he himſelf proceeded in the affair of the marchioneſs of Exeter, and the counteſs of Saliſbury, and therefore could not think it ſtrange the ſame thing ſhould be practiſed in his caſe. The parliament, ever ſlaves to the king, deemed the impeachment juſt, though deſtitute of proof. So by an act, declaring him attainted and convicted of hereſy

[z] Cromwell aſked him next day, how he liked her; the king told him, he liked her worſe than he did. For he ſuſpected ſhe was no maid, and had ſuch ill ſmells about her, that he loathed her more than ever, and did not believe he ſhould ever conſummate the marriage. This was ſad news to Cromwell, who knew how nice the king was in theſe matters, and that ſo great a misfortune muſt needs fall heavy upon him, who was the chief promoter of it. Burnet, tom. I. p. 273. Stow, p. 578.

[a] The king appointed the two archbiſhops, with the biſhops of London, Durham, Wincheſter, Rocheſter, Hereford, St. David's, and eleven doctors, to draw up an expoſition of thoſe things that were neceſſary for the inſtitution of a chriſtian man. He alſo appointed the biſhops of Bath and Wells, Ely, Sarum, Chicheſter, Worceſter, and Landaff, to examine what ceremonies ſhould be retained, and what was the true uſe of them. Theſe committees were to ſit conſtantly Mondays, Wedneſdays, and Fridays, and on other days, in the afternoon only. Burnet, tom. I. p. 275.

[b] April 17. One would think by this, that the king was not angry with him about his marriage, ſince he conferred ſo great a title on him. Henry Bouchier, earl of Eſſex, the laſt of his family, venturing to ride a young horſe, had the misfortune to be thrown, and by the fall to break his neck. Dugdale, vol. II. p. 130, 137.——On November 29, 1538. Sir Thomas Audley, lord chancellor, was created lord Audley, of Walden; and on March 9, 1539, ſir William Poulet was advanced to the title of lord St. John; on the 29th, ſir John Ruſſel, to that of lord Ruſſel; and William Parr, to that of lord Parr. Idem. p. 376, 378, 381.

[c] He allowed a thouſand pounds penſion to the prior of St. John's near London, and five hundred marks a year to the prior in Ireland (for there was but one houſe in each kingdom, with very conſiderable allowances for the knights, amounting in all to three thouſand pounds a year. The houſe in Ireland was at Kilmainan. Burnet, tom. I. p. 276. Stow, p. 579.

[e] He was arreſted July 9. Hall, fol. 242.

[f] The bill was brought into the houſe of lords. Cranmer being then abſent, on the 17th of July, and read the firſt time; and on the 19th, was read the ſecond and third times, and ſent down to the commons, where it ſtuck ten days. And then a new bill, conceived by the commons, was brought up with a proviſo annexed to it. They alſo ſent back the lords bill. It ſeems they rejected the lord's bill, and ſent it up with their own, either in reſpect to the lords, or that they left it to their choice which of the two they would offer to the royal aſſent. Which was an unparliamentary proceeding. Burnet, tom. I. p. 277.

The

and treaſon, he was condemned as a traitor and heretic, the parliament leaving it to the king's choice to make him ſuffer the puniſhment of either of thoſe crimes. This joined to ſome other foregoing, as well as following inſtances, ſhew to what height the king had carried his authority, ſince to diſcover his will was ſufficient to be immediately obeyed, even by thoſe whoſe buſineſs and intereſt it chiefly was to reduce his power within due bounds. The execution of the ſentence was deferred till after the ſeſſion of the parliament.

Henry was ſo tired of his queen, that he could not bear the vexation to ſee himſelf engaged for the reſt of his life in ſo diſagreeable a marriage. He reſolved therefore to divorce her, let what would be the conſequence, eſpecially as the reaſons which induced him to marry her no longer ſubſiſted. He had all hopes of making a league with the proteſtants of Germany, and his fears of the emperor were vaniſhed, ſince he ſaw every thing tending to a rupture between him and France. He only wanted a pretence to demand a divorce, and give ſome colour to the proceedings of the clergy and parliament, of whoſe concurrence he was ſure, however ſlight the pretence might be. He found one in a pre-contract between the queen and the duke of Lorrain's ſon. But this contract was ſo ſlight, that the conſequences were to be much preſſed, to make it ſerve for the foundation of diſſolving Anne's marriage with the king. The duke of Cleves and the duke of Lorrain had formerly, it ſeems, in a treaty, agreed upon a marriage between Anne of Cleves, and the prince of Lorrain, both minors. This agreement had never been confirmed by the parties when of age. On the contrary, the embaſſador of the duke of Gueldres, who acted as mediator in that treaty, declared afterwards by an authentic inſtrument, that this article was deemed null. However, when Henry's marriage with Anne was concluded, this pre-engagement raiſed a difficulty. But the embaſſadors of Saxony and Cleves poſitively promiſed to clear that point, and put it out of all doubt, as ſoon as the princeſs ſhould arrive in England. Anne being come to Greenwich, the king, who liked her not, inſiſted upon this article, in order to ſend her back. For that purpoſe he called a council, and ſending for the embaſſadors, the explanation they had promiſed was demanded. But they had brought nothing with them, looking upon this difficulty as little material. Mean while, the council telling them that good proofs were expected and not bare words, they offered to produce within three months an authentic abſtract from the chancery of Cleves, to prove what they had alleged. This alone would not have been capable of inducing the king to proceed, if, as has been ſaid, there had not been ſtrong reaſons to cauſe him to accompliſh his marriage. So the council was of opinion, that if there were no other objection, the marriage might be lawfully ſolemnized. The abſtract from the chancery of Cleves being come, great exceptions were found to it, upon the ambiguity of the word eſpouſals, becauſe it was not expreſſed whether they were eſpouſals by the words of the preſent or of the future tenſe. But, as the king would not yet commence the affair of his divorce, he cauſed the abſtract to be kept, in order to make uſe of it when there ſhould be occaſion. Upon this, therefore, he reſolved to found his divorce.

The parliament, after a prorogation of ſome days, meeting again, Henry ſent the queen to Richmond. A few days after, a motion was made in the houſe of lords, to preſent an addreſs to the king, to deſire him to ſuffer his marriage to be tried. After what has been ſaid, it cannot be imagined any lord would be ſo hardy as to dare to make ſuch a motion, unleſs he was ſure of the king's approbation. So, the motion being aſſented to, the lords deſired the concurrence of the commons [g]; after which, they went in a body [h] to preſent their addreſs to the king. Henry proteſted to them, that he ſought only the glory of God, the good of his people, and the declaration of truth. Then he agreed that the affair ſhould be referred to the clergy, who immediately appointed commiſſioners to examine the witneſſes [i]. All that could be gathered from the king's own depoſition, and thoſe of the witneſſes, was, that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the prince of Lorrain, which was not ſufficiently cleared: that the king having eſpouſed the queen againſt his will, had not given an inward conſent to his marriage, without which, it was affirmed, his promiſes could not be obligatory, a man's act being only what is inward; that the king had never conſummated his marriage; that the whole nation had a great intereſt in the king's having more iſſue, which they ſaw he could never have by the queen.

The king muſt have had a very ill opinion of the convocation, the parliament, and the public, to allege ſuch extraordinary cauſes of his divorce. The firſt had been diſcuſſed before the celebration of the marriage, and the council was of opinion it could be no juſt impediment. As to the ſecond, if that maxim took place, contracts would be of no uſe, ſince one of the parties might ſay, he had not given an inward conſent. This would be eſtabliſhing, without remedy, inſincerity, fraud, and perfidiouſneſs, in the higheſt degree. As to the third, the king had doubtleſs forgot what he had alleged in the proceſs of his divorce with Catherine. He then maintained, purſuant to his clergy's opinion, that the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine was not neceſſary to render it valid, but that the bare conſent of the parties made it compleat. The fourth was of no greater weight, ſince there was no neceſſity of nulling the marriage, under colour that the king was not pleaſed to lie with the queen. Beſides, he had now an heir. In ſhort, his word muſt be taken, when he ſaid, he had not conſummated his marriage; his word, who ſued for the divorce, and who uſed this argument to obtain it. Mean while, the clergy thought theſe reaſons ſolid, and paſſed a ſentence of divorce upon them; and the parliament were ſo abject as to proſtitute themſelves to the king's paſſion, and confirm the ſentence [k]. There is no diſtinction to be made here, ſince, neither in the convocation, nor in the parliament, was there one ſingle vote againſt the divorce; ſo much did every one dread to incur the king's diſpleaſure. This is a remarkable evidence of what I have often intimated, that in every thing tranſacted in England, during the latter part of Henry VIIIth's reign, the parliament and clergy ought to be conſidered only as the king's inſtruments to gratify his paſſions. To him is due the praiſe of whatever was good and uſeful, and he it is that ought to be blamed for whatever was amiſs. Mean while, the parliament and clergy are inexcuſable for not having endeavoured to ſupport the cauſe of juſtice and truth, when they believed them to be oppreſſed,

The queen was not much troubled at what had been done in her abſence, and even without her being examined. Probably, ſhe had entertained no great affection for a ſpouſe, who had never given her any token of his love. However, though the king had thought it needleſs to aſk her approbation, when he was meditating the divorce, becauſe then the clergy and parliament only were concerned, whom he knew to be at his devotion, he demanded her conſent to what had been done, thinking no doubt the better to juſtify himſelf to the world. At the ſame time he offered by letters patents to declare her his adopted ſiſter, with a penſion of four thouſand pounds a year [l], and her choice either to live in England, or return home. She agreed to all without ſollicitation, and choſe to live in England, where ſhe hoped to paſs her time more agreeably than at Cleves, in her brother's court. Beſides, it is likely ſhe believed her penſion would be more ſecure if ſhe remained in England, than if ſhe lived abroad. Every thing being thus ſettled, ſhe wrote to the duke her brother, that ſhe approved of the divorce, and deſired him to live in a good underſtanding with the king [m].

[i] On the 7th of July it was brought before the convocation, and the caſe was opened by the biſhop of Wincheſter, and a committee appointed to conſider of it; and they deputed the biſhops of Durham and Wincheſter, with Thirleby, and Leighton, dean of York, to examine witneſſes that day. Burnet, ibid.

[k] Sentence was given the 9th of July, which was ſigned by both houſes of convocation; and had the two archbiſhops ſeals put to it, of which whole trial the record does yet remain, having eſcaped the fate of the other books of convocation. The original depoſitions are alſo extant. Burnet obſerves, this only can be ſaid for their excuſe, that the king's reaſons were as juſt and weighty as uſed to be admitted by the court of Rome for a divorce; and moſt of them being canoniſts, and knowing how many precedents there were to be found for ſuch divorces, they thought they might do it as well as the popes had formerly done. Burnet, tom. I. p. 281.

[l] There is in Rymer a liſt of the ſeveral manors and eſtates granted her by the king for life; but it is no where ſaid, that they were four thouſand pounds a year. See tom. XIV. p. 710, &c. Biſhop Burnet ſays, it was only three thouſand pounds a year. See tom. I. p. 282.

[m] The 10th of July, Cranmer reported to the houſe of lords the convocation's ſentence, who ſent him down to the commons to report the ſame. On the 11th, the king ſent the lord chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Southampton, and the biſhop of Wincheſter to the queen, to let her know what was done, and to make her the offers above mentioned. Next day, being the 12th of July, the bill was brought into the houſe for annulling the marriage, which eaſily went through both houſes. Burnet, tom. I. p. 282.

This grand affair being finiſhed, the parliament paſſed an act to moderate one of the ſix articles in the bloody ſtatute. This article, as the other five, made it death for the prieſts to break their vow of chaſtity; but by this laſt act, the pains of death were turned to forfeiture of goods.

All the reſt of this reign will be only a continued ſeries of ſenſible proofs of the ſlaviſh ſubjection the Engliſh nation was reduced to. But in this very ſeſſion of parliament, there are three, which ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence.

The commiſſioners appointed by the king, purſuant to an act of parliament, to examine the doctrines of religion, having drawn a long memorial, and ſet down certain articles as undeniable and abſolutely neceſſary, it was moved in the houſe of lords, to paſs into a law what the commiſſioners had already done, and whatever they ſhould do for the future by order of the king. This motion being received, a bill was brought in immediately, and when paſſed, ſent down to the commons, who agreeing to it, ſent it up again the next day. By this ſtatute it was enacted, that not only the memorial drawn by the commiſſioners, provided it were approved by the king, but likewiſe whatever the king ſhould enjoin for the future in matters of religion, ſhould be believed and obeyed by all his ſubjects. This was inveſting the king with the infallibility taken from the pope. Greater ſigns of ſlavery can hardly be ſeen, ſince the parliament gave the king power over conſcience, after having in a manner rendered him maſter of life and fortune. Moreover a clauſe was inſerted in this act, which under colour of limiting the king's authority, ſenſibly enlarged it, namely, "That nothing ſhould be done or determined by virtue of this act, which was contrary to the laws of the realm." Theſe contradictory clauſes in the ſame ſtatute rendered the king arbiter of the lives of his ſubjects; ſince on the one hand, they were enjoined to ſubmit to the king's will in matters of religion, without knowing however what he would pleaſe to preſcribe, and on the other, were forbid to do any thing contrary to the laws. Conſequently, in caſe the king commanded any thing contrary to the law, they were liable to be proſecuted by virtue of this ſtatute, whether againſt law they obeyed the king, or in obedience to the law refuſed to comply with his will. The acts paſſed in this reign are full of ſuch contradictions, which were not inſerted without deſign.

The parliament paſſed another bill which carried no leſs marks of ſervitude. It was enacted, that a marriage already conſummated ſhould not be annulled, on pretence of pre-contract or any other impediment not mentioned in the law of God. Without doubt the parliament had, or perhaps feigned to have, forgot that the king's marriage with Anne Bullen was annulled by reaſon of a pre-contract, and upon the ſame foundation, during this very ſeſſion, they had approved the diſſolution of his marriage with Anne of Cleves. It is true, the king declared, it was not conſummated. But Catherine, of Arragon, proteſted the ſame thing with reſpect to her marriage with prince Arthur, and yet it was decided, that a party concerned ſhould not be believed, even upon oath, when there were preſumptions to the contrary. Theſe were real contradictions, but not minded by the king. His aim was to legitimate the princeſs Elizabeth by virtue of the former branch of the act, and to remove, by the latter, the impediments in the canon law to his intended marriage with Catherine Howard, who was couſin-german to Anne Bullen [n].

Before the parliament broke up, the clergy of the province of Canterbury, aſſembled in convocation, offered the king a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, of all eccleſiaſtical preferments, to be paid in two years, in acknowledgment (as they ſaid in their addreſs) of his care to free the church of England from the tyranny of the pope. The king gladly accepted their preſent, which was readily confirmed by the parliament. But this was not ſufficient for the king's occaſions. In a few days, he demanded alſo an aid of money of the commons. Though for ſome time the parliament had been wont to ſubmit, without examination, to the king's pleaſure, this demand met with ſome ſort of oppoſition in the lower houſe. And, indeed, it could not but ſeem ſtrange, conſidering the king was in peace with all the world, and beſides, he could not be imagined to have already conſumed the money procured by the ſuppreſſion of the abbies. Some of the commons repreſented, that if in time of peace, and within the ſpace of one year, the king had ſpent ſuch immenſe ſums, there was nothing more to do but to give him all the lands in the kingdom, which too would not ſuffice for the expence of few years. But theſe ſpeeches had no great effect. It was anſwered by the king's party, that he had laid out vaſt ſums in ſecuring the coaſts [o], and that the keeping his ſubjects in peace and plenty coſt him more than the moſt burthenſome war. Theſe reaſons, though very weak, paſſed for inconteſtable, and the commons granted the king a ſubſidy, as large as if he had been actually engaged in a dangerous war [p]. This is a third proof of the parliament's ſlavery. Mean while, the people could not conceive what was become of all the money the king had lately received, and which ſhould have ſupplied his neceſſities for many years.

This parliament, which had given the king ſo great teſtimonies of a boundleſs compliance, was diſſolved the 24th of July. But the king was pleaſed firſt to requite his ſubjects with a free and general pardon, as it was called, though the exceptions limited the benefit to few perſons. All thoſe were excluded, who had been condemned for denying the king's ſupremacy, or for tranſgreſſing ſome one of the ſix articles of the bloody ſtatute, and even thoſe who were only accuſed of theſe crimes which were then unpardonable. The counteſs of Saliſbury, cardinal Pole's mother, and Thomas Cromwell, were excepted by name.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in ſome hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more as having written to the king a very ſubmiſſive letter, he was ſo moved with it, that he cauſed it to be thrice read. But the ſollicitations of the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſeconded by thoſe of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the priſoner fruitleſs. The king ſigned a warrant to cut off his head the 28th of July [q], about ſix weeks after his condemnation. As Cromwell left a ſon, of whom he was very fond, he would ſay nothing on the ſcaffold that might do him a prejudice. He contented himſelf with ſhewing, that he willingly ſubmitted to the ſentence the law had paſſed on him. He prayed for the king's proſperity, and declared he died in the profeſſion of the catholic religion [r]. Theſe laſt words were variouſly interpreted, according to the paſſions and prejudices of the two parties in matters of religion. Though it was certain Cromwell had lived in the opinions of the Lutherans, the contrary party maintained, he recanted at his death; and that by the catholic religion was to be underſtood the old religion, profeſſed in the kingdom before all innovations. The others pretended, theſe words ought to be taken in a more general ſenſe, and at moſt to ſignify only the religion which was then eſtabliſhed. However, the care Cromwell took when he came to die, to ſay nothing that might offend the king, turned to his ſon Gregory's advantage, who was this year created a peer of the realm, by the title of lord Cromwell. The office of vice-gerent, enjoyed by the father, died with him, no one deſiring a poſt ſo obnoxtious to envy, and ſo fatal to the firſt profeſſor. Beſides, the duke of Norfolk and the biſhop of Wincheſter, who were then in great credit, took care not to ſollicit the king to fill a place, which would engage the perſon who held it, to uſe all his intereſt to hinder a reconciliation with Rome [s].

[n] By other ſtatutes it was enacted, 1. That phyſicians in London ſhall be diſcharged from watch and ward, and not ſerve the office of conſtable, or any other. That the preſident, and four fellows of the college, ſhall ſearch and examine the wares and drugs of apothecaries; and that they may practiſe ſurgery. 2. By another, the barbers and ſurgeons were made one company. 3. And by another it was ordered, that a court of firſt fruits and tenths, (conſiſting of a chancellor, treaſurer, two auditors, two clerks, a meſſenger, and an uſher) ſhould be erected. 4. As alſo a court of wards. This laſt was aboliſhed 12 Car. II. See Statut. 32 Hen. VIII.

[s] Thomas Cromwell, from being but a blackſmith's ſon at Putney, found means to travel into foreign countries, to learn their language, and to ſee the wars, being a ſoldier in the duke of Bourbon's army at the ſacking of Rome. Whence returning, he was received into cardinal Wolſey's ſervice; and after his fall, the king voluntarily, (for his fidelity to his old maſter) took him for his ſervant. He obtained ſucceſſively the office and dignities of privy counſellor, maſter of the jewel houſe, clerk of the hanaper, principal ſecretary of ſtate, juſtice of the foreſts, maſter of the rolls, lord privy ſeal, baron, the king's vice-gerent in ſpirituals, knight of the garter, earl of Eſſex, great chamberlain of England, &c. Herbert, p. 225. Dugdale's Baron, vol. II. p. 370. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 363. As his extraction was mean, his education was low; all the learning he had, was, that he had got the new teſtament in Latin by heart. His miniſtry was in a conſtant courſe of flattery and ſubmiſſion, but by that he did great things that amaze one who has conſidered them well. The ſetting up the king's ſupremacy, and the rooting out the monaſtic ſtate in England, conſidering the wealth, numbers, and zeal of the monks, were bold undertakings, and executed with great method. But in the end, an unfortunate marriage, to which he adviſed the king, not proving acceptable, and he being unwilling to deſtroy

Some days after Cromwell's death [t], was ſeen at London a fight, which very much perplexed both parties. This was a company of people condemned and executed all together; ſome for denying the king's ſupremacy, others for maintaining the Lutheran doctrines. Among theſe laſt were Robert Barnes doctor of divinity, Thomas Gerard parſon of Honylane, and William Jerom vicar of Stepney. Theſe three being impeached before the parliament, were condemned to be burned, upon a general accuſation of ſowing hereſy, perverting the ſcriptures, and maintaining errors deſtructive of religion, without the act's mentioning any particulars, and in all appearance, without the parliament's examining the proofs. By the ſame act were condemned to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment four men, one of whom was accuſed of maintaining the papal authority, another for holding correſpondence with cardinal Pole, a third for deſigning to ſurpriſe Calais, a fourth for harbouring a rebel [u], and laſtly, three more convicted of denying the king's ſupremacy [w]. All theſe were burned or hanged at the ſame time and place. It is to be preſumed, they were not admitted to ſpeak for themſelves, ſince Barnes, after a declaration of his faith to the people, aſked the ſheriff whether he knew why he was to ſuffer. The ſheriff anſwering, he did not, he turned to the ſtake and ſaid, the puniſhment he was going to ſuffer plainly taught him the crime of which he was ſuppoſed to be guilty. He prayed however for the king, and even for Gardiner whom he ſuſpected to be the author of his death. The biſhop endeavoured to clear himſelf by a printed apology, but had the misfortune not to be believed [x].

On the 8th of Auguſt, Catherine Howard, the duke of Norfolk's niece [y], was declared queen, the king having privately married her ſome time before. She was ſo devoted to the duke her uncle, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, that ſhe was entirely guided by their counſels. As ſhe had a great aſcendant over the king, very likely ſhe would have induced him to give himſelf over to the guidance of theſe two miniſters, who were preparing to procure by her means great alterations in religion, had not her fall, which will be preſently related, confounded their projects. However, they improved as much as poſſible ſo favourable a juncture, to ſtrike at the reformation and the reformed. Certainly Cranmer was then in a very dangerous ſituation. He could not doubt that the authors of Cromwell's ruin, deſired his deſtruction with the ſame ardour, nay, were privately working it. Complaints of him were already heard in ſeveral places, and even a member of parliament [z] ſaid openly in the houſe, he was the protector and head of the innovators. Theſe things would have doubtleſs taken effect, had his enemies had a little more time to prepare all their plots. But as they knew the king had a real eſteem for him, they intended to proceed by degrees, plainly perceiving they could not, without danger to themſelves, preſs his ruin ſo directly as Cromwell's. Beſides, there was but one article which gave them any advantage upon Cranmer, namely, religion, in which too he had been very cautious, well knowing that the way to advance the reformation under ſuch a prince as Henry, was not directly to oppoſe his will.

The change produced at court, by Cromwell's diſgrace, and the new queen's advancement, was quickly perceived. The commiſſioners, appointed to draw up a declaration of the chriſtian doctrine, having preſented their work to the king, he ordered it to be immediately publiſhed [a]. Though the declaration corrected ſundry abuſes, the popiſh party had ſo prevailed, that inſtead of promoting, it ſenſibly obſtructed the reformation, as it is eaſy to ſee by the abſtract doctor Burnet gives of it in his hiſtory of the reformation of England. However, as ſeveral principles were laid down which might be of great uſe in a more favourable juncture, the reformers were glad, in hopes theſe principles would ſerve one day to deſtroy the errors advanced in the declaration. On the other hand, the popiſh party thought they had gained much, becauſe they ſaw doctrines laid down, to which probably the reformers would never conſent, and hoped this oppoſition would draw the king's indignation upon their whole party. As for themſelves, having always had an abſolute compliance for the king, they intended to purſue the ſame courſe, in order to put him entirely into the diſpoſition they deſired. Other commiſſioners, who were ordered to reform the miſſals, made ſo ſlight alterations, that excepting a few razures of thoſe collects, in which the pope was prayed for [b], there was nothing changed, nor was it neceſſary to reprint the maſs books. Thus, by the credit of the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſupported by the new queen, archbiſhop Cranmer, and thoſe of his party, ſaw a ſtorm approaching, which probably would overwhelm them all. Perhaps it was very fortunate for them, that the king was diverted ſome time by others affairs, from his attention to what concerned religion.

The emperor's paſſage through France ſeemed at firſt to create a ſincere reconciliation between him and Francis. During his ſtay at Paris, he poſitively promiſed to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans. But when Francis preſſed him to ſign an inſtrument of inveſtiture, he anſwered, ſuch an act would be looked upon as extorted, if dated in France, and that it was more honourable for him and the king too, that it ſhould be ſigned in ſome town of Flanders. Afterwards, when he was out of France, he found ſome freſh excuſe not to perform his promiſe. Mean while, he ſubdued the Gantois, and puniſhed them ſeverely for the trouble they had given him of a journey to Flanders. After that, when Francis claimed his promiſe, he clogged it with ſuch reſtrictions, that it was eaſy to perceive he had no mind to part with a country, by which Spain had a communication with his other dominions in Italy and Germany. Francis, vexed to be thus deceived, turned out of favour chancellor Poyet, and conſtable Montmorency, who had adviſed him to take the emperor's word.

About the end of the year 1540, there were ſome beginnings of a quarrel between Francis and Henry, which ended at length in a war. Francis ordered a fortreſs to be built at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the Engliſh pale. But the governor of Calais not ſuffering this encroachment, ſent a detachment of his garriſon and beat down the bridge. The French rebuilt it, and the Engliſh demoliſhed it a ſecond time. Whereupon the king of France ordering marſhal de Biez to raiſe troops in Picardy, Henry reinforced the garriſon of Calais [c], and repaired the fortifications. Mean while the two kings, willing to avoid a rupture upon ſo ſlight an occaſion, agreed to ſend commiſſioners [d] upon the ſpot, with powers to adjuſt the difference. But the confe-what himſelf had brought about, was, no doubt, backward in the deſign of breaking it, when the king had told him of it. And then, upon no other viſible ground, but becauſe Anne of Cleves grew more obliging to the king than ſhe was formerly, the king ſuſpected that Cromwell had betrayed his ſecret, and engaged her to a ſofter deportment, on deſign to prevent the divorce, and did upon that diſgrace and deſtroy him. He carried his greatneſs with wonderful temper and moderation, and was thankful to mean perſons of his old acquaintance. Burnet, tom. I. p. 284. Stow, p. 580. Hollingſh. p. 952.

After this, there followed an explanation of the apoſtles creed, with practical inferences. From that they proceeded to examine the ſeven ſacraments. Then followed an explanation of the ten commandments, which contains many good rules of morality. After that, an explanation of the lord's prayer was added. Then followed an expoſition of the angel's ſalutation of the bleſſed virgin, and the ave-maria explained. The next article is about free-will, which they ſay muſt be in man. After this they handled juſtification; next, good works are explained, which are ſaid to be abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation. The method they followed was this (as appears in ſome authentic writings) firſt, the whole buſineſs they were to conſider was divided into ſo many heads, or queries, and theſe were given to ſo many biſhops and divines, and, at a prefixed time, every one brought in his opinion, in writing, upon all the queries. When their anſwers were given in, two were appointed to compare them, and draw an extract of the particulars in which they agreed or diſagreed; which the one did in Latin, the other in Engliſh. As this was the way that was uſed concerning the ſeven ſacraments (as may be ſeen Collect. N. 21. vol. I. of Burnet's Reformation) ſo it is reaſonable to believe they proceeded with the ſame maturity in the reſt of their deliberations, though the papers are loſt. Burnet, tom. I. p. 286, &c.

The

rence producing no good effect, each provided for his defence in case of an attack.

It was this year that the famous jesuitical order was founded by a bull of Paul III. dated the 27th of September [e].

[1541] The uneasiness the emperor had given Henry for some time was now almost vanished, since Francis had been disappointed in the affair of Milan. Henry knew sufficiently that prince's temper and character, to foresee without much difficulty that he would soon break with the emperor. A war between these two monarchs could not but be advantageous to Henry. It would of course procure him quiet, and enable him to preserve an equality of power between them, which was the firmest foundation of his own and his kingdom's security. So fearing nothing from the pope or the emperor, or the king of France, or his own subjects, whose attempts must be in vain without a foreign aid, he confined himself wholly to his domestic affairs. He had chiefly two things in view. The first was, to preserve and even enlarge the authority he had acquired; the second, to take care that no alterations should be made in religion, but such as he himself judged reasonable. These were the two affairs which wholly employed him. As he was positively bent upon these two points, and the parliament durst not oppose his will, it may be easily judged that none of his ministers had the courage to contradict him in any thing. So it was himself alone that ordered every thing according to his fancy, his council only approving his motions. However, there were in the council, as well as in the kingdom, two opposite parties with respect to religion. But every one had always his eyes upon the king, to try to discover his thoughts, for fear of combating his opinion.

Archbishop Cranmer was at the head of the party who wished for a greater reformation. He was still very much esteemed by the king, especially on account of his integrity. But sincerity, which he professed, rendered him unfit for political affairs, in a court, where, instead of hearkening to reason, justice, and equity, the king's inclination only was to be considered.

Chancellor Audley was a person of good sense. He served the reformers, when he could without danger. But he was too much a courtier to insist upon what he judged reasonable, if the king was against it.

The duke of Norfolk was as eminent for his merit as for his birth. He was reckoned a good general, but was still a better courtier. Ever submissive to the king's will, he outwardly approved whatever he was pleased to command him. But in private, he grieved at all the late innovations in religion, and could not endure either the reformation or the reformed. He would have been glad to see the king reconciled to the pope, but the small hopes of their reconciliation made him very cautious how he offended so unforgiving a master. Nevertheless, as the king was not always in the same disposition, the duke found frequent occasions to serve his party, especially in the punishment of those who disliked the six articles, and were so hardy as publicly to shew it. In a word, he was as head of the favourers of the pope, and the old religion. But he carefully concealed from the king his inclination for the former; and, as for the latter, he shewed his zeal only in supporting what the king had retained.

Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, was in the same sentiments, and behaved in the same manner. But he was very far from being so much esteemed by the king, who made use of him, however, because he was pliant and dexterous, and had an extensive knowledge of foreign affairs. As this knowledge rendered him of greater insight than the rest of the ministers, he sometimes engaged the king in proceedings, the consequences whereof might be advantageous to his party, and of which the king himself did not always know the motive. By a blind submission to the king's will, he kept himself in some degree of favour, being convinced himself, and having also convinced his friends, that compliance was the only means to procure a revocation of what had been done against the pope.

Bonner, bishop of London, was also one of the heads of the same party, but, however, always ready to sacrifice every thing to his fortune. He was naturally bold, passionate, and exceſſively cruel, as he plainly shewed upon many occasions. As he was of very little merit, he supported himself by courting those who were in favour, and by making the king's will the rule of his actions.

Queen Catherine blindly followed the directions of the duke of Norfolk, her uncle, and used what power she had over the king, to support the credit of the enemies of the reformation.

Such was the situation of the court, when the king, freed from his foreign affairs, was wholly employed in his domestic concerns. The kingdom, however, was in profound tranquility, because the terror with which the people were seized, silenced all contradiction. In December, the last year, he began the foundation of the new bishoprics, by converting the abbey of Westminster into a bishop's see [f]. In this year, 1541, he founded three more, Chester [g], Gloucester [h], and Peterborough [i], and the next year Oxford [k], and Bristol [l]. These foundations, and some others of little consequence, were the only charitable uses to which he applied the immense riches acquired by the suppression of the abbies [m]. His courtiers magnified these pious acts, whilst others took notice of the little proportion between seven or eight thousand pounds a year, employed in these uses, and what was acquired by the ruin of near seven hundred religious houses.

Mean while, Henry had a mind to shew his zeal for religion, as if his sole aim was to procure the eternal salvation of his people. The book of The Exposition of Christian Faith being printed, he prefixed an ordinance, declaring all those to be heretics, who believed more or less than was contained in that book [n]. However, as it was not possible that all should conform to it, and it does not appear, any person suffered upon that account in the course of this year, it is likely the king had intimated that he desired not his ordinance to be rigorously executed.

Whilst Henry was congratulating himself upon triumphing over the pope, and enjoying a tranquility which the court of Rome had in vain attempted to disturb, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon what passed between the emperor and the king of France, and upon the preparations in Turkey. The war between the emperor and Francis was going to be renewed, but very unseasonably for the emperor, when Soliman was preparing to invade Hungary, on occasion of the death of John de Zapol, competitor of the king of the Romans. These two princes, after long contending for the crown of Hungary, being at last tired of war, agreed that Zapol should hold, during his life, what he possessed with the title of king, but after his death the crown should descend to Ferdinand. Zapol dying, and leaving a son called Stephen, under the guardianship of his mother, Ferdinand expected that the treaty should be executed, and would have taken possession of all Hungary. But young Zapol's mother implored Soliman's protection, which he readily granted, intending to improve this dissention, to become master of Hungary, and penetrate afterwards into the Imperial territories.

The emperor seeing Hungary threatened with a powerful

[e] The founder of this order was Inigo (or Ignatius) de Leyola of Guipuscoa in Spain. He was born 1492, the very year the Indies were discovered, and Granada taken by Ferdinand. He lived obscurely till he came to twenty-nine years of age, and then turned soldier in the wars of Navarre 1521, where being hurt in the knee, the pain thereof seems to have wakened devotion in him to a religious life; for as soon as he recovered he went to our lady of Montserrat, and offered his sword and dagger; then giving his clothes to a poor man, took upon him a shirt and miserable habit, which he girt about him with a rope of rushes; and in these arms (as Sandoval terms them) he watched one whole night before our lady, and so went to an hospital three leagues off, and there attended sick persons, whence he travelled to the Holy Land; being returned, and in his thirty-third year, he began to learn grammar at Barcelona, which in two years he attained. Then he went to the university of Alcala, and so to Salamanca, where being opposed and persecuted, he left all and came to Paris, and there studied till he had found divers others, with whom he agreed to return in pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Thus about 1536 going to Venice, he stayed till his companions overtook him, and went from thence to Rome, where he obtained of Paul III. the foundation of the jesuits order 1540. Herbert, p. 226.

As all this came far short of what the king had once intended, so Cranmer's design was quite disappointed. For he had projected, that in every cathedral there should be provision made for readers of divinity, and of Greek and Hebrew, and a great number of students, to be both exercised in the daily worship of God, and trained up in study and devotion; whom the bishop might transplant out of this nursery, into all the parts of his diocese. invaſion, which might be of fatal conſequence to Germany, uſed all his art to pacify the proteſtants, without giving them however any ſatisfaction, endeavouring only to amuſe them, and obtain ſome aſſiſtance againſt the Turk. On the other hand, he laboured to perſuade Soliman, that he was in perfect union with the kings of France and England, that the dread of a general league of the Chriſtian princes might divert him from his deſign. Wherefore he tried to amuſe Francis, with putting him in hopes he would give the Low Countries to his ſecond ſon, and erect them into a kingdom. At the ſame time he gave the Ottoman Port to underſtand, this affair was in a manner concluded. Francis fell not into the ſnare. But hearing from all parts that the emperor's miniſters every where gave out, the negotiation was upon the point of concluſion, he reſolved to ſend an embaſſador to Venice, and another to Conſtantinople, to undeceive the emperor of the Turks and the ſenate of Venice. He choſe for theſe embaſſies Rincon and Fregoſa, who ſet out in order to paſs through Italy. But the marquis of Guaſto, governor of Milan, receiving advice that they were to embark at Turin, and go down the Po, cauſed them to be ſo narrowly watched, that they were murdered in the boat. Francis made great noiſe about the aſſaſſination, but the emperor gave him no ſatisfaction. This was a freſh occaſion of the rupture between the two monarchs.

About the ſame time, the emperor called a diet at Ratiſbon for the 5th of April. As it was then no proper juncture to diſturb the proteſtants, the diet reſolved at laſt to grant them a ſecond delay, which was called the interim, that they might continue quiet, and more readily engage to furniſh ſupplies againſt the Turks.

In the mean time the king of the Romans ordered Buda, capital of Hungary, to be inveſted, in hopes of taking it before the Turks ſhould arrive. But the ſiege proving more difficult than was expected, the Turks had time to relieve it, and give the Germans battle, over whom they obtained a ſignal victory. Shortly after, Soliman, coming to Hungary, made his entry into Buda, and under colour of taking young Zapol under his protection, became maſter of the city, and great part of the kingdom.

Mean while the emperor, having ended the diet, inſtead of marching into Hungary to aſſiſt the king his brother, took the rout of Italy, and embarking at Portovenere with an army of twenty thouſand men, ſailed for Africa to make war upon Barbaroſſa, who had made himſelf king of Algiers. This proceeding gave occaſion for many ſpeculations. It was ridiculed at the French court, as if, inſtead of fighting the Turks, he had ſought a pretence to fly from them. But as the African expedition was projected the beginning of the year, and the troops were now on the coaſt of Italy, it is certain he would not have had time to relieve the king of the Romans if he had attempted to march his army into Hungary. However, he landed his army near Algiers the 22d of October. But two days after, a ſudden and violent ſtorm deſtroyed part of his fleet. This accident obliged him to re-embark the beginning of November, after having loſt good part of his troops and ſhips. It is pretended, Francis, out of mere generoſity, would not proclaim war againſt him whilſt employed in this expedition. It is however difficult to believe that Francis, who actually held intelligence with Soliman, and afterwards ſcrupled not to make uſe of the aſſiſtance of the Turks, ſhould ſcruple to interrupt the empeperor's deſigns againſt the infidels of Africa.

Henry ſaw with pleaſure that the king of France and the Turks were going to find the emperor employment, which would hinder him from thinking of England. But though he was eaſy in that reſpect, he was however in ſome pain with regard to the king of Scotland, who, though his nephew, had no reaſon to love him, and could eaſily aſſiſt the Engliſh malcontents, who were very numerous in the northern counties. Henry was afraid alſo, that a religious zeal would carry that prince to undertake ſomething againſt him, becauſe he began to ſuffer himſelf to be governed by the churchmen, who, under colour of perſuading him to deſtroy hereſy, ſtrongly attached him to the pope's intereſt. The reformed had now been burned many years in Scotland. But theſe puniſhments cauſed there the ſame effects as elſewhere, that is, they encreaſed, inſtead of leſſening the number, and yet the clergy were ſtill obſtinately bent to root them out with fire and ſword. James V. was a prince much addicted to his pleaſures, and very greedy of money. Beſides, he had ſeveral natural ſons whom he could not enrich as he wiſhed, becauſe he had exhauſted his treaſure in needleſs expences. There were two parties in his court, whereof the one favoured the king of England and the reformed, and the other, chiefly conſiſting of churchmen, was entirely againſt Henry, and continually ſtrove to induce the king to extirpate all who ſwerved from the old religion. The former endeavoured to perſuade him to imitate the king of England, his uncle, and ſecure a large revenue by the ſuppreſſion of the abbies. The latter repreſented to him, that, by ſtrictly executing the laws againſt heretics, he would raiſe, by forfeited eſtates, above a hundred thouſand crowns a year. After ſome conſideration, James cloſed with the laſt advice, and ſuffering the clergy to take their own courſe, there followed in Scotland a violent perſecution [o].

Henry, perceiving the king, his nephew, to be thus governed by perſons wholly addicted to the court of Rome, feared he would at laſt be led to unite againſt him with the pope and emperor. This apprehenſion ſeemed to him the more juſt, as he could hardly rely any longer on the aſſiſtance of the king of France, who was wont to direct the court of Scotland, becauſe that ancient ally was grown extremely cold to him. Whereupon he reſolved to uſe all his art to gain the king, his nephew, and perſuade him to break, like him, with the pope. To this end he ſent embaſſadors to deſire an interview at York, not queſtioning that in an amicable conference he ſhould have eloquence enough to perſuade him to what he pleaſed. James accepted the overture, and promiſed to come to York, where Henry went, and expected him. But the Scotch eccleſiaſtics, and their whole party, ſo beſtirred themſelves to prevent this interview, the conſequence whereof they perceived, that they ſucceded at laſt, and prevailed with the king to find ſome pretence to be excuſed.

Mean while, Henry, who knew nothing of this change, impatiently waited at York for the day appointed for the interview. In the interval, he iſſued out a proclamation, that all who had been aggrieved for want of juſtice by any of his former miniſters, ſhould come to him and his council for redreſs. His aim was to throw all paſt miſcarriages on Cromwell, and put his ſubjects, particularly the northern people, in hopes of better times [p]. But whilſt he was preparing for the king of Scotland's reception, he received letters of excuſe that he could not have the honour of waiting upon him. He was extremely provoked, and this refuſal, which he deemed an affront, ſoon after cauſed a breach between the two kingdoms. But his vexation at this affair was not comparable to the unexpected affliction he met with upon his return to London.

Since his laſt marriage, he daily bleſſed God for the happineſs he enjoyed with his queen, and, upon all occaſions, publicly teſtified his extreme ſatisfaction: nay, during his journey to York, deſiring to give God thanks in a manner ſuitable to the ſentiments of his heart, he ordered his confeſſor [q] to draw up a particular thankſgiving, and prayed him to join with him in the ſame. All this ſhewed his eſteem and tender affection for the queen, who ſeemed to have the ſame fondneſs for him. But, when he came to London, he heard things which it would have been well for him never to have known. Whilſt he was at York, one John Laſſels came to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who remained at London, and told him that his ſiſter, an old ſervant of the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, under whoſe care the queen was brought up, ſaid to him, that the queen had been very lewd before and ſince her marriage, and that two men, among others, namely, Dirham and Mannock [r], had often enjoyed her. Cranmer, communicating the ſecret to the lord chancellor, and other privy counſellors, it was agreed that the archbiſhop ſhould inform the king of it, as ſoon as he returned to London, though they were not ignorant of the danger they expoſed themſelves to, if the accuſation could not be proved. But on this occaſion it was no leſs dangerous to be ſilent.

[o] George Buchanan, the famous Scotch hiſtorian, was in danger at this time, and would have died with the reſt, had not he eſcaped out of priſon. See his hiſtory of Scotland, l. 14. The ſharpneſs of his poems againſt the clergy was the cauſe of his confinement. He went beyond ſea, and lived twenty years in exile, and was forced to teach ſchool moſt part of the time. In his writings there appears not only all the beauty and graces of the Latin tongue, but a great vigour of mind, and quickneſs of thought. His ſtile is ſo natural and nervous, and his reflections on things are ſo ſolid (beſides his immortal poems) that he is juſtly ſtiled the beſt of our modern authors. Burnet, tom. I. p. 211.

[p] In April this year there broke out a new inſurrection in Yorkſhire, which was ſoon ſuppreſſed. During this progreſs, the places the king paſſed through made their ſubmiſſion to him, thanking him for his pardon, and made him the following preſents: Stamford 20l. Lincoln 40l. Boſton 50l. Lindſey 300l. Keſteven, and the church of Lincoln 50l. The chief perſons of Yorkſhire 900l. The archbiſhop of York, with three hundred prieſts, 600l. Cranmer not knowing how to execute his commiſſion, choſe to ſet it down in writing, and put it in the king's hands [s], deſiring him to read it in private. Henry took it at firſt for a calumny, reſolving in himſelf to puniſh the authors ſeverely. Nay, it was with this view only that he was pleaſed thoroughly to examine the matter, though with all poſſible ſecrecy, for fear of vexing the queen. He ordered therefore the lord privy-ſeal to examine Laſſels in private. Laſſels boldly ſtood to what he had ſaid upon his ſiſter's report, who alſo confirmed what ſhe had told her brother. Upon theſe depoſitions, ſome pretence was uſed to arreſt Dirham and Mannock, who diſcovered in their examination more circumſtances than were deſired. They confeſſed, not only that they had lain with the queen, but alſo that three court ladies, her confidents, were commonly eye-witneſſes to her lewd practices. One of the three was the lady Rochford, who accuſed the lord Rochford her huſband of a criminal commerce with queen Anne Bullen his ſiſter [t]. They farther depoſed, that the king being at Lincoln, one Colpeper, by the lady Rochford's means, was brought into the queen's chamber at eleven o'clock in the night, and ſtaid there till four in the morning, and that when he went away the queen gave him a gold chain and a rich cap. Moreover the queen had taken Dirham into her ſervice, which ſhewed ſhe intended to continue the ſame courſe of life. The queen at firſt denied all. But in a ſecond examination ſhe confeſſed [u], that before marriage ſhe had proſtituted herſelf to ſeveral men. This confeſſion ſhook the king's reſolution, who, lamenting his misfortune, could not forbear burſting out into tears. In ſhort, after Dirham, Mannock, and Culpeper, were condemned to die [w], he was pleaſed the queen's impeachment ſhould be brought before the parliament, which met the 16th of Jan. the next year 1542.

[1542] The commiſſioners [x] named by the parliament to examine the queen, reported, that the facts ſhe was accuſed of were ſufficiently proved. Whereupon both houſes declared her guilty, and petitioned [y] the king that ſhe might be puniſhed with death, together with the lady Rochford, accomplice of her lewd practices, the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, the lord William Howard and his lady [z], the counteſs of Bridgwater, five other women, and four men, for miſpriſion of treaſon, in concealing what they knew of the queen's vicious life. Here again may be obſerved, the ſervileneſs of the parliamant, who did not dare to condemn the queen and her accomplices, without knowing whether the king would be pleaſed to ſuffer them to be puniſhed. They did not proceed in this manner with regard to Anne Bullen and the lord Rochford, becauſe the king's authority was not arrived to that height, as at the time I am ſpeaking of. The king conſenting they ſhould be puniſhed, they were condemned to die by an act of attainder. There was alſo a very extraordinary clauſe in the act, declaring, "That whoever knew any thing of the incontinence of a queen, ſhould reveal it, under the pains of treaſon: that if the king or his ſucceſſors ſhould intend to marry a woman, as a virgin, if ſhe, not being ſo, did not declare the ſame to the king, it ſhould be high treaſon; and all who knew it, and did not reveal it, were guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon: that if the queen, or the princeſs of Wales, ſhould procure any, by meſſages or words, to know her carnally; or any other, by meſſages or words, ſhould ſolicit them, they, their counſellors, and abbettors, are to be adjudged high traitors."

Henry giving his aſſent to the act, by his letters patents [a], the queen and the lady Rochford were beheaded on Tower-hill the 12th of February. The queen ſtood to what ſhe had confeſſed, concerning the miſcarriages of her former life before ſhe was married; but denied upon her ſalvation, that ſhe had ever defiled the king's bed. As for the lady Rochford, ſhe died unlamented by all. But her death and infamy ſerved at leaſt to raiſe again the reputation of the lord Rochford her huſband, and of queen Anne Bullen, whoſe death ſhe procured by her evidence, which her own condemnation cauſed to be univerſally ſuſpected.

The extreme ſeverity of the parliament to the queen's relations was much cenſured by the public. It was thought unnatural to puniſh a grandmother for not diſcovering her grand-daughter's incontinence [b]. Accordingly the king moderated the ſeverity, by pardoning her and moſt of thoſe who were condemned, ſome of whom however remained long in priſon. As for the laſt clauſe, which made it treaſon for a woman, courted by the king, not to reveal the loſs of her virginity, it was turned into ridicule. People jeſtingly ſaid, the kings of England for the future could only marry widows, there being no reputed maid who would run the hazard of being attainted of treaſon, in caſe the king happened not to like her [c].

This affair being ended, the parliament confirmed [d] an act paſſed in Ireland, whereby that iſland was erected into a kingdom. From thenceforward the kings of England inſerted among their titles, that of king of Ireland, whereas before they were ſtiled only lords [e].

Before the parliament broke up, the king began in ſome meaſure to ſhew his intention to ſeize the colleges and hoſpitals as he had done the abbies. But the execution of this deſign was very difficult. By the local ſtatutes of moſt of them, the governors, preſidents, or any of the fellows, had no power to ſurrender the lands belonging to their houſes, without the conſent of the whole ſociety. So it was not eaſy to gain whole bodies of men, who were ſo much concerned to keep the revenues on which they ſubſiſted. It is true, the king had prevailed with ſome, who were not bound, by ſuch expreſs ſtatutes, to reſign their houſes to him. But, as he had his eye upon all, an expedient was to be found, for the reſt to follow this example without breaking their oath. To that end, all the local ſtatutes of colleges and hoſpitals were annulled by act of parliament, and the governors, preſidents, and fellows, were no more to be ſworn to the obſervance thereof. This obſtacle being removed, a few more were ſurrendered to the king. But this affair was not entirely finiſhed till 1545, by a much ſhorter method.

Whilſt the king's affairs were thus tranſacting in the parliament, the convocation, which ſat at the ſame time, where much divided about the new tranſlation of the bible that was going to be publiſhed. Many affirmed, it was full of faults, and to ſuffer it to be read before it was reviſed would be very injurious to the people. Gardiner moved this diſ-

[z] Rapin, by miſtake, ſuppoſes theſe to be her father and mother, whereas they were her uncle and aunt. Her father was the lord Edmund Howard. As the family of the Howards ſpread themſelves into ſeveral branches, in order to prevent confuſion, it will be proper to inſert here a ſhort genealogical account of that family, which ſhall be carried on in due time. Sir Robert Howard (temp. Hen. VI.) married Margaret daughter and coheir to Thomas de Mowbray duke of Norfolk; by whom he had John, created duke of Norfolk, June 28. 1 Ric. III. and ſlain afterwards at Boſworth fight, who married, 1. Catherine, daughter of William lord Molins, by whom he had Thomas created earl of Surrey, 1 Rich. III. and reſtored to the ſame title 4 H. VII. and to that of duke of Norfolk 5 Hen. VIII. 2. Margaret, daughter of ſir John Chedworth. The ſaid Thomas married, firſt, Elizabeth daughter and ſole heir to ſir Frederick Tilney, by whom he had Thomas the third duke of Norfolk, ſir Edward knight of the garter and high admiral, and Edmund father of Catherine, fifth wife of Henry VIII. His ſecond wife was Agnes, ſiſter and heir of ſir Philip Tilney, by whom he had William, created baron of Effingham, March 11. [b] It was not her parents (as Rapin repeats here again by miſtake) but her grandmother, the old ducheſs of Norfolk (under whom ſhe had been bred) that people thought was cruelly dealt by, for not telling the king her grand-daughter was a whore, which would have been inconſiſtent with the rules of juſtice or decency. Her parents ſeem to have been dead before now, ſeeing there is nothing ſaid of her father ſince 12 Henry VIII. Dugdale, vol. II. p. 272.

That perſons, who, by privy tokens and counterfeit letters, deceitfully obtain any money, goods, or chattels, ſhall ſuffer ſuch puniſhment (except death) as ſhall be appointed by thoſe before whom they are convicted. 2. That no perſon, except what has lands, tenements, fees, annuities, or offices, to the yearly value of one hundred pounds, ſhall keep or ſhoot with any gun. 3. That no man ſhall be juſtice of aſſize in the county where he was born, or dwelleth. 4. By another, the court of ſurveyors of the king's lands is ſettled. pute, in hopes the reviſal would take up ſome time, and the king in the mean while alter his mind [f]. His party was ſo numerous, that he would have carried his point, if Cranmer, who perceived his deſign, had not moved the king to refer the peruſing of the tranſlation to the two univerſities, where he had much more intereſt than in the convocation. Several biſhops ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and ſome even entered a proteſtation againſt it [g]. But all ſignified nothing, ſince the king declared it to be his pleaſure: nay, he granted, the 12th of March, a privilege to a London bookſeller [h] to print the bible in Engliſh. This gives occaſion to preſume, the univerſities reviſed not the tranſlation, ſince it was impoſſible they ſhould have examined it in ſo ſhort a ſpace.

The king wanted money for the war with Scotland, on which he was entirely bent, but durſt not aſk the commons. Not that he doubted of ſucceſs, but was afraid of alienating the hearts of his ſubjects, who were much more tender of matters of intereſt than of all others. He wiſhed the commons would voluntarily offer him money, without being aſked. It was in order to gain their affection, that he commanded a ſheriff to he impriſoned for arreſting a member of parliament [i], and offered to leave it to them to puniſh him as they thought fit. On the other hand, he every where borrowed money to let them ſee his neceſſity [k]. But for once the commons feigned not to underſtand this language, being unwilling to introduce the pernicious cuſtom of granting the king ſubſidies unaſked. Beſides, as they were yet ignorant of the deſign of a war with Scotland, they ſaw no occaſion to offer him money. So the parliament broke up without granting the king any thing, except the act concerning the colleges and hoſpitals, which was a ſeed, the fruit whereof he was to gather in due ſeaſon.

The war with Scotland being reſolved, Henry ſent ſir William Paget to France, to ſound Francis I. and try to hinder him by ſome treaty from aſſiſting the king of Scotland. The embaſſador's inſtructions were, to demand of the king of France, that the treaty of perpetual peace between France and England ſhould be renewed. Francis eaſily perceived there was ſome hidden myſtery in the overture. As he knew Henry was diſpleaſed with the king of Scotland, he did not doubt that he deſired the peace to be renewed, on purpoſe to inſert in the new treaty ſome article to tie up his hands, and prevent him from aiding his ally. He anſwered therefore, that it was needleſs to renew the treaty, the conditions whereof the king of England had not performed. The embaſſador replied, there was no ſort of terms in the treaty of peace, and conſequently his maſter could not be accuſed of breaking them. But this diſpute was entirely founded on a miſtake. The embaſſador underſtood by the treaty of peace, a private treaty of one ſingle article, namely, that there ſhould be a perpetual peace between France and England. But Francis meant ſome other treaties ſigned the ſame day, and which belonged to the firſt, though this was written apart. It was this ſeparate treaty which Henry wanted to renew, imagining he ſhould thereby hinder Francis from aſſiſting the king of Scotland. But Francis did not deſign that, under this pretence, Henry ſhould be ſuffered to cruſh an antient ally of France, and France not be able to oppoſe it. On the contrary, he deemed it a manifeſt breach of the peace, to attack his allies without any juſt cauſe. Mean while, as neither would mention the king of Scotland, though both had him in their thoughts, Francis, to embarras Henry, demanded, purſuant to the former treaties, his aſſiſtance to recover the Milaneſe. Henry required on his part, that Francis, according to his promiſe, ſhould aboliſh the papal authority in France. Theſe reciprocal demands were more apt to produce a breach than a renewal of the treaties. Beſides the Engliſh had already begun hoſtilities, by ſeizing ſome French ſhips which were ſuppoſed to be pirates, and the French had detained ſome Engliſh veſſels by way of repriſal. So the embaſſador having taken his leave without effecting any thing, reported to his maſter, that the king of France was ill-inclined to him; that is, he would not, without oppoſing it, ſuffer the king of Scotland to be oppreſſed. This was the meaning of Francis being ill-affected to England, he being at that time very far from wiſhing a war with the Engliſh, ſince he was juſt going to begin another which he much more deſired.

Francis was ſo provoked at all the emperor's artifices, that to proclaim war againſt him, he only ſtaid to ſee him ſo embroiled with the Smalcaldick league, that there ſhould be no more hopes of agreement. To foment the diſſention, he had ſent embaſſadors to the diet aſſembled at Spire, in February, under colour of clearing himſelf from the pretended calumnies he was aſperſed with, and particularly from the imputation of making an alliance with the Turks. His embaſſadors complained to the diet, in very ſtrong terms, of the murder of Rincon and Fregoſa, pretending that Rincon was ſent to Conſtantinople, only to diſſuade Soliman from his deſign of carrying war into Germany. However, in the ſequel of their diſcourſe, they would have perſuaded the German princes, that it was their intereſt to fortify their frontier towns, and abandon Hungary to the Turks. So their preſence at the diet having produced no great effect, they returned very diſſatisfied.

Shortly after their departure, the pope's nuncio offered to the diet, in his maſter's name, a council at Trent. The catholics gladly accepted the offer, and thanked the nuncio. But the proteſtants rejected it, becauſe they would not have a council called by their adverſary, and in a ſuſpicious place, ſince the city of Trent belonged to the king of the Romans. The diet, however, ended to the emperor's and Ferdinand's ſatisfaction, after having unanimouſly reſolved to give them a powerful aſſiſtance, under the conduct of the elector of Brandenburg.

Though the proteſtants refuſed the pope's offer, Paul III. called a council at Trent for November following, by a bull of the 22d of May. But this was only to amuſe the world. He knew that when a war between the emperor and France was going to commence, there would be obſtacles enough to hinder the council from aſſembling.

And indeed, at this very time, Francis I. was bringing five armies into the field, to attack the emperor in five places at once; namely, in Rouſillon, Luxemburg, Piedmont, Flanders, and Brabant. But the ſucceſs anſwered not his expectations. The great effort he made this year to invade his enemy, ſerved only to diſable him to do the like again when he came himſelf to be attacked. The dauphin beſieged Perpignan in vain. The duke of Orleans, his brother, took Luxemburg and Montmedy; but theſe places were retaken before the end of the campaign. As for the other three armies, they performed nothing conſiderable.

Whilſt Francis was vainly endeavouring to be revenged of the emperor, Henry came to a final reſolution to make war upon Scotland. He had been in hopes, that in the expected conference with the king, his nephew, he ſhould perſuade him to renounce the papal authority, and was extremely concerned to ſee himſelf diſappointed. This affair ſeemed to him of the utmoſt importance, becauſe not having much to fear from abroad, where the naval forces were not comparable to his, Scotland was the only country which could give him any uneaſineſs. From thence alone could the Engliſh malcontents receive any ſuccours, and he remembered, with terror, the danger he ſhould have run when the rebels were in arms in the north, had they been ſupported by a Scotch army. In this war, therefore, upon Scotland, his aim was not to make conqueſts, but to bend the king of Scotland to his will by force, ſince he could not do it by fair means. This he deemed abſolutely neceſſary, in order to procure a ſettled peace. At the time of the northern rebellion, the junctures were very favourable to him; for, being then in ſtrict union with France, king James could not engage to ſupport the Engliſh malcontents without Francis's conſent, who, inſtead of approving ſuch a deſign, would have rather diverted him from it. But affairs were now upon another foot, ſince Henry could no longer rely upon the king of France's friendſhip. It is true, that prince was not much to be feared, whilſt at war with the emperor; but he conſidered that the equality of theſe two monarch's forces would probably oblige them to make peace very ſoon, and this peace, in which no doubt the pope would interpoſe, neceſſarily be to his prejudice; nay, it was a queſtion, whether it would not occaſion a league againſt him, and the king of Scotland join in it. In that caſe, England could be invaded in the north with the more eaſe, as the northern counties were moſt inclined to rebel. It was therefore of very great conſequence to Henry to gain the king of Scotland to his intereſt, ſince, being ſecured from that ſide, an invaſion was not much to be feared, which he looked upon as impoſſible, conſidering the ſuperiority of his naval forces.

[f] Gardiner had a ſingular conceit. He fancied there were many words in the New Teſtament of ſuch majeſty, that they were not to be tranſlated, but muſt ſtand in the Engliſh bible as they were in the Latin. A hundred of theſe he put into a writing which was read in convocation. His deſign was viſibly to make the tranſlation unintelligible to the people. Some of theſe words were, eccleſia, penitentia, contritus, juſtitia, juſtificatio, idiota, elementa, baptizare, martyr, ſacramentum, ſimulachrum, gloria, &c. Burnet, tom. I. p. 314.

The

He had intended to make uſe of two ways to gain the king of Scotland in the propoſed conference. The firſt way was, to ſhew him that it was in his power to ſecure to him the ſucceſſion of the crown of England after his ſon Edward, or remove him from it, ſince, by the act of parliament made for that purpoſe, he could call to the ſucceſſion his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, or exclude them for ever. In the former caſe, king James could not pretend to the crown till after the poſterity of theſe two princeſſes was extinct; but, in the latter caſe, he came immediately after prince Edward. As therefore to gain two degrees, was a conſiderable advantage for the king of Scotland, Henry hoped he would not be ſo unwiſe as to ſlight it. The ſecond way he deſigned to make uſe of to win that prince, was, to lay before him the advantages which would accrue to him in caſe he renounced the pope, as well by reaſon of the facility this would give him to ſucceed to the crown of England, if there ſhould be occaſion, as by the riches he would acquire in ſuppreſſing the monaſteries of Scotland. As James was very greedy of money, Henry did not queſtion ſucceeding by this ſecond means, though the firſt ſhould prove ineffectual. He was therefore extremely vexed to ſee himſelf diſappointed of his hopes, by the king his nephew's refuſal to meet him at York. He found the new queen had too great an influence over him, and even ſuſpected it to be the effect of the intreagues of the pope, the emperor, and perhaps the king of France. So, deſpairing to ſucceed in his project by fair means, he reſolved to try to accompliſh it by force.

Scotland was little able to reſiſt England without the aſſiſtance of France. But Francis was ſo employed, that there was no likelihood of his interpoſing in the quarrel. Henry hoped therefore, if he could gain at firſt ſome advantage, he ſhould render the Scots leſs intractable, and more eaſily diſpoſe the king his nephew to hearken to his propoſals. Thus the war he intended to wage with Scotland was properly deſigned to oblige the Scots to a compliance with his deſires, and not founded upon caprice only, or to be revenged of the affront he received, as the hiſtorians pretend. However, as he could not diſcover the real motives without doing himſelf a prejudice, he pretended a violation of the truce, James's denial of ſome land of ſmall value lying on the frontiers, and his reception of ſome Engliſh rebels. But as all this was not very capable of deceiving the world, he bethought himſelf of reviving the old pretenſions of the kings of England to the ſovereignty of Scotland. To that purpoſe, he ſet out a long declaration, in which was inſerted the memorial largely ſpoken of in the reigns of Edward I. and Henry VII. containing the pretended proofs of the homage Scotland had formerly paid to England. The declaration was however ſo ambiguouſly expreſſed, that it plainly appeared, Henry was willing to have it in his power to quit his pretenſions without injuring his honour. It is entirely needleſs to repeat the contents of the memorial. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that the Engliſh writers ſpeak of it as if the ſovereignty of the kings of England over Scotland was there demonſtrated, and the bare citation of it ſufficient to carry the cauſe. Doctor Burnet, though a Scotchman, ſeems to give into this opinion univerſally ſpread in England, ſince he ſpeaks of this memorial in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, without making any remarks. Perhaps he did not think proper to combat the ſentiments of the Engliſh, without any neceſſity, in reſpect to his hiſtory.

Henry publiſhed not this declaration till his army was juſt entering Scotland. His deſign was to ſurpriſe the Scots, which he believed the more eaſy, as there appeared to be no juſt cauſe of breach between the two kingdoms. However, king James, hearing that ſoldiers were raiſing in England, put himſelf in a poſture of defence, in caſe he ſhould be attacked. In the mean while, he ſent two embaſſadors [l] to the king his uncle, to ſee to content him, if poſſible, or at leaſt to gain time till the king of France could aſſiſt him. The embaſſadors were long detained at the court of England, upon frivolous pretences, and whilſt Henry was making his preparations, he gave them no anſwer. Nay, they were not ſuffered to return but with the army which was to enter their country, under the command of the duke of Norfolk [m], and where they were as priſoners. Two other embaſſadors of Scotland, who were going to London, meeting the Engliſh upon their march, were alſo detained till the army arrived at Berwick.

Mean while, king James, hearing the duke of Norfolk was marching towards the north at the head of twenty thouſand men, ſent a body of ten thouſand to the frontiers, under the command of George Gordon, expecting the reſt of the troops who were marching from ſeveral parts to join him. But Gordon could not hinder the duke of Norfolk from entering Scotland, about the end of October [n], and ravaging the country north to the Tweed. After this ſhort expedition, the Engliſh army retired to Berwick; the ſeaſon, which was now very bad, prevented them from advancing any farther. In the mean time, king James ordered the lord Maxwell to march with fifteen thouſand men, whilſt the Engliſh were retiring to Berwick. The Scots pretend, upon the news of Maxwell's march, the Engliſh retreated in ſuch confuſion that they might have been eaſily defeated, if Gordon had ventured to attack them, and that the king was extremely angry with him for this diſappointment. However, James, heading his army in perſon, held a council of war, and appeared fully reſolved to give battle, let what would be the conſequence. But he was alone of that opinion. On the contrary, the danger to which the kingdom would be expoſed, in caſe of a defeat, was ſtrongly repreſented to him. In ſhort, as he would not alter his reſolution, the generals and nobles told him, they would not obey him, if, without any neceſſity, he obſtinately expoſed the kingdom to ſo manifeſt a hazard. This oppoſition threw him into a fury; he ſwore he would puniſh their diſobedience, and called them all traitors, ſince they hindered him from obtaining, as he thought, a certain victory. Cardinal Beaton inſpired him with this notion, by telling him, it was impoſſible for ſuch heretics as the Engliſh to conquer him. The truth is, James was a little diſturbed in his mind, ever ſince he had unjuſtly put to death a nephew of the duke of Albany, whoſe apparition was ever preſent to his imagination. So, being extremely troubled to be thus diſobeyed, he left the command of the army to the lord Maxwell, with orders to march towards the enemy, and remained himſelf within diſtance to join him, in caſe there was occaſion to fight. But, a few days after, as he was extremely incenſed with his generals, and greatly miſtruſted them, he gave a commiſſion in form to Oliver Sinclair, his minion, to command the army. The new general, very unfit for ſuch a poſt, repairing to the camp, cauſed his patent to be publicly read, at which all were offended. This bred ſuch diſcontent among the troops that they began to diſband, when a body of five hundred Engliſh horſe appeared on a hill, where they were poſted to watch the motions of the enemy. This ſight encreaſed the confuſion among the Scotch troops, who imagined the whole Engliſh army was approaching to give battle. In this condition, being without a general, ſince Maxwell's commiſſion was revoked, and none would obey Sinclair, they choſe to retire in a fright, which permitted them not to look back and obſerve the ſmall number of their enemies. The Engliſh horſe, ſeeing them fly with ſuch precipitation, cloſely purſued them, and, without meeting any reſiſtance, ſlew great numbers, took priſoners ſeven lords, two hundred gentlemen, eight hundred ſoldiers, with four and twenty pieces of ordnance [o]. Never was victory ſo eaſily won. Among the chief priſoners were the earls of Glencairn and Caſſilis, the lords Maxwell, Somerville, Oliphant, Gray, and Oliver Sinclair, the king's favourite.

The news of this rout threw king James into a diſmal melancholy, to which he was already too much inclined. He fancied his generals and nobles had betrayed him, and, in that belief, reſolved to put moſt of them to death. His vexation was ſtill encreaſed, upon hearing that a herald, ſent by the duke of Norfolk, was murdered by an Engliſh refugee. He immediately feared the ill conſequences of ſuch an accident, after his late misfortune. So, imagining it would be impoſſible to free himſelf from his preſent embarraſſment, he could not withſtand his immoderate grief, which brought him to his grave the 14th of December 1542. His death happened ſeven days after the birth of a princeſs, called Mary, of whom his queen was delivered, and who was his only heir. A little before, he loſt two ſons in one day.

Henry, not knowing what paſſed in Scotland, had ordered the Scotch priſoners to be brought to London, where they arrived the 19th of December [p]. The next day [q] they were conducted through the city from the Tower (where they had been confined) to Weſtminſter, where the king was pleaſed to ſee and talk with them. He expoſtulated with them, for having, by their pernicious counſels, perſuaded their king to quarrel with him, and told them they juſtly bore the puniſhment of a war raiſed by themſelves. Nevertheleſs, as he intended to make uſe of them to procure ſuch a peace as he deſired, he ended his diſcourſe with ſome obliging expreſſions, and granted them more liberty, by putting them in the cuſtody of ſeveral noblemen. The earl of Caſſilis had the good fortune to fall into the hands of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to receive from him, during his ſhort ſtay at London, ſuch inſtructions as induced him to embrace the reformation when he returned to his own country.

A few days after [r], the news of the birth of Mary, princeſs of Scotland, and of the king, her father's death, arriving together, Henry thought it a favourable juncture to unite Scotland to England, by marrying his ſon Edward to the new queen of Scotland. He cauſed the captive lords to be ſounded, and finding them inclined to ſecond the overture, ſet them at liberty, on condition they would give hoſtages for their return in caſe the project of the marriage did not ſucceed. This condition being accepted, they were conducted to Newcaſtle, from whence they returned into their country. We ſhall ſee preſently what was the event of this project.

The parliament of England, meeting the 22d of January, granted the king a ſubſidy [s], as well for his charges in the war with Scotland, as for his other occaſions. By that was meant a war with France, of which there was no longer room to doubt, ſince the king was upon the point of concluding a league with the emperor. The union which was going to be formed between theſe two monarchs, was like to be ſo favourable to the adherents of Rome and the old religion, that they queſtioned not but the deſtruction of the reformation in England was approaching. However, at this very time they had the mortification to ſee an act of parliament paſſed, which much checked their hopes. The act moved, and at length obtained by Cranmer, ran, that lords, gentlemen, merchants, might have in their houſes an Engliſh bible, with ſome other religious books, mentioned in the act, for the inſtruction of their families. But it was expreſly forbid to print, ſell, buy, or keep, any other religious books, and to preach or ſpeak againſt the ordinance of the year 1540. There was alſo a very conſiderable clauſe in the ſtatute, that the offenders, if eccleſiaſtics, ſhould not be condemned to be burnt till the third offence; and the puniſhment of the laity, not extend beyond forfeiture of goods and chattels [and perpetual impriſonment.] Moreover, the act allowed the party accuſed to bring witneſſes for his own purgation, which had never been practiſed before in the caſe of hereſy. Laſtly, it was enacted, that the accuſed ſhould be tried within a year at fartheſt after the indictment. But, on the other hand, the law of the ſix articles was confirmed, and the parliament left it in the king's power to annul or alter the act at his pleaſure. By this laſt clauſe the king ſtill continued to be maſter of the lives of the reformed, ſince by repealing this act he could proſecute them upon the former ſtatutes [t].

A fortnight after, the parliament broke up, Henry concluded with the emperor a league, which, however, was not publiſhed till June. It was not the intereſt of England that the king ſhould join with the emperor to render him more powerful. He was already but too potent. On the contrary, it would have been much more proper, in order to keep the balance even, to have aſſiſted France. At leaſt, it is undeniable, that a neutrality would have been advantageous to the Engliſh. But the king's paſſion ran counter to the nation's intereſt. He was extremely diſſatisfied with Francis upon ſeveral accounts. In the firſt place, he obſerved in him a great indifference for his concerns, ever ſince he had not wanted his aſſiſtance. Secondly, he perceived at length that all his promiſes to renounce, like him, the papal authority, tended only to amuſe him. He knew Francis, on ſeveral occaſions, had blamed his conduct with reſpect to religion, and ridiculed his marriages. In the next place, he paid neither the yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns, nor that of ten thouſand for the ſalt of Brouage, though bound by divers treaties. As for the debt of two millions, Francis indeed could produce acquittances for good part of that ſum, but then Henry had received no money, the acquittances being in lieu of the ſuccours he had voluntarily promiſed to lend him in his former wars. However, there was a round ſum ſtill left unpaid, and the debtor never endeavoured to ſatisfy him. Moreover, Henry had preſented the king of France with what was due to him from the emperor, ſolely on condition he would perform the treaties, and complained, Francis had not been punctual. But what moſt offended Henry was, the obſtacles Francis had raiſed him in Scotland by means of a faction, which openly oppoſed his deſigns. Here was a ſufficient cauſe for a breach, if the nation's intereſt had been the ſame with the king's. But in ſuch an oppoſition, ſeldom does it happen that the people's advantage prevails over the ſovereign's. Henry reſolved, therefore, to make the king of France ſenſible that it was worth his while to have ſhewn a greater regard for him, and to that end, choſe to be reconciled with the emperor, and join in a league with him.

Charles V. deſired nothing more earneſtly. He plainly ſaw that, with the aſſiſtance of England, he ſhould ſoon bring the king of France to reaſon, and deſtroy all his hopes of recovering Milan by arms. His conſtant fear of Henry's uniting with France and the German proteſtants, cauſed him to conſider the alliance with England as what would enable him to accompliſh his ambitious deſigns. He found his account much better in hindering Francis from ſetting foot again in Italy, and in ſubduing the proteſtants, than in executing or rather in trying to execute the pope's ſentence againſt Henry, an undertaking which, probably, would not have ended to his honour. Beſides, the death of queen Catherine, his aunt, had much leſſened, and it may be entirely ſtifled, his deſire to revenge her. So, at the very time he was complaining to all the princes of Europe that Francis had private intelligence with the infidels, he ſcrupled not to court the alliance of an excommunicated king, who, according to the principles of the Romiſh church, ought not to have been looked upon with leſs horror than the Turk. One ſingle difficulty retarded the concluſion of this alliance. The emperor would have Mary, queen Catherine's daughter, acknowledged for legitimate, which Henry obſtinately refuſed. Nay, he could not grant it without condemning his divorce with Catherine, and all his proceedings upon that occaſion. He promiſed however, that purſuant to the power granted him by parliament, he would give Mary a place in the ſucceſſion, but would never conſent this article ſhould be inſerted in the treaty. The emperor's friends in England adviſed him to be ſatisfied with this verbal promiſe, apprehenſive as they were that the league, from whence they expected great advantages, would be delayed by this obſtacle. Bonner, biſhop of London, who had been ſent into Spain for the negotiation, willingly and ardently endeavoured to accompliſh it, in hopes that an union between the emperor and the king, would re-eſtabliſh religion in England upon the ſame foot as before the divorce.

The treaty was therefore concluded at London the 11th of February 1543. It contained a league for England only with what Henry held in Picardy; and on the emperor's part, for the provinces of the Low Countries under his dominion [u], without any mention of Spain or Germany. The league was to this effect:

That the emperor and the king of England ſhould ſend embaſſadors to the king of France, to declare to him, that by his ſollicitations only the Turks had invaded Chriſtendom. That therefore the two confederate monarchs exhorted him

[s] This ſubſidy was as follows: every perſon worth in goods 20l. and upwards, paid two ſhillings; from 20l. to 10l. ſixteen-pence; from 10l. to 5l. eight-pence; from 5l. to 20s. four-pence. And for lands, fees, and annuities, they paid according to this rate: they that were worth 20l. and upwards, paid three ſhillings in the pound; from 20l. to 10l. two ſhillings; from 10l. to 5l. ſixteen-pence; and they that were worth from 5l. to 20s. paid eight-pence in the pound; all theſe were doubled on ſtrangers. The clergy alſo granted a ſubſidy of ſix ſhillings in the pound; and every prieſt, having but an annual ſtipend, was to pay ſix ſhillings and eight-pence. Theſe ſeveral ſubſidies were to be paid in three years. Stow, p. 585.

[t] In this parliament, an act was made for authoriſing the county and city of Cheſter to ſend each two repreſentatives in parliament, which they uſed not to do before; and another, for empowering perſons, that are not common ſurgeons, to miniſter medicines, notwithſtanding the Statute 3. Hen. VIII.

[u] The places and dominions, mentioned on king Henry's part, are the kingdoms of England and Ireland, the iſlands of Wight, Jerſey, Guernſey, and Man; the caſtle and earldom of Guyſnes, and the towns of Calais and Berwick; and, on the emperor's part, are named, the kingdom of Spain [regna Hiſpaniarum] the provinces of Brabant, Flanders, Holland, Zealand, Hanow, Artois, Limburg, Luxemburg, Namur, Friefeland; the countries of Dureſſel, Utrecht, and Mechlin. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 769, 770.

to break his alliance with the Infidels, to hold them for enemies, and renounce his correſpondence with them. That they demanded moreover, he ſhould ſatisfy the damages done to Chriſtendom, by his calling in thoſe cruel enemies. That he ſhould give over the war he had begun in ſeveral places, that the emperor might apply himſelf to the defence of Chriſtendom. That he ſhould cauſe the town of Maran, taken by the Turks, to be reſtored to king Ferdinand, and to the emperor, Caſtro-novo, which they had beſieged with the aid of twelve French gallies. That he ſhould repair the loſſes the Germans had ſuſtained by the Turkiſh invaſion. Laſtly, that he ſhould ſatisfy the king of England for whatever he owed him, and give him ſecurity for the payment of the hundred thouſand crowns.

After theſe preliminaries, the two confederate monarchs agreed, that they would not make peace or truce but upon theſe conditions; that Francis ſhould pay the king of England whatever was due to him; and for ſecurity of the annual penſion, ſurrender into his hands the earldom of Ponthieu, Boulogne, Montreuil, Ardres, and Terouenne, free from all homage, for which however Henry ſhould conſent that the yearly revenues thence ariſing ſhould be in lieu of the penſion. Moreover, that Francis ſhould reſtore to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy.

That if the king of France ſhould delay but ten days to accept theſe conditions, the two confederate monarchs ſhould proclaim war againſt him, with a declaration that they would never make peace till the king of England was in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Guienne, and the kingdom of France; and the emperor, of Abbeville, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quinty, and the whole duchy of Burgundy.

Laſtly, They agreed, that each ſhould take the field, and invade France with twenty-five thouſand men, of whom five thouſand ſhould be cavalry [w].

Theſe were vaſt projects. But theſe princes were too wiſe to imagine that with twenty-five thouſand men each they were able to conquer France. It is likely therefore, they agreed in the treaty to bring into the field ſo ſmall a number of troops, only to engage Francis to make preparations accordingly. And indeed we ſhall ſee hereafter, that they invaded France with above a hundred thouſand men.

One of the chief reaſons why Henry joined in a league with the emperor was, to find the king of France ſo much employment at home, that it ſhould not be in his power to break his meaſures for the union of Scotland with England, by a marriage between Mary and prince Edward. Henry had this affair extremely at heart, and very juſtly, as it is eaſy to imagine. But unhappily for him, there was a queen dowager in Scotland of the houſe of Lorrain, and a cardinal archbiſhop of St. Andrews, who being both devoted to France and the pope, laboured with all their power to defeat his projects. As the affairs of Scotland will be very ſoon intermixt with thoſe of England, it is abſolutely neceſſary to ſee what paſſed in that country after the death of James V. without which it would be very difficult to underſtand what will be ſaid hereafter.

After the deceaſe of James V. Scotland was in a very ill ſituation. The late king had not ſettled the regency during his daughter's minority. The next heir to Mary was James Hamilton earl of Arran, a perſon of mean genius, a lover of books and eaſe, but little capable of managing the public affairs, and ſtill leſs thoſe of war [x]. He had ſhewn ſome inclination for the new religion, and thereby rendered himſelf as much ſuſpected and odious to the clergy, as agreeable to thoſe who bad embraced the reformation. The queen dowager, ſiſter to the cardinal Lorrain and the duke of Guiſe, had an extreme averſion to the reformed. This averſion was cheriſhed by cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, a violent and cruel man, who had already given ſeveral proofs of his barbarous temper towards thoſe who embraced the new religion. Moſt of the lords who, by their counſels, could have ſupported the ſtate in ſuch a juncture, were either ſlain in the late rout, or in the hands of the Engliſh. But though they had been alive or in Scotland, it would have been very difficult to ſucceed. There had long been ſuch a diviſion among the nobles, that what one moved was ſure to be oppoſed by another. This was the conſequence of the factions raiſed by the kings of France and England in the kingdom, and which were continued by different opinions in religion. To all theſe evils was added that of a war againſt a powerful neighbour, who had juſt gained a very conſiderable advantage, and could eaſily improve the conſternation all Scotland was under.

Amidſt this confuſion, cardinal Beaton, ſeeing none able to withſtand him, formed the deſign of ſeizing the regency. To that end, he forged a will for the late king, wherein he was appointed regent or viceroy during Mary's minority, with three counſellors or aſſiſtants, of whom the earl of Arran was one, and cauſed it to be publiſhed till the parliament ſhould meet and confirm it. Mean while, he ſtrove by all ſorts of ways to gain proper perſons to ſupport him, as well among the people as among the great men. The queen dowager was the firſt that declared for him.

But whilſt the cardinal was labouring to ſtrengthen his party, the friends and relations of the earl of Arran were earneſtly ſolliciting him, not to yield the regency to one who had no right to it. They repreſented to him, that the will on which the cardinal grounded his pretenſions, was a forgery, becauſe the late king never valued him ſo as to commit the regency to him in prejudice of the princes of the blood: that it was a contrivance to deſtroy the Hamiltons with their whole party, and hinder the progreſs of the reformation: that the cardinal was known to be a man of ill principles, of little or no conſcience, cruel and ſuperſtitious, and if once he had the power in his hands, the flames of perſecution would be quickly kindled all over the kingdom, not only againſt the reformed, but againſt all in general who would not blindly ſubmit to his orders; that infallibly the princes of the blood, and the chief of the nobles, would be firſt ſacrificed to his ambition and jealouſy. The earl of Arran was of a peaceable temper, and without ambition. If he had followed his own inclination, he would have left the cardinal quietly to enjoy the authority he had uſurped. But his friends having in a manner forced him by their remonſtrances to proſecute the right due to his birth, he reſolved to demand the regency, and ſhew the forgery of the pretended will on which the cardinal reſted.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the priſoners, who had been releaſed, came to Scotland, and with them Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, and William Douglas, his brother, who had been fifteen years exiles in England. By their arrival, the earl of Arran's party was conſiderably ſtrengthened, whereas the cardinal loſt many followers, who had joined with him more out of fear than affection. It was publicly ſaid, that the earl of Arran's right was indiſputable, though the king had capriciouſly diſpoſed of the regency in favour of the cardinal, which, however, was incredible. The parliament meeting in March, the will was examined, and the forgery being detected, the cardinal was removed, and the earl of Arran declared regent with almoſt unanimous conſent. It was not without reaſon that moſt of the lords and nobles were deſirous to free themſelves from the dominion of cardinal Beaton. Before the parliament met, a paper was found, written with the king's own hand, wherein were ſet down the names of three hundred lords and gentlemen, whom he had reſolved to diſpatch. As moſt of the proſcribed perſons were of the reformed religion, or favoured the reformation, it was not doubted, that the cardinal had greatly contributed to put the king upon this barbarous reſolution, by repreſenting to him that thoſe who had refuſed to fight againſt the Engliſh, were ſecret friends of the king of England, and favourers of the new opinions. It is certain many of the nobility were of the reformed religion, or well-wiſhers to the reformation. The earl of Arran was of this number, and upon that account was ſo well ſupported when he demanded the regency, becauſe thoſe of the new religion intended to make him their protector. But this was an ill choice, the earl's inactive and timorous temper rendering him very unfit to ſupport the party who put themſelves under his protection.

Whilſt the parliament was ſitting, Henry ſent an embaſſador [y] to Scotland, to propoſe the marriage of prince Edward, his ſon, with the young queen, according to the agreement with the captive lords. The embaſſador was furniſhed with a good ſum of money to facilitate the negotiation; Henry knowing, by experience, how effectual that means was in Scotland. The queen and cardinal Beaton uſed all their credit and addreſs to cauſe the overture to be rejected. But as their party was too weak to balance the king of England's, the cardinal made it his buſineſs to confound all the conferences held upon this occaſion, by long ſpeeches, affected diſputes, invectives againſt the contrary party, with deſign to raiſe quarrels, which would obſtruct the concluſion of the affair.

His artifice being at laſt perceived, he was confined to a room till the debates were ended. The moment the cardinal no longer appeared, the king of England's propoſal was accepted without much difficulty, and the parliament appointed embaſſadors to go and treat at London with the king concerning a peace and the marriage. George Douglas, the earl of Angus's brother, and ſome other lords[z], were charged with the negotiation, which ended at length in two treaties, concluded at London the 1ſt of July 1543. The firſt, was to ſettle a good and firm peace between the two kingdoms. The ſecond, for the marriage of prince Edward with the young queen of Scotland. Henry did all he could to have Mary put into his hands. But the Scotch embaſſadors not conſenting, it was at laſt agreed, ſhe ſhould not be brought into England till ſhe was ten years of age: that in the mean time the parliament of Scotland ſhould appoint four lords[a] to take care of her education, and Henry might add a fifth of his own nation, to convey his advices to the governors[b]: that the parliament of Scotland ſhould give the king ſix hoſtages of diſtinction for ſecurity that the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

This affair being ended, the cardinal had a little more liberty granted him, by being given in cuſtody to the lord Seaton. But that lord, ſuffering himſelf to be corrupted by his priſoner, afforded him means to make his eſcape. As ſoon as he was at liberty, he uſed all his art to break the treaties with England, wherein he was powerfully aſſiſted by the queen dowager. As they were both firmly attached to France and the old religion, they could not ſee, without extreme grief, the alliance lately concluded with a prince whom they looked upon as a heretic, and whoſe intereſts had for ſome time been contrary to thoſe of Francis I. They plainly perceived this alliance was capable of producing great alterations, as well in church as ſtate, and would infallibly deſtroy the antient union between France and Scotland. To prevent this, the cardinal aſſembled at his houſe the heads of the clergy, and repreſenting to them that religion was in danger, he obtained a large contribution to aſſiſt him to ſupport it. This money ſerved to maintain his creatures, and gain ſome of the contrary party. In a word, he ſo well caballed, that he quickly put things in extreme confuſion. By his ſollicitations and intrigues he ſo managed, that the priſoners who had been releaſed, reſolved not to go and redeem their hoſtages. The earl of Caſſilis alone could not be prevailed with upon any conſideration to break his word. In ſhort, the cardinal's party being grown very numerous by his liberalities, ſtrongly oppoſed the ſending the hoſtages promiſed to the king of England by the treaty. Beſides that, the cardinal reſolving at any rate to ſet the two nations at variance, cauſed the Engliſh embaſſador to be highly affronted by ſome of his party, and his ſervants to be inſulted. But the embaſſador knowing how deſirous the king his maſter was that the treaties ſhould be executed, bore all with patience for fear of raiſing an unſeaſonable quarrel, which he ſaw to be the cardinal's view. Thus the cardinal had brought things to ſuch a ſtate, that the regent, who wanted reſolution, tried in vain to ſtop theſe violent proceedings, ſince his commands were openly diſobeyed.

At laſt, the day being come that the three hoſtages were to be delivered, the Engliſh embaſſador demanded them of the regent, complaining withal of the affronts he had received. The regent told him, "He was very ſorry any diſreſpect had been ſhewn to his perſon and character, and would give him at a more convenient ſeaſon what ſatisfaction he deſired, but at preſent it was no proper juncture. That he was himſelf witneſs of the troubles raiſed by the cardinal, and how contemptible the authority of the government was rendered by that prelate's cabals: as for the hoſtages, it was no longer in his power to put them into his hands, ſince the cardinal and his whole party were againſt it, who were now grown too ſtrong to be compelled." The embaſſador was ſufficiently convinced of the truth of what the regent ſaid; and as he ſaw little appearance of a change in favour of the king his maſter, he contented himſelf with ſummoning the priſoners to return to England according to their promiſe. But in that he ſucceeded no better. They refuſed to return, though they were releaſed only upon parole. The earl of Caſſilis alone[c], abhorring the perfidiouſneſs of his fellow priſoners, ſet out for London, and put himſelf into the king's hands. This action met with its due reward. Henry very civilly received the earl. He commended his faithfulneſs, and, making him rich preſents, diſmiſſed him without ranſom. Mean while, finding his party in Scotland was neither very ſtrong, nor firm enough to his intereſt, he reſolved to proclaim war with that kingdom. He might eaſily have ſubdued it ſome months before, if he would have taken advantage of the conſternation of the Scots, after their defeat and the death of their ſovereign.

The queen and the cardinal having accompliſhed their deſign with reſpect to a rupture with England, conſidered of means to procure the government of the kingdom, by ſupplanting the earl of Arran, head of the contrary faction. Indeed, they did not much fear the earl, as they had lately ſhewn. But he bore the title of regent, and very poſſibly, by the counſels of the able men of his party, and the king of England's aſſiſtance, he might find means in the end to make himſelf formidable. The war Henry had proclaimed againſt Scotland afforded them an opportunity to execute their project. They repreſented to the king of France, "That it was almoſt impoſſible for Scotland to maintain a war againſt England without a powerful aid from him: that the earl of Arran, regent of the kingdom, favoured the Engliſh, and inſtead of oppoſing them, would certainly make uſe of them to eſtabliſh his authority and compleat the queen's projected marriage: that probably this marriage would break the old alliance between France and Scotland, and produce a ſtrict union between Scotland and England: that he might plainly ſee how much he was himſelf concerned in a war, which, as it would infallibly be unſucceſsful, would cauſe him to loſe Scotland: that indeed they perceived how difficult it was for him to aſſiſt them, when he wanted all his forces againſt the emperor: but they had deviſed an expedient to gain time, in breaking the meaſures of the contrary party. The expedient was, that he ſhould ſend over Matthew Stewart, earl of Lenox, who was in France, that they might oppoſe him to the Hamiltons, whoſe ſworn enemy he was, becauſe they had killed his father: that this lord, being in Scotland, would be immediately acknowledged for head of the party againſt the regent, and by the aſſiſtance they were ready to lend him, would become ſo ſuperior, that it would not be poſſible for the regent to execute his deſigns in favour of England." The better to perſuade the earl of Lenox to come to Scotland, they put him in hopes of marrying the queen dowager, and of being placed on the throne in caſe the young queen died before ſhe was married. They told him, this would be ſo much the eaſier, as before the birth of Mary, the late king had deſigned him for his ſucceſſor, though farther removed than the earl of Arran, becauſe he looked upon Arran as a baſtard, by reaſon of the unlawfulneſs of his father's marriage. Theſe remonſtrances had the deſired effect. Francis I. glad to ſtrengthen his party in Scotland, without being forced to ſend great ſupplies, ſent away the earl of Lenox with all ſpeed, promiſing him his protection.

Mean while, the regent, having ſome notice of this project, reſolved to ſupport himſelf by becoming maſter of the queen's perſon, then in the caſtle of Linlithgow[d]. But as he was not ſecret enough, the cardinal, who was informed of it, came to Llinlithgow, well attended, in order to hinder the queen's removal. Shortly after, the earl of Lenox arrived from France, and after ſaluting the regent, withdrew to his own houſe, where he aſſembled his friends, to conſult with them what was to be done. He acquainted them with the motives of his return, and the hopes given him of being put in poſſeſſion of the regency, the queen mother, and the throne, if the young queen happened to die. The friends he conſulted being all enemies to the regent, unanimouſly adviſed him to improve the preſent opportunity; and each made him an offer of his perſon, his eſtate, his vaſſals, and his friends. So the earl, being determined to purſue his point, drew together four thouſand men, and putting himſelf at their head, came to the queen, under colour of guarding her againſt the attempts of the regent, for fear ſhe ſhould be delivered to the enemies of the kingdom. Indeed, the earl of Arran had reſolved to ſecure her, and was preparing to execute his deſigns. But when he found himſelf prevented, and conſidered the queen could not be got out of the hands of the earl of Lenox, without coming to an open war, he ſent to treat of an agreement. Lenox conſented, on condition the queen ſhould for the future be educated in Stirling caſtle, and four neutral lords, whom both parties could equally truſt, appointed to guard her, and take care of her education. The four lords [e] being choſen and approved of, the queen was removed to Stirling caſtle, where, a few days after [f], ſhe was crowned.

The regent, ſeeing the party of his enemies daily gathered ſtrength, believed himſelf unable to withſtand the ſtorm which was forming againſt him. So his courage and reſolution failing him when moſt wanted, he choſe to give way to the torrent, rather than ſtrive in vain, as he thought, to reſiſt it. Perſuaded as he was that he ſhould be too weak to oppoſe the queen-mother and the cardinal, he believed he ought to alter his meaſures, and ſtrictly unite with them. But even here he met with difficulties which he could not ſurmount, without acting againſt his conſcience. He had hitherto almoſt openly profeſſed the new religion. But the queen and the cardinal, as they could not reſolve to be reconciled to him, ſo long as he was engaged in the party of the reformed, managed him ſo well, that at laſt they perſuaded him to abjure in the church of the Franciſcans at Stirling. By this action he loſt all his old friends, and was reduced to depend upon the oppoſite party, with whom the cardinal had more power than himſelf. From thenceforward he was wholly guided by the counſels of that prelate, who was the true regent, whilſt the earl that bore the name was only the ſhadow.

When the queen and the cardinal were poſſeſſed of the government, they were at a loſs about the earl of Lenox, to whom they were no longer willing to perform their promiſe. So their chief care was to be rid of that lord, who greatly embarraſſed them. They agreed, therefore, to deſire the king of France to recal him, and, whilſt an anſwer was expected, the queen ſhould continue to cheriſh his hopes, but withal ſhould uſe ſundry artifices to delay her marriage, concerning which he began to be very urgent with her. This project was executed as it had been reſolved. The queen for ſome time amuſed her lover, who, not ſuſpecting what was contriving againſt him, ſpent his time in procuring her diverſions, imagining, that would haſten his marriage; but the queen ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe to defer it. This behaviour at laſt bred in him ſuſpicions, which were confirmed by ſome friend of greater penetration, or better informed, than himſelf. He heard the queen and the cardinal had wrote to the court of France, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the king's intereſt than his ſtay in Scotland, ſince they had gained the regent to their ſide.

Lenox was ſo provoked at being thus mocked, that he ſwore to be revenged, and, without taking leave of the queen and the cardinal, retired to Dunbarton. In the mean while, Francis, who was not yet informed of the alterations in Scotland, ſent thirty thouſand crowns to the earl of Lenox, to be diſtributed among thoſe of the party, or to gain ſome of their adverſaries. By theſe means the court of France had long maintained a faction in Scotland, whilſt the court of England oppoſed her by the ſame methods. The money arriving when Lenox was at Dunbarton, he ſent part to the lords who had the care of the young queen, and gave ſome to his own friends. But the cardinal had none, though he had flattered himſelf with having the beſt ſhare, and expected it with impatience. He was ſo very angry, that he perſuaded the regent to raiſe an army and ſurpriſe Glaſgow, where Lenox was retired with his money. The preparations which were making at court, though under other pretences, giving the earl of Lenox ſuſpicion they were deſigned againſt him, he reſolved to put himſelf in a poſture of defence. It was not difficult for him to draw forces together. The cardinal had many enemies, and the regent had loſt his friends, ſince they had been forſaken by him. So the regent's levies were made very ſlowly, whilſt the earl's viſibly encreaſed. Within a few days, he raiſed ten thouſand men, and ſent the cardinal word [g] he would ſave him the trouble of coming to Glaſgow. The cardinal received the defiance with a ſeeming contempt, and pretended to purſue his enterpriſe. But it was not his intention to come to a battle. He did not ſufficiently rely on the regent's experience, who was no warrior. Beſides, he foreſaw that, by prolonging the time, he ſhould oblige his enemy to diſmiſs his troops, becauſe he wanted wherewithal to keep them long on foot.

What the cardinal had foreſeen came paſs. The earl of Lenox, finding himſelf deſtitute of money, and ſeeing the deſertion was great in his army, was forced at laſt to accept a peace that was offered him. He came to Edinburgh, where he was outwardly reconciled with the regent and the cardinal; after which they went together to Stirling. But a few days after, having notice that the court had ill deſigns againſt him, he privately withdrew, and, returning to Glaſgow, furniſhed the biſhop's palace with a garriſon and ammunition, and ſhut himſelf up in Dunbarton. There he was informed, that the king of France had been ſo prejudiced againſt him, that there was no hope of obtaining his aſſiſtance for the future. Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Scotland when Henry reſolved to renew the war againſt that kingdom. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in England.

In July, Henry married his ſixth wife, the lady Catherine Parr [h], widow of John Nevil, lord Latimer, verifying what was only ſaid in railery upon the act paſſed in 1541, that the king muſt marry a widow. The new queen was a favourer of the reformed. But ſhe was to proceed with great caution, not to offend a huſband, whoſe abſolute will it was, that none ſhould believe but what was believed by himſelf. For that reaſon ſhe durſt not, juſt after her marriage, intercede for three proteſtants who were burnt at Windſor [i], at the inveſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter. This prelate never miſſed an opportunity to exaſperate the king againſt thoſe who refuſed to ſubmit to the act of the ſix articles. But he ſhewed not the ſame zeal againſt thoſe who were ſtill attached to the pope. This affair, however, went farther than he deſired, ſince it occaſioned the diſcovery of a plot, formed to ruin ſeveral families at Windſor, upon falſe accuſations. The king was ſo offended at theſe diabolical practices, that he would have the affair thoroughly examined. The event was, that the contrivers of the plot [k] were carried on horſeback, with their faces to the horſe-tails, and then ſet in the pillory. It is ſaid, Gardiner had a great ſhare in the project. But he was a very crafty man, who knew how to conceal the hand that gave the blow, when he thought it dangerous to ſhew it.

It was eaſy for the enemies of the reformation to perceive that Cranmer moſt obſtructed the execution of their deſigns, and they ſhould never ſucceed ſo long as he was in favour with the king. Whereupon they reſolved to apply themſelves before all things to his deſtruction, after which, they imagined, the ruin of his whole party would follow of courſe. There were in this undertaking two contrary things, whereof one ſeemed to promiſe ſucceſs, and the other rendered the execution very difficult. The firſt was, the king ſeemed fully bent not to ſpare thoſe who were called heretics, that is, thoſe who did not entirely conform themſelves to the declaration of faith lately publiſhed. Now every one knew the archbiſhop was of this number, though he uſed great caution not to give his enemies any advantage either by word or deed. The ſecond was, the king's ſingular eſteem for the archbiſhop, againſt whom ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts had been made. Notwithſtanding this, his enemies thought, if he could convince the king that Cranmer's opinions were very different from his, it would in ſome meaſure incenſe him. After that they hoped the king would require of him, as of the reſt of his ſubjects, a blind ſubmiſſion, and that Cranmer's oppoſition would deſtroy the king's affection for him. The buſineſs therefore was to inſpire the king with ſuſpicions, which ſhould induce him to examine what were the archbiſhop's opinions upon religion. To that end, no occaſion was loſt to hint to the king, that it was in vain to puniſh heretics whilſt the chief ſupporters were ſuffered to live unmoleſted. Henry, perceiving Cranmer was aimed at, made no anſwer. He hoped his ſilence would demonſtrate, it was in vain to try to incenſe him againſt that prelate. But at laſt, theſe inſinuations were ſo often repeated, that he ſeemed to give ear to them, in order to know their intent. He hearkened therefore to whatever was ſaid againſt Cranmer, and deſired to have the intended articles of accuſation, with the names of his accuſers. The duke of Norfolk, the biſhop of Wincheſter, and their party, believed the archbiſhop ruined, ſince the king was pleaſed to examine his conduct. But they took care not to make themſelves parties, their deſign being to appear unconcerned, to ſtrike the ſurer. They cauſed therefore the accuſation to be drawn by ſome prebendaries of Canterbury, and certain Kentiſh juſtices of the peace, whom they perſuaded to be his accuſers. The articles being put into the king's hands, he went in his barge to Lambeth, the archbiſhop's palace, on the other ſide of the Thames. Cranmer hearing the king was coming, haſtened down to his ſtairs to receive him, and by his order went into the barge. When the king was alone with him, he lamented the growth of hereſy in the kingdom, and told him, he was endeavouring to find out the chief encouragers of it, to puniſh them according to the utmoſt rigour of the law, about which he was come to aſk his advice. Cranmer anſwered, without any concern, that his zeal was laudable; but entreated him for God's ſake to conſider well what hereſy was, leſt, inſtead of puniſhing heretics, he fought againſt God. After ſome converſation upon the ſubject, the king told him at laſt, he was the man who was accuſed of being the protector and chief encourager of the heretics, and then gave him the articles of accuſation againſt him. Cranmer, peruſing them, fell on his knees, and freely owned to the king, he was ſtill of the ſame mind as when he oppoſed the ſix articles; but that he had done or ſaid nothing againſt them. Then he humbly deſired to be tried by the laws, becauſe he was ſure he ſhould never be convicted of tranſgreſſing them. Whereupon the king aſked him, whether it was true that he was married. Cranmer confeſſed it, but ſaid he had ſent away his wife to Germany upon the paſſing of the act of the ſix articles. Henry, who had long ſeen about him only ſuch as diſſembled their ſentiments, was charmed with the archbiſhop's candour and ſincerity. Inſtead of being diſpleaſed with his confeſſion, he could not forbear admiring his ſteadineſs, which made him dare the greateſt danger he had ever been in, and that he ſo wiſely allied it with an inviolable regard for the laws. Wherefore he gave him a very ſenſible proof of his eſteem and affection, in diſcovering to him the plot his enemies had laid againſt him, naming his accuſers, and ordering him to proceed againſt them. Cranmer excuſed himſelf, but the king told him poſitively he would be obeyed, and that he ſhould name his judges himſelf. If Cranmer had been vindictive, he had a fair opportunity of being revenged on thoſe who would have ruined him, and particularly on Gardiner, chief contriver of the plot, as appears in letters under his own hand. But he ſhewed ſo great backwardneſs to puſh the affair, that at length the king was tired with preſſing him, ſince he did it ſo unwillingly. Mean while, he had not the leſs value for him. Shortly after, one of his ſecret enemies, known for ſuch by the king, though he himſelf had no ſuſpicion of him, deſiring his aſſiſtance in a ſuit he had at court, he went immediately and ſpoke to the king in his behalf. The king ſurpriſed to ſee him ſpeak for that perſon, aſked him if he knew him well; and upon his anſwering, that he took him for his friend; "No, (replied the king) he is your mortal enemy, and I command you when you ſee him next to call him knave." Cranmer modeſtly anſwered, ſuch language did not become a biſhop; but the king inſiſted upon his compliance. Nevertheleſs Canmer found means to be excuſed, and the king, content with admiring his goodneſs, would not preſs him any farther. Thus the plot contrived for the archbiſhop's ruin, ſerved only to endear him the more to the king, and demonſtrate to his enemies how dangerous it was to attack him.

The 23d of December the king created the lord Parr, the queen's brother, earl of Eſſex [l], and conferred on ſir William Parr her uncle, the title of lord Parr, of Horton, with the office of chamberlain to the queen [m].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the war between the emperor and the king of France was carrying on in ſeveral places. In the beginning of the campaign, Francis had ſome advantages in the Low Countries, where he took Landrecy, Emery, Bapanume, Maubeuge, and Luxemburg. But the emperor arriving about the end of the ſummer with a ſtrong ſupply of Spaniſh troops, Francis, being inferior in number, was obliged to keep at ſome diſtance. This gave the emperor an opportunity to inveſt Landrecy, of which however he was forced to raiſe the ſiege, upon Francis's finding means to throw in ſuccours. But he made himſelf amends by taking Cambray.

At the ſame time Barbaroſſa, admiral of the Turks, coming to Marſeilles the beginning of July with a hundred and ten Turkiſh gallies, found there the earl of Enghein, of the houſe of Bourbon, with twenty-two French gallies. After their junction, they went together and attacked Nice the 10th of Auguſt, and on the 20th became maſters of the town. But the caſtle made ſo brave a defence, that the Turkiſh admiral retired and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turkey the beginning of the ſpring. I ſhall ſay nothing of the war in Piedmont, becauſe it produced no remarkable event [n].

During the whole campaign, Henry aſſiſted the emperor only with a ſmall body [o] of troops, commanded by ſir John Wallop [p]. But they both formed vaſt projects for the next year. They intended to enter France, the one by Champagne, the other by Picardy, each at the head of forty thouſand men, and to join about Paris. To execute this project it was neceſſary to act with union and good underſtanding. So Henry could not diſpenſe with performing his promiſe to the emperor, to give the princeſs Mary a place in the ſucceſſion.

[1544] The parliament meeting the 14th of January 1544, immediately paſſed an act, ſettling the order of thoſe who could pretend to the crown after the king's death. I have frequently obſerved, that the parliament was held in ſubjection, and did nothing but what the king pleaſed. Several inſtances have been ſeen, but none more flagrant than the following. In this act prince Edward was ranked firſt, with his iſſue. In the ſecond place, the heirs male by the king's preſent or future marriage with their iſſue. In the third place, the princeſs Mary and her line. Laſtly, the princeſs Elizabeth and her heirs. But there was no mention of the king's divorces with the queens, mothers to theſe two princeſſes. So, notwithſtanding the acts which approved and confirmed theſe divorces, and were never repealed, the parliament ſeemed to conſider theſe princeſſes as legitimate, though before they had been declared baſtards, and as ſuch, excluded from the ſucceſſion. On the other hand, to convince them, they were indebted to the king their father for this favour, the act made them liable to ſuch limitations or conditions, as the king ſhould pleaſe to declare by his letters patents, on pain of forfeiting the right which was granted them. Moreover, in caſe of diſobedience on their part, or if they died without heirs, the parliament gave the king power to ſettle the crown on any other by his letters patents, or his laſt will ſigned by his own hand. Was not this conſidering theſe two princeſſes as baſtards, ſince their right to the ſucceſſion was made to depend on the king their father's pleaſure? Without pretending to queſtion the right of the king and repreſentatives of the nation to ſettle the ſucceſſion as they pleaſe. I cannot forbear remarking, that this right was carried on that occaſion as far as it can be ſtretched. Suppoſing theſe two princeſſes baſtards, the parliament empowered the king to call them to the throne, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm ſince the conqueſt. On the other hand, ſuppoſing them legitimate, they left the king free to exclude them from the ſucceſſion, contrary to the ſame laws and cuſtoms, ſince it was in his breaſt to impoſe on them conditions impoſſible to be performed. This was a power no king of England had ever enjoyed, and which ſhews this act flowed not ſo much from the parliament as from the king himſelf. To palliate in ſome meaſure theſe contradictions, care was taken not to mention in the act, the king's divorces with Catherine and Anne. Only every one was free to gueſs the motives of the act, which was not very difficult, ſince there was no other than that of complying with the king's will. By a clauſe in the ſtatute, all perſons were obliged to take a new oath againſt the authority of the biſhop of Rome, which whoſoever refuſed, or ſhould break any of the articles of the act, was to be adjudged a traitor.

By another act, paſſed this ſeſſion, the title of king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and ſupreme head of the church of England and Ireland, was united for ever to the crown of England.

By another it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould be indicted on the ſtatute of the ſix articles, but upon a preſentment by the oaths of twelve men, before commiſſioners, appointed by the king: that no perſon ſhould be impriſoned but upon an indictment; and laſtly, the preſentment ſhould

Laſtly, the parliament granted the king a ſubſidy, in a manner unheard of before, by enjoining that thoſe who had lent him money ſhould be obliged to forgive the debt [r]. However unjuſt this act was with reſpect to the particular perſons who had lent the money, the parliament was not ſorry the king deſired it, in order to put a ſtop to the cuſtom of loans, which in time would have rendered parliaments uſeleſs.

The power formerly granted the king was alſo revived during life, of appointing commiſſioners to examine all canons and conſtitutions eccleſiaſtical, and to make the neceſſary alterations, which the king had hitherto neglected [s].

Before the end of the ſeſſion, Thomas Wriotheſly, great friend of the old religion, was made lord chancellor, in the room of the lord Audley deceaſed [t].

In the beginning of the year, Francis I. ſent into Piedmont the earl of Enghien, who was but two and twenty years old, to take the command of the army in the room of Boutiers, who had not been very ſucceſsful. The young prince, engaging the marquis of Guaſto at Ceriſoles, obtained the 14th of April a ſignal victory over him, which coſt the Imperialiſts ten thouſand men, beſides the wounded and priſoners. In the conſternation the marquis of Guaſto was under, after the loſs of the battle, he would have found it very difficult to keep Milan for the emperor, if the earl of Enghien had not been ſtopped in the midſt of his career by expreſs orders. As the king of France was informed that the emperor and the king of England were to join and invade him in the center of his dominions, with an army of eighty thouſand foot and twenty-two thouſand horſe, he deemed it more neceſſary to provide for the defence of his kingdom than to think of making conqueſts in Italy. For that reaſon he ordered the earl of Enghien to ſend him twelve thouſand men of his army. This diminution diſabled the young prince to reap any other advantage from his victory than the taking of Carignano, which he reduced to the king's obedience.

Mean while, the formidable armies which were to invade France, not being yet ready, Henry reſolved to uſe part of his troops to finiſh the affair of Scotland, which he had ever at heart. Though he had declared war againſt Scotland, it was not to make conqueſts, but ſolely to compel the Scots by the terror of his arms to agree to the marriage of their queen with the prince, his ſon. He could not conceive that, in their preſent circumſtances, they could flatter themſelves with the hopes of ſucceſs in a war ſo unequal and capable of ruining Scotland in one ſingle campaign. But cardinal Beaton, an obſtinate man, if ever there was one, who governed in the regent's name, choſe rather to expoſe the kingdom to become a prey to the Engliſh than conſent to a peace, which could not be made without ruining his fortune. So Henry, ſeeing it was neceſſary to preſs him more cloſely, reſolved to ſend into Scotland part of the troops deſigned againſt France. The lord Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, and ſir John Dudley, lord Liſle, high admiral, were appointed for the expedition. Seymour led the army to Newcaſtle, where the admiral arrived with a fleet and two hundred tranſport ſhips, in which the troops were embarked. The earl of Hertford, landing near Leith [u], took that town without difficulty, and then marched directly to Edinburgh, of which he became maſter with the ſame eaſe. The regent and cardinal had not provided for their defence, imagining the king's threats would be without effect. The city of Edinburgh was ſacked and burnt, but the Engliſh attacked not the caſtle, for fear of being engaged in too long a ſiege. After that, they returned to Leith, and, burning the town, retired to Berwick the 18th of May [w]. If Henry had reſolved to improve his advantages, he would have ſubdued all Scotland, conſidering the great conſternation of the Scots upon the invaſion. But two reaſons prevented him: the firſt, that he wanted his troops to ſend them to France, where he intended alſo to go in perſon: the ſecond, that his aim was only to let the Scots ſee what they were to expect, if they did not ſpeedily reſolve to execute the treaty for their queen's marriage, and he ſcarce doubted but this method would ſucceed. Mean while, it muſt have been thought very ſtrange, that he ſhould court the young queen of Scotland for the prince, his ſon, in ſo extraordinary a manner, and the world was of opinion, either he had done too much, or did not do enough.

Though Henry had withdrawn his army out of Scotland, he had not however relinquiſhed his project of harraſſing the Scots till they ſhould agree to the marriage. To this end he improved an opportunity that offered, to give the regent and the cardinal freſh diſturbances. The earl of Lenox, as I ſaid, having quitted the court, was retired to Dunbarton, the governor whereof was devoted to him, but found himſelf greatly embarraſſed. His friends in France had informed him, that the king was exceedingly incenſed againſt him, and accuſed him of having laviſhed away the money ſent him to maintain the war againſt the Engliſh. This was in effect what had been hinted to Francis by the queen dowager, the regent, and the cardinal, who were ſeconded by the cardinal of Lorrain and the duke of Guiſe; and in this manner the French hiſtorians repreſent it. The earl, willing to clear himſelf, had ſent a man into France to acquaint the king with all that had paſſed in Scotland ſince his arrival, and with the preſent ſituation of affairs. But the king, prepoſſeſſed by the cardinal of Lorrain, refuſed to give the meſſenger audience, nay, was going to order him to priſon. The earl, ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken, both by the king of France and thoſe who had at firſt joined him in Scotland, ſent to the king of England to know whether he would take him into his ſervice, with the earl of Glencairn, his intimate friend. Henry received the overture more favourably than the two lords durſt have expected. He promiſed them his protection on certain conditions, which he would ſettle with them, if they would ſend ſome truſty perſon to England. Whereupon the earl of Glencairn came himſelf to Carliſle with the biſhop of Cathneſs, brother of the earl of Lenox, and two others. In a few days after their arrival, they concluded with the king's commiſſioners [x] a treaty, wherein the earl of Lenox and Glencairn promiſed,

I. That they would cauſe the pure word of God to be preached in their territories.

II. That they would hinder, to the utmoſt of their power, the young queen from being carried out of Scotland, and do their endeavour to deliver her into the hands of the king of England.

III. That they would aſſiſt the king with all their forces, to procure him [y] the direction of the government of Scotland, and the title of protector of the realm.

IV. That the biſhop of Cathneſs and Hugh Cunningham ſhould be given in hoſtage to the king of England.

The king promiſed on his part:

1. That his army ſhould not oppreſs their lands.

2. That he would conſtitute the earl of Lenox regent of the kingdom, provided he would do nothing without his expreſs conſent.

3. That he would give him, out of the revenues of the crown, what ſhould be reaſonable to ſupport the dignity of regent.

4. That in caſe the young queen ſhould die, he would

5. That he would give the earl of Glencairn a yearly penſion of a thouſand crowns.

6. That he would conſent that Margaret Douglas, his niece, ſhould eſpouſe the earl of Lenox, provided ſhe were willing.

The treaty was ſigned at Carliſle the 17th of May, whilſt the Engliſh army were quitting Scotland, and retiring to Berwick.

Some days after, the earl of Lenox came to the court of England, where the foregoing treaty was confirmed the 26th of June, with the following additional articles:

That the earl of Lenox ſhould ſurrender to the king the caſtle of Dunbritton and the iſle of Bute.

That if he married Margaret Douglas, he ſhould aſſign her an honourable dower.

That the king engaged on his part, to aid him with five hundred men, to give him a penſion of ſeventeen hundred marks [z] for himſelf, and one of a hundred marks for George Striveling, governor of Dunbritton.

In conſequence of this treaty, the earl of Lenox came to Dunbritton with thirteen ſhips and about ſix hundred men. Upon his arrival, he went to the caſtle with a few followers, to try to perſuade the governor [a] to deliver the place to the king of England. But the governor, preferring his duty to his affection for the earl, refuſed to admit the Engliſh. This attempt failing, Lenox ravaged the iſles of Arran and Bute, where he met with no oppoſition. Then he made a deſcent upon Kintyre, and, after plundering ſome villages, ſailed to Briſtol, where he expected the king's return, who was now in France.

In the mean while, the earl of Arran and cardinal Beaton proſecuted with the utmoſt rigour the earl of Lenox's friends, and confiſcated their eſtates. But a freſh invaſion of the Engliſh, who, though few in number, took Jedborrough, Kelſo, and Coldingham, cauſed them to ceaſe theſe proceedings, and raiſe an army to enable them to repulſe their enemies. The Scotch army, amounting to eight thouſand men, being ready to march, the queen dowager, the regent, and the cardinal, led them to Coldingham, where the Engliſh, when they retired, left a garriſon. But whilſt they were employed in the ſiege, the regent having advice that the Engliſh were marched from Berwick to relieve the town, was ſeized with ſuch a panic, that, ſpeedily mounting his horſe, he fled alone to Dunbar. This haſty flight threw the whole army into ſuch a conſternation that there was no hindering the ſoldiers from diſbanding. The earl of Angus alone reſolved to ſtay with a few men and carry off the artillery, which was going to be deſerted. The Scots being diſperſed, the Engliſh ravaged without mercy, Teviot, Merch, and Lauderdale, compelling the inhabitants to ſwear allegiance to the king of England. Buchanan adds, that the earl of Angus reviving the regent's courage, they aſſembled ſome troops, and cauſing the Engliſh to fall into an ambuſh, ſlew eight hundred [b] of their men and took a thouſand priſoners. But there is nothing like this in the Engliſh hiſtories.

Whilſt the king of England was acting againſt Scotland, till all was ready to begin the war in France, the emperor was at Spire, where he had called a diet to try to obtain ſome aſſiſtance from the princes of Germany. The proteſtants at firſt ſcrupled very much to aſſiſt him, whilſt he left them expoſed to the inſults of their enemies; but the moment they obtained a decree that they ſhould not be diſturbed in the exerciſe of their religion, they granted whatever was required. This was all they deſired, and it was deemed a ſignal favour to grant it, even with ſuch limitations and ambiguous clauſes as would one day render it fruitleſs. So the diet broke up about the end of May, to the mutual ſatisfaction of the ſtates of the empire. The pope alone was offended at the decree in favour of the proteſtants, and to hinder them from long enjoying the toleration granted till the council ſhould meet, he fixed the opening of the council of Trent to the 25th of March 1545.

Whilſt the emperor was at Spire, he ordered Luxenburg to be inveſted, which ſurrendered about the end of May. Then he headed his army in perſon to begin the execution of the projects concerted with Henry. Since the concluſion of the treaty in February laſt year, whereby they were each to bring into the field but twenty-five thouſand men, they had agreed to encreaſe the number of their troops, to invade France with two armies, which together were to make above a hundred thouſand men, and to join them about Paris. The emperor's firſt exploits, till the king of England's arrival, were the taking of Commercy and Ligny in le Barrois. After that he entered Campagne, and beſieged St. Didier the 8th of July. This place, though weak, held out above ſix weeks, and then was taken by a falſe intelligence carried to the governor.

The war with Scotland having prevented Henry from being ready ſo ſoon as he had promiſed, it was about Whitſuntide before he embarked part of his army for Calais, under the conduct of the duke of Norfolk [c]. As for himſelf, he ſtill remained in England with the reſt of his troops till the middle of July [d]. When the duke of Norfolk was beyond ſea, he joined the count de Bure, who commanded ten thouſand men of the emperor's troops, and they jointly beſieged the town of Montreuil. This was probably with the emperor's conſent, who at the ſame time laid ſiege to St. Didier. He was in hopes that place would detain him but few days, and then he ſhould march to Paris, whilſt Henry was advancing to join him. Had this project been executed according to agreement, Paris, and all the country as far as the Loire, would have been in great danger, ſince Francis had not above forty thouſand men. But the emperor was prepoſterouſly bent upon the ſiege of St. Didier, which detained him above ſix weeks. In the mean time, Henry arriving at Calais [e] with the reſt of his army, found that the emperor's deſign was to leave him to march alone to Paris, and keep the king of France employed, whilſt he purſued his affairs in Campagne. So, perceiving that inſtead of marching to the rendezvous, the emperor was employed in a ſiege, he ordered likewiſe Boulogne to be inveſted, and came himſelf to the ſiege the 26th of July. By this means their project was ſuſpended, whilſt they ſeparately amuſed themſelves with the taking of towns. This error proved the ſafety of France. From thenceforward theſe two princes mutually charging one another with non-performance of agreements, had no longer any confidence in each other. And therefore the emperor, by indirect means, cauſed a peace to be offered to Francis, whilſt Henry more openly granted a ſafe conduct for French embaſſadors to come and treat with him at a league from his camp.

Mean while the emperor, having at laſt taken St. Didier, about the middle of Auguſt, ſent to Henry to march towards Paris, as was agreed. Henry anſwered, that ſince he had given the emperor time to take St. Didier, it was but reaſonable the emperor ſhould ſtay till he had taken Boulogne, which could not be long. After the taking of St. Didier, the emperor advanced to Chathau-Thierri, and filled Paris with terror and confuſion. But Henry's anſwer convincing him, it would be very difficult to execute their projects during the reſt of the campaign, he renewed his private negotiation with Francis, which had been ſuſpended. Shortly after, he concluded with Francis a ſeparate peace, ſigned at Crepy the 19th of September, not only without including Henry, but even without acquainting him, for fear of prevention.

Henry was not much ſurpriſed at the emperor's proceedings. He ought not to have expected leſs from ſuch a friend, who was reconciled to him only in order to do his own buſineſs. It is certain, Charles V. no more than Maximilian and Ferdinand, his paternal and maternal grandfathers, never pretended much to ſincerity, nor was integrity his principal virtue. Henry complained of his breach of faith. But it was eaſy to allege ſundry reaſons, little capable however of balancing the oath he had taken, to conclude neither peace nor truce without the conſent of his ally. But theſe oaths are generally ſo ill kept in moſt leagues, that they ſeem to be conſidered only as a ſort of form, not much to be relied upon. Happily for Henry, Boulogne had capitulated the 14th of September, before the treaty of Crepy was ſigned [f].

The emperor thought himſelf very politic in eaſing himſelf of the burden of the war, and leaving Francis and Henry embroiled. Indeed, it was a great advantage, had it not been acquired by breach of faith. Immediately after the concluſion of the treaty, he ſent orders to the count de Bure to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, which obliged Henry alſo to recal the duke of Norfolk. In the ſituation of Henry's affairs, he had nothing to do but retire, for fear the dauphin, who was advancing by long marches, ſhould oblige him to fight with great diſadvantage, or retreat with precipitation. Beſides, that the dauphin was at the head of forty thouſand men, he would have found the Engliſh army much leſſened, as well by their loſſes at two ſieges as by the numerous garriſon they were forced to leave at Boulogne. So, having well ſtored that place, and left admiral Dudley governor, Henry departed for England the 30th of September, whilſt his troops were returning to Calais.

The dauphin came a few days after [g], but did not think proper to purſue the Engliſh, who were too far before him, and too near Calais, for him to expect to overtake them. He contented himſelf therefore with trying to ſurpriſe Boulogne, the breaches whereof the Engliſh had not time to repair. He was very like to have ſucceeded in his attempt. The French were now maſters of the lower town, where all the Engliſh ordnance lay, when a ſally from the upper town compelled them to retreat in diſorder. Marſhal Montluc, in his commentaries, ſpeaks of this action in a different manner from the Engliſh hiſtorians, though he agrees with them that the French were repulſed. Some days after [h], a conference was held at Calais, to try to procure a peace between the two kings. But the aim of the French being to perſuade the Engliſh to reſtore Boulogne upon the bare hopes of a peace, it is not ſtrange the conference ſhould be fruitleſs.

Henry, at his return to England, took great care to put in a poſture of defence the places on the Thames, and on the ſouthern coaſt [i], imagining Francis would not fail to invade him the next year. At the ſame time he ſent into Scotland the earl of Lenox, who took Dumfries.

This year, moſt part of the colleges, collegiate churches, and hoſpitals, were ſurrendered to the king [k] by acts and deeds, ſeemingly voluntary, but which were no more ſo than thoſe ſigned by the abbots and priors, when they reſigned their monaſteries [l].

[1545] In the beginning of the year 1549, the marſhal de Biez encamped near Boulogne, in order to raiſe a fort at Portet [m] to command the harbour of Boulogne. But the earl of Hertford, who had ſucceeded Dudley, ſallying out with a body of troops, diſlodged the marſhal from his poſt, and forced him to defer his project till another time.

Mean while Francis was making great preparations againſt England, in hopes of retaking Boulogne, and even Guiſnes and Calais, in order to expel the Engliſh entirely out of France; to that end he equipped in the ſeveral ports of France one hundred and fifty great ſhips, and ſixty ſmaller ones [n], with ten hired of the Genoeſe. Moreover, he had ordered five and twenty gallies to be brought from the Levant, in imitation of Lewis XII. who, on the like occaſion, had ſent for four from thence. At the ſame time, he prepared to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men, with whom he intended to join twelve thouſand landſquenets, levied in Germany. His deſign was to attack Boulogne by land, and ſo block it up by ſea that it ſhould be impoſſible for the Engliſh to relieve it. To execute this project, he ſent a reinforcement to the marſhal de Biez, ordering him to build at Port the fort he had been forced to leave unfiniſhed, being unwilling to approach Boulogne before the fort was in a ſtate of defence. The marſhal putting him in hopes the work would be finiſhed by the middle of Auguſt, he came about the end of June to Havre de Grace, to give orders for an expedition by ſea. His gallies and ſhips arriving ſhortly after, he commanded the fleet to ſail towards England. But, in ſeeing it depart, he had the vexation to behold one of the largeſt, called the Grand Carracon, burnt before his face, ſhe having taken fire whilſt the anchor was weighing.

Admiral Annebaut, who commanded the fleet, arrived the 18th of July at the Iſle of Wight, in ſight of Portſmouth, where lay the Engliſh fleet, of ſixty ſhips only. Notwithſtanding the diſproportion between the two fleets, the Engliſh approached the French; but, after a ſlight ſkirmiſh, retired behind the ſands, with deſign to draw the enemies after them. The French admiral, conſulting how they might be attacked, was told it was impoſſible, becauſe the channel, which led to the place where they lay, was ſo narrow, that hardly four ſhips could ſail a-breaſt. That beſides, there was no venturing among the ſands without pilots. Theſe difficulties obliged the admiral to content himſelf with provoking the Engliſh to fight, by means of the gallies, in order to draw them from their poſt. At firſt the gallies, favoured by a great calm, annoyed the Engliſh ſhips; but, a land-breeze ariſing, deprived them of their advantage, and cauſed them to row off, for fear of being run down by the large ſhips. The Engliſh did not purſue them very far, their deſign being to draw the enemies among the ſands, with which they were unacquainted.

At laſt the French, ſeeing the Engliſh would not loſe the advantage of their poſt, landed in three places in the iſle of Wight. But all this ended only in burning ſome villages. It was moved, in a council of war, to fortify and keep the iſland. But it was judged impracticable, chiefly by reaſon of the time which ſuch a project would neceſſarily require. The admiral, therefore, was ſatisfied with ordering a deſcent on the coaſt of Suſſex [o], imagining the king, who was at Portſmouth, would ſend out his fleet to aſſiſt the country. But he was miſtaken. The Engliſh fleet ſtill lay behind the ſands, and the deſcents which the French made in three ſeveral places gained them no conſiderable advantage, becauſe the coaſts were well guarded. In the mean while, the Engliſh fleet, daily encreaſing, conſiſted now of a hundred ſail. So, Annebaut, ſeeing little hopes of making great progreſs, retired towards France, after having watered at the iſle of Wight, not without loſing ſome ſoldiers and officers.

Some days after, a ſouth wind blew the French back towards the coaſt of England, and put their fleet in confuſion, which the Engliſh reſolved to improve, if the wind continued favourable. And indeed the two fleets engaged for two hours. But, as the wind was very changeable, each endeavoured to gain it, without engaging, however, too far. At laſt, they parted without much loſs on either ſide: and thus ended the greateſt effort France had ever made at ſea.

The attempt to fight the Engliſh fleet, or to ravage the coaſt, was not, however, the principal motive of this powerful armament. The taking of Boulogne was the king of France's chief end, and the fleet was properly intended only to block up that place by ſea. But, as the landſquenets were not yet arrived, and the fort, marſhal de Biez was building, not finiſhed, Francis was vexed to ſee the time proper for executing his deſigns inſenſibly ſlide away. At length, hearing the landſquenets were on the borders, he ſent to view the fort, which, contrary to his expectation, and marſhal de Biez's promiſe, was yet very far from being finiſhed. Beſides, it was built in a different place from what was appointed, and did not command the harbour. The marſhal alleged, if it had been built at Portet, the garriſon would have wanted water. But he affirmed, the fort he was raiſing at Outreau would be finiſhed in eight days. Whereupon, the king ſent him his whole army, of which he gave him the command, and remained himſelf at Chateau-Montier, about ten leagues from Boulogne.

The marſhal de Biez lay encamped near the fort till it was finiſhed, his deſign being to throw in ten thouſand men to awe the garriſon of Boulogne, whilſt he beſieged Guiſnes; but the engineer had ſo ill contrived his work, that, after much time ſpent in it, he was forced almoſt to begin again. This occaſioned a delay, which broke all the meaſures that were taken. Mean while, the king haſtened the work the more, as he knew that ten thouſand landſquenets, and four thouſand horſe, raiſed for the ſervice of England, where marching for Picardy. In ſhort, the marſhal, perceiving the ſeaſon would be too far advanced before his fort could be put in a ſtate of defence, pretended to have certain advice that the king of England deſired to land a ſtrong army at Calais, to relieve Boulogne by land; this is at leaſt what du Bellai imputes to him in his memoirs. However, the marſhal leaving the fort unfiniſhed, encamped on mount Lambert, to be ready to oppoſe the ſuccours. But the Engliſh appeared not. As for the landſquenets ſent for by Henry from Germany, they returned home, becauſe they received not on the borders the money they were made to expect. Mean while, the French army continued encamped, without undertaking the ſiege either of Guiſnes or Boulogne, though Francis had made ſo great an effort for that purpoſe.

In the mean time, the duke of Orleans died at Chateau-Montier, to the great grief of the king his father, who, by his death, ſaw the peace with the emperor very much ſhaken, ſince it was properly founded upon that prince's life, as will quickly appear.

The French army being encamped on mount Lambert, within cannon-ſhot of Boulogne, there were ſkirmiſhes every day, in the ſpace between the mount and the town. In one of theſe conflicts, the duke d'Aumale, known afterwards by the name of the duke of Guiſe, was wounded with a lance, which entering at the corner of his eye, came out behind his head. The wound, though deemed mortal by all, was however cured by the great ſkill of Ambroſe Paré, the king's ſurgeon, who was even forced to draw out with pincers the head of the launce which remained in the wound. The ſcar in the duke's face, gained him the ſirname of Balafré [or Gaſhed.]

The ſeaſon was now ſo advanced, that the ſiege of Boulogne was not practicable. So Francis was forced to be contented with ordering the marſhal de Biez to ravage Terre d'Oye, belonging to the king of England. But the ſudden rains made the country ſo watry, that the marſhal was ſoon obliged to retire with his army. Indeed the inhabitants were great ſufferers, becauſe the garriſon of Calais, which ſhould have protected them, was unable to reſiſt ſo numerous forces. On the other hand, Briſſac, afterwards marſhal of France, defeated a body of two thouſand Engliſh. Theſe were all the damages Henry ſuſtained during the campaign, from an army of above two hundred thouſand men, which had put his enemy to a prodigious expence. In all likelihood, this expence, and the ill ſucceſs of the campaign, contributed moſt to the peace which was ſoon after concluded.

Beſides that France was exhauſted, Francis had ſtill another motive to make peace with England. He was apprehenſive of being ſoon compelled to renew the war with the emperor. By the treaty of Crepi, it was agreed that the duke of Orleans ſhould marry one of the daughters, either of the emperor or of the king of the Romans, and on account of the marriage, ſhould have the duchy of Milan, or the earldom of Flanders. In conſideration of ſo advantageous a ſettlement for the duke his ſon, Francis had reſigned above twenty places, which he held in Piedmont or Montferrat, and relinquiſhed the intereſts of his brother-in-law the king of Navarre. So the hopes of the advantages this marriage was to procure vaniſhing by the death of his ſon, Francis was to find ſome other way to obtain them, or break a treaty now become uſeleſs. For this reaſon, being deſirous to know the emperor's intentions, he ſent admiral Annebaut to Antwerp, to offer him to renew the treaty of peace upon other conditions, ſince the death of the duke of Orleans had rendered thoſe of the treaty of Crepi of no effect. But the emperor plainly intimated, that by the death of that prince, he believed himſelf freed from his engagement; when he told the embaſſador, he would not attack the king of France, if he was not firſt attacked. Francis eaſily judged by this anſwer, he ſhould infallibly have a war with the emperor. This, added to the little progreſs he had made during the laſt campaign, made him deſirous of a peace with England. But as he was unwilling to ſue for it, he applied to the princes of the Smalcaldick league, who offered to become mediators. This mediation ſeemed the leſs precarious, as the proteſtants themſelves were highly concerned to procure a peace between the two kings. They ſaw themſelves upon the brink of being attacked by the emperor, ſince he had made peace with France, and knew moreover he was negotiating a truce with the Turks. Nothing therefore could be more for their advantage, than a good underſtanding between France and England, that both kings might be able to protect them. They ſent therefore to France, Chriſtopher de Veninger, John Bruno of Nidepont, and John Sturmius; and to England, Lewis Bambach, and John Sleidan, to perform the office of mediators between the two kings, in the name of the league. Theſe embaſſadors meeting the plenipotentiaries of France and England between Ardres and Guiſnes[p], preſently found it was not eaſy to make peace. Francis inſiſted that Henry ſhould reſtore Boulogne, and Scotland be included in the peace. But Henry abſolutely rejected both theſe articles. Whereupon a truce only was negotiated, but with no better ſucceſs, becauſe Henry would never agree that the Scots ſhould be compriſed in the treaty. This appears in the ſecret inſtructions ſent to ſir William Paget, one of the Engliſh embaſſadors [q], and inſerted in the Collection of the Public Acts. We find alſo in his inſtructions, that ſir William Paget attempted to bribe Bruno, one of the German mediators, with the offer of a conſiderable penſion, and in all appearance, the mediator hearkened to his propoſals. Mean while, to obtain the better terms, Henry feigned a deſire to be reconciled with the emperor, and even ſent in embaſſy to him the biſhops of Wincheſter and Weſtminſter. But this was only to give a jealouſy to Francis.

Cranmer took the advantage of Gardiner's abſence to advance the reformation, which he knew that prelate would oppoſe with all his power. Some vacant biſhoprics were, by his means, given to perſons who favoured the reformation, and he had thereby among the biſhops a much ſtronger party than ever [r]. Nay, he found means afterwards to obtain the king's conſent to ſome alterations advantageous to religion. But Gardiner, who was then at Bruges with the emperor, having notice of it, ſent the king word, that the pope and the emperor being joined in a league againſt the proteſtants of Germany, the leaſt innovation in England, with reſpect to religion, would be apt to induce them to give the king of France all the ſatisfaction he could deſire, to engage him in their league, in order to act altogether againſt him. This cauſed Cranmer to find more difficulty than he expected.

In Auguſt this year Cranmer loſt a good ſupport by the death of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the height of favour [s]. He was Cranmer's friend, and would have willingly agreed to a farther reformation. But he was too much a courtier to attempt directly to oppoſe the king's will. However, as Henry was not always in the ſame diſpoſition, with regard to religion, this lord did the reformed good ſervice, when he ſaw the king in a favourable ſituation.

The war with Scotland was faintly continued on both ſides. Henry's deſign was only to terrify the Scots, and induce them to execute the treaty concerning their queen's marriage. On the other hand, the Scots had no thoughts of invading England. Nevertheleſs Francis, who, as was obſerved, had formed vaſt projects againſt England, ſent betimes to the regent an embaſſador, called la Broſſe, to aſſure him of his protection, and a powerful aid, which was inſtantly to depart. Beſides that a diverſion in Scotland could not but be advantageous to him, he was alſo excited by the Lorrain princes, who were deſirous to ſupport the queen their ſiſter. So cauſing the Seigneur de Lorge, count of Mongommeri, to embark with five thouſand men, he ordered him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the Scots to make a powerful diverſion on the frontiers of England. Mongommeri arriving in Scotland the 2d of July, joined his troops with the Scots, and both making together fifteen thouſand men, advanced towards the Tweed. For ſome days ſeveral parties paſſed the river, and did ſome damage to the Engliſh. But the French general could never perſuade the Scots to venture with the whole army beyond the Tweed. On the contrary, upon the news that the earl of Hertford was advancing at the head of twelve thouſand men, they haſtily retired, and preſently after diſbanded as uſual. This is all that paſſed in Scotland worth notice during the campain of 1545.

The parliament of England meeting the 23d of November, the convocation continued for two years the ſubſidy given the king for ſix ſhillings in the pound. At the ſame time the parliament ſuppreſſed, by an act, all the colleges and hoſpitals, and gave their lands to the king. The motive, or rather pretence of this ſuppreſſion was, the abuſe of theſe foundations. The parliament deſigned it alſo towards the expenee of the king's wars with France and Scotland. But this not ſufficing, the commons granted him moreover a large ſum [t], and as they were aſſembled only for that purpoſe, they were diſmiſſed the 24th of December. Before the ſeſſion ended, the king came to the houſe of lords in great ſolemnity, and made a fine ſpeech; ſaying, among other things, that never had prince a greater affection for his people, or was more beloved than himſelf. He added many ſuch expreſſions, which, though very far for the moſt part from the truth, were however received by the people with loud acclamations [u].

During this year, the German proteſtants began to feel the effects of the emperor's late peace with France, and of the truce he was going to conclude with the Turk. Hitherto they had been uſed a little gently. But the emperor, coming to Worms, where the diet of the empire was held, plainly declared to them, he could not any way diſpenſe with their ſubmitting to the council which was to meet at Trent. This convinced them there was in reality a deſign to reduce them by force, and the more, as a certain rumour was ſpread of a league between the pope and the emperor, which could not but be againſt them. Their ſuſpicions were farther confirmed by a ſermon preached by a certain Franciſcan before the emperor, to whom he repreſented in very ſtrong terms that he could not diſcharge the duty of a good emperor, unleſs he laboured to the utmoſt of his power to extirpate the Lutherans. They knew alſo the emperor had written to the king of Poland to excite him againſt them. Moreover, he ſummoned the archbiſhop of Cologne to appear before him within thirty days, becauſe he had embraced the reformation, and tried to introduce it into his dioceſe. All this ſhewed plainly what they were to expect. Nevertheleſs, as the emperor had not yet concluded the truce with the Turk, and as his affairs were not quite ready, he ordered that a new diet ſhould be held at Ratiſbon the following January. But, the better to amuſe the proteſtants, he decreed that the divines of both parties ſhould come to Ratiſbon a month before the diet, and hold a free conference, that ſomething might be afterwards ſettled in matters of religion. The Roman catholics did not like the conference, and the proteſtants were ſtill leſs pleaſed with it, becauſe they foreſaw that the ſtiffneſs of the divines of both ſides, on the points which would be the ſubjects of their conference, would give the emperor and the diet a pretence to refer the deciſion to the council of Trent. The diet breaking up the 18th of Auguſt, the emperor returned to the Low Countries. Some time after, he received advice that the truce with the Turks was concluded. He then ſaw himſelf at full liberty to make war upon the proteſtants, and, under that pretence, to ſet about the execution of his project to become maſter of the empire.

It was properly at the inſtance of the proteſtants only, that the council was to meet: but it was very far from being ſuch a council as they had required. They expected it to be held in Germany, in an unſuſpected place; and it was convened at Trent, a city belonging to the king of the Romans, whom they juſtly conſidered as their enemy. Their deſign was to combat the papal authority, and it was the pope who was to preſide by his legates. They intended to ſhew that the Romiſh clergy had corrupted religion, both in doctrine and diſcipline, and it was the Romiſh clergy who were to aſſiſt as judges. Nay, it was uncertain whether they ſhould be allowed to produce their reaſons. Mean while, it was pretended, that, out of great condeſcenſion, a council was called for their ſakes, and at their ſolicitation. It is therefore no wonder they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to ſuch a council, which they as much feared, as they deſired one free and impartial. So the emperor and the proteſtants acted directly contrary to their firſt proceedings. The proteſtants rejected a council, after deſiring it with great earneſtneſs, and the emperor, after amuſing them many years on that account, preſſed with all his power the meeting of the council of Trent, the authority whereof he intended to make uſe of to oppreſs them. The pope would have been glad to have had no council at all, but, finding he was too far engaged with the emperor to recede, had fixed the opening to the 15th of March. After that, he put it off, becauſe on that day there were too few biſhops at Trent. But he had a much ſtronger reaſon. He was very glad to wait the event of the diet of Worms, in hopes that vigorous reſolutions would be taken there againſt the proteſtants, which would engage both parties in an open war, and furniſh him with a pretence, either to delay the opening of the council, or to remove it to ſome town in Italy. But the emperor, who had now formed his plan of making uſe of the council's authority to proceed againſt the proteſtants, cauſed the pope at laſt to order it to be opened at Trent the 13th of December. That day the legates (meeting in the cathedral) declared, the council was aſſembled for three cauſes; to deſtroy hereſy, to reform diſcipline, and to ſettle a laſting peace between chriſtian princes. This firſt ſeſſion was properly held only for the opening of the council. There were ſo few prelates at Trent, that it would have been ridiculous for ſo ſmall a number of perſons to pretend to make decrees upon the articles for which the council was called.

The proteſtants, ſeeing a council opened quite different from what they had required, eaſily perceived no good was to be expected from it. They had the more reaſon to fear it, as the kings of France and England being at war with each other, there was no hopes of aſſiſtance from them. Mean while, though the German mediators had not ſucceeded in their negotiation, the peace between France and England was not more remote. The reaſon was, both kings were equally concerned to end a war, which only did them damage, without a poſſibility for either to expect any conſiderable advantage. The war continued, however, during the winter of the year 1546. The earl of Surrey, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, who commanded at Boulogne, having intelligence that the French were conducting a convoy to the fort of Outreau, ſallied out [w] with part of the garriſon to intercept it. But he ſucceeded ſo ill, that, inſtead of taking the convoy, he was himſelf defeated, and forced to retreat in great diſorder. This news extremely troubled the king, who was not wont to receive the like. Whether he thought it owing to the earl's imprudence, or ſuſpected him of ſome hidden deſign, he recalled him immediately, and ſent the lord Gray to command in his room. A few days after, he ordered the earl of Hertford to depart, with about ten thouſand men, for fear the French ſhould ſeize ſome poſt, and cut off the communication between Boulogne and Calais; and indeed that was their deſign. But the earl of Hertford, preventing them by two days only, poſted himſelf at Ambleville, where he run up two forts, which ſecured the communication. The French, having miſſed their aim, encamped on mount Lambert; and, as the two armies were not far from each other, there were ſkirmiſhes every day, but which decided nothing. It was equally the intereſt of both kings to run no hazard, for fear of breaking off the negotiation of the peace, which was treating between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Francis wiſhed for a peace, becauſe his exchequer was drained by his great and continual expence, from the beginning of his reign, and particularly by the naval armament of the former campaign. Beſides, as he was entering into a war with the emperor, he wanted ſuch a friend as the king of England. In fine, he perceived that, after his fruitleſs efforts to retake Boulogne, it would be very difficult to recover that place by force. Henry was no leſs deſirous of peace, for ſeveral reaſons. He was grown ſo fat and corpulent, that it was a trouble for him to move. Nay, he had occaſion for an engine, with pullies, to lift him up and down ſtairs. This made him extremely uneaſy, and gave him a diſtaſte for buſineſs, ſo that he attended to affairs with ſome reluctance. In the next place, he had no farther thoughts of making conqueſts in Picardy. His ſole aim was to procure what was due to him before Boulogne ſhould be reſtored, which was of little uſe to him, ſince Calais could ſerve all his purpoſes. But he had ſtill a more urgent motive to renew his old friendſhip with Francis. He ſaw the emperor,

That the cuſtos rotulorum in each county ſhall be appointed by a bill, ſigned with the king's hand; and that the ſaid cuſtos ſhall appoint the clerk of the peace. 2. That no higher intereſt than ten pounds per cent. for a year, ſhall be paid. 3. An act for the payment of tithes in London. See Statut. 37 Hen. VIII.

The

with the pope's aſſiſtance, upon the point of making war on the proteſtants, and much queſtioned their ability to withſtand him. In this belief, he was afraid the emperor, after ſubduing Germany, would turn his arms againſt England, with all the forces of the empire, Spain, Italy, and the Low Countries. He could uſe the pretence of executing the pope's ſentence, and even cauſe a like ſentence to be paſſed by the council of Trent. It was therefore not at all advantageous to Henry to be at war with France. It was rather his intereſt to have Francis's friendſhip, as it was alſo very advantageous to Francis to be ſecure of Henry's aſſiſtance, in caſe the emperor turned his arms againſt France.

The obſtacles to the concluſion of the peace conſiſted in Henry's demand of what was due to him, and in Francis's want of money to content him. Beſides, Francis inſiſted upon Boulogne and upon Scotland's being included in the treaty. Theſe difficulties would have been ſufficient to hinder the concluſion of the peace, if more urgent motives had not induced the two kings to ſeek expedients to ſurmount them. Henry conſented at laſt to the article concerning Scotland, and, as to the reſt, a way was found to ſatisfy both. Henry was to keep Boulogne till he was paid, and Francis promiſed to diſcharge the debt in eight years. Every thing being thus ſettled, the peace was ſigned the 7th of June [x]. The treaty ran:

That the king of France ſhould pay regularly the penſion due by the treaty of More, of the 30th of Auguſt 1525, confirmed by ſeveral ſubſequent treaties. As alſo the penſion of ſalt, contained in a treaty of the 25th of April 1527, valued afterwards at ten thouſand crowns a year. But, as Henry pretends, the ſaid penſion given in lieu of the ſalt is to be perpetual; and as Francis maintains, on the contrary, that it is to ceaſe at Henry's death, it is agreed that the diſpute ſhall be amicably decided by umpires; and if the penſion ſhall be found to be perpetual, Francis ſhall pay it to Henry and his ſucceſſors for ever.

Moreover Francis ſhall pay to the king of England, on the feaſt of St. Michael 1554, or within a fortnight after, the ſum of two millions of crowns de ſoliel, as well for the arrears of the penſion of the ten thouſand crowns, as for Henry's expence in the ſiege of Boulogne, undertaken ſolely to procure his money, and in keeping and maintaining that place.

As to the article of the five hundred thouſand crowns, which Henry preſented to Francis on condition he punctually obſerved the treaties, as the two kings differ in point of fact, it is agreed the diſpute ſhall be decided by commiſſioners appointed on both ſides within ſuch a time, or by four impartial lawyers, in caſe the commiſſioners end not the affair.

It is further agreed, that the king of England ſhall keep Boulogne with its territories, the limits whereof are ſettled by the treaty, till he receive whatever is due to him.

That when all the ſums ſhall be paid, Boulogne ſhall be reſtored to the king of France, and nothing that is faſtened to the ground ſhall be impaired or carried away.

That from the date hereof to the ſurrender of Boulogne, neither of the two princes ſhall raiſe any fort or new fortification within the territory of Boulogne, but thoſe already begun may be finiſhed.

The emperor was included by both parties in the peace. As for Scotland, Henry agreed, it ſhould be included, on condition the Scots gave him no freſh cauſe to make war upon them; and in caſe they did, they were to be deemed included no otherwiſe than according to the treaty of the 5th of April 1515.

Henry could hardly expect greater advantages than thoſe he received from this peace; which ſeemed to ſecure him not only the payment of what was due to him, but alſo the yearly and perpetual penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns. But the moſt ſolemn treaties are not always ſufficient ſecurity for the performance of what ſovereigns promiſe. It will appear in the following reigns, that Francis's ſucceſſor not only broke the treaty with reſpect to Boulogne, and the ſums for which his father was bound, but that even the penſion was never charged in the treaties he made with England.

The peace was very ſolemnly proclaimed at London the 13th of June, with a general proceſſion, wherein were carried all the richeſt ſilver croſſes, and the fineſt copes worn, for the greater pomp. But this was the laſt time theſe things appeared in public. Shortly after, Henry called them in, together with the church plate, into his treaſury and wardrobe, without giving any other reaſon than his will and pleaſure.

It is ſaid, the late war with France coſt Henry five hundred eighty-ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and eighteen pounds ſterling; and the charges of keeping Boulogne eight years amounted to ſeven hundred fifty-five thouſand eight hundred thirty-three pounds. So large a ſum, which was, not to be repaid under eight years, had conſumed whatever had been granted by the parliament, and received from the chapels, colleges and hoſpitals. So he was forced, in the beginning of the year, to lay a tax upon his ſubjects, under the name of Benevolence [y], as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts.

The peace reſtored between the two kings the good underſtanding which had been interrupted ſome years, rather by the artifices of the emperor and his party in England, than for any juſt cauſe. Catherine de Medici, dauphineſs of France, being at this time delivered of a princeſs, and Henry deſiring to ſtand godfather [z], he called her Elizabeth. Preſently after the two kings ſent embaſſadors to each other to receive the oaths concerning the peace, and choſe for theſe embaſſies their two high admirals [a]. It is ſaid, that whilſt admiral Annebaut was at London, he began a negotiation about religion, and that the two kings intended to aboliſh the maſs in their dominions [b]. As for Henry, very likely, if he had lived, he would have advanced the reformation: nay, it is certain, that on account of this negotiation, he ordered Cranmer to ſet down in writing how ſuch a change might be effected, and to ſtrengthen all with arguments and paſſages from the ſcriptures. But this project ſoon vaniſhed into ſmoke. Probably Francis had entered into the negotiation only becauſe he deſired to be in ſtrict union with Henry, and knew by experience that the bare propoſal of conforming himſelf to his ſentiments in point of religion, was a moſt effectual way to ſucceed. But it is not likely he really intended to admit of any reformation in his kingdom. And indeed, at this very time he was kindling the flames of perſecution all over France againſt the reformed, of whom fourteen this year were burnt at Meaux, and many others at Paris, and in other places; not to mention the maſſacre of Cabrieres and Marindol, for which none were puniſhed. The cardinals of Lorrain and Tournon, his chief miniſters, were too much incenſed againſt the proteſtants, for any man to believe, that ſo long as they were in favour, the king ever ſeriouſly thought of aboliſhing the maſs in France.

Before the peace between England and France was ſigned, the proteſtant princes of Germany ſeeing themſelves going to be attacked by the emperor, who had at laſt taken off the maſk, ſince his peace with France, and truce with the Turks, ſent to Henry prince Philip, brother [c] to the elector palatine, to deſire aſſiſtance. It appears in the king's letter to this prince, extant in the Collection of the Public Acts, that Henry had ſent to deſire him to come, and the lord Herbert aſſures, that Philip aimed at marrying the princeſs Mary. However, the king anſwered his demand of aid by ſeven propoſitions, containing the terms on which he was willing to enter into a defenſive league with the proteſtants. But as his propoſitions tended only to render him head and ſole director of the league, they did not think proper to put themſelves blindly into his hands. They only told him, if he would depoſit, ſomewhere in Germany, a hundred thouſand crowns to ſerve for the defence of the league, they would prefer his alliance to that of Francis. But finding they offered no advantage for himſelf, he had no ſuch zeal for the Augſburg confeſſion, (from which he was yet very remote) as to engage in its protection without reaping any benefit. The truth is, the proteſtants were perſuaded he had no deſire to be really united with them, but intended only to encourage them for fear they ſhould ſubmit to the emperor, as alſo to hinder them from putting themſelves under the French king's protection, with whom he had not yet made peace. For the ſame reaſon it was, that under colour of continuing the negotiation, he kept the count palatine at his court, till he ſaw the peace with France was near a concluſion.

It was now ſome time ſince the pope and emperor had formed the project of a league againſt the proteſtants of Germany. They had agreed upon all the articles, but the emperor had thought proper to defer the ſigning, that he might ſay he did it merely in his own defence. At laſt, about the middle of June, he ſent the cardinal of Trent to Rome, where the league was ſigned the 26th of the ſame month. The pope promiſed to find for ſix months twelve thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and two hundred thouſand crowns, for the war in Germany. Moreover, he gave the emperor a moiety of one year's revenue of the benefices in Spain, with power to alienate a hundred thouſand crownsworth of church lands. This was a demonſtration that it was a religious war, though the emperor affected to publiſh the contrary.

The emperor having notice that the pope's troops were beginning to march, that the count de Bure had forwarded his levies in the Low Countries, and duke Maurice of Saxony, whom he had engaged in his party, was ready to act when there ſhould be occaſion, aſſembled his army about Ratiſbon. His deſign was to meet the pope's troops, who were croſſing Tirol, under the conduct of Octaviano Farneſe. At the ſame time, to hinder this junction, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe marched the ſame way with an army of forty thouſand men. Without entering into the particulars of this firſt campaign, I ſhall only ſay, in general, that the proteſtants, though ſuperior in number, could not hinder the junction of the Italian troops, nor of thoſe of the Low Countries, with the emperor. The different tempers of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe, did not a little contribute towards their taking wrong meaſures. In ſhort, the campaign laſting till November, without either of the two armies deſiring to engage, the elector of Saxony received the ill news that the king of the Romans and duke Maurice were deſtroying his country with fire and ſword. This obliging him to march with part of his army to the relief of his ſubjects, the landgrave, grown too week by this ſeparation, choſe likewiſe to retire into his dominions. Thus the emperor, meeting with no more oppoſition, took Francfort, Ulm, and ſeveral other towns belonging to the league, which furniſhed him with the money he wanted for the maintenance of his army.

Whilſt the war was carrying on in Germany, the council languiſhed at Trent, and proceeded very ſlowly. Beſides that the members were very few, they were wholly dependent on the legates, who durſt not themſelves undertake any thing without orders from Rome. But it was the pope's intereſt to prolong matters, becauſe he hoped, time would procure him at laſt ſome occaſion to diſſolve the council, or remove it to Italy. Thus the council was but an empty name, made uſe of by the pope and the emperor for their own private views, and to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the public.

Religion began alſo to cauſe troubles in Scotland, or at leaſt to produce the ſeeds thereof, by the deſpair to which thoſe that embraced the reformation were driven. Since cardinal Beaton and the earl of Arran had enjoyed the peace procured them by the king of France, they thought only of being revenged on their enemies. Religion furniſhed them with a pretence, becauſe the oppoſite faction almoſt wholly conſiſted of the reformed. In the courſe of this year, 1546, they put to death ſeveral perſons for religion, at Perth, St. Andrew's, and other places[d]. The regent ſuffered himſelf to be ſo led by the cardinal, that he gloried in delivering to the flames thoſe whom he had formerly conſidered as his brethren. Among thoſe who were ſacrificed to the furious paſſion of the cardinal, a miniſter[e], who ſuffered martyrdom at St. Andrew's, was particularly remarkable. This man being condemned to the fire, the regent, at the inſtance of one of his friends, would have ſaved his life, and to that end ſent a note to the cardinal, deſiring him to ſuſpend the execution. But the barbarous prelate, without regarding the regent's requeſt, not only cauſed the ſentence to be executed, but would alſo feed his eyes with the ſad ſpectacle, ſitting in ſtate in a great window of his caſtle. It is ſaid, that, before he was delivered to the flames, the miniſter told the executioner, "That, within few days, the prelate, who beheld him with ſuch pride from yonder high place, ſhould lie in the ſame, as ignominiouſly as now he was ſeen proudly to reſt himſelf." This prediction proved but too true for the cardinal. Preſently after, he was murdered in his own palace, and his body thrown into the ſtreet, out of the very window from whence he looked on, whilſt the miniſter was burning.

As for England, religion was ſtill upon the ſame foot as the king had been pleaſed to eſtabliſh it. The reformation had made ſome progreſs, but was far from being brought to perfection, and yet the reformed could not forbear hoping the king himſelf would carry it much farther. In this belief, they thought it prudent not to provoke him, and that they effectually conſulted the welfare of their religion, by remaining in ſilence, and waiting for better times. This is the true reaſon why there were fewer perſons that ſuffered for religion in England than in France. It is not to be queſtioned, that if there had not been hopes of a farther reformation, many people would have openly declared the opinions which theſe hopes induced them to conceal. For a like reaſon, thoſe who retained all the tenets of the old religion durſt not directly oppoſe the king, for fear their oppoſition ſhould carry him beyond the bounds he ſeemed to have preſcribed to himſelf. From hence ſprung a blind and univerſal compliance with the king's will, and the exceſſive power he had acquired over all his ſubjects, of which he made a very ill uſe. He had been troubled for ſome time with an old ſore in his leg, which was grown very painful. This, added to his great corpulency, which rendered him almoſt unable to ſtir, made him ſo froward and untractable, that none approached him without trembling. He had been always ſtern and ſevere, but was incomparably more ſo towards the end of his days than in the beginning. Flattery had ſo corrupted his judgment and ſenſe, that he deemed it an unpardonable crime to contradict his opinions, though he changed them himſelf very frequently. I have obſerved, that he treated with admiral Annebaut of aboliſhing the maſs, and changing it into a communion, after the manner of the proteſtants. And yet, ſhortly after, Shaxton, who had reſigned the biſhopric of Saliſbury, and been long a priſoner for refuſing to conform to the ſix articles, being accuſed afreſh of denying the real preſence in the ſacrament[f], the king was pleaſed to have him tried according to the rigour of the law, and he was condemned to be burnt. But this man, who had endured the hardſhips of a long impriſonment, could not behold with the ſame firmneſs the puniſhment prepared for him. The king having ſent the biſhops of London and Worceſter to perſuade him to recant, he was prevailed upon, and, abjuring his pretended hereſy, the king granted him his pardon. He became afterwards a cruel perſecutor of the reformed.

This example was not capable of moving Anne Aſkew, who was accuſed of the ſame crime, and rigorouſly proſecuted, though ſhe had good friends at court, where ſhe was well known[g]. She firmly perſiſted, notwithſtanding all the promiſes to ſave her life in caſe ſhe would recant[h]. Some court ladies, touched with compaſſion for her, having ſent her ſome money when in priſon, for her ſubſiſtence, were the occaſion of her being more cruelly tormented[i]. Chancellor Wriotheſly, great enemy to the earl of Hertford, hoping to draw ſomething out of the priſoner againſt that lord or his counteſs, cauſed her to be racked. Nay, it is ſaid, he would be preſent himſelf, and, obſerving the executioner was moved with pity to the priſoner, threw off his gown, and taking upon him the honourable office, drew the rack ſo ſeverely, that he almoſt tore her aſunder. But this is a fact that ſcarce ſeems credible. However, the woman's bones being put out of joint, ſhe was carried in a chair to the place of execution, and burnt, with four men condemned for the ſame crime[k].

[i] Being aſked what favour or encouragement ſhe had from any in the court, ſhe would confeſs nothing, but that one in livery had brought her ſome money, which he ſaid came from two ladies in the court. This made the chancellor put her to the rack. She had been oft at court, and was much favoured by many great ladies there; and it was believed the queen had ſhewed kindneſs to her. Burnet, p. 341.

But, to add to their ſufferings, they were made to hear a ſermon, preached by Shaxton, their falſe brother, who upbraided them with obſtinacy in very ſevere and abuſive terms: all this was not capable of ſhaking their conſtancy, which endured to their laſt breath.

The enemies of the reformation ſeeing the king incenſed againſt the ſacramentarians, thought it a favourable opportunity to ruin the queen and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom they conſidered as the grand protectors of the reformed. Among the ſupporters of the old religion, the chief were, chancellor Wriotheſly, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey his ſon; Bonner, biſhop of London; Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter; and theſe had, doubtleſs, among the courtiers and the king's ſervants, creatures who failed not to be ſerviceable on occaſion. But, whatever project they formed, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſtill in their way, who, having great influence over the king, commonly broke their meaſures. So, to be entirely freed from this formidable adverſary, they reſolved to complain of him openly to the king, and accuſe him of being the head and protector of the ſacramentarians, and of all in general who rejected the ſix articles. This reſolution was executed. The perſon who took upon him to ſpeak to the king, told him, there were evident proofs ready of what was alleged againſt Cranmer, and if he was ſent to the Tower, ſo many witneſſes would appear againſt him that the king would himſelf be ſurpriſed. Henry was not ignorant that Cranmer was againſt the ſix articles in his mind, ſince he had himſelf frankly owned it. But he really loved him, and therefore would not expoſe him to a trial which muſt have been fatal to him. Beſides, he took it very ill that ſuch pains were taken to deſtroy a man, for whom he had ſo often and ſo openly declared. However, reſolving to ſee how far the malice of his enemies would go, he conſented that he ſhould be the next day called before the council, and ſent to the Tower, if they ſaw cauſe. But in the night the king ſent for Cranmer, and telling him what had been reſolved, deſired to know how he meant to anſwer for himſelf. Cranmer thanked the king, and prayed him, that, ſince he was to be queſtioned for his religious opinions, judges might be aſſigned him who underſtood thoſe matters. The king replied, he went the wrong way to ſave his life, for moſt certainly his enemies had witneſſes ready to convict him in ſuch a manner, that the judges would be forced to condemn him; and therefore, ſince he took ſo little care of himſelf, he would look to it. So he ordered him to deſire the council to uſe him as a privy counſellor, and as they would expect to be uſed in the like caſe, that is, that his accuſers might be brought face to face before he was ſent to the Tower; and if his requeſt was not granted, he was to appeal to the king. At the ſame time he pulled off his ring, and, giving it to him, ſaid, if his appeal was rejected, he ſhould ſhew the council that token of his protection. Next morning, Cranmer, coming to the council door, was ſo long kept waiting in the lobby, that the king, hearing of this diſreſpect, ſent word that he ſhould be preſently brought in [l]. It happened as the king forſaw, ſo that Cranmer was forced at laſt to produce the king's ring, which terribly mortified his enemies. Then they all roſe up, and went and informed the king of what had paſſed, who told them, he thought he had a wiſer council than now he found they were, and, laying his hand on his breaſt, ſwore, that he took the archbiſhop to be the moſt faithful ſubject he had. The duke of Norfolk, willing to excuſe the council, ſaid, they meant the archbiſhop no harm, but only to vindicate his innocence by ſuch a trial as would have freed him from all aſperſions. But the king, looking ſternly at him, anſwered, "He would not ſuffer men who were ſo dear to him, to be thus handled with impunity. He knew the factions that were among them, and their malice to one another, which he would either extinguiſh or very ſpeedily puniſh." Then he commanded them all to be reconciled to the archbiſhop. They immediately obeyed, though it was but in outward appearance. But for Cranmer, he heartily forgave them, as he plainly ſhewed afterwards.

It ſeems, ſo great a mortification ſhould have made theſe men more cautious. But their extreme deſire to ſucceed in their plots would not ſuffer them to deſiſt with regard to the queen. They perceived, if the king had oppoſed their accuſation of Cranmer, it was not to hinder the execution of the law of the ſix articles, but from a pure motive of affection for that prelate. That therefore their proceedings could not have diſpleaſed him as to the thing, but only in reſpect of the perſon. This made them think they ſhould find it eaſier to deſtroy the queen, becauſe the king would never willingly ſuffer that his own wife ſhould differ from him in matters of religion. Catherine Parr, who was then on the throne, had gained the king's affection by her extraordinary care of him, and by giving him daily freſh marks of her gratitude. She was a reformer in her heart, and even ſometimes took the liberty to have ſermons preached in her privy chamber before ſome of her ladies. It came to the king's ears, but he took no notice of it. Nay, he ſuffered her to diſpute with him upon religion, imagining ſhe did it only for inſtruction. But at laſt theſe diſputes having been carried too far, he expreſſed his diſpleaſure at them, and even began to look more coldly upon the queen than formerly. This made her enemies think it a fair opportunity to work her ruin, whilſt, ignorant of their deſigns, ſhe was ſeeking occaſions to inſpire the king with favourable thoughts of the reformation.

The king firſt vented to Gardiner his diſpleaſure with the queen. He could not pitch upon a more partial man. Gardiner failed not to cheriſh the king's reſentment, by aggravating the queen's obſtinacy, and her pains to inſtil her notions into the ladies who ſerved her. The chancellor, who was alſo let into the ſecret, confirmed what Gardiner had ſaid, and hinted to the king, that the queen had encouraged Anne Aſkew in her obſtinacy, and even inſinuated that ſhe was plotting againſt the ſtate. In ſhort, they went ſo far, that articles were drawn up againſt her, and ſigned by the king. The chancellor putting up the paper careleſly in his pocket, it dropped from him, and the perſon that found it carried it to the queen, who, ſeeing the king's hand to ſuch a paper, concluded herſelf loſt. However, being adviſed by one of her friends to go to the king, and try to appeaſe him, ſhe came into his room with a ſettled countenance, as if ſhe knew nothing of what had paſſed. The king received her very kindly, and began to talk of religion. She anſwered, theſe things were above her, and ſhe ought to learn of him what ſhe was to believe. "Not ſo, by St. Mary (ſaid the king,) you are become a doctor and able to inſtruct us." The queen, feigning to be ſurpriſed at his manner of ſpeaking to her, anſwered very mildly, "She ſaw with grief he was offended at the freedom ſhe had ſometimes taken to diſpute with him in matters of religion, but ſhe had done it innocently, with the ſole view of diverting him, knowing what pleaſure he took in talking of thoſe things, which none underſtood better than himſelf; her chief aim had been, not only to make him forget his pain by ſuch ſort of diſcourſes, but alſo to receive inſtruction herſelf, and indeed ſhe had profited much; and if ſhe had ſtarted objections, it was only to give him occaſion to clear the difficulties, which were above a woman's underſtanding." And is it even ſo, ſaid the king, then we are friends again. So he embraced her with great affection, and ſent her away with very tender aſſurances of his conſtant love to her [m]. On the morrow, which was the day appointed for carrying the queen to the Tower, the king, going to take the air in the garden, ſent for her, and preſently after came in the chancellor with forty of the guard. But the king ſtept aſide to him, and, after a little diſcourſe, was heard to call him in an angry tone, knave, fool, and beaſt. Then he came again to the queen, who ſeeing him in a paſſion with the chancellor endeavoured to appeaſe him. But the king told her, ſhe had no reaſon to plead for him.

Theſe two attempts againſt the archbiſhop and the queen not only proved unſucceſsful but alſo very prejudicial to the enemies of the reformation. From thence forward the king could not endure them, being ſatisfied their chief aim was to overthrow whatever he had eſtabliſhed. Gardiner was turned out of favour immediately, and the king would not ſuffer him to be preſent in the council [n].

But a greater ſtorm fell on the duke of Norfolk and his ſon the earl of Surrey. Henry, almoſt choaked with fat, and perceiving his leg viſibly to grow worſe, plainly ſaw he had not long to live. In this belief, he conſidered the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Surrey, as two lords who could greatly embroil the prince his ſon during his minority. The duke of Norfolk was the head of the favourers of the pope and the old religion, though, like a good courtier, he had outwardly complied with all the king's innovations. Henry was contented with this external compliance, though he knew he was ever attached to the pope, whoſe party was ſtill very powerful in England, and that his ſon, the earl of Surrey, was in the ſame ſentiments, This ſufficed to inſpire him with a juſt fear, that after his death theſe two lords, aſſiſted by the pope, the emperor, and their friends, would labour to ſet the crown on the head of the princeſs Mary, and ſo what he had been as ſuch pains to eſtabliſh during his reign would be entirely overthrown. And indeed he could not queſtion, if that party prevailed, they would deem his divorce with Catherine of Arragon null and void. In which caſe, Mary was his only lawful iſſue, and the prince his ſon a baſtard. He could hope for no remedy to this evil from the parliament, having learned by long experience, with how much eaſe that body, conſiſting of ſo many members, was carried away with the prevailing party. He thought therefore, the beſt and ſhorteſt way to prevent theſe miſchiefs, and free himſelf from his fears was, not to leave theſe two lords behind him, whom he believed capable of diſturbing his ſon's minority, and even of robbing him of the crown. For this ſole reaſon their ruin was reſolved, after which ſome pretence was to be found. And this is ſeldom wanting to thoſe who have the power in their hands. As ſoon as it was perceived, his affection for the father and ſon was grown cold, there were perſons ready to inſinuate, they had pernicious deſigns againſt the ſtate [o], and only waited his death to put them in execution; that the earl of Surrey had refuſed ſeveral good matches [p] ſince the loſs of his counteſs, and it was generally reported, he aſpired to the princeſs Mary: that it was not without ſome private reaſon he uſed the arms of St. Edward the confeſſor, though his father had taken them out of his eſcutcheon; but however, the duke himſelf had left that quarter blank, in order to reſume them at a proper ſeaſon. Upon theſe general accuſations, the king ordered them to be arreſted and ſent to the Tower [q]. After that, care was taken to let the public know that they who had any thing to ſay againſt the priſoners ſhould be graciouſly heard, and the king would pardon all perſons concerned in any plot with them, who would come and make a diſcovery [r].

[l] Dr. Buts, the king's phyſician, who loved Cranmer, went and told the king what a ſtrange thing he had ſeen; the primate of all England waiting at the council door among the footmen and ſervants. Whereupon the king ſent to the board to have him brought in immediately. Burnet, tom. I. p. 343.

[m] Whether the king had really deſigned her ruin or not, is differently repreſented by the writers who lived next that time. Some, ſays the lord Herbert, believe it was not ſo much the king's intention to uſe the rigour of the law, as to deter her from reading forbidden books, p. 263.

[n] Lord Herbert ſays, though it appears, by Gardiner's ſubmiſſion, extant in our records, that not long after he fell into the king's diſpleaſure, yet, whether on this occaſion, or that he was a ſpecial friend to the duke of Norfolk (who was now alſo in diſgrace) or any other cauſe, is not there determined. However, the king excluded him out of the number of thoſe whom he appointed his executors and counſellors to his ſon Edward VI. Herbert, p. 263.

Some time before this affair was begun, the king reſtored the two univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge to all their eſtates, rents, and privileges, though by the act of parliament which gave the lands of the colleges to the king, they were to be ſuppreſſed. It might be thought very ſtrange the parliament ſhould not diſtinguiſh the two univerſities from the reſt of the colleges, conſidering their antiquity, and the advantages the kingdom had thence received and daily did receive, if it had not been now frequently ſeen, that they had long acted ſolely by the direction of the court. It is probable, the king remained long doubtful, whether he ſhould diſſolve or preſerve the two univerſities, ſince having received their humble petitions the beginning of the year, he made them wait for his anſwer till October. Nay, it was talked at court for ſome time, of making great alterations in their charters. But at laſt, the king reſolved to continue them upon the ſame foot they had all along been. Shortly after, on the 19th of December, he founded Trinity college in Cambridge, which is one of the nobleſt foundations of that kind in Europe [s].

Mean while, diligent ſearch was making by the king's order, after every thing that could ſerve to form an impeachment againſt the duke of Norfolk and the earl his ſon, the king, who found himſelf near his end, being abſolutely bent they ſhould go out of the world before him. In this interval he ordered his will, made before his late expedition into France, to be brought him, and peruſing it, cauſed Gardiner's name to be ſtruck out of the number of the counſellors appointed for the council of ſtate during Edward's minority. Sir Anthony Brown, who was preſent, would have ſpoke in the biſhop's behalf [t]: But the king anſwered, he knew Gardiner, and though he himſelf could govern him, yet none of thoſe who were to come after him would be able to do it.

This will, extant in the Collection of the Public Acts, is dated December the 30th 1546, and the king's name is at the bottom, with thoſe of ten witneſſes. But it is hard to know for certain, whether it was ſigned with the king's own hand. This was afterwards queſtioned. Mr. Rymer, who collected the records, would have done well to have put the thing out of diſpute, and informed the world, whether he had the original in his hands, and if ſo, whether the king's name was his own hand writing. This he might have eaſily known, by comparing his name on the will with his uſual ſignings, of which doubtleſs he had ſeveral by him [u]. The importance of this enquiry conſiſts, in that the act of parliament, empowering the king to ſettle the ſucceſſion, ordered it ſhould be by letters patent, under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will, ſigned with his own hand. Now it happened afterwards, that the line of Scotland not being placed in the order which belonged to them, queſtioned the validity of the will, maintaining, that Henry had not ſigned it with his own hand-writing. Indeed it could be alleged, againſt this pretenſion, that, the will being dated a month before the king's death, there was no room to ſuppoſe Henry was then unable to ſign it. On the other hand, it is impoſſible, that, having ordered his will to be tranſcribed the 30th of December, he delayed to ſet his hand, and ſo was prevented by death. But there is moreover a ſtrong preſumption he did not ſign it with his own hand, namely, he was very probably unable to write ſeveral months before his death, doubtleſs, by reaſon his fingers were ſo ſwoln, that he could not hold his pen. This conjecture is confirmed by two papers in the Collection of the Public Acts, both prior to the will. The firſt is a power of the 31ſt of Auguſt 1546, given by Henry to three of his miniſters [w] to ſign, in his name, all the royal commiſſions and acts of grace. The ſecond is a like power of the 16th of October following, to ſome of his council to put the king's ſtamp to, and ſeal with his ſignet, all acts to which the king's hand was required [x]. The reaſon alleged for theſe powers was taken from the multiplicity of affairs, wherewith the king was overwhelmed; but, as he had never leſs than at that time, it is extremely probable, this was only a cloak to hide his indiſpoſition. However, as this diſpute, which concerned only the royal family of Scotland, was ended by the acceſſion of that family to the throne of England, it is now of no conſequence. And therefore it ſuffices to men-

[o] Their chief accuſers were ſome of their own family. The ducheſs, daughter of Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, had, for above four years, been parted from the duke her huſband; his daughter Mary, ducheſs of Richmond, was grown an extreme enemy of her brother. From theſe two ladies came the firſt information againſt thoſe unfortunate lords, as appears from lord Herbert, p. 263, 264.

[p] Henry Howard, earl of Surrey, had married Frances daughter of the earl of Oxford, by whom he had two ſons, Thomas and Henry, and three daughters. The duke of Norfolk would have allied himſelf to the Seymour family, by engaging his ſon to marry the earl of Hertford's daughter, which his ſon would not conſent to, and the ducheſs of Richmond, his daughter, to ſir Thomas Seymour. [r] This year, in the latter end of March, the public ſtews, which had long been allowed by the ſtate, were ſuppreſſed. Stow, p. 591. They were a continued row of houſes along the Thames ſide in Southwark, eighteen in number, and diſtinguiſhed by ſigns. In the reign of Henry II. there were ſeveral regulations made concerning theſe houſes, to be ſeen in Stow's Survey of London, book IV. p. 7. Camden thinks they were called ſtews, from the fiſh ponds near them, for the fatting and cleanſing pike and tench. Camden in Surrey.——April 27, William Foxley fell aſleep, and could not be waked by any means, till he had ſlept fourteen days and fifteen nights. The king's phyſicians, as well as the king himſelf, examined him, but the cauſe of his ſleeping thus could not be known. He was potter to the mint in the Tower. When he awoke he thought he had ſlept but one night. He lived forty-one years after, till 1587. Stow, p. 591. Hollingſhead, p. 972.——Of much the ſame nature is what we find mentioned in Rymer's Fœd. There is, in vol. XIV. p. 447. a bull of Clement VII. for John Scot, a layman in the dioceſe of Glaſgow in Scotland, who lived a hundred and ſix days without food.——This year, on February 18, died the famous Martin Luther, aged ſixty three years. Sleidan, l. 16.——In Henry VIIIth's reign (though the particular time is not mentioned) was inſtituted the government of the preſident of the north: Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, was the firſt preſident.

[s] It was founded out of three others, St. Michael's college, built by Harvey of Stanton, in Edward's IId's days; King's hall, founded by Edward III. and Fiſhwicke, or Fyſycke hoſtel. King Henry founded it for a maſter, and ſixty fellows and ſcholars, but it has been ſince augmented by ſeveral benefactions. Camden in Cambr.——About the ſame time the king alſo founded Chriſt church hoſpital in London, and endowed it with five hundred marks. It was, before the ſuppreſſion, a convent of Franciſcans or grey friers, but the king beſtowed both the ground and buildings of the ſaid convent, as alſo the adjoining hoſpital of St. Bartholomew on the city, for the relief of the poor. [u] Some gentlemen were deputed in queen Anne's reign, by perſons of the firſt rank in the kingdom, to go to the chapter-houſe of Weſtminſter abbey to ſearch for the original will among the records of the exchequer. They found one, conſiſting of ſeveral ſheets of ſoft courſe paper, tacked together with a braid of green and white ribband; the writing of a mean and ſlovenly character. The will was ſigned at the top of the firſt, and the end of the laſt page, with the king's hand writing, as pretended, but the character was fairer than ever he could make, and the hand ſtiff, like a counterfeit hand. Upon comparing his name on the will, with his ſtamp and his uſual hand writing, it agreed with neither. See Acta Regia, p. 348. vol. III.

Maitland, tion wherein it conſiſted [y]. Here follows the manner wherein Henry ſettled the ſucceſſion, purſuant to the power given him by act of parliament in the year 1543.

I. Prince Edward and all his poſterity.

II. The children he might have by his preſent queen, or any other whom he ſhould marry after her.

III. The princeſs Mary, and her iſſue, provided ſhe married with the aſſent and conſent of the executors of his laſt will and teſtament, or of the major part of thoſe who ſhould then be alive, given under their hands and ſeals. This conſent of the executors, was a condition ſo annexed to the right he granted Mary to ſucceed in her turn, that without it his intent was, ſhe ſhould entirely forfeit her title to the crown.

IV. The princeſs Elizabeth upon the ſame condition with Mary.

V. Frances Brandon, eldeſt daughter of his ſiſter Mary and the duke of Suffolk.

VI. Eleanor Brandon, Frances' younger ſiſter.

If all theſe perſons ſhould happen to die without heirs, or their iſſue come to fail, it was the king's will, that the crown ſhould go to the next rightful heirs. By that he could mean only Mary, the young queen of Scotland, grand-daughter of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, who ought naturally to have preceded the children of the king's younger ſiſter Mary.

Laſtly, he added, that in caſe Mary performed not the condition required of her, the crown ſhould devolve to Elizabeth, as if Mary had died without heirs.

In like manner, if Elizabeth neglected to perform the ſame condition, his intent was that the crown ſhould go to Frances Brandon, as if Elizabeth had died without iſſue.

He appointed for executors of his laſt will thirteen lords, moſt of whom were privy counſellors: as the archbiſhop of Canterbury, chancellor Wriotheſly, the earl of Hertford, young Edward's uncle, &c. Theſe thirteen [z] executors were alſo nominated for the prince his ſucceſſor's privy council, till he was eighteen years of age. Moreover, he named certain perſons who were to be called to the council upon extraordinary occaſions.

He ordered his executors to pay firſt all his debts, and then to make good all his grants to ſeveral particular perſons.

He made the prince, his ſon, heir to all his goods, plate, jewels, money, cannons, ammunition, ſhips, with all things belonging thereto, and charged him to be guided by the advice of thoſe who were appointed for his privy counſellors, till he had attained to eighteen years of age.

He gave, till their marriage, to his daughters Mary and Elizabeth, a yearly penſion of three thouſand pounds ſterling, and to each a portion of ten thouſand pounds or more, if the executors thought proper.

He left his queen a legacy of three thouſand pounds, either in jewels or plate, as ſhe pleaſed, and a thouſand pounds in ready money beſides her dower.

Laſtly, he gave five hundred marks to each of his executors who were lords, and to the others three hundred each.

The moſt extraordinary thing in this will was, the king's paſſing over in ſilence the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, or at leaſt his placing them after the line of his youngeſt ſiſter Mary. Beſides, the clauſe in his will, which ſaid that after the poſterity of Eleanor Brandon, the crown ſhould go to the next heir, muſt have been favourably explained for this firſt branch, ſince theſe general words were liable to ſundry interpretations. This was the effect of the power the parliament had given the king to ſettle the ſucceſſion, or rather to unſettle and put it in a horrible confuſion, if divine providence had not taken more care of it than he. It is not poſſible to deviſe any other reaſon of his proceedings than his hatred of the Scots, and his fear that the kingdom of England would one day fall under the dominion of a prince or princeſs of that nation; which however, all his precautions could not hinder.

[1547] Whilſt the king was ordering his will to be tranſcribed, the duke of Norfolk's and the earl of Surrey's proceſs was forming with great warmth. The king being reſolved to diſpatch theſe two lords, nothing was able to ſave them. The ſon was firſt brought to his trial at Guildhall [a], before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commiſſioners, and put upon an inqueſt of commoners, becauſe he was not a peer of the realm, the duke his father being alive. Several witneſſes were examined, whoſe depoſitions the lord Herbert has inſerted in his hiſtory. But there appears nothing ſufficient to convict him of high treaſon, of which he was accuſed. What was chiefly urged againſt him was his bearing St. Edward's arms, from whence it was inferred, he aſpired to the throne. However, the king being reſolved he ſhould die, he received ſentence of death, and was beheaded on Tower-hill the 19th of January [b].

Mean while the duke of Norfolk uſed all ſorts of means to obtain the king's pardon. He knew him well enough to be ſenſible, that nothing but an entire ſubmiſſion was capable of appeaſing him. To that end, he wrote him a very humble and ſubmiſſive letter, declaring he could not call to mind he had ever offended him, and entreated him for God's ſake to let him know the cauſe of his diſgrace. He prayed likewiſe that his accuſers might be brought face to face before his majeſty, or at leaſt his council, that his cauſe might be maturely examined. He knew not, he ſaid, that he had offended any man, otherwiſe than in appearing very zealous againſt the ſacramentarians. But therein he had only complied with his majeſty's ſentiments and orders. He concluded, with conjuring him to be ſatisfied with taking all or part of his lands and goods as he pleaſed, leaving him only a ſubſiſtence.

This letter produced a quite contrary effect to what the duke expected. By clearing himſelf, he accuſed the king of injuſtice; an offence which would not have been eaſily pardoned, though his deſtruction had not been reſolved. The duke, ſeeing the king unmoved, ſigned, the 12th of January, before the lord chancellor and ſeveral other privy counſellors, a writing, wherein he confeſſed, "That on ſeveral occaſions he had been guilty of high treaſon, in concealing from the king that his ſon the earl of Surrey bore the arms of St. Edward the confeſſor, which did only belong to the king: that himſelf had born the firſt quarter of his arms ever ſince his father's death, the arms of England, with the difference of the labels of ſilver, which were the proper arms of the king's eldeſt ſon, and of no other. That he owned this to be high treaſon by the laws of the realm; and that he ſigned this ſubmiſſion without compulſion or advice, and threw himſelf entirely upon the king's mercy."

Very probably the duke was induced of himſelf, or by the advice of his friends, to make this confeſſion, in the belief, he ſhould never obtain his pardon, unleſs he confeſſed himſelf guilty, that the king might have room to ſhew mercy. But it was all to no purpoſe. His ruin was reſolved, and the king was not wont to deſiſt from ſuch reſolutions when once they were taken. Mean while, as it was eaſy to ſee that the peers who were the duke's proper judges, could not condemn him upon the evidences which were to be produced againſt him, the king thought he ſhould more eaſily compaſs his ends by an act of attainder. So, the parliament meeting at this time, a bill of attainder was brought into the houſe of lords, and read three times, on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of January, and paſſed. In all likelihood the duke's con-

[y] Maitland, ſecretary to the queen of Scotland, accounted the ableſt man of his nation at that time, in a letter to ſir William Cecil, afterwards lord Burleigh, ſays, "the king neither ſigned the will, nor ordered the ſtamp to be put to it. He had been oft deſired to ſign it, but always put it off: but when he ſaw his death approaching, one William Clarke, ſervant to Thomas Henneage, put the ſtamp to it, and ſome gentlemen that were waiting without, were called in to ſign as witneſſes. For this he appealed to the depoſition of the lord Paget, and deſired the marquis of Wincheſter and Northampton, the earl of Pembroke, ſir William Petre, Doctor Buts, &c. might be examined, and their depoſitions entered in the chancery. He alſo appealed to the original will, by which it would appear, that it was not ſigned, but ſtamped only; and therefore, not being according to act of parliament, was of no force." See this letter in Burnet, vol. I. p. 349. and Collect. p. 267.

[z] There are ſixteen named in all, of whom there were only ſeven that were lords or biſhops; viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord chancellor Wriotheſly, earl of Hertford, young Edward's uncle; lord St. John, lord Ruſſel, viſcount Liſle, biſhop Tunſtal. The reſt were, ſir Anthony Brown, ſir Edward Montague, juſtice Bromley, ſir Edward North, ſir William Paget, ſir Anthony Denny, ſir William Harbard, ſir Edward Wooton, and doctor Wooton, his brother.

[b] Henry Howard (eldeſt ſon of Thomas, third duke of Norfolk, by Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham) died much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities. His ſentence was generally condemned as an act of high injuſtice and ſeverity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular odium that they could never overcome. Sir Richard Southwel depoſing, that he knew certain things of the earl, which touched his fidelity to the king: the earl vehemently affirmed himſelf a true man, and offered to fight in his ſhirt with his accuſer. As to the giving the arms of the confeſſor, he ſaid, he did it according to the opinion of the king's heralds. His ſiſter Mary, ducheſs of Richmond, being examined, confeſſed that the earl, her brother, ſhould ſay, theſe new men (meaning the Seymours) loved no nobility, and if God called away the king, they ſhould ſmart for it; with ſome other paſſionate words and circumſtantial ſpeeches, little for his advantage. He lies buried at Framlingham, in the county of Suffolk. Herb. p. 263, &c. Burnet, tom. I. p. 345, &c. Dugdale's Baron, vol. II. p. 275.

feſſion under his own hand contributed very much to the paſſing of the bill. At leaſt it ſerved for an excuſe to thoſe who durſt not oppoſe it. The bill being ſent down to the commons was read thrice, and ſent up alſo paſſed, on the 24th of January. According to the method too frequently practiſed in this reign, it contained only general accuſations, without ſpecifying any thing, except the duke's bearing the arms of England, with three labels of ſilver. It was very ſtrange that his arms ſhould not have been taken notice of before, which he had born ſo long in the ſight of the king himſelf and the whole court, which he had received from his anceſtors, and for which he had the opinion of the heralds. The bill having paſſed in both houſes, the lord chancellor, the earl of Hertford, and ſome other lords, were commiſſioned under the great ſeal to give the royal aſſent [c]. After that, a warrant was ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower, to cut off the duke's head the 29th of January. But happily for him the king died the night before, and the council did not think it adviſable to begin the new reign with the execution of one of the greateſt lords of the kingdom. It is to be obſerved, that during all the proceedings, both of the court and the parliament, againſt the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Surrey, the archbiſhop of Canterbury withdrew to Croydon, without ever appearing at court. As theſe two lords were juſtly deemed his moſt mortal enemies, he would not be accuſed of being concerned in what was tranſacting againſt them.

Whilſt theſe proceſſes were forming, the king was ſeized in his bed with an illneſs which brought him inſenſibly to his end. However, the conſideration of the account he was going to render to God, was not capable of moving him to uſe compaſſion towards two lords, of one of the moſt antient families in England, who had done him great ſervices, and hitherto were guilty of no crime which deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment. On this occaſion prevailed, as on many others, paſſion and policy in the king's mind, over juſtice and mercy. He was bent at any rate to ſacrifice theſe two lords to his ſon's ſafety, and to eſtabliſh, by their death, all the alterations he had made in religion, being perſuaded they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to deſtroy them. The ſequel plainly ſhewed he was not miſtaken with regard to the duke of Norfolk, who ſurvived him. This lord's life, preſerved by a ſort of miracle, was a demonſtration how vain are human precautions, when contrary to the decrees of God.

The king's illneſs continually increaſed, and no man dared to warn him of his approaching end. Every one was afraid that a prince, who was always approached with trembling, would look upon this charitable warning as a crime, and puniſh it according to an act of parliament, by which thoſe who ſhould dare to foretel the king's death were adjudged traitors. But at laſt, ſir anthony Denny, one of his privy-counſellors, had the courage and charity to warn him that he had but a few hours to live. The king thanked him, and expreſſed his great grief aud horror for all the ſins of his paſt life. Whereupon Denny aſked him if any clergyman ſhould be ſent for; and he ſaid, if any, it ſhould be the archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Cranmer, being then at Croydon, could not come till the king was ſpeechleſs. He had but juſt time to deſire him to give ſome ſign of his dying in the faith of Chriſt. The king ſqueezed his hand, and preſently after expired, in the night between the 28th and 29th of January 1546-7, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, having reigned thirty-ſeven years and nine months. His death was kept private three days. Probably the council took time to conſult whether the duke of Norfolk ſhould be executed. At laſt, after three days, the lord chancellor ſignified to both houſes, that the king was dead, and the parliament thereby diſſolved [d].

[d] The reader may ſee Henry's character drawn at length by the lord Herbert. But as his life and actions ſufficiently make him known, I ſhall only add what Biſhop Burnet ſays of him, at the end of his firſt volume of the Hiſtory of the Reformation. King Henry VIIIth is rather to be reckoned among the great than the good princes. He exerciſed ſo much ſeverity on men of both perſuaſions, that the writers of both ſides have laid open his faults, and taxed his cruelty. But as neither of them were much obliged to him, ſo none have taken ſo much care to ſet forth his good qualities, as his enemies have done to enlarge on his vices. I do not deny that he is to be numbered among the ill princes, yet I cannot rank him with the worſt. ——King Henry's body lies buried at Windſor, under a moſt ſtately tomb, begun in copper, and gilt, but not finiſhed. The reader may ſee the model of what it was intended to be, in Speed, p. 784.

By indentures of the 1ſt and 23d of Henry VIII. a pound weight of gold of the old ſtandard, was to be coined into twenty-ſeven pounds by tale; viz. into twenty-four ſovereigns at 22s. 6d. a piece, or forty-eight rials at 11s. 3d. a piece, or ſeventy-two angels at 7s. 6d. a piece, or eighty-one george nobles at 6s. 8d. a piece, or one hundred and forty-four half angels at 3s. 9d. a piece, or one hundred and ſixty-two forty penny pieces at 3s. 4d. a piece; and a pound weight of gold, of the fineneſs of twenty-two carats only, was to be coined into one hundred crowns and a half of the double roſe, or two hundred and one half crowns, making by tale twenty-five pounds two ſhillings and ſix-pence; and a pound weight of ſilver of the old ſterling, was coined into one hundred and thirty-five groats, or two hundred and ſeventy half groats, or five hundred and forty ſterlings (or pence) or one thouſand and eighty half pence, or two thouſand one hundred and ſixty farthings; ſo that every pound wt. of ſterling ſilver was coined into forty-five ſhillings by tale. In the 34th of this reign, a pound weight of gold, of twenty-three carats fine, and one carat allay, was coined into twenty-eight pounds ſixteen ſhillings by tale; by which indenture there were coined ſovereigns at 20s. a piece, half ſovereigns at 10s. angels at 8s. and quarter angels at 2s. a piece; and a pound weight of ſilver, of ten ounces fine, and two ounces allay, was coined into forty-eight ſhillings by tale, namely into teſtoons (which were 12d. a piece) groats, half groats, pence and half pence, and farthings.——In the 36th of Henry VIII. a pound weight of gold of twenty-two carats fine, and two carats allay, was coined into thirty pounds by tale; viz. into thirty ſovereigns at 20s. a piece, or fifty half ſovereigns at 10s. a piece, or one hundred and twenty crowns at 5s. a piece, or two hundred and forty half crowns: and the king had two carats of fine gold for coinage, which yielded him fifty ſhillings. Silver was coined by the ſame indenture, of ſix ounces fine and ſix ounces allay, into forty-eight ſhillings by tale. It was coined into teſtoons, groats, half groats, pence, half pence, and farthings.——In the 37th of this reign, a pound weight of gold of twenty carats fine, and four carats allay, was coined into thirty pounds by tale, as in the laſt; and the king had four carats which yielded him five pounds two ſhillings; and a pound weight of ſilver, of four ounces fine and eight ounces allay, was coined into forty-eight ſhillings by tale, which raiſed the pound weight of fine gold to thirty-ſix pounds; and the pound weight of fine ſilver to ſeven pounds four ſhillings.

The gold coins of Henry VIII. are ſovereigns, rials, half ſovereigns, angels, george nobles, half and quarter angels, forty penny pieces, crowns, and half crowns; and the ſilver coins, teſtoons, groats, half groats, ſterlings, half pence, farthings; to which may be added crown pieces of ſilver, which were firſt coined by this king. Henry's ſovereign has on one ſide HENRIC. 8. D. G. AGL. FRANCIEZ HIB. REX. the king in his robes crowned upon his throne, with the ſceptre and ball. Reverſe, the arms of France and England quarterly, ſupported by a lion and a dragon, IHS. AVTE. TRANSIENS PER MED. ILLOR. IBAT. (fig. 5.) The angel of this king is like his father's; a half angel has this inſcription on the reverſe, CRUX, AVE. SPES. UNICA. The crown and half crown of gold, have on one ſide a large roſe and crown betwixt H. I. crowned, HENRIC. VIII. RVTILANS. ROSA SIN. SPINA. Reverſe, the arms of France and England quartered under a crown; and H. I. —DEI. G. R. ANGLIE Z. FRA. DNS. HIBERNIE (fig. 6.) As for the ſilver coins, there were two ſorts of teſtoons, or ſhillings; that of fine ſilver exhibits the king half faced, whereof one has CIVITAS EBORACI. The other ſhilling, called the broad-faced ſhilling, of a baſer allay, has on one ſide, HENRIC. VIII. DI. GRA. AGL. FRA. Z. HIB. REX. Reverſe, POSVI, &c. a roſe crowned, with H. R. likewiſe crowned. (fig. 1.) The groat has his head with the ſide face, HENRIC. VIII. DI. GR. AGL. Z. FRANC. Reverſe, the arms, POSUI, &c. (fig. 3.) Another has HENRIC. VIII. DI. GRA. REX. ANGLIE. Reverſe, FRANCIE. ET. HIBERNIE REX. a crowned harp between the letters H. and R. crowned (fig. 7.) Some coined by cardinal Wolſey at York, have a cardinal's hat under the arms. His pence and half pence give him ſeated on a throne, with (and ſometimes without) the globe and ſceptre. H. D. G. ROSA SINE SPIA. (fig. 2.) The farthing has on one ſide a port-culice (whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from half pence, which it was not before) and a croſs and pellets on the other. (fig. 4.)

DISSERTATIONS.

I. Of Queen ANNE of BULLEN.
II. Of the BIRTH of EDWARD the SIXTH.

DISSERTATION I.

Of Queen ANNE of BULLEN [a].

THE life of this unfortunate lady is a remarkable inſtance of the great inſtability of human affairs. She had a ſufficient ſhare of proſperity and adverſity. She was ſeen one day at the top of fortune's wheel, and the next at the very bottom of it. She had been raiſed by king Henry to the higheſt pitch of glory, to the wearing of a crown, and ſitting upon the throne; and, by the ſame hand, was ſunk as low afterwards, deprived of her good name and reputation, and brought at laſt, like a malefactor, to the block. As her caſe has been very differently reported by ſome writers, and very hardly and unfairly repreſented by others, I ſhall examine it with all the candour and impartiality I can, and endeavour to clear up, and vindicate the character of that unhappy princeſs. A piece of juſtice which cannot fairly be denied to one who firſt occaſioned, and zealouſly promoted, the reformation of our church, and alſo gave life to an excellent princeſs, who became the glory of her ſex, the envy of her neighbours, the honour of her nation, which ſhe more than once delivered from ruin and deſtruction. But, before I enter into the merits of the cauſe, and conſider what was alleged againſt that queen, I beg leave to make a reflection or two upon the unhappy ſituation ſhe was in, when the ſtorm broke in ſo violently upon her. Firſt, though a ſudden elevation from a low eſtate to the higheſt pitch of power and greatneſs is generally apt to raiſe the envy of the world, and to create enemies, ſhe lay the more open and expoſed to theſe, as ſhe was thought to be the occaſion of the king's breaking with the pope, and ſhaking off the yoke of Rome, and the greateſt inſtrument and promoter of all the bold ſteps that were taken by that prince, which could not but render her very odious to a formidable party, the whole body of the Roman catholics, who, during her life, could never expect to ſee a reconciliation with the church of Rome, but might hope, after her death, to make up the quarrel, to heal the wound, and to cloſe up the breaches. But, ſecondly, what bore the hardeſt upon her, and indeed was the main occaſion of her ruin, was the paſſionate and violent temper of the king. No ſea, in a full ſtorm, was ever more boiſterous and tempeſtuous than he. Nothing could ſtem the tide of his rage and paſſion. He never ſtuck at any thing to gratify his luſt, and ſatisfy his deſires. He was then tired and ſurfeited with the queen, and reſolved to marry Anne Seymour, whom he had been in love with before, ſo muſt be ſure to get rid of his wife. Lord Herbert, and Rapin after him, impute his ſeverity to a fit of jealouſy; but, with ſubmiſſion, it is giving it too good a name. It was downright diſguiſe and ſurfeit, and a violent paſſion for another woman. Jealouſy (as is truly obſerved) is never without ſome mixture of love, but that Henry had not the leaſt grain of that left, plainly appeared by his haſty, precipitate, and indecent marriage with Anne Seymour, the very day queen Anne loſt her head upon the block. He had found a great deal of trouble and difficulty in breaking through his firſt marriage with queen Catherine, and was now reſolved to make quicker work of it, and to cut a knot he could not eaſily untie. It is true, that, in order to ſave appearances, he got a kind of divorce to paſs under the pretence of a contract and pre-engagement on the queen's ſide, and prevailed with the biſhops (who ſhamefully complied with every thing he required) to favour that abſurdity. I call it an abſurdity, becauſe it was ruining, and in effect deſtroying, all that had been done before. For if there had been, as was trumped up, a pre-contract between her and lord Piercy (though, by the way, he ſwore by his ſalvation, and upon the ſacrament, that it was entirely falſe) if I ſay there had been ſuch a contract, then her marriage with the king was actually null and void, the proceedings againſt it of courſe muſt be ſo too, and ſhe could not without the utmoſt injuſtice be puniſhed for adultery. I now come to examine the charge that was brought againſt her. And here, to clear my way, I ſhall remove, like ſo much dirt and rubbiſh, the evidence, or, to ſpeak more properly, the invectives of the jeſuit Sanders. He is a writer of ſo low and profligate a character for veracity, that he is given up by thoſe of his own communion, who are not a little aſhamed, and out of countenance at his heat, forgeries, and falſehoods. He does not think it enough to revile and aſperſe the character of this princeſs, but makes a monſter of her perſon. He ſaith, ſhe was lean viſaged, longſided, gobbertoothed, of a yellow complexion, and had a wen in her neck. But ſure king Henry muſt have had a better taſte, he muſt have been a more elegans formarum ſpectator, "and could not (as Fuller ſaith) have been drawn to ſo paſſionate a love, without a ſtronger loadſtone." Beſides, ſuch palpable falſehoods were eaſily confuted by the ſight of her pictures, which repreſent her very handſome; and by the paſſionate letters from the king to her, that are ſtill kept at Rome, by which it appears ſhe was a beautiful perſon, and that it was her beauty that ſtruck and charmed the monarch, and advanced her to the throne. The ſame writer aſſerts, that ſir Thomas Wyat aſſured the king he had himſelf firſt corrupted and debauched her. But the falſehood of this appears by a relation of his own ſon. For ſir Thomas was eſquire of the king's body, and always continued in that poſt, except when he was employed in embaſſies abroad. But if Sanders' ſtory had been true, he muſt have fallen under the king's jealouſy, or the queen's power, and would have withdrawn himſelf, or been produced as evidence againſt her at her trial. To proceed, it is ſaid there was a ſolemn tournament at Greenwich on May day, and that at this diverſion the queen dropt her handkerchief, which was taken up by a ſuppoſed favourite, who wiped his face with it [b]. The king, taking notice of this paſſage, immediately withdrew, to the great ſurpriſe of the queen and the court. The next day, the earl of Rochford, the queen's brother, and one Henry Norris were committed to the Tower. But this alſo relies upon the bare report of Sanders, which I ſhould not have taken notice of, but that I find it related by Collier, without naming the author he took it from, or paſſing any cenſure upon it. Lord Herbert rejects it, as not being mentioned by any good hiſtorian. Rapin ſaith it relies wholly upon the credit of Sanders; ſo I look upon it to be a meer fiction and invention of that fabulous writer, or a ſilly imitation of the handkerchief plot in the Moor of Venice, which by the way, is the only weak part and blemiſh in that noble tragedy.

But to come now to more material evidence. The queen

[a] Theſe two diſſertaions were communicated by the ſame hand as thoſe at the end of vol. I.

[b] Biſhop Burnet ſaith, it proceeded from a letter which the king received at thoſe juſts, to inform him that the lady Wingfield, one of the queen's ſervants, had, upon her death bed, charged her, upon oath, with ſome criminal affair.

was accuſed of committing inceſt with her own brother, the earl of Rochford. This is a heavy and grievous charge indeed. But how was it made out? for ſure there is ſome difference between proving and aſſerting. Why, he was ſeen by her bedſide, and ſtooping over the bed, while he was talking to her; doctor Howel ſaith, that he was then ſeen to kiſs her. Allowing the full of the allegation, allowing he did actually ſalute her, ſhall the kiſs of a brother to a ſiſter be branded with the name of inceſt, and be conſtrued as a breach of conjugal fidelity? It is certain the earl denied the crime, and aſſerted the queen's innocence, and his own, to his laſt dying breath. But the evidence that ſeemed to be the moſt material, and to bear the hardeſt upon her, was the depoſition of Smeaton the muſician, who confeſſed (ſaith Burnet) that he had lain three times with the queen. But this was too haſtily aſſerted by that prelate. For there is not the leaſt word of it in lord Herbert, who is a very exact writer, and could never have omitted ſo material a proof, upon which the whole iſſue of the matter ſeemed to turn. He ſpeaks indeed of a confeſſion made by the queen herſelf, in relation to Smeaton. It appears (ſaith he) by a letter from Cromwell to the king, that ſhe had confeſſed ſome particulars, but he ſaith they amounted to no more than ſome indiſcretions and unguarded expreſſions. However, let Smeaton's confeſſion be what it would, it is certain he never was produced face to face to the queen, and every body knows what ſtreſs is to be laid upon an unconfronted evidence [c]. But her enemies had taken care of that. They had condemned Smeaton before her, that he might not appear as witneſs againſt her, and this, as Rapin judiciouſly obſerves, looks very favourably on the queen's ſide; ſince it is not to be thought her accuſer would have neglected ſo full a proof as this, if there had been the leaſt ground and foundation for it. This looks very ſuſpicious, and as if they were afraid to produce him before her face, leſt ſhe ſhould confound him, and oblige him to recant. But it is moſt likely it was only a faint and artifice of her enemies, who told her of this depoſition of Smeaton (as it appears they did by her reply) to ſee whether they could draw a confeſſion from her mouth. However, the ſtratagem did not take. For ſhe anſwered reſolutely, "Hath he not then cleared me? I fear his ſoul now is ſuffering for it; but as for Norris and my brother, I doubt not but they are in the preſence of the great King, with whom I am to be to-morrow." So that this evidence of Smeaton, upon which ſo much ſtreſs was laid, and the iſſue of the whole affair ſeemed to turn, will be found, if duly weighed, to be mighty light in the balance, and to come very ſhort of a full proof and conviction. Collier ſaith, "Her language was broken and diſturbed. She ſeemed to diſcover a mixture of aſſurance and confuſion in her diſcourſe, for ſhe laughed one minute and wept another." But ſure that hiſtorian did not know, or, at leaſt, did not conſider, the nature and effects of vapours and hyſteric fits in women, which are frequently brought upon them by mere grief and trouble. In theſe fits the patients are diſturbed and diſordered in their heads, they know not what they ſay or do, and often laugh and cry all in a breath. This I take to have been exactly her caſe. She was no doubt in the vapours occaſioned by her troubles. But from theſe no proof can fairly be drawn of her innocence or guilt. What I have ſaid on this ſubject will, I hope, ſuffice to clear that unhappy lady, and to ſhew ſhe was not guilty of the crimes laid to her charge, but was merely ſacrificed to the violent paſſion, and cruel [d] and mercileſs pride, of a glutted and ſurfeited huſband, who was reſolved, coſt what it would, to get rid of his wife, and to marry another lady, whom he loved before. And this he was ſo ſtrongly bent upon, that, till he could gain his end, he enjoyed no reſt or quiet, and had no taſte or reliſh for his pleaſures and diverſions. He went out with his hounds, and breakfaſted under a great tree [e] in Epping foreſt, that very day ſhe was to be executed in the Tower, from whence he had ordered notice to be given him by the firing of a gun the minute her head was ſtruck off. He no ſooner heard the ſignal, than he cried out, "The buſineſs is done, the buſineſs is done, uncouple the hounds, and let us follow our ſport;" and that very day, at his return, he married Jane Seymour, and took her to his bed. This ſingle circumſtance, were there no other in her favour, would be ſufficient for any impartial perſon to acquit Anne Bullen, and to ſhew her innocence. Rapin very juſtly obſerves, that this lady's caſe became a party buſineſs, and an affair of religion. As ſhe was a principal occaſion, and a zealous promoter and favourer of the reformation, the proteſtants aſſerted her innocence, and extolled her to the ſkies. The papiſts, for the ſame reaſon, that they might caſt a blemiſh upon the proteſtant religion, and wound it through her ſides, blackened and reviled her to the utmoſt of their power. It was this bigoted zeal that whetted the pen of Sanders, the jeſuit, and tinged it in deepeſt and rankeſt gall. But ſome writers of the ſame communion have been more candid, and have done more juſtice to her character. I ſhall mention but two, whoſe teſtimonies I dare oppoſe to all the calumnies of that virulent writer. The firſt is Metteren, who, in his juſtly-eſteemed hiſtory of the Low Countries, ſpeaks of her in theſe terms: "When ſhe heard her ſentence (ſaith he) ſhe was not in the leaſt concerned and terrified, but lifted up her hands to heaven, and ſaid, O Father, who art the way, the truth, and the life, thou knoweſt well I have not deſerved this death." This is the account this writer gives of her behaviour at her death, without inſinuating that there was the leaſt prevarication, falſehood, and hypocriſy, in her carriage. The other author I ſhall produce is Thevet, a frier, who in his hiſtory ſaith, that king Henry, at his death, owned and declared her innocence, and heartily repented of his injuſtice and cruelty towards her. Now the teſtimony of this writer is very material, and carries much weight along with it. For, beſides that he was a Franciſcan frier, he had been a conſiderable ſufferer himſelf for the ſake of Catherine, the divorced queen, and therefore can never be ſuſpected of any favour and partiality for queen Anne, her rival, ſo that nothing but the force of truth could have drawn ſuch a confeſſion from his pen.

Letter of Queen ANNE BULLEN to King HENRY VIII.

C. O. A Copy.

SIR,

YOUR grace's diſpleaſure, and my impriſonment, are things ſo ſtrange to me, as what to write, or what to excuſe, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you ſend unto me (willing me to confeſs a truth, and ſo to obtain your favour) by ſuch a one whom you know to be my ancient profeſſed enemy: I no ſooner received this meſſage by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you ſay, confeſſing a truth indeed may procure my ſafety, I ſhall with all willingneſs and duty perform your command. But let not your grace ever imagine, that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not ſo much as a thought ever proceeded; and, to ſpeak a truth, never a prince had a wife more loyal in all duty and true affection, than you have ever found in Anne Bullen, with which name and place I could willingly have contented myſelf, if God and your grace's pleaſure had ſo been pleaſed. Neither did I at any time ſo far forget myſelf in my exaltation or received queenſhip, but that I always looked for ſuch an alteration as now I find. For the ground of my preferment being on no ſurer foundation than your grace's fancy, the leaſt alteration was fit and ſufficient (I know) to draw that fancy to ſome other ſubject. You have choſen me from a low eſtate to be your queen and companion, far beyond my deſert or deſire. If then you found me worthy of ſuch honour with your grace, let not any light fancy, or bad council of my enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me. Neither let that ſtain, that unworthy ſtain, of a diſloyal heart to-

[c] This is what ſhe heartily deſired; ſhe earneſtly begged of the king that ſhe might have a fair and legal trial, by which her innocence might be cleared, the king's ſuſpicion and conſcience ſatisfied, the ſlanders and ignominy of the world ſtopped, or her guilt openly declared. This appears by a very moving letter ſhe wrote to the king when ſhe was in the Tower, the day before ſhe died, which carries ſuch marks of the queen's innocence, and of her huſband's hardſhip and cruelty towards her, that I thought I could not better illuſtrate this matter than by annexing it to theſe papers, together with the lord Piercy's ſolemn proteſtation of there never being any marriage contract between him and the queen.

N. B. Theſe two letters were publiſhed by Hern, anno 1717, at the end of Titus Livius Forojulienſis, from ſome original papers of Dr. Smith.

[d] Cruelty indeed was the reigning vice of that king, and the great ſtain and blemiſh of his reign. He took a kind of pleaſure in raiſing men from the meaneſt condition to the greateſt dignities, and ſinking them again to the bottom of miſery. He was one that never did his work by halves, but always went through it in cruelty, of which his reign affords a ſad and melancholy ſcene. For, beſides a great many private men, papiſts, and goſpellers, that ſuffered for their religion under him, he put to death 77 abbots, prieſts, priors, and monks; 18 barons and knights; 12 dukes and marquiſes; and one cardinal: another he attainted, and would have uſed him in the ſame manner, but could not get him into his hands. He executed two of his queens, and was juſt going to cut off a third, for he had ſigned the warrant to ſend Catherine Parr to the Tower; ſo I think there is no ſtrain in what Raleigh ſaith of him, that if the world had loſt the character of a mercileſs and relentleſs prince, it might be truly found in him.

[e] This tree is called Henry the VIIIth's oak to this day, as I was informed by a gentleman living in that foreſt.

Three

wards your grace, ever caſt ſo foul a blot on your moſt dutiful wife, and the infant princeſs, your daughter. Try me, good king; but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my ſworn enemies ſit as my accuſers and judges. Yea, let me receive an open trial. For my truth ſhall fear no open ſhame. Then ſhall you ſee either my innocency cleared, your ſuſpicion and conſcience ſatisfied, the ignominy and ſlander of the world ſtopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatſoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from open cenſure, and my offence being ſo lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute a worthy puniſhment on me, as an unfaithful wife, but to follow your affection already ſettled on that party, for whoſe ſake I am now as I am; whoſe name I could ſome good while ſince have pointed unto you, your grace being not ignorant of my ſuſpicion therein. But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous ſlander, muſt bring you the joying of your deſired happineſs, then I deſire of God that he will pardon your great ſin herein, and likewiſe my enemies, the inſtruments thereof; and that he will not call you to a ſtrait account for your unprincely and cruel uſage of me, at his general judgment ſeat, where both you and myſelf muſt ſhortly appear, and in whoſe juſt judgment, I doubt not, whatſoever the world may think of me, my innocence ſhall be openly known, and ſufficiently cleared. My laſt and only requeſt ſhall be, that myſelf may only bear the burden of your grace's diſpleaſure, and that it may not touch the innocent ſouls of thoſe poor gentlemen, whom I underſtand are likewiſe in ſtrait priſonment for my ſake. If I have ever found favour in your ſight, if ever the name of Anne Bullen hath been pleaſing in your ears, let me obtain this laſt requeſt. And ſo I will leave to trouble your grace any farther, with my earneſt prayer to the Trinity, to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful priſon in the Tower, the 6th of May. Your moſt loyal and ever faithful wife,

ANNE BULLEN.

The king ſending a meſſenger to Queen Anne, being priſoner in the Tower, willing her to confeſs the truth, ſhe ſaid, ſhe could confeſs no more than ſhe had already ſpoken; and ſhe ſaid, ſhe muſt conceal nothing from the king, to whom ſhe did acknowledge herſelf ſo much bound for many favours: for raiſing her firſt from a mean woman to be a marchioneſs; next, to be his queen; and now, ſeeing he could beſtow no further honour upon her on earth, for purpoſing to make her, by martyrdom, a ſaint in heaven.

Earl of Northumberland to ſecretary ———, denying that there was a contract between queen ANNE and him.

C. O. An Original.

Maſter Secretary,

THIS ſhall be to ſignify unto you, that I perceive by ſir Raynold Carnaby, that there is ſuppoſed a precontract to be between the queen and me; whereupon I was not only heretofore examined upon mine oath before the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, but alſo received the bleſſed ſacrament upon the ſame, before the duke of Norfolk and other the king's highneſs council learned in the ſpiritual law; aſſuring you, Mr. ſecretary, by the ſaid oath and bleſſed body, which afore I received, and hereafter intend to receive, that the ſame may be to my damnation, if ever there was any contract or promiſe of marriage between her and me. At Newington Green, the 13th day of May, in the 28th year of the reign of our ſovereign lord king Henry the eighth.

Your aſſured,

H. NORTHUMBERLAND.

DISSERTATION II.

Of the Birth of EDWARD VI.

MY laſt diſcourſe was upon the death of Anne of Bullen, the wife of Henry the VIIIth, whom I endeavoured to vindicate of the crime of adultery that was laid to her charge. The ſubject of my preſent remarks ſhall be the birth of that king's only ſon, Edward the VIth. And here one could hardly think an affair of this nature, as the birth of a prince (eſpecially when there was not the leaſt doubt and conteſt about the legitimacy of it) ſhould afford much matter for a review———But as the nativity of Edward hath occaſioned controverſy among the writers, and given room to ſome of them to ſhew their ſpleen and malice, I ſhall examine the matter with all the fairneſs and impartiality I am able.—Now, the main of the diſpute ſeems to turn upon theſe two points: 1ſt, The day on which king Edward was born; 2dly, The manner of his coming into the world. For the better clearing theſe matters, it will be neceſſary to conſider three things; 1ſt, The very day of the month on which he was born; 2dly, The preciſe time of his mother, queen Jane's death, and how long it happened after the birth of her ſon. This laſt particular may perhaps be thought a matter of ſmall conſequence, but it will appear to be material, as it may help to diſprove the third thing which I deſign to examine; I mean a ſtory related by ſome writers, that he was born by inciſion, and violently cut out of his mother's womb. As to the firſt of theſe, the very day of his nativity, the opinion of hiſtorians in general is, that he was born the 12th of [d] October, on the eve of the feaſt of Edward the martyr. It is probable his father laid hold on this, as a happy omen, and ſo gave him the name of that ſaint. There is one writer indeed that differs from them in this, and places his birth on the 10th day of that month, and that for a reaſon beſt known to the perſon himſelf. I mean the jeſuite Sanders, who aſſerts in his book De Schiſmate Anglicano. But this author's character is ſuch, that when he deviates from other writers, we may take it for granted, it is either to lead the reader out of his way, or to vent his ſpleen, and to diſplay his malice. He was an inveterate enemy to the reformation, and to all the authors and promoters of it, and by conſequence to king Edward the VIth, who had ſo great a hand in that pious work. Had he been a catholic prince, and a favourer of the popiſh cauſe, Sanders, no doubt, would have laid hold of this circumſtance of his birth, would have enlarged upon it as a happy omen, that ſeemed to promiſe and foretel all the glories of his reign. But, as he was unwilling an heretical prince ſhould be ſo happy as to be born on the eve of that Engliſh king and ſaint, he made no ſcruple to haſten and advance his birth, and to make him come into the world two days before he really did. The next thing to be conſidered is, the exact time of queen Jane Seymour's death, and how many days ſhe lived after the birth of the prince. And this Stow, Polydore Virgil, and the reſt of the writers, have fixed, by a miſtake, on the 14th day of October, that is, two days after the nativity of Edward. In this they are followed by Mr. Rapin, which is the more ſtrange, becauſe he muſt have ſeen the remarks upon Hayward's life of this prince in doctor Kennet's edition of the Complete Hiſtory of England, which clear up that matter, and ſet it in a true light. Hayward indeed varies from thoſe writers, and ſets her death four days after her delivery; but this does not at all mend the matter; for it is certain, ſhe did not die till twelve days after the birth of the prince; and this appears from an authentic manuſcript of the ſolemnity of her funeral, as alſo from a journal of ſecretary Cecil.

I have been the more exact in ſettling this date of the queen's death, in order, 3dly, to diſprove a ſtory that has

[d] Three days after, i. e. the 15th of October, he was baptized with great ſplendor and ſolemnity, thoſe of the higheſt nobility, the biſhops, abbots, dignified clergy, and chaplains, with abundance of knights and gentlemen, being ſummoned to be preſent. The prince was carried from his lodgings to the chapel by the marchioneſs of Exeter, with a moſt illuſtrious attendance. The two princeſſes, and the lady Mary and the lady Elizabeth, were in the retinue, and aſſiſted. The godfathers at the font were archbiſhop Cranmer, and Thomas duke of Norfolk; and the duke of Suffolk was godfather at his confirmation at the ſame time. After he had been baptized by one of the biſhops, his title was alſo proclaimed by garter king at arms, and called prince Edward, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter.

The

been related by ſome writers, that Edward was born by inciſion, and violently cut out of his mother's body. The firſt who mentions this is Heyward, who ſaith, "All reports conſtantly run, that he was not, by natural paſſage, delivered into the world; but that his mother's body was opened for his birth, and that ſhe died of the inciſion the fourth day following." How theſe reports were firſt ſpread, and how juſtly grounded they are, will I hope appear in the ſequel of theſe papers. After this he ſaith, That the Romans thought ſuch births fortunate; and fancied, that thoſe proved commonly great men that came into the world in that manner. For this he quotes Pliny, whoſe words are, Auſpicatiùs enectâ matre naſcuntur, ſicut Scipio Africanus prior natus; and that they were called Cæſones, and afterwards Cæſares. But, by the way, his obſervation and quotation out of Pliny are little to the purpoſe here. For whatever [e] conceits and ſuperſtitions the Romans had in relation to theſe violent births, it is certain there was no ſuch notion in England at that time; nor is there in the preſent age, in which ſuch a birth, attended with the mother's death, is eſteemed a great misfortune and ſad calamity to the family it happens in; and I dare ſay, that the firſt inventors and ſpreaders of the ſtory had this very thing in their view, namely, to caſt a ſlur and blemiſh upon the birth of this prince as tragical and unfortunate. I make no doubt but the enemies to king Henry and the reformation were highly pleaſed with the report, looked on it as a judgment upon him for his hard uſage of the good catholic queen Catherine, and as a fatal curſe upon the two wives which he married after that divorce; the firſt of which died like a malefactor on a ſcaffold, and the laſt loſt her life by the ripping up of her womb.

This is the opinion of the judicious author of the remarks upon Edward's life, in doctor Kennet's edition: "No hiſtorian (ſaith he) that wrote before Heyward, gives any countenance to this, except it be Sanders, whoſe pen was not directed ſo much by truth as malice, who frames a ſtory, that when the queen was in extreme labour, and they aſked the king whom he would have ſpared, the queen or his ſon? he anſwered, his ſon, becauſe he could eaſily find out other wives; but even he has not a word of cutting the young infant out of his mother's body. So that I make no queſtion that this was at firſt an idle fable, invented by papiſts, improved upon what Sanders wrote, and the report ſoon became current among that party, out of ill will to king Henry, to make him appear cruel, and the prince, his ſon, to have been unluckily born." The truth is, this was a very good handle for a forgery. It was an eaſy tranſition from one fable to another. It was eaſy, I ſay, upon the firſt report to graft the ſecond falſe and ſcandalous ſtory: I call it falſe and ſcandalous, becauſe none of the writers that lived neareſt that age, neither Stow, Hollingſhead, nor even Polydore Virgil, who lived at the very time of the prince's birth, take the leaſt notice of it. Neither is there a word about it in king Edward's journal, which gives a minute and exact account of all particulars relating to himſelf, from the year 1537, which was that of his birth, and ſo proceeds regularly from the year of his acceſſion to the crown in 1547, to the end of November 1552. Camden, indeed, in his Apparatus, or introduction to the reign of queen Elizabeth, makes mention of it. "Queen Jane (ſaith he) fell in labour and preſently died, the prince being fain to be cut out of her womb, and ſucceeding his father after in the kingdom." But then he ſeems to retract it in his marginal note, where he ſaith only, that the queen died in childbirth of king Edward; and theſe are the very words of Polydore [f] Virgil, namely, that ſhe died in childbirth two days after the birth of the prince. The ſame is related by an old chronicle of Canterbury, publiſhed by Herne [g], in his preface to his accurate edition of Camden's Life and Reign of Queen Elizabeth. This antiquary aſſures us, that the ſame account of king Edward's birth is given by ſir Thomas Smith, in a dialogue concerning the then intended marriage of queen Elizabeth, which is not yet printed, but was communicated to him by Anſtis, king at arms. Fuller ſaith, in his Church Hiſtory, that there went a ſtrong tradition that king Edward, like Cæſar, was cut out of his mother's body; but he adds, that a perſon of great honour, deriving her intelligence from ſuch as were pr ſent at her labour, aſſured him of the contrary. Beſides, the time of Jane Seymour's death, namely, twelve days after her delivery, renders the ſtory extremely improbable. But, laſtly, what ſets the matter beyond diſpute, and which (were there no other proofs againſt it) is enough to ſink the credit of this report, is a letter ——— from the queen herſelf to the council, giving them an account of her happy delivery; to which may be added, a certificate of her illneſs from her phyſicians and attendants, of the ſtate of her health, a little before ſhe died, which makes no manner of mention of this circumſtance of opening the body, which they could not fairly have omitted had it been true. Theſe two original papers, the letter and the certificate, are ſtill extant in the Cotton library, from whence they have been publiſhed by Fuller and Herne. All this, I hope, may be ſufficient to put the matter in a fair and clear light, to diſprove the teſtimony of ſir John Heyward, and to confute the ſtory of king Edward's being cut out of his mother's womb.

I could point at ſeveral other places in the life of king Edward, written by this author, which are as liable to exception as this I have examined above; but, not to detain the reader, nor to deviate too far from my ſubject, I ſhall confine myſelf to two facts only, wherein ſir John Heyward has laid himſelf very open to cenſure and reflection. The firſt, concerning the quarrel between the protector and the admiral, his brother, which proved, in the end, ſo fatal to them both. The ſecond, relating to the death of the laſt of them, who loſt his life upon a ſcaffold. As to the firſt, the difference between theſe two great men, Heyward imputes it to a jealouſy between their two ladies, about precedency and taking place, which he ſaith the protector's wife refuſed to give to Catherine, the queen dowager, who had married the admiral. His words are theſe: "The lord Sudley had taken to wife Catherine Parr, the queen dowager, laſt wife to king Henry the VIIIth, a woman beautiful, with excellent virtues, eſpecially with humility, the beauty of all other virtues. The duke had taken to wife Anne Stanhope, a woman, for many imperfections, intolerable, but for pride, monſtruous. She was exceedingly ſubtle and violent in accompliſhing her ends, for which ſhe ſpurned over all reſpects both of conſcience and ſhame. This woman did bear ſuch an invincible hate, firſt, againſt the queen dowager, for light cauſes and women's quarrels, eſpecially for that ſhe had the precedency of place before her, &c. he adds, that ſhe rubbed into the duke's dull capacity (as he very coarſely expreſſes it) that his brother ſought to take away his life and to attain to his place; that the duke, at length yielding himſelf to her, did deviſe his brother's deſtruction; and that, being arreſted and ſent to the Tower, he was condemned by act of parliament a ſhort time after." But beſides the great improbability of the thing, beſides that the ducheſs muſt have been mad and out of her ſenſes, or entirely ignorant of the cuſtoms of the nation, to think of taking place of a queen dowager of England; beſides this, I ſay, there is not a ſingle word of it in all the letters that paſſed about this grand affair. There [h] is not the leaſt mention of it either in Hollingſhead, Stow, or the journal of Edward the VIth. which is very large about the matter of the admiral, and relates many particulars about it that are of much leſs conſequence than this, ſo that Heyward could have no authority for his ſtory but that of the jeſuit Sanders, a writer of very low credit and ſad character for veracity, and who made it his whole buſineſs to aſperſe and revile king Edward and his miniſters, and the duke of Somerſet eſpecially, who had ſo deep an hand in the reformation of the church. But a fair and impartial hiſtorian ſhould not have made uſe of thoſe ſcandalous memoirs; or, if he did, ſhould have named his author, and let the matter reſt upon the credit of his voucher. It is certain Sanders was the firſt broacher of this fable, he relates it thus: "There aroſe a great conteſt between Catherine Parr and the protector's wife, who ſhould have the precedence. And [e] The notion that the common people in England have of ſuch births, is, that children ſo born will be eminent phyſicians. And this is no new opinion, but may be traced as far as Virgil, who ſaith of Lycas, that he was cut out of his mother's womb, and conſecrated to Apollo.

Inde Lychan ferit, exectum matre peremptâ & tibi, Phœbe, ſacrum, Æn. l. X. ver. 315.——Upon which place, Servius obſerves ſuch children were dedicated to Apollo, the god of phyſic, by whoſe help and aſſiſtance they owed their life. But I think it more probable this notion was derived from Æſculapius, who was himſelf thus taken out of his mother's body after her death; as is related by Pindar, who ſaith, that Apollo, having diſcovered the infidelity of his miſtreſs Coronis, and the affairs ſhe had with Iſchys, ſent his ſiſter Diana to put her to death. But ſhe, unwilling that the child ſhould periſh with the mother, came to the flames, which ſeparated of themſelves, and taking the babe out of the parent's body, gave it to old Chiron to bring up, and to inſtruct in the practice of phyſic.——Pindar Pyth. Od. III.

Sanders

the conteſt reſted not in the women, but paſſed to the men; and when the emulation continually encreaſed, the protector's wife would not let her huſband alone, till at laſt it came to paſs, that the protector, who, although he ruled the king, yet was ruled by his wife, muſt cut off his brother, that nothing might be an hindrance to her will." Theſe are the words of Sanders, who produces no authority for what he ſaith. I am apt to believe it is an old ſtory, new vamped up, and that the jeſuit took his hint from the famous diſpute of the two ladies, daughters of Fabius Ambuſtus, in Livy, who, quarrelling about precedency and rank, occaſioned a difference, 1ſt, between their huſbands, then between the patricians and the plebeians, and raiſed ſuch a ſedition in the commonwealth, as wreſted from the nobles a ſhare in the places and employments in the ſtate. But as this is only a conjecture, let the original of the ſtory be what it will, it certainly did not become a good Engliſhman and true proteſtant, as ſir John Hayward was, to rake into the filth, and to glean the ſcandal of ſuch a profligate writer, whom he knew to be made up of falſehood and lies, and a ſworn enemy to Edward and his miniſters, and to the whole body of the reformers. The 2d thing I mentioned, as liable to cenſure and exception in this writer, relates to the death of the admiral, who, he does not ſcruple to ſay, ſuffered for pitiful and frivolous matters. But ſure he muſt never have ſeen the act of parliament by which he was attainted, which plainly contains, not trivial and pitiful matters, but a very heavy charge of treaſon and rebellion. For (as a judicious writer [k] has obſerved) "the admiral was certainly a very ill man, turbulent, and full of ambitious deſigns, from the beginning of this king's reign; and his brother, the duke, obſerving it, did often adviſe him, and earneſtly diſſuade him from his dangerous courſes, uſing all the faireſt means with him, pardoning all that was paſt; and, that he might meet with this brother's high mind, gratifying with poſſeſſions, beſides the high and honourable office of lord high admiral. Yet he was continually practiſing after this; he raiſed ſoldiers, and threatened he would make the blackeſt parliament that ever was in England. He was ſuſpected to have poiſoned his wife, the excellent queen dowager, that, being ſingle, he might make his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth, the king's ſiſter, and one of the heirs to the crown; ſo that in fine, the parliament did judge theſe things to be a traiterous aſpiring to the crown." Mr. Rapin, in this part of his hiſtory (for what reaſons I cannot tell) ſeems to agree with Heyward; at leaſt he endeavours to extenuate the guilt of the lord Sudley, and to lay the whole weight and odium of his death upon the protector. "It is pretty hard, ſaith he, to excuſe the duke of Somerſet for proſecuting his brother, even to death, for crimes committed againſt himſelf only. For it was never proved that lord had formed any evil deſign againſt the king and ſtate, as he himſelf proteſted to the laſt moment of his life. But it is not the firſt time that facts committed againſt prime miniſters have been conſtrued as high treaſon, and conſpiracy againſt the prince." I wonder at this in Rapin, who ſeems herein leſs excuſable than Heyward, ſince he could not but have ſeen Burnet's account of the matter. This prelate clears up this affair, does juſtice to both ſides, and produces thirty-three articles that were brought againſt the admiral, and theſe not conſiſting of trivial and frivolous matters, but of very heavy crimes that were laid to his charge. To three of theſe articles he replied indeed before the council, but, whether out of haughtineſs and pride, or a ſenſe of his guilt, he obſtinately refuſed anſwering to the reſt; and whoever reads this charge brought againſt that lord, will, I believe, agree, that there was ground enough for the parliament to attaint him, and to judge him guilty of treaſonable aſpiring to the regency and crown. As to the proteſtation which Rapin ſaith he made of his innocence to the laſt, his own acts and deeds, and the attainder of the parliament, do plainly prove the contrary. I do not deny but an unſatible thirſt of power in the admiral, and a violent jealouſy of his brother, whom he ſaw as much ſuperior in dignity and command, as he thought himſelf in ſenſe and parts above him, might be the firſt ſparks that kindled this great flame. But as a fire that is not ſtifled betimes will ſoon break out with greater violence, theſe paſſions of jealouſy and ambition did ſo rage in his breaſt, that he was reſolved, coſt what it would, to gratify them; ſo this, from being a perſonal matter, ſoon became an affair of the ſtate, which he was reſolved to overturn, rather than not to compaſs his ends. Matters in ſhort were got to that paſs with him as to wiſh with Dejotarus in Tully, "Perreant amici dummodo inimice intercidant," that his friends might periſh, ſo that his enemies might be deſtroyed with them. He did not care what became of the ſhip, and who were loſt and ſunk in it, provided his brother did but periſh with the reſt. This drove him upon thoſe violent meaſures, and treaſonable practices, as the levying ten thouſand men, and threatening the parliament with a more dreadful blow than it had ever felt before. Now if ſuch dealings and threatenings do not amount to treaſon, and to treaſon of a very heinous kind, I do not know what the law can ever call ſo. Burnet is more fair and candid in his account of this matter; he carefully weighs the merits of the cauſe, does full juſtice to the characters of the two brothers, and agrees upon the whole, that the removal of ſuch a turbulent perſon as the admiral, was the only way to procure the peace and quiet of the ſtate. I ſhall ſet down his own words here, and with them will conclude theſe remarks. "The buſineſs of the duke's brother, though it has a very ill appearance, and is made to look the worſe by the lame account our books give of it, ſeems to have been forced upon him. For the admiral was a man of moſt incurable ambition, and ſo inclined to raiſe diſturbances, that, after ſo many relapſes, and ſuch frequent reconcilements, he ſtill breaking out into new diſorders, it became almoſt neceſſary to put him out of the capacity of doing more miſchief." Burnet's preface to the ſecond part of the Hiſtory of the Reformation.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XVI.

The Reigns of EDWARD VI. and Queen MARY, containing about Twelve Years.

21. EDWARD VI.

[1547] EDWARD VI. only ſon and ſucceſſor to Henry VIII. was nine years and three months old when he aſcended the throne by the death of the king his father. His majority was fixed to the eighteenth year of his age by the late king's will, but he died before he came to it, after a ſhort reign of ſix years and five months. The hiſtory therefore of theſe ſix years, as may be eaſily judged, will not be ſo much the hiſtory of the king himſelf, as of his governors and miniſters. There was reaſon to hope extraordinary things from this young prince, had it pleaſed God to bleſs him with a longer life. He had an excellent memory, a wonderful ſolidity of mind, and withal, he was laborious, ſparing no pains to qualify himſelf for the well-governing of his kingdom. At eight years of age, he wrote Latin letters to his father. French was as familiar to him as Engliſh. He learned alſo Greek, Spaniſh, and Italian. After that, he applied himſelf to the liberal ſciences, wherein he made an aſtoniſhing progreſs [a]. Cardan, who ſaw him in his fifteenth year, ſpeaks of him as of the wonder of the age. The teſtimony of this [Italian] philoſopher was the leſs ſuſpicious, as it was after the young prince's death that he publiſhed his praiſes, and in Italy, where his memory was odious.

As ſoon as Henry VIII. had reſigned his laſt breath, the earl of Hertford, and ſir Anthony Brown, were ſent by the council to give young Edward notice of it, and to bring him to London. He was then with his ſiſter the princeſs Elizabeth at Hertford, from whence the deputies conducted him to Enfield. Here they inform him of the king's death, and pay their reſpects to him as to their ſovereign. After that, they attended him to the Tower of London, where he was received by the council in a body, and proclaimed king the ſame day, the 31ſt of January 1547.

On the morrow, the council met to ſettle the form of government during the king's minority. There was not much to be debated. The parliament had empowered the late king, not only to ſettle the ſucceſſion by his will, but alſo to appoint what form of government he ſhould think moſt proper, till his ſucceſſor was capable of holding the reins himſelf. All therefore that was to be done, was to open his will and obey the contents. There it appeared, that Henry had nominated ſixteen perſons to be his executors, regents of the kingdom, and governors to his ſon. Theſe were:

Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury.
The lord Wrotheſley, lord chancellor.
The lord St. John, maſter of the houſhold.
The lord Ruſſel, lord privy ſeal.
The earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain.
The viſcount Liſle, lord admiral.
Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham.
Sir Anthony Brown, maſter of the horſe.
Sir William Paget, ſecretary of ſtate.
Sir Edward North, chancellor of the court of augmentations.
Sir Edward Montague, lord chief juſtice of the common pleas.
Judge Bromley.
Sir Anthony Denny, and ſir William Herbert, chief gentlemen of the privy chamber.
Sir Edward Wotton, treaſurer of Calais.
Doctor Wotton, dean of Canterbury and York.

As for Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, I have obſerved, in the late reign, that though he was at firſt among the regents, his name was ſtruck out.

The king empowered theſe ſixteen, or the major part of them, to execute his will, and to adminiſter the affairs of the kingdom, as they ſhould judge fit. Upon this general clauſe, which gave the regents an unlimited power, were afterwards built many alterations, which ſeemed contrary to what Henry had ordained. He gave them, however, no power to ſubſtitute others in the room of ſuch as ſhould die; but it rather appeared, his intention was that the vacancies ſhould not be filled up. This conſequence was naturally drawn from his commanding the princeſſes, his daughters, not to marry without the written conſent of thoſe of the executors who ſhould then be alive. It might alſo be inferred from thence, that he intended none of the regents ſhould be deprived of their dignity.

Beſides the ſixteen who were to exerciſe the ſovereign authority during the king's minority, Henry appointed a privy council, who ſhould be aſſiſting to them, namely:

Henry Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel.
William Parr, earl of Eſſex.
Sir William Petre, ſecretary of ſtate.
Sir Richard Rich.
Sir John Baker.
Sir Ralph Sadler.
Sir Thomas Seymour.
Sir Richard Southwell.
Sir Edmund Peckham.
Sir Thomas Cheney, treaſurer of the houſhold.
Sir John Gage, comptroller.
Sir Anthony Wingfield, vice chamberlain.

The late king's will being thus known, the council reſolved to execute it in all its points, and that very day the regents, as well as the counſellors, entered upon their offices. I have already ſaid the hiſtory of this reign relates more to his governors than to Edward himſelf, and therefore it will be neceſſary to give the characters of ſuch of the regents and counſellors as had the greateſt ſhare in the affairs of thoſe days.

The character of Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, is ſufficiently known by what has been ſaid of him in the foregoing reign. I ſhall only add two things: the firſt, that he did not much love to meddle with ſtate affairs, for which he was not very proper, by reaſon of certain maxims of candour and ſincerity, which he followed, and which were very oppoſite to thoſe generally obſerved in the government of ſtates: the ſecond thing concerning Cranmer is, that he was extremely zealous to promote the reformation. Since he was no longer reſtrained by ſuch a maſter as Henry, he was ſo far from concealing his opinions, that he even laboured with all his power to eſtabliſh them by public authority. He was as the firſt mover of whatever was done with regard to the reformation. But his zeal was tempered with a maxim which he believed abſolutely neceſſary, namely, to proceed by degrees, and retrench firſt the groſs abuſes, that the people might be gradually accuſtomed to the changes, before the tenets of greater conſequences were touched. Beſides, that this courſe ſeemed to him the moſt natural, he went upon another reaſon no leſs important, and which it will be proper to explain.

It has been ſeen in the late reign, that Henry VIII. left not his ſubjects free to approve or reject the alterations he had been pleaſed to make in religion. There was an abſolute neceſſity of conforming to them, or of reſolving to part with eſtate, liberty, and life itſelf. Hence the church of England abounded with multitudes, who, outwardly, embracing the eſtabliſhed opinions, were not however, inwardly perſuaded of their truth. This was the caſe of ſeveral biſhops, and many dignified clergymen. But it was the inferior clergy that were chiefly infected with this hypocriſy. Moſt of theſe were no other than monks, for whom the court of augmentations and the poſſeſſors of the abbey-lands had procured benefices, to eaſe themſelves of the burden of maintaining them, to which they were obliged when the monaſteries were ſuppreſſed. Theſe men were ſtill wedded to the errors that were intended to be reformed. Cranmer thought it neceſſary therefore to gain a little time, in order to change the clergy, by filling the vacant livings with perſons well inclined to the reformation. Herein he met with great oppoſition from the zealous, who wiſhed to bring the reformation to perfection at once, without attending to this worldly wiſdom, which they believed little agreeable to the ſpirit of true religion.

The lord chancellor Wriotheſley, was of a quite contrary character to that of Cranmer, and moreover his religious opinions were entirely repugnant to the reformation. He was extremely ambitious, very conceited of his own merit, haughty, imperious, and very angry that his advice was not always followed. This made him extremely troubleſome in the council, where no one could oppoſe his opinion without being liable to be treated with ſharp and offenſive language. But he ſhewed his heat and paſſion chiefly on occaſion of religious matters. Though he had outwardly complied with the late king's innovations, he was however firmly attached to the Romiſh religion. Of this he had given evident proofs in the affair of Ann Aſkew, in his project to ruin the queen, and on many other occaſions. Wherefore ſuch of the regents as deſired to promote the reformation, were to expect from him perpetual oppoſition. Since the duke of Norfolk's impriſonment, the chancellor was conſidered as the head of the Romiſh party. Accordingly, he looked upon the reformers, and Cranmer in particular, as his enemies; as on their part, they could not without extreme grief ſee him in a poſt which enabled him to countermine their deſigns. Happily for them, their party was ſtrongeſt among the regents and in the council.

Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, was of a noble and ancient family, which came from Normandy with William the Conqueror. Henry VIII. having married Jane Seymour after the tragical death of Anne Bullen, ſir Edward Seymour brother to the new queen was preſently after created lord Seymour and viſcount Beauchamp, and then earl of Hereford. From that time he had always an honourable poſt at court, as well during the queen his ſiſter's life as after her death. Henry VIII. always expreſſed a great eſteem for him, and employed him in ſeveral military expeditions, which he diſcharged in ſuch a manner as encreaſed his maſter's regard and affection. He was humble, affable, civil, courteous, and guided in all the tranſactions of his life by the principles of honour, virtue, and religion, which are ſeldom found in the men of the world. In a word, he had many noble qualities, and few faults. Among theſe is reckoned by ſome an immoderate ambition. But very likely, this ambition was rather an effect of his zeal for religion than a natural failing, as will hereafter appear. It is ſaid alſo, he had no very able head, and therefore was deemed more proper to execute than adviſe. In the late reign he adapted himſelf to the king's religion, becauſe it was very dangerous to oppoſe it. He was not the only perſon that took that courſe. To this reproach all the Engliſh are liable, who lived in that reign, excepting ſome few of both parties who ſuffered death for reſiſting the will of that imperious monarch, However, the earl of Hertford was inwardly a proteſtant, and conſequently a great friend of Cranmer. This drew upon him the hatred of the contrary party, and particularly of the chancellor, who had already attempted to deſtroy him. He always ſhewed a very great zeal for the reformation, and to him and Cranmer is properly due the glory of all that was done in favour of religion during the reign of Edward VI. At king Henry's death he was lord chamberlain. He was one of the regents named in that prince's will, and what ſtill increaſed his power, he was uncle to the new king.

John Dudley viſcount Liſle, was ſon of Edmund Dudley, put to death in the beginning of Henry the VIIIth's reign, for having been Henry VIIth's inſtrument in his oppreſſions of the people. Henry VIII. feeling ſome remorſe for Dudley's death, was pleaſed, and perhaps thought himſelf bound, to make his ſon a ſort of reparation by creating him lord Dudley, and afterwards viſcount Liſle. So the father's downfal proved the ſon's riſe. After Henry VIII. had given him a place in his favour, he made a conſiderable figure at court. He was honoured with ſeveral employments, and always behaved to the king's ſatisfaction. He ſignalized himſelf chiefly in the wars by his bravery and conduct. He ſerved twice as lieutenant-general under the earl of Hertford, in Scotland and Picardy, and had the honour of having a great part of the ſucceſs aſcribed to him, though he commanded not in chief. Afterwards, being governor of Boulogne, he repulſed, by a vigorous ſally from the upper town, the French, who were now maſters of the lower. The next year he commanded, as admiral, the fleet deſigned againſt France, and after the French had refuſed to fight, made a deſcent upon the coaſt of France, and carried away a great booty. In a word, he was conſidered as one of the beſt generals then in England. In all probability, had Henry VIII. lived any longer, he would have puſhed his fortune farther, ſince, with the qualifications of a ſoldier, he had alſo thoſe of a good courtier. But on the other hand, for his morals, he had nothing worthy of commendation. He was exceſſively addicted to his pleaſures, and even ran ſometimes into ſhameful debaucheries. Beſides, he was not very ſcrupulous with regard to honour and virtue. As his ambition was boundleſs, he did not ſtick to uſe any means to accompliſh his ends. It may eaſily be judged that a man of this character had not the concerns of religion much at heart. As long as Henry VIII. was alive, he kept within the bounds preſcribed by that prince. Afterwards, in the reign of Edward VI. he openly declared for the reformation, becauſe it was then the only way to pleaſe the king, and advance his fortune. Nevertheleſs, he muſt have ſhewn, when among the Romiſh party, that he was not their enemy, ſince the court of France believed him very far from being a proteſtant. This is at leaſt what Thuanus affirms in his hiſtory. Hence it may be preſumed, he conſidered religion only as a means to raiſe himſelf, and had made it a rule to follow that which was moſt in vogue. Wherefore, how zealous ſoever he appeared for the reformation, he was never looked upon as one of its protectors, becauſe he was thought to act only out of policy. The figure this lord made during the reign of Edward VI. obliged me to dwell the longer upon his character.

Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, was reckoned a perſon of great abilities. He had been employed by Henry VIII. in ſeveral embaſſies, commiſſions, and negotiations, and at length promoted to the ſee of London, and afterwards to that of Durham, the richeſt and moſt conſiderable in the kingdom, by reaſon of the dignity of Palatine annexed to it. As long as Henry VIII. lived, Tunſtal conformed, like the reſt, to the religion of the ſovereign; but it was perceived he was very ſorry to ſee the religion he had profeſſed from his youth change by degrees. He would have gladly conſented to the reforming of ſome of the moſt notorious abuſes, but was of opinion the king went too far. Mean while, for fear of incurring the royal diſpleaſure, he ſubmitted to what was enjoined. He was however conſidered as one of the chief favourers of the old religion, and ſo much the more formidable to the reformers, as he was able and learned. Nevertheleſs Cranmer had a friendſhip for him, on account of his mild and peaceable temper, which afforded hopes of his being reclaimed.

Sir William Paget, ſecretary of ſtate [b], was a very able politician, and, for religion, was of the principles of the reformers. By which means he had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Cranmer and the earl of Hertford.

It will be entirely needleſs to ſpeak of the lord St. John, the lord Ruſſel, or the reſt of the regents, becauſe they were wholly guided by the others. But it will be neceſſary to mention ſome of the members of the privy council, who were to aſſiſt the regents.

The earl of Arundel, a lord of an antient family, was not very well pleaſed to be only among the counſellors, whilſt ſeveral who were his inferiors were inveſted with the dignity of regents. On the other hand, he was not inclined to the reformation. Theſe two reaſons were the cauſe that he willingly entered into all the intrigues, tending to produce any change, either in religion or the government of the ſtate. But he had the misfortune always to labour for others.

[b] In 23 Henry VIII. he was made one of the clerks of the ſignet; and in the 32d, clerk of the council, and of the privy ſeal; and ſoon after, clerk of the parliament for life; and in the 34th of the ſame king, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. Dugdale's Baron, vol. II. p. 392.

Edward VI

William Parr, earl of Eſſex, brother to the queen dowager, was a perſon of ſlender merit; he made however ſome figure in this reign, and was often employed, becauſe he had the addreſs to be attached to the prevailing party.

Sir William Petre, ſecretary of ſtate, was expert in the diſcharge of his office. He was become almoſt neceſſary, and therefore had a great ſhare in the moſt ſecret tranſactions of the court[c].

Sir Richard Rich, a lawyer by profeſſion, was a good courtier, who, by his pliant temper, found means to become lord chancellor[d].

Sir Thomas Seymour, the king's uncle, and younger brother to the earl of Hertford, thought himſelf unhappy in being only a counſellor, whilſt the king had made his brother a regent. He imagined, his being uncle to the king ſhould have procured him more honour. He had a boundleſs ambition, joined to a high conceit of himſelf. Wherefore the rank given him by the late king in his will, not being capable of ſatisfying him, he had a mind to mount higher, which occaſioned his downfal, as will hereafter appear.

The form of the government was no ſooner ſettled according to Henry's laſt will, but a change was propoſed. Some of the regents obſerved, it could not but be very troubleſome for the people, and particularly for foreign miniſters, to be forced to apply to ſixteen perſons, of equal authority, and moved that one ſhould be choſen to be head and preſident, with the title of protector. They added, that by this means affairs would be more ſpeedily diſpatched, and yet nothing changed in the eſtabliſhed form of government, becauſe the perſon to be raiſed to that dignity ſhould do nothing without the conſent of the major part of the reſt.

The lord chancellor Wriotheſley eaſily perceived this motion was made to his prejudice. As by his office he was next to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who did not much follow ſecular affairs, he was in hopes of becoming the head of the regency. But he ſaw plainly, if a protector were elected, the choice would not fall on him, but this dignity would be conferred on the earl of Hertford, the king's uncle, who was not his friend. Wherefore he ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, declaring, the regents had no power to depart from the late king's will, authoriſed by act of parliament. But matters were ſo well laid beforehand, that notwithſtanding his oppoſition, it was reſolved that one ſhould be raiſed over the the reſt, and called, "The protector of the king's realm, and the governor of his perſon." However, it was with the expreſs condition, that he ſhould do nothing without the conſent of the other regents. Then the choice fell, as it was eaſy to foreſee, upon the earl of Hertford, who probably had cauſed this motion to be made by his friends.

Indeed it was very natural to chuſe for protector the king's uncle, and the perſon of the whole kingdom the moſt concerned for his preſervation. However, it was thought by many, the regents had made a falſe ſtep in the beginning of their adminiſtration, for the reaſons alleged by the lord chancellor. It might indeed be ſaid in their excuſe, firſt, that they had given no particular authority to the protector, and conſequently the form of government eſtabliſhed by the late king was not altered. Secondly, that the will empowering the regents, or the major part of them, to adminiſter the young king's affairs as they ſhould judge proper, whatever was reſolved upon by a plurality of voices was deemed agreeable to the late king's will.

Whilſt all things neceſſary for Henry VIIIth's funeral, and the new king's coronation were preparing, the regents were intent upon an affair which concerned them in particular, or at leaſt the principal of them. Henry had reſolved, before he died, to confer new honours on ſeveral of the regents and counſellors. He had even ſettled the revenues or penſions he deſigned to give theſe new lords, to enable them to ſupport their dignities. But, as ſome had refuſed them becauſe they thought theſe penſions too ſmall, the affair had been ſuſpended, both by reaſon of this objection, and of the king's ſickneſs and death. However, he had ordered in his will, that whatever he had promiſed ſhould be made good. This was ſufficient to put the regents upon performing the engagement, eſpecially as the benefit was chiefly to redound to themſelves. But as the late king's intentions and promiſes appeared not in writing, recourſe was to be had to the teſtimony of thoſe to whom he had opened his mind, who depoſed what they had heard from his mouth. Upon their teſtimony therefore, the earl of Hertford was made duke of Somerſet; the earl of Eſſex, marquis of Northampton; viſcount Liſle, earl of Warwick; the lord chancellor Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton; ſir Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley; Rich, Willoughby, and Sheffield[e], had the title of barons, with the names of their families[f].

As Henry VIII. had not left his coffers full, expedients were to be deviſed to find the revenues and penſions aſſigned to the new lords. No better was found than to alienate five or ſix thouſand pounds a year of the chantry-lands. Theſe promotions, with the revenues annexed, were not univerſally approved, becauſe they were all in favour of the regents themſelves or the counſellors. Many thought theſe lords ſhewed too much avidity at the beginning of their regency, and that they ought to have ſtaid till the king was of age. The protector eſpecially was liable to much envy, by procuring for himſelf the two great offices of lord treaſurer and earl marſhal, vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk. The firſt was conferred on him the 10th of February, and the other the 17th of the ſame month[g].

The ſame day his laſt patent was diſpatched, his brother, Thomas Seymour, created baron of Sudley, was made high admiral of England[h]. Thus, about a fortnight after Henry's death, the Seymour family was raiſed to ſuch greatneſs, that it was hardly poſſible to make any addition to it. Happy, had they been contented! But we ſhall ſee hereafter, that, by endeavouring to riſe ſtill higher, the two brothers fell into an abyſs of misfortunes, which might have been avoided by a ſmall ſhare of moderation.

Henry VIIIth's funeral obſequies were performed with great pomp and magnificence at Windſor[i]. He had himſelf ordered his body to be there interred. The day before, his corpſe was brought to Richmond[k], and as the motion cauſed ſome watery matter to run through the coffin, it was reported to be blood, and that a dog licked it up. This was ſaid with deſign to verify the frier's prediction, who told Henry in a ſermon, that the dogs ſhould lick his blood, as they had formerly licked Ahab's. But beſides that, ſeveral affirmed it was not blood which ran from the coffin, the report that a dog licked it up was entirely groundleſs.

The ceremony being over, Edward's coronation was ſolemniſed the 20th of February, with the uſual formalities[l]. The lord Ruſſel acted as high ſteward, by virtue of a patent which empowered him to exerciſe that office for that day

[c] This gentleman was born at Exeter, and was ſon of John Petre, of Torbigan, in Devonſhire. He had his education at Exeter college in Oxford, where he commenced doctor of law. In the year 1534, he was appointed one of the commiſſioners for diſſolving the monaſteries; and in 1544, was made ſecretary of ſtate; and in 1549, treaſurer of the court of firſt fruits for life. [e] Sir William Willoughby was created lord Willoughby of Parham, and ſir Edmund Sheffield lord Sheffield of Butterwike. Hayward, p. 275.

[f] Sir Edward Paget, ſir Anthony Denny, and ſir William Herbert, being required to declare what they knew of the king's mind; Paget, whom he had moſt truſted, declared, That when the evidence appeared againſt the duke of Norfolk and his ſon, the king intended to beſtow their lands among ſome new peers he deſigned to create. Then he ordered him to write in a book ſuch as he thought meeteſt. Which done, the king aſſigned to each ſuch a portion of lands out of the duke of Norfolk's eſtate, as he thought fit. Paget told him it was too little, and being ordered to acquaint thoſe with it who were to be advanced, many thought ſo to, and deſired to remain as they were. The duke of Norfolk hearing of this, and fearing if his lands were thus divided, they would never return to his family, ſent to deſire the king that he would be pleaſed to ſettle all his lands on the prince, for, ſaid he, according to the phraſe of thoſe days, They are good and ſtately geer. Whereupon the king reſolved to reward his ſervants ſome other way, ſo ordered the book to be thus filled up: The earl of Hertford to be earl marſhal and lord treaſurer, and to be duke of Somerſet, Exeter, or Hertford; and his ſon, to be earl of Wiltſhire, with 800l. a year in land, and 300l. a year out of the next biſhop's lands that fell. The earl of Eſſex to be marquis of Eſſex, and ſo on, with yearly revenues to them. And the king having promiſed to give the earl of Hertford ſix of the beſt prebends that ſhould fall in any cathedral, except deanries and treaſurerſhips; at his deſire the king agreed that a deanry and a treaſurerſhip ſhould be inſtead of two of the ſix prebendaries. All this Denny and Herbert confirmed, for they then waited in his chamber; and when Paget went out, the king made Denny read over the book, and Herbert obſerving the ſecretary had remembered all but himſelf, the king bid Denny to write 400l. a year for him. Burnet, tom. II. p. 6. 7.

[g] On the 6th of February the lord protector knighted the king, being authoriſed thereto by letters patents. So it ſeems, that as the laws of chivalry required that the king ſhould receive knigthood from the hand of ſome other knight, ſo it was judged too great a preſumption for his own ſubjects to give it, without a warrant under the great ſeal. only. Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, had acted the day before as high conſtable, by virtue of a like patent, which limited the exerciſe of his office to the 19th of February, the day preceding the coronation, from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſetting. Probably, the office of high conſtable was neceſſary only for certain preparatives, ſince it was to end before the ceremony of the coronation [m].

On the coronation-day a general pardon was granted to all perſons, excepting the duke of Norfolk, cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldeſt ſon of the marquis of Exeter, and three others [n].

I have before obſerved, that the lord chancellor Wriotheſley, the new earl of Southampton, was ambitious, proud, and haughty, very troubleſome in the council, and moreover, a great enemy to the reformation and the reformed. All theſe reaſons made the protector and moſt of the regents wiſh to be rid of him. They were ſo happy, as that he himſelf afforded them a plauſible pretence. Reſolving to apply himſelf chiefly to ſtate affairs, he had on the 18th of February put the great ſeal to a commiſſion, directed to the maſter of the rolls and three maſters of chancery [o], empowering them to execute the lord chancellor's office in the court of chancery, in as ample a manner as if he himſelf were preſent. This being done by his own authority, without any warrant from the lord protector and the other regents, his enemies failed not to improve this occaſion to ruin him. Complaint of what he had done being brought before the council, it was ordered, that the judges ſhould give their opinions in writing. Their anſwer was, That the chancellor being only entruſted with his office, could not commit the exerciſe thereof to others, without the conſent of the king or the regency: that by ſo doing he had by the common law forfeited his place, and was liable to fine and impriſonment, at the king's pleaſure. This anſwer being communicated to him in full council, he fell into a great paſſion with the judges; and even talked very haughtily to the regents, the council, and the protector. He told this laſt in particular, that he held his chancellorſhip by an undoubted authority, ſince he held it of the king himſelf, whereas it was a great queſtion whether he himſelf was lawfully protector. But this haughtineſs, inſtead of compoſing his affair, only ſerved to render it worſe. His ſubmiſſion might have leſſened his puniſhment, but by his paſſion and heat he gave the council occaſion to treat him with the utmoſt ſeverity. He was immediately confined to his houſe, with a command not to ſtir till further orders. Then it was debated what his puniſhment ſhould be. It was not doubted that he might be deprived of the chancellorſhip. But as to the regency, the point was not ſo clear, becauſe it was uncertain whether the late king had placed him among the regents as chancellor, or as a private perſon, like ſeveral others who were in no office. For this reaſon it was not thought proper to turn him out of the regency; but to render it uſeleſs to him, he was left under an arreſt, and the great ſeal taken from him, and given to ſir William Pawlet lord St. John, till another chancellor ſhould be appointed. So the earl of Southampton continued in his confinement till the 29th of June [p], when he was diſcharged of his impriſonment, upon entering into a recognizance of four thouſand pounds, to pay what fine they ſhould impoſe on him.

After the protector was freed from this troubleſome enemy, he thought only of engroſſing the ſole management of affairs, and to be protector indeed, whereas hitherto it was but an empty title without any peculiar authority. To attain his ends, he repreſented to the regents and council, that ſeveral perſons doubted whether they could by their ſole authority name a protector: that the French embaſſador in particular had inſinuated a diſtruſt, that he could not ſafely treat with him, without knowing firſt whether he was duly authoriſed, ſince his title might be conteſted, for want of authority in thoſe who had conferred it. Upon this foundation, he deſired [q] that he might be allowed to prepare letters patents under the great ſeal, eſtabliſhing him protector of the realm, and governor of the king. His requeſt appearing reaſonable, it was granted, and probably he was left to draw the patent, wherein it is very likely he uſed ſome deceit. What gives occaſion for this ſuſpicion is, that the patent aſſigned him prerogatives unthought of by the regents when they made him protector. There was no mention of the condition upon which he had been choſen. On the contrary, the king gave him full authority to do every thing as he in his wiſdom ſhould think for the honour, good and proſperity of his perſon and realms. Moreover, he appointed him a council, giving him power, with ſo many of them as he ſhould think proper, to annul and change what they thought fitting; reſtraining the council to act only by the protector's advice and conſent. It is true, this council conſiſted of the ſame perſons which before compoſed the regency and council, except the earl of Southampton. But whereas fifteen of them were before regents of the kingdom, executors of Henry's will, and governors to the young king, they were now become by this patent only mere counſellors to the protector, each according to the rank his office or birth gave him, without the protector's being obliged to follow their advice.

Very likely, as I ſaid, the protector uſed ſome fraud on this occaſion. And, indeed, it is by no means probable the other regents ſhould ſo lightly conſent to be deprived of all their authority. Nay, we ſhall ſee hereafter an evident proof that they had no ſuch intention. Thoſe hiſtorians who have endeavoured to vindicate all the duke of Somerſet's actions, in order to preſerve to him the character of a true reformer, have very lightly touched upon this point, whereas his enemies have enlarged on it, to ſhew he was poſſeſſed with ambition. However, as the fact is certain, his motive can only be the ſubject of conjecture; ſome aſcribing it to his exceſſive ambition; others believing he aſpired to become maſter of the government, only to promote more effectually the reformation. It is at leaſt extremely probable that Cranmer and ſuch of the regents as favoured the reformation, were convinced the duke's advancement would be very advantageous to religion.

After the patent was drawn, and the great ſeal put to it, the protector had all the power. He governed with an abſolute authority, without being clogged by the advice of the council, ſince he was obliged only to conſult thoſe that were devoted to him. But, on the other hand, this proceeding, with ſome others of the like nature, drew upon him the envy and hatred of many, and particularly of the nobility, who made him at leaſt feel the effects. There was certainly much to be ſaid againſt the patent, which deſtroyed the form of the government eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII. purſuant to an act of parliament which the king himſelf had not power to annul.

The day before, two new treaties were concluded with France. The firſt was a renewing of alliance between Francis I. and Edward VI. without prejudicing the antient alliance between France and Scotland, and the treaties between the emperor and England. The ſecond concerned the articles which had not been explained in the late treaty of peace, namely, the bounds of the territory of Boulogne, and the fortifications the two kings were making near the place. As to the bounds, they were eaſy to be ſettled, becauſe, as England was to keep Boulogne but eight years, it was not very material whether its territory was a little more or leſs extended. As to the fortifications, there was more difficulty. Whilſt the late peace was negotiating, Henry VIII. finding it would be in his power to preſcribe almoſt what terms he pleaſed, ordered the governor of Boulogne to begin fortifying Boulemberg, Blackneſs, and Ambleteuſe. At the ſame time, he gave inſtructions to his plenipotentiaries, to inſert in the treaty, that neither of the two kings ſhould be allowed to make new fortifications in or about Boulogne, but only to finiſh ſuch as were begun. This was done according to his deſire. However, after the treaty, the French had attempted to fortify St. Etienne, Portet, and la Pointe. Whereupon diſputes aroſe between the embaſſadors appointed to ſettle the limits of Boulogne. But as the two courts were equally deſirous to avoid all occaſion of rupture, it was at length agreed that the Engliſh might continue the works begun; that the French ſhould have the ſame liberty with regard to the fortifications of St. Etienne, but ſhould diſcontinue thoſe at Portet and la Pointe. This treaty, and the other which renewed the alliance between the two crowns, were ſigned at London the 11th of March. But Francis died the 31ſt of the ſame month, before he had ratified them, leaving Henry II. for his ſucceſſor.

Upon news of Francis's death, an expreſs was ſent to Nicholas Wotton, embaſſador in France, with a commiſſion to receive the new king's ratifications, and ſee him ſwear to the treaties. But the court of France was entirely changed by Henry II.'s acceſſion to the crown. The cardinal of Lorrain, and his brother, the duke of Guiſe, managed every thing as they pleaſed, and it was not their intereſt the king ſhould preſerve a good underſtanding with England. Beſides that they were ſtrongly addicted to the Romiſh religion and the pope, they were contriving means to hinder England from employing her arms to accompliſh the marriage between Edward and the young queen of Scotland, their niece. They perſuaded, therefore, Henry II. that it was his chief concern to recover Boulogne at any rate, for fear the Engliſh ſhould make uſe of that place to confound his future projects. Henry, liking their policy, refuſed to ratify the treaties, and diſowned the embaſſador ſent by his father to London to conclude them. So, there not only remained an occaſion of quarrel between the two crowns, with reſpect to the limits of the territory of Boulogne and the new fortifications, but alſo in refuſing to confirm the alliance, Henry ſhewed his intention to break the peace.

This was the firſt ill effect of the death of Francis I. and Henry VIII. but it was not the only one. Germany as well as England ſuffered by the loſs of theſe two kings. The proteſtants, who had been ill uſed by the emperor in the laſt campaign, found themſelves wholly deprived of the aſſiſtance they expected from France and England. Henry II.'s miniſters did not think proper he ſhould be engaged in a war with the emperor, in ſupport of the proteſtant religion. But, as policy ſeemed to require that he ſhould oppoſe the emperor's progreſs, they intimated to him the expediency of firſt recovering Boulogne; after which, it would be ſtill time enough to protect Germany, in caſe the emperor grew too powerful there. As for the court of England, there was no likelihood, that, during a minority, they would undertake to ſupport the proteſtants, eſpecially as France refuſed to be concerned with them. Mean while the princes of the league having ſent to Edward for aid, fifty thouſand crowns were privately given them, with great caution, for fear of offending the emperor. It is very true, the protector was inclinable to ſupport them; but it was not yet convenient to do it openly. The reformation was to be put upon a good foot in England, before any thoughts of protecting it in foreign countries.

Henry the VIIIth's death was a ſort of criſis for England with regard to religion. It was obſerved, in the hiſtory of his reign, that he ſteered a middle courſe in that reſpect. He reformed ſome things, but left others untouched. In general, the reformation he had begun, may be ſaid to concern only the articles which were directly or indirectly contrary to his temporal ſovereignty or eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy. He was ſo rigorous, that he would never allow his ſubjects to differ in opinion from him, or at leaſt not to ſhew it openly. So all were under conſtraint, there being ſcarce any one but what believed more or leſs than himſelf. As ſoon as he was dead every one took the liberty to ſpeak his thoughts upon religion, though the laws made in his reign were ſtill in force. But ſome change was expected. If, on one hand, the reformed built their hopes on Cranmer and the earl of Hertford, the contrary party flattered themſelves that chancellor Wriotheſley, Tunſtal, and ſome others, would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to reſtore religion to its antient ſtate, or at leaſt would hinder the reformation from making farther progreſs. The earl of Hertford's promotion to the protectorſhip, and the chancellor's diſgrace, gave the reformed all the advantage, who, ſeeing themſelves ſupported by the protector and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, entertained great hopes that the work of reformation would viſibly advance. This gave them the boldneſs openly to ſhew their ſentiments, and even publicly to preach them[r]. On the other hand, the contrary party, finding the time was not favourable, ſtrove to perſuade, that religion ſhould be left in its preſent ſtate till the king was of age. They ſaid, ſince no alterations could be made but in the king's name, as ſupreme head of the church of England, it was neceſſary at leaſt to ſtay till he was able to judge of them himſelf. But the reformers agreed not to this principle. They maintained, on the contrary, that the royal authority was the ſame, whether the king was a minor or not. They oppoſed their adverſaries maxim the more ſtrenuouſly, as it influenced not only the affairs of religion but the government itſelf.

The party of the reformers was ſo ſtrong, that it was very difficult for their enemies to reſiſt them. The king himſelf was at their head. Though he was yet of an age wherein men hardly begin to make uſe of their reaſon, he had made very great progreſs in the ſtudy of religion, by the care of Dr. Cox, his preceptor, who was in the ſentiments of the reformers. The duke of Somerſet, Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Holgate, archbiſhop of York, Holbech, biſhop of Lincoln, Goodrick, biſhop of Ely, Dr. Ridley, and Latimer who was diſcharged of his impriſonment, were the chief ſupporters of that party. Theſe were properly whom Dr. Burnet calls in his hiſtory, the reformers. In the other party were the princeſs Mary, Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton, Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, Bonner, of London, Gardiner, of Wincheſter, with many other biſhops; and the major part of the inferior clergy, conſiſting, as I have obſerved, of the ſuppreſſed friers, who had been recommended to livings. But it is certain, though this laſt party was as numerous as the other, they were far excelled by the other in learning and capacity: beſides, the government was in the hands of their adverſaries. There was another thing which very much leſſened the power of this party: Moſt of them had made it a rule to oppoſe to their utmoſt the intended alterations, but, when effected, to pay them afterwards an outward compliance. This conduct, though beneficial to particular perſons, was however detrimental to the whole party, as it intimated they only loved their religion when attended with temporal bleſſings. The biſhops, and the reſt of the clergy, were properly the eſtabliſhers of this maxim, out of fear of loſing their benefices.

The preſent juncture being ſo favourable for the reformation, the protector, and ſuch of the council as were of his ſentiments, reſolved to improve it. To that end, they ordered a general viſitation of all the churches; and appointed viſitors, with power to aboliſh certain groſs abuſes introduced into the divine ſervice, and particularly with regard to images[s]. With this viſitation commenced the execution of the deſign already formed, of perfecting the reformation, which was properly but juſt begun in the late reign. As Dr. Burnet, afterwar dsbiſhop of Saliſbury, has given as full an account of theſe matters as can be deſired, in his excellent hiſtory of the reformation in England, it will be needleſs to deſcend to particulars, which will be ſeen with much more ſatisfaction in the work of that illuſtrious author. So, without ſpeaking hereafter of religion, any farther than will be neceſſary for the underſtanding of the hiſtory, I ſhall confine myſelf chiefly to the political affairs of this reign[t]. The firſt that offers in the year 1547 is the war with Scotland.

Henry VIII. had left his affairs with Scotland in ſuch a ſituation, that the agreed marriage between Edward and the young queen of Scotland was to be relinquiſhed, or the treaty executed by force of arms. The party againſt the marriage in Scotland was ſo powerful, that the others durſt hardly diſcover their contrary ſentiments. If the affair had been to be decided by the two kingdoms, in all appearance Scotland would have been forced to ſubmit. But the king of France took care not to abandon the Scots. He was highly concerned to hinder the king of England from becoming maſter of Scotland. Herein his ſentiments agreed with thoſe of the two Lorrain princes, brothers to the queen dowager of Scotland. It was this that moſt troubled the protector; eſpecially as Henry II. had now declared he would aſſiſt the Scots to the utmoſt of his power. Mean while, the projected marriage was ſo advantageous to England, that it well deſerved ſome endeavours to accompliſh it. Beſides, Henry VIII. had ſo expreſly ordered, before he died, that all poſſible means ſhould be uſed to effect it, that the protector thought he could not be excuſed from taking ſome ſteps to ſhew he intended to execute his orders. He reſolved therefore to carry war into Scotland. Indeed it was a very extraordinary way of wooing the young queen for Edward; but in this the protector and the council followed Henry VIIIth's maxim, who always flattered himſelf, that the inconveniencies and dangers of a war would at laſt oblige the Scots to execute the treaty. To that end therefore they reſolved to make war upon Scotland, and not with deſign to conquer the kingdom.

Every thing being prepared, and the protector ready to go and command the army, the French embaſſador deſired him to conſent to a negotiation, to try to conclude a peace before [r] To ſet the reſt of the kingdom an example, evening prayer began to be read in Engliſh in the king's chapel, on Eaſter Monday. Stow, p. 594.

[s] The biſhoprics were divided into ſix precincts or circuits. The 1ſt was London, Weſtminſter, Norwich, and Ely. The 2d, Rocheſter, Canterbury, Chicheſter, and Wincheſter. The 3d, Sarum, Exeter, Bath, Briſtol, and Glocester. The 4th, York, Durham, Carliſle and Cheſter, The 5th, Peterborough, Lincoln, Oxford, Coventry, and Litchfield. And the 6th, Wales, Worceſter, and Hereford. They began their viſitation in Auguſt, about the time that the protector made his expedition into Scotland. Burnet, tom. II. p. 26. 31.

The

hoſtilities were begun. The protector, who was willing to manage France, complied with his requeſt, and the conferences began the 4th of Auguſt. Tunſtal, who was firſt plenipotentiary [u], had orders to ſubmit to any terms, provided the Scotch commiſſioners had power to agree to the marriage, otherwiſe he was to break off the congreſs. This condition rendered the negotiation ineffectual, becauſe the Scots had nothing like it in their inſtructions. So the protector, departing in Auguſt, entered the territories of Scotland the 2d of September, with an army of fifteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe [w], having the earl of Warwick for lieutenant-general. He took ſome caſtles in his march, and particularly the caſtle of Broughty [x], near the Tay's mouth, where he left a garriſon of two hundred men. A few days after, he came within ſight of the Scoth army, thirty thouſand ſtrong [y], with thirty pieces of cannon, who expected him on the field of Pinkey, near Muſſelburgh.

The duke of Somerſet, as I ſaid, had undertaken the war againſt his will, and only to avoid the blame of not endeavouring to procure for his young maſter an advantageous marriage. The ſight of the enemies army, ſuperior to his own, encreaſed not his deſire to decide the affair by way of arms. Wherefore, to avoid ſo dangerous a deciſion, he wrote to the earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, deſiring him to conſider the great quantity of innocent blood which was going to be ſhed. And to ſhew that he was ready himſelf to come to an agreement, he made this offer: that he would retire to England with his army, if the Scots would agree that the young queen ſhould be bred up in Scotland till ſhe came of age, and give ſecurity that ſhe ſhould not till then be contracted to any foreigner. This propoſal might have been accepted without any detriment either to the queen or the kingdom of Scotland. In the firſt place, this condition hindered not the queen from marrying a Scotch lord. Secondly, the worſt that could happen to the Scots, was to be, when their queen was of age, in the ſame ſituation they were in at preſent. Laſtly, the king of England or the queen might die in this interval, and of courſe the death of either ended the quarrel; but the French faction was ſo prevalent in the council of Scotland, that this advantageous offer was proudly rejected. Nay, a rumour was ſpread among the Scotch troops, that the protector of England would not hearken to a peace, unleſs the queen was put into his hands.

The two armies were parted by the river Eſke. The Engliſh were encamped about two miles on the ſouth ſide, and the Scots along the banks, on the north. So if the Scots had been willing to avoid a battle, probably the Engliſh would never have attempted to paſs the river in their ſight. Mean while, the protector having formed the deſign of approaching the Scots, and gaining a riſing ground on the left, which commanded their camp, moved forward with his whole army. But the Scots, having notice of it, immediately paſſed the river, and poſſeſſed themſelves of that poſt. The protector having miſſed his aim, marched to the right, towards the ſea, in order to encamp on a little hill not far from the river. This march made the Scots imagine he was approaching the ſea, to put his ordnance and baggage on board the fleet which was entered the Frith, that he might retreat the more eaſily. The whole Scotch army were ſo poſſeſſed with this notion, that they conſidered the Engliſh as already vanquiſhed by fear. Mean while the protector had poſted himſelf on the hill, and made ſome entrenchments before his camp. This confirmed the Scots in their opinion, that it was only a feint in order to retire in the night. So, reſolving to hinder the Engliſh from executing this imaginary deſign, they advanced in good order to join battle. The moment the protector had received intelligence of their march, he drew up his army, part on the hill and part on the plain, and expected them without ſtirring. He had placed his artillery in an advantageous place that commanded the whole plain, and on the other ſide, his fleet was near enough to fire upon the enemy in flank. Nay, there was a galliot, which being lighter than the reſt of the ſhips, came very near the land and extremely annoyed the Scotch army [z].

It was on the 10th of September that the two armies engaged. I ſhall not relate the particulars of the battle. Beſides, that the hiſtorians agree not in the principal circumſtances, there are but few capable of giving a juſt account of what paſſes on theſe occaſions, and of pointing out the chief cauſes of the gain or loſs of a battle. It belongs only to generals themſelves to be good hiſtorians on ſuch ſubjects. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with reciting the ſucceſs of this action. After a very obſtinate fight, the Scots were routed, leaving fourteen thouſand dead on the place, and fifteen hundred priſoners in the hands of the Engliſh, of whom eight hundred were gentlemen.

This great loſs threw all Scotland into the utmoſt conſternation. The regent and the queen, after garriſoning the caſtle of Edinburgh, retired to Sterling with the remains of their army, abandoning thus the frontiers to the ravages of the Engliſh, A few days after, the protector took Leith; and the Engliſh fleet, commanded by the lord Clinton, burnt ſeveral ſea-port towns in the county of Fife, with all the ſhips in their harbours. Then the Engliſh army marched to Edinburgh, and, entering without oppoſition, plundered the city. Such a terror ſeized all Scotland, that if the protector had improved his ſucceſs, by beſieging the caſtle of Edinburgh, it is hardly to be doubted, he would have forced the regent to relinquiſh the young queen, or ſubdued the kingdom: but affairs which concerned him in particular, made him relinquiſh his enterpriſe, juſt as he was going to reap the fruits of his victory. Whilſt he was employed in Scotland, his brother the admiral caballed againſt him in England, and had now made ſuch progreſs, that the protector was upon the point of being ruined at the very time he was cauſing the king's arms to triumph. The advice he received made him think he could not too ſpeedily return to court, in order to break his brother's meaſures. This was the real motive of his haſty return, which however was coloured with other pretences.

The 18th of September he departed for England, having employed but ſixteen days in his expedition from his entrance into Scotland, and, if we may believe the Engliſh writers, loſt but ſixty-two men in all [a]. In his return, he marched through the counties of March and Tivotdale, and leaving a garriſon in the caſtle of Hume, ordered Roxborough to be repaired, where he left Sir Ralph Palmer governor.

The protector's glorious campaign in Scotland put the nation in mind of ſeveral noble actions performed by him in the late reign. This gained him great applauſe from the people [b]; but withal, the envy of the nobles, who, if ſir John Hayward is to be credited, had no great eſteem for him. This contract between the nobles and people was very prejudicial to him. It induced him to rely too much on the people's favour, and to raiſe himſelf above the reſt of the nobles, both by an external pomp, and by aſſuming the ſole adminiſtration of affairs. As by the king's patent, he was not obliged to follow the advice of the council, he generally conſulted only his creatures, and neglected the reſt as if there, were no ſuch men. This behaviour ſeemed at firſt a little ſtrange in one, who, very far from being naturally proud and haughty, was rather humble, modeſt, and civil. No other reaſon can be given, but his great zeal to promote the reformation. This was doubtleſs what made him think it neceſſary to remove from the adminiſtration thoſe who were not led by the ſame zeal as himſelf, in order to leſſen the oppoſition as much as poſſible. Beſides, he had paſſed the beſt part of his life in the court of Henry VIII. where he had ſeen the authority-royal carried to the greateſt height; and as Henry had ſucceeded by the way of rigour, he deemed it requiſite to follow much the ſame maxims. The reformation was certainly the ſole object the protector had in view, and all his proceeding in the public affairs, both foreign and domeſtic, tended properly to that point.

The commiſſioners appointed to viſit the churches, having [w] According to king Edward's journal, the Engliſh army conſiſted of thirteen thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe (p. 4.) But Hollingſhead gives us the following particulars: The duke of Somerſet was general of the whole army, and captain of the middle ward, which conſiſted of four thouſand foot. The earl of Warwick led the fore ward, containing three thouſand foot. And the rear ward, wherein was the ſame number, was brought up by the lord Dacres. The lord Grey, of Wilton, marſhal of the army, was captain-general of the horſe, in number ſix thouſand. Sir Francis Brian, captain of the light horſe, in number two thouſand. Sir Ralph Vane, lieutenant of all the men at arms, and demi-lances. Sir Thomas Darcy, captain of all the king's penſioners and men at arms. Sir Peter Mewtas, captain of the harque-butters, in number ſix hundred. Sir Peter Gamboa, captain of two hundred harque-butters, on horſeback. John Brenne, captain of the pioneers, in number fourteen hundred, p. 980. In the mean time, the fleet advanced towards Newcaſtle, conſiſting of ſixty-five veſſels, whereof one galley and thirty-four tall ſhips were prepared for fighting; the reſt ſerved for carriage of ammunition and victuals. Of this fleet Sir Edward Clinton was admiral, and ſir William Woodhouſe vice-admiral. Hayward, p. 279.

To

made their report, it was found that all the biſhops had complied with the orders of the council, except Bonner of London, and Gardiner of Wincheſter. Theſe had given an advantage againſt themſelves, not only by direct oppoſition, but by cavils, which plainly ſhewed how averſe they were to all reformation. They inſiſted chiefly upon the forementioned maxim, that it was not lawful to make any alterations in religion during the king's minority. As this principle might have had pernicious conſequences with reſpect to the government, it was made a pretence to ſend them to priſon [c], notwithſtanding their ſeeming, but very equivocal, ſubmiſſion. The truth is, as ſeveral acts in favour of the reformation were intended to be paſſed in the next parliament, which was ſummoned to meet the 4th of November, the reformers were very glad to be freed from the troubleſome oppoſition of theſe two prelates. The princeſs Mary was alſo diſpleaſed with the inſtructions given to the viſitors, and with the deſign of advancing the reformation. She wrote upon this occaſion to the protector, expreſſing her diſlike of all the changes which were making, and of thoſe which were deſigned to be made during the king's minority. The protector ſent her a very ſtrong anſwer, and did not think himſelf obliged to conform to her ſentiments.

Some days before the parliament met, the lord Rich was made chancellor [d]. The 3d of November, the day before the opening of the parliament, the protector, by a patent under the great ſeal, was warranted to ſit in parliament on the right hand of the throne, under the cloth of ſtate, whether the king was preſent or not; and moreover was to have all the honours, privileges, and prerogatives, that any of the uncles of the kings of England, or any protectors, had ever enjoyed, with a Non-obſtante to the ſtatute of precedence. This proceeding was a clear evidence that the duke of Somerſet's intention was not only to be ſuperior to all, but even to deſtroy by degrees the very remembrance of the form of government eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII. Though he had not forgot to cauſe the patent to be approved by the council before it was ſealed, that was not ſufficient to juſtify him entirely. It was well known the king did nothing but by his direction: that the council was at his command, and that it would have been very dangerous for the counſellors, directly to oppoſe a patent which concerned him in particular.

The parliament, being met the 4th of November, paſſed ſeveral material acts, relating ſome to the ſtate, and others to religion. It is very certain, the number of thoſe who deſired a reformation was very great in the kingdom. However it muſt not be imagined that then, any more than at this day, whatever the parliament did was agreeable to the general opinion of the nation. The repreſentatives of the commons was choſen, as they are at preſent, without any inſtructions concerning the points to be debated in parliament, nay, without the people's knowing any thing of them. Thus, the houſe of commons had, as I may ſay, an unlimited power to determine by a majority of votes, with the concurrence of the lords and aſſent of the king, what they deemed proper for the welfare of the kingdom. There was no neceſſity therefore, in order to obtain what the court deſired, of having the univerſal conſent of the people, but only the majority of the voices in both houſes. Hence it is eaſy to conceive, that the court uſed all imaginable means to cauſe ſuch members to be elected as were in their ſentiments. This is now, and ever will be, practiſed, till ſome cure is found for this inconvenience. I call it inconvenience, becauſe it happens ſometimes that the parliament paſſes acts contrary to the general opinion of the nation. Of this, one may be eaſily convinced, by what paſſed in the parliaments held under Edward VI. and queen Mary his ſiſter. In the reign of Edward, popery was entirely rooted out, and under Mary it was wholly replanted. In one or other of theſe reigns, therefore, the parliament muſt have acted contrary to the opinion of the people; ſince it is not poſſible to believe, that a whole nation ſhould have thus changed, in an inſtant, from white to black. I do not pretend, by this remark, to weaken the proceedings of Edward VIth's parliament in favour of the reformation; what I advance is levelled as much againſt that of queen Mary as againſt this. My deſign is only to obſerve, that the determination of a parliament is not always a convincing proof of the approbation of the whole Engliſh nation. The reaſons therefore which may be drawn from the pretended conſent of the nation, repreſented in parliament, either for or againſt the reformation, ſeem to be of very little weight. Each of the two parties will always ſay, and perhaps very juſtly, that the parliament which oppoſed them, was a parliament devoted to the king and the miniſtry.

The preſent parliament was, in all appearance, directed by the duke of Somerſet, ſince it ſo readily favoured all his deſigns. I ſhall content myſelf with relating the ſubſtance of the chief acts paſſed this ſeſſion, without inſiſting much upon them, becauſe Dr. Burnet has ſpoken of them ſo accurately and fully, in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, that it would be needleſs to repeat what he has ſaid.

The firſt ſtatute repealed ſeveral acts paſſed in the late and ſome former reigns: namely,

I. All acts declaring any thing to be treaſon but what was in the ſtatute of 25 Edward III. This ſtatute of king Edward had long ſerved for the ſtandard of treaſon, till during the civil wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, and particularly in the reign of Henry VIII. the liſt of treaſonable offences was very much encreaſed. Therefore the parliament very juſtly reduced theſe offences within their old bounds, that the ſubjects might not be liable to ſo many rigours.

II. This ſtatute alſo repealed all acts, declaring that to be felony which was not ſo before the rupture with the pope [e]. And,

III. The act which made the king's proclamations of equal authority with acts of parliament. If this ſtatute had continued, parliaments would have become uſeleſs.

IV. Two acts concerning the Lollards [f].

Laſtly, By the ſame ſtatute, the law of the ſix articles was alſo repealed.

By another article of the ſame ſtatute, the king's eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy was again confirmed, with ſeveral penalties upon thoſe who ſhould call it in queſtion. It was likewiſe declared high treaſon in any of the heirs of the crown, nominated in Henry VIIIth's will, and in their abettors, to endeavour to break the ſucceſſion of the crown ſettled by that prince.

It was alſo enacted, That all ſhould enjoy the benefit of the clergy [g], and the privilege of ſanctuary, as before Henry VIIIth's reign; excepting only ſuch as were guilty of murder, poiſoning, burglary, robbing on the highway, ſtealing of cattle, and ſtealing out of churches and chapels.

An act, paſſed in Henry VIIIth's time, empowering his ſucceſſor to annul laws made during his minority till his four and twentieth year, was likewiſe explained; and it was declared, that this act ſhould only take place for the future, and not for the paſt [h].

With regard to religion, ſeveral acts were made, which cauſed very great alterations. Firſt, private maſſes were aboliſhed, and the cup was given to the people in the communion [i].

Another act gave the king power to nominate to the vacant ſees by his letters patents, and ſo aboliſhed the way of chuſing biſhops by conge d'elire [k], which was only a mockery, ſince theſe pretended elections were all made by the direction of the court.

The juriſdiction of the eccleſiaſtical courts was alſo very [g] Benefit of the clergy was an antient liberty of the church, confirmed by divers parliaments. When a prieſt, or one within orders, was arraigned of felony before a ſecular judge, he might pray his clergy, that is, to be delivered to his ordinary, to purge himſelf of the offence objected. But the antient courſe of the law in this point of clergy is much altered; for clerks be no more delivered to their ordinaries to be purged, but now every man, though not within orders, is put to read at the bar, being found guilty, and convicted of ſuch felony as this benefit is granted for, and ſo burnt in the hand, and ſet free for the firſt time, if the ordinary's deputy, ſtanding by, do ſay, Legit ut Clericus.

[h] This law was thus altered. The king, after the 24th year of his age, might, by his letters patents, void any act of parliament for the future, except this preſent act, and all pardons granted by parliament, but could not ſo void it from the beginning, as to annul all things done upon it between the making and annulling it, which were ſtill to be lawful deeds. Burnet, tom. II. p. 41.

[i] And becauſe ſome perſons, on account of the abuſes committed by this ſacrament, took occaſion to deſpiſe and revile it, it was furthermore enjoined by this act, that whoever were for the future guilty of depraving or deſpiſing of it, ſhould be impriſoned, and make fine and ranſom at the king's pleaſure. This bill was firſt read on Nov. 15, twice on the 17th, and again on the 24th, when it was delivered to the lord chancellor. The diſſentient from it were the biſhops of London, Norwich, Hereford, Worceſter, and Chicheſter. Journals Parl.

[k] But the fees uſually paid on the collation to a biſhopric, were retained by an article of this act. They amount to 3311. as the reader may ſee in Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. tom. II. p. 236.

Whereas

much abridged, by taking from them the cognizance of matrimonial and teſtamentary cauſes, which were removed to the civil courts [l].

Then the parliament paſſed a very remarkable act againſt vagabonds. It was enacted, That if any perſon ſhould any where loiter without work, or without offering himſelf to work three days together, he ſhould be adjudged to be a ſlave for two years, to him that ſhould preſent him to two juſtices of peace, and be marked with the letter V imprinted with a hot iron on his breaſt. The law was thought very ſevere in a country like England, where ſlavery ſeems inconſiſtent with the privileges of the people. But herein the court, by whom the parliament was governed, had an eye only to the monks, who being gone from their monaſteries, little inured to labour, could not think of working for their livelihood. Theſe men ſpent their time in going from houſe to houſe, to cabal againſt the government, and inſpire the people with the ſpirit of rebellion. So the court, judging it to be an effect of their idleneſs, and that if they betook themſelves to ſome employment, they would at length loſe this habit, reſolved to make them work, how unwilling ſoever they might be. Mean while, as the law was general, it occaſioned great murmurs among the people. Wherefore it was never rigorouſly executed, and even repealed by another parliament.

Laſtly, the parliament gave the king all the lands deſigned for the maintenance of chantries, chapels, and colleges, which were not poſſeſſed by Henry VIII. and all revenues given for obits, anniverſaries, lights in the churches, together with all guild lands [m] which any fraternity enjoyed on the ſame account. This act did not paſs without great difficulty. Cranmer himſelf oppoſed it to the utmoſt of his power [n]; not from a deſire to keep theſe endowments for the uſes intended by the donors, but becauſe he hoped to meet with ſome favourable opportunity to convert them to other uſes beneficial to religion; whereas being once in the king's hands, the church was deprived of them for ever. But all oppoſition was in vain. The nobles gaped, as I may ſay, after the church-lands, which they obtained of the court upon very eaſy terms. Beſides, the executors of the late king's will, wanted theſe lands to pay his debts and legacies. It it true, there was a clauſe in the act, importing, that theſe lands ſhould be converted to the maintenance of grammar-ſchools and preachers; but it was never put in practice [o].

The parliament ended with a general pardon; in which were excepted the priſoners in the Tower, and thoſe who had abſented themſelves out of the kingdom. As Gardiner was not in the Tower, he enjoyed the benefit of the pardon.

I juſt mentioned the reaſon which obliged the protector to quit Scotland and return to court, with a precipitation very detrimental to the king's affairs. But it is neceſſary now to ſpeak a little more largely of it, before I conclude the year 1547, becauſe it was during this ſeſſion of the parliament that the affair broke out.

Among all the enviers of the protector, there was not one more paſſionate againſt him than his brother, admiral Thomas Seymour. He was a hot, proud, and haughty man. It is true, he was reckoned to have more ſenſe than his brother, and to be more capable of managing great affairs. But this opinion might proceed from the party he had made among the nobility, who loved not the protector. However, the admiral could not bear the difference the king had put between him and the duke of Somerſet, though they were both uncles to the young king. He thought himſelf, by his birth and natural endowments, as worthy as his brother of having a ſhare in the adminiſtration of the government. Preſently after Henry's death, he gave proof of his ambition in making his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth: but, finding he was not like to ſucceed, he turned to Catherine Parr, queen dowager, and ſo won her heart, that he privately married her, without communicating it to the duke, his brother, who was now inveſted with the protectorſhip. This marriage was ſo quickly after Henry's death, that if the queen had bred ſo ſoon as ſhe might have done, there would have been room to queſtion whether the child was the king's or the admiral's. Having kept his marriage private for ſome time, he found means, unknown to the protector, to procure a letter from the king, recommending him to the queen for a huſband. Whereupon he declared his marriage, without uſing any ceremony with his brother. And here began their quarrel. But the protector, who was a man of great moderation, prevented their quarrel from breaking out, though he was ſtill extremely diſpleaſed with his brother. The admiral's envy was greatly encreaſed by the duke his brother's promotion, who, from a nominal, was become a real protector. This envy, added to his natural diſpoſition, carried him at length to form the project of ſupplanting him, by inſinuating himſelf into the king's favour, and making a party among the nobility. There is no doubt the protector's ſecret enemies cheriſhed the admiral's ambition by the praiſes they gave him, confirming him in his ill opinion of the duke his brother. He began his cabals about Eaſter, with gaining the king's ſervants to his intereſt, that they might continue their young maſter in a good opinion of him. By their means he ſo ordered it, that the king frequently came to his houſe to ſee his mother-in-law. Here it was that he diligently made his court, and even furniſhed him with money for his privy purſe, and for ſmall preſents to his domeſtics [p]. This pleaſed the young king, who found himſelf freed from the trouble of aſking his governor for money, and of being accountable to him for what he did with it. All this could not be done without the protector's knowledge. He taxed his brother with it, who denied all, but in ſo haughty a manner, that it was eaſy for the protector to perceive he had not much regard for him. He was unwilling, however, to come to an open quarrel, hoping in time to reclaim him.

The protector was no ſooner in Scotland, but the admiral renewed his cabals with leſs reſerve than before. He diſtributed money to ſeveral perſons, and never ceaſed making his court to the king. Nay, he obtained, unknown to his brother, a new and more ample patent for the office of lord admiral, with an addition of two hundred marks to the ſalary. Sir William Paget, who was devoted to the protector, and perhaps had orders to watch the admiral, ſeeing how he encreaſed in favour with the king, thought himſelf obliged to talk with him about it. But the admiral's anſwer not ſatisfying him, he ſent the protector notice of it, and upon this intelligence it was that he ended his campaign in Scotland ſo abruptly, to return to court, and break his brother's meaſures.

The protector's arrival was not capable of interrupting the admiral's projects. He rather haſtened the execution the more, not to give his brother time to prevent him. He had

[o] This is a miſtake. There were ſchools founded by king Edward, at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, Spilleſby and Louth in Lincolnſhire, Chelmsford in Eſſex, Sedburgh in Yorkſhire, Shrewſbury, Eaſt-Redford in Nottinghamſhire, Birmingham in Warwickſhire, Morpeth in Northumberland: as alſo at Macclesfield, Nun-Eaton, Sturbridge in Worceſterſhire, Bath, Bedford, Guildford, Grantham, Thorne, Giggleſwick, St. Albans, Tunbridge, Southampton, Stratford-upon-Avon, &c. which were moſtly endowed out of the chantry-lands. gained ſome of the privy counſellors, ſeveral lords of diſtinction, and many members of parliament. In fine, he perſuaded the king that the two offices of protector and governor of his perſon, gave the duke of Somerſet too much authority, and that it was proper to part them, and confer the ſecond on him, in order to balance the protector's power. The young king was much better pleaſed to have for governor an uncle, who had all the condeſcenſion poſſible for him, than one who was not ſo complaiſant, and kept him more in awe. So, his age not allowing him to make other reflections, he wrote with his own hand a meſſage to the houſe of commons, deſiring them to make the admiral the governor of his perſon. The admiral was to carry the meſſage himſelf; but his contrivance was diſcovered before he could execute his deſign. The council, hearing of it, ſent ſome lords to reaſon the caſe with him, and prevail with him to proceed no farther. But the lords did not bring back the ſatisfaction that was expected. On the contrary, inſtead of regarding their remonſtrances, he anſwered with threats [q]. Whereupon he was ſent for next day by order from the council, but refuſed to come. At laſt, he was threatened to be turned out of all his offices, ſent to the Tower, and proſecuted upon the act of parliament, which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the government. This menace frightened him. He plainly ſaw, though he had the king on his ſide, the young prince, who was but juſt entered into his eleventh year, would not have reſolution enough to ſupport him, contrary to the advice of the protector and council. Nay, it was hinted to him, there was no likelihood the parliament would hearken to a meſſage from a minor king, but would doubtleſs ſuppoſe him to have been ſurpriſed. He choſe therefore to ſubmit himſelf to the protector and council, and to be reconciled to his brother, who deſired only to reclaim him by fair means. However, this reconciliation was not perfect. Quickly after, he ſhewed he had not relinquiſhed, but only put off his deſign, till a more convenient ſeaſon. And, indeed, he never ceaſed endeavouring, both by himſelf and by thoſe whom he had gained, to infuſe into the king a diſlike of the protector and his other miniſters. This made the protector ſet ſpies about him, to be informed of his proceedings, conſidering him as a very dangerous enemy.

This year the face of affairs in Germany was entirely changed. The emperor defeated and took priſoner John Frederic, elector of Saxony [r], and declared his couſin Maurice elector, who at the ſame time took poſſeſſion of the electoral dominions. After this diſaſter, the landgrave of Heſſe, finding himſelf unable to maintain the war, made the beſt terms he could with the emperor, and came to him upon the faith of a ſafe conduct, which expreſly ran, that he ſhould not be liable to any impriſonment. But, by a groſs fraud, inſtead of the German word Emig, which ſignifies any, the word Ewig, which ſignifies perpetual, was inſerted. By this baſe artifice he was detained a priſoner, to be releaſed at the emperor's pleaſure.

The impriſonment of the two heads rendered the proteſtant party very weak, and the emperor's triumphant. The archbiſhop of Cologn, who had embraced the proteſtant religion, was forced to renounce his dignities of archbiſhop and elector of the empire. After that, the emperor made ſundry alterations, tending to deſtroy the reformation; or rather, under that pretence, to render himſelf abſolute in Germany. For this cauſe, the pope himſelf grew jealous of him. As after his victory, his embaſſadors were imperious at Trent, the pope ordered the council to be removed to Bologna, under the feigned pretence of the plague's being at Trent.

Hitherto Germany had ſerved for ſanctuary to many proteſtants, perſecuted in other countries. But, ſince the emperor's victory, they were no longer ſafe there. For which reaſon many came into England, where they ſaw the reformation to be in a proſperous way. Among theſe, were Peter Martyr [s], Bucer, Ochinus, Fagius; to whom Edward gave penſions and benefices, as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts.

Though Henry II. had refuſed to ratify the two treaties concluded at London in March, the Engliſh, however, as I obſerved, continued the fortifications of Bullenberg, purſuant to an article of the treaty of peace. But, after ſeveral complaints from France, Henry ſent ſo rough a meſſage by his embaſſador, that the protector, rather than hazard a quarrel with France, ordered the works to be diſcontinued before the fort was finiſhed.

[1548] In the beginning of the year 1548, the council made ſeveral alterations with reſpect to religion. By an order [t], the carrying of candles on Candlemas-day, of aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, of palm on Palm-Sunday, with the rites uſed on Good-Friday and Eaſter-day, were forbidden [u]. Moreover, it was left to the people's choice to go to confeſſion or to neglect that practice, hitherto deemed an indiſpenſible duty. Some days after, it was ordered that all images in general ſhould be removed from the churches [w]. As England was then divided in two parties, ſome approved, and others cenſured theſe changes. But the council, in ſpite of all oppoſition, cauſed their orders to be confirmed by the king's proclamation, in virtue of his ſupremacy. Only Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, openly oppoſed theſe changes, upon the maxim that no alteration in religion could be lawfully made till the king was of age. He was not the only perſon that tried to inſtil this notion into the people. All thoſe of his party endeavoured the ſame thing, but had not the courage to do it publicly. Whereupon he was commanded to appear before the council; and, as he offered to ſubmit to whatever ſhould be preſcribed him, he was ordered [x] to preach at St. Paul's upon certain points; whereof one of the chief was, that the king's authority was the ſame during his minority as when of age. He preached; but ſo little to the council's ſatisfaction, that it was reſolved to ſend him to the Tower. This ſeverity produced a great effect, in that all the friends of the Romiſh church reſolved to conform at leaſt outwardly to what ſhould be enjoined by public authority, when they ſaw one of their chief ſupporters was not ſpared.

Mean while the war with Scotland gave the protector great uneaſineſs. He clearly ſaw it was ridiculous to think of accompliſhing the king's marriage with the queen of Scotland, by the way of arms, in ſpite of the queen-dowager, the regent, and the council. Moreover, he knew France was preparing to ſend them a powerful aid; and therefore he perceived it would be very difficult to ſucceed in this undertaking: beſides, that the war would very likely occaſion a rupture with France. In ſhort, nothing was more repugnant than a war to his deſign of compleating the reformation. He would have been glad the regent of Scotland had accepted a ten years truce, which he offered him. But the Scots would not hearken to it, becauſe France had promiſed them a powerful aid. The protector therefore was forced to reſolve, even againſt his will, to continue the war. But, as he would not command the army himſelf, he gave the conduct thereof to Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, whom he appointed his lieutenant. On this occaſion, he plainly ſhewed he meant to ſtretch the prerogatives of the protectorſhip as far as poſſible, ſince he would have the earl take his commiſſion of him. However, as the patent, obtained the 12th of March the laſt year, did not ſo clearly give him the power of nominating his lieutenants, he ordered another to be prepared, wherein his prerogatives were more fully explained and enlarged. In this, the king ſaid, that having, by his letters patents of the 12th of March, appointed his uncle the duke of Somerſet, protector of the kingdom and governor of his perſon, his intention was, that the clauſes therein contained ſhould be underſtood in the ampleſt ſenſe, and the moſt favourable to the duke: that however, as the generality of the terms might occaſion ſome doubts, he declared that he conſtituted him his lieutenant general and captain general throughout his whole dominions, with power to order his ſubjects to take up arms whenever he ſhould think proper, and to appoint lieutenants to command in his place both by ſea and land. It cannot be denied all this was very contrary to the eſtabliſhment of the late king, and conſequently to the act of parliament by which it was previouſly authoriſed. All the favours granted by the king to any but the protector, could be juſtified by the advice of the protector and council: but thoſe done to the protector himſelf, muſt have been aſcribed wholly to the perſuaſions of the perſon who received them. Nay, in extraordinary favours, this rendered in ſome meaſure the king's patents ridiculous, who was made to ſay, he granted them to the protector, by the advice of the protector himſelf.

Mean time, in the beginning of the ſpring, whilſt the court of England was conſidering whether the war with Scotland ſhould be continued, the regent of that kingdom had opened the campaign with the ſiege of Broughty caſtle [y], which employed him three months in vain, though it was but an inconſiderable place. On the other ſide, whilſt he uſed all his forces in the ſiege, the Engliſh took the caſtle of Hadington, and fortified it with all ſpeed. By means of that place, ſituated in one of the moſt fruitful counties of Scotland, they made excurſions to the very gates of Edinburgh, which was but twelve miles from thence. They took Lauder alſo, and made ſome works there.

About the end of May, the Scots received from France an aid [z] of ſix thouſand French and Germans, commanded by Deſſe d'Eſpanvilliers. After theſe troops were a little refreſhed, the regent joined with them eight thouſand Scots, and with theſe forces the two generals beſieged Hadington [a]. During the ſiege it was, that, after ſeveral conferences between the French and the Scots, the reſolution was taken of ſending the young queen of Scotland to France. Many Scots, however, very much diſliked that reſolution. They affirmed, when the queen ſhould be in France, there would be no way to make peace with the Engliſh; whereas, without any prejudice either to the queen or kingdom, the ten years truce offered by the Engliſh might be accepted. This argument was combated by others, who maintained, that the aim of the Engliſh in the war being only to marry the queen to Edward, they would have no farther inducement to continue it, when once that expectation was deſtroyed. Nevertheleſs, it was eaſy to ſee that, by delivering the queen to the French king, they were going to be at the mercy of their ally. But beſides, that the French declared France would not engage to aſſiſt Scotland upon any other terms, the queen mother was extremely deſirous her daughter ſhould be at the court of France, where the princes of Lorrain, her brothers, bore an abſolute ſway. Beſides, all the clergy earneſtly preſſed the ſending of the queen into France, out of fear of her being forced at laſt to be delivered to the Engliſh, and that their religion would be deſtroyed by her marriage with Edward. In ſhort, to win the regent, the king of France promiſed to confer on him the title of duke of Chateleraut, with twelve thouſand livres a year in land. All this produced the reſolution of ſending the queen into France, in the ſame ſhips that had brought the auxiliary troops. But, to avoid meeting the Engliſh fleet, the ſhips ſailed round Scotland by the north [b], and landed the queen in the province of Bretagne. Mean while, admiral Seymour, who commanded the naval forces himſelf, made ſeveral deſcents in Scotland, where he was always repulſed with loſs, and at laſt returned to England without much damaging the Scots.

At length the Engliſh army, ſeventeen thouſand ſtrong [c], entered Scotland, under the command of the earl of Shrewſbury. At his approach, the French and Scots raiſed the ſiege of Hadington, and retired [d]. So, the general eaſily ſupplied the place with proviſions, and then, marching to the enemies, who were intrenched in an advantageous poſt, offered them battle; but, after ſtaying about an hour in their ſight, finding they would not ſtir from their intrenchments, he led back his troops into England. It is hard to gueſs what could be the motive of this abrupt retreat, which gave the Scots an opportunity to make great progreſs during the reſt of the campaign [e]. The Engliſh army was no ſooner retired, but Deſſe attempted to ſurpriſe Hadington. He was now at the gates, and juſt entering the place, when a French deſerter, who had fled thither, fired one of the great cannon, which being diſcharged among the thickeſt of the French troops, ſo diſcouraged them, that they retreated with precipitation. From thence Deſſe went and fortified the village of Leith, now become a very conſiderable town. His deſign was to retake Broughty caſtle; but receiving expreſs orders to make an inroad into England, he advanced as far as Newcaſtle, without meeting any reſiſtance, and returned loaded with ſpoil. It is not known what was become of the Engliſh army, led by the earl of Shrewſbury into Scotland, and conſiſting part of Engliſh and part of Landſquenets. Theſe were German troops who had ſerved the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe, and, having no leader in the empire, had offered themſelves to the protector, who had entertained them in his ſervice. This had raiſed great murmurs againſt him, the Engliſh being impatient of ſeeing in the kingdom foreign troops, who are generally too much devoted to the king. It was eaſy to perceive the protector's aim was to ſtrengthen himſelf perſonally with the aid of theſe foreigners.

Before the end of the year, the queen dowager of Scotland, complaining to the court of France of Deſſe's conduct, who behaved with great haughtineſs, and abuſed the Scots [f], cauſed him to be recalled, and de Thermes was ſent in his room. The new general was accompanied with Montluc, biſhop of Valence, who, being returned from his embaſſy at Conſtantinople, was ſent to be chancellor of Scotland. But the Scots were ſo diſpleaſed to ſee the beſt office in the kingdom in the hands of a foreigner, that the king of France recalled him. They began to repent ſending their queen into France, when they ſaw the French ſhew leſs regard for them.

During the year 1548 the pope and emperor had great quarrels about the tranſlation of the council. The emperor, as I obſerved, uſed the pretence of religion to render himſelf abſolute in the empire. The council, aſſembled at Trent, a city of Germany, as the proteſtants had required, furniſhed him with a colour to compel them to ſubmit to its decrees. He was not ſorry they refuſed to comply with them, but deſired they ſhould have no other reaſons than thoſe which they drew from religion itſelf, becauſe then the pretence of conſtraint remained entire. But, by the tranſlation of the council to Bologna, a city of Italy, and belonging to the pope, this pretence was taken away, becauſe the proteſtants had cauſe to complain that the decrees of the diets were not executed. On the other ſide, the pope, finding the emperor was become almoſt abſolute in the empire, by the ſucceſs of one campaign, grew jealous of his power, fearing it would reach likewiſe over all Italy, and be very detrimental to the holy ſee. For that reaſon, he was very glad to have him always at variance with the proteſtants of Germany, that his affairs there might hinder him from forming new projects. Theſe different intereſts were the cauſe that the emperor and the pope could not agree. The emperor proteſted againſt the tranſlation of the council to Bologna, and the pope rejected the proteſtation.

Soon after, the emperor, intending to ſhew the pope he could proceed without him, ordered articles of agreement to be drawn, which were called the Interim; becauſe the form of religion contained therein was to laſt only till a general council ſhould meet in ſome town of Germany. The framers of theſe articles, by the emperor's order [g], took care to ſet them forth in the ſmootheſt terms poſſible. But, in the main, they contained the doctrines of the Romiſh church, though a little diſguiſed. The only conſiderable ſoftenings were, that marriage ſhould be no bar to prieſt's orders, and the communion given in both kinds to thoſe who deſired it. This work being finiſhed, the emperor ſummoned a diet to Augſburg, where the Interim was propoſed. The elector of Mentz, without any order, did, in all the princes names, give the emperor thanks for it, which he interpreted as the aſſent of the whole diet; and, after that, would not receive the proteſtations of ſeveral towns of the empire, againſt the Interim. The pope himſelf was extremely diſpleaſed with it, becauſe, without conſulting him, the emperor had preſumed to diſpenſe with the marriage of prieſts, and communion in both kinds. This occaſioned many troubles in Germany, and obliged numbers of divines and others, who diſliked the Interim, to abſcond or retire elſewhere, not to be expoſed to the victorious emperor's reſentment, who was bent at any rate to have his Interim univerſally received. At this diet, Maurice, of Saxony, was ſolemnly inveſted with the electorate, of which John Frederic had been deprived.

Whilſt the emperor was labouring to deſtroy the reformation in Germany, it daily made freſh progreſs in England. The parliament, which met the 24th of November [h], was almoſt wholly taken up with matters of religion. By an act, made this ſeſſion, prieſts were allowed to marry. Another, confirmed the new liturgy, about which commiſſioners, appointed for examining and reforming the ſeveral offices, had been employed all the ſummer. This new liturgy retrenched divers abuſes, both in the communion ſervice, and all the other offices, and gave the whole a turn favourable to the reformation. It is the ſame the church of England makes uſe of at this day, excepting a few alterations [i].

The protector and the archbiſhop of Canterbury were the chief ſupports and moſt zealous promoters of the reformation, though always in purſuance of the maxim they had eſtabliſhed, namely, to advance by degrees. Whatever reaſons they had thus to proceed, the zealous of the reformed party were not pleaſed with it, becauſe they were afraid that by ſome ſudden and unexpected revolution, the work would be left unfiniſhed. They knew the protector was hated and envied by many of the nobility, and that all the Romiſh party had a mortal averſion to him. This was ſufficient to create a dread, that his enemies would at length prevail over him; the adminiſtration, he was entruſted with, being of ſuch a nature, that it was almoſt impoſſible not to render himſelf in ſome meaſure obnoxious. They had the more reaſon to be alarmed, when they ſaw him forced to arreſt his own brother, who had now formed a party to ſupplant him.

Though the admiral had already endured a great mortification, he ceaſed not however his practices againſt the protector, in ſpite of the warnings which were given him from time to time that they would in the end prove his ruin. The queen his ſpouſe dying in September the laſt year, 1548 [k], he reſolved to renew his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth; but he did not meet with that encouragement from the princeſs which he expected. After all, though he could have obtained her conſent, that would not have been ſufficient without the approbation of the protector and the council. The late king's will expreſly debarred her from the ſucceſſion, if ſhe married without the conſent of the executors. So the admiral, having no hopes of ſucceeding in this project, turned his thoughts another way to try to gratify his ambition. It is pretended he formed a deſign to carry away the king to his houſe of Holt in Denbighſhire, diſplace the protector, and ſeize the government himſelf; and for that purpoſe had now liſted ten thouſand [l] men in ſeveral places. However this be, it is certain he ſpoke openly againſt the protector, charging him with enſlaving the kingdom by means of the foreign troops in his ſervice. It is alſo ſaid that the protector, being informed of all his proceedings, ſhewed great patience towards him, refuſing to come to extremity, till he ſaw plainly one or other muſt neceſſarily be ruined. But to ſpeak the truth, one cannot rely upon what the hiſtorians ſay of the admiral's private deſigns, or of the protector's forbearance. The reaſon is, as ſome make it their buſineſs to blacken the protector's reputation as much as poſſible, ſo others ſtrive to vindicate all his actions. Thus much is certain, the admiral was not ſatisfied with his condition, but ſought to ſupplant his brother, and put himſelf in his place. But one cannot be ſo poſitive of the means he intended to uſe to execute his deſigns.

At laſt the council, being informed he was contriving ſomething againſt the government, ſigned a warrant to ſend him to the Tower [m]. After that, commiſſioners were appointed [n] to receive the depoſitions of thoſe who appeared as witneſſes againſt him. The commiſſioners reported to the council [o], that the admiral was accuſed of forming, with ſeveral others, a conſpiracy againſt the government [p], and of committing many miſdemeanors in the diſcharge of the admiralty: That he was charged with protecting pirates, who gave him a ſhare of their robberies, and with refuſing juſtice to private perſons, or to princes themſelves, who complained to him of theſe outrages, by which the king was in danger of a war. It is ſaid, before he was brought to his trial, the protector endeavoured more than once to perſuade him to reſign his office, and withdraw from court; but to no purpoſe. So his accuſation was drawn, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, upon which ſome of the council were ordered to go and examine him. But he refuſed to anſwer, demanding an open trial, and his accuſers to be brought face to face. The next day, all the privy-council went in a body to the Tower to examine him; but he ſtill refuſed to anſwer, inſiſting upon his firſt demand, which was not thought proper to be granted. It is ſtrange that, as the particulars of his charge were manifeſtly proved (if any credit is to be given to the council-book) not only by witneſſes, but by letters under his own hand, he ſhould however be denied an open trial, and to be confronted with his accuſers: and yet he was a peer of the realm, lord high admiral of England, and uncle to the king. At laſt, finding he could not obtain this favour, or rather juſtice, he deſired the articles of his accuſation might be left with him, and ſaid he would anſwer to them when he had conſidered them. But even this was denied him. I do not know whether it was lawful then to leave with the party accuſed the articles of his charge, and to allow him time to examine them: But as for the bringing his accuſers face to face, it is evident that could not be refuſed without injuſtice, though this pernicious cuſtom had been introduced in the late reign. Nay, it ſeems, it ought to have been aboliſhed during a minority, or practiſed againſt any other, rather than againſt an uncle to the king.

However, the council having made their report to the king [q], it was debated, whether the admiral's affair ſhould be brought before the parliament by a bill of attainder; to which all the counſellors agreed, the protector himſelf not excepted. Herein their deſign was doubtleſs to take care of the king's reputation, and to caſt the odious part of the proſecution upon the parliament. The king, who believed his

[i] The committee of ſelected biſhops and divines appointed for reforming the offices, and which met at Windſor caſtle for that purpoſe, were, Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury; Robert Holgate, archbiſhop of York; Edmund Bonner, biſhop of London; Cuthbert Tunſtal, of Durham; Nicholas Heath, of Worceſter; William Rugg, of Norwich; Robert Parſew, of St. Aſaph; John Salcot, of Saliſbury; Richard Sampſon, of Coventry and Litchfield; Robert Aldrich, of Carliſle; Paul Buſh, of Briſtol; Robert Farrar, of St. David's; Thomas Goodrick, of Ely; Henry Holbech, of Lincoln; George Day, of Chicheſter; John Skip, of Hereford; Thomas Thirleby, of Weſtminſter; and Nicholas Ridley, of Rocheſter: with Dr. Richard Cox, dean of Chriſt-church; Dr. May, dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Tailor, dean of Lincoln; Dr. Heins, dean of Exeter; Dr. Robertſon, afterwards dean of Durham; and Dr. Redmain, maſter of Trinity college, in Cambridge. The firſt thing they examined was the ſacrament of the euchariſt, than which no part of worſhip was more corrupted. After which they proceeded to the compiling of all the offices, beginning with morning and evening prayer. Theſe were put in the ſame form they are now, only there was no confeſſion nor abſolution: the office beginning with the lord's prayer. In the communion ſervice, the ten commandments were not ſaid as now; but in other things it was very near what it is now. The office of receiving began with a ſhort exhortation, a confeſſion of ſins and abſolution, the very ſame we yet retain. Then thoſe texts of ſcripture were read which we read, followed with the prayer, "We do not preſume, &c." The offertory was to be made of bread and wine, mixt with water. In the conſecratory prayer were theſe words, ſince left out, "With thy Holy Spirit vouchſafe to bleſs and ſanctify theſe thy gifts of bread and wine, that they may be unto us the body and blood of thy moſt dearly beloved ſon, &c. [This communion-ſervice was printed in 1547, before the reſt of the liturgy was drawn up. See Strype, tom. II. p. 85. The curious reader may ſee it, in the form it was publiſhed, (which was on March 8, 1547-8) in Sparrow's Collection of Canons, &c. and in Collier's Eccl. Hiſt. among the records, N. 59.] In baptiſm there was, beſides the forms which we ſtill retain, a croſs at firſt made on the child's forehead and breaſt, with an adjuration of the devil to go out of him, and come at him no more. To all this they prefixed a preface concerning ceremonies, the ſame that is ſtill before the common-prayer book. It is ſaid in the preamble of the act, "That there might be an uniform way of worſhip all over the kingdom, the king, by the advice of the protector and his council, had appointed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, &c. to draw an order of divine worſhip, &c. which they, by the aid of the Holy Ghoſt, had with one uniform agreement concluded on. Wherefore the parliament, having conſidered the book, did enact &c." This act was variouſly cenſured by thoſe who diſliked it. Some thought it too much, that it was ſaid the book was drawn by the aid of the Holy Ghoſt. Others cenſured it, becauſe it was ſaid to be done by uniform agreement, though eight of the biſhops employed in drawing it proteſted againſt it; namely, the biſhops of London, Durham, Carliſle, Worceſter, Norwich, Hereford, Chicheſter, and Weſtminſter; as alſo the earl of Derby, and the lords Daeres and Windſor. uncle guilty, consented also that he should be delivered to the justice of the parliament. Before the two houses proceeded against him, some of their members [r] were ordered to go and take his defence. He gave an answer to the first three articles, and then stopt on a sudden, and would not go any farther. This being reported, the bill of attainder very easily passed the house of lords [s]; but there was much more opposition in the house of commons. They could not forbear exclaiming against attainders in absence, and the irregular manner of judging the accused, without confronting them with the witnesses, or hearing their defence. Perhaps they would have thrown out the bill upon this single consideration, if the king had not sent them a message, that he did not think the admiral's presence necessary, and that it was sufficient they should examine the depositions produced in the house of lords [t]. After the king had thus made known his will, the commons, in a full house of four hundred, passed the bill, not above ten or twelve voting in the negative. Very probably they were convinced of the truth of the depositions; and the point in question, being only an irregularity, which was even become a custom, did not believe it a proper season to put a stop to it. However this be, the royal assent being given to the act, the admiral was beheaded the 20th of March [u].

This tragedy was not acted without giving occasion to severe censures upon the protector's conduct. It was said, if the admiral was guilty, it was only against his brother whom he would have supplanted, and probably it was this same brother who was his adversary, and had brought him to the scaffold. It was added, the council would never have proceeded so rigorously against the admiral, if they had not thought it agreeable to the duke, his brother, or been afraid of displeasing him by a denial. The young king himself, then but twelve years old, would never have been induced to compel, as I may say, the house of commons to overlook the irregularity of the proceedings, if he had not been solicited by the protector to take so unusual a step. It is therefore very difficult to justify the duke of Somerset's prosecuting his own brother to death, for crimes committed against his person only. And, indeed, it was never clearly proved that he had formed any ill design either against the king or the state, as he protested to his last breath. But this is not the only time that plots against the ministers have been reckoned high treason. For my part, I cannot help suspecting that they, who then thought of ruining the protector, feigning to be his friends, moved him with all their power to be revenged on his brother, and were ready to serve as instruments of his vengeance, to render him odious. Some say, the first occasion of the quarrel between the two brothers sprung from the duchess of Somerset's envy at the queen-dowager, wife to the admiral, of whom she pretended to take place as the protector's lady. But it is unlikely she should be so void of sense, or so ignorant of the customs of England, as to dispute the precedence with the queen-dowager [w].

Before the parliament broke up, a subsidy was given the king, to assist him in the conquest of Scotland, which is called in the act a part of his dominions. Then the houses thanked him for the great happiness they enjoyed under him, and for applying all his endeavours to the advancement of the true religion. The clergy also granted him a subsidy [x]; after which the parliament was, on the 14th of March, prorogued to the 4th of November [y].

Presently after, the council appointed commissioners to go and establish the new liturgy in all the churches. It was everywhere received without opposition, except at the princess Mary's, who would never submit to the change. The king and council seemed resolved to compel her. But, upon the emperor's intercession, it was thought advisable, for reasons of state, to promise to leave her undisturbed for some time. He pretended afterwards, that the promise was made without any limitation.

At this time, the council, being informed that several German anabaptists were come into England, and fearing they might spread their errors, commissioned Cranmer and some others to search after and try these people [z]. An unfortunate English woman, Joan Bocher, commonly called Joan of Kent, who had suffered herself to be seduced, shewing an invincible obstinacy, was pronounced a heretic, and as such delivered over to the secular arm, and sentenced to be burnt. But when the king was moved to sign the warrant for her execution, he could not be prevailed with to do it. He thought the sentence was very unjust and cruel. Archbishop Cranmer, who had a great influence over him, was employed to persuade him to sign. At length, the young king, silenced, rather than convinced, by Cranmer's reasons [a], set his hand to the warrant, with tears in his eyes, telling him, if he did wrong, since it was in submission to his authority, he should answered for it to God. Whatever the archbishop's arguments were, it may be affirmed, this was not one of his brightest actions. He would doubtless have done better, not to have concerned himself in such an affair, so little becoming a protestant bishop. Accordingly this proceeding has been often objected to him, and even served for foundation to very disadvantageous reflections upon the reformation and the reformed. Two years after, a Dutchman was also burnt on the same account [b].

Whilst all England seemed to receive with submission whatever came from the court, the leaven of discontent was fermenting in the kingdom, and upon the point of producing great alterations. The chief cause proceeded from the people's not being able to gain their livelihood with the same ease as formerly. This affected all in general, as well of the new as of the old religion. But the priests, the suppressed monks, and they who were still addicted to the Romish religion, took occasion from thence to inflame the discontent universally spread among the common people, in order to incite them to a rebellion. Besides, the duke of Somerset's enemies were not sorry that the people appeared dissatisfied with the government. But before I speak of the insurrections in several parts of the kingdom during the course of this year, it will be necessary to make known the causes.

After the suppression of the abbies, there were great numbers of monks dispersed in the kingdom, who were forced to work for their living, their pensions being either ill-paid, or [t] On the 4th of March, a message was sent from the king, that he thought it was not necessary to send for the admiral; and that the lords should come down and renew before them the evidence they had given in their own house. Which was done. Burnet, tom. II. p. 99.

[x] The clergy granted six shillings in the pound, payable in three years, and the laity twelve-pence. But strangers to pay two shillings; and this to continue for three years. They also gave another aid, namely, of every ewe kept in several pastures, three-pence; of every wether, kept as aforesaid, two-pence; of every sheep kept in the common, three halfpence. They also gave eight-pence in the pound of every woollen cloth made for sale throughout England, for three years. Strype's Mem. tom. II. p. 454.

[y] Besides the two acts made in this parliament, and mentioned above, the following were also then enacted: 1. That malt shall be three weeks in making, except in the months of June, July, and August, when the space of seventeen days is thought sufficient. 2. That tithes shall be paid as they have been within forty years before; and that no one shall carry away his corn, &c. before he hath set out the tithes, or agreed for them, upon pain of forfeiting the treble value of them. 3. That an incumbent, not paying his tenths due to the king, when demanded, shall be deprived of that benefice for which they are due. 4. That butchers, bakers, &c. conspiring and agreeing not to sell meat, bread, &c. but at certain prices; or workmen, refusing to work, except at a certain price or rate, shall, for the first offence, forfeit 10l. for the second, 20l. for the third, 40l. to be paid within six days, or else to suffer imprisonment for twenty days.

[z] Of these anabaptists there were two sorts most remarkable. The gentle or moderate sort, who only thought baptism ought not to be given to infants, but only to grown persons. The other sort were men of fierce and barbarous tempers, who denied almost all the principles of the christian doctrine. They had broke out into a general revolt over Germany, raised the war, called the Rustick war, and, possessing themselves of Munster, made one of their teachers, John of Leyden, their king, under the title of the king of the New Jerusalem. Some of them set up a fantastical, unintelligible, way of talking of religion, which they turned all into allegories: these being joined in the common name of Anabaptists with the other, brought them all under an ill character. Burnet, tom. II. p. 110, &c.

[a] King Edward thought it a piece of cruelty, too like that which the reformers had condemned in papists, to burn any for their consciences. He asked Cranmer, What, my lord, will ye have me send her quick to the devil in her error? So that Cranmer himself confessed, that he had never so much to do in all his life, as to cause the king to sign the warrant, saying, that he would lay all the charge thereof upon Cranmer before God. But to bring him to a compliance, Cranmer argued from the law of Moses, by which blasphemers were to be stoned. He said, he made a difference between errors in other points of divinity, and those directly against the Apostles Creed; that these were impieties, which a prince, as God's deputy, ought to punish. Strong arguments indeed for the monstrous doctrine of persecution! Ibid. Fox, tom. II. p. 2, edit. 1684.

[b] George Van Pare being accused for saying, that "God the father was the only God, and that Christ was not the very God," was burnt in Smithfield. Whereupon the papists very justly said, It was plain the reformers were only against burning when they were in fear of it themselves. This Pare was a man of exemplary piety, and suffered with great composedness of mind. Burnet, tom. II. p. 112. Echard.

not ſufficient for their ſubſiſtance. So, the work being divided among ſo many hands, the profit became leſs than before. Moreover, whilſt the monaſteries ſtood, their lands were let at eaſy rents to farmers, who to cultivate them were obliged to employ a great many people. But after theſe lands were fallen into the hands of the nobility and gentry, the rents were much raiſed; whence the farmers, to make them turn to better account, were forced to employ fewer hands, and leſſen the wages. On the other ſide, the proprietors of the land finding, ſince the laſt peace with France, the woollen trade flouriſhed, took to breeding ſheep, becauſe wool brought them in more money than corn. To that end, they cauſed their grounds to be encloſed. Hence aroſe ſeveral inconveniencies. In the firſt place, the price of corn was increaſed, to the great detriment of the meaner ſort of people. In the next place, the landlords, or their farmers, wanted but very few people to look after their flocks in theſe incloſures. Conſequently great numbers loſt the means of getting their livelihood; and the profit of the lands, which before was ſhared among many, was almoſt wholly engroſſed by the landlords. This occaſioned numberleſs complaints and murmurs among the common people, who ſaw they were like to be reduced to great miſery. Nay, ſeveral little books were publiſhed, ſhewing the miſchiefs of theſe proceedings. But the nobility and gentry ſtill continued the ſame courſe, without regarding the conſequences. The protector openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the poor people; either to mortify the nobles, by whom he was not beloved, or becauſe he foreſaw the miſchiefs which might ariſe from the diſcontent of the commons. In 1548, the inhabitants about Hampton-court complaining to the council concerning a park incloſed there by Henry VIII. the protector gave them content, and the park was entirely laid open. The laſt year, he had appointed commiſſioners to examine whether thoſe who had purchaſed the abbey-lands kept hoſpitality, and performed all the conditions on which theſe lands were ſold to them [c]. But he met with ſo many obſtacles in the execution of this order, that it had no effect. Mean while, the protector encreaſed the hatred of the nobility and gentry, whoſe intereſt it was to continue theſe abuſes. Nay, it happened in the laſt ſeſſion of the parliament, that the lords paſſed an act for giving every one leave to incloſe his grounds if he pleaſed. But the bill was thrown out by the commons; and yet the lords and gentlemen went on incloſing their lands. This bred an univerſal diſcontent among the people, who imagined there was a ſettled deſign to ruin them, and reduce them to ſlavery. Whereupon the common people roſe in Wiltſhire and Somerſetſhire; but ſir William Herbert diſperſed them, and cauſed ſome to be hanged. About the ſame time, there were the like inſurrections in Suſſex, Hampſhire, Kent, Gloceſterſhire, Suffolk, Warwickſhire, Eſſex, Hertfordſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, and Worceſterſhire.

The protector, perceiving the flames were kindling all over the kingdom, ſent to let the people know he was ready to redreſs their grievances, and by that means ſtopt their fury. To perform his promiſe, he brought the affair before the council, hoping ſome expedient would be found to ſatisfy the malcontents. But he met with ſo great oppoſition, that he thought himſelf obliged to take care of it by his ſole authority. So, contrary to the mind of the whole council, he publiſhed a proclamation againſt all new incloſures, and granted a general pardon to the people for what was paſt. He moreover appointed commiſſioners, with an unlimited power to hear and determine cauſes about incloſures, highways, and cottages. Theſe commiſſioners were much complained of by the nobility and gentry, who openly ſaid, it was an invaſion of their property to ſubject them thus to an arbitrary power. Nay, they directly oppoſed the commiſſioners when they offered to execute their commiſſion. For this reaſon, the protector, who every where met with oppoſition, was not able to redreſs this grievance ſo fully as he deſired. So the people, finding the court did not perform what was promiſed, roſe again in ſeveral places, and particularly in Oxfordſhire, Devonſhire, Norfolk, and Yorkſhire. Thoſe in Oxfordſhire were immediately diſperſed by the lord Gray [d].

The inſurrection in Devonſhire was more conſiderable and dangerous. That county abounding with people, who had only complied outwardly with the alterations in religion, the prieſts and monks ran in among them, and fomented the rebellion to the utmoſt of their power. They firſt came together on the 10th of June, and in a ſhort time grew to be ten thouſand ſtrong. The protector neglected this affair at firſt, in expectation that this might be as eaſily diſperſed as were the other inſurrections. At laſt, finding they perſiſted in their rebellion, he ſent the lord Ruſſel with a ſmall force to ſtop their proceedings. That lord, who found himſelf too weak to attack them, kept at ſome diſtance [e], and offered to receive their complaints, and ſend them to the council. But this proceeding, which demonſtrated a fear of them, ſerved only to encourage them the more. At the ſame time they ſet at their head Humphry Arundel, a Corniſh gentleman, who was come to join them. Mean while, to ſhew they had not taken up arms out of wantonneſs, they ſent to the king's general their demands, which plainly ſhewed, religion was the chief motive of their rebellion. They were compriſed in theſe fifteen articles:

I. That all the general councils, and the antient canons of the church, ſhould be obſerved.

II. That the act of the Six Articles ſhould be again in force.

III. That the maſs ſhould be in Latin, and the prieſts alone ſhould receive.

IV. That the ſacrament ſhould be lifted up and worſhipped, and thoſe who refuſed to do it ſhould ſuffer as heretics.

V. That the ſacrament ſhould only be given to the people at Eaſter in one kind.

VI. That baptiſm ſhould be adminiſtered at any hour, and at all times.

VII. That holy bread, holy water, and palms, be again uſed, and images ſet up, with all the other antient ceremonies.

VIII. That the new liturgy ſhould be laid aſide, and the old offices, as well as the proceſſions, reſtored.

IX. That all preachers, before their ſermons, and prieſts, in the maſs, ſhould pray for the ſouls in purgatory.

X. That the people ſhould be forbid to read the bible.

XI. That Dr. Moreman and Mr. Criſpin ſhould be reſtored to their livings.

XII. That cardinal Pole ſhould be reſtored, and made of the king's council.

XIII. That every gentleman might have only one ſervant for every hundred marks of yearly rent belonging to him.

XIV. That the half of the abbey lands ſhould be taken from the poſſeſſors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbies in every county; and all the church-boxes for ſeven years ſhould be given to the ſaid houſes, that devout perſons might live in them, who ſhould pray for the king and the commonwealth.

XV. That, for their particular grievances, they ſhould be redreſſed, as Humphrey Arundel and the mayor of Bodmyn ſhould inform the king and the council.

Theſe extravagant demands were rejected with indignation. However, to ſhew the unreaſonableneſs of them, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ordered to draw an anſwer to each in particular. This he did very ſolidly, not without reproaching them for being miſled by ſome ignorant perſons. Then the rebels, perceiving the court granted not one of their demands, reduced them to eight, which were not more agreeable than the former. Nevertheleſs, to convince the people of the juſtice of this refuſal, the council thought fit to ſend an anſwer to theſe demands in the king's name. But this was not capable of reclaiming the rebels, whoſe obſtinacy grew the more dangerous, as at the ſame time there were the like riſings in Norfolk and Yorkſhire, and as the king of France was entering le Boulonnois with an army. I ſhall ſpeak of the rebels of the other counties, after having finiſhed what concerns thoſe of Devonſhire.

The negotiation breaking off in July, the rebels beſieged Exeter [f], where they met with more reſiſtance than they expected, from a place defended only by the citizens. As they had no artillery, they ſet fire to one of the gates, in order to ſtorm it as ſoon as the violence of the flames was over. But the inhabitants, inſtead of quenching the fire, fed it with much fuel, till they had raiſed a rampart within the gate. The beſiegers, having miſſed their aim, wrought a mine; but the citizens found means to countermine and ſpoil their powder. At length, finding they could do nothing by force, they turned the ſiege into a blockade, in hopes that the want of proviſions would compel the beſieged to ſurrender. But the citizens endured extreme famine for twelve days with invincible reſolution [g].

Mean time, the lord Ruſſel, who had but a ſmall force, being too near the rebels, would have retired at a greater diſtance, for fear of being incloſed. But he found they were poſſeſſed of a bridge behind him [h], over which he was neceſſarily to paſs, in order to be out of danger. As there was no other road, he briſkly attacked the guard, conſiſting of two thouſand men, and, after a ſlight conflict, became maſter of the bridge [i]. This trial convincing him they were not ſo formidable as he imagined, he reſolved to attack them as ſoon as he had received a ſupply, which he expected from Briſtol. Shortly after, the lord Gray joining him with ſome troops, and Spinola with a body of Landſquenets, he marched directly to the rebels [k]. He found a body of them poſted on the ſide of a river, who would have oppoſed his paſſage, but attacking them immediately, ſlew above a thouſand, and then continued his march to Exeter. At his approach, the rebels raiſed the blockade, and divided themſelves into ſmall parties, which were eaſily diſperſed one after another. Arundel, their leader, the mayor of Bodmyn [l], and ſome others, were hanged ſoon after. Thus ended the inſurrection in Devonſhire [m].

The riſing in Norfolk was no leſs dangerous. One Ket, a tanner, headed the rebels, who quickly became twenty thouſand ſtrong. The marquis of Northampton was ſent againſt them with eleven hundred men only [n], too ſmall a number to inſpire them with terror. Wherefore he had orders to keep at ſome diſtance from them, and try only to cut off their proviſions. Ket, marching to Norwich, was advanced as far as Mouſhold-hill, above that city, where he erected a ſort of a tribunal to adminiſter juſtice, as a ſovereign, under an old oak, called from thence the Oak of Reformation. This was becauſe they talked only of reforming the ſtate; religion being neither the cauſe nor pretence of their riſing. Their deſign was to deſtroy the gentry, and put ſome of their own body about the king to direct and govern him.

The marquis of Northampton, neglecting to obſerve the orders given him, marched on to Norwich; and even entered the city. But as the rebels had correſpondence there, he was attacked the next day, and glad to eſcape, leaving a hundred of his men dead on the ſpot [o], with thirty priſoners. This loſs obliged the court to ſend the army deſigned againſt Scotland, under the command of the earl of Warwick. It was compoſed of ſix thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe. With this conſiderable body the earl of Warwick entered Norwich, where he waited for a favourable opportunity to attack the rebels. At laſt, as they had themſelves waſted the country about them, and as the earl never failed to cut off their convoys of proviſions, they were forced to remove. Then it was that the earl of Warwick cloſely followed them; and, without allowing them time to come to themſelves, fell upon them, killed two thouſand, and took many priſoners; among whom was Ket their captain, who atoned for his crime on a gibbet at Norwich [p].

At the ſame time that the malcontents of Norfolk began to riſe, thoſe of Yorkſhire alſo took up arms; but their number never exceeded three thouſand [q]. They committed ſome outrages at firſt, but at length accepted the offer of pardon which was ſent them. Some of the ringleaders, renewing afterwards the ſedition, were taken, and hanged at York.

During theſe commotions, the protector diſcovered by all his proceedings that he did not deſire to come to extremities with the rebels; whether he was perſuaded the people had reaſon to complain, or was willing to gain their favour, ſince he was hated by the nobility. Nay, after all the troubles were over, he moved in the council, that there might be a general pardon proclaimed for reſtoring the peace of the kingdom. But this was ſtrongly oppoſed. Many of the council were for taking this occaſion to curb the inſolence of the people. But the protector being of another mind, gave out, by his ſole authority, a general pardon of all that had been done before the 21ſt of Auguſt, and excepted only a few rebel priſoners. He had power to act in this manner by virtue of his patent; but it inflamed the hatred of the nobles, as well as of a good part of the counſellors, who were vexed to ſee themſelves conſulted only for form-ſake, and that their opinions were of no weight.

Whilſt the court was employed in quelling the inſurrections, other troubles unexpectedly aroſe from another quarter. Henry II. finding it a favourable juncture, entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of an army, though there had been no declaration of war between the two crowns ſince the laſt treaty of peace. Nothing was more expreſs than that treaty, wherein Francis I. and Henry VIII. agreed, that Boulogne ſhould be reſtored to France in eight years, on payment of two millions of crowns of gold to the king of England. But Henry II. was no ſooner on the throne of France, than he formed the deſign of recovering Boulogne before the time appointed, and without paying the ſtipulated ſum. His reaſon was, that Henry VIII. had unjuſtly made war upon Francis I. when Francis was employed againſt the emperor. From thence he inferred, he might himſelf improve a favourable opportunity to repair the loſs ſuſtained by the king his father. It is not neceſſary to examine Henry's grounds, I mean, the pretended injuſtice done to his predeceſſor. It ſuffices to obſerve, that according to this maxim, the moſt ſolemn treaties are to go for nothing. And yet, it is but too much followed, and, as if it was an undeniable truth, it is an inexhauſtible ſource of wars between ſovereigns.

However, Henry ſeeing that the commotions in England preſented him with a fair opportunity to execute his deſigns upon Boulogne, took ſeveral caſtles in the Boulonnois. Then he ordered the fort of Bullenberg to be attacked, where his troops were bravely repulſed. At the ſame time there was a ſea-fight between the French and Engliſh, near Jerſey, each claiming the victory [r], as it often happens in ſuch engagements. At length, Henry beſieged Boulogne in September, and the Engliſh, believing they could not keep Bullenberg, carried away their cannon, and blew up the fortifications. The plague, which ſeized the French army, obliging Henry to depart, he left the management of the ſiege to Gaſper de Coligny, lord of Chatillon, who, after ſome fruitleſs attempts, was forced at laſt to turn it into a blockade.

The war with Scotland was not ſucceſsful to the Engliſh during this campaign. De Thermes, who had ſucceeded Deſſe, took Broughty-caſtle. On the other hand, the protector, finding himſelf obliged to employ the army, deſigned for Scotland, againſt the rebels of Norfolk, and not daring even to ſend that army at a diſtance from the centre of the kingdom, reſolved at length to demoliſh Hadington, which was done the 15th of September.

Mean time the war, begun by the king of France, made the protector extremely uneaſy. He had certain advice that Henry II. was entered into a treaty with the German proteſtants, and had promiſed them a ſtrong aid as ſoon as he had recovered Boulogne. Hence it was eaſy to perceive he would make a powerful effort the next campaign, and, in order to withſtand him, England would be obliged to make a conſiderable armament. But the king's exchequer was very low [s], and there was danger of raiſing new commotions in demanding freſh ſubſidies of the parliament. On the other hand, as the protector was extremely zealous for the reformation, he plainly ſaw nothing could be more advantageous than the union of France with the German proteſtants. But he was ſorry it was to coſt the Engliſh Boulogne. The protector alſo conſidered, if the war with France ſhould laſt any time, there was ſome reaſon to fear the Romiſh party would excite troubles in the kingdom. In that caſe, he foreſaw how difficult it would be to maintain three wars at once[t]. In ſhort, there was another reaſon which concerned him in particular, and made him deſirous of a peace with France, namely, the war might give his enemies too great an advantage, on account of the ill accidents it might produce, whereas a peace enabled him to parry their blows. He was not ignorant there was a ſtrong faction already formed againſt him, as well by reaſon of the envy at his greatneſs, and of his diſobliging the nobility and gentry in the affair of the incloſures, as becauſe of the injury he had done to many of the counſellors, in depriving them of the dignity of regents, and reducing them to the bare ſtate of privy counſellors. Among theſe the chief were, the earl of Southampton, who had reſumed his place in the council, and the earl of Warwick. This laſt was extremely ambitious; he envied the protector, and eſteemed him but little. As, of all the lords who had moſt acceſs to the court, he thought himſelf the only perſon fit to ſucceed him in the adminiſtration of the government; he reckoned, if he could but ruin him, he ſhould infallibly profit by his diſgrace. Upon that account he had formed in the council itſelf a ſtrong party, of which the protector had ſome knowledge, but which he ſaw himſelf unable to ruin at once.

All theſe conſiderations made the protector reſolve to propoſe to the council the reſtitution of Boulogne to France. He ſeconded his motion with all the reaſons he thought moſt plauſible, adding, that by concluding a peace with France, England would at the ſame time be freed from a burthenſome, and withal a fruitleſs war with Scotland, ſince it was not poſſible to obtain the end propoſed in beginning it. The propoſal was received by the council with marks of indignation, and conſidered as a real cowardice. It was too nice an affair for the protector to determine by his own authority. And therefore, though he plainly perceived the faction againſt him would carry it, he was willing his propoſal ſhould be debated in form. The reſult of the debate was, that Boulogne ſhould not be reſtored, but an alliance with the emperor endeavoured for the ſecurity of that place. Paget was appointed for the embaſſy, becauſe, being devoted to the protector, the ill ſucceſs which was expected from this negotiation, was deſigned to be thrown upon him, in order to blacken the protector himſelf.

The duke of Somerſet's enemies, having reſolved to execute the plot contrived againſt him, began with ſpreading reports to deſtroy his reputation. It was ſaid, he was more cruel than a wild beaſt, ſince he ſcrupled not to ſacrifice his own brother to his boundleſs ambition: That he was the cauſe of the inſurrections this ſummer, by countenancing the people, and intimating, he thought them unjuſtly oppreſſed: That afterwards he favoured the malcontents to the utmoſt of his power during their actual rebellion; and when their fury was ſtopt, granted them a general pardon, contrary to the mind of the council: That to maintain himſelf in the poſt he had uſurped, he entertained foreign troops, having extorted the council's conſent: That he was raiſing a much larger and more ſtately palace than the king's, and had pulled down ſeveral churches for the ſake of the materials, and alienated church-lands to bear the expence[u]: That he had the boldneſs to call himſelf "By the grace of God, duke of Somerſet," as if he was a ſovereign prince: That he had kept for himſelf the money raiſed by the ſale of the chantry lands: That he had broke through the eſtabliſhment ſettled by the late king, by ſeizing the regency alone, and excluding the other executors, who had no leſs right than himſelf: That he had ill provided the forts of the Boulonnois, that their loſs might render a peace with France abſolutely neceſſary: That he had demoliſhed Hadington in Scotland for the like reaſon: That he had moſt preſumptuouſly aſſumed the government of the kingdom, and procured the king's letters patents to countenance his ambition: That beſides, he uſed his power tyrannically, rejecting the opinions of the council, and acting in many things by his own authority. In ſhort, Paget being returned from his embaſſy, without ſucceeding in his negotiation, it was rumoured that he had the protector's orders to repreſent the impoſſibility of engaging the emperor in the defence of Boulogne, that it might give a colour to the baſe project of reſtoring that place.

As it was impoſſible all theſe reports ſhould be publiſhed, and the duke not hear of them, and gueſs the authors, the whole month of September was ſpent in diſputes and heats: his enemies only ſeeking an occaſion of quarrel to execute what they had reſolved. Mean while the protector, ſeeing his enemies acting almoſt openly, was afraid they had formed a deſign to carry away the king, and to that end corrupted thoſe about him. For this reaſon, to ſecure himſelf againſt ſuch a deſign, he placed his own ſervants about the king[w], with orders to watch narrowly what paſſed. This proceeding furniſhed his enemies with the pretence they were ſeeking.

On the 6th of October, the lord St. John, preſident of the council; the earls of Southampton, Warwick, and Arundel; ſir Edward North, ſir Richard Southwel, ſir Edmund Peckham, ſir Edward Wooton, and Dr. Wotton, met at Ely Houſe in Holborn[x], and ſat as the king's council. Secretary Petre being ſent to them in the king's name, to aſk the reaſon of their meeting, they forced him to ſtay with them. Being thus met, they conſidered the ſtate of the kingdom, and laid on the protector the blame of all the pretended diſorders, and of the late loſſes in France, taking for granted, they would not have happened had he followed the advice of the council. Then they declared they had that very day intended to confer with him, but hearing he had armed his ſervants, and many others whom he had placed about the king, did not think they ought to expoſe themſelves to his violences. This done, they ſent for the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, with the lieutenant of the Tower, and expreſly forbid them to own the duke of Somerſet for protector. The lieutenant of the Tower[y] promiſed to obey. The mayor and aldermen anſwered more cautiouſly. But in all likelihood moſt of them were now gained, as it plainly appeared two days after.

Upon the firſt news of the counſellors undertaking, the protector removed the king to Windſor, and armed ſuch as he could aſſemble at Windſor or Hampton-court. This furniſhed his enemies with a freſh occaſion to complain, that he had carried the king to a place where there were no proviſions fit for him, ſo they took care to ſend him what he might want from London. The ſame day, being the morrow after their meeting, ſeven counſellors: namely, the lord chancellor Rich, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewſbury, ſir Thomas Cheney, ſir John Gage, ſir Ralph Sadler, and the lord chief juſtice Montague, came and joined with them. Whereupon they wrote to the king a letter full of expreſſions of their duty, complaining of the duke of Somerſet's not hearkening to their counſels, and of his gathering a force about his perſon, to make him believe they had ill deſigns againſt him, though they had nothing in view but his good and welfare. They wrote alſo to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and to Paget, ordering them to ſee that the king's own ſervants ſhould attend on him, and not the duke of Somerſet's.

On the 8th of October they went in a body to Guildhall, where the common-council were aſſembled. They declared they were ſo far from having any ill deſigns againſt the king[z], that their ſole aim was to take him out of the hands of the duke of Somerſet, who conſidered only his own private intereſt. Whereupon the common-council openly declared they were ready to ſupport them to the utmoſt of their power.

The duke no ſooner heard that the city of London, and the lieutenant of the Tower, had forſaken him, but he was entirely diſcouraged. He called together the few counſellors then about the king, and, proteſting he had no deſign againſt any of the counſellors, offered to ſubmit to the judgment of two of thoſe that were preſent, and two of thoſe that were at London. This offer made him loſe five counſellors more, who ſeeing him thus yield, did not think it prudent to expoſe themſelves for the ſake of a man they believed already undone. So, though they approved not the proceedings of thoſe at London, they joined with them however the next day, being the 9th of October. Theſe five were, the lord Ruſſel, the lord Wentworth, ſir Anthony Brown, ſir Anthony Wingfield, and ſir John Baker, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

From that day the duke of Somerſet's affairs daily declined, every one forſaking him when he was ſeen himſelf to deſpair of maintaining his ground. Nay, upon an information to the privy counſellors, his enemies, that he had ſaid, if they intended to put him to death, the king ſhould die firſt; and boaſted it was in his power to carry the king out of the kingdom; they declared him unworthy of the protectorſhip, though they had no proofs of his ſpeaking theſe words. After that, they publiſhed a manifeſto, to inform the public of the reaſons of their conduct. Then they wrote to the king, that his royal father, having appointed them executors of his will, and regents of the kingdom, they had choſen the duke of Somerſet to exerciſe the office of protector, with the expreſs condition, that he ſhould do nothing without their advice; which condition he had not obſerved, but had made himſelf abſolute maſter of the government. Therefore they judged him unworthy of that honour, and praying his majeſty's leave to diſcharge the office committed to them by the late king; and that the forces, gathered about his perſon by the duke of Somerſet, might be diſmiſſed.

Of all the privy counſellors, only the archbiſhop of Canterbury and Paget ſtayed with the king, who, ſeeing the impoſſibility of withſtanding the oppoſite party, adviſed the king and the duke to give the council the ſatisfaction they deſired. The king conſenting to it, the counſellors at London had notice of it by an expreſs. As they had foreſeen the duke would be obliged to ſubmit, they had already ſent deputies[a] to Windſor, with a charge to ſee that the duke of Somerſet ſhould not withdraw, and that ſome of his confidents ſhould be put under an arreſt[b]. On the 12th of October, the counſellors, enemies of the duke, came in a body to the king, who received them graciouſly, and aſſured them, he took all they had done in good part. The next day they proceeded to the examination of the duke's friends, who were ſent to the Tower, except Cecil, who had his liberty. On the 14th, the duke of Somerſet was called before them, and the articles of his accuſation were read to him; the principal whereof were as follow:

I. That he had not obſerved the condition on which he had been made protector.

II. That he had treated with embaſſadors without notifying it to the council, and by his own authority had diſpoſed of governments and biſhoprics.

III. That he had held a court of requeſts in his own houſe[c].

IV. That he had embaſed the coin.

V. That he had iſſued out proclamations in the affair of incloſures, againſt the mind of the whole council.

VI. That he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections, but had even ſupported and encouraged them.

VII. That he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſions and ammunition.

VIII. That he had endeavoured to inſtil into the king an ill opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him they intended to deſtroy him; and had even ordered ſome perſons to put the king continually in mind of it, leſt he ſhould forget it.

IX. That he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclamed traitors.

X. That he had maliciouſly not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him ſo ſuddenly to Windſor, but caſt him into a dangerous diſeaſe.

XI. That he had armed his friends and ſervants, and left the king's ſervants unarmed; and that he intended to fly to Jerſey or Guernſey.

Upon theſe accuſations, to which it was then not a time to anſwer, he was ſent to the Tower; thoſe whom he had taken ſo much pains to humble, being become his proper judges. He could not indeed deny the truth of moſt of the facts laid to his charge. But the queſtion was, whether they were crimes; for he was accuſed neither of fraud, nor rapine, nor extortion; but that was to be decided only by the peers of the realm, or by the parliament. As ſoon as the duke was in the Tower, an order was made that ſix lords ſhould be the governors of the king's perſon, two of whom were in their courſe conſtantly to attend him[d]. Then it was eaſily ſeen that the earl of Warwick had been the chief promoter of the protector's ruin; ſince all the other counſellors ſuffered him, without oppoſition, to take upon him the principal adminiſtration of the government, though without any title which might give him a particular authority.

The enemies of the reformation gloried in the protector's fall. They were perſuaded the earl of Warwick was in his heart more catholic than proteſtant, and his ſtrict union with the earl of Southampton confirmed this belief. Accordingly Bonner and Gardiner, who were then in the Tower, wrote to him a hearty congratulation, upon his having freed the nation from the tyrant; ſo they called the duke of Somerſet. It was even thought for ſome time, that the duke of Norfolk was going to be releaſed. But the earl of Warwick was not yet fully known. That lord, who was wholly ſwayed by ambition, was properly of neither religion. He was far therefore from undertaking to deſtroy the reformation, which had too many friends in the kingdom. On the contrary, knowing how deſirous the young king was to eſtabliſh it, he openly declared in its favour. Thus the adherents of the pope and the old religion had not long reaſon to rejoice at the late revolution at court.

Bonner, biſhop of London, had been deprived and impriſoned ſome time before this turn. He was known to be ſtrongly addicted in his heart to the Romiſh religion, and to pay only an outward compliance to what was eſtabliſhed by public authority, whilſt, by a doubtful behaviour, he plainly ſhewed his diſlike of theſe alterations. They who were then at the helm, reſolved therefore to put him to a trial, which could not fail either to give them an advantage againſt him, or make him forfeit the eſteem and truſt of his party. He was ſummoned before the council, and, after a declaration of the cauſes of complaint againſt him, he was ordered to preach on a Sunday at St. Paul's Croſs, and to prove, in his ſermon, certain points, whereof this was one of the principal: "That the authority of a king was the ſame when he was in minority, as when of full age." He preached on the 1ſt of September, before a numerous audience, and touched upon all the points that were enjoined him, except the laſt. Beſides, he brought in ſome things which gave offence to the court. Whereupon the king appointed judges to examine the matter[e]. Dr. Burnet ſays, he behaved before the judges more like a madman than a biſhop. However, he was deprived[f], and ſent to the Tower. It was doubtleſs with joy that a pretence was found to be rid of ſuch a biſhop, who embarraſſed the reformers.

The earl of Southampton was no leſs deceived in his expectations than the reſt of his party. He imagined that, having been one of the principal inſtruments of the duke of Somerſet's ruin, he ſhould be rewarded for this ſervice with the office of high-treaſurer, or at leaſt reſtored to that of lord chancellor. But he found himſelf much miſtaken. Rich ſtill kept the great ſeal, and the treaſury was given to the lord St. John, who, ſome time after, was alſo created earl of Wiltſhire[g]. It was not the earl of Warwick's intereſt to advance to any high poſt ſo intriguing a perſon as the earl of Southampton, who beſides was looked upon as the head of the party againſt the reformation. He would thereby have loſt the king's favour, whom it was his buſineſs to perſuade, that religion was not concerned at all in what had paſſed with regard to the duke, his uncle. So, without a moment's heſitation, he forſook not only the earl of Southampton, but alſo all the Romiſh party, who had flattered themſelves with ſeeing ſome great change in religion. Southampton was ſo full of indignation to be thus ſlighted, that he could not forbear caballing againſt the earl of Warwick: but, perceiving Warwick was informed of his proceedings, and knowing his revengeful temper, relinquiſhed his projects. Shortly after, he withdrew from court, without taking leave, and lived at one of his manors, where he died with grief and vexation. Some even ſay he poiſoned himſelf [h].

Mean while, the war with France made the council very uneaſy. Henry II. it was plain, was reſolved to beſiege Boulogne, and it was juſtly feared that place was not tenable. Whilſt the duke of Somerſet was alone burthened with that incumbrance, his enemies would have it to be cowardice to reſign Boulogne to avoid a war, wherein they hoped to find an occaſion to ruin him. But when they had the government in their hands, they found difficulties in that affair, which they would not own ſo long as they thought the event would be laid to his charge. They reſolved therefore to ſend a ſecond embaſſy to the emperor [i], to perſuade him to take Boulogne into his protection, imagining Paget had magnified the difficulties. But the embaſſadors found the emperor very cold, and conſtantly alleging his alliance with France. He even told them, that ſo long as religion continued in England in its preſent ſtate, the Engliſh could not expect much aſſiſtance from him. This anſwer determined the council to make peace with France. We ſhall ſee preſently the effects of this reſolution [k].

The parliament met the 4th of November, without the duke of Somerſet's diſgrace occaſioning any change in the affairs of religion. It was ſtill the ſame parliament the duke of Somerſet had called, and the council had ſtill the ſame maxims with reſpect to the reformation, the earl of Warwick's policy not ſuffering him to make any change. The parliament began with a ſevere act againſt unlawful aſſemblies, in order to prevent any more inſurrections. But by another act, the ſtatute againſt vagrants, as too ſevere and contrary to the liberties of the nation, was repealed, and a law made in the late reign revived.

[1550] The 2d of January 1550, a bill of attainder againſt the duke of Somerſet, with a confeſſion ſigned by his own hand, was read in the houſe of lords. But as ſome of the lords ſuſpected the confeſſion to be extorted, four temporal lords and four biſhops were ſent to know the truth from his own mouth [l]. Next day they made their report, that the duke thanked the houſe for their kindneſs, and owned he had freely ſubſcribed the paper, after having confeſſed the contents before the king and council. He proteſted, however, he had no ill intention againſt the king or ſtate. Whereupon, he was fined by act of parliament in two thouſand pounds a year of land, with the forfeiture to the king of all his goods, and the loſs of all his places. Many thought this confeſſion very ſtrange, and much cenſured ſo abject a proceeding: but it was doubtleſs becauſe they wiſhed he had taken another courſe, which would not have failed to prove fatal to him. It is certain, among the articles of his accuſation, there were ſeveral which could be juſtified only by the intention, which would have been little ſerviceable to him in the houſe of peers, moſt of whom were not inclined to favour him. For inſtance, to mention only the chief article, could he deny that, contrary to the condition on which he was made protector, he had degraded as it were the other regents, and reduced them to bare counſellors? It is true, he might have alleged the king's patent: but it was the patent of a minor king, not eleven years old, who looking upon him as his governor, acted only by his advice, as it was ſaid in the very patent which conferred his authority on him. Wherefore the duke could never have cleared himſelf upon this article, nor upon ſeveral others. Conſequently his only remedy was to own himſelf guilty of all, and caſt himſelf upon the king's mercy. Beſides, it concerned him highly to get out of priſon on any terms, ſince it was very dangerous for him to remain any longer in the hands of his enemies. He was very ſucceſsful in this courſe. They who wiſhed his deſtruction, ſeeing the king had been very hardly prevailed with to conſent this trial, thought it was not yet time to puſh their hatred any farther, till they had ruined him in the king's favour. He came therefore out of the Tower the 6th of February, giving bond of 10,000l. for his good behaviour, and ten days after had his pardon. Thus his fall was not ſo great as his enemies expected. He forfeited however much of the eſteem he had acquired among the people, who, not diving into the reaſons of his conduct, could not help thinking him guilty, ſince he had confeſſed all. But the king judged otherwiſe, ſince, on the 6th of April following, he gave him a place again in his council [m].

Mean while the parliament, knowing the friends of the Romiſh church drew from the duke of Somerſet's fall conſequences which might breed ill effects, thought it proper to confound their hopes. To that end an act of parliament was made, confirming the new liturgy, and ordering all miſſals, breviaries, &c. to be delivered to ſuch as ſhould be appointed to receive them, and all the prayers to the ſaints to be daſhed out in all the primers ſet out by the late king. Moreover, thoſe who had any images taken out of churches, were required to burn or deface them before the laſt of June [n]. Then the parliament was prorogued on the 1ſt of February, after granting the king a ſubſidy [o], which was followed by a general pardon, in which the priſoners of the Tower were excepted. It was during this ſeſſion that the eldeſt ſons of peers were firſt permitted to ſit in the houſe of commons [p].

After the late revolution at court, by the duke of Somerſet's diſgrace, the earl of Warwick had not forgot himſelf. On the 28th of October laſt he was made great maſter of the king's houſhold; a new title, introduced by Henry VIII. inſtead of that of ſteward of the houſhold, when he conferred this office on the duke of Suffolk [q]. But it was not ſo much by his poſts that the earl of Warwick was grown powerful and conſiderable, as on account of his directing the council, who acted only by his advice. Some of the counſellors looked upon him as their friend, others as the head of their party, and ſome were afraid of offending him. What he had lately done with regard to the duke of Somerſet, demonſtrated how dangerous it was to have him for an enemy.

Notwithſtanding all his greatneſs, the earl of Warwick was not a little embarraſſed concerning the affair of Boulogne. He had himſelf moſt exclaimed againſt the duke of Somerſet for propoſing to reſign that place, and ridiculed all his reaſons, and yet for theſe ſame reaſons, he reſolved at length to do what he ſo much blamed in another. But not to appear inconſiſtent with himſelf, he choſe to cauſe the reſtitution of Boulogne to be moved and reſolved in council, and to appear himſelf to be no farther concerned, than to comply with the opinion of the majority. It is not very difficult for one that directs an aſſembly, to procure what reſolutions he pleaſes without acting openly. But the difficulty conſiſted in the diſhonour of making the firſt ſtep, and the danger of ſhewing a deſire to conclude a peace with France. The earl of Warwick found an expedient to avoid this inconvenience, by employing one Guidotti, an Italian merchant, who lived at Southampton. This man coming to Paris, on ſome pretence, inſinuated himſelf into the conſtable's family, who was the king's chief favourite. In his converſation with ſome of the conſtable's officers, he ſaid, he verily believed the court of England might be eaſily brought to reſtore Boulogne for a ſum of money. The conſtable, to whom this was told, preſently gueſſed the meaning. He ſpoke himſelf to Guidotti, and charged him to intimate to ſome one of the council of England, that the king of France had rather end the affair of Boulogne by treaty than by arms. Whereupon Guidotti made ſeveral journies to London and Paris. At laſt he ſet the matter in ſo fair a way, that the courts, being equally desirous of ending it, agreed to send plenipotentiaries to some place in Picardy to treat of a peace and the restitution of Boulogne [r].

For

Monsieur de la Rochport, of the house of Montmorency, Gaspar de Coligny, afterwards admiral, and two more, were appointed by France; and the court of England made choice of the lord Russel, Paget, now made a baron [s], secretary Petre, and sir John Mason. Their instructions were a clear evidence that the council would have a peace at any rate. The substance of them was:

I. That as to the place of congress, they were not to appear very difficult; but, if possible, they were to have it at Calais or Boulogne.

II. They might offer the restitution of Boulogne.

III. But then they were to demand that the young queen of Scotland should be sent home, to consummate her marriage with the king of England.

IV. That the fortifications of Blackness and Newhaven should be demolished.

V. That the pension promised by Francis I. to Henry VIII. should be continued, and all arrears paid; but, if they could not obtain the first, they were to be satisfied with the arrears.

VI. That as for Scotland, they should affirm, England could not treat without the emperor's concurrence; but if the emperor would agree to it, the king of England would restore all the places he held in Scotland, except Aymouth and Roxburgh.

VII That if the French spoke any thing of the king's marrying Henry II.'s daughter Elizabeth, they should answer, they had no instructions upon that head, and should insist upon the king's being so young.

The plenipotentiaries meeting near Boulogne [t], those of France said plainly, it was not to be expected that the king, their master, would send back the queen of Scotland, since he designed her for his son the dauphin: that as for the perpetual pension, Francis I. promised it when forced by his affairs, but the king, his son, never intended to be tributary to England: that, however, they were ready to treat about the restitution of Boulogne for a sum of money: that moreover, the king, their master, did not mean the English should keep any one place in Scotland. This was talking imperiously. But Henry II. had discovered the intentions of the council of England, and was resolved to improve the occasion to destroy the grating claim of the kings of England to the crown of France, or at least to the perpetual pension promised by Francis I. in lieu of that claim. Some time after, the English embassadors received fresh instructions, empowering them to conclude a peace upon terms less difficult to be obtained than those first demanded. However, as the court of England would not absolutely desist from the pension, an expedient was found, with which that court was satisfied, namely, all claims of the two kings were to remain as before, except such as would be adjusted by the treaty, which was at length signed the 24th of March, and was in effect as follows:

I. That the city of Boulogne should be restored to France, with all the ordnance and ammunition found there by Henry VIII. when he took the place.

II. That in consideration of Henry's improvements, and charges in transporting provisions and ammunition, the king of France should pay the king of England the sum of four hundred thousand crowns of gold [u], half on the day of restitution, and half before the 15th of August.

It is to be observed upon this article, that the king of France very carefully avoided mentioning either the pension stipulated in the last treaty of peace, or even what was due to the crown of England since the time of Charles VIII. which had been always encreased afterwards by several treaties.

III. That for the security of the payment of the two hundred thousand crowns in August, France should give six hostages, and England the like number [w] for the security of the restitution of Boulogne.

IV. As to Scotland, it was agreed that the king of England should deliver to the queen of Scotland the two forts of Lauder and Dunglass, with all the ordnance, except what was brought thither from Hadington.

V. That if these two forts remained in the king of England's power, he should be obliged to demolish the fortifications of Aymouth and Roxburgh, which should never be rebuilt by England or Scotland; but, if he restored Lauder and Dunglass, he should however be obliged to raze Aymouth and Roxburgh, provided the queen of Scotland demolished also Lauder and Dunglass; and that none of these four places should be ever re-fortified.

VI. That the king of England should make no new war upon Scotland, unless he had fresh cause; that is to say, Edward relinquished his marriage.

VII. That the king of England's demands, claims, and pretensions, as well upon France as Scotland, and all the king of France's and the queen of Scotland's upon England, should remain as before.

Thus all the pains taken by Henry VIII. to secure a pension, or rather a yearly tribute, in lieu of the title he pretended to have to the crown of France, were rendered fruitless by this treaty; which contained, in favour of England, only an indeterminate reservation of the claim which had occasioned the effusion of so much blood since the reign of Edward III. There remains to the kings of England only the empty title of king of France, none of Edward VI.'s successors having ever seriously thought of prosecuting their pretended right.

The treaty being brought to London to be ratified, the earl of Warwick feigned sickness, not to be obliged to sign a peace he had so much exclaimed against. But this was only to impose on the public, since he had signed all the orders and instructions by virtue whereof the embassadors had concluded it.

The restitution of Boulogne opened the eyes of the people, with respect to the conduct of those at the helm. They, who had now delivered up that place for four hundred thousand crowns, in lieu of the two millions Francis had promised to pay, were the same who some months before had reviled the protector for only intending to restore it. The earl of Warwick, who had the chief direction of affairs, and whose interest it was to procure the people's affection, seeing them a little enraged, thought proper to divert them, by giving them some satisfaction in other respects. To that purpose, he called to a strict account those who had managed the king's money, or been guilty of misdemeanors in the exercise of their offices. He had also in this another motive, namely, to pay the king's debts, which were considerable. In this inquisition, his chief friends, who had served him as instruments to ruin the duke of Somerset, were least spared. The earl of Arundel was fined in 12,000l. payable in twelve years. Southwel was put in the Fleet, and the rest made their compositions with the court as well as they could. As there were few but what were guilty of some misdemeanor, this enquiry established the earl of Warwick, every one fearing he would find means to be revenged of those who expressed not great submission [x].

In the course of this year there were some changes in the bishoprics. The see of Westminster, vacant by the resignation of Thirleby, was united to that of London, and given to Ridley, bishop of Rochester [y]. Thirleby had the see of Norwich; Poinet that of Rochester [z]; and, on the 3d of July, John Hooper was made bishop of Gloucester [a].

This year, Polydore Virgil, an Italian, who had been now forty years in England, had leave to go and spend the residue of his days in his own country. The king permitted him

Before we proceed to the next year, it will not be improper to mention what had paſſed in foreign countries.

Paul III. dying the 13th of November 1549, the cardinals who entered the conclave the 29th of the ſame month, agreed in few days to raiſe cardinal Pole to the papal throne, and even came in the night to his chamber to adore him, according to cuſtom. But he deſired them to defer the ceremony till it was day, telling them it ought not to be a work of darkneſs. This ſcruple, unheard-of till then, ſeemed to them ſo extraordinary, that ſome imputed it to ſtupidity. Others were afraid, if Pole was pope, he would reform the court of Rome, and the college of cardinals in particular. However this be, from that moment they thought of electing another pope. After which, being divided into three factions, they could not agree upon the perſon till the February following, when they choſe the cardinal de Monte, who took the name of Julius III. [d].

In Germany, the emperor having opened the diet of the empire about the end of July, would have obliged all the proteſtants to ſubmit to the determinations of the council, now removed back to Trent. Maurice, elector of Saxony, ſtrongly oppoſed it, but with ſo much caution and regard for the emperor, that he did not loſe his favour. On the contrary, the emperor agreed, that the diet ſhould declare him general of the army of the empire, to end the war by the ſiege of Magdeburg, the only proteſtant town which ſtill held out. Maurice had great deſigns, which the emperor knew not, till it was too late to hinder the execution.

Scotland enjoyed a great tranquility after the concluſion of the peace [e]. James Hamilton, earl of Arran in Scotland, and duke of Chateleraut in France, ſtill governed the kingdom as regent. But he was himſelf governed by the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, his natural brother, a man of a very lewd and infamous life. Let us return now to England, and ſee what paſſed there during the year 1551.

After the concluſion of the peace with France and Scotland, the principal affair in the kingdom was that of the reformation, which the young king wiſhed to bring to as high a degree of perfection as poſſible. He was kept in this diſpoſition by Cranmer, and the reſt of the reformers. The earl of Warwick appeared alſo very forward to complete the work, becauſe he thereby inſinuated himſelf more into his young maſter's favour. The conſtant maxim of the Romiſh party was to oppoſe with all their power any intended alterations, before they were eſtabliſhed by law. But they complied with them, at leaſt outwardly, when there was no remedy, till a favourable opportunity ſhould offer to throw off the maſk. It was not poſſible to be rid of theſe hypocrites at once, becauſe they gave no advantage by their outward behaviour. But they were narrowly watched, that their falſe ſteps might be improved. By this means, Bonner was put outo f the way the laſt year; and, by the ſame method, Gardiner was this year deprived on the 18th of April [f].

During all the reſt of the year, choſen commiſſioners were preparing a confeſſion of faith [g], which was the laſt mortal wound to he given to the old religion. Some places of the new liturgy were alſo corrected [h]. But the princeſs Mary refuſed to ſubmit to theſe or the former changes. She continued to have maſs ſaid in her houſe, and thereby drew upon herſelf great mortifications from the council and the king himſelf, who ſeemed reſolved to force her to a compliance. She was ſo alarmed at it, that ſhe formed a deſign to withdraw out of the kingdom, by means of ſome veſſels which the regent of the Low-Countries was to ſend upon the coaſt of England. But the deſign being diſcovered, the execution was prevented, though it ſhould ſeem that princeſs would have occaſioned leſs trouble and embarraſſment, had ſhe been out of the kingdom. In all appearance, the project of excluding her from the ſucceſſion was not yet formed, neither was the king's death thought ſo near as it was.

This princeſs's obſtinacy drew upon her the king her brother's diſpleaſure, who from thenceforward loſt much of the eſteem and affection he had for her. It was this probably that inſpired the earl of Warwick with the thoughts of excluding her from the ſucceſſion, and of forming, in favour of his own family, the project mentioned hereafter. It will be neceſſary however briefly to ſay here, that this project was, to marry the princeſs Elizabeth abroad; to cauſe Mary to be ſet aſide; and to marry one of his ſons to Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, and of Frances Brandon, who was the next in the ſucceſſion, after Henry VIIIth's two daughters [i].

At this time the ſweating-ſickneſs broke out in England with great violence, carrying off in twenty-four hours ſuch as were ſeized with it, in ſpite of all remedies [k]. If we may believe the hiſtorians, this ſickneſs was peculiar to the Engliſh nation. It did not ſeize the foreigners who were in England; and in other countries Engliſhmen were only afflicted with it. For this reaſon it was called the Engliſh ſweat. There is much the ſame thing to be obſerved among the Polanders, who were alone ſubject to a diſtemper they call plica [l], unknown, as it is affirmed, in all other countries. The duke of Suffolk, ſon of Charles Brandon by his ſecond wife, died of the ſweating-ſickneſs; as did alſo, two days after, his brother, who had ſucceeded him. So, the title of duke of Suffolk being void, the earl of Warwick reſolved to procure that honour for the marquis of Dorſet, father of Jane Grey, whom he deſigned for one of his ſons. He wanted the concurrence of that lord to ſet the crown on his daughter's head, to whom the mother was moreover to reſign her right. It is however very difficult to conceive that the earl of Warwick ſhould have formed this project ſo early, ſince Edward was in good health, in his fifteenth year only, and very likely to have a numerous iſſue. The earl of Warwick muſt therefore have known that the king was to die very ſoon. And this is what they would inſinuate, who make him form his deſign at the time I am ſpeaking of, and before the king was ſeized with his laſt illneſs, in order to repreſent him as the author of his death. However, it is pretended, all this lord's proceed-there were beſtowed upon the ſame ſees, either worſe manors, or elſe rectories, and impropriated tithes. Thus on September 26, 1547, Shaxton, biſhop of Lincoln, reſigned to the king twenty-four manors; ſo that at preſent the revenues of that biſhopric are ſaid to conſiſt of impropriations. Buckden being the only manor it has left. May 20, 1548, the biſhop of Bath and Wells made the like reſignation or exchange of ten manors. And April 12, 1550, Ridley, biſhop of London, yielded up to the king the manors of Stepney and Hackney, in Middleſex, and of Branktree and Southminſter, in Eſſex; in the room whereof he had the manors of Feting, Kilvedon, &c. in Eſſex; of Greenford, Hanwel, Drayton, and Paddington, in Middleſex; the advowſon of St. Martin's in the Fields, and others; of which the reader may ſee an account in Strype's Eccl. Mem. tom. II. p. 217, who there obſerves, that the advantage of the exchange was conſiderably on the biſhop's ſide. The ſee of Winchester was alſo regulated. See ibid. p. 272. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XV. p. 166, 171, 226. King Henry VIII. had led the way in this general regulation, as it was called, of the biſhoprics, by a ſtatute made in the 37th of his reign, c. 16, when no leſs than ſeventy manors, all at the old rents, were taken at once from the ſee of York, and annexed to the duchy of Lancaſter, impropriations and tithes being given in lieu of them; and many were alſo at the ſame time diſmembered from the archbiſhop of Canterbury. See Stat. 37 Henry VIII. Strype's Mem. tom. II. p. 75, &c. Heylin, p. 18.

[d] He gave a ſtrange omen of what advancements he intended to make, when he gave his own hat (according to the cuſtom of the popes, who beſtow their hats before they go out of the conclave) on a mean ſervant of his, who had the charge of his money; and being aſked, what he ſaw in him to make him a cardinal? He anſwered, As much as the cardinals had ſeen in him to make him pope. But it was commonly ſaid, that the ſecret of this promotion was an unnatural affection to him. Burnet. tom. II. p. 127.

[e] It had been included in the late peace made between the crowns of England and France; and accordingly took care to have this comprehenſion ratified. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XV. p. 255—273.

Poinet, biſhop of Rocheſter, was tranſlated on March 23, to the ſee of Wincheſter, ſaid then to be vacant by the deprivation of Stephen the late biſhop.—See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XV. p. 253. According to king Edward's Journal, it was on February 13.—January 28, this year, a commiſſion was given to ſeveral biſhops, and others of the clergy and laity, to enquire after, repreſs, and extirpate, the errors of the anabaptiſts, libertines, and other heretics. Rymer's Fœd. tom XV. p. 215.

[g] It is not known who were the compilers of theſe articles of the church of England, being forty-two in number, nor what method was taken in preparing them. Burnet thinks they were framed by Cranmer and Ridley, and that that they were by them ſent about to others, to correct or add to them as they ſaw cauſe. The reader may ſee them in Burnet's Collection, numb. 55. vol. II. with the difference between theſe and thoſe ſet out in queen Elizabeth's time marked in the margin.

[h] A general confeſſion and abſolution was added. And the commandments were put in the beginning of the communion ſervice. The chriſm, uſe of the croſs in conſecrating the euchariſt, prayers for the dead, &c. were laid aſide. Burnet, tom. II. p. 169, 170.

[k] This ſickneſs began firſt at Shrewſbury, in April, and ſpreading towards the north, ended not till October. Rapin. Whoever was ſeized with it, died, or recovered within nine or ten hours at moſt. If he took cold, he died within three hours; if he ſlept, within ſix hours, he died raving. It raged chiefly among young men, of a ſtrong conſtitution. Edw. Jour. p. 30.

[l] They that are troubled with it, loſe the uſe of their limbs, as if they had a palſy, and feel great pains in their nerves, which generally continue a whole year. After that, they fall into a great ſweat at night, and next morning their hair is glued together, and has a nauſeous ſmell, which continues ever after. If they cut their hair, the humour falls on their eyes, and makes them blind. This diſtemper is infectious, and communicated by coition. Atlas. Geog. tom. I. p. 199.

The

ings from the death of Jane Grey's two brothers, to the end of this reign, had relation to this project; as for inſtance, the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth to the king of Denmark's eldeſt ſon, which he cauſed to be privately treated, but without effect.

The marriage of the king himſelf with a daughter of France, which was negotiated and concluded this year, ſeems directly contrary to the earl of Warwick's deſigns, ſuppoſing they were already formed. Wherefore Dr. Burnet ſays, that this marriage was only to amuſe the young king. Hayward, who wrote the hiſtory of Edward VI. ſays alſo, that after the marriage was concluded, Edward thought himſelf in perfect ſafety, though indeed he was in extreme danger. But whatever the earl of Warwick's motive might be, the marquis of Northampton, the biſhop of Ely, and ſome other embaſſadors, were ſent with a ſplendid retinue to carry the order of the Garter to Henry II. and to propoſe a marriage between his daughter the princeſs Elizabeth and Edward. Henry being then at Chateaubriant, the Engliſh embaſſadors came to Nantes, from whence they were conducted to court. The marquis of Northampton, as head of the embaſſy [m], preſented the collar of the order to the king. Then the biſhop of Ely deſired him to appoint commiſſioners to treat with them about an affair tending to the common good of the two kingdoms. The commiſſioners being named, the embaſſadors propoſed the marriage of Edward with the princeſs Elizabeth, and the treaty was ſigned at Angers the 19th of July. The princeſs's portion was to be two hundred thouſand crowns, and her dower as great as any queen of England had ever enjoyed. But the marriage was not to be contracted by words of the preſent tenſe, till a month after the princeſs was twelve years of age. This hindered it from being conſummated, becauſe Edward died before that time. Shortly after, Henry II. ſent a noble embaſſy into England, of which the marſhal de Montmorency was head, with the order of St. Michael to the king.

Foreign affairs being finiſhed, the earl of Warwick applied himſelf to domeſtic, or rather to his own. He cauſed Henry Grey, marquis of Northampton, to be created duke of Suffolk, and himſelf duke of Northumberland [n]. William Paulet, earl of Wiltſhire, and lord treaſurer, was made marquis of Wincheſter [o], and ſir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke [p]. They who were on this occaſion dignified with new honours, were the intimate friends of the earl of Warwick, now duke of Northumberland, who ſought to eſtabliſh himſelf in the poſt he poſſeſſed of chief manager of the public affairs, though without any patent to give him that authority.

This lord could not however enjoy a perfect tranquility, ſo long as he ſtill ſaw ſuch a rival as the duke of Somerſet, who might one day be reſtored to favour, and who was really endeavouring to regain the poſt he had formerly poſſeſſed. Edward was near the time of his majority, and daily encreaſed in the knowledge of affairs. The duke of Northumberland had therefore to fear, than when the king ſhould compare his adminiſtration with the duke of Somerſet's, he would perceive the laſt had been wrongfully deprived of his dignity. Beſides, Edward ſtill expreſſed great eſteem for his uncle, and gave him frequent and public marks of it. All this made the duke of Northumberland very uneaſy, who plainly ſaw, it would be almoſt impoſſible to execute his projects whilſt he had ſuch an inſpector as the duke of Somerſet. He determined therefore to be rid of this troubleſome rival at any rate, and to that end made uſe of two ways. The firſt was to ruin him in the king's favour, by means of certain emiſſaries, who beſet him continually [q]. The ſecond was, to cauſe his enemy ſuch mortifications as ſhould throw him upon actions that would give an advantage againſt him. Theſe two ways ſucceeded to his wiſh. The king by degrees took a diſguſt at his uncle, and was thereby diſpoſed to receive any ill impreſſions againſt him. On the other hand, the duke of Somerſet could not, without extreme impatience, ſee himſelf daily expoſed to affronts, the more provoking, as they were done with deſign to inſenſe him. Few have the prudence or moderation to avoid falling into ſuch ſnares. It is pretended that, ſeeing himſelf thus puſhed, he reſolved to kill the duke of Northumberland at a viſit he was to make him. Others ſay, he intended to have invited him to dinner at the lord Paget's, and there he was either to kill or poiſon him. At leaſt the hiſtorians thus ſpeak of it, becauſe the report was ſpread both before and after his diſgrace, and even imbibed by the king. And yet his impeachment had no ſuch thing in it, but ran only, that he intended to ſecure the duke of Northumberland's perſon. However, it cannot be denied, he had contrived ſome plot to be reſtored to his poſt, and deviſed, and perhaps imparted to his confidents, ſeveral expedients which were imputed to him afterwards as ſo many crimes, though he had executed none. One of theſe confidents was the perſon that ruined him, being in all appearance bribed by his enemy. This man, ſir Thomas Palmer by name, having been ſecretly brought to the king, told him all he knew, and probably ſo turned his diſcourſe as to make the king believe that bare projects or thoughts were fixed and ſettled deſigns [r]. However, the king, being perſuaded his uncle would have aſſaſſinated the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, conſented that he ſhould be brought to his trial. So, on the 17th of October, the duke was apprehended and ſent to the Tower, with many others accuſed of being his accomplices. The next day the ducheſs of Somerſet, with two of her women, were alſo arreſted; and after that, the earl of Arundel and the lord Paget underwent the ſame fate.

As ſoon as the duke of Somerſet was in the Tower, his pretended crimes were every where publiſhed, with circumſtances proper to impoſe on the people. Upon theſe extravagant accuſations it is that the hiſtorians, doctor Burnet excepted, have built their accounts of this event. What is moſt probable is, that the duke had projected to get himſelf declared protector in the next parliament, ſince the earl of Rutland affirmed it upon oath. As to the means he intended to uſe for that end, very likely he had deviſed ſeveral, but not yet fixed upon any, except that perhaps of ſecuring the duke of Northumberland's perſon. As the cuſtom of bringing the witneſſes face to face had been ſome time ſince laid aſide, we muſt be contented with knowing what the witneſſes depoſed againſt him, without any poſſibility however of receiving from thence an unqueſtionable proof of the truth of the facts. Every one is ſenſible what great alterations the confronting of witneſſes is capable of producing in ſeemingly the moſt poſitive depoſitions.

Palmer depoſed, that ſir Ralph Vane was to have headed two thouſand men to ſupport the duke of Somerſet's deſigns, who, with a hundred horſe [s], was to have fallen upon the guard; that being done, the duke intended to have gone through the city, proclaiming, Liberty! Liberty! And, in caſe he failed to raiſe the people, to have fled to the iſle of Wight. One Crane affirmed the ſame thing, and added, that the earl of Arundel and the lord Paget were privy to the conſpiracy.

Upon theſe depoſitions, the duke was brought to his trial before the peers on the 1ſt of December, the crimes laid againſt him being caſt into three articles:

I. That he had deſigned to ſeize on the king's perſon, and the adminiſtration of the public affairs.

II. That he, with one hundred others, intended to impriſon the duke of Northumberland.

III. And that he had deſigned to raiſe an inſurrection in the city of London.

Theſe three articles, to which the duke of Somerſet's crimes were reduced, plainly ſhew, there was no proof of his having intended to kill or poiſon the three lords above mentioned, though the king had been made to believe it, and the people told the ſame. Of theſe three articles, the firſt and third were high-treaſon, and the ſecond, concerning the duke of Northumberland, was only felony. He poſitively denied the treaſonable articles; and for the other, which was placed the ſecond in the impeachment, he proteſted, he had never determined to kill the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, but had only talked of it, without any intention to do it.

Journ.) as was alſo John Cheek, the king's preceptor.

[q] Some reported, that he had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king in divers counties. Hayward, p. 320.

[r] He afterwards denied all to the duke of Somerſet. See king Edw. Journ. p. 37.

[s] December 1550, there was appointed a band of horſemen, divided amongſt the nobles; an hundred to the duke of Somerſet. Theſe were the horſe, that, with the two thouſand men, were to ſet upon the Gens d'armes, who were nine hundred in number. See king Edw. Journ. p. 21, in Burnet, vol. II.

It muſt be confeſſed, here is a difficulty which is not eaſy to be reſolved. The duke of Somerſet is not accuſed of intending to kill theſe lords, and yet he juſtifies himſelf on that head. This ſeems to intimate, there was ſome ſuch article in the indictment. And yet, doctor Burnet, an exact hiſtorian, if ever there was any, who affirms that he took the accuſation out of the records of the council, ſets down but three articles, where there is no mention of theſe lords, who even ſat among the peers, his judges. On the other hand, it will appear preſently, that the duke was condemned for felony; which was ſtretching the rigour of the law as far as it could go, if he was guilty only of an intention to ſeize the duke of Northumberland; whereas, if he had really intended to kill theſe three lords, there was nothing in his ſentence but what was agreeable to an act of parliament. It muſt therefore be ſaid, either the famous hiſtorian above-mentioned has not exactly related the articles of accuſation, or the peers condemned the unfortunate duke for a crime he was not legally charged with. The faithfulneſs and exactneſs doctor Burnet has profeſſed, will not allow him to be accuſed of ſuch a fraud. But the character of the duke of Northumberland, and of moſt of the duke of Somerſet's judges, who, for the moſt part, were his profeſſed enemies, give but too much occaſion to ſuſpect that the fear of offending the duke of Northumberland, or ſome other motives, prevailed over juſtice [t].

After the peers had heard the depoſitions againſt the duke, and his defences, they unanimouſly acquitted him of treaſon, but found him guilty of felony. They proceeded, in all appearance, upon a ſtatute made in the time of Henry VII. [u], which declared it felony to intend to take away the life of a privy-counſellor. This was ſtretching very far that ſevere law, which perhaps was never executed before, eſpecially upon a duke, peer of the realm, and uncle to the king. Beſides, his charge did not run, that he had intended to kill theſe three counſellors, but only had deſigned to ſecure the duke of Northumberland's perſon. But what is moſt ſtrange in the trial is, that theſe three lords ſat as judges. Sentence being given, he aſked pardon of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, for his ill intentions againſt them. This aſking pardon has made ſeveral believe him guilty. But it is a queſtion, whether by theſe ill intentions we are neceſſarily to underſtand a deſign to aſſaſſinate them. When the people who were preſent at his trial, ſaw he was returned not guilty of treaſon, they ſhouted for joy ſo loud, that they were heard at Charing-croſs. But their joy was turned into ſorrow, when they heard he was condemned of felony.

Every one believed the duke would be pardoned, becauſe his execution was deferred almoſt two months. But ſo great care had been taken to prepoſſeſs the king againſt him, that young Edward, who abhorred the crimes he believed him guilty of, was very far from any thoughts of granting him a pardon. It appears in his Journal, that one Bartuile had affirmed upon oath, that the duke of Somerſet had hired him to kill the duke of Northumberland. That the duke himſelf had owned it at his coming to the Tower, though he had denied it at firſt. But it is very ſtrange this evidence was not produced at his trial. Nothing argues his innocence in this reſpect ſo much as the indictment itſelf, which ran, not that he had intended to aſſaſſinate the duke of Northumberland, but only had deſigned to ſeize and impriſon him. Nevertheleſs, it cannot be denied that the king believed him guilty of the firſt of theſe crimes, ſince we ſee in his letter to Barnaby Fitz-Patrick, his favourite, then in France, that the duke had confeſſed it after ſentence, though he had before ſworn the contrary [w]. But the king's belief does by no means prove the fact. It ſerves alſo equally to prove that the young king was abuſed, who even ſhewed afterwards an extreme ſorrow for having conſented to his uncle's death. The duke of Somerſet was in hopes, however, of undeceiving the king. He had now engaged the lord chancellor Rich to be his friend, who, through a miſtake in the ſuperſcription of a note he ſent to the duke, diſcovered his deſign to uſe his endeavours for him. This occaſioned the great ſeals to be taken from him, and given to the biſhop of Ely [x].

As ſoon as the duke had received his ſentence, great care was taken to divert and entertain the king with pleaſing ſights, that he might not reflect upon this ſtrange condemnation. At the ſame time, all his uncle's friends were carefully hindered from coming near him. At laſt, on the 22d of January, he ſigned an order for his execution. The duke appeared calm and undiſturbed on the ſcaffold, and made a ſpeech to the people. He affirmed, "he had never offended the king by word or deed. He gave God thanks for making him his inſtrument to promote the reformation, and exhorted the people to perſiſt therein." When he had gone ſo far, he was forced to ſtop, by reaſon of an extraordinary noiſe among the people, which laſted ſome time. Sir Anthony Brown riding towards the ſcaffold, and crying to the people to give way, made many believe he was bringing a pardon. On the other ſide, a company of ſoldiers who had been ordered to attend at the execution, coming too late, cauſed others to imagine they were come to maſſacre them. This bred a terrible diſorder, and fatal to ſome of the ſpectators, who were ſmothered to death. When the noiſe was over, he calmly went on with his ſpeech, and ſaid, "he had always been moſt diligent about his majeſty, in his affairs both at home and abroad; and no leſs diligent in ſeeking the common good of the whole realm." Here again he was interrupted by the people crying out, "It was moſt true." Then "he prayed for the king, aſked forgiveneſs of all whom at any time he had offended; forgave all his enemies without exception; and deſired the people to bear him witneſs, that he died in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt." When he had ended his ſpeech, he turned to his private devotions; after which he laid his head on the block to receive the fatal blow.

Thus fell the duke of Somerſet, concerning whom opinions have been very much divided. Some have repreſented him as a very wicked man, capable of committing the moſt henious crimes; and others, as a very good Chriſtian. It is eaſy to ſee, that religion was the ſole cauſe of this diverſity. Had it not been for the prejudice religion begets in moſt men, his faults would not have been ſo much aggravated, which, after all, were ſome of the leaſt, men are guilty of. On the other hand, without this ſame prejudice, there would not have been ſo much pains taken to colour his ambition, which doubtleſs was a little too great. They who have made it their buſineſs to vindicate all his actions, have alſo very lightly touched upon the vaſt riches amaſſed by him during his adminiſtration. Of this, Somerſet-houſe, now ſtanding in London, is an authentic proof. But then, his enemies have made bare accuſations, artfully ſpread among the people, and inſtilled into the king, to paſs for evidenced crimes, though it manifeſtly appears, by the very articles of his indictment, that he was condemned only for an intention to commit an offence, not againſt the king or ſtate, but againſt ſome private perſons. It may therefore be affirmed, that the faults for which he was pardoned after his firſt condemnation, were much greater than that for which he ſuffered death. The people, who are ſeldom miſtaken in their judgment of great men, were ſo generally perſuaded of his innocence, that many dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, conſidering him as a ſort of martyr. Nay, it happened in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, that a woman, ſeeing the duke of Northumberland leading to the Tower, ſhook one of theſe bloody handkerchiefs at him, ſaying, "Behold the blood which thou didſt cauſe to be unjuſtly ſhed, does now apparently begin to revenge itſelf on thee."

About a month after this execution, ſir Ralph Vane, ſir Miles Partridge, ſir Michael Stanhope, and ſir Thomas Arundel [y], who were ſaid to be the duke of Somerſet's chief accomplices, were alſo put to death. But they all proteſted they had never intended to form any plot, either againſt the king or any privy-counſellor. Vane added, he did not doubt his blood would make the duke of Northumberland's pillow uneaſy to him. As for Palmer, Crane, and Bartuile, who

The lord chancellor was left out of the number, being ſuſpected of favouring the duke of Somerſet. Edw. Journ. p. 41. Burnet, tom. II. p. 179.

[w] The king's words, as in Burnet, are: "The duke ſeemed to have acknowledged the felony, and after ſentence he had confeſſed it, though he had formerly vehemently ſworn the contrary." So it was not the deſign of killing, (as Rapin ſays by miſtake) but the felony, that the king ſaid he confeſſed. Burnet, vol. II. p. 181.

[x] The lord chancellor, intending to ſend the duke of Somerſet an advertiſement of ſomewhat deſigned againſt him by the council, and being in haſte, wrote only on the back of the letter, "To the duke," and bade one of his ſervants carry it to the Tower; without giving him particular directions to the duke of Somerſet. His ſervant, fancying it was to the duke of Norfolk, carried it to him. He, to make Northumberland his friend, ſent the letter to him. Rich, underſtanding the miſtake, prevented the diſcovery, and went immediately to the king, and pretending ſome indiſpoſition, deſired to be diſcharged; and upon that took to his bed. So it ſeemed too barbarous to do any thing farther againſt him. Burnet, tom. II. p. 182.

had ſerved as witneſſes againſt the duke of Somerſet, they were eaſily diſcharged. Nay, it was obſerved, there was a great intimacy afterwards between Palmer and the duke of Northumberland, which gave occaſion to believe Palmer had been corrupted to betray the duke of Somerſet, who had honoured him with his friendſhip.

During the year 1551, the ſtate of the emperor's affairs was changed in Germany, when he leaſt ſuſpected it. Maurice, elector of Saxony, having formed the deſign of reſtoring his country to liberty, had ſecretly negotiated a league with France and the proteſtant princes of Germany. But before he declared himſelf openly, he had a mind to know what might be expected from England. To that purpoſe he ſent embaſſadors to Edward, to gain him to his intereſt, and procure a ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns, by telling him it was for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion. The embaſſadors were told, the king would moſt willingly enter into a religious league; but did not mean to be engaged, under that pretence, in a war for other quarrels. That if the elector of Saxony would confer more particularly with the proteſtant princes, and then ſend the king embaſſadors with fuller inſtructions and ſufficient powers, he ſhould have a more poſitive anſwer. Hitherto Maurice had but faintly preſſed the ſiege of Magdeburg: but when his private affairs were ſettled, he ſo ordered it, by the help of ſome friends in the town, that the inhabitants ſurrendered by capitulation. Then he broke up his army, who, parting into ſeveral bodies, quartered in the territories of ſome popiſh princes, putting them under heavy contributions. The catholics complained very much of their being expoſed to theſe oppreſſions. The emperor alone remained in an entire ſecurity, without having the leaſt ſuſpicion of the elector.

The council being removed back to Trent, was opened again in May 1551. But a quarrel between the pope and the king of France interrupting the ſeſſions, they were renewed in September; and though Henry II. proteſted againſt the council, the legates continued it, and cauſed ſeveral points to be decided, which are foreign to our purpoſe [z].

[1552] The parliament met the 23d of January 1552. The commons, ſeeing the great abuſe of the pernicious cuſtom of condemning people without confronting the witneſſes, had a mind to put a ſtop to it. To that end a bill was prepared, condemning, under divers penalties, thoſe who ſhould write or ſpeak againſt the king, with a proviſo, that none ſhould be attainted of treaſon on this act, unleſs two witneſſes ſhould come, and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould confeſs it. The lords were very unwilling to agree to this proviſo [a], as if it concerned them leſs than the commons to be freed from oppreſſion: but at length the act paſſed as drawn by the commons.

In this ſeſſion alſo ſome progreſs was made in the reformation [b]. Among other things, the marriage of the clergy was declared good and valid, which had been for ſome time conſidered by the people as only tolerated.

The ſeſſion of parliament being about to end, and not above a hundred and thirty-ſeven members remaining in the lower houſe, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords to repeal the ſettlement of the duke of Somerſet's eſtate, made in favour of his children by his ſecond wife. In this bill was inſerted a clauſe, as the foundation of it, that the duke of Somerſet and his accomplices were juſtly attainted [c]. But the commons, agreeing to the repeal, rejected the clauſe. This ſhews their opinion of the duke's innocence.

In this ſame ſeſſion, the duke of Northumberland attempted to get Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, condemned; who had been accuſed of miſpriſion of treaſon [d]. The lords readily paſſed the bill for attainting him; but the commons would not proceed upon it, becauſe it was intended to condemn the biſhop, without confronting the witneſſes. The duke of Northumberland's aim was, to have had the dignity of palatine of Durham, annexed to that ſee, conferred on himſelf. We ſhall ſee hereafter, his project had better ſucceſs. Mean while, finding the commons had not much condeſcenſion for him, becauſe the parliament had been called during the duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration, he reſolved to have another which ſhould be more at his devotion. Accordingly this, which had now ſat five years, was diſſolved at the end of the ſeſſion [e]. Then the council came to a reſolution to call a new parliament for the next year only, in order to have time to take the neceſſary meaſures to cauſe repreſentatives to be choſen, who ſhould be more favourable to the court.

There were this year two conſiderable changes with reſpect to the biſhops. Firſt, Heath and Day, biſhops of Worceſter and Chicheſter, were deprived, for too openly oppoſing the reformation. The ſecond change was more conſiderable. After the parliament had given the king power of nominating to the vacant ſees, his patents ran, that he appointed ſuch a one biſhop of ſuch a ſee, during his natural life. But, at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was thought proper to change the words into, "ſo long as he ſhall behave himſelf well [f]." So the biſhops, made by theſe patents, might be deprived of their ſees by a bare act of the king's will, without being forced to obſerve the uſual formalities in ſuch caſes.

The duke of Northumberland ſtill directed the affairs of the government, though he had no commiſſion to diſtinguiſh him from the other privy-counſellors. His proceedings againſt the duke of Somerſet putting every one in fear of being expoſed to his vengeance, not a man dared openly to oppoſe him. It has been ſeen that in the late parliament he attempted to render the duke of Somerſet's memory odious, by cauſing his ſentence to be approved by the two houſes. That project not ſucceeding, he took another method. He ordered a ſtrict enquiry to be made of all who had been enriched by the chantry-lands, given to the king during the duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration. Great numbers were found, ſome of whom were condemned in heavy fines, and others found means to purchaſe the duke of Northumberland's favour. But it was not poſſible for the lord Paget to divert the ſtorm which fell upon him, the duke of Northumberland mortally hating him for having been entirely devoted to the duke of Somerſet [g]. He was not only fined in ſix thouſand pounds, but alſo, on pretence that he was no gentleman [h], was degraded from the order of the garter, which he had received from Henry VIII. as if that prince, when he gave it him, knew not his pedigree. Beſides the motive of hatred and revenge by which the duke of Northumberland was ſwayed, he had alſo another, which was to make way for his eldeſt ſon [i] the earl of Warwick, for whom he eaſily procured the vacant garter [k].

About this time the corporation of German merchants, who lived in the Steel-yard, was diſſolved, becauſe it was become detrimental to England, by engroſſing the whole woollen trade [l]. It was proved, that the Steel-yard men, in the year 1551, ſhipped forty-four thouſand cloths, and all the Engliſh merchants together did not export above eleven hundred. The regent of Flanders and the city of Hamburgh earneſtly

And a letter was written on July 12, 1552, to ſir Peter Mewtas, captain of the iſle of Jerſey, to command him, that divine ſervice might there be uſed as in England. Edw. Journ. p. 58. By another act, the biſhopric of Weſtminſter was ſuppreſſed, and united to London; but the collegiate church, with its exempted juriſdictions, was ſtill continued. About this time, David's pſalms began to be turned into Engliſh rhyme, by Thomas Sternhold, one of the grooms of the king's privy chamber. He tranſlated only thirty-ſeven. [k] On February 2, this year, there was a king at arms appointed for Ireland, by the name of Ulſter. Edw. Journ. p. 46.

[l] Henry III. had been much ſupported in his wars by the aſſiſtance he received ſollicited to have the company reſtored, but it was to no purpoſe. The court alſo ſet on foot a project for the advantage of the trade of England: namely, to open two free mart-towns in England, Hull, and Southampton. But it was not executed for want of time.

This year Cardan, the famous Italian philoſopher, paſſed through England in his return from Scotland, where he had been to cure the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's of a dropſy. His endeavours were crowned with ſucceſs; but he foretold the archbiſhop he was to be hanged. As he paſſed through England he waited on young king Edward, and was ſo charmed with him, that he every where ſpoke of him as of a miracle. It is ſaid, he caſt his nativity, and foretold to him a long and proſperous life. But for once the rules of his art were not juſt [m].

The affairs of Scotland underwent this year ſome alteration. The queen-dowager had been in France, on pretence of ſeeing her daughter; and had obtained of that court the regency of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Arran. In November 1551 ſhe returned to Scotland, through England, where ſhe was magnificently treated by the king, and her charges borne to the frontiers of the two kingdoms. At her arrival in Scotland, ſhe perſuaded the earl of Arran to reſign the regency to her, according to the deſire of Henry II. and his miniſters, the earl perceiving he could not keep it againſt their will. The archbiſhop of St. Andrew's did not like his brother's reſigning his dignity. He caballed againſt the queen-regent; who had the addreſs to ſupport herſelf by the aſſiſtance of the reformed, promiſing them the free exerciſe of their religion in their own houſes. By this means ſhe eſtabliſhed herſelf in the government, in ſpite of the archbiſhop's attempts.

The revolution this year in the affairs of Germany was much more conſiderable. The elector of Saxony at length diſcovered his project, but not till after the king of France had proclaimed war againſt the emperor, and the conſtable, de Montmorency, taken Metz by ſurpriſe. Then Maurice, aſſembling his forces, marched directly to Inſpruck, where Charles V. was, and had like to have taken him priſoner. Maurice's declaration obliged the emperor at laſt to give the proteſtants ſome ſatisfaction, by granting them the famous edict of Paſſau, whereby the ſeveral princes and towns were ſecured in the free exerciſe of their religion. That monarch ſoon met with another great mortification. He inveſted Metz: but, by the brave reſiſtance of the duke of Guiſe, who defended the place, he was forced to raiſe the ſiege. Let us return now to the affairs of England [n].

The new parliament meeting the 1ſt of March 1553, the houſe of commons conſiſted of repreſentatives who for the moſt part were diſpoſed to follow the directions of the court. They gave the king a very conſiderable ſubſidy, grounded upon the great waſting of his treaſure during the duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration. This ſhewed what power the duke of Northumberland had in the houſe [o]. That lord procured likewiſe an act for ſuppreſſing the biſhopric of Durham, having firſt cauſed Tunſtal to be deprived [p]. This biſhopric being ſuppreſſed, the king founded two others; one at Durham, with 2000 marks revenue, and another at Newcaſtle, with 1000. But the temporality of the biſhopric being turned into a county palatine, was given to the duke of Northumberland. Probably, Tunſtal was deprived, and his ſee ſuppreſſed for that purpoſe.

The parliament ſat but one month. It was diſſolved the 31ſt of March, after the duke of Northumberland had procured a ſubſidy for the king, and a ſtain for the memory of the late duke of Somerſet [q]. The court had no farther need of a parliament, and the duke of Northumberland's intereſt required there ſhould be none, when he was preparing to execute his deſigns.

The young king had been ſeized ever ſince January with a diſtemper, which at length brought him to his grave [r]. This did not hinder his being made to ſign an order for viſiting the churches, and taking thence all the ſuperfluous plate and ornaments. The viſitors were likewiſe to examine very ſtrictly what embezzlements had been made in that reſpect. All this was done under colour of ſelling the ſuperfluities, and giving the money to the poor, who had, however, the leaſt ſhare [s].

The progreſs of the French in Germany beginning to make England uneaſy, the council reſolved to take ſome meaſures to ſtop their career. Nay, they ſeemed at firſt to have intended to join in a league with the emperor againſt France. But all this ended at laſt in the offer of the king's mediation, which produced no effect.

Mean while, Edward was ſtill troubled with a defluxion upon his lungs, which waſted him by degrees, and daily grew more dangerous. Some plainly affirm, a ſlow poiſon was given him, and threw the ſuſpicion upon the duke of Northumberland. Others only inſinuate ſuch a thing, without ſaying it poſitively. But after all, both ſpeak only by conjecture, without giving any proof. The young king ſaw death approaching, without any fears as to himſelf; but could not reflect without an extreme concern on the future ſtate of religion, under his ſiſter Mary, who was to ſucceed him. Very probably, the duke of Northumberland, who conſtantly attended him in his illneſs, took care to encreaſe his fears, on purpoſe to lead him more eaſily to the point he deſired. All hopes however of the king's recovery were not given over till the middle of May, when, it is likely, the phyſicians told the duke of Northumberland, his caſe was deſperate. Then it was that he married the lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth ſon, the only one unmarried, to Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter received from the free towns in Germany; in recompence whereof he gave them great privileges in England. They were made a corporation, and lived together in the Steel-yard near the bridge. They had gone ſometimes, particularly in the reign of Edward IV. beyond their charters, which were thereupon judged to be forfeited; but by great preſents they purchaſed new ones. They traded in a body, and ſo ruined others by underſelling them. Trade was now riſen much: courts began to be more magnificent; ſo there was a greater conſumption of cloth than formerly. Antwerp and Hamburgh had then the chief trade in theſe parts of the world, and their factors in the Steel-yard (ſo called from the ſteel imported by them) had all the markets of England in their hands, and ſet ſuch prices both on what they imported or exported as they pleaſed, and broke all other merchants. Whereupon the merchant adventurers complained of them; and, after ſome hearings, it was adjudged that they had forfeited their charter, and that their company was diſſolved. Burnet, tom. II. p. 207. Strype, tom. II. p. 295.

[m] After the king's death, when nothing was to be got by flattering, he wrote the following character of him: ——"All the graces were in him: he had many tongues when he was yet but a child: together with the Engliſh, his natural tongue, he had both Latin and French; nor was he ignorant, as I hear, of the Greek, Italian, and Spaniſh, and perhaps ſome more: but for the Engliſh, French, and Latin, he was perfect in them; and was apt to learn every thing: nor was he ignorant of logic, of the principles of natural philoſophy, nor of muſic. The ſweetneſs of his temper was ſuch as became a mortal; his gravity becoming the majeſty of a king, and his diſpoſition was ſuitable to his high degree. In ſhort, that child was ſo bred, had ſuch parts, and was of ſuch expectation, that he looked like a miracle of a man." Afterwards he adds, "He was a marvellous boy; when I was with him, he was in the fifteenth year of his age, in which he ſpoke Latin as politely and readily as I did. He began to love the liberal arts before he knew them, and to know them before he could uſe them; in him there was ſuch an attempt of nature, that not only England, but the world, had reaſon to lament his being ſo early ſnatched away.—— When the gravity of a king was needful, he carried himſelf like an old man; and yet he was always affable and gentle as became his age. He played on the lute; he meddled in affairs of ſtate; and for bounty, he did in that emulate his father; though his father, even when he endeavoured to be good, might appear to have been bad. But there was no ground of ſuſpecting any ſuch thing in the ſon, whoſe mind was cultivated by the ſtudy of philoſophy." See the original, in Burnet's Hiſt. Ref. tom. II. Collect.

[n] This year the king's debts amounted to two hundred and fifty-one thouſand, or, according to Strype, two hundred and forty-one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-nine pounds; and a commiſſion was granted to certain perſons, to ſell part of the chantry-lands for the payment of them. Edw. Journ. p. 51. Strype, tom. II. p. 312.

[o] They gave the king two tenths and two fifteenths, and a ſubſidy, to be paid in two years. At the paſſing the bill, there was a great debate about it in the houſe of commons, which ſeems to have been about the preamble, containing a long accuſation of the duke of Somerſet, for involving the king in wars, waſting his treaſure, engaging him in much debt, embaſing the coin, and having given occaſion to a moſt terrible rebellion. This was inſerted by the duke of Northumberland, to let the king ſee how acceptable he and his party, and how hateful the duke of Somerſet had been. The clergy did alſo give the king ſix ſhillings in the pound of their benefices. Burnet, tom. II. p. 215.

[p] He was deprived Aug. 14, 1552. Strype, tom. II. p. 367. The bill for diſſolving his biſhopric was firſt read on the 21ſt of March, and, for the ſecond and third times, on the 22d and 29th. Journ. Parl.

[q] But an act was made for the reſtoring in blood ſir Edward Seymour, knt. who was eldeſt ſon of the duke, by his ſecond wife. There was alſo a remarkable act made for avoiding exceſs of wines. It imported, that no perſon whatever ſhould keep in his houſe above ten gallons of French wine, for ſpending, upon pain of forfeiting 10l. ſterling, unleſs he could ſpend an hundred marks yearly in lands, tenements, or other profits certain; or was worth a thouſand marks of his own; or elſe was the ſon of a duke, marquis, earl, viſcount, or baron. When it was read in the houſe of lords, the duke of Suffolk, the earls of Arundel, Oxford, Weſtmoreland, Rutland, the biſhop of St. David's, and the lord Darcy, of Chich, diſſented from it. Journ. Parl.

[r] April 2, 1552, he fell ſick of the ſmall-pox and meaſles, which probably might turn to a conſumption. Edw. Journ. p. 49.

[s] Viſitors were appointed to examine what church-plate, jewels, and other furniture, was in all churches, and to compare their account with the inventories made in former viſitations, and to ſee what was embezzled, and how. They were to leave in every church one or two chalices of ſilver, with linen for the communion-table and for ſurplices; and to bring in all other things of value to the treaſurer of the king's houſhold, and to ſell the reſt of the linen, copes, altar-cloths, and give the money to the poor. Helyn, and others, urge from thence, that the king was ill-principled as to the matters of the church, becauſe he was now in the ſixteenth year of his age. But Burnet obſerves, that when all is done, it was only calling in the ſuperfluous plate that lay in churches, more for pomp than uſe. And that perhaps, being ſick, he did not much mind what papers the council brought him to ſign. Tom. II. p. 217.

of the new duke of Suffolk, by Frances Brandon, who was in Henry VIIIth's will the next in ſucceſſion after the princeſs Elizabeth. At the ſame time, Jane's two ſiſters were alſo married; the ſecond, the lady Catherine, to the earl of Pembroke's eldeſt ſon, the lord Herbert; the third, the lady Mary, who was crooked, to the king's groom-porter, Martin Keys. Theſe marriages were ſolemnized about the end of May [t], when there was no hope of the king's recovery. At laſt, one day, as the young king was expreſſing his great concern at the thoughts, that his ſiſter the princeſs Mary would do her utmoſt to deſtroy the reformation, the duke of Northumberland broke the ice. He repreſented to the king, that there was but one way to prevent the misfortunes England was threatened with, in caſe the princeſs Mary aſcended the throne after him; and that was, to ſettle the crown on the lady Jane Grey, his daughter-in-law. Indeed it was natural in excluding Mary to transfer the crown to his ſiſter Elizabeth, whom the king tenderly loved, and who was a hearty friend to the reformation. But, probably, the duke told the king, as he could exclude Mary but on the ſpecious pretence of her being illegitimate, the ſame reaſon ſubſiſted with regard to Elizabeth, ſince the marriages of their mothers were equally annulled. That therefore, either the ſucceſſion was to be left as ſettled by the late king, or the princeſſes were to be both excluded together. Very likely, the young king, who found himſelf dying, and only thought of ſaving the reformation from the impending deſtruction, was prevailed with by this argument to ſacrifice the princeſs Elizabeth. Beſides, he had a great eſteem and affection for Jane Grey, who was an accompliſhed lady both in body and mind.

However, the king having taken the reſolution ſuggeſted to him by the duke of Northumberland, three judges of the realm [u] were ſent for, and required to draw an aſſignment of the crown to Jane Grey. The judges deſired a little time to conſider of it. At laſt, they anſwered they could not preſume to do any ſuch thing without being guilty of high treaſon: Adding, that all the privy-counſellors who conſented to the aſſignment would unavoidably be liable to the pains expreſſed in the act of ſucceſſion. Upon which the duke of Northumberland was in ſuch a fury, that he had like to have beaten the judges; but they ſtood to what they had ſaid. On the 16th of June they were ſent for again, and at length by threats, and the expediency of a pardon under the great ſeal, were wrought upon to draw the ſettlement of the crown, which was ſigned by all the reſt of the judges, except Hales, who could never be prevailed with. All the privy-counſellors ſet their hands to it likewiſe on the 21ſt of the ſame month. Cranmer was abſent that day on purpoſe to avoid ſigning; but the king importuned him ſo much, that he ſet his hand at laſt as a witneſs, as it is pretended, and not as a privy-counſellor [w].

Mean while, the king's diſtemper encreaſing, without the poſſibility of finding any remedy, the council thought fit to diſmiſs the phyſicians, and put him into the hands of a certain woman, who undertook his cure. It was ſaid, this was done by the duke of Northumberland's advice, and that the woman ſhortened the king's days. But he was now ſo ill, that it was entirely needleſs to haſten his death. It is true, the woman inſtead of curing him, only put him to more pain by the medicines ſhe gave him; and this was ſufficient to inſpire the people with violent ſuſpicions of the duke of Northumberland, who was not beloved, nor was thought capable of any thing. At laſt the phyſicians were ſent for again. But it was not in their power to ſtop the violence of his diſtemper, which carried him out of the world on the 6th of July, after his giving ſenſible proofs of a true piety. Some days before his death, the duke of Northumberland got the council to write to the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth, deſiring them to come and keep him company in his ſickneſs. His aim was to have them in his power, that they might not obſtruct the promotion of his daughter-in-law Jane Grey. The two princeſſes, not imagining the king ſo near death, were upon the road, but hearing he was expiring, turned back, and the duke was diſappointed of his expectation [x].

BY indentures of the 1ſt and 2d of Edward VI. a pound weight of gold, of twenty carats fine and four carats allay, was coined into thirty pounds by tale, out of which the king had a great profit; and a pound of ſilver, of four ounces fine and eight ounces allay, was coined into forty-eight ſhillings: after which rate, every pound of fine ſilver made in current money ſeven pounds four ſhillings; and the king's profit on every pound weight was four pounds four ſhillings.——In the 3d year of this king, a pound weight of gold, of twenty-two carats fine and two carats allay, was to be coined into thirty-four pounds by tale, into ſovereigns at 20s. a-piece, half-ſovereigns at 10s. a-piece, crowns at 5s. and half-crowns at 2s. 6d. a-piece: and a pound weight of ſilver, of ſix ounces fine and ſix ounces allay, was to be coined into ſeventy-two ſhillings, which were to go for 12d. a-piece by tale; of which the merchant, for every pound weight of fine ſilver, received three pounds four ſhillings, and the king above four pounds gain.——In the 4th year of this reign, a pound weight of gold of the old ſtandard, of twenty-three carats, and three grains and a half fine, was coined into twenty-eight pounds ſixteen ſhillings by tale; namely, into ſovereigns at 24s. a-piece, half-ſovereigns at 12s. angels at 8s. and half-angels at 4s. a-piece.—In the 5th of this reign, a pound weight of ſilver, of three ounces fine and nine ounces allay, was coined into ſeventy-two ſhillings, at 12d. a-piece: and the merchant received for every ounce of fine ſilver, which he ſhould bring to the mint, ten ſhillings of ſuch money; by which means twelve ounces of fine ſilver was exorbitantly raiſed to fourteen pounds eighteen ſhillings.——In the 6th of this reign, a pound weight of gold, of the old ſtandard aforeſaid, was coined into thirty-ſix pounds by tale: namely, twenty-four ſovereigns at 30s. a-piece, ſeventy-two angels at 10s. a-piece, or one hundred and forty-four half-angels: and and a pound weight of crown gold, of twenty-two carats fine and two carats allay, was coined into thirty-three pounds by tale: namely, thirty-three ſovereigns at 20s. a piece, or ſixty-ſix half-ſovereigns at 10s. a-piece, or one hundred and thirty-two crowns, or two hundred and ſixty-four half-crowns: and a pound weight of ſilver, conſiſting of eleven ounces one penny-weight fine, and nineteen penny-weights allay, was coined into three pounds by tale: namely, twelve crowns, or twenty-four half-crowns, or ſixty ſhillings, or one hundred and twenty ſix-pences, or two hundred and forty three-pences, or ſeven hundred and twenty pence, or one thouſand four hundred and forty half-pence, or two thouſand eight hundred and eighty farthings.

The gold coins of this king are ſovereigns, half-ſovereigns, angels, half-angels, crowns, half-crowns. The ſovereign has on one ſide the king's buſt crowned; reverſe, SCVTVM. FIDEI. PROTEGIT. It is ſaid, king Edward was in body beautiful, of a ſweet aſpect, and eſpecially in his eyes, which ſeemed to have a ſtarry livelineſs and luſtre in them. He kept a book, in which he wrote the characters of all the chief men of the nation, all the judges, lord lieutenants, and juſtices of the peace over England, marking down their way of living, and their zeal for religion. He had ſtudied the buſineſs of the mint, with the exchange and value of money. He alſo underſtood fortification, and deſigned well. He knew all the harbours and ports in his dominions, as alſo in Scotland and France, with the depth of water, and way of coming into them. He had acquired ſo great knowledge in foreign affairs, that the embaſſadors who were ſent into England, publiſhed very extraordinary things of him in all the courts of Europe. He took notes of almoſt every thing he heard, which he wrote firſt in Greek characters, that thoſe about him might not underſtand them, and afterwards copied out fair in the journal or diary that he kept. This journal written with his own hand, is ſtill preſerved in ſir John Cotton's famous library; from whence the learned biſhop Burnet tranſcribed and publiſhed it, in his ſecond volume of the Hiſtory of the Reformation. In it the moſt conſiderable tranſactions in this reign are perhaps as well regiſtered (ſays biſhop Nicolſon) by the young king himſelf, as by any other hiſtorian.—June 26, a few days before his death, the king endowed Chriſt's, St. Thomas's, and Bridewell hoſpitals, in London, with the revenues belonging to the Savoy in the ſame city, which amounted then to 600l. a year; and gave licence for the purchaſing of lands, to the uſe of the ſame hoſpitals, as far as the yearly ſum of 4000 marks. Hollingſh. p. 1082. He alſo founded Chriſt's hoſpital, in Abington. Heylin, p. 141.—The expences of his houſhold yearly, during his reign, were as follow: The firſt year, 49,187l. 18s. The ſecond, 46,902l. 7s. The third 46,100l. 3s. The fourth, 100,578l. 16s. The fifth, 62,863l. 9s. The ſixth, 65,923l. 16s. Strype, tom. II. p. 454, 455. The ſilver monies of this prince, who was the firſt of that name that added the number to it, are contrary to thoſe of his father; the fine money of Henry VIII. having the half-face, and his bad the full; whereas king Edward's bad has the half, and his good the full. Of the baſe there are two ſorts of teſtoons, which give him half-faced; the one having this legend, TIMOR DOMINI FONS VITE. M.D.XLIX. (Fig. 1.) and the other, INIMICOS EIVS INDVAM CONFVSI-ONE. It was on the former of theſe that biſhop Latimer remarked, it was ſuch a pretty little ſhilling, that he had like to have put it away for an old groat. 22. MARY.

[1553.] HENRY the Eighth's divorces from Catherine of Arragon and Anne Bullen: the acts of parliament confirming theſe divorces: other ſubſequent acts which ſeemed to repeal what the firſt had ordained: the power given to the king to appoint his ſucceſſors, and to place them in what order he pleaſed: in a word, that prince's laſt will itſelf had ſo embroiled the affair of the ſucceſſion, that it appeared full of contradiction and obſcurity. It would not have been poſſible to decide by the antient laws and cuſtoms of the realm, the queries ariſing from ſo many inconſiſtent acts, becauſe the makers of theſe new laws had not in view juſtice and equity, but only the gratifying of a prince to whom it was dangerous to refuſe any thing. Henry VIII. had foreſeen the difficulties and perplexities his two divorces might one day occaſion, and even ſeemed deſirous to prevent them. But he only encreaſed them by the new ſtatutes he obtained of the parliament, wherein his aim was not ſo much to procure the welfare of the kingdom, as to follow his humour, and cauſe his will to be a law. To ſet this matter in a clear light, it will be proper to inſert here a brief recapitulation of that monarch's proceedings with reſpect to the ſucceſſion.

It has been ſeen in the hiſtory of his reign, that after living eighteen years with Catherine of Arragon, his firſt wife, and having by her ſeveral children, of whom there was but one daughter alive, he had a mind to put her away. He pretended, his marriage was void; and becauſe the court of Rome, for reaſons of ſtate, would not condeſcend to annul it, he cauſed a ſentence of divorce to be pronounced by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, before he had aboliſhed the papal authority in his kingdom. He thereby afforded a very ſpecious pretence to queſtion the prelate's authority by whom the ſentence was pronounced. What is more, he took a ſecond wife, before he was legally divorced from the firſt; and by this precipitation, gave a freſh occaſion to diſpute the validity of his ſecond marriage. Here are already two contradictions in theſe his two firſt ſteps. He applied to the pope, as to his judge, and before he had ſolemnly renounced his authority, contemns it, and, in ſpite of the pope, whoſe juriſdiction ſtill was acknowledged in England, is divorced from queen Catherine. On the other hand, he owns there was need of a legal ſentence to juſtify his divorce, and yet he prevents the ſentence, by running into a ſecond marriage, before it was pronounced.

In the next place, he beheaded his ſecond wife for adultery; and yet, before the execution, pretended ſhe could not be his wife, and was divorced from her on a frivolous pretence. Theſe two divorces were confirmed by an act of parliament paſſed in 1536, wherein was alſo a manifeſt contradiction. The act declared Mary and Elizabeth, born of the two firſt marriages, illigitimate and incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, and yet it gave the king power to place them on the throne; ſince, without any limitation, it inveſted him with all the authority neceſſary to ſettle the ſucceſſion as he pleaſed.

There was likewiſe another contradiction in a ſtatute of the year 1540, wherein it was declared, that a marriage after conſummation ſhould not be annulled by reaſon of a precontract. Nevertheleſs Henry's divorce from Anne Bullen had no other motive. Thereby, the king and parliament owned they had injured Elizabeth in declaring her illigitimate. It will be ſaid, perhaps, this act was not to regard what was paſſed. But it is certain, it was made only with deſign to favour Elizabeth. Notwithſtanding, ſhe was not reſtored by this act, but it ſtill lay in the king's breaſt to give her place in, or exclude her from, the ſucceſſion.

In another act, made in 1544, there was a no leſs manifeſt contradiction. By this act, both houſes themſelves put in the line of the ſucceſſion Mary and Elizabeth after their brother Edward. Did not this ſeem to be making them an authentic reparation, and owning them for legitimate? And indeed, hitherto no baſtards had ever been on the throne of England. Nay, it might be queſtioned, whether it was in the parliament's power to place them there. At leaſt there would have been need of a very expreſs and authentic law for that purpoſe. Nevertheleſs, by a particular clauſe of this act, the king was allowed the liberty to impoſe conditions on theſe two princeſſes, without which they could have no right to ſucceed; a thing the parliament would not, nay, could not have done, if they had been owned for legitimate. It was not therefore on account of their natural right, but by mere favour, that they were enabled to ſucceed to the crown.

Henry followed the ſame plan in his laſt will. He put Mary and Elizabeth in the line of the ſucceſſion after their brother Edward, but in ſuch a manner that he let them ſee it was by mere grace, ſince he bound them to certain conditions, without which they were to forfeit their right. The difference he made between them and Edward, ſhewed he owned them not for legitimate, and thereby afforded a pretence to queſtion the right he gave them. But what conduced ſtill more to embroil the affair of the ſucceſſion was, that this will, paſſing over in ſilence the iſſue of Margaret, queen of Scotland, Henry's eldeſt ſiſter, placed next to Elizabeth the children of Mary, queen dowager of France, and ducheſs of Suffolk, the younger ſiſter. This was a manifeſt abuſe of the power granted him by the parliament, and conſequently it was furniſhing the queen of Scotland with a plauſible pretence to demand the annulling of a will which ſubverted the moſt ſteady laws of the kingdom.

Edward VI. completed this confuſion in the affair of the ſucceſſion, by conveying the crown to Jane Grey, contrary to the rights of Mary and Elizabeth. This was an act of abſolute ſovereignty, very unbecoming a king of England, and one that died a minor. But moreover, in this act of conveyance, there were contradictions no leſs palpable than thoſe

Henry VIII. had been guilty of. Edward owned for good and valid the act declaring Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate. But at the ſame time he repealed, by his own authority, that which gave the king, his father, the power to ſettle the ſucceſſion. On the other hand, he followed his father's will, in giving the preference to the younger ſiſter's children; but withal, annulled the will, by excluding Mary and Elizabeth.

By this ſhort recapitulation, it may be eaſily perceived what a door to diviſions and civil wars was opened by Henry VIII. and his ſucceſſor. By the above-mentioned acts, four princeſſes, namely, Mary, Elizabeth, the queen of Scotland, and Jane Grey, could pretend to the crown after Edward's death, and each could find in theſe very acts, arguments to combat the claims of her adverſaries.

Mary reſted upon her father's will. But ſhe received, in her opinion, a much ſtronger ſupport, though ſhe durſt not openly allege it, from her natural right and the want of authority in thoſe who annulled her mother's marriage. On the other hand, it might be objected to her, that having been declared illegitimate by an act of parliament, that act was never repealed, and it was not in the king's power to place baſtards on the throne, in excluſion of the lawful heirs. That beſides, it was known to the whole nation, that the parliament was far from being free when ſhe was placed in the ſucceſſion after Edward; but, however, this act ought to have been preceded by an expreſs repeal of that whereby ſhe was declared incapable of ſucceeding.

The ſame thing could be alleged againſt Elizabeth. But ſhe might anſwer, that her mother's divorce was grounded only upon a clauſe which was afterwards declared inſufficient, and that by the act of the year 1540 ſhe was reſtored to her rights. Conſequently it was to her the crown was devolved, if her ſiſter Mary was incapable of ſucceeding.

The queen of Scotland could plead the illegitimation of Mary and Elizabeth, and affirm, it was her right to aſcend the throne of England, as grand-daughter to Henry VIII's eldeſt ſiſter. As to the objection of her being born out of the land, it was a groundleſs cavil, ſince the princes of the blood in England are never deemed foreigners, though born out of the kingdom.

Jane Grey had for her right Edward's aſſignment, approved by all the counſellors and the judges of the realm. But it muſt be confeſſed, it was a very ill-grounded right. Herein it is certain, the king, the council, and the judges, had undertaken what exceeded the bounds of their power. Beſides, the duke of Northumberland was known to hold the council in ſubjection, and it would have been eaſy to prove the judges were forced to draw and ſign the inſtrument.

Had this affair been to be decided by the law and impartial judges, many difficulties would doubtleſs have occurred. On the other hand, if each of the four princeſſes who might have pretended to the crown, would have maintained her right, and had been ſtrong enough to ſupport her pretenſions, to what calamities would the kingdom have been expoſed? But the affair took another turn, becauſe Elizabeth and the queen of Scotland endeavoured not to poſſeſs the crown. So Mary and Jane were the only competitors. This was very advantageous to Mary, becauſe her right was thereby put in the balance with only Jane's, the weakeſt of all. Undoubtedly this is what induced all the hiſtorians to declare for Mary's right, becauſe they compared it only with that of her rival. But if Elizabeth and the queen of Scotland had been each ſupported with a good army, perhaps all the advantage would not have been ſo readily given to Mary. Having thus ſeen the grounds of the quarrel, let us now proceed to the deciſion.

The duke of Northumberland took great care to conceal Edward's death, becauſe he expected Mary would come and throw herſelf into his hands. It muſt be confeſſed, this miniſter, though very politic, committed a very groſs error in neglecting to ſecure Mary and Elizabeth, immediately after Edward had ſigned the conveyance to Jane Grey. He might have eaſily effected it whilſt the king was alive. But, inſtead of ſuddenly taking ſo neceſſary a precaution, he expected they would come of their own accord into the ſnare he had laid for them, by cauſing them to be ſent for to keep their brother company in his ſickneſs. Mary had like to have been entrapped. She was within half a day's journey of London [a], when ſhe had notice from the earl of Arundel of the king's death, the aſſignment of the ſucceſſion, and the deſign upon her perſon. This news obliging her to take other meaſures, ſhe immediately turned back, and went to Kenning-hall in Norfolk. From thence ſhe wrote a letter to the council [b], which plainly diſcovered ſhe was informed of what they intended to conceal from her. She told the counſellors, ſhe thought it very ſtrange that the king, her brother, being three days dead, ſhe had not been advertiſed of it by them, ſince they could not be ignorant of her juſt right to the crown. That their neglect on this occaſion was a plain intimation of ſome ill deſign againſt her; but that ſhe was ready to take all in good part, and to pardon thoſe who would have recourſe to her clemency. That, in the mean while, ſhe required them to proclaim her queen. After writing this letter ſhe departed from Kenning-hall, and repaired to the caſtle of Framlingham, in Suffolk. Two reaſons induced her to retire to this place: The firſt, that the duke of Northumberland was much hated in thoſe parts, ever ſince the great ſlaughter he had made of the rebels who had taken up arms under Ket. The ſecond, that the caſtle of Framlingham being near the ſea, ſhe might, if the ill ſucceſs of her affairs ſhould oblige her to it, have an opportunity to fly with more eaſe into Flanders. Upon her arrival at this place, ſhe took the title of queen; and, being proclaimed at Norwich, ſent a circular letter to all the nobility, requiring them to come and aid her in maintaining her right. Let us now ſee what paſſed at London.

It has been obſerved in the foregoing reign, that the duke of Northumberland was become ſo abſolute in the council, that not one of the counſellors dared to oppoſe his will. Edward's death ſeemed likely to free them from this ſervitude. But, as probably the duke would have more authority under his daughter-in-law, Jane, than under Edward, every one dreaded to make him an enemy. It is not therefore to the council ſo much as to the duke of Northumberland, by whom the board was directed in all their reſolutions, that whatever was done in favour of Jane after Edward's death is to be aſcribed. This miniſter ſoon found it impoſſible to conceal long the king's death. Two days after, the news of it was public in London. Beſides, Mary's retreat plainly ſhewed how fruitleſs were the pains that were taken on that account. So the duke, thinking it no longer proper to hide his deſigns, cauſed himſelf to be ſent with the duke of Suffolk to give Jane notice of her deſtination to the throne [c], by virtue of Edward's letters-patents. Jane was then but in her ſixteenth year. But at that age, wherein the judgment hardly begins to be formed, her's had acquired ſuch a degree of perfection, as is rarely found in one ſo very young. All the hiſtorians agree, the ſolidity of her mind, joined to a continual application to ſtudy, rendered her the wonder of her age. She underſtood perfectly French, Latin, and Greek; and made uſe of theſe languages as helps to attain to the higheſt knowledge in the ſciences [d]. Herein ſhe was very like her couſin, king Edward, who had a tender friendſhip for her, as on her part ſhe had a great eſteem for him. She appeared much moved at his death, which however ſhe muſt have expected, ſince his recovery had been now ſome time deſpaired of. But, as ſhe knew not that his death was to procure her the crown, ſhe was extremely ſurpriſed at the news which her father and the duke of Northumberland told her. Inſtead of receiving it with joy, as they doubtleſs expected, ſhe told them, ſhe did not mean to enrich herſelf by the ſpoils of others; that the crown belonged to the princeſs Mary, and after her, to the princeſs Elizabeth; and that being acquainted as ſhe was with king Henry's will, ſhe was unwilling to aſpire to the throne before her turn. Againſt theſe reaſons were urged king Edward's and the council's authority, with the approbation of the judges; and it was endeavoured to convince her, that this unanimity was a clear evidence there was nothing in it contrary to the laws of the land. She found herſelf moved by theſe arguments, and the importunities of Guildford Dudley, her huſband, prevailed with her at length to receive the offered crown. It was however in ſuch a manner, as convinced the two dukes, that ſhe did it not ſo much from a perſuaſion of the juſtice of her title, as out of compliance and for want of reſolution. Accordingly the duke of Northumberland declared in his report to the council, that ſo far was Jane from aſpiring to the crown, ſhe was rather by enticement and force made to accept it.

She anſwered, the paſtimes in the park were but a ſhadow to the delight ſhe had in reading Plato's Phaedon, which then lay open before her. Ibid. As ſoon as the duke of Northumberland had obtained Jane's conſent, it was reſolved that the council ſhould withdraw to the Tower with her [e], and ſhe be proclaimed. This reſolution being taken, the lord mayor of London was ſent for, and being informed of the king's death, and of the ſettlement in favour of queen Jane, the ceremony of the proclaiming was fixed to the next day, the 10th of July, and the 5th after Edward's death. Mean while the council wrote an anſwer to Mary's letter, ſigned by twenty-one counſellors [f] to this effect, "That Mary could not pretend to the crown, ſince ſhe was born of an unlawful marriage, diſſolved by a legal ſentence, confirmed by more than one parliament; that ſhe ought to give over her pretenſions, and acknowledge queen Jane for her ſovereign, who was now on the throne by virtue of the late king's letters patents: that if ſhe ſhewed herſelf obedient, ſhe ſhould find the counſellors all ready to do her any ſervice, conſiſtent with their duty to qneen Jane."

Jane was proclaimed in London with the uſual formalities. But there were none of the acclamations cuſtomary on ſuch occaſions; ſo aſtoniſhed were the people to ſee a queen proclaimed they had never thought of. Beſides, as the duke of Northumberland was very much hated, and as Jane was his daughter-in-law, when ſhe was heard to be proclaimed queen, the duke was imagined to be proclaimed chief governor, which was by no means pleaſing to the people. Nay, an accident happened on this occaſion, which was very ominous, and confirmed the Londoners in their prejudice againſt the duke of Northumberland. A vintner's boy [g] having ſome way expreſſed his ſcorn at the proclamation, was immediately ordered to be ſet in the pillory, with his ears cut off, and nailed to it; which was accordingly done. This proceeding, the odium whereof was caſt upon the duke, made it judged what was to be expected from his government, ſince this new reign began with an act of ſeverity.

The duke of Northumberland took care not to omit the cuſtom long ſince introduced, that the new ſovereigns ſhould withdraw to the Tower with the council, in the beginning of their reign. He could not doubt, Mary would pretend to the crown, and uſe all poſſible endeavours to take poſſeſſion, neither was he ignorant how the nobles and people ſtood affected with regard to the ſituation the ſtate was then in. For this reaſon, he was very glad to have the counſellors in the Tower, in order to be maſter, and cauſe them to come to reſolutions agreeable to his intereſts. As the change, which ſhortly after happened, proceeded from the diſpoſition of the ſeveral members of the ſtate, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to have a diſtinct notion how they ſtood inclined, in order to underſtand the cauſes of the revolution.

The council conſiſted of one and twenty counſellors, among whom there were few real friends of the duke of Northumberland; but every one feared him. Some, as the earl of Arundel, ſtill adhered to the Romiſh religion, though outwardly they complied with the new laws. Others, as the archbiſhop of Canterbury, were truly proteſtants. But the major part, without being really addicted to any religion, blindly followed that which was uppermoſt. As they had readily embraced that of Henry VIII. they had with the ſame eaſe followed that eſtabliſhed by Edward, being ready to reſume the Romiſh religion if it ſuited beſt with their temporal intereſt. This was particularly the duke of Northumberland's character. So, though he profeſſed the reformed religion, the proteſtants themſelves had a very ill opinion of him. They were perſuaded his pretended zeal for the advancement of the reformation was all grimace, and the pure effect of his policy. This diſpoſition of the counſellors manifeſtly ſhews, that a religious zeal alone was not capable of keeping them in Jane's intereſts. There was need of a much ſtronger motive to that end. But inſtead thereof, there was a reaſon which entirely diſengaged them from her party, namely, the ſlaviſh ſubjection they were held in by the duke of Northumberland. That lord, whoſe pride was intolerable, could not bear contradiction. The council ſeemed to have nothing to do, but to follow his directions without examination. Then, he was one of thoſe unreaſonable perſons, with whom, if you fail on a ſingle occaſion, all paſt ſervices are cancelled. This the earl of Arundel in particular had ſadly experienced. Though he had been very ſerviceable to the duke in ruining Somerſet, yet afterwards, becauſe he did not find him ſubmiſſive enough, he cauſed him to be condemned in a heavy fine, under colour of his having waſted the king's treaſure. This uſage was ſtill remembered by the earl, who only waited an opportunity to be revenged. The reſt of the counſellors were no leſs deſirous to free themſelves from the duke's yoke. But they were as priſoners in the Tower, where they apprehended the leaſt falſe ſtep would coſt them their life, before the quarrel between Jane and Mary was decided. And therefore, they approved of whatever the duke pleaſed to order, and the reſolutions tending to eſtabliſh Jane on the throne, were made in the council's name, though the duke alone was the author.

The reſt of the nobility, who had no ſhare in the government, where in much the ſame ſentiments with the counſellors. Whilſt the duke of Somerſet was protector, he was hated by the nobility, as appeared in the former reign. And therefore, they aſſiſted to the utmoſt the earl of Warwick to ruin him. But when that was done, they ſoon perceived they were no gainers by the change, ſince it gave them a much prouder and more formidable maſter than the perſon they were freed from. The new miniſter treated them afterwards with ſo much haughtineſs, that they had reaſon to regret the duke of Somerſet. Conſequently they earneſtly deſired to ſee him ruined, which they could not expect whilſt his daughter-in-law ſhould be on the throne. This made them incline to Mary, though that princeſs was little beloved in the kingdom.

The duke of Northumberland had been the principal author of Somerſet's fall, who was the people's idol. This was ſufficient to render him odious. Beſides he was counted a hard and cruel man, whoſe counſels always leaned to the ſide of ſeverity. After he had diſperſed the Norfolk rebels in the late reign, he cauſed ſo many to be executed, that he drew upon him the hatred of the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. This hatred afterwards ſpread itſelf over the kingdom, when he came to be at the head of affairs. Wherefore, all the people in general wiſhed to be freed from this odious miniſter, and that could be only by the ruin of Jane's party. The Londoners in particular hated him mortally, becauſe they believed him guilty of king Edward's death.

Let us now conſider the Engliſh nation in reſpect to the two religions. Jane openly profeſſed the proteſtant religion, and ſhewed, ſhe was entirely convinced of the truth of its doctrines. Mary, on the contrary, was extremely addicted to the Romiſh church, and though, during Edward's reign, ſhe had pretended to adhere to the religion eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII. it was known to be only with deſign to ſilence thoſe who governed during her brother's minority. She was not only thought devoted to the pope, but alſo a favourer of the moſt abſurd doctrines of the Romiſh religion. It may eaſily be gueſſed, that all who were ſtill for the old religion in their hearts, paſſionately wiſhed that this princeſs might aſcend the throne. This was the only way they could hope to ſee their religion reſtored; whereas, if Jane reigned, they could expect only the continuance of the meaſures taken to aboliſh it. The duke of Northumberland, who probably was to be Jane's prime miniſter, had even appeared zealous for the reformation. So, to judge of him by his paſt conduct, the friends of the old religion could hope for no advantage from him. Some who knew him better than the reſt, were however ſenſible he was far from being a good proteſtant. But they knew alſo, though he might have favourable thoughts of their religion, they could expect nothing from him but what was agreeable to his temporal intereſt, and that this intereſt would naturally hold him attached to the proteſtant party. So the Roman catholics were all for Mary, and ready to lend their aſſiſtance to place her on the throne.

The better to underſtand the diſpoſition of the reformed at this time, it muſt be obſerved, that to conſider England in general, it may be ſaid, ſhe was wholly proteſtant. Hardly was there a man but what had ſubmitted, at leaſt outwardly, to the laws made for that purpoſe in the reign of Edward. But among the great numbers which were looked upon as proteſtants, there were many who were ſo only in name. Some ſtill halted between the two religions. Others were papiſts in their hearts; and very many regarding only temporal advantages, had embraced the reformation to make their fortunes. The ſmalleſt number was of thoſe, who truly convinced of the tenets of the new religion, were ready to ſacrifice their all for its ſake. None but theſe therefore were real friends to Jane. As for the others, there were many who wiſhed indeed the reformation might prevail, and conſidered Mary's acceſſion to the throne as a misfortune, but were unwilling to hazard their lives and fortunes to prevent it. However, there was one thing wherein all the reformed, as well the zealous as the lukewarm and timerous, were agreed, namely, in their hatred of the duke of Northumberland, and their dread of falling again under his tyrannical government. Theſe two paſſions cauſed them to look upon Jane's reign as a misfortune to them and the kingdom. They were the more confirmed in this opinion, as, not foreſeeing what was to happen in Mary's reign, they flattered themſelves, that, content with the private exerciſe of her own religion, ſhe would leave the proteſtant in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it, or at moſt would be ſatisfied with giving her party liberty of conſcience; and this was what her friends every where, and on all occaſions, took great care to inſinuate. So Jane's cauſe was like to be but ill ſupported, eſpecially as Mary having no other rival, the Engliſh did not believe they ought, through a principal of religion, to depart from the rules of juſtice and equity, by depriving her of the crown, who had the beſt title. If their poſterity have not continued in the ſame opinion, it is to be wholly aſcribed to the cruelties exerciſed upon the proteſtants, wherever the Romiſh religion prevails.

It is certain, though Mary had for her all the well-wiſhers to the old religion, that party would not have been able to place her on the throne, if the people's hatred of the duke of Northumberland had not determined the proteſtants themſelves to declare for her. Moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians take great pains to prove the juſtice of Mary's title, to infer from thence that the proteſtants preferred right to their own intereſt. I will not deny that ſeveral acted from that principle. But very probably the dread of falling again under the government of the duke of Northumberland, helped Mary to more friends than the juſtice of her title, eſpecially as this title was not ſo clear but that it was liable to many objections. However, Mary being proclaimed at Norwich, the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk declared for her, and furniſhed her with troops. The men of Suffolk, though ſtrongly attached to the reformation, ſignalized themſelves on this occaſion. It is true, they deſired to know of her, whether ſhe would leave religion in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it; which ſhe poſitively promiſed, reſerving to herſelf however the liberty of profeſſing her own religion. Upon theſe aſſurances, they reſolved to hazard their lives and eſtates in her quarrel. Many lords and gentlemen came alſo to Framlingham to offer their ſervice; and the earls of Bath and Suſſex, the ſons of the lord Wharton and Mordant [h], with many more [i], raiſed forces for her.

Mean time the council was drawing inſtructions for Richard Shelley, who was to go and inform the emperor of what paſſed in England. It was believed there was moſt danger from that quarter. Shelley went indeed [k], but the emperor would neither give him audience, nor receive Jane's letter, to notify her acceſſion to the crown, and to deſire his friendſhip.

Mean while the council received advices from all ſides that Mary's party gathered ſtrength; that ſhe had been proclaimed in ſeveral places; and had an army already, which daily encreaſed. Theſe advices, which flowed in very faſt, obliged the miniſters to raiſe forces to ſend againſt Mary's. Immediate orders were given to thoſe that were ready, to meet at Newmarket, with whom were joined ſome regiments levied in haſte at London. At the ſame time they ſent ſir Edward Haſtings, the earl of Huntington's brother, to raiſe Buckinghamſhire, and the earl of Northampton undertook alſo to raiſe Herefordſhire. The duke of Suffolk was appointed to command the army, becauſe the duke of Northumberland was unwilling to go away, for fear his abſence ſhould produce ill effects. But the earl of Arundel, who wiſhed for an opportunity to act for Mary, ſeeing the duke of Northumberland's preſence was an inſuperable obſtacle to the execution of his deſigns, found means to break his meaſures. He intimated to Jane, that the duke her father would be expoſed to great danger; that it would be more proper for the duke of Northumberland to head the army, and for the duke her father to ſtay with her. On the other hand he inſinuated, or cauſed it to be inſinuated, to the duke of Northumberland, that it would be very dangerous to put the army under the duke of Suffolk's command, who had never been very fortunate in his expeditions: that on ſuch an important occaſion, he ought inſtantly to head the troops himſelf, and that his name alone was capable of ſtriking terror into thoſe aſſembled by Mary, in a country where he had given ſingular proofs of his conduct and valour. Jane's tender affection for the duke her father cauſed her ſo ardently to embrace this advice, that all the duke of Northumberland's endeavours to make her alter her mind were ineffectual.

At ſo critical a juncture, the duke of Northumberland was much diſtracted in his mind. Indeed, he knew he was much fitter than the duke of Suffolk to command the army againſt Mary, and was very ſenſible all dpended upon it. But then he was afraid to leave the young queen in the hands of the council, of whom he was not well aſſured, and who complied with him purely out of fear: and the more, as the duke of Suffolk, the queen's father, was reckoned but a weak man. However, as it was not entirely in his choice to accept or refuſe the command, and beſides, all depended upon the ſucceſs againſt Mary's army, he reſolved to march. He left London on the 14th of July, without being wiſhed ſucceſs (as is uſual on ſuch occaſions) by the great crowds looking on as he paſſed, and went and headed ſix thouſand men aſſembled at Newmarket [l].

Though moſt of the counſellors had no great inclination to favour the duke of Northumberland's deſigns, they were obliged however to uſe great caution. They ſaw themſelves as priſoners in the Tower, under the direction of the duke of Suffolk, who was concerned to prevent all proceedings againſt his daughter. It was neceſſary therefore to ſeem very zealous for Jane's intereſts till a favourable opportunity offered to declare for Mary. To this end they appointed Ridley, biſhop of London, to ſet out queen Jane's title in a ſermon at St. Paul's, and to warn the people of the dangers they would be expoſed to if Mary ſhould mount the throne. Ridley diſcharged his commiſſion [m] like one that was perſuaded the reformation would very much ſuffer under Mary's government: And therefore, he largely inſiſted upon Mary's attachment to the Romiſh religion; and informed the audience of ſome things which had paſſed between him and her, and which were plain indications of her averſion to the reformation and the reformed [n]. Mary never forgave him this ſermon, which at that juncture was capable of doing her great injury. For it was at a time when her friends were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the people ſhe was not ſo zealous for the Romiſh religion as ſhe was repreſented, and that ſhe would make no change in that which was eſtabliſhed by law. Sands, vice-chancellor of Cambridge, afterwards archbiſhop of York [o], in the reign of queen Elizabeth, having received the ſame orders from the duke of Northumberland, chancellor of that univerſity, managed it more artfully, and, by keeping to more general terms, gave no offence to either party.

Mean while the duke of Northumberland was extremely embarraſſed. He had marched to Cambridge with ſix thouſand men [p], and from thence was advanced to St. Edmundſbury. But, inſtead of ſeeing his army encreaſe by the way, as he expected, it daily diminiſhed by deſertions. On the other hand, he heard of Mary's progreſs in Norfolk and Suffolk; and, to complete his misfortunes, news was brought him that ſir Edward Haſtings [q], who was to have joined him with four thouſand men he had raiſed, had declared for Mary, and proclaimed her at Buckingham. In ſhort, he was informed likewiſe, that the ſix men of war ſent to cruize on the coaſt of Suffolk, to prevent Mary's eſcape, had followed the example of Haſtings. All theſe things made him reſolve to return to Cambridge, from whence he wrote to the council for a ſpeedy ſupply. But the counſellors were then otherwiſe employed.

The news they received from all parts, of the proſperous ſtate of Mary's affairs, had now determined ſome of them to provide for their ſafety, by changing ſides, whilſt their change might be of ſervice to them. In all appearance, the earl of Arundel had already laboured to take off ſome of his colleagues from Jane's party. The marquis of Wincheſter, who always went with the ſtream, was eaſily prevailed with. The earl of Pembroke had been one of the moſt zealous for Jane, becauſe his ſon had eſpouſed the new queen's younger ſiſter. But finding her affairs in an ill way, he reſolved, either of himſelf, or by the ſolicitations of the earl of Arundel, to ſcreen himſelf from the impending ſtorm, in doing Mary ſome ſignal ſervice[r]. Theſe three lords gained other counſellors, and they all reſolved to declare for Mary as ſoon as it was poſſible. The difficulty was to get out of the Tower, without giving ſuſpicion to the duke of Suffolk. Had the duke of Northumberland been preſent, they would have found it very hard to ſucceed; but the duke of Suffolk was far from having this penetration. The letter lately received from the duke of Northumberland furniſhed them with the wanted pretence. They repreſented to the duke of Suffolk, that the readieſt way to find the deſired ſupply, was to apply to the mayor of London, and to that end, it was proper the council ſhould meet ſomewhere in the city, the more eaſily to confer with the mayor, concerning the means of ſpeedily raiſing a body of troops: that the earl of Pembroke's houſe was convenient for that purpoſe, and there the affair would be forwarded more in two hours than in ſix in the Tower. But as it might be objected, that the mayor and aldermen could be eaſily ſent for to the Tower, they added, that at the ſame time audience might be given to the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, who ſcrupled to receive it in the Tower. Whether the duke of Suffolk did not ſuſpect them of any ill deſign, or at ſuch a juncture durſt not diſcover his ſuſpicions, he ſuffered the council to meet at the earl of Pembroke's [s], whom he did not miſtruſt, on the 19th of July.

As ſoon as they were met, the earl of Arundel made a ſpeech, repreſenting to them, that now or never was the time to ſhake off the tyranny of the duke of Northumberland; that they had ſufficiently experienced his inſolence, injuſtice, cruelty, treachery to his friends; and if, they were ſo unwiſe as to ſupport Jane on the throne, they would but render more heavy the yoke which the duke had already laid on their necks: that the only way was to declare for Mary; and when the people ſhould ſee the council take that courſe, the duke of Northumberland would be forſaken by all. The council's ſudden reſolution to follow the earl's advice, ſhews that the affair had been already determined among the principal members. After a ſhort debate, they ſent for the mayor and aldermen of London, and, declaring their reſolution, they went together and proclaimed Mary in ſeveral parts of the city. Then they repaired to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was ſung. The ready compliance of the magiſtrates of London can be aſcribed only to their hatred of the duke of Northumberland. Let it be affirmed ever ſo much, that theſe magiſtrates longed for the re-eſtabliſhment of the old religion, and therefore gladly embraced the opportunity to ſet Mary on the throne, it is not likely that men, placed in their offices in Edward's reign, ſhould be ſo well inclined to the old religion, as to come to ſo ſudden a reſolution with that view, if there had not been ſome other motive. However, as ſoon as they came from St. Paul's, the council ſent an order to the duke of Suffolk, to require him to deliver up the Tower, and that Jane ſhould lay down the title of queen, and give over her pretenſions. The duke immediately obeyed, ſeeing no poſſibility of keeping the Tower at ſuch a juncture. As for Jane, ſhe ſaw herſelf ſtript of her dignity (held but nine days) with more joy than ſhe had ſeen herſelf cloathed with it. Then the council diſpatched orders to the duke of Northumberland to diſband his army, and behave himſelf as became an obedient ſubject to queen Mary. At the ſame time the earl of Arundel and the lord Paget were ſent to inform Mary of theſe tranſactions.

The duke of Northumberland heard what paſſed at London, before he received the council's orders to diſmiſs his troops; and, plainly perceiving it would not be poſſible to keep his army together, prevented the orders, and obeyed beforehand. His firſt thoughts were to fly out of the kingdom; but, it is ſaid, he was hindered by the band of gentlemen penſioners, who plainly told him, they had need of his teſtimony to juſtify their conduct. After that, he thought only of gaining Mary's favour, by expreſſing a zeal for her ſervice, as if it had been poſſible to deceive her by ſome external actions. To that purpoſe he went to the market-place in Cambridge, and proclaimed the queen, flinging up his own hat for joy, and crying, God ſave queen Mary. But all this ſignified nothing. The next day [t] the earl of Arundel arreſted him by the queen's order. Then was that proud and haughty man ſeen to cringe as much as he had been exalted in his proſperity. He fell at the earl of Arundel's feet to beg his favour, and ſhewed many other ſigns of fear, abjectneſs, and puſilanimity. This is the common character of men whom fortune raiſes above their birth and merit. Three of his ſons, namely, the earl of Warwick, his eldeſt; Ambroſe and Henry; ſir Andrew Dudley, his brother; John and Henry Gates; ſir Thomas Palmer, and doctor Sands, were apprehended with him, and ſent to the Tower the 25th of July. Upon this occaſion, a woman, ſeeing the duke of Northumberland paſs to the Tower, ſhook at him a handkerchief, dipt in the duke of Somerſet's blood, upbraiding him with having cauſed it to be unjuſtly ſhed.

When the duke of Northumberland was in the Tower, Mary met with no more oppoſition. All Jane's adherent's ſtrove to atone for their fault by a ready ſubmiſſion and ſupplication of the new queen's mercy. She received very graciouſly thoſe who came to pay their duty to her, though ſhe was determined to ſacrifice to her ſafety or vengeance ſome of thoſe whom ſhe looked upon as her principal enemies. Of this number were Jane Grey, the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Northampton, Ridley, biſhop of London; Cheek, who had been Edward's preceptor; Robert Dudley, the duke of Northumberland's ſon; Guilford Dudley, Jane's huſband; Cholmley and Montague, judges. All theſe were ſent to [u], or detained in the Tower by the queen's expreſs order. But three days after, ſhe releaſed the duke of Suffolk, having pitched upon him for an inſtance of her clemency, becauſe ſhe thought him uncapable of creating her any diſturbance [w].

On the 3d of Auguſt ſhe came to London with her ſiſter Elizabeth, who had met her on the way with a thouſand horſe [x] ſhe had raiſed for her ſervice. When ſhe entered the Tower, ſhe releaſed the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, Bonner, the ducheſs of Somerſet, and the lord Courtney, eldeſt ſon of the marquis of Exeter, whom ſhe ſhortly after created earl of Devonſhire. Thus, without any effuſion of blood, ſhe was peaceably ſettled in the throne, notwithſtanding the attempts to deprive her of it. She owed this good ſucceſs to the univerſal hatred of the duke of Northumberland; for, it may be truly affirmed, that as Jane Grey without that lord would never have borne the title of queen, ſo without him ſhe would doubtleſs have preſerved it. Very probably, the reſtoring of religion to the ſtate it was in before the alterations introduced by the two laſt kings, and perhaps the being revenged of her enemies, were the principal things intended by Mary when ſhe aſcended the throne. At leaſt, we ſhall ſee no other project in the courſe of her reign.

As the new queen had nothing in her thoughts but the eſtabliſhing of her religion, her firſt care was to conſult her truſty friends how to effect it. She was herſelf diſpoſed to keep no meaſures, but to force the kingdom to return immediately to what ſhe called, the Union of the Catholic Church. To that end, ſhe had now determined to ſend for cardinal Pool as legate, to reconcile England to the pope. But Gardiner, who was conſidered as a man of great experience, was of another opinon. He knew the reformation muſt be pulled down the ſame way it was ſet up, that is, by degrees, and therefore it was ſufficient at firſt to bring back religion to what it was at king's Henry's death. This advice was more prudent, and withal more ſuitable to the intereſts of the perſon who gave it. He was ſenſible the queen had a great eſteem and affection for Pool, and was afraid the cardinal, being in England, would diſpoſſeſs him of the chief place in the queen's favour; nay, quite ruin him with her, becauſe he was not his friend. Mean while, as this advice was not reliſhed by the queen, it was in danger of being rejected, if Gardiner had not uſed other means to compaſs his ends. He ſent a meſſenger to the emperor to repreſent to him, that what the queen propoſed was too hazardous, and in caſe Pool came ſo ſoon into England, his zeal for the ſee of Rome would undo all, becauſe the Engliſh were not yet prepared to ſubmit to the papal yoke [y]. That, on the contrary, by his method every thing would ſucceed to the queen's ſatisfaction, and to the advantage of religion, provided the queen would be pleaſed to make him chancellor, and thereby give him the authority neceſſary to conduct ſo nice an affair. Probably, it was now the emperor projected the marriage between his ſon Philip, and Mary, either of himſelf or by Gardiner's ſuggeſtion. However, the emperor approving Gardiner's meaſures, wrote ſeveral letters to Mary, to perſuade her to moderate her zeal, leſt too much haſte ſhould ſpoil her deſigns. As ſhe had a great deference for his counſels, ſhe brought herſelf by degrees to comply with the biſhop's projects, to whom at length ſhe gave the great ſeal [z].

King Edward's funeral was ſolemnized at Weſtminſter the 18th of Auguſt. The new miniſters were for having the old aboliſhed office made uſe of on that occaſion; but Cranmer, ſupported by acts ſtill in force, ſtoutly oppoſed it, and officiated himſelf according to the new liturgy, giving the communion to as many as were deſirous to receive it [a]. But the queen had a ſolemn ſervice in her own chapel, performed with all the ceremonies of the church of Rome.

On the 12th, the queen in council declared ſhe would uſe no force upon conſcience in affairs of religion. Great care was taken to diſperſe this declaration, and to magnify it as a great inſtance of the queen's generoſity. But the proteſtants eaſily ſaw the difference betwixt her declarations in council, and her promiſes to the Suffolk-men. She had told theſe, that religion ſhould be left in the ſame ſtate as at Edward's death; but in the declaration, thought it ſufficient to give a general aſſurance, that the proteſtants ſhould not be forced to embrace the Romiſh religion; for this was the moſt natural meaning of her expreſſions. This reſtriction to her firſt promiſe greatly alarmed them.

The adherents of the Romiſh church were ſo confident of the queen's intention to reſtore their religion, that they made no difficulty of owning it publicly, and even inveighing againſt the proteſtant religion, though it had ſtill the countenance and protection of the laws. The day after the queen had made the declaration in her council [b], Bonner went to St. Paul's church, to hear a ſermon preached by his chaplain Bourn. The preacher ſpoke ſo honourably of Bonner, that he raiſed the indignation of his audience. Then, aggravating the pretended perſecutions ſuffered by this prelate in the late reign, he ſpoke of king Edward in ſo injurious terms [c], that the hearers loſt all patience. Some reproached, and others threw ſtones at him. One even threw a dagger, which he happily avoided, and which ſtuck faſt in the wood of his pulpit. At laſt the people grew ſo furious, that probably the preacher had been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent proteſtant miniſters, interpoſed, and conveyed him from the danger into a neighbouring houſe. What recompence this ſervice met with will hereafter appear.

The proteſtants ſtill hoped the queen would keep her word; and even gave the reſtriction, ſhe had added by her declaration in council to her firſt promiſe, a favourable interpretation. But they were not long left in this hope. Shortly after [d], the queen publiſhed a proclamation, which was but too capable to remove their miſtake. The terms were ſo artfully managed, that they implied much more than they ſeemed to expreſs. The queen ſaid, ſhe had the ſame belief in which ſhe had been educated from her infancy, and intended to adhere to it during her life. She paſſionately wiſhed all her ſubjects would follow her example, but would uſe no force, 'till public order ſhould be taken by common aſſent.' This plainly diſcovered her intention to change religion by the parliament, and that then ſhe ſhould think herſelf diſcharged from her promiſe of not compelling conſcience. Then ſhe forbid her ſubjects to give one another the odious names of Papiſt and Heretic. The proteſtants conſidered the prohibition as levelled entirely againſt them, becauſe they clearly underſtood, that a diſobedience to it would be puniſhed in them, but not in their adverſaries. After that, all ſorts of unlawful aſſemblies were forbid, and this article had the ſame conſtruction with the foregoing. By another clauſe of the proclamation, it was forbid to preach without her ſpecial licence. A man muſt have been wilfully blind, not to ſee this was intended to exclude the proteſtants out of all the pulpits. Finally, the queen ſaid, it was her intention no man ſhould be puniſhed for the laſt rebellion, 'without her order.' Hereby he left all his fears. The proclamation ended with ſaying, the queen was reſolved to puniſh rigorouſly all thoſe who ſhould foment pernicious deſigns; but ſhe hoped to have no cauſe to execute the ſeverity of the law. This clauſe naturally inſpired the proteſtants with terror, for it was eaſy to foreſee that religion and the laws were going to be changed; and that thoſe who ſubmitted not blindly to the new ſtatutes would be conſidered as rebels.

The ſame day the proclamation was publiſhed [e], came on the trial of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Warwick, ſir Andrew Dudley, ſir John and ſir Henry Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer. Upon the evidence of Palmer and ſir John Gates, king Edward had conſented to the execution of his uncle the duke of Somerſet, and they were become the principal confidents of the duke of Northumberland. The queen made the duke of Norfolk lord high ſteward at the trial of theſe three lords. He was ſtill under condemnation, ſince the act of attainder againſt him had not been reverſed. But the queen had granted him a pardon, which indeed was not diſpatched till eleven days after. It was thought without doubt that the queen's promiſe was ſufficient, otherwiſe it is not eaſy to conceive by what ſort of right a man under ſentence of death could preſide in a capital trial, or even give his vote [f].

The duke of Northumberland, being brought before his peers, deſired information upon two points before he anſwered to the articles exhibited againſt him. The firſt was, Whether a man, acting by order of council and the authority of the great ſeal, could be guilty of treaſon? The ſecond was, Whether perſons, who had acted with him in the ſame affair, and were equally guilty, could ſit as his judges? This doubtleſs related to the marquis of Wincheſter, and the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who were actually members of the council when Jane was proclaimed, and had given orders for her proclamation. After a ſhort conſultation, it was anſwered, that the great ſeal of an uſurper could give no authority nor indemnity to thoſe that acted by ſuch a warrant. To the ſecond point, he was anſwered, that none of the peers who ſat in judgment upon him, having been either condemned for, or even accuſed of the ſame crime, could be deprived of their right upon a bare ſurmiſe or report. It belongs to the lawyers to conſider whether theſe anſwers are very ſolid. It ſeems, as to the firſt, that if this maxim was admitted in its utmoſt extent, it would draw after it very dangerous conſequences. Let us, for inſtance, ſuppoſe an uſurper upon the throne of England, it is certain the adherents to the lawful king cannot avoid great danger, which way ſoever they turn. If they obey the uſurper, they will be guilty of treaſon when the lawful king is on the throne; if they refuſe obedience, they will be puniſhed by the uſurper. It ſeems, that the maxim, which allows that every ſubject ought to be faithful to the king on the throne who exerciſes the ſovereign power, is liable to fewer inconveniencies. As to the ſecond, let the peers inſiſt ever ſo much on their privileges, it is contrary to reaſon and equity, that accomplices of a crime ſhould ſit in judgment on him who committed it with them, when it is notoriouſly certain they were equally guilty. At leaſt it is unlikely this maxim ſhould be approved by the judges of the realm, if there was the leaſt room to believe the accomplices would vote for the accuſed, which might very eaſily happen.

The duke, ſeeing theſe two points determined againſt him, confeſſed himſelf guilty, and ſubmitted to the queen's mercy. The other two lords followed his example, and they were all three found guilty of high-treaſon. Of the ſeven condemned, three were deſtined to execution; the duke of Northumberland, ſir John Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer. The biſhop of Worceſter [g] being ſent to the duke with the meſſage of death, he confeſſed to the biſhop, and declared he had always been a Roman catholic in his heart. He made the

The matter of this ſermon tended ſo much to the derogation and diſpraiſe of king Edward, and his words ſounded ſo evil in the ears of the hearers, that they proceeded to the extremities here related. ſame confeſſion on the ſcaffold; but it was ſtill doubted whether this was done in hopes of a pardon[h], or he had really diſſembled during the whole courſe of his life. It is pretended, that to engage him to this public declaration, he had been flattered with the hopes of his pardon, even though his head were laid on the block. He died unlamented, his paſt conduct having given no perſon whatever any cauſe to love him. His two companions were executed the ſame day, being the 22d of Auguſt.

The proclamation, lately publiſhed by the queen, concerning religion, plainly ſhewed in what ſpirit ſhe deſigned to rule. But, immediately after, there were more convincing proofs. The inhabitants of Suffolk, relying on the queen's promiſe, and having tranſgreſſed the prohibitions contained in the proclamation, the court ſent an order to the magiſtrates of that county to look ſtrictly to the execution of it, and rigorouſly puniſh the diſobedient. Upon this, the inhabitants, not believing the queen would break her word, after the great ſervice they had done her, ſent deputies to pray her to remember what ſhe had promiſed them with her own mouth. The petition was rejected with great haughtineſs, and thought the more offenſive, as it juſtly reproached the queen with failure of her word. They were anſwered, that ſubjects were not to controul the actions of their ſovereign; and Dobbe[i], one of their number, was ſet in the pillory for ſpeaking more freely than the reſt.

A few days after, Bradford, one of the two miniſters who had reſcued Bourn, was ſent to priſon; and Rogers, his companion, confined to his houſe. Afterwards he was alſo thrown into priſon. The great changes meditated by the miniſters, made them afraid of meeting with obſtacles from thoſe who had moſt credit with the people, and therefore they were glad on divers pretences to ſecure them. Theſe proceedings made the proteſtants think they were going to be expoſed to a terrible ſtorm.

At the ſame time, all the biſhops, deprived in the reign of Edward, were reſtored by commiſſioners appointed by the queen to examine the cauſes of their deprivation. Five Roman catholic biſhops, Bonner, Gardiner, Tunſtal, Day, and Heath, were ſubſtituted in the room of five reformed[k]. Gardiner was made chancellor at the ſame time, and, a few days after, a commiſſion was given him by the queen, empowering him ſingly to grant licences to preachers, in conſequence of what ſhe had before enjoined by her proclamation. Some eccleſiaſtical proteſtants, not thinking proper to ſubmit to the order, were ſent to priſon. Hooper, biſhop of Gloceſter; Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's; and Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter; were of this number. The two firſt were impriſoned, the laſt commanded not to ſtir out of his houſe without leave.

After the Roman catholics plainly ſaw the queen's intentions, they had not patience to wait for the reſtoration of their religion by public authority, but boldly celebrated divine ſervice in ſeveral places, according to the old rites before the reformation; and though this was againſt law, the court connived at it, and ſilently approved it.

At the ſame time, the partiality of the queen and her miniſters appeared evidently in favour of the Roman catholics, againſt the proteſtants. Judge Hales, who had alone refuſed to ſign the inſtrument which transferred the crown to Jane Grey, was thrown into the Marſhalſea, for charging the juſtices of Kent to conform to the laws of Edward, not yet repealed, or rather for being a proteſtant[l]. For the ſame reaſon, Montague, who had been forced to aſſiſt in drawing the fore-mentioned inſtrument, was turned out of his office, fined in a thouſand pounds, and ſucceeded by Bromley, who had drawn and ſigned it without ſcruple.

In fine, ſince the ſhort time the queen had been on the throne, proteſtants were every where injured and oppreſſed, the magiſtrates not venturing or caring to protect them. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity in Oxford, finding himſelf expoſed to the inſults of the enemies of his religion, was obliged at laſt to leave the place, and retire to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Cranmer, whoſe ruin was reſolved, was little able to protect him. Mean time Bonner launched out into invectives and railleries againſt Mr. Canterbury, as he was pleaſed to call him, and publiſhed every where, that he was ſo reſigned to the queen, that he had promiſed her a ſolemn abjuration of his errors. Cranmer refuted this calumny in a writing. He called the queen herſelf to witneſs, that he had never made her any ſuch promiſe, and offered to maintain publicly the truth of what he profeſſed, if the queen would grant him leave. The writing being publiſhed, Cranmer was called before the Star-chamber. He owned himſelf the author, though it was publiſhed without his conſent; and, contrary to all men's expectation, was diſmiſſed without any puniſhment. But the queen was not ſatisfied, though ſhe was adviſed to treat Cranmer with the ſame moderation he himſelf had uſed whilſt he was in authority. The queen herſelf owed her life to him, which was ſaved merely by his ſolicitation, when her father, Henry VIII. had deſigned to put her to death[m]. To this it was oppoſed, that if the queen treated with mildneſs the chief of the heretics, they would all grow obſtinate and inſolent, but the puniſhment of Cranmer would intimidate the champions of hereſy. This advice was very agreeable to the queen, who had conceived a mortal averſion to the archbiſhop, by reaſon of the ſentence of divorce pronounced by him againſt the queen, her mother; this injury making a ſtronger impreſſion upon her, than the ſervice received from him afterwards. So, three days after, Cranmer, being cited before the council, was ſent to the Tower on an accuſation of treaſon, and of publiſhing ſeditious libels. Old Latimer, who had been biſhop of Worceſter in the reign of Henry VIII. had been ſent thither the day before.

Shortly after, the court came to a reſolution of ſending away all foreigners that were come on the public faith and encouragement. Peter Martyr, and a Poliſh profeſſor, named John a Laſco, were included in the number[n]. This was the only act of mildneſs and equity ſhewn in this reign with reference to religion. But this ſufficiently diſcovered what was intended againſt the Engliſh proteſtants. The court's daily proceedings, before the repeal of any one law, ſo intimidated thoſe who had religion at heart, that great numbers, paſſing for Frenchmen, withdrew out of England into foreign countries[o]. Thoſe who made haſte to eſcape the impending ſtorm were wiſeſt and happieſt. For, ſoon after, others, who had taken the ſame reſolution, were arreſted by an order ſent to all the ports, to ſuffer no perſon to leave the kingdom as a Frenchman, without a paſſport from the embaſſador of France.

It was time now for the queen to reward thoſe who had done her ſervice. The earl of Arundel was made lord ſteward, ſir Edward Haſtings a peer of the realm, and ſome others, who had early declared for the queen, had employs and dignities conferred on them[p]. But the earl of Suſſex[q], who had been her general, obtained an honour unuſual in England, namely, to be covered in the preſence of the queen, as it is practiſed in Spain. He had his letters patents, under the great ſeal, the 2d of October.

As the parliament had been ſummoned to meet the 5th of October, it was neceſſary for the queen to be crowned before. The ceremony of the coronation was performed the 1ſt of that month, with the uſual ſolemnity, by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who forgot not one formality practiſed before the reformation. The ſame day a general pardon was publiſhed, [h] Some ſay, that having a promiſe, and being put in hope of pardon, even though his head were upon the block, if he would recant and hear maſs, he conſented thereto, and denied in words that true religion which he had before profeſſed. Fox, tom. III. p. 16. He went to maſs in the Tower, and received the ſacrament after the popiſh manner. He begged his life with all poſſible meanneſs, "That he might do penance all the days of his life, if it were in a mouſe-hole." Gardiner interceded for him; but the emperor, being afraid he ſhould hinder the intended marriage between Philip and Mary, had him put out of the way. Burnet, tom. III. p. 222. Hales was firſt put into the Marſhalſea, thence removed to the Compter, and after that to the Fleet; where he was ſo diſordered at the report of the cruelties which the warden told him were contriving againſt thoſe who would not change their religion, that it turned his brain, and he endeavoured to kill himſelf with a penknife. The preſent baron aſſerted this ancient right of his family in the reigns of the late and preſent king.

but with ſo many exceptions, that few perſons could receive any benefit from it. All thoſe who had been arreſted before September were excepted by name[r].

Then came out a proclamation[s], by which the queen diſcharged the ſubſidies granted by the laſt parliament to the king her brother, for the payment of his debts[t]. This was to gain the good will of the enſuing parliament, and render it ſubſervient to her deſigns with reſpect to religion. Before the parliament met[u], the archbiſhop of York was ſent to the Tower, on a general accuſation of ſeveral capital crimes. Six days before, John Veſey, ſome time biſhop of Exeter, but deprived in the laſt reign, was reſtored by an order of the queen. This was with intent to ſtrengthen the catholic cauſe in the upper houſe.

The court had reſolved to abrogate all the laws made in favour of the reformation, and to reſtore the ancient religion. This was not to be done without the concurrence of the parliament. But if elections had been left free, it would have been difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, for the queen to ſucceed in her deſign. The number of the reformed was without compariſon greater than that of the Roman catholics, and conſequently the elections would not probably be favourable to her. But beſides the ordinary ways made uſe of by kings to have parliaments at their devotion, all ſorts of artifices, frauds, and even violences, were practiſed in this. As care was taken beforehand to change the magiſtrates in the cities and counties, and there was hardly one but who was a catholic, or had promiſed to be ſo, every thing tending to the election of catholic repreſentatives was countenanced. On the contrary, thoſe who were ſuſpected of an inclination to chuſe proteſtants, were diſcouraged by menaces, actions, impriſonments, on the moſt frivolous pretences. In ſeveral places, things were carried with ſuch violence, that proteſtants were not allowed to aſſiſt in the aſſemblies where the elections were to be made. In ſhort, in places where it was not poſſible to uſe theſe direct means, by reaſon of the ſuperiority of the reformed, the ſheriffs, devoted to the court, made falſe returns. As the diſputes ariſing from ſuch elections can only be decided by the houſe of commons, it is eaſy to imagine, that a houſe compoſed of ſuch repreſentatives failed not to approve of the elections that were favourable to the court, and reject all the others that were in the leaſt conteſtable. This is one of the greateſt abuſes belonging to parliaments, and which is but too frequent whenever the kingdom is rent into factions. By theſe methods, the court ſecured a houſe of commons ready to comply with their ſuggeſtions, and whoſe members had an intereſt in the change of religion, or were indifferent to all religious eſtabliſhments.

As to the upper houſe, which cannot be thus modelled to the liking of the court, the queen probably laboured ſo ſucceſsfully to engage it in her intereſts, that ſhe found no oppoſition from the peers. It is very ſtrange, that the lords, who but a few months before were all proteſtants, and had in their whole body but ſeven or eight who oppoſed the laws made in Edward's reign in favour of the reformation, were become almoſt all zealous catholics in queen Mary's. I pretend not to decide in which reign they diſſembled their ſentiments; but it is too clear that, in the one or the other, they were guilty of a baſe and ſcandalous prevarication. Mean while, to make this houſe ſtill more compliant, the court took care beforehand to make changes amongſt the biſhops in favour of their deſigns. Beſides both the archbiſhops, and the biſhops of Gloceſter and Exeter, in actual impriſonment, ſix others had been changed, as has been obſerved. Probably all the reſt, excepting two, were for preferring their ſees to their religion. The two I except, were Taylor biſhop of Lincoln, and Harley of Hereford, who were even thruſt out of the houſe the firſt day for refuſing to kneel at the maſs. Such was queen Mary's firſt parliament, compoſed of a houſe of commons filled with the creatures of the court, and of a houſe of lords, who, through fear, avarice, or ambition, diſſembled their ſentiments, or, a few excepted, thought all religions alike. It is eaſy to foreſee what is to be expected from ſuch a parliament.

In the firſt ſeſſion, which laſted but eight days, care was taken that nothing ſhould be moved with regard to religion. The only public act was a declaration of treaſons and felonies, by which nothing was to be judged treaſon, but what was in the ſtatute of the 25th of Edward III. or felony, but what was ſo before the 1ſt of Henry VIII. This act ſeemed unneceſſary, ſince the like had been paſſed ſince Henry's death. But as ſome crimes, not contained in the ſtatute of Edward III. had been ſince declared felony, the intent of this was to aboliſh the late acts. It is true, this might have been attended with another inconvenience, namely, the diſcharge of ſeveral perſons then in priſon, had not an expreſs exception been made of all who were committed before the laſt of September, as they had been excepted out of the queen's general pardon.

By a private act, the attainder of the marchioneſs of Exeter, executed in the reign of Henry VIII. was reverſed, and her ſon the earl of Devonſhire reſtored to all his honours. Then the parliament was prorogued from the 21ſt to the 24th of October.

In the ſecond ſeſſion, the deſigns of the court were more open. The divorce of the queen's mother was immediately repealed. This act paſſed in fewer days than Henry had ſpent years in proſecuting the divorce[w]. In the preamble it was ſaid, "That the marriage of Henry with queen Catherine was not contrary to the law of God, and that man ought not to pat aſunder what God had joined: that king Henry's ſcruples had been ſuggeſted to him by malicious perſons, and ſupported by the deciſions of ſome univerſities, which had been previouſly ſecured by corruption and bribery: that Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had raſhly pronounced ſentence of divorce, upon the authority of thoſe deciſions and other groundleſs conjectures, and by a blameable preſumption had thought himſelf more knowing than all the other doctors." Upon theſe foundations, the parliament repealed the ſentence, and all the acts to confirm it. Gardiner, chief promoter of the act, muſt have been paſt all ſhame, to make the parliament talk thus of Henry's divorce, in which he was principally concerned, even before Cranmer was known to the court, which he had himſelf approved and adviſed, and at which he had aſſiſted as judge. But ſuch was the character of the man.

The princeſs Elizabeth being thus again declared illegitimate, by an act which reſtored Mary, found a great change in the behaviour of the queen, who no longer ſhewed her any affection. It is even pretended, that another ſecret cauſe alienated Mary from her, and that was, her love for the earl of Devonſhire, whom ſhe had ſome thoughts of marrying, but that the earl, too indiſcreetly perhaps, continued to pay his reſpects to Elizabeth.

The 31ſt of October, the lords ſent down to the commons a bill for repealing Edward's laws concerning religion, and ſix days after the commons ſent it back with their approbation. By the act it was ordained, that no other form of public worſhip ſhould be allowed from the 20th of December, but what had been uſed in the laſt year of Henry VIII. This ſhews Gardiner's influence on the parliament, ſince the act preciſely followed the plan he had propoſed.

Another act paſſed, decreeing the ſevereſt puniſhments againſt all who ſhould moleſt any preacher for his ſermons, or diſturb him in any part of the divine ſervice. The ſame puniſhments were ordained for thoſe who ſhould profane the ſacrament, or pull down croſſes, crucifixes, or images.

The commons at the ſame time ſent up another bill againſt thoſe who came not to church or the ſacraments, when the whole ſervice ſhould be ſet up. But the lords thought not proper to go ſo far at once.

Shortly after, the parliament revived an act of the laſt reign, forbidding any, to the number of twelve or more, to meet with deſign to change the eſtabliſhed religion, and declaring the offenders guilty of felony, that is, worthy of death. This act was directly contrary to that made by this very parliament, to repeal all new treaſons and felonies. But the pretence of religion covered all.

In this ſeſſion, the act of attainder againſt the duke of Norfolk in Henry's reign was reverſed, on pretence that all the neceſſary formalities were not obſerved[x].

Theſe were the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this firſt parliament, which, in a few days, overturned all that had been done with regard to religion in the reign of Edward VI.[y]

[x] By an act made during this ſeſſion, it was alſo ordained, That no perſon who is a ſheriff, ſhall at the ſame time exerciſe the office of juſtice of peace.

[y] This parliament granted the queen tonnage and poundage for life, upon the ſame foot as it was granted to king Edward VI.

King Henry's laws were not to be touched, becauſe they had difficulties, concerning which the pope was firſt to be conſulted.

The 3d of November [z], the parliament ſtill ſitting, Jane Grey, Gilford Dudley, her huſband, two other ſons of the duke of Northumberland [a], and Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, were brought to their trial. They all confeſſed their indictments, and received ſentence of death as traitors [b]. Cranmer's ſentence rendered him incapable of poſſeſſing any benefice, and conſequently his archbiſhopric was void in law. But two reaſons obliged the queen to diſpenſe with the ordinary forms, and leave Cranmer, though condemned, in poſſeſſion of his dignity. The firſt was, that intending to reſtore the clergy to all their privileges, ſhe was reſolved Cranmer ſhould be canonically degraded, but this could not be done till the laws of Henry VIII. were repealed. The ſecond was, that by a refinement of ſelf-love, ſhe was willing to pardon Cranmer his treaſon, to make the world believe ſhe proceeded againſt him from no motives of private revenge. But at the ſame time ſhe devoted him to death as a heretic, as ſoon as any laws ſhould be made upon that ſubject, as if ſhe only acted out of pure zeal for religion. Therefore at preſent the archbiſhop's revenues were only ſequeſtered, and himſelf detained in priſon till a proper time for his execution.

Since Mary's acceſſion to the throne, ſhe had appeared to be wholly employed in theſe public tranſactions. But at the ſame time, ſhe was forming ſecret deſigns which were not known till ripe for execution. The news of king Edward's death was no ſooner ſpread in the world, than the court of Rome conceived hopes of re-uniting England to the Holy See, and even began to project it. Cardinal Dandini, the pope's legate at Bruſſels, as of himſelf, ſent Commendone, afterwards cardinal, to ſound Mary's inclinations. Commendone, being unknown in England, eaſily concealed himſelf under a borrowed name, and, repairing to London, obtained a private audience of the queen [c]. This was ſoon after her coming to that city, ſince the envoy was preſent at the duke of Northumberland's execution, which was on the 22d of Auguſt. At this audience the queen told Commendone ſhe deſigned the reſtoration of the papal authority in England, and prayed him to intercede with the pope to ſend cardinal Pole as legate. But ſhe intimated to him, that the diſcovery of this ſecret would blaſt the deſign. The pope, communicating to the conſiſtory his intentions of ſending Pole into England, found at firſt great oppoſition. The cardinals feared to expoſe the honour of the Holy See, in ſending a legate without a ſolemn embaſſy from the queen. But the pope, telling them he knew more of the affair than he thought fit to communicate, they complied with his propoſal.

At the ſame time, the emperor was projecting a marriage for his ſon Philip with queen Mary. Gardiner was in the ſecret, whether it aroſe at firſt from him, or was only communicated to him by the emperor. However, this prelate neglected no endeavours to accompliſh it. The news of Pole's nomination to the legateſhip was equally diſagreeable to the emperor and Gardiner. Commendone had doubtleſs divulged at Rome queen Mary's queſtion to him, Whether Pole might not have a diſpenſation to marry? This occaſioned a belief, that it was her intention to make him her huſband. The emperor, being informed of this, and, apprehenſive that Pole's preſence might obſtruct the deſign he was meditating, reſolved to uſe his endeavours to prevent the legation, or at leaſt to retard it as long as poſſible. On the other hand, Gardiner could not, without the utmoſt concern, think of Pole's arrival, who might intercept his views upon the ſee of Canterbury, and perhaps the ſmiles of the queen herſelf. And indeed there was danger, that if the cardinal, who neither loved nor eſteemed him, ſhould inſinuate himſelf into the queen's favour (as it was very likely) he would uſe his credit to ruin him. He was therefore to find ſome expedient to keep him at a diſtance, and none was more natural than an inſinuation to the queen, that the cardinal's zeal for the Holy See would prejudice the affairs of religion in England: that the people were firſt to be managed and perſuaded to own the papal authority, to which they were extremely averſe; that beſides, Pole was not enemy enough to the proteſtants; and religion, in the preſent conjuncture, required to be conducted by other maxims than thoſe of that cardinal. The emperor, on the other ſide, believing it his intereſt to keep Pole where he was, wrote the ſame thing to the queen, and repreſented to her, that Pole would ruin her affairs, let her intentions be ever ſo good. In fine, he propoſed her marriage with his ſon, and ſupported his propoſal with all the reaſons moſt apt to perſuade her. Above all, he ſet forth the neceſſity of a foreign power in reſtoring religion in England, or at leaſt of an alliance capable to inſpire terror into thoſe who ſhould oppoſe her deſigns: that an alliance with the emperor and Spain was doubtleſs moſt advantageous, as France, being able to form projects in favour of the young queen of Scots, who was to marry the dauphin, was in intereſt concerned to raiſe and foment diſturbances in England. Mary was much pleaſed with the propoſal, which was probably made about the beginning of November. Beſides a zeal for religion, which might induce Gardiner to ſecond the emperor's deſigns, he ſaw a conſiderable advantage for himſelf, namely, the ſecuring his own credit, ſince Philip would be indebted to him for his marriage. Mean while, Pole was to be kept at a diſtance till the queen's marriage was concluded; and this the emperor did firſt by his own authority, in detaining him in his dominions [d]; but afterwards got the queen to ſend an expreſs to acquaint him that the intereſts of religion required a ſtop in his journey, becauſe the nation was not yet diſpoſed to own the papal authority.

While the legate was thus detained in Germany, or the Low-Countries, he tried ſeveral times to obtain leave to purſue his journey: but it was ſtill in vain. He knew not to whom this uſage was owing, and perhaps was never fully informed. However, he held a conſtant correſpondence, by letters, with the queen, on the affairs of religion; but his counſels were ſecretly oppoſed either by the emperor or Gardiner. It was his opinion, that, laying aſide all ceremony, the kingdom ſhould immediately be reconciled to the Holy See. Gardiner, on the contrary, believed the marriage ought to be concluded before the reconciliation was mentioned, that the conſideration of ſo powerful an alliance might awe thoſe who were inclined to ſtir. He thought Pole (and would have had others think him) a weak man, a ſhallow politician, and of little uſe in the cabinet. Pole, on the other hand, believed Gardiner a very improper perſon to direct the affairs of religion, becauſe, in his opinion, he relied too much on his intrigues and the arm of fleſh. Their little eſteem of each other ended at laſt in an open enmity.

The deſign of the queen's marriage was not conducted with ſufficient ſecrecy to keep it from the commons. They were ſo alarmed, that they ſent their ſpeaker, with twenty of their members, to pray the queen not to marry a foreigner. This convinced the queen ſhe could expect no more ſupplies from the commons, if ſhe refuſed to ſatisfy them in that point. But as ſhe had no ſuch intention, ſhe choſe to diſſolve the parliament [f]. Gardiner improved the juncture, to the obtaining conditions from the emperor, which he could not otherwiſe have expected. He repreſented to him, that the Engliſh were ſo averſe to the marriage, that the worſt was to be feared, unleſs he complied with two things abſolutely neceſſary. The firſt was, his conſent that the treaty of marriage ſhould contain terms ſo advantageous to England, as to ſilence the moſt zealous oppoſers. The ſecond was, his remitting conſiderable ſums to gain thoſe who would be wanted to curb the people, or who could moſt eaſily induce them to rebel. The emperor, not doubting of Gardiner's zeal for his intereſts, approved the advice, and left it entirely to him to preſcribe the conditions of the marriage; and moreover, put into his hands twelve hundred thouſand crowns, to be diſpoſed of as he ſaw fit [g]. Theſe particulars were printed in a little book, in form of a petition to the queen, by the Engliſh exiles at Straſburg. The author added farther, that Gardiner denied common

If the queen did in earneſt forgive him the treaſon, it might be owing to this appeal; that is, if ſhe forgave the treaſon in earneſt; for the taking away his life afterwards, leaves it a very diſputable point, whether this injury, added to the divorce of her mother, or his religion, wrought moſt powerfully on her reſentments. Theſe juſtice in the court of Chancery to thoſe perſons who would not engage to ſecond the queen's intentions.

Whilſt the parliament was aſſembled, the convocation held its ſeſſions according to cuſtom. It is not known whether any biſhops, conſecrated in the time of king Edward, appeared in the upper houſe. If any did, the number could be but ſmall, and of ſuch too, as the lords vouchſafed to receive into their houſe; that is, men who were not likely to oppoſe any meaſures. Care was taken to fill the lower houſe with perſons entirely devoted to the court; ſo that only ſix members [i] had the inclination or courage to oppoſe the deciſion made in favour of tranſubſtantiation [k]. Theſe ſix members demanded a regular diſputation on the ſubject, which was granted. But three of them declined the diſpute [l], well foreſeeing what would be the reſult. The other three ſtood their ground; ſo a diſputation was had [m]. But the Roman catholics, for want of better arguments, received thoſe of their adverſaries with hootings, reproaches, menaces, and continual interruptions, and then publiſhed that they were vanquiſhed. This at leaſt is the account given by the proteſtants [n].

[1554] In the beginning of the year 1554, a magnificent embaſſy arrived at London from the emperor, with the count of Egmont [o] at the had of it, to ſettle the articles of the marriage. The queen entruſted Gardiner with the management of the negotiation [p], or rather with the care of drawing the treaty, ſince probably every thing material was agreed before the arrival of the embaſſadors. That able politician had a double deſign. The firſt was, to have ſuch conditions inſerted in the treaty as the parliament might approve. The ſecond was, to exclude the Spaniards from having any ſhare in the government. The emperor complied with every thing, in the belief, no doubt, that his ſon would find ways to evade the obſervation of the articles, which ſhould reſtrain him too much. To be convinced that this was his thought [q], let it only be conſidered, that ſo able a politician as Charles would never have parted with twelve hundred thouſand crowns to procure for his ſon the empty title of king of England. For indeed the treaty, as will appear, promiſed him no more. In all probability, Gardiner had the ſame thoughts with the emperor. But the buſineſs was to dazzle the parliament with conditions advantageous to the nation; for whoſe intereſts, though he affected a great zeal, he was probably but little concerned for what might happen after his death. Mean while, he acquired a high reputation, the public aſcribing to his capacity and prudence the terms of the marriage, which ſeemed to ſecure England from all Philip's attempts. The principal articles of the treaty, which was ſigned the 12th of January 1554, a few days after the arrival of the embaſſadors, were theſe:

That Philip, in virtue of the marriage, ſhould jointly with queen Mary enjoy the title of king of England, while the marriage ſubſiſted, ſaving always the rights, laws, privileges, and cuſtoms, of the king of England. It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that the queen ſhould have the ſole diſpoſal of the revenues of the kingdom, the nomination to all employments, offices, and benefices, which ſhould be conferred on the natural ſubjects of her majeſty, and no others.

That the queen likewiſe ſhould bear the titles belonging to her huſband.

That her dowry ſhould be ſixty thouſand pounds of Flemiſh money, forty Gros each [r], of which forty thouſand ſhould be aſſigned to her upon Spain, and twenty thouſand upon Brabant, Flanders, Hainault, and Holland. That ſhe ſhould enjoy the dowry in the ſame manner it was enjoyed by Margaret, ſiſter of Edward VI. and wife of Charles, duke of Burgundy.

That the children born of this marriage ſhould inherit their mother's eſtate, according to the cuſtom of the reſpective countries.

With relation to the father's eſtate, it was agreed, that the archduke, Charles, ſon of Philip, ſhould ſucceed to the kingdoms of Spain, Naples, Sicily, the duchy of Milan, and all other properties and domains ſituate in Lombardy or Italy; but in default of Charles and his iſſue, the eldeſt ſon of Philip and Mary ſhould ſucceed to the ſame ſovereignties.

That the firſt-born of Philip and Mary ſhould inherit Burgundy and the Low Countries, from which the archduke, Charles, ſhould be excluded, as the children of Philip and Mary were excluded from Spain and Italy.

That the younger ſons and daughters of Mary and Philip ſhould have their appendages and portions aſſigned them in England, without prejudice, however, to what they might expect from Philip, their father, or Charles, their grandfather, in the Low Countries, or Burgundy.

That in caſe only daughters proceeded from this marriage, the eldeſt ſhould ſucceed to Burgundy and the Low-Countries; provided that, with the conſent of the Infante Don Charles, her brother, ſhe married a huſband out of theſe countries, or the dominions of the queen, her mother. That, on her refuſal or neglect to perform this covenant, prince Charles ſhould preſerve his right to the ſaid countries, with obligation, however, to aſſign a portion to his ſiſter, both out of Spain and the Low-Countries.

That if prince Charles died without iſſue, the eldeſt ſon or daughter of Philip and Mary ſhould ſucceed, as well to Spain and Italy, as the other dominions.

Laſtly, it was expreſly agreed, that, in all the forementioned caſes, thoſe children who ſhould ſucceed to either the paternal or maternal eſtates, ſhould leave them poſſeſſed of all laws, rights, privileges, and cuſtoms, belonging to the reſpective countries, and ſhould adminiſter the government by the natives of the ſaid countries.

A Clause annexed to the Treaty.

By this clauſe it was expreſly covenanted, that, before the conſummation of the marriage, Philip ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to the obſervation of the following articles:

That he would retain no domeſtic, who was not either an Engliſhman or ſubject to the queen, nor bring any foreigner into England to give uneaſineſs to the Engliſh. That if any of his retinue tranſgreſſed this article, he ſhould be puniſhed in ſuch a manner as ſhould be thought convenient.

That Philip would make no alteration in the laws, rights, ſtatutes, and cuſtoms of England.

That he would never take the queen out of her own dominions, unleſs at her own particular requeſt; nor carry out of England any of the children born of this marriage, without the conſent of the nobility.

That if the queen ſhould die firſt, without children, he would pretend to no right upon England, or its dependencies, but leave the ſucceſſion to the rightful heir.

That he would carry out of the kingdom no jewels, or other valuable things; nor alienate any thing belonging to the crown, or ſuffer any perſon whatſoever to ſeize them.

That England ſhould never, by virtue of this marriage, be concerned directly or indirectly in any war depending between France and Spain; but that the alliance between England and France ſhould ſubſiſt and remain in full force.

That he would not give any occaſion of rupture between France and England.

It would be very difficult to diſcover what advantages England could receive from this marriage, if the intereſt of the ſovereign and his miniſters were not commonly confounded with thoſe of the kingdom, though frequently very oppoſite. The court had in view the reſtoration of the Roman catholic religion in England, and therefore believed they wanted the aſſiſtance of Spain. On the other hand, this marriage was advantageous to the chancellor, who ſtrengthened his credit with Philip's protection. But at the ſame time England ran a great riſk of falling under the dominion of Philip, who probably meant not to be bound with chains of parchment.

The day after the treaty was ſigned [s], the queen granted a pardon to the marquis of Northampton, who had been condemned with the duke of Northumberland.

This

We have before ſeen, that about the end of the reign of Edward VI. the court had taken meaſures to prevent the company of the German merchants, called the Steel-yard, from engroſſing the whole woollen trade, in prejudice to the Engliſh, as till then had been practiſed. For this purpoſe the parliament had laid a heavy duty upon the goods, whether exported or imported by that company; and the act was renewed in Mary's firſt parliament. But the beginning of this year, the queen, to gratify the Hanſe-towns, ſuſpended the execution of theſe acts for three years, and diſcharged the company of German merchants from the payment of the extraordinary taxes impoſed upon them, all acts to the contrary notwithſtanding. This was the firſt effect of the queen's alliance with the emperor.

After the treaty of the queen's marriage with Philip was made public, complaints and murmurs were every where heard. The proteſtants in particular believed themſelves loſt, and feared to ſee erected in England a Spaniſh inquiſition. But they were not the only murmurers. Independently of religion, the greateſt part of the nation was not free from the fears of king Philip's introducing the Spaniſh tyranny into England; of which the Indies, the Low-Countries, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the duchy of Milan, afforded recent inſtances. In a word, few perſons could believe that the emperor had agreed to the articles ſtipulated in the treaty, with any deſign to obſerve them. At laſt, theſe murmurs grew into a conſpiracy againſt the queen, of which the marriage was either the cauſe or pretence. The duke of Suffolk, ſir Thomas Wyat [t], ſir Peter Carew, formed the deſign of a general inſurrection. Carew was to act in Cornwall, Wyat in Kent, and the duke of Suffolk in Warwickſhire, which is in the center of the kingdom.

Carew managed ſo ill, that his plot was diſcovered [u], and one of his accomplices arreſted, before he had concerted his affairs. This ſent him into France, and Wyat, upon his flight, haſtened the execution of his enterpriſe, though it was the deſign of the conſpirators to wait the arrival of Philip, for a more plauſible colour to their inſurrection. Wyat therefore, reſolving to puſh his point, though he was yet unprepared, went to Maidſtone with a few followers, and gave out, he took up arms to prevent England from being invaded. Afterwards he marched to Rocheſter, from whence he wrote to the ſheriff to deſire his aſſiſtance. But the ſheriff, inſtead of eſpouſing his cauſe, required him to lay down his arms, and aſſembled forces to oppoſe him.

This rebellion alarmed the court [w], where nothing was ready to allay it, the queen having diſmiſſed her forces, when ſhe thought herſelf out of danger. Wherefore ſhe ſent a herald to Wyat with a full pardon, if he would lay down his arms in twenty-four hours. But he refuſed the offer of pardon. Mean time, the court was ſo unprepared, that the duke of Norfolk was ſent with only ſix hundred of the city trained-bands [x], commanded by an officer named Bret. Whilſt this was doing, the ſheriff of Kent [y], as he was going to join the duke of Norfolk, met and defeated Knevet, who with ſome troops was marching to join Wyat, and killed ſixty of his men. This ill ſucceſs ſo alarmed Wyat, that he had now reſolved to conſult his own ſafety [z], when an unexpected accident inſpired him with freſh courage. Sir George Harper, one of Wyat's adherents, pretending to deſert him, went to the duke of Norfolk, and ſo artfully managed the trained-bands, that they took part with the rebels, and quitting the duke, joined Wyat [a].

With this reinforcement and his other troops, making together a body of four thouſand men, Wyat marched towards London [b]. He met near Deptford two meſſengers from the queen, who, in her name, aſked what would content him. He demanded the Tower and the queen's perſon to be put into his hands, and the council to be changed as he ſhould think proper. This demand being rejected, the queen repaired [c] to Guildhall, and acquainted the magiſtrates with Wyat's anſwer. She then ſpoke of her marriage, and told them ſhe had done nothing in it but by the advice of her council. And, to give them a proof of the confidence ſhe repoſed in them, ſhe reſolved to ſtay in the city, though many adviſed her to withdraw to the Tower [d].

Wyat in the mean time continued his march, and reached the borough of Southwark the 3d of February, expecting to enter the city without any difficulty. But the bridge being ſtrongly barricaded and guarded, he was obliged to march along the Thames to Kingſton [e], ten miles from London. Here he found the bridge broken, and ſpent ſome hours in repairing it. He then paſſed to the other ſide with his army, encreaſed now to near ſix thouſand men. After that, he continued his march to London; and, after ſome time loſt in repairing one of his broken carriages, reached Hyde-Park about nine in the morning, the 7th of February. The time, unſeaſonably ſpent in repairing the carriage, rendered his undertaking abortive. For, in that interval, Harper, who had been ſo ſerviceable in bringing over the trained-bands, deſerted, and poſting to court, diſcovered his intentions to march through Weſtminſter, and enter the city by Ludgate. This advice came ſeaſonably to the earl of Pembroke and lord Clinton, who, at the head of ſome troops, had reſolved to engage him as he entered the city. But, obſerving he was entangling himſelf in the ſtreets, where he could not extend his troops, they thought it better to let him paſs, after orders given to ſhut the gate through which he deſigned to enter.

Wyat, ſtill prepoſſeſſed that the citizens would favour his undertaking, left his canon under a guard at Hyde-Park, and entering Weſtminſter [f], purſued his march through the Strand, in his way to Ludgate. As he advanced, care was taken to cut off his retreat by barricades and men placed at all the avenues. He believed himſelf now at the height of his wiſhes, when he found the gate into the city ſhut againſt him. He then firſt diſcovered his danger, and perceiving it was impoſſible to retire, loſt all courage. As he was endeavouring to return, a herald [g] came to him, and exhorting him not to ſacrifice the lives of ſo many followers, he ſurrendered quietly [h], and was ſent to priſon. This unfortunate man, who doubtleſs had but a ſlender capacity, fooliſhly imagined, without having good aſſurances, that the city of London would declare in his favour, and that proved his ruin. If his meaſures had been better taken, the queen and her miniſters would have been greatly embarraſſed, at a time when the government, weak as it was, had already created many enemies. But the ill ſucceſs of this enterpriſe ſo ſtrengthened the queen's authority, that henceforward ſhe found no more reſiſtance. After the taking of Wyat, his men being diſperſed, were taken at pleaſure, and filled the priſons.

While Wyat was acting in Kent and London, the duke of Suffolk had made but ſmall progreſs in the county of Warwick. He would not have been ſo much ſuſpected, had not an expreſs been ſeized, ſent to him by Wyat, to inform him of the reaſons which had obliged him to haſten his undertaking, and to pray him to be as expeditious as poſſible. Upon this advice, the earl of Huntington had orders to arreſt him. The duke was informed, and being not yet ſecure of fifty horſe, choſe to conceal himſelf in the houſe of one of his domeſtics [i], who baſely betrayed him to the earl of Huntington, by whom he was conveyed to the Tower the 11th of February. Such was the ſucceſs of this conſpiracy. Had it been managed by abler heads, it might have been attended with great conſequences. But few men of reputation cared to put themſelves under the conduct of ſuch leaders. If it had cauſed only the death of the principal actors, they might have been ſaid to meet the juſt reward of their folly. But it produced two conſiderable effects, one fatal to an illuſtrious and innocent perſon, and the other to all proteſtants. Not that religion had any ſhare in the conſpiracy. Wyat himſelf being a Roman catholic, and the queen in her proclamation not accuſing the proteſtants, though ſince ſome hiſtorians have been pleaſed to brand them. But as the queen's authority was ſtrengthened by the ill ſucceſs of this undertaking, ſhe turned it entirely to the ruin of the reformed and the reformation. The duke of Suffolk being concerned in the conſpiracy, the court eaſily underſtood his deſign was to replace his daughter, the lady Jane, on the throne; and this determined the queen to ſacrifice her to her own ſafety.

Two days after the taking of Wyat, a meſſage was ſent to Jane Grey and her huſband, to bid them prepare for death. Jane, as ſhe had long expected it, received the meſſage with great reſolution. Mean while, Dr. Feckman, who brought it, and had orders to exhort her to change her religion, preposterouſly imagining ſhe deſired ſome time to be determined, obtained three days reſpite of her execution. But ſhe let him know, it was no ſatisfaction to her. She was well aſſured, the jealouſy of the government would not ſuffer her to live, and therefore ſhe had employed the whole time of her confinement in a preparation for death. Some have believed, that without this laſt attempt of the duke of Suffolk, the queen would have ſpared his daughter. But as afterwards ſuch numbers were put to death for their religion, it is not likely that Jane, ſo firmly attached to the proteſtant religion, would have been more mercifully uſed than the reſt, even though the queen could have prevailed with herſelf to pardon her treaſon. Be this as it will, ſhe was executed the 12th of February, after ſeeing the headleſs body of her huſband paſs by her, as he was brought back from execution to be interred in the chapel of the Tower. She ſhewed to the laſt moment a great conſtancy and piety, and an immoveable adherence to the reformation, owning, however, herſelf guilty of a great ſin in accepting a crown which belonged not to her. The duke of Suffolk, her father, was tried the 17th of the ſame month, and executed the 21ſt [i], with great grief for having been the cauſe of his daughter's death.

Next, Wyat was brought to his trial, where he offered to make great diſcoveries if his life might be ſaved. He accuſed even the princeſs Elizabeth and the earl of Devonſhire [k] as concerned in the conſpiracy. This did not prevent his ſentence, but only gained him a reſpite of two months, becauſe of the hopes of drawing from him conſiderable diſcoveries. Mean time the earl of Devonſhire was committed to the Tower [l]; and the princeſs Elizabeth, though indiſpoſed, was brought to London, and cloſely confined in Whitehall [m], without liberty to ſpeak to any perſon. On the 11th of March following ſhe was ſent to the Tower.

The 14th and 15th of February, Bret, commander of Wyat's forces, and fifty-eight more, were hanged. Some days after [n], ſix hundred priſoners, with halters about their necks, waited on the queen, and received their pardon. But this was not capable to efface the impreſſion made in mens' minds by ſo many executions for a conſpiracy in which was no effuſion of blood. The fault was thrown on Gardiner, who was accuſed of leading the queen to an exceſſive jealouſy of her authority, and the moſt extreme rigour. An affair happened at the ſame time, which alſo greatly alarmed and filled the people with fears of the queen's intending to rule with too extenſive a power. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, being accuſed and tried as an accomplice in the conſpiracy, was acquitted by his jury, for want of ſufficient proof to condemn him. For this the jury were ſeverely fined. So the juries were deprived of the liberty of judging according to their conſciences; and, inſtead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the court ſtood affected to the priſoners, and by that determine their verdict. This rigour exerciſed upon the jury was fatal to ſir John Throgmorton, who was found guilty upon the ſame evidence on which his brother had been acquitted.

The reſpite granted to Wyat had a quite contrary effect to what the court expected. This unhappy man, who had accuſed Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonſhire, only in hopes of a pardon, finding he muſt die, fully cleared them in his ſecond examination; and, for fear his laſt declaration ſhould be ſuppreſſed, he renewed it at the place of execution [o]. As there was no other proof againſt them, and their accuſer himſelf had acquitted them with his laſt breath, no proceſs could be formed againſt them, though Gardiner paſſionately deſired the death of the princeſs. Nay, it is very probable, the queen would have gladly conſented to it, could ſhe have ſupported her rigour with any colour of juſtice [p].

After Elizabeth had ſuffered a long and ſevere impriſonment in the Tower, ſhe was removed to Woodſtock. This was not intended as a favour, but to take her out of the hands of the lord Chandois, lieutenant of the Tower, who had treated her with great humility and diſtinction. She was at Woodſtock committed to the cuſtody of ſir Henry Beningfield [q], who paying her no ſuch reſpect as ſhe had received from the lord Chandois, gave her room to ſuſpect a deſign againſt her life. It is even pretended, that certain perſons officiouſly undertook to murder her, in the expectation of pleaſing the queen and her miniſters, but that the ſtrictneſs with which ſhe wat kept, denied them acceſs.

The diſturbances occaſioned by Wyat's conſpiracy being entirely appeaſed, the queen reſumed her firſt deſign, of an utter deſtruction of the reformation. Though to this the authority of parliament was neceſſary, ſhe failed not to anticipate the deſign by her own authority, in virtue of her ſupremacy, which ſhe herſelf deteſted, and yet ſcrupled not to uſe againſt the proteſtants! For that purpoſe, ſhe gave inſtructions to the biſhops to viſit their dioceſes. Their inſtructions, drawn by Gardiner, contained a bitter narration of all the pretended diſorders introduced into the church in the reign of Edward. She afterwards gave the chancellor a particular order to purge the church of all married biſhops and prieſts.

Some days after [r], the queen granted a ſpecial commiſſion to Gardiner and five others [s], to deprive four biſhops who were married, namely, the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of St. David's, Cheſter, and Briſtol, and all in actual confinement [t]. Two days after, the commiſſioners were ordered to deprive the biſhops of Lincoln, Gloceſter, and Hereford, for having behaved themſelves ill, and preached erroneous doctrines. The pretence to deprive theſe biſhops by a bare order of the queen, was taken from the letters patents of king Edward, in which it was provided that they ſhould hold their biſhoprics ſo long only as they behaved well; and therefore it was no injuſtice to deprive them, ſince their conduct was diſpleaſing. This was the pretence, but the true reaſon was, the court's deſire to fill theſe ſees with their creatures, before the meeting of the parliament. As to the inferior clergy, Dr. Burnet pretends, that of ſixteen thouſand then in England, twelve thouſand were turned out for having wives [u]. And indeed, in the Collection of the Public Acts, we meet with an infinite number of preſentations to livings, which ſufficiently ſhew the alterations made in the church. Mean time, in conſequence of the act of parliament, the maſs was every where reſtored, with the liturgy uſed in the end of Henry VIIIth's reign. Such was the conſtitution of the ſtate and church when the new parliament met the 2d of April 1554 [w].

The care of the court to have a parliament at their devotion had not been leſs than in the foregoing year. Nay, it was ſo much more ſucceſsful, as Gardiner had money in his hands to gain the electors and repreſentatives. The court

But the lieutenant, by an application to the queen, to know what was her pleaſure, and her denying any knowledge of the warrant, ſaved the life of the princeſs. See Fox, tom. III. p. 537. Burnet, tom. III. p. 227. Had the queen immediately diſplaced Gardiner, ſhe might have been thought innocent of ſo barbarous a deſign. But the confidence and truſt in which he continued till his death, gave a ſuſpicion at leaſt that ſhe would not have been diſpleaſed with an obedience to the warrant, which ſhe could have denied her knowledge of, as it wanted her hand, and perhaps obtained a belief by a ſacrifice of the counſellors concerned in it. Queen Elizabeth herſelf afterwards took that method in the affair of Mary queen of Scots.

[w] The queen had at firſt ſummoned this parliament to meet at Oxford, becauſe that place had ſhowed itſelf very obedient and forward in reſtoring the popiſh religion; and London, on the contrary, did not much favour her proceedings about religion, and had given her ſome jealouſy during Wyat's inſurrection: but ſhe altered her mind. Hollingſh. p. 1102.

had a double design: the first to have the queen's marriage approved, the second to restore the pope's authority. For the first, it was not sufficient to have representatives well inclined to the intended alterations in religion, it was farther requisite, they should be little zealous for the good of their country, since the queen's marriage put England in evident danger of becoming one day a province to Spain. For the second it was necessary, not only that most of the commons should be convinced of the Romish doctrines, but also should be really papists, that is, persuaded that religion could not subsist without a pope. Now the men of this opinion were not very numerous among the Roman catholics. There were many more, who believing transubstantiation, invocation of saints, adoration of images, &c. were however persuaded that the papal authority was by no means necessary to the church, and were well content with its abolishment. To have persons returned proper for the designs of the court, or to gain those who were not so compliant, it was that Gardiner used all his interest with the emperor and queen to promise pensions. This was done with so little caution and secrecy, that with regard to a great number of members, their pensions were known. The parliament, when met, was so obsequious to the queen's will, that she was sometimes obliged to check the impetuous zeal of the commons.

The first act passed in this session gave occasion to many reflections: but the intent of it was unknown till long after, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, when a certain person, let into the secret, discovered it to the earl of Leicester. The bill was brought in by the speaker. It imported, "That as the laws declarative of the royal prerogatives had been made in favour of kings, it might be pretended that the queen had no right to them: it was therefore declared, that these prerogatives did belong to the crown, whether it was in the hands of male or female; and whatsoever the law did limit or appoint for the king, was of right also due to the queen, who was declared to have as much authority as any of her progenitors." This bill occasioned some debates in the house of commons. Some feared that the pretence of securing to the queen her just rights covered a design of enlarging them beyond their just bounds; and that the last clause, 'that she had as much authority as any of her progenitors,' might encourage her to exercise the same power as William the Conqueror, who stripped the English of their lands, to bestow them on foreigners. The queen's marriage with the prince of Spain still encreased this suspicion, by the fear of having a despotic government, like that of Spain, introduced into England. It was therefore thought proper to alter the words of the act, in such manner as they should secure to the queen all her legal rights, without giving her an opportunity to usurp such as were not so. The court found no fault with the correction. Gardiner, who promoted the bill, had no intention to make the queen absolute, but to prevent Philip from seizing the government on pretence of sex. The example of Henry VII. furnished a just cause of fear. That prince had at first no pretension to the crown but what flowed from his marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. However, when he afterwards found himself sufficiently strong, he resolved to reign in his own right, as heir to the house of Lancaster. Philip might have done the same thing, as descended from the same house. So that here Gardiner consulted at once the interest of the nation and his own. It was the nation's interest that Philip should not have an opportunity of seizing the government. Gardiner's likewise required the same, because, if Philip should once become master of England, the administration of affairs would probably be put into the hands of Spaniards, and consequently Gardiner be excluded. In a word, the true occasion of Gardiner's bill was this: A certain person had contrived a model of government, according to which the queen was to declare herself a conqueror; or assert, that as she came to the crown by common law, she was not bound by the laws which limited the regal power, because these restrictions were made for kings, and not queens. This plan was communicated to the Imperial embassador, who put it into the queen's hands, and prayed her to read it with attention. The queen doubtless read, and then delivered it to her chancellor to examine, and give his opinion upon it. He thereby saw what was the aim of the Spaniards, and set before the queen the consequences and peril of following, or even listening to such counsels. In a word, he so managed her, that she threw the project into the fire. It was not without reason that Gardiner began to be alarmed with respect to the Spaniards. Besides, that such projects as this gave him just cause to suspect them of some design upon the liberties of England, there was another thing that confirmed his suspicions: This was, the Spaniards had published a genealogy of Philip, which derived him from a daughter of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and son of Edward III. Gardiner, therefore, thought it high time to break the Spanish measures; and this he undertook to do by the fore-mentioned act. But he took particular care not to be known for the author, for fear of forfeiting Philip's favour [x].

In this session the bishopric of Durham, suppressed in the end of the late reign, was restored to its ancient rights, and the act of suppression repealed.

The sentence against the duke of Suffolk and the fifty-eight men, executed for the late rebellion, was likewise confirmed.

Lastly, the parliament approved the treaty of marriage between the queen and Philip. But as Gardiner began to fear the Spaniards, he so ordered, that the parliament in approving the treaty, explained more clearly and enlarged the articles, by which the government of the kingdom was declared to belong only to the queen.

No more was desired of the parliament in this session [y]. If the zeal of the commons to please the court had been indulged, many rigorous acts against the reformation and the reformed would have been made. But the lords, by the court's direction, threw out the bills sent by the commons on that subject. Without doubt the ministers thought it not proper to begin the persecution before the consummation of the queen's marriage, lest some unforseen accident should retard the prince of Spain's arrival. For that reason, the parliament was dissolved [z] the 25th of May, after the queen's principal desire, the approbation of her marriage, was obtained.

At the end of this session of parliament, the court thought proper to interrupt the convocation, in order for a new conference to be held at Oxford, concerning the eucharist. The protestants complained publicly of the treatment they had met with, in the dispute held at London. From hence occasion was taken to lay a new snare for them, by appointing another disputation in presence of the university of Oxford, as if more justice was intended them. But this was in effect only to give them a fresh mortification. If the court had meant to act with sincerity, they would never have chosen, as they did, for managers of the dispute on the protestants side, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, all prisoners in the Tower, and the two first without controversy the most learned and able men of their party. But as it was resolved to confound them otherwise than by reasons and arguments, the court was glad to expose these three grave prelates to the insults of their enemies. They were therefore removed to Oxford [a], to dispute against some of the Romish clergy; at the head of whom was Weston, prolocutor of the lower house of convocation. The disputation or conference was managed like the former at London [b]. The three protestant bishops were forced to be silent, by reason of the continual interruptions and noises which hindered them from being heard, whence it was inferred they were vanquished. Those who are curious to see the particulars of the dispute, will find them in the History of the Reformation of England. But to mortify these bishops was not thought sufficient. The dispute, which lasted three days, being ended, they were summoned to abjure their pretended errors, and upon their refusal excommunicated [c].

Prince Philip being informed that nothing now retarded the consummation of his marriage, left the Groyne the 16th of July, and arrived the 19th at Southampton [d]. At his landing he drew his sword, and carried it naked some time. This mysterious action was variously interpreted. Some said, it signified that he would draw his sword in defence of the nation. Others believed, that he intimated to the English by this action, that he intended to govern them by the sword. The magistrates of Southampton presenting him with the keys of the town, he took and returned them without speaking a word. This gravity displeased the English, who used to be treated more affably by their sovereigns. The queen met him at Wincheſter, where Gardiner married them the 25th of July. The ſame day they were proclaimed king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jeruſalem, and by many other titles [e]. The emperor had lately made a preſent to his ſon of the kingdoms of Naples and Jeruſalem. Philip was but twenty-nine years of age, and Mary was thirty-eight. Many cheſts of bullion [f], brought by Philip, were landed, which no doubt were a great part of the one million two hundred thouſand crowns, promiſed to be ſent into England by the emperor, but which he was not inclined to part with before the conſummation of the marriage. This infuſed freſh zeal for the queen's intereſt into thoſe who had before been gained by Gardiner [g].

[x] Another reason for this act might also be, to prevent any disturbance that might arise from an opinion broached by some of queen Mary's enemies, That it was unlawful for a woman to govern; to prove which, Knox and others wrote books soon after. Strype's notes on Godwin, p. 344.

Philip, deſirous to acquire the affection of the Engliſh, began with acts of clemency, which would have produced that effect, had the reſt of his conduct been anſwerable to them. However, ſome perſons of diſtinction were the better for his generoſity. The princeſs Elizabeth was the chief. Gardiner was for removing her out of the way at any rate. He apprehended, if ſhe ſucceeded Mary, ſhe would be led by her own intereſt to ſubvert whatever ſhould be done in this reign with reſpect to religion. Beſides, it was known that, notwithſtanding all her caution, ſhe was reformed in her heart. Now, as it was reſolved to perſecute the proteſtants, there was ſome room to fear an inſurrection, under colour of aſſerting her rights. The queen herſelf was not far from Gardiner's ſentiments; but Philip interceded for Elizabeth, and freed her from this danger [h]. This was doubtleſs at firſt from a motive of generoſity. It has been pretended, that policy had afterwards a great ſhare in the preſervation of this princeſs; and two ſeveral reaſons are aſſigned. Firſt, it is ſaid, that when he had no longer hopes of children by queen Mary, he reflected, that, if Elizabeth died before the queen, the crown of England would devolve to the queen of Scotland, who would bring this rich inheritance to the dauphin of France. It is indeed true, that, by Henry VIII's will, the queen of Scots could not claim the Engliſh crown till after the poſterity of the ducheſs of Suffolk. But it was not likely the dauphin would regard the will; and he might happen to join the crowns of England and Ireland to thoſe of France and Scotland, which could not but be prejudicial to the houſe of Auſtria. The ſecond reaſon which induced Philip to ſave Elizabeth, was, as it is pretended, his hopes to marry her, if Mary died firſt. Beſides the princeſs Elizabeth, ſome other perſons obtained their pardon by Philip's interceſſion, namely, nine knights, and the archbiſhop of York [i]. It is preſumed that prelate was not firm to his religion, becauſe all the reſt who were releaſed were men who ſuited their religion to the times. Probably they had been engaged in Wyat's or the lady Jane's cauſe. Beſides, the archbiſhop of York was ſuffered to live in quiet during the reſidue of this reign.

Philip's grave manner and reſerved air gave great diſguſt to the Engliſh. None were ſuffered to come either into his or the queen's preſence, without a formal demand of an audience, as is practiſed by embaſſadors. This rendered the court entirely unfrequented, the Engliſh nobility not enduring to conform to cuſtoms ſo oppoſite to their own.

The old duke of Norfolk died in September, about a year after obtaining his liberty [k].

Mary's third parliament met the 11th of November [l], diſpoſed as the court could wiſh [m]. The money, come from Spain, produced ſuch effects, that moſt of the repreſentatives only wanted occaſions to ſignalize their zeal for the queen. The court was ſo ſenſible of this, that, without any law yet made to reſtore the papal authority, two noblemen were ſent to receive cardinal Pole, as legate, and bring him over into England. One of theſe was the lord Paget, who, having been a principal friend and confident of the duke of Somerſet, and one of that protector's inſtruments to eſtabliſh the reformation in the reign of Edward, was nominated in this of Mary, to meet the pope's legate [n]. Such change had a new reign produced amongſt the nobility. Whilſt the legate in Flanders was preparing for his voyage, an act paſſed in parliament to repeal his attainder in the reign of Henry VIII. This coſt but three days [o], in order to avoid the inconvenience of ſeeing a legate arrive in the kingdom, ſtill liable to a ſentence of death.

Pole arrived the 24th of November [p], and, after communicating his inſtructions to the king and queen, he laid before them, and both houſes of parliament (ſent for on purpoſe) the occaſion of his legation. This, he ſaid, was to bring back to the fold of Chriſt the ſheep that were gone aſtray: that the pope, who held on earth the place of ſovereign paſtor, was ready to receive them; and therefore he exhorted the Engliſh to embrace an opportunity at once ſo favourable and happy. The queen, who paſſionately deſired to ſee the pope's authority reſtored in England, was ſo moved on this occaſion, that ſhe fancied ſhe felt a child ſtir in her womb. This news was immediately publiſhed in all places, and even, by an order of council [q], Te Deum was ſung at St. Paul's. Some flatterers ſpared not to ſay, that as John Baptiſt leaped in his mother's womb at the ſalutation of the virgin, ſo here a happy omen followed on the ſalutation from Chriſt's vicar ſpeaking by the mouth of his legate. The queen's women, who ſaw her ſo fond of her imaginary conception, humoured her in this belief, till the middle of the next year, when, to her great mortification, ſhe diſcovered her miſtake.

The 29th of November the two houſes preſented a petition to the king and queen, praying their interceſſion with the legate for a reconciliation of the kingdom with the church, from which a horrible ſchiſm had long diſunited it. They promiſed in the ſame petition to repeal all the acts againſt the pope's authority. Upon this, the legate came to the parliament, and in a long ſpeech enlarged upon the pope's affection and tenderneſs for the kingdom of England, and the extraordinary favours which in every age that nation had received from the Holy See. Then he enjoined for penance the repeal of all the laws againſt the papal authority, and, granting a full abſolution, which was received by both houſes on their knees, abſolved alſo the kingdom from all cenſures.

The repeal promiſed by both houſes could not be ready before the beginning of January. By this act the pope's authority was reſtored to the ſame ſtate as before the twentieth year of the reign of Henry VIII. But the five following articles inſerted in it were ſo many reſtrictions upon the papal power.

I. That biſhoprics, cathedrals, and colleges, ſhould remain in their preſent condition.

II. That marriages contracted within the degrees forbidden only by the canons, and not the law of God, ſhould be deemed good and valid.

III. That inſtitutions into benefices made during the ſchiſm ſhould be confirmed.

IV. That all judicial proceſſes ſhould alſo be confirmed.

V. That the alienations of the lands of the church ſhould be authorized, and the poſſeſſors ſubject to no cenſures or proſecutions on that account.

The legate ratified all theſe articles, but with a denunciation of the judgments of God on all thoſe who poſſeſſed the church-lands. As this article was the moſt important and obſtructive to a re-union, the court of Rome had not been a little embarraſſed to ſettle it. The nobility and gentry, enriched with the plunder of the church in the two laſt reigns, were not to be alarmed. On the other hand, the canons make the lands of the church ſo ſacred, that the pope himſelf, however extenſive his power be in other reſpects, cannot alienate them. Conſequently, Julius III. could not conſent to the alienation made in England, without violating the canons: nay, his conſent would have been of no force, ſince he would have exceeded the bounds of his power. Mean while, had he inſiſted upon the neceſſity of reſtitution, and told the Engliſh, that without it he could not poſſibly abſolve them, the affair of the re-union of England, the concluſion whereof was ſo paſſionately deſired by the pope, would have been in danger of miſcarrying. This was one of thoſe nice affairs which called for ſome of thoſe expedients the court of Rome ſeldom wants. The expedient now uſed was to deceive the Engliſh. The pope firſt gave Pole a general power [r], which was not thought ſufficient however to remove the uneaſineſs of the perſon concerned. Afterwards he ſent him another [s], authorizing him, "to tranſact with the poſſeſſors of church-lands for the rents they had unlawfully received, and for the moveables they had conſumed; in reſtoring firſt, if the legate thought proper, the lands they unjuſtly poſſeſſed [t]." This clauſe "in reſtoring firſt, if the legate thought proper," had a very equivocal meaning. It might ſignify, that the legate had the liberty to oblige the poſſeſſors to reſtitution, or to diſpenſe with it; or elſe, that he had power to tranſact with them for the received rents before or after the reſtitution of the lands. In all appearance, the pope underſtood the clauſe in this laſt ſenſe, but was willing to give room to believe, that he underſtood it in the firſt. This power appearing inſufficient to the emperor and the court of England, the pope gave a third not leſs equivocal, and which, under a heap of general terms, contained certain reſtrictions, which left him free to act afterwards as he ſhould pleaſe; for his preſent buſineſs was to blind the poſſeſſors and the parliament, in giving them a ſeeming ſatisfaction. This laſt power ran, "That whereas he had before given power to his legate to tranſact with the poſſeſſors of the church's goods, and to diſcharge them the rents they had unjuſtly received, or the moveables they had waſted; nevertheleſs, to the end that the entire reduction of England might become ſo much the more eaſy, by the greater hopes which the pope gave of condeſcenſion and compliance on this occaſion (unwilling as as he was to keep back the great work of the ſalvation of ſo many ſouls by any human conſiderations, and deſirous to imitate the good father going out to meet the prodigal ſon) he gave power to his legate, agreeably to the confidence he repoſed in him, to tranſact and agree, by authority of the Holy See, with the poſſeſſors of the goods of the church, for whom the queen ſhould intercede, and to give them a diſpenſation for the future enjoyment of them; with reſervation, however, of ſuch things, wherein, for the greatneſs and importance of them, he ſhould think fit to conſult the Holy See, for its approbation and confirmation."

This laſt power, far from correcting what was defective in the former, was ſtill more equivocal and uſeleſs. Firſt, for the word Tranſact, which was in the firſt power, and remained likewiſe in this, it is manifeſt, that the pope did not mean by it a bare acquieſcence of his legate to a poſſeſſion deemed unjuſt, and that, on this occaſion, a tranſaction imported at leaſt ſome previous reparation to be made to the church. But for fear the term Tranſact ſhould not be ſignificant enough, the pope added in this laſt power the term Agree, which evidently ſhewed in what ſenſe he would have this tranſaction underſtood. Wherefore the bare acquieſcence of the legate was uſeleſs, ſince he thereby exceeded his power, which was to Tranſact and Agree. Secondly, under theſe terms, Future Enjoyment, was an equivocation, ſince the Future might imply either a perpetual or a temporary enjoyment. Thirdly, the legate could grant a diſpenſation for the enjoyment of theſe lands but to thoſe for whom the queen interceded, ſo that the queen might chuſe whether ſhe would intercede for any perſon: nay, it is very likely ſhe would have ſcrupled it, ſince it will appear, ſhe herſelf made reſtitution of all ſuch lands as were in her poſſeſſion. Fourthly, all that the legate could do on this occaſion was inſignificant without the pope's confirmation, who could revoke it; ſo that the legate's power was only proviſional. Laſtly, the obligation to conſult the Holy See in matters of importance, was alſo an uncertain expreſſion, and liable to endleſs cavils.

Pope Julius III. died before he was informed of the ſucceſs of this affair. But if we judge of him by the terms of the power granted to his legate, he acted with no ſincerity, and his ſucceſſor plainly refuſed to confirm the legate's acquieſcence. It was therefore a manifeſt illuſion put upon the poſſeſſors of the church lands, ſince, according to the canon law, they could thereby acquire no juſt title. On the other hand, they could not poſſeſs them with a ſafe conſcience, ſince the legate, at the ſame time that he gave his conſent to their enjoyment of theſe lands, denounced the judgments of God ready to fall on their heads. It will be aſked, perhaps, how the Engliſh could ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed upon by ſo palpable an artifice? To this may be anſwered, firſt, that the king and queen, being in the ſentiments of the court of Rome, aſſiſted the fraud as much as poſſible, and the parliament, corrupted with Spaniſh gold, ſeemed not to ſee what they ſaw. In the ſecond place, the legate's powers were probably ſhown only to the king and queen, who appeared ſatisfied with them; and the parliament, without examining theſe powers, ſuppoſed the legate ſufficiently authorized. I have a little enlarged on this ſubject, becauſe it is very material at preſent, and poſſibly may be more ſo hereafter. The Engliſh may ſee by this, not only the impoſſibility of the court of Rome's acting with ſincerity in this affair, but that, though a pope ſhould have the beſt intentions towards the poſſeſſors of church-lands, his conſent would be inſignificant. His ſucceſſors might always ſay, with ſome foundation, that he had exceeded his power. However, the poſſeſſors were, or ſeemed to be ſatisfied, and the rather becauſe the parliament made a law which in ſome manner diſpelled the fears of the perſons concerned. This law imported, that whoever ſhould diſturb the ſubjects, in their poſſeſſion of any lands or goods once belonging to the church, on pretence of any eccleſiaſtical authority, ſhould fall into a præmunire.

The affair of the reconciliation being ended, and the government become entirely popiſh, the parliament paſſed an act to revive the ſtatutes of Richard II. Henry IV. and Henry V. againſt heretics [u]. The commons were ſo haſty, that if their zeal had been indulged, they would have finiſhed at once what the court deſired to do only by degrees. They brought in ſeveral bills, which were rejected by the lords, for fear of alarming the proteſtants, and driving them to deſpair. But the commons were almoſt indifferent whether their bills were approved or rejected, becauſe, whatever happened, their zeal for the queen was rendered indiſputable. This was the real aim of all their proceedings.

Afterwards an act was made by way of ſupplement to the ſtatutes of treaſons and felonies. It was in favour of Philip that this act was renewed, by which, if any perſon aſſerted, that Philip had no right to the title of king of England during his marriage with the queen, he was to be ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, and to forfeit all his goods. Moreover, that prince having conſented to take upon him the guardianſhip of the children he might have by the queen, and to govern the kingdom for a ſon till he was eighteen, and for a daughter till fifteen; it was alſo enacted, That conſpiring his death, during that time, ſhould be treaſon. It was likewiſe death by another act, for any to pray, "That God would turn the queen's heart from idolatry, or ſhorten her days [w]."

The ſtatutes againſt heretics were no ſooner revived, than the court took into conſideration how to reduce them. Their number was great, and without doubt much greater than that of their adverſaries. But theſe had the government for them. In this party were thoſe who were indifferent to all religions, and theſe appeared the moſt zealous, becauſe it was a ſure means to render them acceptable to the court. On the other hand, the proteſtants could not make any advantage of their numbers, becauſe they were without ſupport. Beſides, many of them concealed their ſentiments, for fear of loſing their lives and fortunes. Others, by a principle of conſcience, choſe to ſuffer, rather than reſiſt. So thoſe who would have uſed force againſt the attacks of their enemies, would probably have been ill ſupported, and the rather, becauſe the emperor would not have failed to aſſiſt the queen, had it been neceſſary. The proteſtants therefore, with the greateſt conſternation, ſaw a ſtorm ready to fall on their heads, without any poſſibility to avoid it.

In the council, held at court on this ſubject, Pole was for gentle methods rather than force, thinking this would only inflame inſtead of curing the evil, and at moſt, would but encreaſe the number of hypocrites. He added, that the beſt means of converting the proteſtants, was the reformation of the clergy, whoſe irregular lives had firſt given birth to hereſy. Gardiner, on the contrary, maintained, that only rigour was capable to have a good effect upon the proteſtants. That in the reign of Henry VIII. it was notorious, all ſubmitted to the ſtatute of the ſix articles through fear of puniſhment. As Gardiner had in many things complied againſt his conſcience, he could not believe that others had more reſolution than himſelf. For that reaſon he thought the puniſhment of ſome of the moſt obſtinate, would be attended with a blind compliance in all the reſt to whatever was enjoined. Hence it appears, he was little concerned to gain men's hearts, provided the prevailing religion found no more oppoſition. The queen, who was a furious bigot, embraced his opinion. But to ſhew Pole that his counſels were not wholly neglected, ſhe charged him with reforming the clergy, and left to Gardiner the care of extirpating hereſy.

Towards the end of the year, the queen ſent viſcount Montague [x], the biſhop of Ely, and ſir Edward Karne, to Rome, with a tender of ſubmiſſion to the pope from the king, the queen, and the three ſtates of the realm.

[1555] The reſolution being taken to proſecute with the utmoſt rigour the proteſtants, Gardiner, firſt author of that advice, very readily undertook to execute it. He it was, who, in ſpite of all the difficulties which naturally occurred in the queen's marriage, had at laſt accompliſhed it. He it was alſo, who, by intreagues, had found a way to diſpoſe parliaments to favour the queen's intentions with regard to religion, and had effected the work of reſtoring the Roman religion and the papal authority. He thought therefore nothing more was wanting to complete his glory, than the forcing the proteſtants into the pale of the church, or at leaſt to an outward ſubmiſſion to the laws newly enacted, which is the utmoſt bounds of man's power. For that purpoſe he reſolved to begin with Hooper and Rogers. The firſt had been biſhop of Gloceſter, the other was a clergyman of great repute among the proteſtants. It was he, who, with Bradford, had reſcued Bourn from his danger when he preached at St. Paul's. This action, charitable as it was, had received ſo ill a conſtruction, that the court took occaſion from it to arreſt Rogers, in order to remove out of the way a man, who was regarded as one of the chiefs of the proteſtants, from his great credit and influence with the people. It was an artifice frequently uſed in the beginning of this reign by the court, to impriſon, on frivolous pretences, thoſe whom they deſigned to ſacrifice, with intent to detain them till laws were made to condemn them. Hooper and Rogers were of this number, and the firſt martyrs of this reign. They were condemned by commiſſioners appointed by the queen, with the chancellor at their head [y], and delivered over to the ſecular arm. Hooper was burnt at Gloceſter, and Rogers at London [z]. Hooper was three quarters of an hour in torment, the fire not being well kindled, ſo that his legs and thighs were firſt burnt, and one of his hands dropped off before he expired [a]. Theſe executions were followed by thoſe of Saunders and Taylor, two other clergymen of the moſt diſtinguiſhed zeal for their religion [b]. Taylor's puniſhment was remarkable for his being put into a pitch-barrel, and for having before the fire was kindled a faggot from an unknown hand thrown at his head, which made it ſtream with blood. Afterwards, as he was repeating the 51ſt Pſalm in Engliſh, one of the guards ſtruck him over the mouth, and bid him pray in Latin. He was therefore obliged to be ſilent, and continue his ejaculations, till the moment came which was to finiſh all his ſufferings. But while the fire was kindling, one of the guards, either through impatience, or pity, knocked out his brains with a halbert, and delivered him from more cruel torment [c].

Gardiner, finding himſelf miſtaken in his conjectures, and that the puniſhment of theſe four clergymen produced not the effect he expected, transferred to Bonner a commiſſion, which could not but draw upon him the public hatred. This was no favour to the proteſtants; for if Gardiner's zeal was cruel, Bonner's was furious.

Mean while, theſe few executions cauſed an univerſal conſternation. The bigots only triumphed. The reſt who had any ſenſe of humanity, could not without the laſt concern behold men expoſed to ſuch cruel ſufferings, who were accuſed of no crime, and ſolely for their religious opinions. It could not but be obſerved, how differently the proteſtants behaved from the Roman catholics. In Edward's reign, very few had ſuffered impriſonment for their religion; and in Mary's, no puniſhment was thought too cruel for thoſe proteſtants who dared to perſevere in their opinions. The biſhops themſelves ſeemed aſhamed, for in a ſolemn embaſſy they declared, they had no hand in theſe barbarities. So all the hatred fell upon the king and queen, and particularly the king, as he was bred in a country where the inquiſition prevailed. Philip hearing of it, ſaw that the affection of the Engliſh would be entirely loſt, if they were ſuffered to continue in this ſentiment. Beſides, he was reſolved not to be the dupe of the biſhops, who cleared themſelves at his expence. He therefore ordered his confeſſor, Alphonſo, to preach before him, who, before all the court, charged the biſhops with the cruelties complained of by the whole kingdom [d]. He even challenged them to produce in the whole ſcriptures one paſſage which allowed chriſtians to burn men for matters of conſcience. It was not without aſtoniſhment that a Spaniard was heard to exclaim againſt burning heretics, and condemn cruelties ſo common in Spain. The biſhops were ſo amazed, that the fires remained extinguiſhed for ſome weeks, but about the middle of March they were re-kindled, the biſhops chuſing to incur the public hatred rather than not perſecute the proteſtants. The truth is, the court was no leſs inclined to cruelty than the biſhops. But each had a mind to throw the whole blame of the perſecution on the other. Bonner, biſhop of London, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a fury unbecoming, not only a clergyman and chriſtian, but even a cannibal. From this time the executions of the proteſtants were continued, with a barbarity which clearly ſhewed, that thoſe by whom they were ordered were not at all forced. The biſhops condemned without mercy all who were brought before them, and the civil magiſtrates executed the ſentences even more rigorouſly than commanded by the laws [e].

About the end of April, the princeſs Elizabeth was conducted from Woodſtock to Hampton-court, where Gardiner, attended by a great number of privy-counſellors, exhorted her ſeriouſly to merit the queen's pardon by an ingenious confeſſion of her crimes. But ſhe poſitively denied to have ever juſtly offended the queen. At laſt Philip prevailed for an enlargement of her liberty at a ſeat in the country [f], where ſhe was permitted to retire. As ſhe knew all her actions were narrowly obſerved, ſhe avoided concerning herſelf in any affair which might give the leaſt ſuſpicion. During the reſt of this reign, ſhe applied herſelf wholly to her ſtudies, and made a conſiderable progreſs. But ſtill ſhe led an uncomfortable life, as ſhe was forced to diſſemble her religious ſentiments to hear maſs, and frequently confeſs herſelf, to eſcape

In king Edward's reign he returned to England, and was made prebend of St. Paul's, and reader of the divinity lecture in the ſame cathedral. On the 28th of January, he was convened before the commiſſioners, excommunicated on the 29th, and burnt February 4. He left a wife and eleven children. At the ſtake he had it in his power to have ſaved his life by a recantation: but neither hopes nor fears could prevail on him to deſert his religion: on the contrary, he ſaid, "He reſigned his life with joy, in teſtimony of the doctrine he had preached." the dangers she was continually exposed to[g]. In this she was a little less scrupulous than her sister Mary had been in Edward's reign. But it may be said for her, that there was a great difference between the characters of Edward and Mary. The fear of death could not oblige Mary to dissemble her religion, because she was never threatened with it, whereas Elizabeth saw death continually before her eyes upon the least advantage against her.

While the queen was thus expressing her zeal for the Romish religion, she felt a load upon her conscience, which she could no longer bear. This was the possession of the abbey-lands adjudged to Henry VIII. Pope Julius III. pretended to consent that the possessors of the church-lands should not be disturbed. But he plainly shewed that nothing was farther from his intentions; for even before the affair of the reconciliation was ended, he published a bull, excommunicating all who had taken possession of any church or abbey-lands, as well as the princes who favoured or assisted them. Gardiner indeed had endeavoured to remove the queen's uneasiness, by telling her the bull concerned Germany alone, and had no authority, unless received in England. But it was easy to see, that a defect of formality could not excuse a practice in England, which was condemned by the pope as a heinous crime in Germany. Be this as it will, the queen, who believed herself near the time of her delivery, would not run the risk of dying excommunicate. She sent for the ministers[h], and told them it was her fixed resolution to part with the church-lands in her possession, to be disposed of as the pope should judge proper. At the same time she ordered them to acquaint the legate with her intention, and give him a list of those lands that still continued in the crown.

Pope Julius died the 23d of March, a few days before this restitution. Marcellus II. succeeded him the 9th of April. The new pope was preparing to make a great reformation in the church, but death surprised him whilst he was meditating this project, the 22d day after his exaltation.

The news of Marcellus's death being brought to England, the queen formed the design of raising Pole to the pontificate. She even made some advances towards it, but on the 23d of May the cardinals assembled in conclave elected cardinal Caraffa, who assumed the name of Paul IV. The see had not of a long time been filled with a pope more haughty, or more proud with his power. He was no sooner raised to the papal chair, than he resolved to carry his authority as high or higher than any of his predecessors. The embassadors of England[i] arrived in Rome the very day of his election, but were not admitted to audience till a month after. This delay was owing to Mary's assuming the title of queen of Ireland, which the pope would not suffer, pretending that the Roman pontiff only had a right to erect kingdoms. As the embassadors had no instructions to relax on this article, their audience would have been long deferred, if the pope had not thought of an expedient. He privately erected Ireland into a kingdom[k], and at the same time sent to the embassadors to acquaint them, that otherwise he would not suffer them to give their queen that title in a public audience. This difficulty being removed, the embassadors were admitted to audience; and the pope with a great ceremony told them, that in token of his esteem of the king and queen of England, he had erected Ireland into a kingdom, by virtue of his power to create new kingdoms and supplant old ones. Afterwards, in private audiences, he warmly pressed the restitution of the church-lands, and told the embassadors, that he expected the whole should be restored without any exception. He said also, he intended to have the payment of St. Peter's pence continued; for which purpose, he would shortly send a collector into England; and that the English were not to expect St. Peter would open the gates of heaven to them, so long as they usurped his patrimony on earth. The embassadors, not to exasperate this haughty pontiff, were contented to answer him with submission, but did nothing, as indeed they had no power to meddle with these points.

While this passed at Rome, the privy council being informed that the justices of peace, and particularly those of the county of Norfolk, were indulgent to the protestants, sent instructions to them to act more agreeably to the intentions of the court. This shews the bishops were not alone guilty of the cruelties exercised against the protestants, but that the court was equally possessed with this furious zeal. In these instructions was an article enjoining the justices to have spies in every parish, for giving information of all persons who were remiss in their duty in point of religion. This was so like an inquisition, that it was imputed to the counsels of the Spaniards, which rendered them extremely odious, there being nothing more contrary to the English humour and government. Notwithstanding these instructions, and the court's severe orders, the violences already committed occasioned such murmurs, that Bonner himself, whether through fear or some other motive, moderated his fury so far, as to send away without trial persons brought before him for heresy. This conduct drew from the king and queen a severe letter to him[l], in which, after expressing their surprise, they exhorted him not to be remiss. This was sufficient to renew the persecution with more fury than before. Bradford, who had been some time under sentence of death, was burnt in July[m]. Ridley, bishop of London, and the venerable old Latimer[n], who had been bishop of Worcester in the reign of Henry VIII. suffered martyrdom in November. I omit many other martyrdoms in several places of the kingdom, because my design is not to write a history of the church. Let it suffice to say, that in the course of this year, sixty-seven persons were burnt; amongst whom were four bishops, and thirteen other ecclesiastics[n].

When the king and queen wrote to Bonner to rekindle his zeal, the queen believed herself upon the point of being delivered. The 29th of May, the courtiers were in a readiness to convey the news to different parts of the kingdom[o]. In the beginning of June, a rumour was every where spread that she was delivered of a prince. The bishop of Norwich sung Te Deum in his cathedral. One priest, more officious than the rest, described in his sermon the lineaments of the new-born prince. But this pretended pregnancy ended at last in some moles cast forth by the queen at several times.

[n] These two excellent prelates were burnt together at Oxford, October 16. Their behaviour was comparable to any thing left upon record of the primitive martyrs. Ridley was born of a good family in Northumberland, and brought up at Newcastle-school, and Pembroke-hall in Cambridge; of which last he was master. He was chaplain to king Henry VIII. by whom he was promoted to the see of Rochester, and translated by king Edward VI. to that of London. He was one of the ablest champions of the reformation. His piety, learning, and solidity of judgment, were admired by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. The night before his execution, he invited the mayor of Oxford and his wife to see him die. And when the good woman melted in tears, he spoke to her with an assurance, which was capable to banish her sorrow, in the thought that so much firmness on so melancholy an occasion, could be the only gift of heaven, inspiring and animating him against his approaching agony. He comforted Latimer at the stake, who was ready to return the kind office. He was so little diverted by the terrors before him, that he even gave a serious attention to the sermon preached by a furious bigot; and was sufficiently calm to have answered the exceptionable parts of it, which he offered to do; but he was not allowed to display his eloquence and reason, which might have shaken his audience, and made more work for his persecutors. He left the world with an act of justice, by a petition sent to the queen, that either the tenants of the bishopric of London might be confirmed in their leases, or their fines restored out of his goods, seized when he was imprisoned. His torment was lingering, by the ill-placing of the faggots to burn him: and his legs were almost consumed before the fire reached his vitals.——Latimer was born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire, and brought up at Cambridge. He was made by king Henry VIII. bishop of Worcester, which see he resigned, as has been already related. He had a noble simplicity, and in his sermons arraigned the vices of great sinners with plainness, which, unadorned with human eloquence, found a way to their hearts, and made the Felixes of the age tremble before him. One illustrious robber made restitution in his hands of money stole from the public, or the treasury, moved by one of his discourses on restitution, which pierced his conscience, and obliged him to sacrifice gain to godliness. He comforted Ridley at the stake (who had done as much for him) and unshaken with all the triumphs of reigning popery, prophesied, that "they two should light such a candle in England, as by God's grace should never be extinguished." He was soon out of his pain, and fell asleep; and finished a life, which, through a course of eighty years, and in the corruption of the last ages, preserved the piety, simplicity, and integrity, of the first. This was a grievous disappointment to the queen and the whole court[p]. King Philip was no less dismayed. He had only married in hopes of having children by the queen, and thereby uniting England with the monarchy of Spain. This accident, and perhaps the opinion of the physicians, that there was no likelihood of any children, entirely destroying these hopes, he grew weary of a wife, who had neither youth nor beauty, and resolved to apply more closely to his other affairs. Besides, he was doubtless informed, by the emperor, his father, of his intention to resign to him his Spanish dominions. He left England therefore the 4th of September[q] to go into Flanders, leaving the queen extremely mortified at his coldness, of which she was but too sensible.

Before the king's departure, a discovery was pretended of a conspiracy against the queen. Several persons were arrested, and some put to the torture. But, as no confession was drawn from them, very likely the conspiracy was only a false surmise, designed to incense the queen against the persons accused.

In the course of this year, a strict enquiry was made after them who had pillaged the churches and monasteries, and particularly after those who were employed in the visitation under Henry VIII. This was a good expedient to draw large sums from those men, who were forced to open their purses to escape a severer punishment.

The parliament met the 21st of October, and did nothing considerable, besides the making an act to approve and confirm the queen's resignation of the first fruits and tenths[r]. The lords were desirous to make a law to confiscate the estates of those whom the fear of persecution had driven out of the kingdom, but the commons rejected the bill. Most of the members began no longer to pay the same deference to the court as formerly, whether their pensions were withdrawn, after a compliance to almost whatever was desired, or they would not be the instruments of restoring to the clergy an authority so odious to the nation. Besides, most people were grown weary of the cruelties exercised against innocent men. However, the queen met with great mortifications in this session. When she desired a supply of money, the commons, with great freedom, replied, it was not just to burden the people with expences which she might easily have supplied, if she had kept the church-lands. So it was with great difficulty that she obtained a moderate subsidy[s]. The parliament, seeming resolved not to be directed any more by the court, was dissolved the 9th of December[t].

It is not surprising that the good intelligence between the queen and the commons began to decrease, since the minister, who had hitherto been employed to manage that house, was no longer in the world. I mean Gardiner, who died in the beginning of the session, in which he had been but twice present[u]. He was seized with his sickness the very day he received the news of the death of Ridley and Latimer, which he impatiently waited for. He refused to sit down to dinner till he had received it, and was without that satisfaction till four in the afternoon. He then dined with a good appetite, and after dinner was seized with a suppression of urine, which brought him to his grave in a few days. It is said, that during this indisposition, he felt some remorse for his past conduct; and sometimes said, he had erred with St. Peter, but not mourned with him. He was a man entirely attached to the world, of great wit, and of equal craft and dissimulation[w]. He directed his talents solely to the supporting and augmenting his own authority. Pope Paul IV. promised him a cardinal's hat. It is also pretended, that, to procure the archbishopric of Canterbury, promised to Pole, he had so slandered him to the court of Rome, that the pope had resolved to recal and even punish him as a favourer of heresy, because he did not approve the violent methods practised for the conversion of protestants. Gardiner's hope of succeeding to the archbishopric was the reason that Cranmer was suffered to live, because Gardiner waited till Pole was recalled; though, in all appearance, his religion was that of the church of Rome; he had conformed to all Henry VIII.'s changes. But the hope he had groundlessly conceived, that Henry would at last return to his first sentiments in religion, put him upon some practices which rendered him suspected, and robbed him of the fruit of his dissimulation. During the reign of Edward, he dissembled so far as to comply outwardly with the laws concerning religion; but at the same time he sufficiently discovered that it was with regret. To this was owing his deprivation; those who then managed the religious affairs, being persuaded that his dissimulation did more harm than good. In the reign of Mary, he was no longer forced to conceal his sentiments. Nay, perhaps he affected a greater zeal than he really had for the Romish religion, to recommend himself the more to a bigotted queen. By this he acquired her favour, and became her first minister, having artfully gained the emperor to his interest. When he saw his credit firmly established, he turned his revenge upon his enemies into barbarity. They had been contented to detain him in prison; but he could only be satisfied with burning them alive. Ridley and Latimer, amongst others, felt the terrible effects of his vengeance. He had not so long deferred the satisfaction of causing Cranmer to perish in the flames, if his own interest had not induced him to spare his life for some time. It is pretended he was natural son of Richard Woodvil, brother to queen Elizabeth, king Edward IV.'s wife; and that this was the cause of his so sudden advancement to the bishopric of Winchester in the reign of Henry VIII. Dr. Burnet has clearly proved, in his History of the Reformation, that Gardiner was one of the principal authors of Henry's divorce with Catherine. This, one would think, should have rendered him equally odious with Cranmer to queen Mary: but his zeal for the Romish religion effaced all. After his death, the chancellorship was executed by commission[x], from the 13th of November to the 1st of January following, when Heath, archbishop of York, had the seals delivered to him.

The day after dissolving the parliament, the queen received a bull from Paul IV. erecting Ireland into a kingdom, the pope presuming that the erection made in the reign of Henry VIII. was null and invalid. Probably the queen, who was full of scruples, was not displeased to receive this bull without her desiring it.

The king's absence, and Gardiner's death, did not hinder the fires from being re-kindled, about the end of the year, for the burning of protestants. This shews that Philip and Gardiner were not the only authors of these violences, but that the source of them lay in the queen's furious bigotry.

It was likewise about this time that Charles V. resigned all his Spanish dominions to Philip at two different times[y]. The following year he resigned likewise the imperial dignity to his brother Ferdinand[z]. Paul IV. long refused to own the new emperor, pretending that the resignation of the empire ought to have been made to him[a].

The 21st of March, Cranmer suffered the martyrdom to which he had long been destined. He had been declared he-

But she would in no case part with the child. Fox, tom. III. p. 271. This, as Burnet observes, being at a time that the queen seemed to be every day looking for her delivery, may give some suspicions. Tom. III. p. 244.

That two surveyors shall be chosen in Easter week in every parish, who shall take care to have the highways mended. 3. That purveyors shall not take victuals within five miles of Oxford or Cambridge. 4. An act for the regulation of watermen and bargemen upon the river Thames.

Burnet, 321. —As to his person, his successor, bishop Poinet, gives this description of him: He was of a swarthy colour, hanging look, frowning brows, eyes an inch within his head, hooked nose, wide nostrils, a sparrow mouth, great hands, and long talons, rather than nails, upon his toes, which made him go uneasily. retic in April 1554. But this declaration was attended with only a bare excommunication; the power of the judges who had condemned him, reaching no farther. At laſt, in September 1555, he was tried at Oxford before two commiſſioners [b], one delegated from the pope and one from the queen. His accuſation contained, that he had been twice married: That he had kept a wife ſecretly in the reign of Henry VIII. and openly in that of Edward: That he had publiſhed heretical books, forſaken the communion of the Romiſh church, and denied the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament. He owned all theſe facts, and upon his confeſſion was cited to appear before the pope within eighty days; a needleſs citation, ſince he was detained a priſoner. The 14th of February, Bonner and Thirleby were ſent to Oxford to degrade him. Bonner executed his commiſſion with his uſual inſolence, and with ſevere railleries and invectives againſt Cranmer during the ceremony. But Thirleby melted into tears. Cranmer was clothed in pontifical robes made of canvas, to render him ridiculous; and then ſtript of that ludicrous attire, piece by piece, according to the ceremonies of degradation practiſed in the church of Rome [c]. But what was ridiculous, was his being condemned for non-appearance at Rome, though he was all the while a cloſe priſoner.

Death ſhould of courſe have immediately followed the ſentence of the commiſſioners and his degradation. But ſo many ſnares were laid to overcome the conſtancy of this prelate, that by infirmity, and the hopes of ſaving his life, he was prevailed with to ſign an abjuration [d]. His enemies, it ſeems, ſhould have been ſatisfied with engaging him in this weakneſs, but his death was what they wanted, and nothing leſs would content them. The queen, who pretended a merit in forgiving him his private offences, and in being moved only by a zeal for religion, ſeeing all her meaſures broke by his abjuration, pulled off the maſk, and ſigned a warrant for burning him, notwithſtanding his abjuration. Then it was that Cranmer came to himſelf, and, full of ſhame and confuſion, retracted at the ſtake, and reſolved the hand which had ſigned the fatal abjuration ſhould firſt ſuffer. He held it extended in the fire till it dropped off [e], and then was obſerved to beat his breaſt with the other. Thus he expired, teſtifying a repentance for the fault he had committed. His heart was found entire in the aſhes after his whole body was conſumed, which occaſioned divers reflections foreign to my purpoſe. The enemies of the reformation triumphed in the fall of this prelate, and the proteſtants excuſed him in the beſt manner they could [f]. Pole was conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury the day after his death. It ſeems he had his Congé d'elire with his election, and his bulls from Rome diſpatched before that, becauſe the order for the reſtitution of the temporalities bears date the 21ſt of March, the day of Cranmer's death [g]. It is therefore without foundation that Pole is accuſed of haſtening his death, to take poſſeſſion of his archbiſhopric, becauſe there was almoſt a month between the queen's warrant for burning Cranmer and the execution. Pole had no need of Cranmer's death to be poſſeſſed of the archbiſhopric, vacant ever ſince his predeceſſor's condemnation. And indeed, he was now archbiſhop of Canterbury before Cranmer died, having been elected in England, and approved by the pope, as is expreſſed in the order for reſtoring the temporalities, dated the 21ſt of March.

All the reſt of the year was a continual and violent perſecution of the proteſtants. The furious Bonner, who had the care of puniſhing heretics, not content to burn them one by one, ſent them in troops to the flames; ſo that in the year 1556, eighty-five periſhed by his barbarity. The very women were not ſpared, and the fury of the perſecutors fell upon innocent infants. In the iſle of Guernſey, a woman big with child being condemned to be burnt, and the violence of the fire burſting her womb, a boy fell into the flames, which, being ſnatched out by one more merciful than the reſt, was, after a ſhort conſultation, thrown in again by command of the magiſtrates who aſſiſted at the execution.

While, by theſe violent proceedings, the utter ruin of the proteſtant religion was endeavoured, the queen, on the other hand, laboured to ſupport that of the church of Rome, by repairing old monaſteries and founding new ones [h]. Perhaps ſhe had more advanced her deſign to reſtore the religious houſes, had not the nobility and gentry taken the alarm. It happened, even in the laſt ſeſſion of the parliament, that ſome of the commons, upon hearing a propoſal concerning that affair, laid their hands on their ſwords, and boldly ſaid, They knew how to defend their own properties. The queen ſeeing ſo many obſtacles, and not thinking it proper at that time to puſh the affair, reſolved to wait a more favourable opportunity, and proceed gradually. Mean while, ſhe gave a commiſſion to Bonner and ſome others, to raze out of the public records whatever had been done by Henry VIII. againſt the monks and the pope, and particularly the accounts of the viſitations of monaſteries, and the renunciations of the papal authority by the monks. This has made the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of that time very defective, and yet, notwithſtanding the care of the commiſſioners, many records of this nature eſcaped their diligence, and remained to this day.

The war ſtill continuing between France and Spain, without the intervention of the Engliſh, Philip was deſirous of either a peace or a truce, to have leiſure to fix himſelf firmly on the throne, lately reſigned to him by the emperor his father. His queen had mediated for this peace or truce, and obtained that the two kings ſhould ſend their embaſſadors between Calais and Arders, where they had indeed met the 21ſt of May the laſt year, but without coming to any concluſion [i]. The advancement of Paul IV. to the papal throne rendered the peace ſtill more difficult. He was a pope of the moſt extravagant pride, and though fourſcore years old, was forming vaſt projects. He cannot be better compared than to Julius II. He had two nephews, one a cardinal, and the other governor of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and both mortal enemies of the family of the Colonni, whoſe ruin they had reſolved, and conſequently the king of Spain's, who ſupported it. To effect their deſign, they perſuaded the pope their uncle, that they had diſcovered a conſpiracy formed againſt him by the Spaniards. In conſequence of this pretended diſcovery, they opened the packets of the duke of Alva, viceroy of Naples, and therein pretended to find inconteſtable proofs. They committed cardinal Colonni to priſon, and arreſted the envoys of Philip and the queen of England. Then they ſeized Palliano and Nettuno, two towns belonging to the Colonni.

But not ſatisfied with this, they ſoon after induced their uncle the pope to declare war with Spain, without having either money or troops to ſupport it. He was therefore obliged to have recourſe to the king of France, who was in actual war with Philip. For that purpoſe, he propoſed to him the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples, and offered him all his forces to execute the deſign, provided he would aſſiſt him in the war he had undertaken. The propoſal being laid before the council of France, the cardinal of Lorrain ſupported it with all his intereſt. The cardinal had then ſuch influence over the court, that no perſon almoſt durſt contradict him, though it was eaſy to ſee that a league with the pope could bring no advantage to the king. The cardinal's aim was to procure for his brother the duke of Guiſe the command of the army which ſhould be ſent into Italy.

This league, offenſive and defenſive, was therefore begun

[b] James Brooks, biſhop of Gloceſter, was commiſſioned from Pole, and the king and queen delegated two aſſiſtants, which were Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, p. 352.

[c] His behaviour in this ceremony was uniform and becoming. He was not ſorry, he ſaid, to be thus cut off, with all this pageantry, from any relation to the church of Rome, but declared it to be great injuſtice to condemn him for not going to Rome when he was ſhut up in priſon; and denying the pope had any authority over him, appealed from this ſentence to a free general council. Burnet. p. 333.——This ſpectacle, as Godwin obſerves, was ſufficient, not only to extort compaſſion from his enemies, but even to melt inanimate things into tears. The primate of England, that lately flouriſhed in the higheſt honour and authority with princes, moſt venerable for his ſanctity of life, for his age, perſon, learning, gravity, and innumerable excellencies of mind, now, by the malice of the Romaniſts, dreſſed in a ridiculous old habit, baited with ſcurrility and contemptuous revilings, and dragged to a moſt inhuman and tormenting death, p. 353.

[d] He was prevailed upon to ſubſcribe not only one form of recantation, but ſix diſtinct ones, which the reader may ſee in Strype's Mem. tom. III. p. 233, &c.

[g] Rapin by miſtake ſays, he was made archbiſhop the day Cranmer died. Though he had been elected and approved by the pope, Pole thought it indecent to be conſecrated as long as Cranmer lived, yet his chooſing the next day for it, brought him under the ſuſpicion of having procured his death; ſo that the words of Elijah to Ahab concerning Naboth, were applied to him, Thou haſt killed and taken poſſeſſion. [i] The Engliſh embaſſadors were cardinal Pole (accompanied by ſir William Cecil, for whom he had a particular eſteem) the chancellor Gardiner, the earl of Arundel, and the lord Paget. They went over to Calais May 8. Strype, tom. III. p. 218.

February

at Paris, and ſigned at Rome, where the cardinals of Lorrain and Tournon had repaired the beginning of October 1555. The pope promiſed the inveſtiture of Naples to a ſon of France; and the king, on his part, engaged to ſend into that country an army of twelve thouſand foot, five hundred men at arms, and as many light-horſe. But, ſhortly after, by the mediation of Mary, Henry II. and Philip concluded a five years truce, ſigned the 5th of February 1556. The pope complained loudly, that the king of France had left him to the vengeance of the Spaniards. Indeed, the duke of Alva had now approached Rome, and taken ſome places, and, amongſt the reſt, Oſtia, which the pope's nephews had neglected to ſtore. In this extremity, the pope and his nephews had no other refuge than to prevail with the king of France to break the truce with Spain. It was with this view that cardinal Caraffa repaired to Paris, as legate a latere, declaring that he came to effect a peace between the two crowns. At the ſame time, the pope loaded with praiſes the queen of England for mediating a truce; and exhorted her not to leave her work unfiniſhed, but endeavour to change the truce into a firm and laſting peace. Mean time, the legate, by his intrigues and magnificent promiſes, prevailed at laſt with the king to break the truce, without alleging other reaſon than that the pope was oppreſſed by the Spaniards, though his holineſs had firſt declared war againſt Spain.

In January 1557, cardinal Pole viſited both the univerſities. Whilſt he was at Cambridge, Bucer and Fagius, two German divines, dead ſome years before, were ridiculouſly cited before the commiſſioners to give an account of their faith, and, upon their non-appearance, both were condemned to be burnt. The ſentence was followed by a warrant from the court to execute it, and the two bodies, in their coffins, were tied to ſtakes and conſumed to aſhes [k]. At Oxford, Peter Martyr's wife was dug out of her grave by order of the legate, and buried in a dunghill, becauſe, having been a nun, ſhe had broke her vow. At firſt a proceſs was intended againſt her as an heretic. But as ſhe had never learned to ſpeak Engliſh, no witneſs could be produced to ſwear he had ever heard her utter any hereſy. If all had been thus dug up who might have been preſumed to die heretics ſince the reformation, there would have been work enough. In all apppearance, the ſuffering Peter Martyr to go out of the kingdom was heartily repented. If the body of his wife was thus treated, what muſt he have expected, had he been ſtill in the hands of his perſecutors [l]?

The violences hitherto acted, upon both the dead and the living, had a quite contrary effect to what the queen had imagined. The eccleſiaſtics only continued their rage; but the magiſtrates began to relax, and ſcrupled to be the inſtruments of theſe barbarities. The council, being informed of it, wrote circular letters to all the towns, to inflame their zeal in the perſecution of heretics. But theſe letters produced no great effect.

The queen, and her miniſters, enraged to hear from all parts that the number of the proteſtants encreaſed rather than leſſened, reſolved, as ſome have aſſured, to erect an inquiſition in England, like that in Spain. To that end, a commiſſion was granted the laſt year, empowering twenty-one commiſſioners [m] to ſit upon trials of hereſy, with a power ſo unlimited, that no other rules were preſcribed than their diſcretion, nor any perſon whatever exempted from their juriſdiction. This was followed by a perſecution, in which ſeventy-nine proteſtants periſhed.

While theſe things paſſed in England, the duke of Guiſe arrived in Italy, with the army deſigned for the conqueſt of Naples. He ſtayed ſome time at Rome, where he found nothing ready of what the pope had promiſed. Nevertheleſs he entered the kingdom of Naples in April, where he performed no great exploits. Shortly after, he was recalled by the pope to the relief of Rome, cloſely blocked up by the duke of Alva.

On the other hand, Philip, finding the French had broken the truce, reſolved to exert his utmoſt to eſtabliſh his reputation in the beginning of his reign. He raiſed for that purpoſe an army of fifty thouſand men, who were to act in Picardy; and, to make himſelf the more formidable, tried all ways to gain the queen to his intereſts, notwithſtanding the agreement in their marriage-articles, and his oath to give no occaſion of rupture between England and France. His creatures about Mary perpetually inſinuated to her, that ſhe was ill treated by the king of France; who, not content with receiving the Engliſh fugitives that retired into his dominions, had even given penſions to ſeveral. Theſe inſinuations began to operate on the queen. But, to put her quite out of humour with Henry, an artifice was uſed, which ſucceeded according to the deſires of thoſe who contrived it, probably to do Philip ſervice. Dr. Wotton, the Engliſh embaſſador in France, ſent for one of his nephews to Paris, and gave him proper inſtructions to accompliſh the project. This young man, applying himſelf to one of the king's gentlemen, deſired a private audience of the king, ſaying, he had an affair of great conſequence to communicate to his majeſty. The king, refuſing to ſee him, ordered him to apply to the conſtable of Montmorency. Wotton, in his conference with the conſtable, told him, he was ſent by the inhabitants of Calais, who were generally proteſtants, and deſirous to put themſelves into the hands of the French king, provided they might have liberty to profeſs their religion. The conſtable, liſtening to this propoſition, bid him explain how it might be effected; and, liking the project, told Wotton to come to him again and talk of the affair. But Wotton [n], inſtead of returning to the conſtable, croſſed the ſeas back into England, and made his report to the queen and her miniſters of what paſſed at Paris. Whereupon the queen thought the king of France was no longer to be regarded, ſince, in the midſt of peace, he was forming projects to ſurpriſe Calais. It appears, that in February ſhe had reſolved upon a rupture with France [o], ſince, by an order of the 19th of the ſame month, commiſſioners were ſent to the ſheriffs and juſtices of peace to levy forces, and have them in readineſs to march upon the firſt notice. Shortly after, another affair happened, which furniſhed her with the deſired pretence to declare war with France.

One Stafford [p], having ſecretly obtained aſſiſtance from the court of France, aſſembled ſome Engliſh fugitives, and, embarking them, landed them in Scotland, towards the end of April, and marched directly to Scarborough, where he ſeized the caſtle, and publiſhed a manifeſto againſt the queen, pretending ſhe had forfeited all her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into the kingdom. He had even the boldneſs to aſſume the title of protector of England. But the earl of Weſtmoreland, aſſembling ſome troops in the north, re-took Scarborough, and made Stafford priſoner, with three of his accomplices [q].

King Philip arrived the 20th of March [r] in England, where eight thouſand men were ready to paſs into the Low Countries. Shortly after his arrival, the queen ſent a herald to declare war againſt France. The 17th of June, the eight thouſand Engliſh [s] under the conduct of the earl of Pembroke, left England, and joined the Spaniſh army commanded by the duke of Savoy; after which Philip himſelf departed in July [t], to return to Bruſſels.

The duke of Savoy, having made a feint for a month to attack ſeveral places in Picardy, fell ſuddenly upon St. Quintin [u], which was in ill condition, and had only a garriſon of three hundred men. All that the conſtable, who commanded the French army, could do, was to detach his nephew, admiral Chatillon, with three thouſand men, to throw himſelf into the town. The admiral ſucceeded in part, having got in the night through the quarters of the beſiegers. But inſtead of three thouſand, only ſeven hundred followed him, the reſt having loſt their way. With this reinforcement he made a gallant defence, in hopes that the conſtable, though much weaker than the enemy, would uſe all poſſible endeavours to relieve him; and indeed nothing was neglected by the conſtable. He was even ſo ſucceſsful as to throw Andelot, brother of the admiral, into the place, with five hundred men. But, in his return, after his ſucceſs, he was attacked by the duke of Savoy, who routed his army, killed two thouſand five hundred of his men, and took him priſoner. In this battle, called the battle of St. Laurence (becauſe fought on the 10th of Auguſt, the day dedicated to that ſaint), France loſt a great number of princes and noblemen, killed or made priſoners [w]. The conſternation was ſo great, that if the duke of Savoy had marched directly to Paris, it was believed nothing could have prevented his entrance. But, inſtead of that, he drew back to his lines, and eight days after, carried the town by ſtorm [x], and took the admiral priſoner on the breach. All France exclaimed againſt the pope, who had occaſioned the rupture. But the blow was ſtruck. The king of France's laſt reſource was to call the duke of Guiſe out of Italy, where he was making no great progreſs.

When the pope heard the queen of England had declared war againſt France, he was ſo angry with Pole, as if he could have hindered it, that he recalled all his legates [y], including Pole in the number; but Karne, the Engliſh embaſſador, remonſtrated to him, by ſome cardinals, the miſchiefs which from thence might enſue to religion. At laſt, after many ſolicitations and remonſtrances, the pope, without revoking his order, promiſed only it ſhould not be notified to Pole, and told the embaſſador he was inclined to continue the cardinal in his legation, if the queen ſhould deſire it. This was before the battle of St. Laurence. But, when the news of the loſs of that battle, and the recalling of the duke of Guiſe, were brought to him, he was again extremely incenſed againſt Pole, and reſolved to ſacrifice him to his revenge. For that purpoſe he ſent for Peyto, the queen's confeſſor, to Rome, and, creating him cardinal, put into his hands the bull of Pole's revocation, and appointed him for his legate in England. But the queen, being informed of it, wrote to Peyto, who was on his return, that if he offered to ſet foot in England, ſhe would bring him within the Præmunire. The letter ſtopt his journey [z]. Mean while, though the pope's brief was not delivered to him, Pole abſtained from the functions of his legateſhip, being unwilling to give the haughty pontiff a plauſible pretence of complaint, who had long hated him.

When the duke of Guiſe had quitted Italy, the pope, unable to defend himſelf againſt the duke of Alva, who was near Rome, made a peace with Spain, and left France in the lurch [a]. By a ſecret article of the treaty, Pole was reſtored to his office of legate.

Mean time, Henry being recovered from his conſternation by Philip's not improving his advantages, the duke of Guiſe had time to come to his aſſiſtance, and was immediately conſtituted his lieutenant general. On the other hand, Henry ſolicited the queen-regent of Scotland to break the peace with England, and that princeſs was as ready to oblige him. But ſhe had a powerful party againſt her, which was for preſerving the peace. Wherefore, as ſhe could not bring the ſtates to the reſolution ſhe deſired, ſhe took another courſe to accompliſh her deſign. She fortified Aymouth, contrary to an expreſs article of the treaty lately concluded with England; and thereby engaged the Engliſh to oppoſe it with force. This produced indeed a breach between the two nations [b]; and the Scotch army, under the conduct of d'Oyſel, even entered the frontiers of England. But the ſtates, ſtill hoping to repair the breach made in the peace without their conſent, required d'Oyſel, by an expreſs order, to return, which he was forced to obey. The regent, ſeeing how low her authority was, preſſed the court of France to haſten the marriage of the queen her daughter with the dauphin; to the end that prince, being in poſſeſſion of Scotland, might be more maſter of its forces and counſels. Henry, improving this advice, immediately ſent embaſſadors into Scotland to ſettle with the ſtates the marriage articles [c].

The war which was preparing in Scotland, and that already begun in France, greatly embarraſſed the queen, becauſe ſhe wanted money. She tried to raiſe money by way of loans, but without ſucceſs. She was therefore obliged to call a parliament for the 20th of January, though with regret, becauſe ſhe feared that, to obtain a ſupply, ſhe ſhould be forced to remit her ſeverities againſt the proteſtants.

About the end of the year, Philip gave notice to the queen of a deſign forming by the court of France upon Calais, and made her an offer of his forces to ſtrengthen the garriſon, which he knew to be weak. This advice, being laid before the council, was ſuſpected to be an artifice of Philip, to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of Calais, on pretence of reinforcing the garriſon. This, though a bare ſuſpicion, was not entirely improbable. Mean while, the counſellors, as if it had been a moſt evident truth, could not believe that France had any intention to beſiege the town, though it was not provided with the fourth part of the neceſſary troops and ammunition. It ſeemed, that the ſole reputation of the town was to be its ſecurity. So the advice was neglected, and nothing done for its relief, though the governor, William lord Wentworth, was not wanting in his ſolicitations [d].

Nothing leſs was to be expected from a council compoſed chiefly of eccleſiaſtics, who were only intent upon the ruin of the proteſtants. After ſo ſhameful a neglect of providing for the ſafety of Calais, the queen and her miniſters were in the utmoſt conſternation, upon the news that the town was actually loſt [e]. The duke of Guiſe beſieged it the 1ſt of January, and, carrying the fort called Newnambridge [f], which commanded the avenues from the land, and alſo the Riſbank, which commanded the harbour [g], obliged the governor to capitulate the ſeventh day of the ſiege. After he was maſter of the place, he ordered all the Engliſh to depart, as Edward III. had expelled the French two hundred and ten years before. Then he ſat down before Guiſnes, commanded by lord Grey [h], with a garriſon of eleven hundred men. But the garriſon was ſo diſcouraged by the loſs of Calais, that, on the firſt attack, they quitted the town, and retired into the citadel. Mean while, the Engliſh governor, perceiving the French were fallen to plundering, made a ſally and beat them out of the town; but, deſpairing to keep it, ſet it on fire, and retired. Soon after, the French cloſely inveſted the citadel, and, in an aſſault, the garriſon loſt three hundred men. After that, the governor, ſeeing no poſſibility of a longer reſiſtance, ſurrendered himſelf priſoner of war, with his whole garriſon. The caſtle of Hames, ſituated in an almoſt inacceſſible marſh, might have made ſome reſiſtance; but the garriſon fled, and left it to the French. Thus, in the middle of winter, and in leſs than fifteen days, the Engliſh loſt all the remains of their antient conqueſts in France by the incapacity of a queen, whoſe thoughts were wholly engroſſed by one affair, as if the deſtruction of the proteſtants had alone merited her application, and by the negligence, if it deſerves no worſe name, of her council. Such was the fruit England reaped from her alliance with Spain, notwithſtanding all Gardiner's care to prevent a mixture of intereſts between the two crowns. The nonperformance of this article ſhews, how the reſt would have been obſerved, if Philip, had he had any children by the queen, could have introduced himſelf, as their guardian, into the government of the kingdom.

The loſs of Calais made great noiſe in England. The proteſtants took occaſion to arraign the government, and the creatures of the court were ſo confounded, that they durſt not open their mouths in juſtification of the miniſtry. Some accuſed them of treaſon, others of incapacity, and their moſt zealous adherents could not but own their negligence. The two governors of Calais [i] and Guiſnes were the moſt unhappy. Beſides the loſs of their reputation, the miniſters, to inſinuate to the people that theſe places were loſt by their fault, ſuffered them to remain priſoners, and no care was taken for their releaſe. But no one had a more lively ſenſe of the loſs than the queen [k]. She perfectly knew the value of Calais after it was taken, which rendered England always formidable to France, becauſe the Engliſh could in twenty-four hours, land great armies in that kingdom. The greatneſs of the loſs has ſince been ſtill more ſenſibly felt. From that time, France, except when diſtracted with civil wars, no more ſhewed for England that regard, ſhe was before forced to pay.

Immediately after the taking of Calais, Philip ſtrongly preſſed the queen to make a vigorous effort to recover it, before France had time to repair and fortify it. But it was not poſſible for the miniſters to find means to execute ſuch an undertaking. Upon a computation of the neceſſary expence for the fleet and army, it was judged dangerous, conſidering the general diſcontent, to load the people with ſo great a burden, even though the parliament could be brought to a compliance [l]. This was ſent to Philip in a letter of thanks for his advice and offers. But beſides that reaſon, there was another of great weight, namely, the fears of the miniſtry, the council, and the queen herſelf, that the ſiege of Calais would oblige them to interrupt the perſecution. So, in the belief that one year more would ſuffice to deſtroy the reformation and the reformed, they judged it proper to defer the ſiege of Calais till a more convenient ſeaſon.

The parliament [m], which met the 20th of January, did nothing conſiderable beſides granting a ſubſidy to the queen, after the clergy had led the way [n]. The houſe of commons was filled with perpetual complaints, that by the pernicious counſels of the miniſters, the queen had exhauſted her treaſury, by the reſtitution of the church-lands and the new foundations of the monaſteries.

This affair being finiſhed, the friends of the court brought in a bill to confirm all the queen's letters patents, without explaining themſelves farther. This was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by one of the members, who urged, that a power ſo unlimited would put the kingdom in danger, and the queen in a capacity to diſpoſe of the crown from the right heirs. The commons were offended with theſe inſinuations againſt the queen, and ſent the member to priſon [o]. But though the queen ſeemed pleaſed with the zeal of the commons for her reputation, ſhe clearly ſaw how far they were from any thoughts to deprive the princeſs Elizabeth of the crown. It is not known what was the intent of ſo general a confirmation: but it is likely, the authors had ſome view diſadvantageous to Elizabeth.

In this ſeſſion, Ambroſe and Robert Dudley, ſons of the late duke of Northumberland, were reſtored in blood. Henry their brother loſt his life at the ſiege of St. Quintin. After that, the parliament was prorogued from the 7th of March to the 7th of November.

In April this year, the dauphin at laſt married Mary the young queen of Scots [p]. After many difficulties the ſtates of Scotland granted the dauphin the title of king of Scotland, upon a ſolemn promiſe from his father, that he ſhould content himſelf with the bare title, and not concern himſelf in the government of the kingdom.

The princeſs Elizabeth was now in more danger than ever. The queen ſenſibly declined in her health. She had not been well managed during her pretended pregnancy, becauſe having committed herſelf to the care of women who only flattered her, ſhe had neglected to conſult the phyſicians, who might have prevented the conſequences of that accident. From that time ſhe never enjoyed a ſound health. She was naturally melancholy, and this temper was encreaſed by her many mortifications in the two former reigns. Afterwards the diſguſt of the king her huſband, of which ſhe was but too ſenſible, ſtill augmented her melancholy; and the loſs of Calais brought her to ſuch a ſtate, that ſhe could bear the ſight but of very few perſons. The body ſympathized with the mind, and ſhe felt herſelf grow daily weaker. In this condition, ſhe was troubled with the ſame reflexions on her ſiſter Elizabeth's account, that had before diſturbed Edward on her's, namely, that after her death, what ſhe had with ſo much pains eſtabliſhed, would be infallibly overturned. The biſhops were ſtrongly perſuaded of this. They were not ignorant that Elizabeth, whatever pains ſhe took to conceal it, was a proteſtant in her heart, and even induced to be ſo from her temporal intereſt. Hence ſome were perpetually inſinuating to the queen, the neceſſity of putting her out of the way. Gardiner had been of this opinion, and frequently ſaid, it was in vain to lop off the branches while the tree was ſuffered to ſtand. It is aſtoniſhing this advice had never been followed! The queen was a bigot to the laſt degree. It gave her no remorſe to ſpill human blood, when religion was the pretence. So, in all appearance, ſhe would not have ſpared a ſiſter, whom ſhe conſidered as a baſtard, had not God ſuffered the politics of Philip to prevail over the zeal of the queen his ſpouſe. For at the very time I am ſpeaking of, when the ſpirit of perſecution rendered men deaf to reaſon, juſtice, and humanity, to what can be aſcribed, but to the particular protection of heaven, the preſervation of this princeſs, whom ſo many reaſons demanded as a ſacrifice to the Romiſh religion? But God, who has ſet bounds to the ſea, reſtrains alſo the fury of perſecutors, and prevents them from maſſacring thoſe whom he has reſerved for the peace of his church. However, Elizabeth was, contrary to all probability, preſerved through Mary's whole reign, and particularly in the latter part of it, when ſhe appeared to be moſt in danger.

Some time after the prorogation of the parliament, the king of Sweden ſent a gentleman to Elizabeth, to inform her of his deſign to demand her in marriage, and to deſire her conſent [q]. The meſſenger deſiring a private audience, ſhe would not grant it, without firſt knowing his meſſage. After ſhe was informed, ſhe ſent him a poſitive anſwer, that ſhe would receive no ſuch propoſal, but by the queen's direction. The meſſenger replied, his maſter acted like a lover, who would not eſpouſe a princeſs, without being firſt ſure of her conſent, by which he teſtified his eſteem for her; but when ſhe had once allowed his addreſſes, he would then as a king demand her by his embaſſador. But this was not capable to make her alter her reſolution. On the contrary, ſhe ſignified to him, that the king of Sweden would oblige her, in thinking no more of her. This anſwer, one would think, ſhould have ſatisfied the Swediſh embaſſador, then arrived in London, ſince the king their maſter reſolved not to marry Elizabeth without her conſent, and yet they propoſed the marriage to the queen. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect, that the Swediſh gentleman who deſired a private audience of the princeſs, had not received his commiſſion immediately from the king his maſter, but from the embaſſadors, and that the queen's miniſters had induced them to ſound the princeſs, in order to draw her into a ſnare. However, preſently after, the queen ordered her to be told [r], that ſhe was pleaſed with her anſwer to the Swediſh gentleman: that the embaſſadors had in their king's name demanded her in marriage, in which ſhe deſired to know her mind. Elizabeth anſwered, ſhe was content with her condition; and that, if the queen would allow her to purſue her own inclination, ſhe proteſted, a ſingle life was to her preferable to a marriage with the greateſt prince in the world. Thus the affair proceeded no farther.

The loſs of Calais, and the ſeſſion of the parliament, had given ſome reſpite to the proteſtants. But in the end of March, the perſecution was renewed with greater fury than ever. The queen herſelf, exceeding her prerogative, publiſhed a proclamation, "That whoever had any heretical books, and did not preſently burn them without reading, ſhould be eſteemed rebels, and executed without delay by [k] She was ſo affected with it, that ſhe abandoned herſelf to deſpair; and told thoſe about her, ſhe ſhould die, though they were yet ſtrangers to the cauſe of her death; but if they would know it hereafter, they muſt diſſect her, and they ſhould find Calais at her heart. Godwin, p. 358.

[l] The computation they made was thus: there could not be ſent, to any purpoſe, under twenty thouſand men; the pay of them for ſix months would riſe to 170,000l. Garriſons, and an army againſt the Scots, and ſecuring the coaſt againſt the French, would come to 150,000l. The ſetting out of a fleet, and an army by ſea, would amount to 200,000l. There was alſo great want of ammunition and ordnance. All this would riſe to 520,000l. Burnet, tom. II. p. 359.

The ſubſidy was four ſhillings in the pound of lands (eight ſhillings of ſtrangers), and two ſhillings and eight pence of goods from every perſon worth five pounds, to be paid before June 24. Journ. Parl.—In this parliament it was enacted, That if any perſon carries away a young woman, under ſixteen years of age, without the conſent of her parents or guardians, he ſhall ſuffer two years impriſonment; and if any one marries a woman under that age, he ſhall ſuffer five years impriſonment.

[o] This member's name was ——— Copley, repreſentative for ———. His words, as ſet down in the Journals of the houſe of commons, were, "That he feared the queen might thereby give away the crown from the right inheritor." For this, he was committed to the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, but afterwards releaſed at the deſire of the houſe, who pleaded his youth as an excuſe.

the martial law." On the other hand, ſhe expreſly forbid to pray for thoſe who were executed, or even to ſay, God help them. This cauſed the author of the Hiſtory of the Reformation judiciouſly to remark, that "it was not ſo much the converſion as the deſtruction of thoſe they called heretics, that the biſhops deſired." A convincing proof of this was ſeen ſhort after. One Benbridge being tied to the ſtake, through the violence of the flames, cried out, "I recant." Whereupon the ſheriff [s] ordered the fire to be extinguiſhed, and the ſufferer ſigned an abjuration dictated to him. But ſoon after he received an order from court to burn the condemned perſon, and come himſelf to London, where he was committed to priſon. The fury of the perſecutors was ſo extreme, that though they were going to loſe the queen, they ceaſed not theſe ſeverities. About a week before her death, five perſons were burnt at Canterbury, and in this laſt year of her reign, thirty-nine proteſtants ſuffered martyrdom in ſeveral places. Authors are not agreed concerning the number of thoſe who died in flames during Mary's reign. Thoſe who ſay the leaſt, reckon two hundred and eighty-four; but others affirm, that in the two firſt years of the perſecution, which began in 1555, eight hundred were put to death [t].

While theſe tragedies were acting in different places of the kingdom, the queen, who was deeply affected with the loſs of Calais, was willing to make one effort to repair it. Philip had adviſed to try to ſeize Breſt. For that purpoſe, ſhe put to ſea a fleet of one hundred and twenty ſhips [u], commanded by the lord Clinton [w], who landed at Conqueſt, and burnt that ſmall town; but the country riſing upon the Engliſh, obliged them to retire to their ſhips, with the loſs of ſix hundred of their men [x]. The whole country being in arms to oppoſe a ſecond deſcent, and freſh troops daily arriving in theſe parts, the Engliſh admiral, who had only ſeven thouſand men, thought it not proper to engage in any new action, and returned. Such was the benefit the queen reaped from this expenſive armament. She was now ſenſible, that the continuation of the war would procure her no advantage, and readily conſented to a negotiation then propoſed for a peace between France, England, and Spain. Cambray was the place appointed for the congreſs, which was opened in October [y].

The parliament meeting the 5th of November, the queen demanded aſſiſtance to continue the war, in caſe the negotiation ſhould miſcarry. The houſe of commons was ſo little inclined to grant her requeſt, that ſhe was obliged to ſend the chancellor and ten other lords to lay the ill ſtate of her affairs before them, and pray them to haſten the neceſſary ſupplies. This ſolicitation producing ſome effect, the commons debated, that and the two following days, upon a ſubſidy. But the queen's death put an end to the conſultations.

She had been ſome time afflicted with the dropſy, which being much encreaſed the beginning of November, carried her off the 17th of the ſame month, in the 43d year of her age, after a reign of five years, four months, and eleven days.

Cardinal Pole followed her within ſixteen hours. He was a prelate of a ſweet and moderate temper, who would have been glad to bring back, by fair and lawful means, the Engliſh to their antient belief, but approved not the methods of fire and ſword. This gave his enemies room to repreſent him as a little inclined to the proteſtant religion, or at leaſt, as one of too tender a diſpoſition for that time. Neither the queen, nor Philip, nor the pope, nor Gardiner, nor the biſhops ſubſtituted in the place of the ejected proteſtant biſhops, were perſons to be guided by his moderate maxims. Accordingly, Pole was never conſulted on religion, though, in all other affairs, the queen placed a great confidence in him. Pope Paul IV. was his ſworn enemy. It was he who by his ſlanders prevented his aſcending the papal throne on the death of Paul III. though he was elected in the conclave. From that time, believing Pole could not forgive him ſuch an injury, he never ceaſed doing him ill offices. And when he was himſelf pope, he often gave him marks of his enmity. It is even pretended, that when he recalled him from his legation, to put Peyto in his room, he intended to puniſh him ſeverely for having been too gentle to the proteſtants. But Philip and Mary took him into their protection [z].

The exceſſive bigotry of queen Mary is evident from the hiſtory of her reign. To this ſhe joined a temper cruel and vindictive, which ſhe endeavoured to confound with a zeal for religion. But when it was not poſſible to unite them, ſhe plainly ſhewed, ſhe was inclined to cruelty as well by nature as zeal. She had the misfortune to be encouraged in this diſpoſition by all who approached her. King Philip was naturally moroſe. Gardiner was one of the moſt revengeful men living. Bonner was a fury; and the other biſhops were choſen from amongſt the moſt cruel and barbarous of the clergy. This was the quality by which alone a man was thought worthy of the epiſcopal dignity. The perſecution therefore againſt the proteſtants in this reign has nothing which ought to ſeem ſtrange. Dr. Burnet ſays, Mary had a generous diſpoſition of mind. It were to be wiſhed, he had given us ſome paſſages of her life, where this generoſity appeared. For my part, I find but one action to approve in her whole reign. This was her rejecting the Spaniſh embaſſador's project, to make herſelf abſolute at the expence of the laws and liberties of the nation. She diſcovered no great capacity in the government of her dominions; and the loſs of Calais, though there was not ſomething more odious, would be an everlaſting blot upon her reign [a].

BY an indenture of the firſt of queen Mary, a pound weight of gold, of the old ſtandard, was coined into thirty-ſix pounds; and a pound weight of ſilver, eleven ounces fine, was coined into three pounds by tale.

[t] According to Fox's account, and biſhop Burnet's calculation, there were two hundred and eighty-four burnt in all. A paper found among the lord Burghley's MSS. makes the number of thoſe that were burnt to be two hundred and ninety. The ſame lord Burghley, in a treatiſe wrote in the year 1583, reckoneth up the number of thoſe that died in that reign, by impriſonment, torments, fire, and famine, to be near four hundred. But the author of the preface to biſhop Ridley's book De Caena Domini, who, according to Bale (de Script. p. 684, 731), was William Wittingham, affirms, that in the two firſt years of the queen's perſecution, there were above eight hundred put to the moſt cruel kinds of death for religion. The reaſon of this diverſity may be, that no exact liſt was kept at the time of the perſons committed to the flames, but the accounts of them were afterwards gathered by ſeveral perſons, according to the beſt intelligence they could receive from their friends, throughout the ſeveral parts of the kingdom. However this be, it is generally acknowledged, that there were burnt five biſhops, one and twenty divines, eight gentlemen, eighty-four artificers, one hundred huſbandmen, ſervants, and labourers, twenty-ſix wives, twenty widows, nine virgins, two boys, and two infants. Sixty-four more were perſecuted for their religion: whereof ſeven were whipped, ſixteen periſhed in priſon, and twelve were buried in dunghills. It is obſervable, that the perſecution raged moſt in Bonner's dioceſs, and in Kent. For, as Heylin reckons it, in all the province of York, there was but one brought to the ſtake; and but three in the four Welſh dioceſſes. In thoſe of Exeter, Wells, Peterborough, and Lincoln, there is mention but of one a-piece; of two in that of Ely, and of no more than three a-piece at Briſtol and Saliſbury: in thoſe of Oxford, Gloceſter, Worceſter, and Hereford, none at all. And now, not to let ſuch helliſh and bloody doings paſs without ſome reflection, I ſhall obſerve with Mr. Collier, that, "to deſtroy people for points of mere ſpeculation, and which have no ill effect on practice and civil government, ſeems very remote from the ſpirit of Chriſtianity. Suppoſing truth on the perſecuting ſide, yet to burn a man becauſe he will not belie his conſcience, and turn hypocrite, is ſtrangely unaccountable. Men cannot believe what they pleaſe: their underſtandings are not all of a ſize. Things do not ſtand in the ſame light, and ſtrike with the ſame force on every body. Beſides, if the Roman catholics believed the reformed ſuch notorious heretics, if they believed they would be ſo ill received in the other world, why did they not uſe them gentlier in this? Why did they hurry them to eternal deſtruction before their time?" We may juſtly affirm, that ſuch wiſdom as this, did not proceed from above, but was earthly, ſenſual, and deviliſh. Collier Eccl. THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XVII.

The Reign of Queen ELIZABETH: containing the Space of about Forty-Four Years and four Months.

23. ELIZABETH.

[1558.] THE death of Mary, though foreſeen, ſtruck the counſellors and miniſters with aſtoniſhment. They were all of the prevailing religion, and had adviſed, or at leaſt approved, the perſecution which the proteſtants lately groaned under; and now, in all likelihood, the proteſtants were going, in their turn, to govern. Mary's death was therefore concealed for ſome hours, to give time to conſult what was to be done. But, as the parliament was ſitting, it was not in their power to decide any thing concerning the ſucceſſion, eſpecially as it was clearly ſettled by the will of Henry VIII. authoriſed by an act of parliament which had never been repealed. Their conſultation therefore ended only in a meſſage, to inform the parliament of the queen's death. This was all that could be done on the occaſion. The news was firſt communicated to the houſe of lords, who immediately conſidered the rights of the perſons who might pretend to the crown. If the affair had been left to the deciſion of the civil or common law, there would have been no ſmall difficulty, ſo much had Henry perplexed it by his divorces, and by contradictory acts of parliament. But in England, the parliament, which includes the king, lords, and commons, is the ſupreme legiſlator; and, when force does not interpoſe, the validity of its laws are unqueſtionable. Henry VIII. obtained an act, empowering him to ſettle the line of ſucceſſion as he ſhould think proper. He placed Elizabeth next to her ſiſter Mary, though both had been declared baſtards. This ſufficed to give Elizabeth a right, which the parliament could not conteſt, ſince it was a parliamentary right, as founded in the act to empower Henry to ſettle the ſucceſſion. Beſides, every one knew the diſſolution of that prince's marriage with Anne Bullen, and the act which, in conſequence of the divorce, declared Elizabeth illegitimate, was the pure effect of the king's caprice, and of the compliance rather than juſtice of the parliament. But though the lords ſhould have thought to exclude Elizabeth from the ſucceſſion, on what other perſon could they have fixed, without expoſing the kingdom to great danger? It will be proper briefly to explain this, as a thing very requiſite to the ſequel of this reign.

Upon Mary's death, three princeſſes could pretend to the crown, namely, Elizabeth, ſiſter of the late queen; Mary, queen of Scotland, grand-daughter to Margaret, eldeſt ſiſter of Henry VIII. and Frances, ducheſs of Suffolk, daughter of Mary, younger ſiſter of the ſame prince. Elizabeth ſupported her right upon the will of the king her father, authoriſed by act of parliament. Mary could object, that Elizabeth had been declared a baſtard by an act ſtill unrepealed: that no baſtard had ever aſcended the throne of England: that the laws of the country gave baſtards no ſhare in the inheritance of their fathers, and conſequently the ſucceſſion was devolved to the poſterity of Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. It could be alleged for the ducheſs of Suffolk, that Elizabeth being a baſtard, and the queen of Scotland a foreigner, and not even placed in the order of ſucceſſion by the will of Henry VIII. the crown ought to fall to the poſterity of Mary, ſecond daughter of Henry VII. It is not neceſſary to examine theſe ſeveral pretenſions, becauſe, probably, the parliament, which made the deciſion, proceeded not ſo much upon the laws, as upon policy and the intereſts of the kingdom. The queen of Scotland had married the dauphin, heir apparent to the crown of France. In adjudging the crown to her, England would have been in danger of ſubjection to, or dependence on, France. This alone was ſufficient to exclude her. The ducheſs of Suffolk could not have been placed on the throne with any colour of juſtice, ſince ſhe only derived her right from the will of Henry VIII. which was equally favourable to Elizabeth. Beſides, ſuch a choice would have infallibly thrown the kingdom into a civil war. It was probaby for theſe reaſons that the houſe of lords declared for Elizabeth. It ſeems, however, that a great difficulty was to occur. All England, and particularly the houſe of lords, made profeſſion of the Romiſh religion, and it was ſcarce to be queſtioned that Elizabeth was a proteſtant in her heart. But two things, doubtleſs, conſpired to remove this obſtacle. The firſt was, that the biſhops and catholic lords were perſuaded, that Elizabeth, ſhould ſhe deſire it, would find it difficult to change the eſtabliſhed religion. They even believed her of a temper ſo complying, that ſhe would rather conform to the rites of the Romiſh religion, as ſhe had done for ſome years, than hazard the cauſing of diſturbances which might be fatal to her. If Camden's teſtimony is to be entirely credited, Elizabeth made no ſcruple to declare herſelf a catholic during the reign of her ſiſter. "The lady Elizabeth,"

(ſays this hiſtorian) "now guiding herſelf as a ſhip in tempeſtuous weather, both heard divine ſervice after the Romiſh manner, and was frequently confeſſed; and, at the preſſing inſtances and menaces of cardinal Pole, through fear of death, profeſſed herſelf a Roman catholic."

The ſecond reaſon which probably prevented the lords from inſiſting on her excluſion was, that though they all profeſſed the catholic religion, they were not however all catholics. Many, and perhaps the greateſt number, had only diſſembled their ſentiments during Mary's reign. But, being freed from all danger by her death, they could ſpeak boldly, and oppoſe thoſe who pretended to exclude Elizabeth on account of her religion; this reaſon not being of more force againſt her, than it was againſt Mary after Edward's death.

However, the houſe of lords declaring for Elizabeth, the commons were ſent for, and acquainted by the chancellor with the queen's death and their reſolution; which was readily and unanimouſly embraced. The ſame day Elizabeth was proclaimed queen at the uſual places, with the acclamations of the people. The proteſtants thanked God that he had at laſt delivered them from perſecution, in placing on the throne a princeſs who very likely would be favourable to them. It is true, that among the papiſts, ſome looked on the death of Mary, and the advancement of Elizabeth, as a mortal wound to their religion; but others were not ſorry to ſee a ſtop put to thoſe barbarities which diſhonoured it. As for thoſe who made not religion the chief object of their thoughts, they were eaſily comforted for the loſs of a queen, under whom England had not much flouriſhed, and who had loſt the only place which commanded reſpect from France. They believed to have reaſon to expect better things from the new reign.

Elizabeth being informed of the reſolution of both houſes in her favour, left Hatfield [a] the 19th of November, and came to London with a numerous train of lords and ladies [b], and an infinite crowd of people, teſtifying their joy by the loudeſt acclamations. She was twenty-five years old, tolerably handſome, of an air great, noble, and majeſtic. But ſhe was ſtill more agreeable to the people by a certain natural affability, which commanded the eſteem and affection of all who approached her. As ſhe had a large ſhare of ſenſe and judgment, ſhe knew perfectly how neceſſary the love of her people was to her, ſince it was to be the ſtrongeſt ſupport of her throne, as will hereafter appear. Wherefore, inſtead of loſing this affability in being raiſed from a ſubject to a queen, ſhe ſtudiouſly encreaſed it to ſuch a degree, that ſome accuſed her of playing the comedian, and over-acting her part.

Her firſt care, after receiving the compliments on her acceſſion, was to diſpatch embaſſadors to the principal courts of Europe, to give notice of the late change in England [c]. Lord Cobham [d] was ſent to Philip, whom ſhe eſteemed her friend, and who was moreover her ally in the war againſt France, the treaty of Cambray not being yet concluded. Sir Thomas Chaloner was ſent to the Imperial court. Lord Howard, of Effingham, was joined in commiſſion with Thirleby, biſhop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, plenipotentiaries for negotiating a peace. Sir Henry Killigrew went to Germany, to aſſure the proteſtant princes of the queen's affection. Karne, who was ſtill at Rome, where he had been reſident ever ſince the death of Edward VI. had orders to notify to the pope, Mary's death and Elizabeth's acceſſion to the crown [e]. The kings of Sweden and Denmark had the ſame notifications.

Theſe envoys being diſpatched, the queen formed a council, in which ſhe left thirteen of Mary's counſellors, all zealous Roman catholics, to whom ſhe added eight new ones, equally attached to the proteſtant religion [f]. With ſome of theſe ſhe ſecretly conſulted about the means to reſtore the reformation in England. But before I ſpeak of the reſult of the conſultations, a new project of the king of Spain muſt briefly be mentioned.

When this prince received the news of the death of his queen, whether, on account of Elizabeth's inclination to the proteſtant religion, or by her marrying ſome prince of that religion, againſt which he had himſelf openly declared, he looked upon England as loſt to him. He was not even without fear, that the king of France, aſſerting the queen of Scotland's claim upon England, would ſeize that kingdom, and unite it, as well as Scotland and Ireland, to the French monarchy. Wherefore, to free himſelf from theſe fears, and preſerve the advantages of his alliance with England, he ſent inſtructions to the Condè de Feria (lately arrived at London, to pay his compliments to the deceaſed queen) to congratulate Elizabeth on her acceſſion, and propoſe his deſign of uniting himſelf with her in marriage. Elizabeth received the offer with marks of a particular eſteem for the king of Spain, but objected their affinity as an impediment to their marriage. This objection was foreſeen, and immediately replied to by the embaſſador, That his maſter would undertake to procure the pope's diſpenſation. The queen, not caring to expreſs her little regard of ſuch a diſpenſation, civilly diſmiſſed the embaſſador to have time ſeriouſly to conſider of the propoſal. Three principal reaſons hindered her from accepting Philip's offer. Firſt, her perſuaſion that ſuch marriages were contrary to the law of God, and her father's example in a parallel caſe reminded her of her duty. Secondly, nothing was more contrary to her intention of openly profeſſing and reſtoring the proteſtant religion in England, as eſtabliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. Laſtly, to make uſe of a diſpenſation to marry a brother-in-law, would have been an acknowledgment of the invalidity of her father's divorce with Catherine of Arragon, and of her own illegitimacy. If Paul IV. could grant ſuch diſpenſation, Julius II. might have granted the ſame to Henry VIII. to marry Catherine of Arragon; from whence it neceſſarily followed, that Henry's ſecond marriage with Anne Bullen was null. But, on the other hand, Elizabeth had ſtrong reaſons to preſerve the king of Spain's friendſhip. To him ſhe owed her life, or at leaſt her not being excluded by her ſiſter from the ſucceſſion. Mary would never have left Elizabeth in a condition of one day mounting the throne, if the intereſt and ſolicitations of the king, her huſband, had not ſtrongly reſiſted her zeal for her religion. In the ſecond place, Elizabeth was informed that the king of France was uſing all his credit at Rome to have her declared illegitimate, in order to procure the crown of England for his daughter-in-law, the queen of Scotland. Laſtly, England was in a very ill ſtate. The loſs of Calais, Guiſnes, and Hames, the crown debts contracted by Henry VIII. and encreaſed by the guardians of Edward VI. and an exhauſted treaſury, gave Elizabeth juſt cauſe to fear ſhe ſhould be unable to oppoſe a vigorous attack. To this may be added, ſhe was engaged in a war with France and Scotland, unſupported by any other alliance than that of Spain; ſo unmindful had Mary been of every thing where religion was not concerned. Her buſineſs therefore was to end theſe two wars with honour; but this was not to be done without Philip's aſſiſtance, and conſequently it was not proper to give him any juſt cauſe of complaint, for fear of his deſerting England in the negotiation of peace. Theſe reflections threw the queen into great perplexity. She was fully reſolved to refuſe the king of Spain's propoſal, but was uneaſy about the manner. Though ſhe alleged ſcruples of conſcience, it did not free her from the importunities of the Condé de Feria, who perſiſted that a diſpenſation from the pope was more than ſufficient to remove them. He told her likewiſe, that as his maſter had made this overture purely from his extraordinary eſteem for her, he would be the more diſpleaſed if it was rejected. At laſt the queen, being thus preſſed, found no ſurer or readier way to extricate herſelf out of the difficulty, than,

[c] And at the ſame time ſhe took care of ſecuring all the ports, and the Tower of London; ordered a new commiſſion to be ſent to Thomas Ratcliff, earl of Suſſex, lord lieutenant of Ireland, who had kept that mutinous country quiet, only with three hundred and twenty horſe, and eight hundred and ſixty foot; and alſo, that the judges patents ſhould be renewed; new juſtices and ſheriffs appointed in every county; no bills of exchange be ſent beyond ſea; and that preachers ſhould not meddle with controverted points. [e] The haughty pope told Karne, That England was held in fee of the apoſtolic ſee, and Elizabeth could not ſucceed, being illegitimate. That it was great boldneſs in her to aſſume the crown without his conſent; for which reaſon ſhe deſerved no favour at his hands; but if ſhe would renounce her pretenſions, and refer herſelf wholly to him, he would ſhew a fatherly affection to her. Burnet, tom. II. p. 374.

This reſolution being taken, ſhe cauſed to be examined before her cabinet council, the proper methods to execute it, the inconveniencies it might be attended with, and the means to prevent them. The greateſt obſtacles to the affair were to ariſe either at home or abroad. At home, from the great number of catholics and the oppoſition of the biſhops and inferior clergy. Abroad, from the pope, who in all likelihood would thunder his cenſures againſt the queen, and expoſe the kingdom a prey to the firſt invader. Hence it was to be feared, that the kings of France and Spain would uſe that pretence to make war upon the Engliſh, as excommunicated heretics, and to ſtir up Scotland, which was entirely directed by the king of France. Upon the inconveniencies at home, it was conſidered that though the kingdom appeared wholly catholic, it was far from being really ſo. That the fear of puniſhment ceaſing, the greateſt part of the people were manifeſtly inclined to return to the religion which they had been forced to forſake in the laſt reign; but, however, it would not be very difficult to have a parliament favourable to the queen's intentions, by employing means which rarely fail of ſucceſs, when uſed with diſcretion. That for this purpoſe, the magiſtrates of the counties and towns were to be removed, and proteſtants put in their places, who would uſe their credit and authority to have ſuch repreſentatives returned as were proper for the execution of the intended deſign. Laſtly, That it was abſolutely neceſſary not to leave any zealous catholic in the council, or in any other office which influenced the ſubject: That when the reformation ſhould be once eſtabliſhed by public authority, it would be eaſy to ſubdue the clergy, by depriving the biſhops and moſt obſtinate eccleſiaſtics, and by removing in the univerſities the maſters and profeſſors who were moſt averſe to the new eſtabliſhment.

As for the obſtacles from abroad, it was conſidered, that the pope was not formidable in himſelf, and his thunders were thrown away upon thoſe who deſpiſed them: That a contempt of him was the ready way to conquer, provided the kingdom was put in a poſture of defence: That indeed it was to be feared the king of France would aſſert the claim of the queen of Scotland, but that the king of Spain was too wiſe to ſuffer ſo great an acceſſion to the monarchy of France, as England and Ireland: That from whatever quarter the miſchief came, whither from France or Spain, Henry and Philip would always be jealous of each other, and the aſſiſtance of one of them might be ſafely relied on: That if the king of France offered peace, it ought to be embraced on any terms, as Scotland would be included in the league; but if he was for continuing the war, all the danger would be, his powerfully aſſiſting the Scots to invade England: That therefore the northern frontiers were to be ſecured, after which a good fleet would ſo endanger any ſuccours ſent to France, that without doubt that kingdom would ſoon grow weary of ſo burthenſome a war: That beſides, it was unlikely that Philip, in the negotiation of peace, would abandon England to the king of France's ambition: That a peace thus concluded with France and Scotland, would afford time at leaſt to provide againſt their attacks [g].

Such was the reſult of this council; after which the queen ſummoned a parliament to meet the 23d of January, according to the reſolution taken therein. At the ſame time, doctor Parker was intruſted with the care of reviſing the liturgy of Edward VI. and was ordered to communicate his labours only to ſome choſen perſons [h]. Mean time the proteſtants growing impatient, and preaching publicly in ſeveral places, the queen took occaſion to publiſh a proclamation, which clearly ſhewed her intentions. She allowed the goſpels and epiſtles, with the Lord's prayer, creed, litany, and ten commandments, to be read in Engliſh, but forbid all preaching on controverſial ſubjects, or any change in the Romiſh rites, till it ſhould be otherwiſe appointed by the parliament. In this ſhe followed the ſteps of the deceaſed queen.

Queen Mary's funeral, which was ſolemnized with great pomp, finiſhed this year [i]. But before we proceed to the events of the next, it is neceſſary to deſcribe the affairs of the neighbouring ſtates.

The war between France and Spain was manifeſtly drawing to a concluſion. The two kings, equally weary of a war from which neither could expect any advantage, had kept their armies all the campaign in a ſtate of inaction, for fear of obſtructiug a peace. At laſt the conſtable of Montmorency, who had been priſoner in the Low Countries ever ſince the battle of St. Quintin, having made ſome overtures of peace to Philip, the principal articles were ſettled; after which the two kings ſent their plenipotentiaries to Cercamp, and then to Cambray. The principal obſtacle to a peace was the king of France's reſolution to keep Calais, and Philip and Mary's inſiſting upon its being reſtored. But Mary dying, Philip no longer ſupported the intereſts of England with the ſame ardour as before, at leaſt when he deſpaired of marrying Elizabeth. It was that expectation which cauſed him to ſtand out ſome time, and delay the concluſion of the peace till the following year.

The 14th of March, Ferdinand I. was declared emperor, by the voluntary reſignation of Charles V. his brother, who enjoyed but two years the repoſe he had choſen in relinquiſhing the care of his worldly concerns. He died the 17th of September [k].

As Scotland is to afford materials for great part of Elizabeth's hiſtory, a very particular account muſt be given of the affairs of that kingdom. Without an accurate knowledge of what paſſed in Scotland, Elizabeth's conduct and policy cannot be underſtood.

The queen dowager of Scotland, mother of the queen dauphineſs, obtained the regency of that kingdom by the intereſt of the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain, her brothers, but was ſupported only by the proteſtants. The earl of Arran, chief of the houſe of Hamilton, had unwillingly reſigned the regency, though his reſignation procured him the duchy of Chatelerault in France [l], with twelve thouſand livres a year in land. The archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, his natural brother, inceſſantly blamed his imprudence, and by his cabals amongſt the clergy, gave diſturbance to the regent. To break the meaſures of this prelate, ſhe returned to the proteſtants, who were now grown conſiderable. This method ſucceeded, but withal ſhe was obliged to connive at the meeting of the proteſtants, and this indulgence greatly encreaſed their number and ſtrength.

Things remained in this ſtate till the breach between France and Spain. As England eſpouſed the cauſe of Philip II. and the regent of Scotland could not poſſibly induce the Scots to declare war with Mary, ſhe adviſed the king of France to haſten the dauphin's marriage with the young queen, and accordingly it was ſolemnized in April 1558. This gave a conſiderable turn to the affairs of Scotland. The clergy, knowing how the court of France ſtood affected to the followers of the new religion, did not queſtion to be ſupported in their attempt to reduce the proteſtants within the pale of the Romiſh church. On the other hand, the regent no longer wanting the proteſtants, began to look more coldly on them. To begin the work, the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's having ſummoned before him an aged prieſt [m], who had diſcontinued the maſs, ordered him to be burnt alive in his archiepiſcopal city, to the great grief and diſcontent of the inhabitants. This eſſay being made, the biſhops cited a miniſter, called Paul Meffan, with deſign to make him ſuffer the ſame puniſhment; but as they ſaw the people began to be moved, the trial was deferred to another opportunity. Some time after, a proceſſion, annually made at Edinburgh [n], raiſed a ſort of commotion, which ſhewed that the proteſtants were not afraid to appear. The regent had a farther conviction, when ſhe was told that Meffan, condemned for non-appearance, was openly protected in the county of Fife. Theſe were as preludes to what was to follow. In fine, ſome gentlemen of Fife and Angus, diſperſing themſelves through the counties, encouraged the proteſtants to ſtand upon their defence, and not [g] Beal, clerk of the council, gave this advice to ſir William Cecil, whilſt the conſultation was held about reforming religion: That the parliaments under queen Mary ſhould be declared void, as the firſt was under a force; and the title of ſupreme head was left out in the ſummons to the next, before it wast aken away by law; from whence he inferred, that theſe had been no true parliaments, and conſequently the laws of Edward were ſtill in force: but this propoſal was rejected. Burnet, tom. II. p. 376.

[h] The perſons employed in this reviſal were, according to Camden, Dr. Matthew Parker, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury; Dr. Richard Cox, afterwards biſhop of Ely; Dr. May; Dr. Bill; Dr. James Pilkington, afwards biſhop of Durham; Sir Thomas Smith; Mr. David Whitehead; Mr. Edmund Grindal, afterwards biſhop of London, and then archbiſhop of Canterbury. The management of this affair, and the care to have it done, was left to William Parr, marquis of Northampton; Francis Ruſſel, earl of Bedford; John Grey, of Pyrgo; and ſir William Cecil. Camden, p. 341.

Stow, p. 635.—White, biſhop of Wincheſter, preached the funeral ſermon, in which he applauded the late reign, and lamented the preſent ſtate of affairs with ſuch freedom, that it was proper to ſhew ſome reſentment; and accordingly he was confined to his houſe till the meeting of the parliament. Burnet, tom. II. p. 378.

ſuffer their lives to be taken away on pretence of religion, demonſtrating to them that their number was greater in Scotland than that of the catholics. This occaſioned an aſſociation under the hands and ſeals of the aſſociators, and was the firſt that was formed in Scotland in defence of the new religion. The proteſtants perceiving themſelves ſtronger ſince the aſſociation, which was called the congregation, ſent to the regent a petition, that the worſhip of God might be in the vulgar tongue, and the communion given in both kinds; which was ſtrongly oppoſed by the biſhops. But the regent being told, that an abſolute refuſal might throw all Scotland into a flame, ſhe endeavoured to ſoften the biſhops, by a promiſe of her protection at a more ſeaſonable juncture. Mean time ſhe permitted the proteſtants to celebrate divine ſervice in their own tongue, provided this was done without tumults or public aſſemblies in Edinburgh and Leith [o]. But the clergy, not liking this politic circumſpection of the regent, met together to conſult upon the affair, and reſolved to proſecute the heretics with the extremeſt rigour. The proteſtants deputed John Areſkin, afterwards earl of Mar, to the biſhops aſſembled, to demand of them that divine ſervice might be performed in the vulgar tongue; but this was unanimouſly rejected. Such was the ſituation of the affairs in Scotland when Elizabeth aſcended the throne of England, and till the end of the year 1558.

[1559] In the beginning of the following year, Elizabeth conferred honours on ſome perſons whom ſhe was pleaſed to diſtinguiſh, either on account of their merit, or becauſe ſhe expected ſome important ſervices from them. William Parr, marquis of Northampton, who had been ſentenced to death in the reign of Mary, and afterwards pardoned, was reſtored to his honours. Edward Seymour, eldeſt ſon of the late duke of Somerſet, was created earl of Hertford, notwithſtanding all the precautions of the duke his father to cauſe his titles to deſcend to the children of his ſecond marriage [p]. Thomas Howard, ſecond ſon of the duke of Norfolk, was created viſcount Bindon. Henry Carey, the queen's couſin [q], and Oliver St. John, were raiſed to the dignity of barons. All theſe peers were proteſtants, and conſequently very proper to promote the queen's deſigns in the houſe of lords.

Theſe promotions being over, the queen was crowned in Weſtminſter abbey [r], with the uſual ceremonies. The ſee of Canterbury being vacant, this office belonged to the archbiſhop of York; but he, with the other biſhops, refuſed to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, becauſe Elizabeth by proclamation, and by admitting into her council, men who paſſed not for good catholics, had ſufficiently declared againſt the church of Rome. Oglethorp of Carliſle was the only biſhop that at laſt was perſuaded to do the office, notwithſtanding the murmurs of his brethren. It ſeems that the biſhops thought the miniſtry of a biſhop ſo eſſential to a coronation, that, in refuſing to perform the ceremony, they could deprive the queen of her dignity.

The parliament meeting the 25th of January [s], ſir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great ſeal [t], opened it with a ſpeech, in which he diſplayed the merits of the new queen, with ſevere reflections on the late miniſtry for the loſs of Calais. He told them, that the queen deſired an immediate application to the affairs of religion; that a diſunion in that reſpect was one of the evils which called for the moſt ſpeedy redreſs. He exhorted the parliament to proceed between the two extremes of ſuperſtition and irreligion, which might reunite the adherents of both religions in the ſame public worſhip.

Dr. Burnet has ſo largely deſcribed in his hiſtory the manner of reſtoring the reformation in England by the parliament, that I believe I may be excuſed deſcending to particulars, and the more, as this ſubject chiefly relates to church hiſtory. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with only pointing to the acts made in this ſeſſion, to ſpare the reader the trouble of turning over his hiſtory. I ſhall however obſerve, that this author ſeems to have been miſtaken in placing the acts (moſt of which were made in February and March) after the peace, which was not concluded till April. But this is not very material.

At firſt, to try how the parliament was inclined, a motion was made in the lower houſe for reſtoring to the crown the tenths, firſt-fruits, and impropriations, ſurrendered by queen Mary. This motion was immediately approved; and the houſe of lords conſented to it, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the biſhops [u].

The 4th of February, the houſe of commons addreſſed the queen in a very dutiful manner, and repreſented to her how neceſſary it was for the happineſs of the nation, that ſhe ſhould think of marrying. The queen graciouſly thanked the commons, and told them how much ſhe was pleaſed that they had neither limited time nor place. She added, that by the ceremony of her inauguration, ſhe was married to her people, and her ſubjects were to her inſtead of children: they would not want a ſucceſſor when ſhe died; and, for her part, ſhe would be well contented, that the marble ſhould tell poſterity, HERE LIES A QUEEN THAT REIGNED SO LONG, AND LIVED AND DIED A VIRGIN.

Some days after, the lords paſſed a bill to recognize Elizabeth for lawful queen, in virtue of an act of the 35th of Henry VIII. Some thought it ſtrange that the ſentence of her mother's divorce, and the ſubſequent act, declaring Elizabeth illegitimate, were not annulled. Camden ſays, this omiſſion was with deſign; and Burnet reports the reaſons which determined the houſe of lords to be ſilent on this point. The firſt was, that the poſſeſſion of the crown purged all defects, according to a received maxim when Henry VII. mounted the throne. But this reaſon had not appeared ſufficient to Mary, who was in the ſame caſe with Elizabeth, and yet had procured a repeal of that act, which declared her illegitimate. The ſecond reaſon was, that this act could not be repealed, without caſting ſome diſhonour on the memory of Henry VIII. and it was the queen's intereſt rather to conceal than publicly expoſe her father's weakneſs. I own this reaſon appears to me very unſatisfactory. For why was the reputation of Henry VIII. to be ſpared, if it could not be done without endangering the ſafety of the reigning queen? Beſides, it was not expoſing faults which till then had been concealed, but faults known to all the world. The third reaſon was, that too ſcrupulous an enquiry on this head, would render the queen's right more uncertain, inſtead of making it leſs diſputable. This probably was the prevailing reaſon, though to ſuffer the ſentence and act to ſubſiſt ſeems to have been equally dangerous. It was eſtabliſhing a precedent in favour of baſtards, which might have ill conſequences. And who knows but it may ſtill affect future ages? Beſides, this regard for the honour of Henry left an eternal blot upon the memory of Elizabeth. At leaſt her enemies, and particularly the queen of Scotland, were thereby furniſhed with a plauſible pretence to wreſt the ſcepter from her, if a favourable opportunity offered. Dr. Burnet thinks the conduct of this parliament equally pious and wiſe. I allow the firſt: but the continued endeavours to dethrone Elizabeth, wholly founded on the ſentence of her mother's divorce and the ſubſequent act, will not permit me to believe it wiſdom to leave them unrepealed.

The act to recognize the queen's title being paſſed, the parliament turned to the affairs of religion, and made divers ſtatutes, which I ſhall but juſt mention.

The firſt appointed the public worſhip to be performed in the vulgar tongue [w].

The ſecond reſtored the queen to her right of ſupremacy in the church of England.

[o] Buchanan and Melvil differ in relation to the time when this toleration was granted to the reformed. Rapin.

[q] Rapin here is entirely miſtaken, for this Edward Seymour was his eldeſt ſon by his ſecond wife, lady Ann Stanhope, on whoſe iſſue he procured an act to ſettle the titles and eſtate; and not Edward Seymour his eldeſt ſurviving ſon, by his firſt wife Catherine Fittol, who was diſinherited to gratify the pride and ambition of his laſt wife, and never enjoyed any title. It is not unworthy notice, that upon the extinction of the youngeſt line of this family by the ſecond marriage in 1750, the eldeſt branch ſeated at Maiden-Bradley, Wilts, deſcended from the laſt mentioned Edward, ſo diſinherited, ſucceeded to the dukedom of Somerſet, after having been excluded full two hundred years.

[t] He was the firſt that was by patent created lord keeper. Formerly thoſe that were keepers of the ſeal, had no dignity nor authority annexed to their office; they did not hear cauſes, nor preſide in the houſe of lords, but were only to put the ſeals to ſuch writs or patents as went in courſe; and ſo the ſeal was only put in the hands of the keeper but for ſome ſhort interval. But now Bacon was the firſt lord keeper that had all the dignity and authority of lord chancellor conferred on him. He was father to the great ſir Francis Bacon, viſcount St. Alban's, and was one of the moſt learned, moſt pious, and wiſeſt men of the nation. Burnet, tom. II. p. 380.

[u] This bill was read in the houſe of lords, January 30, 31, and February 4; and in the houſe of commons, February 6, 17, and 21. The biſhops that oppoſed it were, Heath, archbiſhop of York; Bonner, biſhop of London; Pates, of Worceſter; Kitching, of Landaff; Bayne, of Coventry; Turbeville, of Exeter; Scot, of Cheſter; Oglethorpe, of Carliſle. D'Ewes's Journ. p. 19.

The

The third renewed and confirmed all the acts made in the reign of Edward VI. concerning religion. And in this many others were included.

The fourth reſtored to the queen the nomination of the biſhops. By this ſtatute likewiſe many others were confirmed, made in the reign of Henry VIII. againſt the pope. The queen was empowered to put the exerciſe of her ſupremacy into what hands ſhe ſhould think proper. Moreover, all perſons in public employments were obliged to ſwear, that "they acknowledged the queen to be the ſupreme governor in all cauſes, as well eccleſiaſtical as temporal; that they renounced all foreign juriſdiction, and ſhould bear the queen true allegiance." Whoſoever refuſed this oath was declared incapable of holding any public office. Laſtly, divers penalties were enacted againſt any, who, by word or writing, tended to ſet forth or advance any foreign power in the kingdom.

The fifth act eſtabliſhed uniformity in divine worſhip[x].

By a ſixth, the parliament empowered the queen to reſerve to herſelf the lands belonging to the biſhoprics, as they became void, giving in lieu of them their full value in impropriated tythes.

By a ſeventh act, all religious houſes were annexed to the crown.

By an eighth, the deprivation of popiſh biſhops in king Edward's reign was declared valid.

In a word, the parliament in this ſeſſion reſtored religion to the ſame ſtate as in Edward VI.'s reign, and after a grant of a ſubſidy, two tenths, and two fifteenths, with tunnage and poundage for the queen's life, it was diſſolved the 8th of May[y].

Among the biſhops then in England, ſome there were who had complied with all the changes in religion ſince Henry's breach with the pope. Of this number were, Heath, archbiſhop of York; Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham; Thirleby, biſhop of Ely; and ſome others. Theſe choſe to abſent themſelves from the parliament, becauſe, as they ſaw the queen's intention, they durſt neither openly oppoſe it, nor aſſiſt in reſtoring the reformation, after ſo public a deſertion of it in the laſt reign. Both appeared to them equally incommodious. Other biſhops ſtrongly oppoſed theſe acts, but with no ſucceſs. Some of the lay-peers alſo endeavoured to ſtem the torrent, and even entered their proteſts, but their number was very ſmall. To ſay all in a word, the ſame thing happened in this as in the parliament under Henry, Edward, and Mary; that is, the court cauſed to be enacted almoſt whatever they pleaſed. This is not very ſtrange with regard to the houſe of commons, where the members may be changed every new parliament; but the readineſs wherewith the houſe of lords conſented, one while to acts favouring the reformation, another while to thoſe eſtabliſhing the Romiſh religion, is much more ſurpriſing.

The ſupremacy with which the queen was lately inveſted, with power to depute any perſons to exerciſe it in her name, gave riſe to a new court, called the High Commiſſion Court. It was compoſed of a certain number of commiſſioners, who exerciſed the ſame power which had been formerly lodged by Henry VIII. in a ſingle perſon with the title of Vicegerent.

While the parliament was taken up with affairs of religion, ſome preachers having, in divers places, delivered doctrines from the pulpit, tending to overthrow the reformation, the queen, following the precedent ſet her by Edward and Mary, forbid all preaching without a ſpecial licence under the great ſeal. This fired the lower houſe of convocation, and produced a petition to the queen, in which were boldly aſſerted the doctrines of the church of Rome. This gave occaſion to a propoſition for a conference between nine doctors on each ſide to examine the reaſons of both. The conference was held the begining of April. But the Roman catholics, reflecting that they had undertaken more than they could anſwer, in thus bringing the doctrines of their religion into queſtion without being authoriſed by the pope, refuſed to give their reaſons in writing, though that had been agreed. At laſt, they plainly declared, it was not in their power to diſpute on points already decided[z]. They had not been ſo ſcrupulous in the reign of Mary, becauſe then the ſucceſs of the conference was known beforehand. This gave the proteſtants cauſe to triumph, and pretend that their adverſaries durſt not enter the liſts.

To finiſh what I have to ſay at preſent on religion, I ſhall only add, that the reformation having been eſtabliſhed by public authority, of 9400 beneficed clergymen in the kingdom, only fourteen biſhops[a], twelve archdeacons, fifteen heads of colleges, fifty canons, and about eighty parochial prieſts, choſe to quit their preferments rather than their religion. Their places being filled with proteſtants, England became entirely reformed, very ſhortly after having ſeen the reformed ſent to the flames. It is now time to return to political affairs.

While Philip had any hopes of marrying Elizabeth, his plenipotentiaries, aſſembled with thoſe of England and France at Cateau, in Cambreſis, inſiſted upon the reſtitution of Calais to the crown of England. But when his expectations were diſappointed by the change in England, with regard to religion, he deſerted Elizabeth, and made a ſeparate peace, or at leaſt ſettled with France the principal articles. It is pretended that, in the treaty by which France reſigned 198 places to Spain or her allies, in exchange for three only, there was a ſecret article of a mutual promiſe between the two kings to extirpate heretics. This done, the Spaniards, from parties, as they were before, became mediators between France and England. But they acted ſo faintly, that it was plain they did not much concern themſelves in Elizabeth's affairs. Philip's defection therefore obliged the queen to conclude a peace on any terms; the continuation of the war being no way favourable to her affairs, or to the meaſures ſhe was now taking to introduce the reformation in England. By a treaty, therefore, ſigned the 2d of April, it was agreed,

That the king of France ſhould have Calais and the other places in Picardy, conquered upon the Engliſh, eight years; after which, he ſhould be obliged to reſtore them to the queen of England.

That within the ſpace of ſix months, ſeven foreign merchants, not ſubjects of the French king, ſhould engage for the payment of 500,000 crowns of gold to Elizabeth, as a penal fine, in caſe the reſtitution of the places within the time limited, was either refuſed or delayed by Henry or his ſucceſſors. "And that notwithſtanding, whether the ſaid ſum was paid or not paid, the king of France and his ſucceſſors ſhould remain under the obligation to reſtore Calais and the other places, as they engaged by this treaty." Moreover, that the king of France ſhould deliver to the queen, as hoſtages till the promiſed ſecurity was given, Ferry de Foix, count of Candale, and captal of Buch; Lewis de St. Maure, marquis of Neſle, and count of Laval; Gaſton de Foix, marquis of Trans; Antoine du Prat, preſident of the parliament of Paris; and the lord Nantouillet.

Theſe are the expreſs words of the treaty, of which the French hiſtorians give us only the pretended meaning, by turning them after their own manner. Mezerai ſays, "It was covenanted that Henry ſhould either reſtore Calais and the other conqueſts, or, if he liked it better, the ſum of 500,000 crowns; which, being referred to his opinion, there was no doubt he would keep this place, which was the key of his kingdom."

Neither has father Daniel given us the very terms of the treaty, which perhaps he had never ſeen. He contents himſelf with relating the ſenſe, adding an explication which entirely changes the nature of the treaty. "Elizabeth (ſays this hiſtorian) could not, without giving offence to the Engliſh, make an abſolute ſurrender of Calais to France. Beſides, ſhe ſaw the king determined not to part with it; a middle way was therefore taken, which left this prince in poſſeſſion of Calais for eight years, at the end of which he promiſed to reſtore it, on forfeiture of 500,000 crowns to [x] The diſſentients from it were, the archbiſhop of York, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Shrewſbury, the viſcount Montague; the biſhops of London, Ely, Worceſter, Landaff, Coventry, Exeter, and Cheſter; the lords Morley, Stafford, Dudley, Wharton, Rich, and North. D'Ewes, p. 28.

[y] This parliament granted the queen a ſubſidy of 2s. 8d. in the pound of goods, and 4s. of lands, to be paid at two ſeveral payments. They alſo granted her two tenths, and two fifteenths, and tunnage and poundage for life, as they were granted to Edward VI. and Mary. Stevens. Stow, p. 639.

[z] The points to be diſcuſſed in this conference were, worſhip in an unknown tongue, the power of particular churches to alter rites and ceremonies, and the propitiatory ſacrifice in the maſs. The conference was begun the 31ſt of March, in Weſtminſter abbey, before the privy-council, both houſes of parliament, and infinite crouds of people. The proteſtant diſputants were, Storye, biſhop of Chicheſter; Cox, Whitehead, Grindall, Horne, Sands, Gueſt, Ailmer, and Jewel. And the popiſh were, the biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincoln, Carliſle, Cheſter, Coventry and Litchfield; Cole dean of St. Paul's, Langdal archdeacon of Lewes, Hapsfield archdeacon of Canterbury, and Chedſey archdeacon of Middleſex. The biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln, ſeeing their cauſe in great danger, ſaid, that the faith of the church ought not to be examined but in a ſynod of divines. The queen and council ought to be excommunicated, for ſuffering the catholic faith to be argued before an unlearned multitude. Fox, tom. III. p. 979, &c.

[a] Theſe biſhops were, Heath archbiſhop of York, Bonner biſhop of London, Thirleby of Ely, Bourn of Bath and Wells, Chriſtopherſon of Chicheſter, Bain of Litchfield, White of Wincheſter, Watſon of Lincoln, Oglethorpe of Carliſle, Turbevile of Exeter, Pole of Peterborough, Scot of Cheſter, Pates of Worceſter, and Goldwell, of St. Aſaph. the Engliſh. That notwithſtanding this payment, which was to be made on a refuſal or delay of reſtitution, the Engliſh were allowed to uſe force for the recovery of Calais.' By theſe laſt words he explains the ſenſe of thoſe in the original treaty ——— 'That whether the ſum was paid or not paid, the king of France and his ſucceſſors ſhould be bound to the reſtitution of Calais, as they engaged by the treaty.' This ſhews how we ought to be upon our guard againſt the national partiality of hiſtorians. I ſhall add here upon this article, that Calais never was reſtored, that the 500,000 crowns were never paid; and when Elizabeth demanded Calais at the expiration of the term, the court of France founded their refuſal upon ſome generalities, and not upon the treaty itſelf, as they might have done, ſuppoſing what theſe two hiſtorians have related.

Another article of the treaty was, that neither the king of France, nor the king and queen of Scotland, nor the queen of England, ſhould attempt any thing againſt one another, directly or indirectly, in prejudice of this treaty. That if the queen of England violated this article, the king of France and the king and queen of Scotland ſhould be freed from their engagements, and their hoſtages and ſecurities be diſcharged. In like manner, if the violation came from the king of France, he ſhould be obliged to reſtore Calais, and the other places, as if the eight years were expired; and if he refuſed to make the reſtitution, the ſecurities and hoſtages ſhould ſtill remain bound.

That the fortifications of Aymouth, and all others made in Scotland ſince the treaty of Boulogne, ſhould be demoliſhed.

That all the other pretenſions of the kings of France, of the king and queen of Scotland, and of the queen of England, with all their exceptions, ſhould remain entire, in the expectation that Providence would produce ſome good opportunity to terminate them by a peace.

That the forementioned princes or princeſſes ſhould not afford a retreat or protection to each other's rebels, but reciprocally deliver them to one another.

The ſame day a treaty was ſigned between the queen of England and the king and queen of Scotland, of which theſe are the principal articles:

That neither of the parties ſhould attack the dominions now poſſeſſed by the other, neither in perſon or otherwiſe.

That they ſhould give no aid to attack the dominions of one another to any perſon, in whatſoever degree of conſanguinity or affinity he might be related to them, or whatever might be his quality.

That they ſhould not receive or entertain rebels, fugitives, malefactors, &c.

That in three months, the fortifications of Aymouth, and all others erected in Scotland ſince the treaty of 1549, ſhould be razed.

That all other mutual claims and pretenſions ſhould remain entire.

That in two months, commiſſioners ſhould be appointed on both ſides, to ſettle certain articles, concerning which the embaſſadors of France were not ſufficiently inſtructed.

Francis and Mary ratified the treaty the 18th of April, and the 31ſt of May the commiſſioners of the two kingdoms at Upſalinton ſigned a ſecond treaty upon the articles left undecided in the firſt.

Elizabeth having concluded a peace with France and Scotland with more eaſe and honour than ſhe had reaſon to expect, flattered herſelf ſhe was going to enjoy a ſettled tranquillity. But ſhe quickly perceived, ſhe had little cauſe to triumph. Henry II. had made a peace with her, only becauſe Philip II. who had engaged Mary his queen in the war, was reſolved not to ſign the peace before Elizabeth had concluded her's. It was of little moment to Philip, that ſhe found great advantages in the peace, or the king of France obſerved his treaty with her, provided it appeared to the world that Spain had not deſerted England. This was all he deſired, and probably what facilitated the peace. Henry II. granted, no doubt, more than he intended to perform, as well to give that ſatisfaction to the king of Spain, as to diſengage him from the intereſts of England. He ſoon diſcovered he had no other intention.

Embaſſadors from France being come to Bruſſells to ſee the peace ſworn, ſecretary Ardoy, who was there from the dauphin king and the queen dauphineſs, gave them the titles of king and queen of Scotland, England, and Ireland. Shortly after, Elizabeth heard that the king of France had ordered Francis and Mary to aſſume the ſame titles, and quarter the arms of England in their ſeal, their plate, their furniture; that no one might be ignorant of their pretentions. Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, the Engliſh embaſſador in France, complained of this uſurpation with great freedom, but the frivolous anſwer to his complaints let him ſee the little regard France had for his miſtreſs. Mezerai ſays, the embaſſador was told, that this was agreeable to the cuſtom of Germany, where the cadets, or younger branches, bore the title and arms of the chief of their family [b]. Camden adds, that the court of France pretended, that all princes and princeſſes had a right to bear the arms of their houſe with a bar. But, beſides that Francis and Mary bore them without any ſuch diſtinction, they moreover aſſumed the title of king and queen of England [c]. In ſhort, the court, of France being preſſed upon the affair, anſwered the embaſſador, that the king and queen of Scotland had only taken the arms of England to oblige Elizabeth to quit thoſe of France. To this Throckmorton replied, that twelve kings of England had carried the arms and title of kings of France, without being obliged by any treaty to quit them. But his reaſons were not heard; and notwithſtanding all his complaints, Francis and Mary ſtill bore the title they had uſurped. Camden affirms, the conſtable of Montmorency by his arguments induced them to relinquiſh it, but aſſuredly he is miſtaken. Thus, though the court of France would not openly declare their thoughts of Elizabeth, it was manifeſt ſhe was regarded as a baſtard, and the crown of England was pretended to be devolved upon Mary. Accordingly, Elizabeth did not ſuffer herſelf to be deceived. From that time ſhe conſidered Mary as a dangerous rival, and the princes of Lorrain, her uncles, the authors of this uſurpation, as her moſt mortal enemies. The death of Henry, a little after, inſtead of diſcouraging the deſign to place Mary on the throne of England, only gave it freſh vigour. The duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal of Lorrain, governing all under Francis II. ſucceſſor to Henry, never ceaſed inciting the young king to ſend forces into Scotland, to render himſelf abſolute maſter of the kingdom, and then attack Elizabeth from that quarter. But becauſe this project was founded upon the preſent ſituation of the Scotch affairs, it is neceſſary to reſume the recital at the place where I left off the laſt year.

Shortly after the marriage of the young queen with the dauphin, the affairs of Scotland began to be terribly embroiled. The princes of Lorrain having formed the deſign to attack England by Scotland, believed it impracticable till the king and queen were rendered abſolute in their kingdom. They knew it would be difficult to perſuade the ſtates of Scotland to be the inſtruments of their ambition in making war upon Elizabeth, in order to place the crown of England on the head of their queen. The number of proteſtants was now ſo conſiderable in Scotland, that they were almoſt maſters in the aſſemblies of the ſtates. Conſequently, it appeared impoſſible to draw them into the project of dethroning a proteſtant queen (who was eſtabliſhing their religion in England) in order to place a catholic queen on that throne, who would thereby be enabled to deſtroy the reformation in both kingdoms. It was therefore neceſſary to find an excuſe for ſending an army into Scotland to ſtrengthen the catholic party, which probably would be more ready and zealous to favour the enterpriſe. It was with this view, that they obtained of Henry II. an order to the queen-regent, and to d'Oyſel, commander of the French and Scotch forces in the pay of France, to ſuffer no other religion in Scotland than the Roman catholic [d]. They eaſily foreſaw, this order would produce troubles in Scotland, and furniſh them with a pretence to ſend thither an army.

The regent, upon the receipt of the order, began to execute it with publiſhing an edict [e], conformable to the king's will, or rather of the two princes his brothers, who, as will hereafter be ſeen, had not diſcovered their whole project to the king. The proteſtants, in ſeveral deputations to the queen-regent, repreſented to her the unſeaſonableneſs of rigour, conſidering their number; but ſhe would hearken to [b] Melvil ſays, Throckmorton got but Dutch excuſes; for the French court alleged, that in Duchland all the princes, brothers, couſins, or children, are ſtiled princes, or dukes of the ſame houſe, p. 23.

[c] At the late congreſs, the cardinal of Lorrain told the Spaniſh commiſſioners, "That his niece, the queen of Scots, was the true and undoubted queen of England, and that the king of Spain ought to endeavour to have Calais put into the hands of his niece, who was the rightful queen of England." Camden, p. 373.

[d] The pope, emperor, and kings of Spain and France, had then entered into a combination to reduce again the moſt part of Europe to the Roman catholic religion, and to purſue and puniſh with fire and ſword all the heretics who would not condeſcend to the ſame. Melvil, p. 23.

nothing. At this time, the city of Perth, alias St. John's-town, having publicly embraced the reformed religion, the regent ſummoned the ſtates to Sterling, and cited thither the reformed miniſters, in order to baniſh them the kingdom by a ſolemn decree [f]. The miniſters appeared at Sterling to defend their cauſe, being attended with infinite crowds of people unarmed, who were come to aſſiſt them in their defence, agreeably to the cuſtom of Scotland [g]. The regent, aſtoniſhed at the ſight, prayed John Areſkin to prevail with the multitudes to retire, promiſing that nothing ſhould be decreed in the ſtates againſt the miniſters. Areſkin ſucceeded, and the miniſters with all their attendants withdrew. But they were no ſooner gone, than they were condemned for non-appearance, according to the citation. Areſkin was ſo enraged to be made the queen's inſtrument to deceive the proteſtants, that he reſolved to be revenged. For that purpoſe, he went to the nobility of Strathern, Angus, and Merns, who were aſſembled upon the news of what paſſed at Sterling, and perſuaded them to take up arms.

This news being brought to Perth, Knox the miniſter, a celebrated preacher, animated the people by a ſermon, which, while the principal citizens were at dinner, ſent the rabble into the churches, who broke the images and entirely deſtroyed the monaſtery of the Carthuſians. The inhabitants of Cuper immediately followed the example of the people of Perth. The regent vexed to ſee her edict contemned, and willing to prevent the conſequences of this diſobedience, reſolved to chaſtiſe the inhabitants of Perth. To that end, ſhe aſſembled ſome forces, and attended by the earls of Argyle and Athol, marched directly to Perth. But approaching the town, ſhe was informed the earl of Glencarne [h] was encamped in the neighbourhood with ſeven thouſand men. This news determined her to offer the earl and his aſſociates certain conditions, which were accepted. Amongſt other articles it was agreed, that the Scotch forces on both ſides ſhould be diſmiſſed, and the French removed at a certain diſtance from Perth [i]: that the queen ſhould be reſpectfully received into the city, and ſuffered to lodge in it ſome days, provided ſhe would make no alterations: laſtly, that the differences concerning religion ſhould be referred to the deciſion of the ſtates. The confederates having diſmiſſed their forces, the regent came to Perth, and entered with ſome Scotch troops in the pay of France, which was conſidered by the confederates as a violation of the treaty [k]. But this was not all they had cauſe to complain of. The regent reſtored the maſs in Perth, and reſolving to make it a place of arms, left a garriſon in the town.

Hence the earl of Argyle and James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, and natural ſon to James V. took occaſion to declare againſt the regent, and levy forces to ſupport the proteſtants. They had ſome time before embraced the reformation, though hitherto they had adhered to the regent. Shortly after, the inhabitants of St. Andrew's and ſome other towns, declaring themſelves proteſtants, committed ſeveral diſorders in the catholic churches. Whereupon the regent aſſembled an army, compoſed of two thouſand French and one thouſand Scots, and giving the command to the duke of Chateleraut ſent him to chaſtiſe the inhabitants of Cuper, who had declared themſelves next after thoſe of Perth. But the duke hearing the confederates were marching with ſuperior forces to give him battle, informed the regent of it, who was then at Falkland. She tried at firſt to amuſe them with new propoſitions, till ſhe had reinforced her army. But the confederates perceiving her artifice, marched to Perth, and became maſters of the town in a few days. Afterwards Scone, Sterling, and Linlithgo, were ſecured by them, and as their army daily encreaſed, the regent and d'Oyſel were obliged to withdraw to Dunbar.

Mean time, the regent had wrote to the court of France, that James, prior of St. Andrew's, was the principal author of the troubles of Scotland, and that, being natural ſon of James V. he deſigned to ſeize the crown. The princes of Lorrain, brothers to the regent, embraced this occaſion to inſinuate to Henry II. that religion was not concerned in the troubles of Scotland, and was only made the pretence to wreſt the crown from the dauphin and the queen his ſpouſe. By this inſinuation, they had inſpired the king with the reſolution of ſending a good army into Scotland, and he had now begun his levies in Germany. But the conſtable of Montmorency having diſcovered the deſign of theſe princes to engage him in very difficult projects, prevailed with him to proceed no farther, till he was more particularly informed of the Scotch troubles. The buſineſs was only to find a perſon in whom the king could confide. The conſtable offered James Melvil, a Scotch gentleman, his domeſtic, and gave him his inſtructions in the preſence of the king himſelf. Theſe inſtructions were, as he ſays himſelf in his Memoirs, "That the king had been informed by the cardinal of Lorrain that James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, pretended, under colour of religion, to uſurp the kingdom unto himſelf; and that the king deſired to know certainly, if this was the ſource from whence the troubles in that kingdom flowed; or whether Stuart was moved to take up arms only for conſcience ſake, in defence of his religion, himſelf, his dependants, and aſſociates. In the firſt caſe, the king was reſolved to hazard his crown, and all that he had, rather than that the queen his daughter-in-law ſhould be robbed of her right; and he reſolved to ſend an army to Scotland for that effect, though he would gladly ſhun the trouble thereof, if it were poſſible. That in the ſecond caſe, if it were only religion that moved the Scots, the king would have no concern in their affairs, but committed their ſouls unto God, for he had difficulty enough to rule the conſciences of Frenchmen. And it was the obedience due unto their lawful queen, with the body, that the king deſired. That finally, he could not perſuade himſelf, that the Scots had made an inſurrection againſt the regent without cauſe, and therefore deſired to know if the regent had broke her word with them; if ſo, by whom and at whoſe inſtance. That if d'Oyſel, who was reported to be choleric, haſty, and too paſſionate, was not acceptable to the Scots, he would ſend ſome other in his room, who, he hoped, ſhould pleaſe them." This ſhews, the king had been ill informed by the cardinal of Lorrain, to engage him to ſend an army into Scotland, and of this probably the conſtable meant to give him a demonſtration, by the report Melvil was to make him. In effect, Melvil, having had a conference with the queen-regent at Falkland, and afterwards with the prior of St. Andrew's, reported to the king, that the prior was ſo far from the thoughts of aſpiring to the crown, that he was ready to baniſh himſelf perpetually out of Scotland on the firſt orders from his majeſty [l].

Henry II. being dead before Melvil returned to Paris [m], the confederate Scots prepoſterouſly imagined, there was no farther danger, and moſt of them returned to their homes. The regent and d'Oyſel being informed of it, reſolved to improve this negligence, and marched with ſome troops to Edinburgh, hoping to ſurpriſe thoſe who remained there. But the duke of Chateleraut and the earl of Morton, knowing the confederates were arming again with all poſſible diligence, waited on the regent, and perſuaded her to conſent to a truce from the 24th of July to the 10th of January. The truce was equally neceſſary to both parties. The confederates wanted to put themſelves in a poſture of defence; and the regent hoped, that in that interval ſhe ſhould receive a powerful aid from her ſon-in-law, the king of France. Accordingly, at the ſolicitation of the princes of Lorrain, he immediately ſent her a thouſand foot, with the promiſe of a more conſiderable ſupply.

During theſe tranſactions, the earl of Arran, ſon to the duke of Chateleraut, being at the court of France, and receiving notice that he was to be arreſted on ſome pretence, made his eſcape, and came for Scotland. As he was, after the duke his father, next heir to the young queen, he believed, upon ſome well or ill grounded advices, that the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain deſigned to ſecure and perhaps murder him, for fear, if the queen died, he ſhould mount the throne, for he had declared himſelf a proteſtant. He was no ſooner in Scotland than he gained his father to the confederates, who put him at their head.

Mean time, the regent and d'Oyſel were buſy in fortifying Leith, and ſtoring it with all ſorts of proviſions, deſigning to make it a place of arms, and to expect there the ſupplies that were to come from France. The confederates pretended this to be a breach of the truce, whether they proceeded upon ſome general maxim, or on ſome particular articles of the late treaty. However, after ſome fruitleſs complaints to the regent, they aſſembled their forces, and marched to beſiege Leith. But as they ſuffered themſelves to be amuſed for ſome time, they came too late, and, finding the place in a ſtate of defence, deſiſted from the ſiege. Shortly after, the regent, having received a new ſupply of two thouſand men, commanded by La Broſſe, continued the fortifications of Leith with greater application than ever. The confederates once more deſired her to give over the work: but were not heard. As ſhe ſaw herſelf ſufficiently ſtrong, ſhe only anſwered by ſending an herald with an order to lay down their arms. Their indignation to be thus deceived by the regent, induced them at laſt to publiſh, that they would treat as enemies all that obeyed her orders. But they were little able to make good this bravado. The regent, knowing they were at Edinburgh in ſmall number, marched the beginning of November with all her forces to attack them, and ſo ſurpriſed them by her unexpected arrival, that they deſerted Edinburgh, and retired to Sterling. When they were there, they ſent William Maitland, of Lidington, to Elizabeth, to deſire her aſſiſtance, without which they ſaw they ſhould be infalliby oppreſſed. The French troops ſtill continuing to purſue them, obliged them alſo to quit Sterling, and retire to the mountains, where they divided in two bodies to embarras their enemies, who gave them no reſt. Some time after, they received letters from William Maitland, giving them hopes of a good ſucceſs of his negotiation. Such was the origin of the Scotch troubles, on which I have been forced to enlarge, the better to ſhew the concern Elizabeth was to have in them, ſince ſhe was their principal object. As this is a material point in her hiſtory, and as upon the knowledge of the deſigns formed againſt her repoſe ſhe regulated her conduct, I ought to ſupport this truth by the teſtimony of a French hiſtorian, who cannot be ſuſpected in the affair. Father Daniel thus expreſſes himſelf in the reign of Francis II.

"I obſerved, that, before the conſpiracy of Amboiſe broke out, la Renaudie had been ſent by the admiral into England, to engage Elizabeth to make a diverſion in Scotland, while the Calviniſtical party revolted in France; and ſhe knew her intereſt too well to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of kindling or fomenting a civil war in the two kingdoms. Whatever care ſhe had taken to bridle the catholics of her kingdom, ſhe was always apprehenſive of a party forming againſt her in favour of the queen of France, who carried herſelf as heireſs of the crown of England, and had quartered the arms with thoſe of Scotland, when ſhe was only queen dauphineſs; and if France and Scotland had remained in tranquility, England was in danger of being attacked from two quarters at once, and diſturbed at home by the ſtill numerous adherents of the old religion."

Hence may be ſeen what was the deſign of the princes of Lorrain, in ſending a French army into Scotland. It was to preſerve the peace of that kingdom, that is, render it entirely ſubject to France, in order to attack England from that ſide. This muſt be ever remembered, if it is deſired to underſtand perfectly Elizabeth's hiſtory. Let us now mention the affairs of France.

After Henry II. had concluded a peace with Spain, he reſolved to relinquiſh entirely the affairs of Italy, and apply himſelf ſolely to his project of uniting England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the monarchy of France. His haſte to cauſe the dauphin, his ſon, and the queen of Scotland, his daughter-in-law, to aſſume the title of king and queen of England immediately after the concluſion of the peace, clearly ſhews, he had the thing in his thoughts, though he was not yet perhaps reſolved how to execute it. Elizabeth, who was on the throne of England, was but a woman, and might be conſidered as a baſtard: ſhe had no ally; had lately made a great many enemies amongſt her ſubjects, by her innovations in religion: the king of Spain no longer concerned himſelf with her affairs; and the pope deſired nothing more paſſionately than to dethrone her, and place a catholic princeſs in her room. All theſe circumſtances doubtleſs gave Henry hopes of ſucceſs in his deſign. To effect which, he was to ſhew a great zeal for the catholic religion, to gain the profeſſors of it, princes and ſubjects, to his intereſts. The perſecution renewed in France immediately after the peace of Cateau, flowed perhaps as much from this as any other cauſe, though the king's diſpoſition, the pope's ſolicitations, the ſuggeſtions of the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain, and the ſecret treaty made with Spain, had but too large a ſhare in that tragedy.

This prince was taken out of the world the 10th of July, in the midſt of his vaſt projects, by a death ſudden and tragical [n], leaving for ſucceſſor a young prince incapable to govern of himſelf. The two princes of Lorrain, uncles to the young queen, were entruſted with the adminiſtration of the government under the new reign. They removed the conſtable of Montmorency immediately from the court, and recalled the cardinal of Tournon, ſworn enemy of the proteſtant religion. When the affairs of the court were ſettled, their next care was to erect courts of juſtice, called Ardentes, for condemning proteſtants to the flames. This threw the reformed into an inevitable neceſſity of either ſuffering themſelves to be burnt one by one, or of taking up arms in their own defence, and ſo furniſhing their enemies with the deſired pretence to extirpate them all at once. On the other hand, they ſent two thouſand men into Scotland, under the command of La Broſſe, with orders to join the catholics of England for dethroning Elizabeth. Thus, their boundleſs ambition engaged a young prince, not yet ſeventeen years of age, to throw his own kingdom into a flame, and withal to undertake the conqueſt of England, which of all the countries of the world is the moſt difficult to be conquered.

At the ſame time appeared the ſeeds of troubles in the Low Countries, which ſoon ripened, and which it will not be improper to mention, in order to ſhew their riſe.

Charles V. had always a great affection for the Low Countries, where he was born, and had governed them with great lenity. Indeed, after the victory of Pavia, he had formed the project of changing their government, and of making of the ſeventeen provinces one ſtate, dependant on the crown of Spain. He was incited to this by the Spaniards, who would have found their advantage in ſeeing him abſolute maſter of theſe provinces, where his authority was very much limited by their privileges. But, after mature deliberation, he relinquiſhed the project, whether to avoid the oppreſſions with which the execution would have been infallibly attended, or becauſe he believed it impracticable by reaſon of the different laws and cuſtoms of theſe provinces, each of which had been a ſeparate ſtate.

Philip II. his ſon and ſucceſſor, reſumed much the ſame deſign, and reſolved to rule independent of the laws and privileges inceſſantly alleged by theſe ſtates. To this he added the project of extirpating the proteſtants, then very numerous in the provinces. For that purpoſe, he obtained from the court of Rome the erection of ſeveral archbiſhoprics and biſhoprics, to the great detriment of the abbots, part of whoſe revenues were to be given to the new ſees. But, beſides the intereſt of the proteſtants and abbots, there was another thing of univerſal concern. Philip had put Spaniſh garriſons into the principal towns, contrary to the privileges of the provinces, and thereby plainly diſcovered his intention of reducing them to ſlavery. In fine, when he departed in Sptember 1559 for Spain, he committed the government of the Low Countries to Margaret, ducheſs of Parma, his natural ſiſter [o], to the great diſguſt of William of Naſſau, prince of Orange, and of count Egmont, who had both aſpired to that dignity. But what gave them the laſt provocation was, his leaving with the governeſs, the cardinal of Granvelle their enemy, and who was conſidered as the author of the pernicious counſels, tending to deprive the country of its liberty. Philip was no ſooner arrived in Spain than he cauſed a great number of proteſtants to be burnt, and, by theſe inhuman executions, ſhewed the ſubjects of the Low Countries what they were afterwards to expect.

Pope Paul IV. dying in the courſe of this year, was ſucceeded by cardinal Angelo de Medici, a Milaneſe, by the name of Pius IV. [p].

[1560.] To underſtand the ſequel of this reign, it is abſolutely neceſſary to have a diſtinct idea of the ſituation of the Engliſh affairs, as well with regard to the queen's perſon, as to the people of England and the foreigners. The wonder of this reign lies not in the memorable events which happened in England, while Elizabeth was on the throne, but in the tranquility which ſhe cauſed her ſubjects to enjoy, amidſt the ſecret and open attacks of her own and their enemies, both at home and abroad. To underſtand therefore the motives of Elizabeth's conduct, and the maxims by which ſhe eſtabliſhed her government, theſe enemies, their characters, their views, their intereſts, are to be diſtinctly ſhewn. Hence alſo will be ſeen and admired, the addreſs with which ſhe freed herſelf from all the embarraſſments and ſnares to which ſhe was continually expoſed. For this purpoſe, it muſt be obſerved, that her right to the crown was always conteſted openly or tacitly; that the papiſts in general, conſidering her but as a queen de facto, believed they might with a ſafe conſcience aſſiſt in dethroning her, whenever an opportunity offered. As the uncertainty of her right was the foundation on which her enemies built, I cannot help enlarging a little on what has been ſaid above on this ſubject.

The parliament of England, conſiſting of the king and both houſes, which repreſent the whole nation, there is no Engliſhman but what is ſubject to its laws, were it only for this reaſon, that every man is ſuppoſed to give his conſent either in perſon or by his repreſentative. It was upon this foundation that Mary and Elizabeth aſcended the throne, I mean, in virtue of an act of parliament, impowering their father to ſettle the ſucceſſion. But it may be doubted, whether foreign princes, concerned in ſuch acts of parliament, are obliged to the ſame ſubmiſſion, when they believe them manifeſtly unjuſt to themſelves. I ſhall not undertake to decide this queſtion, which is more uſually determined by arms than by laws. I ſhall only remark, that formerly Edward III. did not think himſelf obliged to abide by the deciſion of the French nation, which had placed Philip of Valois on the throne. However, Mary, queen of France and Scotland, believed herſelf injured, as well by the act, impowering Henry VIII. to interrupt the order of ſucceſſion according to his humour, as by the will of that prince. She alleged, that neither king nor parliament had any right to place on the throne two daughters declared illegitimate by ſolemn acts, and ſtill leſs to overlook the poſterity of the eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. even without aſſigning any reaſon, and place in the line of the ſucceſſion baſtards, and the children of the younger. To theſe two grievances it was anſwered, that the Engliſh, in acknowledging ſucceſſively Mary and Elizabeth for queens of England, had not followed the caprice of Henry VIII. but the order of nature and the law of ſucceſſion; that the caprice of this prince lay not in his placing his two daughters next after his ſon Edward, but in the intention to exclude theſe two princeſſes, really born in wedlock: that, in reſtoring them to their due place, Henry corrected his error, and left no room for any alteration: that the not revoking the ſentence of divorce againſt Anne Bullen, and the ſubſequent act againſt Elizabeth, was not without good reaſons, and at moſt, was but a defect of formality, which altered not the thing itſelf. As to Mary's ſecond grievance, that Henry had not mentioned the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter, it muſt be owned, the generality of the Engliſh were convinced of the injuſtice of that proceeding. But as the caſe which might breed a diſpute on this ſubject, did not yet offer, this point was left undetermined, in hopes of the queen's marriage, and her having children to ſucceed her.

Let us now proceed to another reflection with reſpect to the foreign princes. Mary, eldeſt daughter of Henry VIII. aſcended the throne without any diſturbance from abroad; whereas, after her death, the principal ſovereigns of Europe endeavoured to wreſt the ſceptre from Elizabeth. It is not difficult to aſſign many natural cauſes of the different conduct of the princes with regard to theſe two queens. The firſt is, that when Mary mounted the throne, there was not a prince in Europe who could with any colour diſpute her right. It is true, the young queen of Scotland was in France, and deſtined for the dauphin, but was not yet married. This marriage was only projected, and could not be executed ſome years, by reaſon of the tender age of the parties. But ſuppoſing Henry II. ſhould have then aſſerted the claim of this queen, he muſt have drawn upon himſelf all the forces of the emperor and England. The ſecond cauſe is no leſs natural, namely, that by the principles of the Roman catholics, they could not conteſt Mary's right without a renunciation of the papal authority, ſince the diſpenſation for the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon was granted by a pope. But Henry II. was very far from any ſuch thought, and as for the emperor, Charles V. he was particularly concerned to ſupport Mary's title, who was his couſin-german. As for the pope, he maintained his own rights in ſupporting thoſe of Mary. Laſtly, as Mary was zealous for her religion, the pope, the emperor, the king of France, found a great advantage in this zeal. The pope expected to ſee the catholic religion reſtored by her means in England. The emperor immediately projected her marriage with his ſon Philip. Beſides, a catholic queen in England removed all apprehenſions of the aid the German proteſtants might receive from the Engliſh. In a word, his zeal for his religion gave him the ſatisfaction of ſeeing England about to return into the pale of the Roman church. For the ſame reaſon, Henry II. who burnt the proteſtants in France, could not but be pleaſed to ſee them deprived of the protection they might have expected from England, if that kingdom had continued proteſtant. Thus every thing conſpired to render Mary's reign peaceable and ſecure. It was alſo this, doubtleſs, which induced that queen to carry the perſecution againſt the proteſtants to ſuch a height, well knowing they could have no hopes of aſſiſtance from abroad.

But when, after Mary's death, Elizabeth mounted the throne, there was a change in the intereſts of the princes, as often happens by the death of a ſovereign. The empire and Spain were no longer under the dominion of the ſame prince. The dauphin had married the queen of Scotland, and by that marriage acquired a claim to England, which he had not before. Beſides, the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain, were become more powerful in the court of France, by the abſence of the conſtable of Montmorency, who was priſoner in the Low Countries. After the death of Henry II. they became ſtill more powerful, and ſhewed by their conduct they had nothing more at heart than the placing of the queen their niece on the throne of England. Elizabeth could not doubt it, ſince ſhe ſaw Francis II. and Mary ſtill uſurp the arms of England, which they ſeemed to have taken at firſt only in obedience to the orders of Henry II. On the other hand, Philip II. who deſpaired of marrying Elizabeth, had entirely deſerted the intereſts of England, and appeared by no means diſpoſed to ſupport that kingdom, which was become proteſtant. Laſtly, the pope ſaw his authority baniſhed in England, and no hope of gaining Elizabeth, who was evidently concerned to maintain what ſhe had done. Thus France, Spain, the court of Rome, not only had no reaſon to incline them to ſupport Elizabeth, but it was even their intereſt to dethrone her. It is very true, Philip II. would not willingly have ſeen England and Ireland in the hands of the king of France; but he would not have been ſorry that France was to conquer England, becauſe, from ſo difficult an undertaking, he would have received the ſatisfaction of ſeeing two powers moſt formidable to him, weakening each other. Beſides, his zeal for the catholic religion, and his projects in relation to the Low Countries, would have made him with great pleaſure behold theſe two kingdoms incapable to aſſiſt thoſe provinces, which already bore their yoke with impatience. As to the new emperor, Elizabeth, if ſhe had nothing to fear, had at leaſt nothing to hope from him. As for the proteſtants of Germany, they then lived in a tranquility which they would not willingly have diſturbed for the aſſiſtance of England. They had found in the reign of Henry VIII. that, under the pretence of maintaining their religion, it was deſigned to engage them in a war by no means agreeable to their intereſts. Wherefore, content with their preſent condition, they were not willing to be oppreſſed for ſupporting the rights of Elizabeth, though, otherwiſe, they with pleaſure ſaw a proteſtant queen on the throne of England.

I have already ſhewn the ſituation of the Scotch affairs. Elizabeth was ſo far from expecting any aſſiſtance from Scotland, that ſhe ſaw herſelf under an indiſpenſable neceſſity to ſupport the proteſtant party there, well knowing, it was the intention of France to attack her from that quarter. Beſides the two thouſand men already ſent to the regent, another more conſiderable reinforcement was preparing in France, to be conducted into Scotland by the marquis of Elbeuf [q]. This ſufficiently diſcovered, that the court of France, ſenſible of the difficulty of attacking England by ſea, was reſolved to puſh the war on the northern frontiers, by a junction of their forces with thoſe of Scotland. Thus the deſign of the French court to ſubdue the Scotch rebels, was only the firſt ſtep by which they hoped to riſe to the conqueſt of England.

On the other ſide, Ireland gave no leſs uneaſineſs to Elizabeth. That iſland was inhabited by native Iriſh, and Engliſh families tranſplanted thither ſince the conqueſt of it by Henry II. It was governed by a viceroy, or lord lieutenant, in the name of the queen; but his authority was very far from being ſo regarded as to keep the Iriſh in ſubmiſſion. They had among them many great men, who, indeed, outwardly acknowledged the queen's ſovereignty, but believed they had a right to do themſelves juſtice for the wrongs they pretended to have received. They made war upon one another, re-gardleſs of the lieutenant's orders, who, having but few Engliſh forces, was unable to make himſelf feared. As often as there was any preſſing occaſion to chaſtiſe a rebellion, or prevent the ſtrong from oppreſſing the weak, new forces were to arrive from England. But as this could not be done without expence, very often it was not determined till the laſt extremity. So moſt of the lieutenants, finding themſelves deſtitute of the means to force an obedience, wilfully connived at the exceſſes and violences of the great, for fear of unſeaſonably expoſing the royal authority. They contented themſelves with filling their purſes while they held their commiſſions, and left it to their ſucceſſors to repreſs the inſolence of the Iriſh. This conduct had rendered the lords of the country ſo fierce and arrogant, that they acknowledged the royal authority no farther than it was neceſſary to protect them againſt their enemies. Beſides the natural averſion of the Iriſh for the Engliſh, who helped not by their conduct to gain their affection, there was at this time, another reaſon which contributed to encreaſe their averſion, namely, the change which the queen had lately made in religion. The Iriſh had for the pope an attachment equal to their ignorance, which was extreme. This diſpoſed them to liſten to the ſolicitations of the Romiſh emiſſaries, who were continually inciting them againſt the government. Elizabeth was therefore obliged to have a conſtant eye upon the tranſactions of that iſland, knowing what credit the pope her enemy had there.

It remains now to ſpeak of the diſpoſition of the Engliſh to Elizabeth. When the queen deſigned to eſtabliſh the reformation, her firſt care was to change the magiſtrates in the towns and counties, and fill their places with proteſtants. Then ſhe called a parliament, whoſe members were choſen according to her deſires. This parliament revived the laws made by Edward VI. concerning religion. Theſe laws, by the care of the magiſtrates, were punctually obſerved. So a few months after Mary's death, the public exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion was not leſs criminal than the exerciſe of the proteſtant had been in the laſt reign. The clergy, who refuſed obedience to the new laws, were deprived of their benefices, and the vacancies ſupplied by zealous proteſtants. To ſay all in a word, the reformation roſe under Elizabeth, juſt as the Romiſh religion had been eſtabliſhed under Mary, with this difference, that no perſon was put to death by Elizabeth on account of religion. We are not however to imagine that this external change produced a real one in the mind. There are very few, who in point of religion, implicitly obey their ſovereigns. Thoſe who were good catholics under Mary, remained ſuch under Elizabeth; as thoſe who really embraced the reformation under Edward VI. continued in Mary's reign reformed in their hearts under an outward compliance. If it is therefore conſidered, that all the changes in religion under this and the foregoing reigns had been made in the ſame manner, it will not be difficult to comprehend that the Roman catholics were ſtill very numerous in the kingdom. Little more than twenty years had paſſed ſince the reformation began, and in that interval the public worſhip had been changed four times. Now it is improbable, that a whole nation ſo frequently change their opinion according to the caprice of the governors, though outwardly they ſubmit to the public authority. It is certain the number of Roman catholics in the kingdom was very great, even after Elizabeth had eſtabliſhed the reformation, though it is likely the reformed were ſtill more numerous. It is therefore very natural to imagine, that thoſe who perſiſted in their antient ſentiments were ſecret enemies of the queen: that they deſired the re-eſtabliſhment of the old religion, and were diſpoſed to embrace all opportunities to place a catholic queen on the throne. It was not one of the leaſt of Elizabeth's cares to watch her own ſubjects.

Let us briefly recapitulate what has been ſaid. Elizabeth had for enemies, France, the queen of Scotland, the pope, and all the catholic powers. For though Philip II. had not yet declared himſelf, ſhe knew he was not her friend, and the ſequel clearly proved it. On the other hand, ſhe had the Iriſh and a great part of her Engliſh ſubjects to guard againſt, without having one ally to aſſiſt her. She was therefore to ſeek in herſelf, in her prudence, in her good conduct, and in her own ſubjects, the aſſiſtance ſhe would have vainly ſought elſewhere. To obtain ſpeedily and willingly the aid ſhe foreſaw would be frequently wanted, ſhe had but one way, and that was to make herſelf beloved by her people. Accordingly this was the governing maxim of her conduct. Happily for her, the qualities of her heart and mind were ſo diſpoſed, that ſhe never once deviated from ſo neceſſary a rule. Wherefore it may be affirmed, that no king of England was ever more ſincerely beloved by his people than Elizabeth. But to demonſtrate this elogy not to be groundleſs, it is neceſſary to be more particular upon this ſubject. It is certain, that her truly proteſtant ſubjects were much more numerous than the catholics. What therefore could ſhe do better than to favour the proteſtant religion, eſpecially, as being herſelf of that religion, ſhe could without reluctance act ſo agreeably to her intereſts? Another thing which greatly contributes to procure a ſovereign the affection of his people, is ſo to manage the treaſury, that he be not forced to load them with unneceſſary taxes. No prince had ever this quality in greater perfection than Elizabeth. Nay, ſhe carried this œconomy ſo far, that ſhe ſometimes gave occaſion to her own miniſters to charge her with avarice. However, her expences were ſo well regulated, that ſhe was never ſeen to laviſh her treaſures upon her favourites, or expend them in things of no uſe. Nevertheleſs, this frugal inclination, whether owing to nature or policy, hindered her not from being profuſe of her money, when ſhe thought it neceſſary. France, Spain, and Scotland, experienced, in their turns, how well ſhe knew to be laviſh of her treaſures. Her people had ſo good an opinion of her œconomy, that through the whole courſe of her reign, ſhe was never once denied by the parliament the ſupplies ſhe wanted, or complained of by her ſubjects for the taxes they were charged with. She had alſo another quality which won her the eſteem of the Engliſh. She would not be induced by her miniſters to beſtow offices or honours upon undeſerving perſons. She was apprehenſive of nothing more than to render contemptible, dignities deſtined for the recompence of merit and virtue. By this wiſe conduct ſhe avoided the diſobliging of men, who might have aſpired to honours, had they ſeen them beſtowed on others of no greater merit than themſelves. This was a maxim from which ſhe rarely departed, during the whole courſe of her reign. Laſtly, ſhe uſed her conſtant endeavours to cauſe juſtice to be impartially adminiſtered. Her greateſt favourites felt her ſeverity, when they abuſed her kindneſs and wandered from their duty. There is no doubt, her great intereſt to be beloved by her people induced her to employ all poſſible means to that end. But it cannot be, as ſome have inferred from hence, that her whole conduct was all diſſimulation, ſince it is by no means impoſſible for the inclinations of men to tally with their intereſts. Elizabeth had a true eſteem for the reformed religion, and her intereſt required her to ſupport it with all her power. She was naturally an œconomiſt, and ſuch was the ſituation of her affairs, that no prince ever had more occaſion to be ſo. As ſhe had true merit herſelf, ſhe eſteemed it in others; and therefore could never reſolve to confer dignities upon men who had not merited them. In fine, had ſhe been never ſo little remiſs with reſpect to juſtice, there would have been danger of her ſex being deſpiſed, and of the great men growing by degrees too licentious.

Such were the principal means uſed by Elizabeth to gain the affection of her ſubjects. Their love was ſo neceſſary, that ſhe had no other reſource. Without it her reign would probably have been very unhappy, conſidering the number and quality of her enemies. The reader therefore is to conſider moſt of her actions, as flowing from the maxim ſhe had preſcribed to herſelf, to neglect nothing which might procure the affection of her people.

There was alſo another maxim which no leſs influenced her conduct than this I have mentioned. She ſaw herſelf threatened on all ſides. The pope, France, and afterwards Spain, never ceaſed their open or ſecret attacks. It was not without reaſon that ſhe feared an union of all theſe powers for her ruin. In this belief, ſhe laboured to the utmoſt to cheriſh the troubles of the neighbouring ſtates, and particularly of France, Scotland, and the Low Countries; that her enemies being employed at home, might be leſs able to invade her. I ſhall not pretend to decide, whether this way of defence againſt enemies ſo powerful and dangerous, was agreeable to the rules of juſtice. It cannot however be denied, that this was excellent policy, and that her own ſecurity juſtified this method, as ſhe had no other to divert their attacks. Accordingly ſhe made frequent uſe of this maxim, as will hereafter appear.

I thought it neceſſary to prepare the reader for the ſequel of this reign by theſe reflections, which are ſolely deſigned to ſuſpend in his mind the prejudices inſpired by the hiſtorians of all nations and religions, for and againſt this renowned queen. It is no ſmall difficulty to fix the judgment, amidſt all the contrarieties which occur in the hiſtorians. Some have conſidered her as the moſt accompliſhed queen the world ever ſaw. They have found no fault in her. All her actions were the reſults of prudence, juſtice, and equity; and had no other motive than the glory of God and the hap, neſs happineſs of her people. They have pretended that her love for her ſubjects was ſo ardent, that ſhe forgot her own intereſt, and thought only of rendering them happy. Not content to excuſe ſome of her actions which deſerve cenſure, they have even in ſome meaſure ſanctified them, by inſinuating that they were the effects of her zeal for the glory of God and the proteſtant religion. Others have aſperſed her with all the calumnies it is poſſible to invent. According to theſe, ſhe exceeded the moſt famous tyrants in cruelty and barbarity. She was extremely deceitful, and her whole conduct was one continued diſſimulation, from the beginning to the end of her reign, notwithſtanding her affectation of an outward ſhow of religion and virtue. To theſe accuſations concerning her public adminiſtration, they have added horrid ſlanders upon her private life. They have repreſented her as a diſſolute woman, who conſtantly refuſed to marry, in order more freely to continue her lewd practices. To efface both theſe impreſſions, and incline the reader (if religious prejudices will ſuffer him) to ſuſpend his judgment, I have previouſly ſhewn the motives of her conduct, and the maxims by which ſhe was, and with reſpect to policy only ought, to have been governed. Her principal aim was to ſecure a tottering crown, and to ſucceed, ſhe followed the above-mentioned maxims. Is it to be thought ſtrange, that on certain occaſions ſhe little over-acted her tenderneſs for her people, wherein lay her only ſupport? But it would be juſt cauſe of wonder, that by an irregular life and other exceſſes, of which ſhe is accuſed, ſhe would have acted directly contrary to what could only procure her the love and eſteem of her people, of which ſhe had ſo great occaſion. This ſuffices, as I imagine, to diſpel ſome of thoſe clouds by which her reputation has been darkened. On the other hand, as ſhe ſaw herſelf aſſaulted from all parts by powerful enemies, who were continually infuſing a ſpirit of rebellion into her ſubjects, when we ſhall ſee her fomenting the troubles of Scotland, and aſſiſting the Hugonots of France, and the malcontents of the Low Countries, it will be eaſily known to what this conduct is owing, notwithſtanding the flatteries of ſome of her admirers. Apply but the two maxims, I have mentioned, to her actions, and remember the neceſſity of her always having them in view, nothing almoſt in her conduct will then appear, the true motive whereof may not eaſily be diſcovered. After this long, though, I think, abſolutely neceſſary digreſſion, it is time to proceed to the events of the year 1560.

Maitland, who was ſent into England from the confederate Scots, at laſt concluded the treaty, which was ſigned at Berwick the 27th of February 1560[r]. Elizabeth ſeeing the great preparations which were making in France, and not doubting of their being deſigned againſt Scotland, thought herſelf above all things obliged to provide for the ſafety of that nation, and prevent the French from being too powerful there. She had cauſe to fear, that if queen Mary had children by the king her huſband, France and Scotland would be united under one head, which it was her great inteteſt to hinder. She concluded therefore a treaty with Maitland, which ſhews her fears with regard to Scotland. The treaty ran:

That ſhe took under her protection the duke of Chateleraut, and all the nobility and ſubjects of Scotland, to maintain that kingdom in its liberties and privileges, during the marriage of the queen of Scotland with the king of France, and one year after.

That ſhe promiſed to ſend with all ſpeed, a convenient aid of men into Scotland, and continue them there till the French were entirely expelled the kingdom.

That ſhe would come to no agreement with France, but on condition of leaving Scotland in full liberty.

That ſhe would never abandon the confederates, while they acknowledged Mary for their ſovereign, and endeavoured to maintain the liberty of their country, and the eſtate of the crown of Scotland.

That if the Engliſh took any place in Scotland, they ſhould be either demoliſhed by the Scots, or delivered to the duke of Chateleraut, at his own opinion; but that the Engliſh ſhould erect no fortification in the kingdom, without the advice of the duke and his party.

That the duke and all his party ſhould join the Engliſh forces.

That they ſhould declare themſelves enemies of thoſe of their countrymen, who ſhould ſerve France againſt England.

That if England was attacked in the ſouth, the confederates ſhould ſend to the queen's aſſiſtance two thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe at the leaſt; but if in the north, they ſhould join the Engliſh army with all their forces.

That if the earl of Argyle, lord chief juſtice of Scotland, ſhould join with the confederates, he ſhould be obliged to uſe his endeavours to reduce the north of Ireland under the dominion of England, agreeably to a treaty to be made betwixt him and the lord lieutenant of Ireland.

That the duke of Chateleraut and his party ſhould give hoſtages to Elizabeth, to remain in England [s] during the time that the marriage between Mary queen of Scots and the king if France ſhould ſubſiſt.

Laſtly, The duke of Chateleraut and his party proteſted, that their intention was to be faithful to their queen in every thing not contrary to the laws and liberties of Scotland, and not tending to their ſubverſion.

From this treaty, it is plain Elizabeth's ſole aim was to keep the king of France from becoming maſter of Scotland, knowing it was intended to invade her from that quarter.

While the treaty was negotiating, the French forces which were in Scotland continued their purſuit of the confederate Scots into the mountains, contrary to the opinion of Martigues of the houſe of Luxemburg. This lord who had brought the laſt ſuccours from France [t], was for an immediate invaſion of England, imagining, that on his approach, the Engliſh catholics would all riſe and join him. But the regent, better informed of the ſtate of England, judged it not proper to enter upon ſo great a deſign with ſo ſmall an army. Some time after, while the French were exulting at the ſight of a flying enemy, they diſcovered from a mountain a fleet at ſea, which they at firſt took to be the marquis of Elbeuf's. But perceiving afterwards it was an Engliſh fleet [u], they were of opinion that the forces ſent to the confederates by land were not very diſtant. This made them retire to Leith, with deſign to aſſemble there all their forces, and wait the arrival of the marquis d'Elbeuf. But he was expected in vain, for a violent tempeſt diſperſed his fleet, and forced him to ſail back to France to refit his ſhips. Afterwards the troubles in France calling for the aſſiſtance of the forces which were ſending into Scotland, and of thoſe already there, the expedition was entirely blaſted.

The French forces being retired to Leith, the confederates aſſembled from all places where they were diſperſed, in order to join the Engliſh army marching to their relief under the command of the lord Grey [w]. At length they came to Haddington the 1ſt of April, being ſix thouſand ſtrong in foot and two thouſand in horſe, and there expected the ſo much deſired Engliſh ſuccours, which were advancing with all poſſible ſpeed. The queen-regent fearing to be ſhut up in Leith, choſe rather to retire to the caſtle of Edinburgh, which was committed by the ſtates to the care of John Areſkin, with the expreſs condition not to reſign it without their order. Areſkin received the regent with honour, but ſtill preſerved the command of the caſtle.

Shortly after, the lord Grey entering Scotland [x] with an army of ſix or ſeven thouſand foot and twelve hundred horſe, was joined by the confederates, after which they marched together to Leith, where the enemies were retired. It was no inconſiderable work to beſiege a place which had an army within its walls; and yet it was undertaken, becauſe there was no other way to drive the French out of Scotland. While they were employed in the ſiege, all poſſible endeavours were uſed by the French king to prevail with Elizabeth to recal her forces out of Scotland. But ſhe knew her intereſt too well to be impoſed upon. When de Sevre, the French embaſſador, firſt mentioned it, ſhe anſwered, Her troops ſhould be readily recalled, provided the French were ſo too; ſince France had no more right than England to ſend forces into Scotland. At laſt the embaſſador finding, after many attempts, he could not prevail, declared in the preſence of the Spaniſh embaſſador, that by ſending forces into Scotland ſhe had violated the treaty of Cateau: to which ſhe calmly anſwered, That the king of France had firſt infringed that treaty by his endeavours to render himſelf maſter of Scotland. Some time before, ſhe had publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring her reaſons for concerning herſelf in the affairs of Scotland. She charged in plain terms the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain with being the authors of the troubles in that kingdom, in order to effect more eaſily their deſigns againſt England. To them alſo ſhe wholly aſcribed the injury done her by the king and queen of France, in aſſuming her title and arms.

Before de Sevre had made his declaration, Monluc, biſhop of Valence, was come into England to preſs the queen to recal her forces from Scotland; and would have even perſuaded her that Francis II. and Mary had aſſumed her title on purpoſe to do her honour. This excuſe was more provoking than the injury. At laſt Monluc, ſeeing he could not divert her from her reſolution to ſupport the Scots, told her, the king of France would reſtore Calais, if ſhe would draw her forces out of Scotland. But ſhe anſwered, that ſhe did not value that fiſh-town ſo much as the quiet of Britain. Mean time ſhe diſpatched Montague [y] to Philip II. to inform him of her reaſons to aſſiſt Scotland. That embaſſador was to repreſent to him, that the Guiſes had projected an union of the crowns of France and Scotland, and, not to be diſappointed, had concerted the murder of the earl of Arran, who had happily eſcaped out of their ſnares [z], and that ſhe therefore deſired him to conſider if ſuch an union would be advantageous to Spain.

During theſe negotiations, the ſiege of Leith was continued, but with no great ſucceſs, becauſe of the numerous garriſon. The 15th of April, the French made a ſally, and nailed three great pieces of cannon [a]. The 30th, the Engliſh were fiercely repulſed at an aſſault. The 1ſt of May they ſtormed again, but with no better ſucceſs. The length and difficulties of the ſiege began now to diſcourage them, when the duke of Norfolk, warden of the northern marches of England, ſent a powerful reinforcement, and came to the Engliſh camp himſelf, to encourage the continuation of the ſiege. They would, however, have hardly taken the place, had not the conſpiracy of Amboiſe, which was then diſcovered in France, convinced the princes of Lorrain, that the ſeaſon was not proper for the execution of their deſigns againſt England. So, inſtead of ſending new forces into Scotland, they thought of recalling thoſe already there, imagining they might want them in France. It was to this end that Monluc, biſhop of Valence, and the comte de Randan, were ſent into Scotland, with full powers from the king to conclude a peace. Elizabeth, hearing of it, ſent likewiſe ſecretary Cecil, and Dr. Wotton, with the ſame powers [b]. The plenipotentiaries immediately agreed to meet at Edinburgh, in July, and in the mean time concluded a truce, which was to laſt till the end of their conferences. During the truce, the queen-regent died in the caſtle of Edinburgh, the 10th of June.

When the peace came to be negotiated, the French plenipotentiaries abſolutely refuſed to treat with the Scottiſh confederates, ſaying, it would be an injury to the royal authority, becauſe they were rebels. This refuſal might have put an end to the congreſs; but, as both ſides were deſirous of peace, an expedient at laſt was contrived, namely, Francis and Mary ſhould grant certain conditions to the confederates, not by way of treaty, but as of pure grace: and that nevertheleſs they ſhould promiſe to obſerve them in their treaty with the queen of England. This was in effect the ſame thing; but the embaſſadors, probably with a view to ſome advantage, preferred that expedient. Moſt hiſtorians confound, in the treaty ſhortly after concluded at Edinburgh, two things, which, however, ought to be diſtinguiſhed, namely, the conceſſions of Francis and Mary to their Scottiſh ſubjects, and the treaty between France and England. As of theſe two things, one was obſerved and the other not, it is neceſſary to have a diſtinct idea of them. The promiſes made to the Scots were:

That the French forces ſhould leave Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ſhips to be furniſhed by Elizabeth.

That the city of Leith ſhould be reſtored to Scotland, and the fortifications demoliſhed.

That the works made by the French at Dunbar ſhould be razed.

That the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould grant an act of oblivion to the confederates, for every thing done from the 10th of March 1559, to the 1ſt of Auguſt 1560, and that this act ſhould be approved and confirmed by the ſtates of Scotland, to be aſſembled the following Auguſt, with the conſent of the king and queen.

That the French ſhould have liberty to leave ſixty men in the iſle of Keith [c].

But, with regard to the intereſts of Elizabeth, a real treaty was concluded, which will be often mentioned hereafter by the name of the treaty of Edinburgh, containing,

That for the future the king and queen of Scotland ſhould not aſſume the title of king and queen of England and Ireland, nor bear the arms of theſe kingdoms.

That the patents and other acts which had been diſpatched with that title, ſhould be altered, or remain of no force.

That the farther ſatisfaction required by the queen of England for the injury done her, ſhould be referred to a conference at London, between the commiſſioners of the two crowns.

That if the commiſſioners could not agree, the deciſion ſhould be left to the king of Spain.

That the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould perform the promiſes made to the Scots at Edinburgh by the plenipotentiaries of France.

It muſt be obſerved, that Buchanan, in his hiſtory, has only mentioned the articles granted to the confederate Scots; and Camden, in his annals of Elizabeth, takes notice only of the treaty between the two crowns. This cauſes ſome obſcurity in their reſpective accounts of the following events:

After the concluſion of the treaty, the French and Engliſh quitted Scotland; the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar were demoliſhed; and the act of oblivion ſent over in Scotland, and confirmed by the ſtates. Theſe ſtates, aſſembled in Auguſt, made laws favourable to the reformation, and ſent them to the king and queen for their approbation, rather to diſcover their ſentiments, than with any hopes of obtaining their deſires; and yet they cauſed theſe new laws to be punctually obſerved.

But as to the treaty concluded between the crowns, Francis and Mary refuſed to ratify it, for a reaſon, the force of which is not eaſily conceived. It was, they ſaid, becauſe the Scots, falſely ſtiling themſelves faithful ſubjects, had made a treaty with Elizabeth in their own private names, without any warrant from the royal authority. If this refuſal had only concerned the articles granted to the Scots, Elizabeth might have believed that the court of France repented of their conceſſions, and then the reaſon alleged might have had ſome colour. But whatever related to the Scots being already performed, their pretended incroachment could not render invalid a treaty about a difference between Elizabeth and Mary, in which the conduct of the Scots was entirely unconcerned. It was therefore eaſy to infer, that this weak reaſon was but a pretence uſed by Francis and Mary, to elude what they had promiſed in the treaty with reſpect to Elizabeth. Accordingly, Elizabeth was convinced that the princes of Lorrain ſtill perſiſted in the deſign to wreſt the crown from her; and this belief was ever rooted in her mind. Mary's uncles did not then foreſee how dear this proceeding would one day coſt their niece, whoſe grandeur they ſo paſſionately deſired.

While Elizabeth was employed in theſe affairs, her court was attentive to watch her motions, her conduct, and inclinations with regard to marriage. Though ſhe told her parliament, ſhe was reſolved to remain ſingle, ſuch reſolutions were known to be liable to change, and the more, as there were many princes, and ſome lords, who deſpaired not to make her alter her mind. Charles, archduke of Auſtria, third ſon of the emperor Ferdinand, the king of Sweden, the duke of Holſtein, had already made their addreſſes. The earl of Arran, ſon of the duke of Chateleraut, relying on the barrenneſs of queen Mary, and his ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland, flattered himſelf that Elizabeth would prefer him to any other, in order to unite the two kingdoms [e]. To theſe were added others, who, being her ſubjects, and not daring to declare their minds ſo openly, were contented to leave her to gueſs their inclinations, or to diſcloſe them by means of ſome of her ladies. One proceeded upon his birth, another upon his merit, a third upon his mein and outward accompliſhments, apt to kindle the flames of love in the fair ſex. In ſhort, ſhe was indirectly aſſaulted on all the ſides which are generally thought weakeſt in a woman. The earl of Arundel [f], of a noble and ancient race, though a little advanced in years, imagined the queen would marry a ſubject rather than a ſovereign, and if ſo, that no man deſerved that honour better than he. Sir William Pickering [g], having received ſome particular mark of the queen's eſteem, deſpaired not that theſe firſt favours would be extended much farther. But no man believed he had better grounds to flatter his hopes, than Robert Dudley, ſon of the late duke of Northumberland. The queen viſibly preferred him to all who had the honour to approach her, and gave him ſo many proofs of the inclination ſhe had for him, that for ſome time it was believed ſhe intended to marry him. At her acceſſion to the crown, ſhe made him maſter of the horſe, and knight of the garter. From thenceforward, ſhe took a pleaſure to diſtribute her favours through him; ſo that, by this diſtinction, ſhe diſcovered that ſhe had more than a bare eſteem for him. He was at court called only My Lord, without any other addition, which demonſtrated her preference of him to all the nobility. And yet, when his pretenſions to ſuch diſtinguiſhing favours were examined, no qualities were found in him capable to make an impreſſion upon ſo diſcerning a queen. His vices far ſurpaſſing his virtues, recourſe was had to the planets which ruled his birth and occaſioned this ſympathy of thoughts. However this be, he was a favourite at court. All affairs were imparted to him: embaſſadors gave account to him of their negotiations: every one applied to him for his affairs at court, and woe to thoſe who addreſſed to any other; that was an unpardonable fault.

[c] The reader will naturally aſk of what ſervice would it be to Francis and Mary to have ſixty men of their French ſubjects left in Scotland. And Buchanan gives this reaſon, that the queen might not ſeem to be thrown out of the entire poſſeſſion of Scotland.

The queen had two favourites more, but of a different kind from Dudley, as they were only for the affairs of the government. Theſe were Nicholas Bacon and William Cecil. The firſt was made keeper of the great ſeal, with all the privileges of lord chancellor. William Cecil had been ſecretary of ſtate to Edward VI. and diſcharged the office ſo well, that if his religion had not ſtood in the way, he had been continued under Mary. He was not however expoſed to perſecution, whether he ſo artfully managed as to give no advantages againſt him, or his particular merit procured him a diſtinction above all other proteſtants. He had an uncommon genius, a ſound judgment, a capacity for great affairs, an unwearied application, and an impenetrable ſecrecy, with a conſtant tendency to his ſole view, the welfare and advantage of the queen. It is not therefore ſtrange if he preſerved all his life the favour of a queen who ſo perfectly knew her own intereſt. When able princes are bleſt with ſuch miniſters, they do not eaſily part with them.

In the ſituation of Elizabeth's affairs, ſhe wanted able and diſintereſted miniſters to guide her. Wherever ſhe turned her eyes out of her kingdom, ſhe ſaw not one friend who was really concerned for her welfare; ſhe had at firſt relied on the king of Spain; but Montague's report of his embaſſy to that prince, diſappointed all her expectations from him. When this embaſſador, after diſcourſing with Philip about the Scottiſh affairs, demanded, agreeably to his inſtructions, the renewing of the antient alliance between England and the houſe of Burgundy, he found him very cold. Philip, in his anſwer, lamented the changes made in England with regard to religion, and ſignified his concern for them. He complained he had received no intelligence of the ſending an Engliſh army into Scotland till it was too late; and yet he adviſed the queen to have it inſerted in the future treaty between her and Mary, that if France ſent forces into Scotland, ſhe ſhould alſo have the ſame liberty, and to ſtipulate poſitively the reſtitution of Calais. He added, he had till then prevented Elizabeth's excommunication, and obtained from the pope a promiſe, that nothing ſhould be done in that affair without his knowledge. As to the renewing of the treaty, he coldly anſwered, it was needleſs. In fine, he returned by the embaſſador the collar of the order of the garter. This convinced Elizabeth, that Philip was no longer her friend, and that his advice, which came too late, was more the effect of his jealouſy of the growing greatneſs of France than of his affection for her. Some time after, ſhe gave him a ſmall mortification, in refuſing her permiſſion to certain Engliſh catholics [h] to reſide in the Low Countries, and preſerve their effects in England. Amongſt theſe was Jane Dormer, grandmother of the Condé de Feria's lady, whom he married in England, during his embaſſy [i]. This ſo provoked the Condé, that he uſed all his credit with Philip to exaſperate him againſt Elizabeth. He even found an opportunity to force into the inquiſition a ſervant of Chamberlain, the Engliſh embaſſador in ordinary for Spain. He alſo ſtrongly ſolicited the pope to excommunicate her, but without ſucceſs. Pius IV. was for trying other means, which appeared to him more proper to gain the queen, and were not prejudicial to his cenſures, which he could thunder againſt her whenever he pleaſed.

It was with this view that he ſent Vincenzo Parpaglia, abbot of St. Saviour, into England, with certain inſtructions, and a letter to the queen, exhorting her to return into the pale of the church, and promiſing to continue the general council [k] as ſoon as poſſible. It is pretended, the nuntio had likewiſe a power to offer the queen, that the pope would annul the ſentence of Henry's divorce with Anne Bullen, and the ſubſequent act of parliament, confirm the Engliſh liturgy, and permit the Engliſh to communicate in both kinds. But theſe offers were not capable of moving Elizabeth; and the rather, as probably they were not ſincere, at leaſt, in what concerned religion. Hence it may be obſerved, what opinion the court of Rome and all catholics had of Elizabeth's birth, ſince it was offered as a great favour to own her for legitimate daughter of Henry VIII.

Mean time, Elizabeth very cloſely applied herſelf to the affairs of the government, in order to render her ſubjects as happy as poſſible, well knowing, her greateſt aſſiſtance was to flow from them in caſe of an invaſion, which ſhe had reaſon to expect. This year, ſhe was obliged to reſtore the coin to its antient ſtandard, which had been extremely debaſed in the reign of Henry VIII. though no king had ever drawn ſo much money from his ſubjects [l]. If cardinal Pole may be credited, this prince alone drew more money from the people than all the kings together ſince the conqueſt. The monaſtery of Weſtminſter was this year turned into a collegiate church [m]. Theſe were the moſt remarkable events in England in 1560. But before we proceed to the following year, it is neceſſary briefly to mention the affairs of the neighbouring ſtates.

The affairs of France tended to confuſion the beginning of the year. The proteſtants, ſeeing themſelves perſecuted, and condemned to the flames without mercy, thought it time to provide for their common defence. To this end, ſome of them, after a private conference, formed a conſpiracy againſt the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain, the king's miniſters, and their declared enemies. They had no leader who openly appeared, but very likely the prince of Condé, jealous of theſe two foreign princes, had among the reformed emiſſaries, who intimated to them, that when things were ripe, they ſhould not want a ſupport. However this be, a gentleman, named La Renaudie, projected to carry off the Lorrain princes, then with the king at Amboiſe. This attempt miſcarrying, was interpreted as a conſpiracy againſt the king himſelf, and twelve hundred perſons, either guilty or only ſuſpected to be concerned in it, were put to death. The two Lorrain princes would have been glad, on this pretence, to have diſpatched the prince of Condé; but their meaſures not being yet well taken, they waited a more favourable opportunity. Some time after, the ſtates, being aſſembled at Orleans, the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé indiſcreetly came thither, though they had intimation of the court's ill deſigns againſt them. The king of Navarre, indeed, was not arreſted, but was ſo carefully watched, that an eſcape was impoſſible. The prince of Condé was impriſoned, and ſhortly after condemned to die. But the death of Frrncis [n], about the ſame time, prevented the execution of the ſentence, and the prince was releaſed.

[n] The 5th of December. Rapin.

This ſame year, Philip II. having carried war into Africk againſt the corſair Dragut, who had made himſelf king of Tripoli, his arms were ſo unſucceſsful, that he was forced to recal the Spaniſh troops left in the Netherlands. The inhabitants of thoſe provinces ſaw the departure of the Spaniards with great ſatisfaction, which would have been much encreaſed, had cardinal Granvelle been alſo recalled; for they mortally hated him, and were encouraged in their hate by the prince of Orange and the counteſs of Egmont and Horn, his ſworn enemies.

The death of Francis II. cauſed great alterations in the court of France. Charles IX. his brother and ſucceſſor, being yet a minor, Catherine de Medici, his mother, had the addreſs and influence to prevail with the king of Navarre, firſt prince of the blood, to yield the regency to her, and content himſelf with the title of lieutenant-general. Mean while, as ſhe was not entirely without fear that he might one day think of reſuming the rank due to his birth, ſhe fomented with all her art the diſſenſions which had begun to appear in the late reign. By this means, ſhe at laſt formed two parties in the court and kingdom, which proved her ſecurity, as ſhe was neceſſary to both. The firſt was headed by the duke of Guiſe, the conſtable of Montmorency, and the marſhal of St. André. Theſe three lords were called the triumvers. On their ſide were all the catholics of the kingdom, into whom a belief was infuſed, that the chiefs had only in view the maintenance of the catholic religion. At the head of the other party, wholly conſiſting of Hugonots (ſo the French proteſtants [o] were called), where the prince of Condé, the admiral of Coligny or Chatillon, and his brother d'Andelot. The king of Navarre fluctuated between the two parties, without being able to reſolve, and the queen-regent reaped great advantages from the diviſion among the great men.

The affairs of France being in this ſituation, Elizabeth ſeemed to be out of danger from them. Francis's ſucceſſor had no pretence to concern himſelf with the affairs of Scotland any farther than as common ally, and he had no manner of demand upon England. On the other hand, the queen-regent, who had no great affection for her daughter-in-law, was far from engaging in a war for her ſake. Though ſhe could have hoped to place her on the throne of England, it was not her intereſt to render the houſe of Guiſe more powerful than it was. In fine, the princes of Lorrain, employed in ſtruggling with their enemies at court, were not in condition to proſecute the rights of the queen their niece. Wherefore, immediately after the death of Francis II. Mary, by the advice of her uncles, quitted the title of queen of England, which ſhe had bore ever ſince the treaty of Cateau. But this was not ſufficient to ſatisfy Elizabeth. Mary, being ſtill very young, might marry ſome powerful prince, and transfer to him her pretenſions. Therefore, to make Elizabeth eaſy, the young queen was ſolemnly to declare ſhe had no right to that title, otherwiſe ſhe might have reſumed it when ſhe pleaſed, a bare interruption being not ſufficient to invalidate her claim. By the way, Elizabeth, like her grandfather, Henry VII. was all her life ſo jealous of her crown, that ſhe was for ever uneaſy on that account. When ſhe heard of Francis' death, ſhe ſent the earl of Bedford into France, with her compliments of condolence and congratulation to the new king, and ordered him to preſs Mary to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh. The embaſſador diſcharged his commiſſion; and was anſwered by Mary, that the affair not concerning her as queen of France, but as queen of Scotland, ſhe would not confirm it without the advice of the Scottiſh nobility [p]. Mean time, as ſhe knew her mother-in-law, the queen-regent, loved her not, ſhe left the court of France, and retired to Rheims, where her uncle the cardinal was archbiſhop, to ſpend part of the winter there, and afterwards ſhe went to reſide at Nancy. While ſhe was at Rheims, ſhe received a viſit from Martigues la Broſſe, d'Oyſel, and the biſhop of Amiens, who being acquainted with the affairs of Scotland, and knowing her intention to return thither, believed it incumbent on them to give her ſome inſtructions. She came from thence ſo young, that ſhe was utterly ignorant of the kingdom ſhe was going to govern. Melvil ſays, they adviſed her to gain by her favours, James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, her natural brother, the earl of Argyle, who had married Jane Stuart, her natural ſiſter, ſir William Maitland of Lethington, and ſir Willam Kirkaldy laird of Grange, and to rely on the proteſtants rather than the catholics, as the reformed were in all reſpects ſuperior. Some time after, on her way to Nancy, ſhe gave audience to John Leſley, ſent to her from her catholic ſubjects. Leſley ſays himſelf, in his Hiſtory of Scotland, that he adviſed her, agreeably to his inſtructions, not to confide in the prior of St. Andrew's, and to repair to Aberdeen, where ſhe might be at the head of a good body of catholic troops, to reſtore religion to the ſtate it was in before the late changes. But ſhe was too wiſe to follow ſuch dangerous council. The next day the prior of St. Andrew's, who was alſo come to France to pay her his reſpects, met her at Joinville, and gave her counſels more ſuitable to the ſituation of her affairs. He confirmed her reſolution to return into Scotland, and adviſed her to reign like her predeceſſors with the concurrence of the ſtates, aſſuring her, it was the only way to live happy and peaceable [r]. The queen, agreeably to this advice, ordered him to return to Scotland, and prepare all things for her reception. Moreover, ſhe put into his hands a patent, empowering the ſtates to meet and ordain whatever they ſhould judge convenient for the good of the kingdom. Thus, Leſley's pains to prejudice her againſt Stuart, were for once ineffectual. This Leſley, afterwards biſhop of Roſs, greatly contributed, by his intrigues and violent counſels, to the misfortunes which at laſt fell on the head of the queen his miſtreſs. Stuart arriving in Scotland, notwithſtanding Leſley's endeavours to have him arreſted in France, delivered to the ſtates the patent which the queen had ſent by him. As almoſt all Scotland was then proteſtants the ſtates employed the general power granted them by the queen, to eſtabliſh the reformation by public authority. This was followed by an order to demoliſh all the monaſteries, which was immediately put in execution.

Mean time, Mary, preparing to ſail for Scotland, ſent d'Oyſel to Elizabeth for a ſafe-conduct. Elizabeth anſwered, ſhe hoped the queen would ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, after which ſhe ſhould not only have a ſafe-conduct, but alſo, without being expoſed to the dangers and fatigues of the ſea, might paſs through England, where ſhe ſhould be received with all the marks of affection ſhe could expect from a good ſiſter [s]. Mary complained of this anſwer to Throckmorton the Engliſh embaſſador, ſo as to ſhew him, ſhe was extremely offended at it. She told him, "As ſhe came into France in ſpite of Edward, ſhe could return into Scotland notwithſtanding Elizabeth's oppoſition: ſhe was heartily vexed, for aſking a favour ſhe could ſo well be without: that the refuſal, and the aſſiſtance given by Elizabeth to the Scotch rebels, was a clear evidence, how little ſhe deſired to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms: that it was matter of aſtoniſhment to her, that the queen of England ſhould obſtruct the return of her near relation, and moſt certainly preſumptive heir, into her own country: that ſhe could have no pretence for this, ſince ſhe could not accuſe her of meddling with the affairs of England, though the diſcontent of the Engliſh gave her an opportunity." She added, "ſhe was a queen as well as Elizabeth, and not deſtitute of friends when they ſhould be wanted: that the treaty of Edinburgh was made in the life-time of her huſband, and if he delayed to ſign it, he alone ought to bear the blame: that ſince ſhe was a widow, neither the council of France, nor her uncles, had concerned themſelves with the affairs of Scotland: that the Scots about her were private perſons, whom ſhe neither could nor ought to conſult in ſo important an affair; but as ſoon as ſhe had adviſed with the ſtates of Scotland, ſhe would return a ſuitable anſwer: that therefore ſhe was haſtening her return into Scotland, but Elizabeth intended to ſtop her journey, and ſo alone was the cauſe of the delay ſhe complained of." She concluded with ſaying, "ſhe had never offended Elizabeth, and prayed the embaſſador to tell her the reaſon of her anger."

Throckmorton replied, his order was only to receive her anſwer concerning the treaty of Edinburgh: but ſince ſhe deſired it, he would for a moment lay aſide the embaſſador, and give her his ſentiments as a private man. Then he told her,

[o] They were ſo called, either from Hugo's gate in the city of Tours, where they uſed to meet firſt; or from king Hugo's ghoſt, which was the ſcarecrow uſed in that town to frighten children, and which was ſaid to walk in the ſuburbs in the nigh; it being the uſual time and place where the proteſtants were wont to meet. Charles IX. forbids this name by an edict. Thuanus, lib. 24.

[p] This affair being thus put off from time to time, queen Elizabeth began to ſuſpect ſome plot was hatching againſt England, and therefore reſolved to prevent it. Accordingly, ſhe diſpatched ſir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, to cultivate a good underſtanding between the Engliſh and Scotiſh nations. Camden, p. 385.

[r] Camden ſpeaks quite otherwiſe of James Stuart. Rapin. Camden ſays, he adviſed queen Elizabeth to intercept Mary in her paſſage, and that Lidington was alſo of the ſame mind, leſt, at her return, ſhe ſhould treat the proteſtants of Scotland with extreme rigour, not as traitors, but heretics, as queen Mary of England had done before her. Camden, p. 387.

[s] Buchanan is in the wrong to omit the conditions on which Elizabeth was willing to grant a ſafe-conduct. Rapin.

That

the queen his miſtreſs, was very much offended at her aſſuming the title and arms of England, which ſhe had not done in queen Mary's reign, and left her to judge, whether a greater indignity could be offered to a crowned head. Mary anſwered, ſhe did it by the expreſs command of Henry II. her father-in-law, and of Francis, her huſband, whom ſhe was obliged to obey; but, upon the death of her huſband, ſhe had, when miſtreſs of herſelf, quitted both the title and arms: that, however, ſhe being a queen, and grand-daughter to Henry VIII.'s eldeſt ſiſter, did not believe it injurious to any perſon to bear the arms of England, which had been done by others more remotely allied, without any noiſe. Camden, from whom this is taken, does not mention Throckmorton's reply. It would however be ſtrange, that he ſhould be ſatisfied with ſuch weak reaſons. Elizabeth did not only demand that Mary ſhould quit the title and arms of England, but alſo ſhould declare, in the moſt expreſs manner, that ſhe never had any right to aſſume them. Nay, ſhe expected a ſolemn reparation for the encroachment, as appears by the treaty of Edinburgh. Now Mary's quitting the title and arms of England, without owning ſhe had no right to aſſume them, was very far from contenting Elizabeth, who would not have had any other perſon but herſelf pretend to the title of queen of England. Mary's alleging that other's had borne the ſame arms, without any offence, pointed to the marquis of Exeter and the ducheſs of Suffolk. But there were three remarkable differences between them and Mary. The firſt was, they bore the arms by the king's ſpecial grant. The ſecond, that they did it with a limb or border for diſtinction. The third, that they never aſſumed the title of king and queen of England.

All this made Elizabeth ſuſpect the queen of Scotland was forming ſome dangerous deſign, and, in quitting the title and arms of England, intended only to amuſe her, ſince ſhe refuſed to own the injuſtice of aſſuming them. In ſhort, Mary, being determined to return into Scotland without Elizabeth's ſafe-conduct, ſent for Throckmorton to Abbeville, and demanded of him what was to be done to ſatisfy Elizabeth. Throckmorton anſwered, ſhe had only to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, as he had often told her before. She replied, ſhe could not conceive why ſhe was thus urged to ratify a treaty already executed: that the articles concerning the Scots had been really performed: that as ſhe had quitted the title and arms of England, ſhe could not be accuſed of ſeeking evaſions not to ratify the treaty, ſince a treaty already executed did not want a ratification: that the Scots could not complain of being treated with too much rigour, but that ſhe perceived the perſon who would prevent her return into Scotland, would prevent their enjoying the effects of her clemency. She added, ſhe would write to the queen of England with her own hand, and deſired the embaſſador rather to compoſe than aggravate matters. But the letter ſhe wrote on this occaſion, did not give Elizabeth the ſatisfaction ſhe believed to have reaſon to expect. As the uſurpation of the arms and title of Elizabeth, and the refuſal to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, were the baſis and foundation of the differences between theſe two queens, and had a conſtant influence upon this reign, it will not be unneceſſary to add ſome obſervations to what has been ſaid, in order to ſet in a clearer light the reaſons and intereſts of both.

Elizabeth, in France, and all the catholic countries, was deemed illegitimate. It was upon this foundation that Henry II. obliged the dauphin, his ſon, and the queen of Scotland, the dauphin's wife, to aſſume the title of king and queen of England, and that after his death they continued to bear the ſame. Elizabeth was not ſo void of underſtanding, as not to perceive that this pretence would be more than ſufficient to deprive her of the crown, ſhould it ever come to be ſupported by force. On the other hand, ſhe could not doubt that ſuch a deſign was formed by Mary and her friends. Of this, her having aſſumed the title of queen of England, was a clear indication. It was therefore neceſſary to provide for her ſafety. The civil war in Scotland naturally preſenting itſelf, ſhe aſſiſted the malcontents, and whereas France was reſolved to invade her from that quarter, gave Francis and Mary cauſe to apprehend ſhe would deprive them of Scotland. This produced the treaty of Edinburgh, 1561, which was never ratified by Francis; and after his death Mary perſiſted in her refuſal, contenting herſelf with only quitting the title of queen of England. But this was not a ſufficient ſecurity for Elizabeth: As Mary had quitted the title, without giving any reaſon, ſhe could reſume it the firſt opportunity: and this was what Elizabeth deſired to prevent, and the more, as Mary's obſtinate refuſal gave her cauſe to believe it was really intended.

Mary, on her ſide, had ſtrong reaſons to elude this ratification. She was perſuaded Elizabeth was not the ligitimate daughter of Henry VIII. and that neither his will nor an act of parliament could give her a right which nature denied. Upon this ſuppoſition, Mary believed the crown of England was fallen to her, as next heir to the deceaſed queen; and though Elizabeth had poſſeſſion, ſhe did not deſpair of wreſting it from her, with the aſſiſtance of France, Spain, the pope, and the Engliſh catholics. But if, by ratifying the treaty of Edinburgh, ſhe owned herſelf in the wrong to aſſume the title of queen of England, and promiſed, with an oath, never to bear it more, ſhe had cauſe to fear her friends would grow very cool. To what purpoſe then did Francis order his plenipotentiaries to ſign a treaty, which he did not intend to ratify? To this the anſwer is eaſy. He could not otherwiſe draw his forces out of Scotland, where they were beſieged, nor oblige Elizabeth to recal her's. As to the breach of his word, it did not then much trouble the French court. Now as Mary was at that time in ſubjection to a huſband, ſhe threw upon him whatever was amiſs in that conduct.

[1561.] The ſecond reaſon Mary had to refuſe the ratification was ſtill of more force. The plenipotentiaries of France, in ſigning the treaty, made a wrong ſtep, for want of ſufficient knowledge of the Engliſh affairs. They ſuffered to be inſerted in the treaty, without any reſtriction, this general clauſe, "That for the future Francis and Mary ſhould not aſſume the title of king and queen of England." Now Mary had reaſon to fear, that theſe words, "for the future," might be a ſnare to make her renounce for ever the crown of England, on account of her religion. This fear ſeemed the more juſt, as the Engliſh had ſufficiently diſcovered their intention to regulate the ſucceſſion by Henry the VIII.'s will, where the poſterity of Margaret, queen of Scotland, was omitted, and the ducheſs of Suffolk placed next to Elizabeth. It ſeemed therefore to her, that a ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh would give occaſion to ſay, ſhe complied with the will of Henry VIII. which could not but be to her extremely prejudicial. It is ſcarce to be doubted that Elizabeth thought the ſame thing, ſince afterwards, when Mary, preſſed by the neceſſity of her affairs, offered to ratify the treaty, with this alteration of the clauſe in diſpute, "That, during the life of Elizabeth, ſhe would not take the title of queen of England," Elizabeth was not ſatisfied. This is an evident ſign, that her intention was to make uſe of the ratification to deprive Mary of her birth-right, or, at leaſt, to hold her in ſubjection, by keeping her in a perpetual uneaſineſs concerning her ſucceſſion. There was then inſincerity in both their proceedings. Mary, in evading the ratification of the treaty, on pretence of the prejudice it might do her, refuſed in effect to acknowledge ſhe had done amiſs in aſſuming the title of queen of England during the life of Elizabeth, and thereby preſerved all her claim to be aſſerted on occaſion; for it was not till ſome years after, that ſhe offered the forementioned reſtriction. On the other hand, Elizabeth, under colour of deſiring Mary only to renounce a right which ſhe had aſſumed to her prejudice, meant to engage her to ſign an equivocal clauſe, which might have deprived her of all her rights. Theſe remarks will hereafter appear not to be entirely uſeleſs.

Mary, though ſhe had no ſafe-conduct from Elizabeth, put to ſea, and happily arrived in Scotland. Some ſay, ſhe eſcaped the Engliſh fleet, in a fog, which waited to intercept her[t]. But this is only a bare conjecture, without any proof[u]. It is, however, very likely, that, as affairs ſtood between her and Elizabeth, if ſhe had been taken ſhe would have been detained in England, at leaſt till ſhe had ratified the treaty of Edinburgh. She was received in her kingdom with great demonſtrations of joy, both by the nobles and people[w]. But ſhe had the mortification to ſee the reformation eſtabliſhed by laws ſo ſevere, that only herſelf was allowed the liberty to have maſs in her own chapel, but without any pomp or oſtentation. Nevertheleſs, ſome lords ſtill perſiſted in the old religion, and hoping to reſtore it by her [t] That queen Elizabeth intended to intercept the queen of Scots, is not poſitively aſſerted by the Scottiſh hiſtorians. Buchanan ſays, that queen Elizabeth had prepared a great fleet, on pretence to ſcour the ſea of pirates; but ſome thought, that it was to intercept the queen of Scots, if ſhe adventured to paſs againſt her will. So that it was only a ſuſpicion. lib. 17. Thuanus affirms, that James Prior, of St. Andrew's, in his return from France through England, adviſed queen Elizabeth to detain the queen of Scots, thinking ſhe would come through England, lib. 29.

[u] It is true, there aroſe a great fog in her paſſage. See Brantome, Dam. illuſt. p. 130. But that does not prove ſhe was purſued by the Engliſh fleet. Rapin.

[w] And at firſt, following the counſel of her friends, ſhe behaved herſelf humanely to them all, committing her affairs to her brother, the prior of St. Andrew's, and to the ſecretary Lethington, or Liddingtoun, as meeteſt both to hold the country at her devotion, and alſo to beget a ſtrict friendſhip between her and the queen of England. Melvil, p. 32.

For

authority, made their court to her with great application. Of this number were George Gordon, earl of Huntley; the earls of Athol, Crawford, Sutherland; with ſome biſhops. It was not poſſible to determine, what was the religion of the duke of Chateleraut, his conduct had been hitherto ſo ambiguous. The lords I have named were very conſiderable by their birth, their riches, and their vaſſals. And yet they would never perhaps have thought of reſtoring the antient religion, had they not depended upon the queen's favour, who could alone counter-balance the power of the proteſtants. Their firſt project was to try to alienate her from thoſe of the proteſtants, who had the moſt credit with her and in the kingdom. James Stuart, her natural brother, was the principal object of their hatred, on account of his adherence to the proteſtant religion. Beſides, the queen having at her arrival committed to him the adminiſtration of affairs, it would be very difficult for them to undertake any thing without oppoſition from him, while he continued in that poſt. For this reaſon, they omitted nothing that could ſerve to ruin him with the queen. But it is not neceſſary to be more circumſtantial in theſe intrigues; it ſuffices to ſhew the ſituation of the court of Scotland, becauſe this is abſolutely neceſſary for the ſequel.

The haughtineſs with which Mary talked to the Engliſh embaſſador, before ſhe left France, was not only unſuitable to her preſent circumſtances, but even contrary to her meaſures and the projects ſhe had formed with her uncles. Whilſt Francis II. was alive, theſe princes believed that the forces of France would be ſufficient to ſubdue Scotland, under colour of extirpating hereſy, and afterwards, in conjunction with the Scotch troops, it would be eaſy to enter England, and with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh catholics, dethrone Elizabeth. But the war, they had excited in Scotland, taking a very different turn from what they expected, and the death of Francis following immediately upon it, they found that other meaſures were to be taken, and the execution of their project deferred for ſome time. They therefore adviſed the queen, their niece, voluntarily to quit the title of queen of England, to return into Scotland, to enter if poſſible into a ſtrict friendſhip with Elizabeth, to endeavour to be declared her preſumptive heir, and, under colour of that correſpondence, to form a party in England, where was no want of malcontents to be ſerviceable on occaſion. The whole courſe of the hiſtory ſhews this to have been Mary's plan, and I ſhall hereafter give convincing proofs of it. Nothing therefore was more contrary to theſe meaſures than a quarrel with Elizabeth, whoſe friendſhip ſhe ought to have courted, in order to obtain the declaration ſhe deſired, by means of which ſhe was to ſtrengthen her party in England. When ſhe arrived in Scotland, ſhe endeavoured to correct this error, by ſending Maitland to Elizabeth, to notify her ſafe arrival at Edinburgh, and to deſire her friendſhip. The embaſſador carried likewiſe a letter from the principal noblemen to Elizabeth, which, after many compliments, ſignified to her, that the beſt way to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms, was for her to declare their queen her preſumptive heir. Elizabeth was ſo much upon her guard againſt whatever came from Mary, that it was not eaſy to ſurpriſe her. She anſwered the embaſſador, that the queen of Scotland, while in France, promiſed to give her ſatisfaction concerning the treaty of Edinburgh, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould arrive in that kingdom; it could not therefore but ſurpriſe her to find no notice taken of that article. The embaſſador excuſed the queen, his miſtreſs, that the ſhort time ſince her arrival had not allowed her to think of any important affair. Elizabeth ſeemed ſatisfied with the excuſe; but to the letter from the lords, anſwered plainly, that ſhe would not run the hazard of ſeeing her ſubjects adore the riſing ſun. And, raiſing her voice, added, She would not ſuffer the queen of Scotland to rob her of the crown during her life; neither did ſhe intend to do any thing that might prejudice that queen after her death, though ſhe had uſurped the arms of England, for which ſhe ought in juſtice to make reparation. This was the ſubſtance of what paſſed in relation to this embaſſy, from which Mary drew the advantage ſhe deſired, as it gave her an opportunity to renew a correſpondence with Elizabeth. I am perſuaded Melvil is miſtaken, when he ſays, in his Memoirs, that after Mary's return to Scotland, there was ſo cloſe a friendſhip between the two queens, that they wrote to one another every week, and teſtified an extreme deſire to deliver by word of mouth what they committed to writing. Nothing till then had paſſed between them that could ſerve to form or cement this pretended reciprocal friendſhip. On the contrary, many things contributed to alienate their hearts from each other. But if Melvil, who was then in Germany, was rightly informed, one cannot help thinking they were both very great diſſemblers. About the end of the year, Mary gave the prior of St. Andrew's the title of earl of Murray, and created John Areſkin earl of Marr.

Though the anſwer, given laſt year to the abbot of Parpaglia, was by no means proper to inſpire the pope with any great hopes of the reſtoration of the antient religion in England, he ſent a nuntio this year to Elizabeth, to notify that the council of Trent, which had been interrupted, would be continued in the ſame place, and to deſire her to ſend thither ſome Engliſh biſhops. The abbot Martinengo, who was charged with this commiſſion, arriving in Flanders, and ſending for leave to purſue his journey into England [w], could never obtain it. Whereupon the nuntio at Paris prayed Throckmorton to write to the queen, who coldly anſwered, ſhe heartily deſired a general council, but a popiſh one ſhe would never honour with an embaſſador; that ſhe had no buſineſs with the biſhop of Rome, who had no more power than other biſhops.

After ſuch an anſwer, Elizabeth might depend upon continual diſturbance from the court of Rome; and the more, as ſince the death of Francis II. the king of Spain was entirely eſtranged from her, becauſe he no longer dreaded the union of Great Britain with the monarchy of France. This fear was the only band that had till then attached him to England.

Mean time, Elizabeth, ſeeing herſelf without any ally, and in danger from all ſides, took care, in time, of her defence. She employed this whole year in peparations, which convinced her enemies ſhe would not be eaſily ſurpriſed. Her great care was to have always a good fleet in readineſs, knowing that her navy was the beſt bulwark of England. At the ſame time, ſhe ordered all the forts and caſtles of the northern borders to be well fortified, and particularly Berwick, as the place from whence ſhe might be attacked with moſt eaſe. As the Engliſh had till this time been obliged to have all their gunpowder from abroad, ſhe was afraid of wanting it, and, to prevent that inconvenience, ordered it to be made in her own kingdom [x]. Moreover, ſhe encreaſed the pay of the ſoldiers, to encourage them to ſerve her faithfully, and be ready upon occaſion. This ſame year was happily diſcovered in Cumberland a mine of pure copper [y], which had been neglected many ages; and at the ſame time was found, in great abundance, the ſtone called Lapis Calaminaris, ſo neceſſary for braſs-works.

The cares of war did not divert Elizabeth from the affairs of juſtice and the civil adminiſtration. She had her eye every where, and laboured effectually for the reformation of abuſes, and the bringing things into good order. Information being made, that the officers of the exchequer reſerved the penſions aſſigned to thoſe eccleſiaſtics who had been turned out of their abbies, ſhe ordered that all who were living, and unprovided with benefices, ſhould be paid to a farthing [z].

Thus, every man, relying on the queen's juſtice and equity, England ſaw the revival of a happineſs ſhe had long wanted. The people had the more reaſon to be pleaſed with the government, as the queen, without demanding any ſubſidies, diſcharged all the extraordinary expences out of the crown revenues [a]; for ſhe did not laviſh her money upon the court-leeches, like her predeceſſors. Her maxim was, to injure none, but to be extremely ſparing of her favours and treaſures, remembering in what want, by exceſſive profuſion, many of her predeceſſors had lived, with great revenues. This was what forced them to have frequent recourſe to their parliaments, not to have the public occaſions, but their own extravagances ſupplied [b].

[w] For it was provided by an antient act, that the pope's nuntios ſhould not ſet foot in England without leave; and, before making oath, that they would attempt nothing prejudicial to the king, or liberties of the people. The council did not think proper to admit the preſent nuntio, when there were ſo many papiſts in all parts of the kingdom, who were endeavouring to involve the nation in troubles. Camden, p. 387.

[b] This year, on June 15, the ſpire of St. Paul's cathedral in London, the timber part of which was two hundred and ſixty feet high, and the roof ſeven hundred and twenty feet long, and one hundred and thirty broad, was burnt down by lightning, as it was then thought; but a plummer confeſſed, on his death-bed, that it was ſet on fire by his careleſſneſs, in leaving a pan of coals in the ſteeple, when he went to dinner. Stow, p. 647. Heylin's Hiſt. Ref. p. 312.

The

It was not without reaſon that Elizabeth took ſo much pains to gain the love of her ſubjects by the good order ſhe introduced into the kingdom, ſince, at the ſame time, endeavours were uſed to corrupt and draw them into rebellion. The catholics began to meet and plot to reſtore their religion by arms. Elizabeth, having ſome intimation of theſe cabals, was deſirous to know whence they ſprung, and at laſt found it was the queen of Scotland that was to ſerve for pretence to the revolt, on account of her title to the crown of England. The counteſs of Lenox, born from a ſecond marriage of Margaret, queen of Scotland, with the earl of Angus, held a ſecret correſpondence with Mary. Here the firſt diſcovery was made. As this counteſs had the ſame intereſt with Mary, ſince they both deſcended from the eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. the queen imagined this correſpondence was not without myſtery, and therefore ſent the earl and counteſs of Lenox to the Tower [c].

Soon after, ſhe diſcovered that Arthur Pole, and his brother, deſcended from a princeſs of the houſe of York [d], and ſir Anthony Forteſcue, who had married their ſiſter, began to form a party in the kingdom. Upon this intelligence, they were ſent to priſon, and afterwards tried. They confeſſed a deſign of withdrawing into France to the duke of Guiſe, of returning from thence into Wales with a French army, to proclaim Mary, queen of Scots, queen of England, and Arthur Pole duke of Clarence. They proteſted, however, that they meant not to execute their project during the queen's life, who, they believed, would die before the end of the year, having been told ſo by ſome pretenders to aſtrology. Their own confeſſion condemned them; but the queen, in conſideration of their illuſtrious deſcent, forgave their offence.

Catherine Grey, daughter to the duke and ducheſs of Suffolk, and ſiſter of Jane Grey, beheaded in the laſt reign, was not uſed with the ſame lenity, though ſhe was leſs criminal, and the queen's near relation. She was called to account for a crime, in the puniſhment of which Elizabeth leſs ſhewed her zeal for juſtice than her jealouſy and deſire to find a pretence to ſecure herſelf from this ſort of rival, who gave her ſome uneaſineſs. Catherine had been married to Henry, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Pembroke [e], who had procured a divorce, becauſe he could not live with her. Afterwards the earl of Hertford privately married her, and then went into France. In his abſence the queen, being informed of this clandeſtine marriage, ſent Catherine to the Tower, though ſhe was very big with child. The earl, returning, and owning his marriage, was committed to the ſame place. After this, the archbiſhop of Canterbury annulled their pretended marriage, becauſe it was not ſufficiently proved, and they both remained priſoners in the Tower. While they were there, the earl found means to come to her, and ſhe again proved with child. Whereupon he was accuſed of three capital crimes: of breaking priſon; of debauching a virgin of the blood royal; and of abuſing her a ſecond time: and for each offence was fined five thouſand pounds [f]. At laſt, after a long impriſonment, and ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to have his ſentence reverſed, he was forced to forſake her by an authentic act. But the queen remaining implacable to the lady, ſhe died in priſon. Before ſhe expired, ſhe prayed the lieutenant of the tower to tell the queen, that ſhe begged her pardon for contracting marriage without her permiſſion, thereby ſhewing, ſhe had ever conſidered the earl of Hertford as her lawful huſband [g]. This exceſſive rigour does Elizabeth no credit, ſince it is plain, Catherine Grey's right to the crown, whether well or ill-grounded, was her greateſt offence.

But it was not from the houſe of Suffolk that Elizabeth had moſt to fear. The queen of Scotland was a rival much more dangerous, as being powerfully ſupported. Her friends ſtill thought of placing her on the throne of England, and only waited a favourable opportunity to execute their deſign. Elizabeth had occaſion to be convinced of this by her intelligence, that the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain, to engage the king of Navarre [h] in their party, offered him the marriage of their niece, and promiſed him poſſeſſion of the throne of England, by the aſſiſtance of the pope and king of Spain. Though this prince had a wife, they minded not the difficulty of annulling his marriage, becauſe his queen Jane was a heretic [i]. This ſatisfied Elizabeth that the princes of Lorrain had not laid aſide their firſt deſign; and that Philip II. was coming into the plot. Whereupon ſhe diſpatched Sidney [k] into France on ſome pretence, to inform himſelf exactly of the affairs of that kingdom, and of what was contriving againſt her, that ſhe might take her meaſures accordingly.

Catherine de Medici ſtill continued to foment the diſſention between the two factions, and ſeemed to incline to the ſide of the Hugonots, who were the weakeſt. As the Guiſes had artfully perſuaded the catholics, that their differences with the prince of Condé concerned only religion, ſhe feared to ſee herſelf once more at their diſcretion, as ſhe had been in the laſt reign, if the Hugonots were oppreſſed. For this reaſon ſhe ſupported them, and procured them a very favourable edict, called the Edict of January. The duke of Guiſe, penetrating her deſign, believed it time to break her meaſures, by engaging on a ſudden both parties in a war. He accompliſhed his deſign by the maſſacre of Vaſſy, committed under his eyes, upon a very ſlight occaſion. Then the Hugonots, unable to contain any longer, began the war by ſurpriſing Orleans, with the more reaſon, as the queen regent had applied to the prince of Condé for his aſſiſtance, to free her and the king from the captivity in which they were held by the Guiſes.

I ſhall not deſcend to the particulars of this war, which may be ſeen in all the hiſtories of France. I ſhall only ſay, that the Hugonots, unſucceſsful in the firſt campaign, ſent the Vidame of Chartres to Elizabeth, to deſire her aſſiſtance. Shortly after his arrival at London, he concluded a treaty with Elizabeth, by which ſhe promiſed to furniſh the Hugonot leaders with a hundred thouſand crowns, and an aid of ſix thouſand foot; half to be employed in the defence of Dieppe and Roan, and half to be put into garriſon at Havre de Grace. The Hugonots, on their ſide, engaged to put the queen in poſſeſſion of this laſt place, to be kept till the reſtitution of Calais. The ſame day the treaty was ſigned, Elizabeth publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring the reaſons which obliged her to aſſiſt the Hugonots. She ſaid, "her intention in ſending troops into Normandy was not to recover that province, the antient patrimony of her anceſtors, and unjuſtly wreſted from them; but to preſerve it from the king of France during his minority, and reſcue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorrain. That ſhe was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifeſtly their deſign to ſeize the ports of Normandy, and from thence invade her dominions, after the extirpation of the reformed in France. That for theſe reaſons ſhe thought herſelf obliged to aſſiſt the young king, hinder his ſubjects from being oppreſſed by the Guiſes, protect the profeſſors of the reformed religion, and provide for her own ſafety." This laſt article concerning her ſecurity, was the chief, or rather the only one, which juſtified her aſſiſting the Hugonots. In all appearance, ſhe would not have liked that a foreign prince ſhould have uſed the other pretences, alleged in her manifeſto, to aid the Engliſh catholics, had they taken up arms againſt her. But ſhe looked upon the duke of Guiſe as her moſt mortal enemy, and the principal protector of the queen of Scotland, for whom, it manifeſtly appeared, he would have procured the crown of England. The duke was at the head of the catholic party, which was infinitely more powerful than that of the Hugonots. It might therefore very eaſily happen, that theſe would be extirpated, or at leaſt entirely diſabled, and the duke of Guiſe become abſolute maſter of the court and kingdom, and employ all the forces of France to execute his project in favour of the queen of Scotland, his niece. It is therefore eaſy to conceive the neceſſity Elizabeth was under to oppoſe the advancement of ſo formidable an enemy, which was not to be done more ſucceſsfully than by aſſiſting the Hugonots. In maintaining the war in France, ſhe held the duke of Guiſe employed, and rendered him incapable to attempt any thing againſt England. Paul de Foix, the French embaſſador, having notice of the treaty, required her, in virtue of the treaty of Cateau, to deliver to him the Vidame and all his attendants; but ſhe excuſed authority, made their court to her with great application. Of this number were George Gordon, earl of Huntley; the earls of Athol, Crawford, Sutherland; with ſome biſhops. It was not poſſible to determine, what was the religion of the duke of Chateleraut, his conduct had been hitherto ſo ambiguous. The lords I have named were very conſiderable by their birth, their riches, and their vaſſals. And yet they would never perhaps have thought of reſtoring the antient religion, had they not depended upon the queen's favour, who could alone counter-balance the power of the proteſtants. Their firſt project was to try to alienate her from thoſe of the proteſtants, who had the moſt credit with her and in the kingdom. James Stuart, her natural brother, was the principal object of their hatred, on account of his adherence to the proteſtant religion. Beſides, the queen having at her arrival committed to him the adminiſtration of affairs, it would be very difficult for them to undertake any thing without oppoſition from him, while he continued in that poſt. For this reaſon, they omitted nothing that could ſerve to ruin him with the queen. But it is not neceſſary to be more circumſtantial in theſe intrigues; it ſuffices to ſhew the ſituation of the court of Scotland, becauſe this is abſolutely neceſſary for the ſequel.

The haughtineſs with which Mary talked to the Engliſh embaſſador, before ſhe left France, was not only unſuitable to her preſent circumſtances, but even contrary to her meaſures and the projects ſhe had formed with her uncles. Whilſt Francis II. was alive, theſe princes believed that the forces of France would be ſufficient to ſubdue Scotland, under colour of extirpating hereſy, and afterwards, in conjunction with the Scotch troops, it would be eaſy to enter England, and with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh catholics, dethrone Elizabeth. But the war, they had excited in Scotland, taking a very different turn from what they expected, and the death of Francis following immediately upon it, they found that other meaſures were to be taken, and the execution of their project deferred for ſome time. They therefore adviſed the queen, their niece, voluntarily to quit the title of queen of England, to return into Scotland, to enter if poſſible into a ſtrict friendſhip with Elizabeth, to endeavour to be declared her preſumptive heir, and, under colour of that correſpondence, to form a party in England, where was no want of malcontents to be ſerviceable on occaſion. The whole courſe of the hiſtory ſhews this to have been Mary's plan, and I ſhall hereafter give convincing proofs of it. Nothing therefore was more contrary to theſe meaſures than a quarrel with Elizabeth, whoſe friendſhip ſhe ought to have courted, in order to obtain the declaration ſhe deſired, by means of which ſhe was to ſtrengthen her party in England. When ſhe arrived in Scotland, ſhe endeavoured to correct this error, by ſending Maitland to Elizabeth, to notify her ſafe arrival at Edinburgh, and to deſire her friendſhip. The embaſſador carried likewiſe a letter from the principal noblemen to Elizabeth, which, after many compliments, ſignified to her, that the beſt way to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms, was for her to declare their queen her preſumptive heir. Elizabeth was ſo much upon her guard againſt whatever came from Mary, that it was not eaſy to ſurpriſe her. She anſwered the embaſſador, that the queen of Scotland, while in France, promiſed to give her ſatisfaction concerning the treaty of Edinburgh, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould arrive in that kingdom; it could not therefore but ſurpriſe her to find no notice taken of that article. The embaſſador excuſed the queen, his miſtreſs, that the ſhort time ſince her arrival had not allowed her to think of any important affair. Elizabeth ſeemed ſatisfied with the excuſe; but to the letter from the lords, anſwered plainly, that ſhe would not run the hazard of ſeeing her ſubjects adore the riſing ſun. And, raiſing her voice, added, She would not ſuffer the queen of Scotland to rob her of the crown during her life; neither did ſhe intend to do any thing that might prejudice that queen after her death, though ſhe had uſurped the arms of England, for which ſhe ought in juſtice to make reparation. This was the ſubſtance of what paſſed in relation to this embaſſy, from which Mary drew the advantage ſhe deſired, as it gave her an opportunity to renew a correſpondence with Elizabeth. I am perſuaded Melvil is miſtaken, when he ſays, in his Memoirs, that after Mary's return to Scotland, there was ſo cloſe a friendſhip between the two queens, that they wrote to one another every week, and teſtified an extreme deſire to deliver by word of mouth what they committed to writing. Nothing till then had paſſed between them that could ſerve to form or cement this pretended reciprocal friendſhip. On the contrary, many things contributed to alienate their hearts from each other. But if Melvil, who was then in Germany, was rightly informed, one cannot help thinking they were both very great diſſemblers. About the end of the year, Mary gave the prior of St. Andrew's the title of earl of Murray, and created John Areſkin earl of Marr.

Though the anſwer, given laſt year to the abbot of Parpaglia, was by no means proper to inſpire the pope with any great hopes of the reſtoration of the antient religion in England, he ſent a nuntio this year to Elizabeth, to notify that the council of Trent, which had been interrupted, would be continued in the ſame place, and to deſire her to ſend thither ſome Engliſh biſhops. The abbot Martinengo, who was charged with this commiſſion, arriving in Flanders, and ſending for leave to purſue his journey into England [w], could never obtain it. Whereupon the nuntio at Paris prayed Throckmorton to write to the queen, who coldly anſwered, ſhe heartily deſired a general council, but a popiſh one ſhe would never honour with an embaſſador; that ſhe had no buſineſs with the biſhop of Rome, who had no more power than other biſhops.

After ſuch an anſwer, Elizabeth might depend upon continual diſturbance from the court of Rome; and the more, as ſince the death of Francis II. the king of Spain was entirely eſtranged from her, becauſe he no longer dreaded the union of Great Britain with the monarchy of France. This fear was the only band that had till then attached him to England.

Mean time, Elizabeth, ſeeing herſelf without any ally, and in danger from all ſides, took care, in time, of her defence. She employed this whole year in peparations, which convinced her enemies ſhe would not be eaſily ſurpriſed. Her great care was to have always a good fleet in readineſs, knowing that her navy was the beſt bulwark of England. At the ſame time, ſhe ordered all the forts and caſtles of the northern borders to be well fortified, and particularly Berwick, as the place from whence ſhe might be attacked with moſt eaſe. As the Engliſh had till this time been obliged to have all their gunpowder from abroad, ſhe was afraid of wanting it, and, to prevent that inconvenience, ordered it to be made in her own kingdom [x]. Moreover, ſhe encreaſed the pay of the ſoldiers, to encourage them to ſerve her faithfully, and be ready upon occaſion. This ſame year was happily diſcovered in Cumberland a mine of pure copper [y], which had been neglected many ages; and at the ſame time was found, in great abundance, the ſtone called Lapis Calaminaris, ſo neceſſary for braſs-works.

The cares of war did not divert Elizabeth from the affairs of juſtice and the civil adminiſtration. She had her eye every where, and laboured effectually for the reformation of abuſes, and the bringing things into good order. Information being made, that the officers of the exchequer reſerved the penſions aſſigned to thoſe eccleſiaſtics who had been turned out of their abbies, ſhe ordered that all who were living, and unprovided with benefices, ſhould be paid to a farthing [z].

Thus, every man, relying on the queen's juſtice and equity, England ſaw the revival of a happineſs ſhe had long wanted. The people had the more reaſon to be pleaſed with the government, as the queen, without demanding any ſubſidies, diſcharged all the extraordinary expences out of the crown revenues [a]; for ſhe did not laviſh her money upon the courtleeches, like her predeceſſors. Her maxim was, to injure none, but to be extremely ſparing of her favours and treaſures, remembering in what want, by exceſſive profuſion, many of her predeceſſors had lived, with great revenues. This was what forced them to have frequent recourſe to their parliaments, not to have the public occaſions, but their own extravagances ſupplied [b].

[w] For it was provided by an antient act, that the pope's nuntios ſhould not ſet foot in England without leave; and, before making oath, that they would attempt nothing prejudicial to the king, or liberties of the people. The council did not think proper to admit the preſent nuntio, when there were ſo many papiſts in all parts of the kingdom, who were endeavouring to involve the nation in troubles. Camden, p. 387.

The

It was not without reaſon that Elizabeth took ſo much pains to gain the love of her ſubjects by the good order ſhe introduced into the kingdom, ſince, at the ſame time, endeavours were uſed to corrupt and draw them into rebellion. The catholics began to meet and plot to reſtore their religion by arms. Elizabeth, having ſome intimation of theſe cabals, was deſirous to know whence they ſprung, and at laſt found it was the queen of Scotland that was to ſerve for pretence to the revolt, on account of her title to the crown of England. The counteſs of Lenox, born from a ſecond marriage of Margaret, queen of Scotland, with the earl of Angus, held a ſecret correſpondence with Mary. Here the firſt diſcovery was made. As this counteſs had the ſame intereſt with Mary, ſince they both deſcended from the eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. the queen imagined this correſpondence was not without myſtery, and therefore ſent the earl and counteſs of Lenox to the Tower [c].

Soon after, ſhe diſcovered that Arthur Pole, and his brother, deſcended from a princeſs of the houſe of York [d], and ſir Anthony Forteſcue, who had married their ſiſter, began to form a party in the kingdom. Upon this intelligence, they were ſent to priſon, and afterwards tried. They confeſſed a deſign of withdrawing into France to the duke of Guiſe, of returning from thence into Wales with a French army, to proclaim Mary, queen of Scots, queen of England, and Arthur Pole duke of Clarence. They proteſted, however, that they meant not to execute their project during the queen's life, who, they believed, would die before the end of the year, having been told ſo by ſome pretenders to aſtrology. Their own confeſſion condemned them; but the queen, in conſideration of their illuſtrious deſcent, forgave their offence.

Catherine Grey, daughter to the duke and ducheſs of Suffolk, and ſiſter of Jane Grey, beheaded in the laſt reign, was not uſed with the ſame lenity, though ſhe was leſs criminal, and the queen's near relation. She was called to account for a crime, in the puniſhment of which Elizabeth leſs ſhewed her zeal for juſtice than her jealouſy and deſire to find a pretence to ſecure herſelf from this ſort of rival, who gave her ſome uneaſineſs. Catherine had been married to Henry, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Pembroke [e], who had procured a divorce, becauſe he could not live with her. Afterwards the earl of Hertford privately married her, and then went into France. In his abſence the queen, being informed of this clandeſtine marriage, ſent Catherine to the Tower, though ſhe was very big with child. The earl, returning, and owning his marriage, was committed to the ſame place. After this, the archbiſhop of Canterbury annulled their pretended marriage, becauſe it was not ſufficiently proved, and they both remained priſoners in the Tower. While they were there, the earl found means to come to her, and ſhe again proved with child. Whereupon he was accuſed of three capital crimes: of breaking priſon; of debauching a virgin of the blood royal; and of abuſing her a ſecond time: and for each offence was fined five thouſand pounds [f]. At laſt, after a long impriſonment, and ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to have his ſentence reverſed, he was forced to forſake her by an authentic act. But the queen remaining implacable to the lady, ſhe died in priſon. Before ſhe expired, ſhe prayed the lieutenant of the tower to tell the queen, that ſhe begged her pardon for contracting marriage without her permiſſion, thereby ſhewing, ſhe had ever conſidered the earl of Hertford as her lawful huſband [g]. This exceſſive rigour does Elizabeth no credit, ſince it is plain, Catherine Grey's right to the crown, whether well or ill-grounded, was her greateſt offence.

But it was not from the houſe of Suffolk that Elizabeth had moſt to fear. The queen of Scotland was a rival much more dangerous, as being powerfully ſupported. Her friends ſtill thought of placing her on the throne of England, and only waited a favourable opportunity to execute their deſign. Elizabeth had occaſion to be convinced of this by her intelligence, that the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain, to engage the king of Navarre [h] in their party, offered him the marriage of their niece, and promiſed him poſſeſſion of the throne of England, by the aſſiſtance of the pope and king of Spain. Though this prince had a wife, they minded not the difficulty of annulling his marriage, becauſe his queen Jane was a heretic [i]. This ſatisfied Elizabeth that the princes of Lorrain had not laid aſide their firſt deſign; and that Philip II. was coming into the plot. Whereupon ſhe diſpatched Sidney [k] into France on ſome pretence, to inform himſelf exactly of the affairs of that kingdom, and of what was contriving againſt her, that ſhe might take her meaſures accordingly.

Catherine de Medici ſtill continued to foment the diſſention between the two factions, and ſeemed to incline to the ſide of the Hugonots, who were the weakeſt. As the Guiſes had artfully perſuaded the catholics, that their differences with the prince of Condé concerned only religion, ſhe feared to ſee herſelf once more at their diſcretion, as ſhe had been in the laſt reign, if the Hugonots were oppreſſed. For this reaſon ſhe ſupported them, and procured them a very favourable edict, called the Edict of January. The duke of Guiſe, penetrating her deſign, believed it time to break her meaſures, by engaging on a ſudden both parties in a war. He accompliſhed his deſign by the maſſacre of Vaſſy, committed under his eyes, upon a very ſlight occaſion. Then the Hugonots, unable to contain any longer, began the war by ſurpriſing Orleans, with the more reaſon, as the queen regent had applied to the prince of Condé for his aſſiſtance, to free her and the king from the captivity in which they were held by the Guiſes.

I ſhall not deſcend to the particulars of this war, which may be ſeen in all the hiſtories of France. I ſhall only ſay, that the Hugonots, unſucceſsful in the firſt campaign, ſent the Vidame of Chartres to Elizabeth, to deſire her aſſiſtance. Shortly after his arrival at London, he concluded a treaty with Elizabeth, by which ſhe promiſed to furniſh the Hugonot leaders with a hundred thouſand crowns, and an aid of ſix thouſand foot; half to be employed in the defence of Dieppe and Roan, and half to be put into garriſon at Havre de Grace. The Hugonots, on their ſide, engaged to put the queen in poſſeſſion of this laſt place, to be kept till the reſtitution of Calais. The ſame day the treaty was ſigned, Elizabeth publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring the reaſons which obliged her to aſſiſt the Hugonots. She ſaid, "her intention in ſending troops into Normandy was not to recover that province, the antient patrimony of her anceſtors, and unjuſtly wreſted from them; but to preſerve it from the king of France during his minority, and reſcue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorrain. That ſhe was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifeſtly their deſign to ſeize the ports of Normandy, and from thence invade her dominions, after the extirpation of the reformed in France. That for theſe reaſons ſhe thought herſelf obliged to aſſiſt the young king, hinder his ſubjects from being oppreſſed by the Guiſes, protect the profeſſors of the reformed religion, and provide for her own ſafety." This laſt article concerning her ſecurity, was the chief, or rather the only one, which juſtified her aſſiſting the Hugonots. In all appearance, ſhe would not have liked that a foreign prince ſhould have uſed the other pretences, alleged in her manifeſto, to aid the Engliſh catholics, had they taken up arms againſt her. But ſhe looked upon the duke of Guiſe as her moſt mortal enemy, and the principal protector of the queen of Scotland, for whom, it manifeſtly appeared, he would have procured the crown of England. The duke was at the head of the catholic party, which was infinitely more powerful than that of the Hugonots. It might therefore very eaſily happen, that theſe would be extirpated, or at leaſt entirely diſabled, and the duke of Guiſe become abſolute maſter of the court and kingdom, and employ all the forces of France to execute his project in favour of the queen of Scotland, his niece. It is therefore eaſy to conceive the neceſſity Elizabeth was under to oppoſe the advancement of ſo formidable an enemy, which was not to be done more ſucceſsfully than by aſſiſting the Hugonots. In maintaining the war in France, ſhe held the duke of Guiſe employed, and rendered him incapable to attempt any thing againſt England. Paul de Foix, the French embaſſador, having notice of the treaty, required her, in virtue of the treaty of Cateau, to deliver to him the Vidame and all his attendants; but ſhe excuſed herſelf, and told him, ſhe would write to the king of France about it. She did ſo indeed, but not obtaining any thing for that lord, ſhe did not think herſelf obliged to deliver him to the king.

The ſix thouſand Engliſh not embarking till September, found the king of Navarre, on their arrival, before Roan. This was the reaſon of their dividing themſelves in two bodies only, of which one entered Dieppe [l], and the other took poſſeſſion of Havre de Grace, according to the treaty of London. The earl of Warwick [m], general of theſe forces, had been made governor of this laſt place by the queen. Mean time, the city of Roan was taken by aſſault, and the king of Navarre, who was wounded at the ſiege, died on his return to Paris. In the cloſe of this year, the battle of Dreux was fought between the catholics and Hugonots, with almoſt equal loſs. The prince of Condé and the conſtable de Montmorency, who commanded the two armies, were both taken priſoners, but the king's forces kept the field of battle. The prince of Condé not being able to head his party, admiral de Chatillon took upon him the command of the army. I muſt now ſpeak of the tranſactions of Scotland this year.

James Stuart, created earl of Murray, held ſtill the firſt rank in the management of affairs, not ſo much from any affection the queen had for him, as from her being adviſed to keep him always attached to her intereſt. It was indeed almoſt impoſſible for Mary, who had been educated in a court ſo averſe to the reformation, to have any great friendſhip for the earl her brother, whom ſhe conſidered as the head of the reformed. Beſides, his ſevere temper did not agree with the luxury which was introducing into the court by the young queen. The preachers exclaimed from the pulpit againſt theſe worldly vanities, as very repugnant to true religion. On the other hand, the earl of Murray, as well to ſupport his intereſt among the reformed as to follow his own inclination, ſignified often to the queen, that this way of life would at laſt forfeit her the eſteem and affection of her ſubjects. This furniſhed his enemies with a pretence to inſinuate to the queen, that Murray meant to keep her in ſervitude, and it would be impoſſible to reſtore the old religion while he had the direction of affairs. But if Buchanan is worthy of belief, they were not content with uſing ſecret artifices to ruin him in the queen's favour. This hiſtorian pretends the duke of Chateleraut and the earls of Huntley and Bothwell conſpired to aſſaſſinate him, but their plot was diſcovered by the earl of Arran. He adds, that the duke was puniſhed with the loſs of his government of Dunbarton, and Bothwell impriſoned in the caſtle of Edinburgh, from whence he found means to eſcape.

But theſe were not Murray's moſt dangerous enemies. Buchanan ſays, the cardinal of Lorrain wrote to the queen his niece to incite her to diſpatch the earl and ſome other zealous proteſtants out of the way, for which he might depend upon a powerful aid from the pope to reſtore the catholic religion in Scotland. According to this hiſtorian, the queen reſolved to comply with the deſires of the pope and the cardinal, and communicated her intentions to the earl of Huntley, who approved of them, and promiſed his aſſiſtance. It was for this purpoſe, that the queen took a progreſs into the north, where lay the earl of Huntley's eſtate [n], and where the catholics were numerous. But at the ſame time Huntley finding the queen, in order to execute her project, was going to a country which almoſt wholly depended on him, formed himſelf the deſign to carry her away, and force her to marry Gorge Gordon his ſecond ſon [o]. Murray accompanying the queen in her progreſs, ſeveral obſtacles occurred which cauſed the execution of the plot againſt him to be delayed from day to day. Mean while, the earl of Huntley and his ſon improved the occaſion to execute their project. One day, when the court was in a ſmall and ill-fortified town, George Gordon appeared near it with ſome forces, in order to ſurpriſe the queen's perſon. But the earl of Murray, by unexpected good fortune, found means to ſave her. This important ſervice effaced for ſome time the diſadvantageous impreſſions ſhe had received of him.

The diſcovery of the plot was not capable to make the earl of Huntley deſiſt from his enterpriſe. He ſtill kept in arms with intent to ſurpriſe the court, where the earl of Sutherland was his ſpy, and informed him of what paſſed there. But an intercepted letter diſcovering all, Sutherland fled into Flanders, and the earl of Murray, at the head of ſome forces, marched againſt the earl of Huntley, who bravely expected him. In a battle fought on this occaſion, Huntley was defeated and taken priſoner, but died within a few days [p]. George his ſon eſcaping, the duke of Chateleraut his father-in-law, very earneſtly ſued for his pardon, and upon ſome good hope given him by the queen, put him into her hands. He was however conducted to Dunbar, tried, and ſentenced to die: but the ſentence was not executed [q].

While theſe things were tranſacting in Scotland, James Melvil, author of the Memoirs under his name, was employed at Inſpruck to ſound the inclinations of the Imperial court concerning the marriage of queen Mary with the archduke Charles, third ſon of the emperor Ferdinand. The firſt overture of this deſign had been made by the cardinal of Lorrain in his way through Inſpruck to the council of Trent, with the offer of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for a portion. This occaſioned Maximilian, eldeſt brother of Charles, to aſk Melvil, ſpeaking of this marriage, whether the Scots would be willing to aſſiſt their queen in obtaining the crown of England. Hence it is plain, that the Guiſes had ſtill this deſign in view, and were inceſſantly labouring to execute it. We muſt not therefore wonder that Elizabeth had always an eye upon the queen of Scots as upon a very dangerous rival [r].

[1563] In the beginning of the year 1563, the duke of Guiſe laid ſiege to Orleans, which was the magazine of the Hugonots, and where D'Andelot brother of the admiral was ſhut up with a numerous garriſon. The place was now reduced to the laſt extremity, when the duke of Guiſe was killed with a piſtol-ball by a gentleman named Poltrot. The duke perceiving his end approaching, teſtified an extreme concern for having kindled the civil war, and ſent his ſerious advice to the queen-regent to make a peace on any terms. The admiral being accuſed of this murder, endeavoured to clear himſelf, but the relations of the deceaſed perſiſted in their belief of his guilt. Mean while, the peace between the king and the Hugonots cloſely followed the death of the duke of Guiſe, without any care taken by the prince of Condé [s] to have his generous friend the queen of England included. Nor was this all: for Charles IX. beſieging Havre de Grace, the Hugonots diſtinguiſhed themſelves in driving the Engliſh out of a place which they themſelves had put into their hands. If their conduct on this occaſion, ſhewed them good Frenchmen, it was alſo a demonſtration of their being very ill politicians. Indeed they could not have done any thing more prejudicial to their own intereſt, or more agreeable to their enemies, than thus to quarrel with England. The earl of Warwick defended the place ſome time with great bravery and intrepidity [t]; but the plague, which raged in the town, daily ſwept away fifty of his men [u], and reduced him to the neceſſity of a capitulation, by which the town was reſtored to the king of France. After Havre was taken, a peace was concluded between the two crowns. The Engliſh forces which had ſerved in France, bringing the plague with them into England [w], it made terrible ravages, above twenty thouſand dying in London only [x].

The death of the duke of Guiſe made ſome alteration in the affairs of the queen of Scotland. Charles IX. declaring himſelf of age to govern, was under the influence of the queen his mother, who, not loving her daughter-in-law, gave her ſome mortifications. The payment of her dowry was diſcontinued, the Scotch guard diſmiſſed, and the duke of Chateleraut denied his revenues. The duke of Guiſe left a ſon, who was too young to have any ſhare in the government, and the cardinal of Lorrain had no longer the ſame credit as during the life of his brother. Mary, complaining of her ill treatment from the court of France, the cardinal, her uncle, fearing ſhe might be provoked to turn to Elizabeth, was more preſſing than ever for her marriage with the archduke, and did his utmoſt to accompliſh it. Melvil ſays, however, in his Memoirs, that he perceived at the Imperial court it was not reliſhed by Maximilian, eldeſt ſon of the emperor. Be this as it will, Mary readily received the propoſition. But as the death of the duke of Guiſe had removed at a great diſtance the near proſpect ſhe had of mounting the throne of England, ſhe believed it neceſſary to manage Elizabeth, and deſired her advice concerning the propoſed marriage. Elizabeth was alarmed at the deſign of allying the queen of Scotland with the houſe of Auſtria, not being ignorant with what view the cardinal of Lorrain offered ſuch a marriage to his niece. She therefore told Mary, by Randolph, her embaſſador, that, having for her the tenderneſs of a ſiſter, and, regarding her intereſts as her own, ſhe deſired her to conſider that ſuch an alliance would remove her for ever from the throne of England, ſince the Engliſh would never run the hazard of falling under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria: that England was not without perſons who had their pretenſions to the crown as well as herſelf, and might greatly embarras her: it was therefore her intereſt to gain the affection of the Engliſh, by a marriage which would not be uneaſy to them: that if any Engliſh nobleman was ſo happy as to pleaſe her, ſuch a marriage would doubtleſs remove the difficulties which lay in the way of her deſire to be declared her preſumptive heir. This was the ſubſtance of what Randolph was ordered to repreſent to the queen of Scotland, without naming, however, the lord, Elizabeth wiſhed to give her for huſband. But he had a ſecret commiſſion to intimate to the earl of Murray, and ſecretary Lidington, that he believed ſhe had caſt her eyes on the lord Dudley [x], Elizabeth's anſwer threw Mary into great perplexity. She believed herſelf at leaſt the lawful heir of Elizabeth by her birth-right; but Henry VIII. having not placed her in the line of the ſucceſſion, an act of parliament was neceſſary to reſtore her to her right. Without this, ſhe was in danger that, if Elizabeth died without heirs, the will of Henry would be punctually complied with. On the other hand, her uncertainty whether Elizabeth would cauſe ſuch an act to be paſſed in her favour, and get her declared her heir, made her unwilling to relinquiſh the hope given her by her uncle, the cardinal, of being placed on the throne of England by the aſſiſtance of the pope, France, Spain, and the Engliſh catholics. In this perplexity, ſhe choſe to inform the cardinal of the repreſentation made to her by Elizabeth, and of that queen's deſign to marry her to Dudley. The cardinal anſwered, that Dudley was not a fit match for her, and that Elizabeth only amuſed her, in pretending to marry her to a man whom ſhe intended for her own bed. That as to the hope ſhe was flattered with, of being declared her preſumptive heir, it was not much to be relied on, ſince, though ſhe kept her word, ſhe might have children, which would render the act of no uſe, or might, on the leaſt pretence, cauſe it to be repealed. That it was therefore more agreeable to her intereſt, to depend upon the aſſiſtance of her real friends, than on ſuch uncertain hopes.

This did not prevent Mary, after a mature examination of what had been offered on both ſides, from reſolving to deſiſt from the deſign of marrying the archduke, for fear of doing herſelf a prejudice in England. But withal, ſhe determined to evade the propoſal Elizabeth intended to make her, concerning Dudley, without breaking, however, with her. It was abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew a regard for Elizabeth, in order to continue with more eaſe her intrigues in England, and encreaſe there the number of her friends, which was already conſiderable. Beſides that the catholics were all for her, many proteſtants were perſuaded, that the crown, if Elizabeth died without children, could not be refuſed her without injuſtice, and the leaſt diſcontent was capable to create a belief, that Mary had even a better title than Elizabeth herſelf. This gave great uneaſineſs to Elizabeth, who feared that Mary, by a marriage with a catholic prince, would be enabled to ſupport her pretenſions. Therefore ſhe did all that lay in her power to divert her from any ſuch deſign. To this end, ſhe told Melvil, in his return through England, how much it would offend her, if Mary married without her advice. She added, as it was their common intereſt to live in a good underſtanding, ſhe deſigned to make her two offers, that, by embracing either, ſhe might avoid the jealouſy which her marriage with a foreign prince would raiſe in the Engliſh. The treaty of Edinburgh was all this while unmentioned, the conjuncture not being proper to preſs that affair.

Frances Brandon, ducheſs of Suffolk, ſo often mentioned, died this year [y]. She had accepted for her third huſband Adrian Stokes, a private gentleman, by whom ſhe had no children. Of her three daughters, by her former marriage with Grey, marquis of Dorſet, afterwards duke of Suffolk, Jane, the eldeſt, had been proclaimed queen after the death of Edward, and loſt her life on a ſcaffold. Catherine was in the Tower, or perhaps dead. Mary, the third, had been given in marriage to a man ſo little diſtinguiſhed, that there was no likelihood of her being put in competition with the queen of Scotland. Thus, by the death of the ducheſs of Suffolk, Mary ſaw herſelf delivered from a rival, who was granddaughter of Henry VII. [z] [1564] The truce between France and England ended at laſt in a peace, ſigned at Troye, in Champagne, the 11th of April, 1564. By the treaty, the king of France and queen of England preſerved entire all their pretenſions, without mentioning any in particular, not even the reſtitution of Calais. There were only ſome ſeparate articles, which were left unſigned till the next day, concerning the hoſtages delivered to Elizabeth after the treaty of Cateau, which ſhe was willing to reſtore for a ſmall ſum [a]. Throckmorton, who had been arreſted in France on ſome pretence [b], was ſet at liberty. After this, Elizabeth ſent to king Charles the order of the garter by the lord Hunſdon [c], who was ſent into France to ſee the peace ſworn to.

At this time, the commerce between England and the Netherlands was entirely broke, by the artifices of cardinal Granvelle. As he foreſaw a war was going to be kindled in the Low Countries, he was willing to remove the Engliſh, and for that purpoſe had prevailed with the governeſs to forbid the importation of Engliſh cloths. This prohibition obliged the Engliſh to ſet up a ſtaple for their cloths at Embden, a town of Eaſt Frieſland. But a new embaſſador [d], ſent into England by Philip, in the room of the biſhop of Aquila, who was dead, conſidering that his maſter's ſubjects would, from this interruption of commerce, receive no leſs damage than the Engliſh, brought the affair to a negotiation. As there occurred great difficulties, it was mutually agreed that the treaty of commerce, called the Great Intercourſe, made in the time of Maximilian, ſhould ſubſiſt till one of the parties notified the contrary to the other, with the allowances of forty days to the merchants to withdraw their effects. This affair was very important to both nations. Camden ſays, that in his time the commerce between England and the Netherlands, roſe yearly to above twelve millions of gold, and that the woollen trade alone amounted to above five millions [e].

This affair being finiſhed, Elizabeth viſited the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with great pomp and magnificence. She teſtified her ſatisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection, and intention to encourage learning to the utmoſt of her power.

She

The tranquility which the queen then enjoyed would have been compleat, if her ſuſpicions of the queen of Scotland had not given her perpetual uneaſineſs. It was on her ſhe was always reflecting, as on her moſt dangerous enemy. She conſidered that the marriage of this queen might prove to her a fountain of troubles and cares, and draw upon her the greateſt misfortunes. So, her whole policy tended either to obſtruct all marriages offered to Mary, or, at leaſt, to effect that ſhe ſhould eſpouſe a man, from whom England ſhould have nothing to fear, With this view ſhe wrote her a letter, wherein, after many demonſtrations of friendſhip, ſhe gave her advice concernnig her marriage, telling her, the marrying without her conſent would ruin her affairs. Notwithſtanding Mary's reſolution to live in friendſhip with Elizabeth, ſhe was provoked at her thus taking upon her to adviſe her, and even with an air of ſuperiority, which was but too manifeſt [f]. Forgetting therefore her reſolution, and thinking only of making herſelf ſatisfaction [g], ſhe returned ſuch an anſwer to the letter as greatly offended Elizabeth. But ſome time after, reflecting that ſhe herſelf broke her own meaſures in quarrelling with Elizabeth, ſhe diſpatched ſir James Melvil to pay her compliments, and to endeavour to mend what had been ſpoiled by her impatience. Elizabeth received her compliments with equal diſſimulation. After telling Melvil how much cauſe ſhe had to be offended with the letter, ſhe tore it [h] in his preſence, teſtifying her readineſs to be reconciled, and expreſſing an affection for her good ſiſter, which aſſuredly ſhe had not. It was not her intereſt to quarrel, for fear of inducing Mary to marry ſome prince, who would not have patience to wait the time of enjoying her ſucceſſion. She therefore embraced this occaſion to renew her inſtances to Mary for her choice of a huſband, proper to preſerve their friendſhip, and a good intelligence between the two kingdoms. All this tended only to a ſetting forth of ſeveral reaſons to perſuade Mary to accept the lord Dudley, though ſhe did not directly name him. It is however very uncertain, whether this marriage was ſincerely intended by Elizabeth, or only deſigned to amuſe Mary, and prevent her thinking on others. Nay, it is very likely Dudley, who depended upon Elizabeth, was only propoſed to prolong the affair. This ſeems to be confirmed by the permiſſion afterwards granted by Elizabeth to the lord Darnly, ſon of the counteſs of Lenox, to go into Scotland, though ſhe was not ignorant that Mary had ſome thought of marrying that lord, as ſhe intimated to Melvil. Indeed, Mary had now reſolved it, not in compliance with the counſels of Elizabeth to eſpouſe a lord little capable to give her uneaſineſs, but in hopes of receiving conſiderable advantage from the marriage. It had been frequently hinted to her that there was room to doubt, whether her title to the crown of England was as good as the ducheſs of Suffolk's, which was ſupported by the will of Henry VIII. and that this was a point to be decided by Engliſh lawyers. This was to keep her in ſubmiſſion, and prevent her diſobliging Elizabeth. When this uneaſineſs was removed by the death of the ducheſs of Suffolk and Catherine her daughter, the rights of the counteſs of Lenox, daughter of Margaret queen of Scotland by her ſecond huſband Archibald earl of Angus, begun to be whiſpered. Henry VIII. her uncle, had given her in marriage to Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, who had withdrawn into England, as was ſaid in the reign of that prince. The counteſs of Lenox could not indeed, with any ſeeming juſtice, enter into competition with Mary, ſince ſhe was born only of Margaret's ſecond marriage, whereas Mary came from the firſt. But it could be alleged in her favour, that ſhe was one degree nearer, and it was to be feared for Mary, that this reaſon would prevail, if ſupported by Elizabeth. So, to avoid this competition, Mary had reſolved to unite the titles of the two families by her marriage with the lord Darnly, ſon to the counteſs of Lenox, and thereby diſable Elizabeth to give her any diſturbance. Elizabeth had for the ſame reaſon reſolved to obſtruct the marriage, not from any fear of the lord Darnly, but with intent to keep Mary always in awe and ſubmiſſion.

The reconciliation between the two queens being made, as I before ſaid, Mary ſeriouſly thought of executing her deſign. But as ſhe was prepoſſeſſed with a belief, that Elizabeth only ſought to amuſe her, and prevent her from marrying, ſhe ſaw it neceſſary to uſe ſome art, to draw the earl of Lenox and his ſon into Scotland. She began with the father, and pretended to recal him, in order to reſtore him to his eſtate, forfeited during the regency of the duke of Chateleraut. Elizabeth did not think it right to oppoſe the earl of Lenox's return into his own country, upon a motive ſo juſt and reaſonable. In this whole affair the two queen's behaved with equal diſſimulation. At the very time Mary was taking meaſures to marry the lord Darnly, unknown to Elizabeth, ſhe pretended a readineſs to be directed by her counſels. She even conſented to a congreſs of commiſſioners of both the kingdoms, concerning her marriage, though ſhe was not ignorant of Elizabeth's intentions to propoſe to her Dudley, lately created earl of Leiceſter [i]. On the other hand, Elizabeth, not unacquainted with Mary's deſign to marry the lord Darnly, ſeemed not to perceive it, being well pleaſed to have her fix her thoughts upon a ſubject, whom ſhe believed to be at her diſpoſal, becauſe the earl his father had great poſſeſſions in England. She hoped therefore to have it always in her power to break off or delay the marriage, as ſhe ſhould judge proper, her ſole aim being to gain time, and amuſe the queen of Scotland.

Some time after, the earl of Bedford [k] for England, and the earl of Murray with Lidington for Scotland, had a conference at Berwick [l], where the earl of Bedford, according to his inſtructions, propoſed the marriage of the queen of Scotland to the earl of Leiceſter. But the two Scotch commiſſioners, who had likewiſe their orders, received the propoſal with ſuch coldneſs, that the earl of Bedford thought it not proper to inſiſt much on it. Nay, it is pretended that the earl of Leiceſter, who had ſome hope to marry Elizabeth [m], had deſired him not to preſs it.

Mean time, Melvil being returned, freely told Mary, in laying his negotiation before her, that the queen of England's friendſhip was far from being ſincere. This cauſed Mary, who had already no very good opinion of Elizabeth, to regard her as a ſecret enemy, who, though ſhe always called her good ſiſter, did not mean her well. Sometimes ſhe thought Elizabeth only propoſed the earl of Leiceſter to her, that ſhe herſelf might marry him with the leſs diſhonour, after his having been encouraged by a queen; and ſometimes, that this propoſal was only an artifice, to waſte time in fruitleſs negotiations.

Thus was ſpent the year 1564, in which Ferdinand I. died, leaving the Imperial dignity and his hereditary dominions to his ſon Maximilian.

[1565] The queen of Scotland had for ſome time entertained David Rizzo, an Italian, who governed her abſolutely. As the queen entirely changed both her conduct and character, after this ſtranger was received into her confidence, and as he was the firſt cauſe of the troubles of Scotland, and the misfortunes of his miſtreſs, it is neceſſary to ſay ſomething of him.

David Rizzo, ſon of a muſician of Turin, being ſervant to the count de Muretto, embaſſador to Scotland, attended his maſter into that country. As he perfectly underſtood muſic [n], and ſung a good baſs, he got acquainted with the court-muſicians, and was introduced to the queen, who wanting a baſs to her concert, deſired the embaſſador to leave him with her. His fine voice often procuring him the honour of ſeeing and talking with the queen, he ſo artfully inſinuated himſelf into her good graces, that he daily encreaſed in favour and credit. At laſt the ſecretary of the French diſpatches being gone into France, Rizzo was choſen for that office during his abſence. From this time he puſhed his fortune ſo ſucceſsfully, that he became in a manner firſt miniſter, nothing of moment being tranſacted at court but by him. Buchanan, the queen's great enemy, often inſinuates, that David's influence over her was not confined to public affairs. He ſays, ſhe admitted him to her table, and frequently dined at his, and by ſuch uncommon familiarities gave occaſion to ſcandalous ſuſpicions. In a word, he ſays enough to incline thoſe who pay entire credit to him, to believe that the queen's conduct was not free from crime. But as Buchanan may juſtly be ſuſpected of aggravation, it is better to adhere to Melvil's account. He can be accuſed of no deſign to aſperſe the queen's reputation, ſince he rather, on all occaſions, ſhews a great zeal for her,

[f] She deſired Mary to take heed, that in ſhewing pleaſure to the earl of Lenox, ſhe did not diſpleaſe the houſe of Hamilton, ſeeing thereby trouble and ſtrife might ariſe in her country. Melvil, p. 42.

[g] At any other time this advice would not have been ill taken; but now all advices given by Elizabeth were miſ-conſtrued, partly on account of her having hindered the marriage with the archduke, and partly becauſe Rizzo, the queen of Scots, ſecretary for the French tongue, was not very ſkilful in inditing French letters. without however concealing her faults. At the time when Rizzo was moſt in favour with the queen, ſhe had ſo entire a confidence in Melvil, as even to allow, or rather command, him to admoniſh her of her faults. See what this author, in his Memoirs ſays of Rizzo: "As he entered in greater credit, ſo he had not the prudence how to manage the ſame rightly. For frequently, in preſence of the nobility, he would be publicly ſpeaking to the queen, even when there was greateſt conventions of the ſtates; which made him to be much envied and hated, eſpecially when he became ſo great, that he preſented all ſignatures to be ſubſcribed by her majeſty. So that ſome of the nobility would frown upon him, others would ſhoulder and ſhut him by, when they entered the queen's chamber, and found him always ſpeaking with her. All who had any buſineſs at court, addreſſing themſelves to him, and depending upon him, in ſhort time he became very rich.—As he was a known minion, and ſuſpected to be a penſioner of the pope, it gave ground of ſuſpicion, that ſome deſign would be by him contrived againſt the reformed religion." The ſame author adds, that having himſelf repreſented to the queen the injury which her favours upon this ſtranger now did and might afterwards do her, his remonſtrance was very ill received, the queen telling him, ſhe would not be ſo far reſtrained but that ſhe might diſpenſe her favours to ſuch as ſhe pleaſed. He ſays farther, that, having remonſtrated to Rizzo how much he offended the nobility by his affectation to appear ſo great with the queen, he ſeemed to pay ſome regard to his advice; but within a few days told him, he had the queen's orders to behave as he was wont, without minding any thing. This teſtimony added, to Camden's ſilence, who, having undertaken in his Annals of Elizabeth to juſtify the queen of Scots, ſays nothing of Rizzo, ſhews that this miniſter or favourite entirely governed the queen. So, the lord Darnly, being a catholic, and Rizzo the pope's penſioner, as Melvil affirms, it is not to be doubted that the queen was determined to the marriage by her favourite's advice. It was therefore to have an opportunity of drawing that young lord into Scotland, that ſhe reſtored his father to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate. As this was to be done in the aſſembly of the ſtates, ſummoned to meet in January, Darnly demanded leave to be abſent three months, in order to be at the Scotch parliament, and obtained it by the interceſſion of Cecil, who never imagined he would venture to eſpouſe Mary without the queen's permiſſion. Probably he was permitted to go into Scotland only with intent to amuſe the queen, and perhaps to give her an opportunity to entertain for that handſome young lord a paſſion, which would hinder her from thinking of any other. However this be, he was well received by the queen, who immediately gave him great marks of her eſteem, and ſhortly after, it was perceived ſhe deſigned him for her huſband. Rizzo inſtantly contracted ſo cloſe a friendſhip with him, that they both lay in the ſame bed.

After Rizzo had ingroſſed the queen's favour, the earl of Murray ſaw his credit daily decline. This, added to the intended marriage, and the great union between Darnly and Rizzo, convinced him it was time to retire, and, to haſten him, the queen recalled all his enemies to court. The earl of Bothwell returned from France, the earl of Sutherland from Flanders, and George Gordon, who was impriſoned at Dunbar, and under ſentence of death, was releaſed, and, after obtaining his pardon, took the title of earl of Huntley. Murray could not ſee Bothwell (who would have murdered him) without reſentment. He impeached him in a legal manner, and prevailed to have a day aſſigned for his trial. The queen, according to Buchanan, uſed her utmoſt endeavours to oblige Murray to deſiſt from his proſecution, and not ſucceeding, tried to corrupt his judges. Notwithſtanding ſo powerful a protection, Bothwell thought it not proper to appear, but withdrew. Afterwards the queen obtained from the earl of Murray a ſort of reconciliation with Bothwell. The ſame hiſtorian pretends, that the queen had conceived ſo violent hatred againſt Murray, that, jointly with Darnly and Rizzo, ſhe formed a deſign to have him murdered in a journey ſhe made on purpoſe to Perth; but that Murray, having ſome notice of it, retired to his mother's at Lochleven. He ſays further, that the queen being at Perth, a report was induſtriouſly raiſed, that Murray intended to ſurpriſe her and the lord Darnly, in their return to Edinburgh. To make the report the more credible, ſcouts were ſent out on the road, and the queen came to Edinburgh with a precipitation apt to create a belief of the greatneſs of her danger. It muſt however be owned, that Melvil ſpeaks of a conſpiracy to ſeize the lord Darnly, as ſomething real, though Buchanan will have it to be all imaginary; but Melvil does not aſcribe it to Murray alone, ſince the duke of Chateleraut, the earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Rothes, were likewiſe concerned.

The earl of Murray had a double intereſt to obſtruct the projected marriage; the one private, the other public. I have already taken notice of the firſt, which engaged him to alter the ſtate of the court, where he could no longer ſupport himſelf. The latter flowed, firſt from the danger into which the queen's marriage with a catholic lord might throw the reformed religion. In the next place, it was to be feared, that this marriage, being made without the queen of England's participation, or any care for the ſupport of the reformed religion, would lay a foundation for troubles, in which it was almoſt impoſſible for England and France not to be concerned, to the great prejudice of the kingdom. The earl of Murray was not the only perſon who diſliked the marriage. The duke of Chateleraut, ſworn enemy to the houſe of Lenox, the earls of Argyle, Rothes, Marr, Glencairn, and many others, ſome from private views, others from more honeſt motives, believed it time to apply effectual remedies to the impending miſchiefs, by making a league to oppoſe the deſigns of the court. It is not eaſy to decide whether theſe lords took up arms before or after the queen's marriage. Buchanan intimates this was not till after, upon the court's intending to oppreſs them. Melvil ſpeaks of an inſurrection of theſe lords after failing to ſeize the lord Darnly, and then proceeds to the recital of the queen's marriage. Camden poſitively aſſerts, that the queen, to celebrate the marriage with more ſafety, was obliged to march with ſome forces againſt the confederate lords, and forced them to fly into England. If this be true, ſhe doubtleſs ſurpriſed them before they were prepared. This is not the only diſagreement between Camden and Buchanan.

However, Mary, having reſolved on her marriage, had now applied to the pope for a diſpenſation [o]. When ſhe knew it was granted, ſhe aſſembled the great men of her court, who were all devoted to her, and aſked their advice concerning her marriage, which was unanimouſly approved. Only it was added, not to exaſperate the people, that care was to be taken of the proteſtant religion. The firſt part of this approbation was gladly accepted; but as for the reſtriction, it was no more heard of. Buchanan ſays, the earl of Murray undertook to procure Elizabeth's conſent, provided the proteſtant religion was ſecured. But this was not the intention of the court, who perceived this ſecurity would be the guaranty of Elizabeth, which agreed neither with the intereſts of the queen, nor thoſe of Rizzo, and the lords newly taken into favour.

Mean time, the people began to murmur by the ſecret inſtigations of the confederate lords. It was debated in private converſations, whether the queen could marry without the conſent of the ſtates. Some ſaid, ſhe could not be denied a natural right enjoyed by all her ſubjects. Others maintained, that the condition of the queen and her ſubjects were not the ſame, becauſe the queen, by her marriage, gave a ſovereign to her ſubjects, which ſhe could not do without their conſent. Theſe freedoms convinced the queen that ſhe muſt haſten her marriage, not to be any longer expoſed to the difficulties which might be ſtarted, whilſt there was hope to obſtruct it. She believed, however, that ſhe could not avoid aſking, not the advice, but the approbation of Elizabeth, whom it was, as I ſaid, her intereſt to manage. She wrote to her, therefore [p], to communicate her deſign as a thing already reſolved. Elizabeth, on ſight of the letter, aſſembled her council, who examined the affair with great attention. The reſult was, that the marriage of the queen of Scotland with Darnly was dangerous to religion and the kingdom. To religion, becauſe that queen, in chuſing a catholic lord, intended, it was to be feared, to reſtore her religion in Scotland, which would be very prejudicial to that of the proteſtants. To the kingdom, as Mary, uniting by this marriage the intereſts of the two houſes who could pretend to the crown of England, ſeemed to have a deſign of forming a powerful party in the kingdom, and preventing the interruption of her cabals, by oppoſing againſt her the houſe of Lenox. For theſe reaſons, ſome of the counſellors were for ſending immediately an army into Scotland, to ſupport the malcontents. But Elizabeth thought it not proper to be ſo haſty, and the more, as the alleging that her marriage might be dangerous to England, was but a weak pretence to make war upon the queen of Scots [q]. She contented herſelf therefore with ſending ſir Nicholas Throckmorton, to make her ſenſible of the hazard ſhe ran of loſing her expectation of mounting the throne of England, by a marriage ſo diſagreeable to the Engliſh. Mary's anſwer was, that the affair was too far advanced to be recalled, nor had Elizabeth any reaſon to diſapprove the marriage, ſince, by her advice, ſhe had now choſe an Engliſhman, deſcended from the royal blood of kingdoms, and the firſt nobleman of all Britain. Throckmorton, unable to prevail with Mary, ſignified to the earl of Lenox, and the lord Darnly, that their licence being expired, they were to return to England, or their eſtates would be forfeited [r]. This menace was incapable to command their obedience in ſuch a conjuncture. However, they both wrote very ſubmiſſively to the queen; and Darnly in particular proteſted, that he only accepted the honour done him by the queen of Scotland, with intent to preſerve a perfect harmony between the two kingdoms.

But this was not the only commiſſion the embaſſador of England was charged with. He had alſo inſtructions to encourage the diſcontented lords, and give them hopes of the queen's protection. It was probably from this encouragement that they took up arms to oppoſe the marriage. But the queen prevented them, by having it ſolemnized the 29th of July in her own chapel, after the manner of the church of Rome. Buchanan ſays, ſhe had two other reaſons to haſten her marriage. The firſt was, her fear of the cardinal of Lorrain's oppoſition, who wiſhed her to make a more conſiderable alliance. The other was, that Rizzo was willing to recommend himſelf to the pope, by giving the queen a catholic huſband, without any ſecurity for the proteſtant religion.

Mean time the confederate lords being cited, and not appearing, the queen, whether before or after her marriage, put herſelf at the head of four thouſand men, and purſuing them from place to place, forced them at laſt to retire into England. There they found a ſafe retreat [s], notwithſtanding the treaty of the year 1560, by which the two queens mutually promiſed to deliver the fugitive rebels. But ſuch articles are uſually very ill obſerved. Melvil relates a particular which deſerves notice. The Scoth fugitive lords having deputed to Elizabeth the earl of Murray to deſire her protection, ſhe politically induced him to own, before the embaſſadors of France and Spain, that ſhe was not concerned in their rebellion. But the words were no ſooner out of Murray's mouth, than ſhe called them rebels and traitors, and forbid them her preſence. This was to clear herſelf to the embaſſadors: but was all a farce, ſince ſhe ſtill granted the fugitives a ſafe retreat in her kingdom. Nay, privately ſupplied them with money by the duke of Bedford [t].

Mary's marriage with a catholic, the great credit of Rizzo, and the concern of many for the fate of the fugitive lords, produced a diſcontent among the Scots, which daily encreaſed by the ſecret intrigues of the relations and friends of the fugitives. The preachers ſtill greatly inflamed it, by inſinuating to the people, that religion was in extreme danger. Notwithſtanding all this, the court, now proſperous and elate, reſolved, contrary to the rules of policy, and at a time when the kingdom was diſſatisfied, to degrade and baniſh the fugitive lords by a degree of the ſtates. To this end, the ſtates were ſummoned to meet in February the next year. Melvil ſays, in his Memoirs, that having repreſented to the queen the miſchiefs this rigour might produce, ſhe at firſt ſeemed to mind him, but, however, perſiſted in her reſolution, for two reaſons. The firſt was, the avarice of Rizzo, who had an eye to the confiſcation of the exiles eſtates. The ſecond was the powerful ſolicitation of the cardinal of Lorrain againſt them. He ſtill thought of placing the queen his niece on the throne of England, and therefore judged, if the fugitives of Scotland, as they were the heads of the proteſtants, were once ruined, it would be eaſy to reſtore the Romiſh religion in Scotland, and afterwards invade Elizabeth from thence. Rizzo, the pope's creature, acted doubtleſs from the the ſame motive, and in all appearance the new king was no enemy to the deſign. If Elizabeth is to be credited, in what ſhe wrote to her embaſſador in France ſome years after, Mary and the lord Darnly, from the moment of their marriage, never ceaſed to cabal againſt England. On this ſuppoſition, it will not appear ſtrange that Elizabeth fomented the troubles in Scotland, to put it out of the power of her enemies to invade her.

In the mean time, Elizabeth ſent into Scotland, Tamworth, a gentleman of her privy-chamber, with a letter written with her own hand, wherein ſhe demanded of Mary, that the lord Darnly, to whom ſhe vouchſafed not to give the title of king, ſhould be delivered up to her, according to the tenor of their treaty. Mary refuſed to give the embaſſador audience, but was willing to receive the letter. Whilſt ſhe was reading it in the preſence of ſome lords, Rizzo came in, and ſnatching it out of her hands, hindered her from proceeding [u]. He judged that Elizabeth demanded the king, only to oblige the queen to pardon the exiles, to which he could not agree, being determined to ruin them, though the earl of Murray had ſent him a very ſubmiſſive letter, with a fine diamond incloſed. Mary anſwered Elizabeth, That ſhe would not attempt any thing againſt England ſo long as ſhe lived, "provided ſhe was declared her preſumptive heir by act of parliament." As to the fugitive lords, ſhe deſired her to leave her at liberty to diſpoſe of them as ſhe pleaſed, ſince ſhe did not meddle with what paſſed in England.

Whilſt Rizzo was employed in taking meaſures to execute his projects, the queen conceived an extreme averſion to her new ſpouſe, which ſoon became public, becauſe ſhe took no care to conceal it. She was not contented with grievouſly mortifying him in private, but was pleaſed all the world ſhould know how little ſhe valued him. When they were firſt married, ſhe had cauſed the king's name to be ſet with her own in all public acts, and on the coin [w]; but preſently after, ſhe ordered her own to be placed before the king's, and even cauſed his to be left out in the money-ſtamp. Mean while, ſhe continued without any reſerve her ſcandalous familiarities with Rizzo, if we may believe Buchanan. Melvil ſays not ſo much on this ſubject, but, beſides his plain intimations, he manifeſtly ſuppoſes it, otherwiſe there would be no coherence in what he relates. As for Camden, who makes it his buſineſs to vindicate queen Mary upon all occaſions, he ſcarce mentions Rizzo; and for the queen's averſion to the king, he accuſes the earl of Murray, then a fugitive in England, of having cauſed it by his letters and friends. He pretends, Murray took occaſion, from the alteration enjoined by the queen with reſpect to the acts and the coin, to ſow diſcord between them; ſo aſſigning for cauſe, what was only the effect of the queen's averſion.

Buchanan muſt be copied to repreſent fully all the mortifications the queen made the king undergo, the affronts ſhe put upon him, and the little diſcretion ſhe obſerved in her familiarities with Rizzo [x]. Perhaps this hiſtorian is guilty of great aggravation. But, however, it cannot be denied, that the king was jealous. The queſtion was to know, whether the queen gave occaſion for this jealouſy, as Buchanan pretends; or whether, as Camden affirms, the earl of Murray, though abſent, inſtilled it into the king, without any foundation, by his letters and friends [y]. Melvil, who may be conſidered as an unſuſpected evidence, plainly ſuppoſes the king's jealouſy, without any mention of the cauſe; and it may be almoſt affirmed, that if he had thought the queen entirely innocent, he would not have failed to clear her. He adds, that the friends of the fugitive lords, improving the viſible diſcord between the king and queen, and the diſpoſition of the king with regard to Rizzo, induced him to reſolve to take away the life of that favourite, in order by his death to put a ſtop to the proſecution of the fugitives, who properly had no other adverſary but him. This ſeems to confirm what Buchanan ſays, ſince Melvil ſuppoſes the king's jealouſy, and ſince the friends of the fugitives only made uſe of the king's diſpoſition. On the other hand, Camden ſeems to have ſaid juſtly, that the earl of Murray's friends inſpired the king with the deſign to diſpatch Rizzo out of the way. But we ſhall ſee preſently, that by the friends of the fugitive lords, Melvil did not mean the earl of Murray's particular friends, but rather thoſe of the other lords, who, like him, had taken refuge in England.

The king having taken this reſolution, and conſulted ſome of his domeſtics how to excute it, the queen, who was informed of it, was ſo enraged with him, as made him ſtill more ſenſible how much ſhe was concerned for that unworthy favourite. As the deſign was diſcovered, the king was afraid of his own life, and not knowing what courſe to take, aſked advice of his father the earl of Lenox, who was of opinion, privately to recal the fugitive lords, and ſtrengthen himſelf by their aid againſt Rizzo's attempts. Probably it was then the king ſent to theſe lords, that they might return to Scotland, whether he only gave them ſome general hopes of a revolution to their advantage, or informed them of his moſt ſecret deſigns.

In July, this year, was the famous interview of Bayonne, where the two courts of France and Spain reſolved to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to extirpate the heretics, as it afterwards appeared. Very likely queen Elizabeth was not forgot on this occaſion.

Pope Pius IV. dying in Sptember, his ſucceſſor took the name of Pius V. I return to the affairs of Scotland, which are very material to clear the hiſtory of Elizabeth [z].

The members of the parliament of Scotland daily repaired to Edinburgh in the beginning of the year 1566. As they arrived, Rizzo openly ſolicited them to obtain the condemnation of the fugitive lords, notwithſtanding the warm inſtances of the Engliſh embaſſador, who conjured the queen to pardon them, or at leaſt delay their trial. Theſe inſtances were ſo far from moving her, that they rather helped to confirm her reſolution, becauſe ſhe conſidered Elizabeth as an enemy, againſt whom ſhe was to guard. Theſe lords being the heads of the proteſtants, it was probable the queen of England demanded their pardon, only to have ſo many powerful friends when they ſhould return to their country. But this was what the queen and Rizzo were reſolved to prevent at any rate, knowing their projects would be very difficult to be accompliſhed when theſe lords were in Scotland. And therefore they were to be deprived of all hopes to return.

Mean while, the king conſulted with the earl of Morton, and ſome other friends, how to diſpatch Rizzo. In ſhort, his death was determined, the king, having firſt ſigned a writing, declaring himſelf to be the author [a]. His inſtruments were, the lord Ruthven, and George Douglaſs, natural ſon to the earl of Angus [b]; Morton only adviſing the thing, without lending his aſſiſtance; and it was executed in this manner: The queen, being at table, and Rizzo in her chamber, the king came up by a private pair of ſtairs, and ſtood ſome time, leaning upon her chair. Preſently after, the lord Ruthven, and George Douglaſs, entered, all armed, and attended with ſome of their accomplices, the reſt having poſted themſelves in ſeveral parts of the palace to prevent aſſiſtance. Theſe men entered ſo abruptly, that the table was overturned. The queen aſking Ruthven what his deſign was, he made her no anſwer; but, ſpeaking to Rizzo, boldly commanded him to go out of the room, ſaying, the place he ſat in was not fit for him. It ſeems by that, Rizzo was at table with the queen. Be that as it will, Rizzo perceiving he was the mark they aimed at, trembled for fear, and took hold of the queen's robe, to put himſelf, as it were, under her protection, who did all ſhe could to interpoſe herſelf between him and the conſpirators. But the king, taking her in his arms, and telling her ſhe had nothing to fear, hindered her from expoſing herſelf to the danger, and withal from ſcreening Rizzo. Mean time, George Douglaſs, taking the king's dagger from his ſide, drew it, and ſtabbed Rizzo, who was immediately dragged into another room [c], and there ſlain [d]. The queen was then above five months gone with child, and it may be eaſily judged that the committing ſuch a deed in her preſence muſt have made her like to miſcarry [e].

Rizzo being dead, a guard was ſet upon the queen, who found means, however, to tell Melvil to go inſtantly to the provoſt of Edinburgh, and bid him draw the people together and come to her relief. Melvil having diſcharged his commiſſion, the provoſt anſwered, he would do his endeavour to ſerve the queen; but there was not much to be expected from the people, who were extremely diſpleaſed with the government. Some, however, appearing in arms before the palace, the king ſhewed himſelf out of a window, and aſſuring them that Rizzo was ſlain by his command, ordered them to retire, which they did immediately [f].

Mean while the queen, not doubting Rizzo's murder was committed in favour of the fugitive lords, and that they would ſoon return into Scotland, ſent to Melvil by one of her ladies, that he would endeavour to prepoſſeſs the earl of Murray, and entreat him, from her, not to join with her enemies, for which he might depend upon her love and favour for ever. Murray and the other fugitive lords arrived indeed two days after Rizzo's death, having had notice of the change which was to happen at court. Camden draws this conjecture from the ſudden arrival of the fugitives, that Rizzo's murder muſt have been committed for the ſake of the earl of Murray, who was to be condemned two days after by the parliament. But it appears, on the contrary, in Melvil's Memoirs, that the earl of Murray's particular friends had no hand in the deed, ſince he did not think himſelf at all obliged to the actors. What Melvil ſays upon this occaſion, ſhews that the conſequence drawn by Camden againſt the earl of Murray, from the ſudden arrival of the fugitives, is not juſt. His words are theſe: "Which commiſſion [to perſuade Murray not to join with her enemies] I did not fail to execute at his coming upon Monday, but he was more moved at his meeting with her majeſty, who embraced and kiſſed him, alleging, that if he had been at home, he would not have ſuffered her to have been ſo uncourteouſly handled. Which ſo much moved him, that the tears ran from his eyes. He knew ſufficiently well that it was not for his cauſe, but their own particular ends, that the greateſt part who had made that enterpriſe

[d] The account of this matter is thus given by the lord Ruthven, the principal actor in this buſineſs: "Upon Saturday the 9th day of March, the earl of Morton, lord Ruthven, and lord Lindſey, with their accomplices, paſſed up to the queen's utter chamber; and the ſaid lord Ruthven paſſed in through the king's chamber, and up through the privy way to the queen's chamber, as the king had learned him, and through the chamber to the cabinet, where he found the queen's majeſty ſitting at her ſupper, at the middes of a little table, the lady Argyle ſitting at one end, and Davie Rizzo at the head of the table, with his cap on his head, the king ſpeaking with the queen's majeſty, and his hand about her waiſt. The lord Ruthven, at his coming in, ſaid to the queen's majeſty, It would pleaſe your majeſty to let yonder man Davie come forth of your preſence, for he hath been over-long here. Her majeſty anſwered, What offence hath he made? The ſaid lord replied again, That he had made great offence to her majeſty's honour, the king her huſband, the nobility, and commonweal of the realm. And how? ſaith ſhe. It will pleaſe your majeſty, ſaid the ſaid lord, he hath offended your majeſty's honour, which I dare not be ſo bold to ſpeak of. As to the king your huſband's honour, he hath hindered him of the crown matrimonial, which your grace promiſed him, beſides many other things which are not neceſſary to be expreſſed: and as to the nobility, he hath cauſed your majeſty to baniſh a great part, and moſt chief thereof, in ſo far as he ſuffered not your majeſty to grant or give any thing but that which paſſed through his hands, by taking of bribes and goods for the ſame; beſides many other inconveniencies that he ſolicited your majeſty to do. Then the ſaid lord Ruthven ſaid to the king, Sir, take the queen's majeſty, your ſovereign and wife to you, who ſtood all amazed, and wyſt not what to do. Then her majeſty roſe on her feet, and ſtood before Davie, he holding her majeſty by the plaits of her gown, leaning back over in the window, his whyniard drawn in his hand. Arthur Erſkin, and the abbot of Holyrood-houſe, and others, began to lay hands on the ſaid lord Ruthven, none of the king's party being preſent. Then the ſaid lord pulled out his whyniard, and freed himſelf while more came in, and ſaid to them, Lay not hands on me, for I will not be handled; and, at the incoming of others into the cabinet, the ſaid lord Ruthven put up his whyniard; and, with the ruſhing in of men, the board fell to the wallwards, with meat and candles being thereon; and the lady of Argyle took up one of the candles in her hand; and, in the ſame inſtant, the ſaid lord Ruthven took the queen in his arms, and put her into the king's arms, beſeeching her majeſty not to be afraid; for there was no man there that would do her majeſty's body more harm that their own hearts; and aſſured her majeſty, all that was done was the king's own deed and action. Then the remanent gentlemen, being in the cabinet, took Davie out of the window; and after that they had him out in the queen's chamber, the ſaid lord Ruthven followed, and bade take him down the privy way to the king's chamber; and the ſaid lord returned to the cabinet again, believing that the ſaid Davie had been had down to the king's chamber, as ſaid is; but the preſs of the people hurled him forth to the utter chamber, where there was a great number ſtanding, who were ſo vehemently moved againſt the ſaid Davie, that they could not abide any longer, but ſlew him at the queen's far door in the utter chamber." Relation of the Death of David Rizzo, by the lord Ruthven, p. 27—29.

[e] Melvil ſays, it appeared to be done to deſtroy both her and her child. For they might have killed Rizzo in any other part, and at any other time, p. 66. The lords concerned in this murder, were for diſpatching Rizzo in his own chamber in a morning, or elſewhere. But the king inſiſted it ſhould be done as it was. Relation of his death, p. 22—23.

[f] Buchanan ſays, there was a great tumult in the city, and that the citizens took up arms; but, according to Melvil, the tumult was not very conſiderable. Rapin.

Buchanan

had therein engaged, which made him the leſs concerned in them." Can any thing be more oppoſite to Camden's inference? This hiſtorian will have Rizzo to be ſlain on the earl of Murray's account, and, in order to prevent his condemnation, without mentioning the other fugitive lords, as if their friends had not been concerned in the deed. And yet Melvil, who was then preſent in the court, and wrote long before him, ſays poſitively, that the friends of the other fugitive lords were the ſole authors of the murder, and that the earl of Murray's were not engaged in it. By ſuch ſtrokes as theſe, and by perpetual invectives againſt Murray, Camden has disfigured the Scotch hiſtory of thoſe days, and withal that of England, in what it has in common with this neighbouring kingdom.

While the queen was kept in confinement, Scotland was in a real anarchy, which, however, did not laſt. The king quickly began to repent of following ſuch violent counſels, and the queen, who perceived it, managed him ſo artfully, that ſhe perſuaded him to abandon Rizzo's murderers [g]. This unexpected turn aſtoniſhed them, eſpecially as they ſaw, contrary to their expectation, that the earl of Murray would not join with them. The queen, embracing ſo fair an opportunity, propoſed an agreement, to which they readily conſented, unable as they were to ſupport themſelves. But ſhe had the addreſs to cauſe the writing to be ſo penned, that there was occaſion to make ſeveral alterations before it could be ſettled. This was done to gain time, and give the queen leiſure to take neceſſary meaſures to free herſelf from captivity. When the writing was drawn to the ſatisfaction of the parties, ſhe repreſented to the king, that if ſhe ſigned it whilſt a priſoner, it would be of no force, and by that means ſhe got her guard to be diſmiſſed. But, inſtead of ſigning the writing, ſhe found means to eſcape [h], and retire to Dunbar, where ſhe brought the king along with her [i]. When ſhe was going away, ſhe ordered Melvil, by one of her ladies, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to keep the earl of Murray in his good reſolution; and Melvil ſays, Murray and his friends aſſured him of their conſtant fidelity to the queen.

Mary, being come to Dunbar, and reſuming her authority, granted a pardon to the earl of Murray, and afterwards the earls of Argyle, Rothes, and Glencairn, obtained the ſame favour. As for the duke of Chateleraut, he had withdrawn from them before they were conſtrained to fly into England. The queen's anger was wholly turned againſt Rizzo's murderers; but Morton, Ruthven, and Douglaſs, being fled into England, ſhe could puniſh only ſome of their accomplices, who were executed. Buchanan affirms, ſhe cauſed Rizzo's body to be removed from the obſcure place where it was buried, and laid in the ſepulchre of the kings, cloſe by Magdalen of France, daughter of Francis I. It is eaſy to gueſs that the deed lately committed by the king greatly encreaſed the queen's averſion to him. She put a conſtraint upon herſelf whilſt a priſoner; but as ſoon as ſhe ſaw herſelf at liberty, ſhe mortified him beyond all patience. Buchanan is very circumſtantial; and what he relates is in a manner confirmed by Melvil, who ſays, "the queen could not bear the king in her ſight: ſhe fled from his company; and he went up and down all alone, ſeeing few durſt bear him company. He was miſliked by the queen, and by all ſuch as ſecretly favoured the late baniſhed lords: ſo that it was a great pity to ſee that good young prince caſt off, who failed rather for want of good counſel and experience, than from any bad inclinations." In a word, the queen, who had reſolved to lie-in at Sterling, ſeeing the king arrive there, retired without him to the caſtle of Edinburgh, to wait the time of her delivery.

Now began the earl of Bothwell to hold in the queen's affection the place Rizzo had poſſeſſed. As the new favourite found the queen had a great regard for the earl of Murray, who had lately given her convincing proofs of his fidelity, he joined with the earl of Huntley, and John Leſly, biſhop of Roſs, to deſtoy him. To this end, they intimated to the queen, that he intended to get the earl of Morton and the reſt of Rizzo's murderers recalled, in order to form a party againſt her whilſt ſhe was in childbed [k]. But ſhe would not believe it, and Melvil entirely undeceived her. Thus Murray was always expoſed to his enemies, to whom the queen, to her own misfortune, gave but too much acceſs to her perſon.

Elizabeth, being fully informed of what paſſed at the court of Scotland, was not ſorry to ſee her good ſiſter (for ſo ſhe called Mary) purſue a courſe contrary to her true intereſt, in truſting to men who could not but ruin her. She knew Mary could not relinquiſh her project of dethroning her; and that the pope, the cardinal of Lorrain, and the courts of France and Spain, took great care to keep her in that reſolution. So, the better to diſcover her ſecrets, ſhe had ſent one Ruxby [l] into Scotland, who feigning to fly out of England, and to hate Elizabeth mortally, had inſinuated himſelf into Mary's favour, and by degrees got out of her ſome important ſecrets which he communicated to ſecretary Cecil. Theſe diſcoveries having confirmed Elizabeth's ſuſpicions, were the reaſon that though ſhe had by proclamation commanded all the fugitive lords of Scotland to depart out of her dominions, ſhe gave them private aſſurances of her protection, deſigning, when occaſion, to make them her inſtruments to raiſe Mary diſturbances, which ſhould prevent her from thinking of England.

Mean while ſir Robert Melvil, the Scotch embaſſador in England, having found that Ruxby was Cecil's ſpy, gave notice of it to the court of Scotland, who ordered him to be arreſted with all his papers, among which were found ſome of Cecil's letters in cypher [m]. He was kept with ſuch care, that it could not be known why he was apprehended. Shortly after, Elizabeth ſending Killigrew into Scotland about ſome affairs, ordered him to demand Ruxby as an Engliſh fugitive. Mary, feigning to be ignorant of Ruxby's buſineſs in Scotland, replied, ſhe was ready to deliver him to any perſon whom the queen her ſiſter ſhould commiſſion to receive him. But Elizabeth underſtanding he had been arreſted, and ſuſpecting the reaſon, ſaid no more of the matter. Thus theſe two queens, amidſt their mutual demonſtrations of friendſhip, looked upon one another however as real enemies, and not without cauſe. Mary was privately labouring by her emiſſaries to corrupt Elizabeth's ſubjects, and inſpire them with a ſpirit of rebellion. Elizabeth on her part countenanced the malcontents of Scotland with ſecret intimations, that they ſhould always find in her a powerful protection.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the queen of Scotland was delivered of a prince, on the 19th of June, and immediately James Melvil was ſent to Elizabeth, to carry her the news and deſire her to ſtand godmother to the new-born infant. Melvil ſays in his Memoirs, that ſecretary Cecil having brought the news to the queen, who was then at a ball, the dancing immediately ended, and the queen ſat down in her chair, leaning her head upon her hand, without ſpeaking a word; that one of her ladies aſking the reaſon of her ſudden melancholy, ſhe replied, "The queen of Scots was mother of a ſon, while ſhe was but a barren ſtock." However, the next morning, when ſhe gave audience to the envoy, ſhe appeared better dreſſed and more gay than uſually, expreſſing great joy that the queen, her good ſiſter, was ſafely delivered. At the audience, Melvil inſinuating to her, that in this juncture ſhe could not better ſhew her concern for what related to the queen of Scotland, than by declaring her preſumptive heir to the crown of England; ſhe coldly anſwered, the affair was in the hands of the lawyers, and ſhe heartily wiſhed her title might be found well grounded.

Whilſt Melvil was at London, Mary's principal friends thought it abſolutely neceſſary to remove the court of England's ſuſpicions occaſioned by Ruxby's intelligence; and that, for this purpoſe, it would be proper for queen Mary to write two letters, one to her embaſſador in ordinary, to be ſhewn to Elizabeth, another to ſecretary Cecil [n], and draughts were ſent to her. Theſe letters were wrote accordingly. In that to her embaſſador, Mary proteſted ſhe expected nothing, but by the favour and friendſhip of her good ſiſter. She enjoined her embaſſador not to hearken to any propoſal of the malcontents, but to threaten to diſcover their plots if they came to his knowledge. The other letter, directed to the ſecretary of ſtate, contained much the ſame proteſtations. "By theſe letters, adds Melvil, Ruxby's intelligence was ſuppreſſed, and my brother ſuffered to ſtay in England, whereby the queen's friends ſo encreaſed, that many whole ſhires were ready to rebel, and their captains already named by the election of the nobility."

This confeſſion of a man, who probably was well informed, ſince he was brother of the embaſſador in ordinary, ſhews what were Mary's deſigns. Can it be thought that the embaſſador undertook to incite the nobles and counties of England to rebel, contrary to the will of the queen his miſtreſs, or without her knowledge? There are in Melvil's Memoirs ſeveral paſſages to the like effect, which ſhew that Mary and her friends were perpetually ſtriving to encreaſe her adherents in England, and to keep them diſpoſed to take up arms againſt Elizabeth, when it ſhould be deemed proper. It is therefore no wonder if Mary refuſed to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh. That ratification would have diſcouraged her friends in England and other countries. Elizabeth was not ignorant of Mary's aim, which, in ſhort, was to dethrone her, if ſhe could poſſibly find means. This was the reaſon of her preſſing her ſo earneſtly to take the falſe ſtep of ratifying the treaty of Edinburgh, in order to break her meaſures. On the other hand, at the very time Mary was making proteſtations of friendſhip to her good ſiſter, and entreating her to ſtand godmother to her ſon, ſhe was endeavouring to enſnare her, by perſuading her to get her declared heir to the crown. She knew, could ſhe once obtain that advantage, her party, which was already very great in England, would become more numerous and powerful. But they both knew their intereſts too well to fall into the ſnares they laid for each other. So, Mary never ratified the treaty of Edinburgh, neither did Elizabeth ever declare her next heir. It may however be juſtly preſumed, that if Mary had not loſt herſelf another way, as we ſhall ſee preſently, ſhe would have thrown Elizabeth into difficulties, of which, with all her policy, ſhe would have hardly got clear.

In the interval between Mary's delivery and the prince's baptiſm, ſhe was ſeen to treat the king with ſo great contempt, and to put ſuch grievous affronts upon him, that it was the talk of the whole kingdom. Buchanan is not content with enlarging upon this ſubject; but ſpeaks moreover of the queen's amours with Bothwell, in a manner that ſhews ſhe had loſt all ſhame, and no longer regarded what the world ſaid of her. It might be thought Buchanan, who hated the queen, has uſed aggravation, if what happened afterwards did not too evidently confirm what he has ſaid. Camden ſays nothing of the queen's amours with Bothwell, and ſpeaks but ſlightly of her averſion to the king, calling it only a difference between them, becauſe theſe were things directly contrary to his deſign of an entire vindication. Melvil found himſelf embarraſſed. He durſt not ſay all, but the ſequel and connection of his Memoirs neceſſarily requiring he ſhould ſay ſomething of the queen's amours, he contents himſelf with intimating, in ſeveral places, that Bothwell was at that time abſolute at court, and entirely governed the queen [o]. He was not ſo reſerved with reſpect to the queen's averſion to the king, ſince he does not ſcruple to ſhew it was extreme.

The prince's baptiſm being to be celebrated at Sterling, the embaſſadors of France, England, and Savoy, who were to ſtand godfathers, repaired thither, and the court was very numerous. It was the earl of Bedford, whom Elizabeth ſent to ſtand in her place [p]. The prince was named James, and the queen prevailed, though with much difficulty, that he ſhould be baptiſed after the manner of the Romiſh church, intending to educate him in the catholic religion. Whilſt the court was at Sterling, the king was expoſed to unheard-of indignities, not daring to ſhew himſelf, by reaſon of the extreme want he was reduced to, whilſt Bothwell appeared with a royal magnificence, to the great ſcandal of the world. But, without inſiſting upon what Buchanan ſays, ſince he is not thought impartial, I ſhall content myſelf with the teſtimony of Melvil. The queen, ſays that author, being at Sterling, ſeemed very melancholy, and complained to me of Rizzo's murder, as of an outrage which could not be blotted out of her mind. I endeavoured to comfort her, and to perſuade her to recal the baniſhed lords, that ſhe might enjoy a peaceable government. I had now ſomewhat prevailed with her, "but, alas! ſhe had bad company about her; for the earl of Bothwell, who had a mark of his own that he ſhot at, as ſoon as he underſtood of her wiſe and merciful deliberations, took occaſion to bring in the earl of Mortoun, and his aſſociates, thereby to make them friends, and by them to fortify his faction. For, apparently, he had already in his head the reſolution of performing the foul murder of the king, which he afterwards put in execution, that he might marry the queen." He adds further, that the earl of Bedford, being upon the point of returning to England, deſired him to tell the queen from him, "That for her own honour, ſhe ſhould entertain the king as ſhe had done at the beginning." Melvil diſcharged his commiſſion, but without any effect. What Buchanan relates, is much better confirmed by theſe teſtimonies than confuted by Camden's ſilence.

After the ceremony of the baptiſm, the earl of Bedford, purſuant to Elizabeth's orders, preſſed the queen of Scotland to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh. Hitherto ſhe had only uſed pretences and excuſes to evade the demand; but now ſhe ſpoke more freely. She anſwered, there was an article in the treaty expreſſed in ambiguous terms, which ſhe could not ratify without great prejudice to herſelf: that, however, ſhe offered to ſend commiſſioners to the borders, to agree with thoſe of the queen of England upon a new treaty, wherein ſhe would promiſe to aſſume neither the title nor arms of England, ſo long as Elizabeth and her heirs ſhould live. Thus the difficulty was at length unravelled, and indeed Elizabeth could not with juſtice require more of her. Nevertheleſs, ſhe took this anſwer for a refuſal; which, in my opinion, is a clear evidence of what I have ſaid elſewhere, that Elizabeth intended to make uſe of this abſolute ratification, if Mary had been ſo unwiſe as to give it, againſt Mary herſelf, and thereby prove ſhe had no title to the crown of England. It is extremely probable, that moſt of the Engliſh proteſtants, after having been ſo cruelly perſecuted in the foregoing reign, wanted only a pretence to exclude a catholic princeſs from the ſucceſſion.

The court of Scotland being returned to Edinburgh after the prince's baptiſm, the king was treated there in ſo injurious a manner, that he reſolved at laſt to retire to Glaſgow to the earl, his father, who had left the court, not to be a witneſs of the baſe indignities offered to the king, his ſon. Juſt as he was going, ſome of the queen's officers took away all his plate, and gave him a ſet of pewter. He was hardly a mile from Edinburgh, when he felt himſelf ſeized with a very violent illneſs, cauſed by poiſon, given him before his departure [q]. He went on, however, to Glaſgow, where phyſic and the ſtrength of his conſtitution overcame the violence of his diſtemper, though with great difficulty. Not to interrupt the thread of the affairs of Scotland, I have run over at once what of moment happened in that kingdom, in the year 1566. We muſt now proceed to other matters.

In the beginning of this year, Charles IX. ſent Mr. de-Rambouillet into England, with two collars of the order of St. Michael, which he deſired Elizabeth to confer on what two noblemen ſhe pleaſed. She made choice of the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Leiceſter; and honoured the bearer with the order of the garter [r]. But we muſt not be deceived by theſe external marks of mutual eſteem and friendſhip between the two courts, for they were far from being ſincere. Elizabeth had broke the meaſures of the court of France by driving the French out of Scotland. Moreover, ſhe was looked upon as the head and protectreſs of the proteſtants, whoſe deſtruction had been determined in the conference of Bayonne. So, in all appearance, it was only to amuſe her, that the court of France gave her this equivocal mark of their eſteem. Elizabeth was not ignorant, that the French court, which was extremely bigotted, and where the queen of Scotland had ſuch powerful friends, had no affection for her: nay, ſuppoſing ſhe had received no intelligence of the reſolution taken at Bayonne, which was however known or gueſſed by the Hugonots of France, ſhe could never truſt that court.

This year, the earl of Arundel departed the kingdom with the queen's leave, under colour of changing the air for the recovery of his health. It was thought, the real motive of his retreat was his deſpair of marrying the queen, with which he had vainly flattered himſelf [s].

[o] Thus, p. 77, he ſays, that the earl of Bothwell ruined all at court, having brought home the baniſhed lords, and patched up quiet friendſhip with the earl of Morton; and in the ſame page he affirms, that the earls of Bothwell and Huntley enterpriſed the ſlaughter of the earl of Murray at Jedburgh; but the lord Hume came there with forces, and prevented that enterpriſe.

[p] He was accompanied by George Carey, eldeſt ſon of the lord Hunſdon; Chriſtopher Hatton, eſq. Mr. Ligniſh, &c. Melvil, p. 76. The prince was baptiſed Dec. 18. Stow, p. 660.

[q] Camden ſays not a word of this poiſoning. Rapin.—Melvil's account is this, "The king followed the queen about whitherſoever ſhe rode, but got no good countenance. So, that finding himſelf ſlighted, he went to Glaſgow, where he fell ſick, it being alleged, that he had got poiſon from ſome of his ſervants." p. 77.

[r] It was not the bearer, but king Charles, his maſter, that was honoured with the order of the garter. Rambouillet, in the king his maſter's room, took his place amongſt the knights of St. George at Windſor, ſays Camden, p. 399.

[s] He left the kingdom after the expence of a vaſt treaſure, on the vain hopes of enjoying the queen. At the ſame time others of the Engliſh nation

had therein engaged, which made him the leſs concerned in them." Can any thing be more oppoſite to Camden's inference? This hiſtorian will have Rizzo to be ſlain on the earl of Murray's account, and, in order to prevent his condemnation, without mentioning the other fugitive lords, as if their friends had not been concerned in the deed. And yet Melvil, who was then preſent in the court, and wrote long before him, ſays poſitively, that the friends of the other fugitive lords were the ſole authors of the murder, and that the earl of Murray's were not engaged in it. By ſuch ſtrokes as theſe, and by perpetual invectives againſt Murray, Camden has disfigured the Scotch hiſtory of thoſe days, and withal that of England, in what it has in common with this neighbouring kingdom.

While the queen was kept in confinement, Scotland was in a real anarchy, which, however, did not laſt. The king quickly began to repent of following ſuch violent counſels, and the queen, who perceived it, managed him ſo artfully, that ſhe perſuaded him to abandon Rizzo's murderers [g]. This unexpected turn aſtoniſhed them, eſpecially as they ſaw, contrary to their expectation, that the earl of Murray would not join with them. The queen, embracing ſo fair an opportunity, propoſed an agreement, to which they readily conſented, unable as they were to ſupport themſelves. But ſhe had the addreſs to cauſe the writing to be ſo penned, that there was occaſion to make ſeveral alterations before it could be ſettled. This was done to gain time, and give the queen leiſure to take neceſſary meaſures to free herſelf from captivity. When the writing was drawn to the ſatisfaction of the parties, ſhe repreſented to the king, that if ſhe ſigned it whilſt a priſoner, it would be of no force, and by that means ſhe got her guard to be diſmiſſed. But, inſtead of ſigning the writing, ſhe found means to eſcape [h], and retire to Dunbar, where ſhe brought the king along with her [i]. When ſhe was going away, ſhe ordered Melvil, by one of her ladies, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to keep the earl of Murray in his good reſolution; and Melvil ſays, Murray and his friends aſſured him of their conſtant fidelity to the queen.

Mary, being come to Dunbar, and reſuming her authority, granted a pardon to the earl of Murray, and afterwards the earls of Argyle, Rothes, and Glencairn, obtained the ſame favour. As for the duke of Chateleraut, he had withdrawn from them before they were conſtrained to fly into England. The queen's anger was wholly turned againſt Rizzo's murderers; but Morton, Ruthven, and Douglaſs, being fled into England, ſhe could puniſh only ſome of their accomplices, who were executed. Buchanan affirms, ſhe cauſed Rizzo's body to be removed from the obſcure place where it was buried, and laid in the ſepulchre of the kings, cloſe by Magdalen of France, daughter of Francis I. It is eaſy to gueſs that the deed lately committed by the king greatly encreaſed the queen's averſion to him. She put a conſtraint upon herſelf whilſt a priſoner; but as ſoon as ſhe ſaw herſelf at liberty, ſhe mortified him beyond all patience. Buchanan is very circumſtantial; and what he relates is in a manner confirmed by Melvil, who ſays, "the queen could not bear the king in her ſight: ſhe fled from his company; and he went up and down all alone, ſeeing few durſt bear him company. He was miſliked by the queen, and by all ſuch as ſecretly favoured the late baniſhed lords: ſo that it was a great pity to ſee that good young prince caſt off, who failed rather for want of good counſel and experience, than from any bad inclinations." In a word, the queen, who had reſolved to lie-in at Sterling, ſeeing the king arrive there, retired without him to the caſtle of Edinburgh, to wait the time of her delivery.

Now began the earl of Bothwell to hold in the queen's affection the place Rizzo had poſſeſſed. As the new favourite found the queen had a great regard for the earl of Murray, who had lately given her convincing proofs of his fidelity, he joined with the earl of Huntley, and John Leſly, biſhop of Roſs, to deſtoy him. To this end, they intimated to the queen, that he intended to get the earl of Morton and the reſt of Rizzo's murderers recalled, in order to form a party againſt her whilſt ſhe was in childbed [k]. But ſhe would not believe it, and Melvil entirely undeceived her. Thus Murray was always expoſed to his enemies, to whom the queen, to her own misfortune, gave but too much acceſs to her perſon.

Elizabeth, being fully informed of what paſſed at the court of Scotland, was not ſorry to ſee her good ſiſter (for ſo ſhe called Mary) purſue a courſe contrary to her true intereſt, in truſting to men who could not but ruin her. She knew Mary could not relinquiſh her project of dethroning her; and that the pope, the cardinal of Lorrain, and the courts of France and Spain, took great care to keep her in that reſolution. So, the better to diſcover her ſecrets, ſhe had ſent one Ruxby [l] into Scotland, who feigning to fly out of England, and to hate Elizabeth mortally, had inſinuated himſelf into Mary's favour, and by degrees got out of her ſome important ſecrets which he communicated to ſecretary Cecil. Theſe diſcoveries having confirmed Elizabeth's ſuſpicions, were the reaſon that though ſhe had by proclamation commanded all the fugitive lords of Scotland to depart out of her dominions, ſhe gave them private aſſurances of her protection, deſigning, when occaſion, to make them her inſtruments to raiſe Mary diſturbances, which ſhould prevent her from thinking of England.

Mean while ſir Robert Melvil, the Scotch embaſſador in England, having found that Ruxby was Cecil's ſpy, gave notice of it to the court of Scotland, who ordered him to be arreſted with all his papers, among which were found ſome of Cecil's letters in cypher [m]. He was kept with ſuch care, that it could not be known why he was apprehended. Shortly after, Elizabeth ſending Killigrew into Scotland about ſome affairs, ordered him to demand Ruxby as an Engliſh fugitive. Mary, feigning to be ignorant of Ruxby's buſineſs in Scotland, replied, ſhe was ready to deliver him to any perſon whom the queen her ſiſter ſhould commiſſion to receive him. But Elizabeth underſtanding he had been arreſted, and ſuſpecting the reaſon, ſaid no more of the matter. Thus theſe two queens, amidſt their mutual demonſtrations of friendſhip, looked upon one another however as real enemies, and not without cauſe. Mary was privately labouring by her emiſſaries to corrupt Elizabeth's ſubjects, and inſpire them with a ſpirit of rebellion. Elizabeth on her part countenanced the malcontents of Scotland with ſecret intimations, that they ſhould always find in her a powerful protection.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the queen of Scotland was delivered of a prince, on the 19th of June, and immediately James Melvil was ſent to Elizabeth, to carry her the news and deſire her to ſtand godmother to the new-born infant. Melvil ſays in his Memoirs, that ſecretary Cecil having brought the news to the queen, who was then at a ball, the dancing immediately ended, and the queen ſat down in her chair, leaning her head upon her hand, without ſpeaking a word; that one of her ladies aſking the reaſon of her ſudden melancholy, ſhe replied, "The queen of Scots was mother of a ſon, while ſhe was but a barren ſtock." However, the next morning, when ſhe gave audience to the envoy, ſhe appeared better dreſſed and more gay than uſually, expreſſing great joy that the queen, her good ſiſter, was ſafely delivered. At the audience, Melvil inſinuating to her, that in this juncture ſhe could not better ſhew her concern for what related to the queen of Scotland, than by declaring her preſumptive heir to the crown of England; ſhe coldly anſwered, the affair was in the hands of the lawyers, and ſhe heartily wiſhed her title might be found well grounded.

Whilſt Melvil was at London, Mary's principal friends thought it abſolutely neceſſary to remove the court of England's ſuſpicions occaſioned by Ruxby's intelligence; and that, for this purpoſe, it would be proper for queen Mary to write two letters, one to her embaſſador in ordinary, to be ſhewn to Elizabeth, another to ſecretary Cecil [n], and draughts were ſent to her. Theſe letters were wrote accordingly. In that to her embaſſador, Mary proteſted ſhe expected nothing, but by the favour and friendſhip of her good ſiſter. She enjoined her embaſſador not to hearken to any propoſal of the malcontents, but to threaten to diſcover their plots if they came to his knowledge. The other letter, directed to the ſecretary of ſtate, contained much the ſame proteſtations. "By this

[g] Buchanan does not fully explain this, and thereby makes his account very obſcure. Rapin.

[h] At midnight, March 12. Melvil, p. 66.

[i] Buchanan ſays, ſhe compelled him to go with her; but in the condition ſhe was in, it was hardly poſſible for her to uſe force, and conſequently it is much more likely that he followed her voluntarily. Rapin.

[k] And therefore adviſed her to impriſon him till ſhe was delivered. Melvil, p. 67.

[l] This man was to appear to be a zealous favourer of Mary's right and title to the crown of England, and to inform her of the great friendſhip divers of the catholics had for her, who durſt not deal with the Scotch embaſſador, being a proteſtant; but that he would deal himſelf betwixt her majeſty and them.

[m] It was only one letter, wherein ſecretary Cecil promiſed Ruxby to ſee him rewarded, and deſired him to continue in his diligence. Melvil, p. 69.

[n] The letters were both wrote to Melvil, of which the queen was to ſee one, and Cecil the other. They are to be ſeen, p. 73, of Melvil's Memoirs.

Thus

letters, adds Melvil, Ruxby's intelligence was ſuppreſſed, and my brother ſuffered to ſtay in England, whereby the queen's friends ſo encreaſed, that many whole ſhires were ready to rebel, and their captains already named by the election of the nobility."

This confeſſion of a man, who probably was well informed, ſince he was brother of the embaſſador in ordinary, ſhews what were Mary's deſigns. Can it be thought that the embaſſador undertook to incite the nobles and counties of England to rebel, contrary to the will of the queen his miſtreſs, or without her knowledge? [r] It was not the bearer, but king Charles, his maſter, that was honoured with the order of the garter. Rambouillet, in the king his maſter's room, took his place amongſt the knights of St. George at Windſor, ſays Camden, p. 399.

[s] He left the kingdom after the expence of a vaſt treaſure, on the vain hopes of enjoying the queen. At the ſame time others of the Engliſh nation

Shortly after Elizabeth's receiving the news of the queen of Scotland's delivery, ſhe viſited the univerſity of Oxford, where ſhe was received in the ſame manner as at Cambridge. She alſo ſhewed here, by her diſcourſe and courteous behaviour, an extraordinary regard for that univerſity [t]. Never was prince greater maſter than herſelf of the art of gaining the love of her ſubjects, by kind and affectionate expreſſions, which ſeemed to flow from her heart [u].

Notwithſtanding all this, a terrible ſtorm was gathering againſt her. The queen of Scotland having been delivered of a prince, her friends began to ſtir, and ſcrupled not to act openly, in order to have her declard the queen's heir. The parliament met in November [w] with that reſolution. Thoſe who managed the affair were Mary's chief friends, and had only her in view: but the public good was pretended by all. Among the lords there were ſome, who ſeeing Elizabeth unmarried, and the queen of Scots inclined to a divorce, flattered themſelves with marrying one or other. To this end they kept behind the curtain, and ſet their friends to work, in order to ſtrike in the moſt critical minute. At length, the party being made, it was moved in the upper houſe to addreſs the queen, and pray her to marry, or appoint a ſucceſſor. Among the reaſons alleged for this requeſt, ſome were contradictory; but all arguments were good to thoſe who had formed the project, provided they could engage the majority on their ſide. To gain thoſe who had only the public good in view, they were told, if the queen died without iſſue, the kingdom would be expoſed to great troubles, becauſe nothing yet was ſettled about the ſucceſſion. The zealous proteſtants were made to fear, that the queen of Scotland having a claim to the crown, there was danger of ſeeing the late reign acted over again, if the queen did not take a huſband, and, with the bleſſing of God, get a ſucceſſor. Many fell into the ſnare, imagining the queen, who had ſo great an affection for her ſubjects, would comply with their deſires, and reſolve at length to marry, and they hoped by that means to ſee the kingdom in perfect tranquility. The queen of Scotland was not mentioned, and yet it was ſhe alone the heads of the plot had in view. They knew the queen had reſolved never to marry. Nay, it was believed, ſhe could not do it without hazarding her life, and that her phyſicians had told her the ſame [x]. But, feigning ignorance, they reſolved ſhe ſhould be preſſed to marry, that they might, from her refuſal, have a pretence to oblige her to name a ſucceſſor. This could be only the queen of Scotland, there being no other perſon that could diſpute her title. The ducheſs of Suffolk and her two eldeſt daughters were dead. The third was very deformed, and had married a man of a very mean condition. Nay, I do not know whether ſhe was yet alive. As for the children of Catherine Grey, the ſecond of the three ſiſters by the earl of Hertford, Elizabeth had cauſed them to be declared baſtards by a legal ſentence. Conſequently they could not pretend to the throne. As for the counteſs of Lenox's title, Mary had taken care to unite it with her own by her marriage with the lord Darnly. It was neceſſary therefore, either to call to the ſucceſſion ſome deſcendant from the females of the houſe of York, to which the queen and parliament would not have willingly agreed, or to nominate Mary Stuart to fill the throne after the queen. The combination was ſo ſtrong in the upper houſe, that ſome of the lords were of opinion it was not ſufficient to entreat the queen, but that ſhe ought to be obliged to marry; or in caſe of a refuſal, a ſucceſſor be declared by act of parliament, even againſt the queen's will [y]. At laſt it was reſolved to ſend the lord-keeper Bacon, to beſeech her, in the name of the houſe, to chuſe a huſband, and to lay the reaſons before her [z].

Things were managed with ſtill leſs temper in the lower houſe. It was openly maintained, that ſince the queen would not marry, ſhe ought to be conſtrained to appoint a ſucceſſor: that by neglecting ſo neceſſary a precaution, ſhe ſhewed that her pretended affection for her people was all diſſimulation, ſince ſhe preferred her own intereſt to the welfare of the nation: that ſhe could deny what was deſired of her, only out of fear of her ſucceſſor, which fear could be entertained by none but timorous princes or faint-hearted women [a].

The queen took ſome time to return an anſwer, to the lords, and ſeemed to be ignorant of, or overlooked, what paſſed in the houſe of commons. She was however extremely mortified, that her enemies had credit enough to turn both houſes of parliament againſt her, and to ſee thoſe whom ſhe had moſt favoured, prevailed with to act ſo directly contrary to her intereſts. As ſhe knew very many of her ſubjects were not fully convinced of the juſtice of her title to the crown, ſhe plainly perceived, to appoint the queen of Scotland for her preſumptive heir, was really encreaſing and ſtrengthening the right of that dangerous rival. Among the ſovereign princes, ſhe had no ally or true friend. On the contrary, ſhe could not doubt that the pope, France, and Spain, would readily aſſiſt to deprive her of the crown. Her whole dependence was upon the affection of her people, whoſe repreſentatives ſhe ſaw combined, as I may ſay, againſt her, to oblige her to take a ſtep ſo oppoſite to her true intereſt. It is not eaſy to gueſs what ſhe would have reſolved, if the lords had perſiſted in their demand, and been ſeconded by the commons. Until ſhe could more fully diſcover the intrigues which influenced the parliament, ſhe made uſe of an expedient, which ſucceeded, delaying to take other meaſures, according as her enemies ſhould proceed. The expedient was, to order thirty of each houſe to come to her [Theſe ſhe diverted by the moſt obliging expreſſions, mixed with a gentle reproof from their reſolution, and promiſed them to manage things, not only with the care of a prince, but the tenderneſs of a parent. And whereas the houſe had offered greater ſubſidies than uſual [b], on condition ſhe would declare a ſucceſſor, ſhe refuſed thoſe extraordinary grants [c], and accepted a ſmaller ſum, ſaying, "That money in her ſubjects purſe, was as good as in her own exchequer [d]."

The laſt day of the ſeſſion, ſhe made the following ſpeech to both houſes], to let them know, or rather to diſguiſe, her intentions, and evade their requeſt.

"MY lords, and others the commons of this aſſembly, although the lord-keeper hath, according to order, very well anſwered in my name, yet as a periphraſis, I have a few words farther to ſpeak unto you. Notwithſtanding I have not been uſed, nor love to do it, in ſuch open aſſemblies; yet now (not to the end to amend his talk) but remembring that commonly a prince's own words be better printed in the hearers memory, than thoſe ſpoken by her command, I mean to ſay thus much unto you. I have in this aſſembly found ſo much diſſimulation, where I always profeſſed plainneſs, that I marvel thereat, yea two faces under one hood, [x] Huick, the queen's phyſician, diſſuaded her, it ſeems, from marrying, on pretence of ſome natural defect. Camden, p. 399.——Here it may not perhaps be diſagreeable to the reader, to peruſe a ſtory related by Melvil. He was told at Newcaſtle, by an Engliſhman, one of the gentlemen of queen Elizabeth's privy-chamber, that king Henry VIII. had been ſo curious as to enquire of diviners or necromancers, what ſhould become of his ſon Edward, and of his two daughters Mary and Elizabeth. He was anſwered, that Edward ſhould die, having few days and no ſucceſſion; and that his two daughters ſhould ſucceed one another. That Mary, his eldeſt daughter, ſhould marry a Spaniard, and that way bring many ſtrangers into England, which would occaſion great ſtrife and alteration. That Elizabeth ſhould reign after her, who ſhould marry either a Scotchman or a Frenchman. Whereupon the king cauſed to give poiſon to both his daughters, but becauſe this had not the effect he deſired (for they finding themſelves altered by vehement vometings and purgings, and ſuſpecting poiſon, had taken remedies), he cauſed to proclaim them both baſtards. But the women that attended about queen Mary, alleged, that her matrix was conſumed; for ſhe was ſeveral times ſuppoſed to be with child by king Philip of Spain, yet brought forth nothing but dead lumps of fleſh. Therefore, to be revenged of her father, ſhe had cauſed, ſecretly in the night, to take up her father's bones, and burn them. Melvil, p. 28.

[y] The earls of Pembroke and Leiceſter did openly, and the duke of Norfolk with more caution, profeſs this to be their opinion. But they made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained their pardon. Camden, p. 399.——Moſt of the lords and other great men in England, were then well affected to the queen of Scots, and kept a correſpondence with her; as may be ſeen in Melvil, p. 46, &c.

[z] This petition was preſented to the queen November 5. D'ewes, p. 104, 105.

[a] Theſe and other points were firſt moved in the houſe by Mr. Molineux; and were inſiſted upon by Bell and Monſon, great lawyers, with Dutton, Kingſmill, Wentworth, and others. Camden, p. 400. D'ewes, p. 124, &c.

[b] There is mention in the Journals only of a ſubſidy, and one tenth and fifteenth. The bill for it was firſt read in the houſe of commons, October 28, and in the houſe of lords on December 17, and for the ſecond and third times on the 18th. See D'ewes, p. 111, 125, 126.

[c] The reaſon of this refuſal ſeems to be, that the declaration of a ſucceſſor, and the ſubſidy bill, were ordered by the houſe of commons to proceed together; ſo that the one could not be rejected without the other. See D'ewes, p. 124. She remitted only the third payment of the ſubſidy, as before rated, granted by parliament, to induce her to declare a ſucceſſor. See D'ewes, p. 131.

[d] Rapin, miſtaking the thirty members ſent for by the queen from each houſe for ſo many deputies from the parliament, makes the queen ſpeak the following ſpeech to them, and not to both houſes, as ſhe did at the end of the ſeſſion. Had he happened to ſee the original ſpeech, which is here inſerted, inſtead of the abridgment in Camden, he would have perceived his error. What is inſerted between the two crotchets, is ſupplied from Camden, in order to rectify Rapin's miſtake.

The

and the body rotten, being covered with two vizors, ſucceſſion and liberty, which they determined muſt be either preſently granted, denied, or deferred; in granting whereof they had their deſires, and denying and deferring thereof (thoſe things being ſo laudable, as indeed to all men they are) they thought to work me that miſchief which never foreign enemy could bring to paſs, which is the hatred of my commons. But alas! they began to pierce the veſſel before the wine was fined; and began a thing, not foreſeeing the end: now, by this means, I have ſeen my well-wiſhers from my enemies, and can, as me ſeemeth, very well divide the houſe into four. Firſt, the broachers and workers thereof, who are in the greateſt faults: ſecondly, the ſpeakers, who, by eloquent tales, perſuaded others, are in the next degree: thirdly, the agreers, who being ſo light of credit that the eloquence of the tales ſo overcame them, that they gave more credit thereunto than to their own wits: and laſtly, thoſe that ſat ſtill, mute, and meddled not therewith, but rather wondered, diſallowing the matter; who, in my opinion, are moſt to be excuſed. But do you think that either I am unmindful of your ſurety by ſucceſſion, wherein is all my care, conſidering I know myſelf to be mortal? No, I warrant you; or that I went about to break your liberty? No, it was never my meaning, but to ſtay you before you fell into the ditch. For all things have their time; and although perhaps you may have after me one better learned, or wiſer, yet I aſſure you, none more careful over you; and therefore henceforth, whether I live to ſee the like aſſembly or no, or whoever it be, yet beware how you prove your prince's patience, as you have done mine.

"And now to conclude, all this notwithſtanding (not meaning to make a Lent of Chriſtmas) the moſt part of you may aſſure themſelves, that you depart in your prince's grace."

It is not eaſy to comprehend what the queen would have intimated to the parliament, when ſhe ſaid, "Whether I live to ſee the like aſſembly or no." For theſe are ambiguous words, which may be taken in various ſenſes. Beſides, they are put in where they have not much connection with the preceding or following words:—However, after this confuſed ſpeech, the parliament was immediately diſſolved. But this was only a palliative remedy, which was not capable of allaying the fermentation already raiſed among the people[e]. If it gave the queen time to take other meaſures, it afforded alſo her enemies leiſure more ſtrongly to erect their batteries. Very probably, the affair would have been debated again in the next parliament, if in the mean while the queen of Scotland had not loſt herſelf by her ill-conduct, and viſibly leſſened her party in England[f]. This is what I am going to ſhew, after cloſing the year 1566, with a brief account of the affairs of the Netherlands.

After Philip II. had quitted theſe provinces in 1559, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontent of the nobles and people was grown to that height, that it was not poſſible the affairs of that country ſhould remain any longer in their preſent ſituation. This univerſal diſſatisfaction flowed from ſeveral cauſes: I. The people's belief, that the king had formed a deſign to aboliſh their liberties and privileges, and eſtabliſh an arbitrary power. II. The erection of the biſhoprics, which greatly leſſened the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbies, in which many families were concerned. III. The inquiſition which was intended to be ſet up in theſe provinces, and which was little leſs abhorred by the catholics than by the proteſtants themſelves. IV. The prohibition to aſſemble the ſtates. V. The king's project to extirpate the heretics, who were now very numerous in the country. VI. and laſtly, The intereſt of the great men, who plainly ſaw how fatal to them the execution of the king's deſign would be. They had in vain for ſeveral years beſought their governeſs to aſſemble the ſtates, and prevent the calamities with which they foreſaw their country was ſoon going to be afflicted. Their requeſt was conſtantly rejected. This rigour had at length obliged the prince of Orange, count d'Egmont, count Horn, and ſeveral other lords, to withdraw from the council of ſtate, and write to the king, that cardinal de Granvelle had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the worſt was to be feared, if he continued any longer in the Low Countries. Philip, not thinking proper to recal the cardinal directly, adviſed him, however, to withdraw. As ſoon as Granvelle was gone, the great men went and reſumed their places in the council.

Mean while, the inquiſition being univerſally abhorred, the people began to ſtir, and ſhew their reſolution to free themſelves from that yoke. The great men ſupported this reſolution with two motives. Firſt, becauſe they perceived the inquiſition muſt prove deſtructive of liberty. In the ſecond place, becauſe they were informed the king had taken terrible reſolutions againſt them, on account of what had paſſed about cardinal de Granvelle. Whereupon they formed a confederacy againſt the inquiſition; and Lewis, count of Naſſau, brother to the prince of Orange, with four hundred attendants, preſented a petition to the governeſs. On this occaſion it was that the proteſtants received the name of Gueux, or Beggars. The governeſs not having power to grant their requeſt, the proteſtants, of their own accord, took the liberty to preach publicly, and the governeſs was forced to ſuffer it, and at length to allow it expreſly. From that time, Philip conſidered the people of the Low Countries as rebels; and they for the moſt part looked upon him but as an unjuſt and cruel ſovereign, who aſpired to be abſolute maſter of their eſtates, their bodies, and their ſouls. I ſhall enter no farther into theſe affairs. It ſuffices to have briefly ſhewn the ſpring of the troubles of the Netherlands, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of ſometimes in the ſequel. I return to the affairs of Scotland, which more nearly relate to England[g].

I am now going to give an account of an event which has been rendered obſcure, as well by religious prejudices, as for the ſake of the prince of Scotland, whoſe birth I have mentioned. This prince, coming to the crown of England after queen Elizabeth's death, thought it his duty to try to vindicate the queen, his mother, from the horrible crime ſhe was accuſed of during her life; I mean of murdering the king, her huſband. In all likelihood, he made uſe of Camden's pen for that purpoſe.

[1567] It is agreed, that Henry Stuart, king of Scotland, huſband of queen Mary, was aſſaſſinated the beginning of the year 1567. It cannot be denied that this murder was committed by the earl of Bothwell, or his order; that the earl was then in great credit with the queen, and that ſhe married him a few months after the tragical death of the king. This, added to her averſion for the king, forms a ſtrong prejudice againſt her. On the other hand, almoſt all the Roman catholic writers, who mention this murder, make it their buſineſs to juſtify the queen, and throw it on the earl of Murray. They ſeem to have taken this courſe with the more reaſon, as Camden, a proteſtant author, in his Annals of queen Elizabeth, has openly undertaken Mary's defence, and repreſented the earl of Murray as the author, not only of the crime, but even of all the troubles which happened in Scotland, after the marriage of queen Mary with Francis II.

It will be aſked, perhaps, where is the neceſſity of clearing this fact in a hiſtory of England? I anſwer, there is an abſolute neceſſity, becauſe, otherwiſe, queen Elizabeth's conduct will be either inconceivable, or miſunderſtood. The hiſtory, therefore, as well as truth, requires a diſtinct knowledge of the foundation of queen Elizabeth's politics, and of the real cauſe of the events which will be related hereafter. This fact is as the hinge on which all the affairs of England and Scotland turn for ſeveral years. They who, under colour of clearing it, have laboured to darken it as much as they could, were very ſenſible, how contrary the truth was to the idea they deſired to give of the affairs of this reign. So, to ſet it in a true light, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to follow a quite different courſe.

To ſucceed in what I propoſe, I muſt largely treat of the affairs of Scotland. Some grave authors, of an eſtabliſhed reputation, have endeavoured to diſguiſe the facts they have related, by curtailing and altering them, by ſuppreſſing material truths, and ſuppoſing things which have not even the leaſt probability. To oppoſe to them a bare narration, containing only the naked truth, would not be the way to ſatisfy the reader, who would be ſtill at a loſs to know whom he ought moſt to credit. It is neceſſary therefore to prove what [f] This laſt mentioned parliament, which was diſſolved on January 2, granted the queen a ſubſidy, and one tenth, and a fifteenth. The clergy granted at the ſame time, a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, to be paid in three years. The acts made in this ſeſſion were theſe: 1. An act declaring the making and conſecrating of biſhops within this realm to be good, orderly, and lawful. 2. That no man ſhall ſend any rams, ſheep, or lambs, alive out of the realm, upon pain, for the firſt offence, of forfeiture of all his goods, and one year's impriſonment; and for the ſecond, of being declared a felon. 3. That cut-purſes and pick-pockets ſhall not have benefit of clergy. 4. Whereas there were but one ſheriff for Surrey and Suſſex, one for Eſſex and Hertfordſhire, one for Somerſet and Dorſet, one for Warwick and Leiceſter, one for Nottingham and Derby, one for Oxford and Berkſhire, it was ordered, that for the future (the year 1567 being the firſt) each of theſe counties ſhould have a ſheriff a-piece. See Statut.

I advance, and in matters of fact there are no better proofs than the mutual connection of these same facts, and the testimonies of unsuspected persons. But it is almost impossible to shew where the truth has been altered, without running into some reasonings which indeed do not always suit with history, but which, on this occasion, seem to me unavoidable.

Three historians, who may be considered as originals, have related what passed in Scotland during the reign of Elizabeth; namely, George Buchanan, William Camden, and James Melvil. Some remarks on these three authors will help to give the reader a true notion.

Buchanan, a Scotchman and protestant, was a man of great learning, and much esteemed by all the learned in Europe. If he had not penned the History of Scotland, he would perhaps have been neither envied nor hated: but as in the recital of the frequent quarrels between England and Scotland, he does not always agree with the English historians, a prejudice is formed against him in England, as if he endeavoured to falsify whatever might be to the advantage of the English. This difference would have been little regarded by other nations, if what Buchanan says of queen Mary Stewart had not excited all the Roman catholics in Europe against him. His aim was to shew, that queen Mary was the sole cause of the troubles of Scotland, and particularly, the author of the king her husband's death; and his history is full of circumstantial facts, which have a visible connection, and tend all to the end he proposed. He does not cite testimonies to confirm what he says, because he wrote at the very time the things were transacted, or shortly after. On the other hand, he was Murray's creature, and counted revengeful. It is chiefly upon these prejudices that his history has been discredited, without however any express endeavours to confute him in any material assertion.

Camden, an English author and protestant, wrote the Annals of the reign of queen Elizabeth in the time of James I. son of queen Mary. He was eminent for his knowledge in the antiquities of England, and, if I mistake not, he was Clarenceux king at arms. The History of England is indebted to him for several good works, which have greatly served to illustrate it. But it manifestly appears, that, in writing the Annals of Elizabeth, his only aim was to vindicate the queen of Scots, under colour that the History of Elizabeth cannot be compiled without a particular account of the affairs of Scotland. He speaks extremely well of Elizabeth when Mary is not concerned. But in the places where the two queens must be necessarily put in opposition, he does it so artfully, that Elizabeth is shewn to be in the wrong. It is not the same, where he can praise or excuse Mary without wounding Elizabeth; for then he makes no scruple to represent Mary as a pattern of virtue. He entirely passes over in silence whatever may injure her reputation, or contents himself with confuting what she is accused of, by a bare and directly opposite narration, without alleging the least proof. So, when a man reads the histories of Camden and Buchanan, he would think these two writers are speaking of two different queens, who reigned at the same time in Scotland. Buchanan's design was to blacken Mary's reputation, and Camden's to vindicate or praise her. Wherefore, Camden, who wrote last, has taken care to warn his readers, that no credit is to be given to Buchanan, because he was the earl of Murray's creature, a mercenary writer, and his works were condemned by the states of Scotland. Nay, he pretends that, before his death, he repented of his malice[h]; but, according to custom, supports what he advances with no proof, neither does he take up Buchanan in any remarkable circumstance, but only, as I said, by giving a contrary account. Having thus removed the testimony of the Scotch historian, he adds, "For his part, he proposes, to the end both sides may be heard, to relate the affair [the king's murder] without any mixture of love or hate, as far as he can come to the knowledge of it, from writings, published at the very time, but soon suppressed in favour to the earl of Murray, and in hatred to the queen; or from letters of embassadors, and of other persons worthy of credit." It must be observed, that he cites in his Annals no passage from these suppressed writings; gives neither the titles nor authors; neither does he name the embassadors, and persons of credit, on whose testimony he builds his account. He alleges but one single paper, which I shall speak of in its place, and which carries all possible marks of forgery. Thus, after a caution not to believe Buchanan, who wrote of what passed in his own time, and before his own eyes, he will have us believe him, who did not write till above forty years after the event, upon his bare word, and upon the testimony of persons and books unknown[i].

After this preamble, he enters upon the subject; and, in order to relate the king's death, begins with a character of the earl of Murray, and represents him as a man of boundless ambition, and aspiring to the crown. It has been seen that this was the accusation brought against him before Henry II. by the queen-dowager and the cardinal of Lorrain, and of which Melvil has fully cleared him. Camden adds, that, with this view, Murray did all he could to hinder the queen's marriage, and not succeeding, took up arms against her, and was at length forced to fly into England: that, during his absence, by his letters and friends, he sowed discord between the king and queen; and, to hinder his condemnation, the earl of Morton, his friend, persuaded the king to cause Rizzo, secretary to the French dispatches, to be assassinated: that the king coming to a sense of the heinousness of the crime, conceived such an aversion to Murray, that he resolved to make away with him; but that Murray, having notice of it, was immediately reconciled to Bothwell, and determined with him to kill the king, in order to cast the deed on the queen, ruin her in the affection of her subjects, and at the same time destroy the earl of Bothwell, and seize the government.

This is the substance of the story forged by camden to justify the queen, and throw the murder of the king upon the earl of Murray. I call it a forged story, because indeed it is impossible to reconcile it with the history of Scotland, the principal circumstances whereof this author has been pleased to omit. For instance, he says nothing of the favour Rizzo was in with the queen, or of his great credit at court, neither does he mention that princess's amours with Bothwell; and, yet, in his very narrative, these two facts must be necessarily supposed. For, how can it be conceived, that, to save the honour and estates of the earl of Murray, there was a necessity of assassinating a secretary for the French dispatches, if this secretary had not been in great credit with the queen? Again, why must Murray destroy Bothwell, in order to usurp the government, if Bothwell had not been in possession of it? It is very visible, that otherwise Camden's account has neither coherence nor foundation. In short, this author was not ignorant that the queen of Scots had been publicly accused of the king her husband's death; that all Scotland and all England were full of it; and that it passed for a certain fact in both kingdoms. Can therefore facts publicly known, if I may so say, be overthrown forty years after, by a bare contrary account, without the least proof of what is advanced? But, to confirm what I have been saying with regard to Camden, I need only observe, that Melvil's Memoirs, penned before Camden's Annals, but which appeared not till long after, are entirely opposite to what that author has said, and perfectly agree with Buchanan's history, a few circumstances excepted.

Melvil is the third author I am to speak of. He was a person of distinction, who was employed in several embassies, and concerned in what passed at the court of Scotland. Nay, it appears, in his Memoirs, that he was very much in the queen's favour, since she chose him to advise her about her behaviour, and tell her of her faults. A sovereign can hardly give a subject greater marks of esteem. If Buchanan has not mentioned him in his history, it was probably because he loved him not. Melvil, on his part, has drawn in his Memoirs a character of Buchanan, which, though it does justice to his sense and great knowledge, gives no very advantageous idea of the qualities of his mind. This suffices to shew he has not copied that historian, and that they did not correspond. He has wrote what passed before his eyes, from the year 1563, when he returned to his own country, to the year 1594. Consequently he cannot be said to be ill informed. He may be still less suspected by the queen's friends, since it is plain in his Memoirs, that he was always attached to the interests of [h] Camden's words upon that point are very inconsistent. He says, "That Buchanan often blamed himself with tears in the king's presence, for having employed his pen in too virulent a strain against queen Mary; and wished on his death-bed, that he might live so long as to recal the truth of that fact." Now, surely, if he had often blamed himself for this fact, he had time enough to recal the truth of it before he came to be on his death-bed. See Thuanus, Addit. ad Vol. III. p. 582.

[i] Many believe Camden wrote nothing in his Annals about Scotland, but what was dictated to him, or enjoined by James I. We must therefore understand here by Camden, the real author of the Annals, whoever he be. Rapin.——Osborn says, that Camden's lines were directed by king James; and he led rather to vindicate the honour and integrity of his mother, than to do right for a mistress, that had from a schoolmaster raised him to a capacity of being the first king at arms. Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, sec. 16. It is something remarkable, that the records of the criminal court, or justiciary of Scotland, commonly called The Acts of Adjournal, are missing during the government of queen Mary, and also of her son, king James, till after the trial and execution of the earl of Morton in 1581. In which records was the earl of Bothwell's trial, and the trials of some others of the regicides of king Henry Darnly. The records of the parliament of Scotland, held in August 1560, by appointment of queen Mary and her husband Francis, wherein the authority of the pope was abolished, and the protestant religion established, are likewise missing; as were also those of the parliament in December 1657, wherein the acts made concerning the protestant religion were ratified, and several acts concerning queen Mary. Anderson's Collect. Preface to the first Vol. p. 7, 8.

In

that princeſs. Accordingly he ſpeaks of her every where with great caution, contenting himſelf with briefly intimating ſome things which Buchanan has not ſcrupled to inſiſt upon more largely. He has not thought fit however to conceal the principal facts, becauſe theſe facts ſerve for foundation to his Memoirs, which otherwiſe would have no connexion. He has not wrote either to juſtify or accuſe the queen, but purely for the inſtruction of his ſon in what paſſed in his own time. If we compare his Memoirs with Buchanan's Hiſtory and Camden's Annals, we ſhall ſoon be convinced it is impoſſible to reconcile them with what Camden ſays; but that on the contrary, they agree in the principal facts related by Buchanan. All the difference is, Melvil has cleared many things which Buchanan did not well know; and on the other hand, Buchanan has enlarged much more upon every thing that can reflect on the queen, whereas Melvil very ſlightly touches upon ſuch paſſages. By that he ſhews he ſpeaks of them with regret, and ſo far only as to carry on the thread of his Memoirs.

After theſe remarks upon three hiſtorians, of whom two were cotemporaries, eye-witneſſes of what they relate, and agree together in the main without having written by concert, and without one at leaſt being liable to be ſuſpected of diſguiſing the truth, and of whom the third wrote forty years after, and is directly contrary to the two others, without ſupporting his ſtory with any teſtimony, or known author, I think I cannot be blamed if I take the two firſt for guides preferably to the laſt [k].

Whilſt the king was taking remedies to expel the poiſon, the queen removed the young prince her ſon from Sterling, and ordered him to be carried to Edinburgh, though it was in the midſt of winter [l]. Shortly after, ſhe heard the king had reſolved to withdraw into France or Spain, and that there was an Engliſh ſhip ready to receive him, as ſoon as he could bear the fatigue of the voyage. This precaution making her apprehenſive he would get away, and ſo break all her meaſures with Bothwell, ſhe expreſſed an intention to be reconciled to him. To that purpoſe, ſhe ſent ſeveral tender and affectionate letters, to convince him of her ſincerity. At laſt, ſhe went to ſee him at Glaſgow [m], and ſo artfully managed him, that ſhe prevailed with him to return to Edinburgh in a litter. Melvil does not mention the queen's journey to Glaſgow, but neceſſarily ſuppoſes a reconciliation, ſince he ſpeaks of the king's voluntary return to Edinburgh [n]. As ſoon as he came there, he was lodged in a loneſome houſe [o], near the walls of the city, on pretence he would be diſturbed by the noiſe in the palace. For ſome days the queen made him frequent viſits, and even cauſed her own bed to be brought into a room underneath the king's. In a word, ſhe omitted nothing to perſuade him ſhe did not bear him the leaſt ill will. At that time the earl of Murray, upon news that his wife was like to die of a miſcarriage, deſired leave to go and ſee her, and went away accordingly, notwithſtanding the queen's inſtances to the contrary. This circumſtance makes equally for Buchanan and Camden. Buchanan infers from it, that the earl of Murray had no hand in the king's murder, who was killed the night following, ſince he abſented himſelf the day before the deed [p]. Camden draws a quite contrary inference, ſaying the motive of his going away was to hinder his being ſuſpected. Buchanan and Melvil affirm, many knew there was a deſign to kill the king, but no man durſt warn him of it, becauſe he told all again to the queen, or to ſome of his ſervants who betrayed him. However, the earl of Orkney, half-brother to the earl of Murray, gave him notice of it, which he telling again to the queen, ſhe ſent for the earl of Orkney to examine him; but he denied in her preſence he had ever ſaid any ſuch thing [q].

At length, the time appointed for the deed being come, the queen left the king, to go and put to bed one of her women [r] who had been married that day. I omit numberleſs circumſtanceſs whereby Buchanan inſinuates the queen was in the plot. Indeed thoſe circumſtances would be ſo many proofs, if they were confirmed by an unſuſpected author: but as Melvil ſays nothing of them, I chuſe to paſs them over in ſilence. However, the king was ſtrangled that night [s], with one of his ſervants who lay in his room. As ſoon as he was dead, his body was carried into a garden belonging to a neighbouring houſe, where his ſlippers were alſo brought. Then fire was ſet to ſome barrels of powder placed in the room where the queen's bed was, and the houſe was blown up. The people who came running in at the noiſe, were told at firſt, that the violence of the gunpowder had thrown the king into the garden. But as his ſlippers were found by him, as his ſhirt was not ſinged by the fire, and as ſome black and blue marks were ſeen round his neck, the people were not ſo credulous. The ſame night it was rumoured about the city, that the earls of Morton and Murray had cauſed the king to be aſſaſſinated; and this report ſpread immediately as far as the borders of England. Camden infers from hence, that the earl of Murray muſt have been concerned in the murder, ſince he was preſently accuſed by the voice of the public: but this voice of the public conſiſted doubtleſs of ſome people who were ſuborned to ſpread the report. Melvil affirms on the contrary, it was whiſpered at court that Bothwell had cauſed the king to be murdered, and that he was ſtrangled with a napkin. He adds, "I came to the door of the queen's chamber the next morning after the murder, and the earl of Bothwell ſaid, That her majeſty was ſorrowful and quiet, which occaſioned him to come forth. He ſaid, the ſtrangeſt accident had fallen out which ever was heard of, for thunder had come out of the ſky, and had burnt the king's houſe, and himſelf was found dead lying a little diſtance from the houſe under a tree. He deſired me to go up and ſee him, how that there was not a hurt nor a mark on all his body. But when I went up to ſee him, he had been taken into a chamber, and kept by one Alexander Durham; but I could not get a ſight of him." Buchanan adds, the queen ordered the body to be brought to her on the wrong ſide of a bench, and after viewing it ſome time, without any ſigns of joy or grief, commanded it to be interred near Rizzo, in the ſepulchre of the kings [t]. It is ſtrange that Camden, who attempts to ſtrip Buchanan of all credit, ſhould not undertake to confute any of the circumſtances related by that hiſtorian, though they are many in number, and very diſhonourable to the queen.

The earl of Murray, though ſick, and notwithſtanding the rumour about him, came to court two days after, and appeared without fear. This ſhews he was in no dread of the accuſations of his enemies; and indeed he was never queſtioned for the fact [u]. The queen keeping her chamber but a few days, reſumed her uſual way of life, having always the earl of Bothwell with her.

Mean while, the people murmured exceedingly that there was no enquiry concerning the king's death, of which they openly accuſed the earl of Bothwell. Theſe murmurs were ſo public, that Bothwell could not help taking ſome ſtep to ſhew he was willing to clear himſelf. He went therefore in company with ſome friends to the earl of Argyle, chief juſtice of the kingdom, and requeſted him to make inquiſition concerning the murder of the king. Upon his requeſt, a proceeding was begun, and the depoſitions of ſeveral perſons were taken; but all was ſuppreſſed on a ſudden. The court was contented with offering a reward to any perſon that ſhould diſcover the authors of the king's death; but as all believed the queen and Bothwell guilty, no one was ſo bold as to accuſe them. It would have been very dangerous to take ſuch a ſtep [w]. However, libels and ballads were publiſhed, wherein Bothwell was ſtill accuſed. Whereupon he cauſed it to be fixed up in ſeveral places, that he would fight any perſon that ſhould dare to maintain the accuſation. He was anſwered by another paper, poſted up without a name, that his challenge was accepted, provided he would appoint a neutral place for the duel; but this came to nothing.

This queen perceiving at length that the murmurs and complaints of the people might be attended with ill conſequences, was deſirous of having the caſtle of Edinburgh in her hands, the cuſtody whereof was committed to the earl of Marr by the ſtates. The earl was unwilling to comply with the queen's deſire: but at length, imagining a civil war was at hand, he offered to deliver the caſtle, provided he was ſuffered to carry the young prince to Sterling, of which he was governor alſo. He thought it more advantageous to be maſter of the prince's perſon than of the caſtle of Edinburgh, and the queen agreed to the exchange.

Hitherto people were contented with liberally publiſhing their ſuſpicions of Bothwell, without any adverſary appearing againſt him: but at laſt the earl of Lenox, finding the queen very ſlow to puniſh the crime lately committed, ſolicited her by letter for juſtice upon Bothwell, charging him with being the author of the king his ſon's murder. This letter threw the queen into great perplexity. She could not deny a father the ſatisfaction he demanded, eſpecially in a caſe concerning the death of a king who had been her huſband. I ſhall not relate here all her artifices to evade this proſecution, and to get Bothwell acquitted, becauſe Buchanan, who has given the particulars, may be ſuſpected. I ſhall content myſelf with tranſcribing what Melvil ſays upon this ſubject:

"Every body ſuſpected the earl of Bothwell; and thoſe who durſt ſpeak freely to others, ſaid plainly, that it was He. Whereupon he drew together a number of lords of his dependers to be an aſſize, which cleared and acquitted him; ſome for fear, ſome for favour, and the greateſt part in expectation of advantage. This way being aſſailed, he remained ſtill the greateſt favourite at court."

This teſtimony of a man who cannot be ſuſpected of ſlandering her, is very ſtrong againſt the queen. She not only could not part with a man publicly accuſed of the murder of the king her huſband, but even made him her prime miniſter and favourite. Though ſhe had believed him innocent, it was renouncing the laws of decency, which a woman ſeldom does, unleſs carried away by the violence of paſſion: but theſe are trifles in compariſon of what ſhe did afterwards [x].

The report of the queen's intending to marry the earl of Bothwell, flying from the court over all the kingdom, the lord Herris came to Edinburgh. He took ſo ſeaſonable a time, that he accoſted the queen in Bothwell's abſence, and, caſting himſelf at her feet, freely told her, it would be an everlaſting diſhonour to her if ſhe married her huſband's murderer. The queen, feigning a ſurpriſe, anſwered, ſhe did not know from whence he had that intelligence; and very coldly added, that hitherto her heart had dictated nothing to her in favour of Bothwell. A few days after, Melvil received a letter from England about the ſame thing, but expreſſed in much ſtronger terms than the lord Herris's remonſtrance, which he ſhewed to the queen, who ſaid it was a device of his own. Melvil aſſured her, the letter came from the perſon whoſe name was ſubſcribed, and contained nothing but what he himſelf had deſigned to repreſent to her, as he was in duty bound. Thus the queen in reſolving to marry Bothwell, ſinned not out of ignorance, ſince ſhe was fully informed of the people's opinion concerning the author of the king's death.

A few days after, ſhe went to Sterling, to ſee the prince her ſon. If Buchanan is to be credited, her intent was on ſome pretence to get him out of the hands of the earl of Marr, who plainly refuſed to deliver him. In her return to Edinburgh, ſhe was met by the earl of Bothwell, with a company of armed men [y], who carried her away, and conducted her to Dunbar. Melvil, who was preſent, and was himſelf arreſted, ſays, "Bothwell only took her majeſty's horſe by the bridle," and adds not a word which may inſinuate that the queen ſeemed ſurpriſed at this violence, or that ſhe offered to make the leaſt reſiſtance [z]. He ſays on the contrary, that captain Blachater, who ſeized him, aſſured him all was done with the queen's own conſent.

When Bothwell came to Dunbar, he procured a divorce from his wife, daughter of the earl of Huntley, whom he had married but ſix months before. The divorce was decreed by two ſentences, one in the eccleſiaſtical, and the other in the civil court, and both at the ſuit of the counteſs of Bothwell. In the firſt trial, before the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, Bothwell was accuſed of a criminal commerce with a kinſwoman of his wife; and upon his confeſſion, the archbiſhop pronounced the ſentence of divorce [a]. In the ſecond, his wife accuſed him of adultery; and as he did not deny it, the marriage was annulled. He was forced to uſe theſe two means, by reaſon of the different rules the two courts obſerve with regard to the cauſes for annulling a marriage. The proceſs was commenced and ended in leſs than ten days. In all appearance, the earl of Huntley, Bothwell's great friend, perſuaded his daughter himſelf to ſue for a divorce. This is Buchanan's account; but Melvil ſays, he cannot tell how nor by what law he parted with his wife, becauſe having been releaſed, he had left Dunbar. Hence it is plain at leaſt, he had not read Buchanan's Hiſtory, when he wrote his Memoirs, nor did copy that hiſtorian, though they agree in the principal facts.

Bothwell being thus parted from his wife, carried the queen to Edinburgh, and the next day ſhe appeared in the courts of juſtice, and declared ſhe was entirely free. This was done to prevent an objection, which might be taken from her captivity, to null the marriage ſhe intended to contract with Bothwell. This marriage was ſo odious in all its circumſtances, that it was very difficult to find any pretence to leſſen the horror of it. The only method the queen and Bothwell could find, was to make the lords of the court accomplices of the ſame crime. To that end Bothwell, having invited them to dinner, preſented to them and cauſed them to ſubſcribe a paper, the purport whereof was, "That they judged it was much the queen's intereſt to marry Bothwell, he having many friends in Lothian and upon the borders, which would cauſe good order to be kept. And then the queen could not but marry him, ſeeing he had run away and lain with her againſt her will." One of Camden's artifices, among many others, is to ſpeak of this paper or approbation of the great men in a very looſe manner, and alter it entirely, under colour of relating the ſubſtance. Moreover he ſpeaks of it before he relates the queen's rape, that the rape might be conſidered as a conſequence of the approbation of the great men; whereas it was juſt the contrary, as may be ſeen by the very writing in Melvil [b]. However, the marriage was ſolemnized [c] after the manner of the proteſtants, by the biſhop of Orkney, who was very ready to do ſo odious an office.

Whatever ſuſpicion the queen had given of herſelf, by her neglect to puniſh the authors of the king's murder, there were ſome however who ſtill doubted whether ſhe was guilty. But when they ſaw her publicly eſpouſe the earl of Bothwell, hardly was there a man who durſt undertake her defence [d]. It was eaſy for her to perceive the change in the hearts of her ſubjects, ſo viſible was their diſcontent. For this reaſon, ſhe reſolved to ſtrengthen herſelf with the aſſiſtance of the great men, by forming a league with them for the defence of herſelf and new ſpouſe. All thoſe that depended on Bothwell readily ſigned the league; but herein lay not all the difficulty. There was another very conſiderable party which was to be gained, otherwiſe the league of the court would be of little power. To that end, the queen and Bothwell thought it neceſſary to begin with the earl of Murray, that he might influence all the reſt. The confederacy therefore was brought him to ſign. But he anſwered, that to oblige him to ſerve the queen, it was needleſs to make him ſign the paper; and for the earl of Bothwell, ſince the queen had deſired he would be reconciled to him, he ſhould punctually obſerve whatever he had promiſed. However, fearing after this refuſal to be expoſed to the reſentment of the court, he deſired leave to withdraw to St. Andrew's; but perceiving the queen made ſome ſcruple, prayed her to permit him to paſs ſome time in France; to which ſhe readily conſented, and he departed within a few days [e]. Camden has taken care not to mention the reaſon of Murray's retiring into France: that very ill agrees with his ſcheme. For, had that lord aſſociated with Bothwell to kill the king, why ſhould he quit the court, at at a time when, inſtead of having any thing to fear, he might have expected every thing from the great credit of his pretended friend?

JAMES EARL of MORTON.

Goldar Sculp.t

In the Poſſeſſion of the R.t Hon.ble the Earl of Morton

Publiſh'd as the Act directs May 1 1785

Mean while, all Scotland loudly complained that no vengeance was taken for the king's death, and at ſeeing the queen married to the man who was univerſally conſidered as the murderer. The king of France even wrote to Du Crocq his embaſſador, to ſignify his aſtoniſhment at it, and his letter was ſhewn to ſeveral lords. In ſhort, the earls of Argyle, Morton, Marr, Athol, Glencarn, and the baron of Boyd, meeting at Sterling, ſigned a confederacy, the intent whereof was to bring the murderers of the king to condign puniſhment, and to cauſe the queen's late marriage to be diſſolved [f]. They hoped to effect this the more eaſily, as they had room to believe the queen herſelf would not be ſorry to be compelled, conſidering the unworthy treatment ſhe had now received from her new ſpouſe. Melvil ſays, he heard her one day call for a knife to ſtab herſelf, not being able to bear his brutiſh uſage.

As the confederates did not queſtion that the people of Edinburgh would countenance their undertaking, they had projected to inveſt the city, that the queen and Bothwell, who were there without troops, might not eſcape. But Bothwell, having notice of their deſign, retired with the queen to Borthwick. They were purſued by the confederates; but it was in vain, the queen and Bothwell being now gone to Dunbar. Having miſſed their aim, the confederates marched to Edinburgh, where the gates were opened to them, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the earl of Huntley, the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, and the biſhop of Roſs, to the contrary, who were even forced to withdraw into the caſtle, from whence ſir James Balfour, whom the queen had made governor, afforded them means to eſcape. He gave alſo the confederates to underſtand, he would not give up the caſtle, but intended to ſtand neuter.

Mean time, the queen and Bothwell drew together ſome forces at Dunbar with all poſſible diligence. But the confederates were extremely embarraſſed. They had no money: Balfour refuſed to give them any artillery or ammunition; and by reaſon of the ill ſucceſs of the enterpriſe of Borthwick, part of their troops had deſerted them. So, after ſeveral conſultations, they had almoſt reſolved to give over their projects, and return to their homes. The queen and Bothwell, being informed of their condition, marched immediately towards Edinburgh, in hopes of ſurpriſing them before they came to any reſolution. The news being brought to the confederates in the night, inſtead of flying, they reſolved to meet the queen, and decide the affair by a battle. This reſolution ſtopped their enemies, who, finding things take a quite different turn from what they expected, ſuffered them to paſs the Eſk without oppoſition; after which, the two armies ſtood very near each other. Then it was the queen perceived her troops did not ſerve her heartily, and that but few of her officers and ſoldiers were willing to fight in her quarrel. The knowledge of this inſpiring her with great fear, ſhe deſired to ſpeak with William Kircaldie, laird of Grange, one of the heads of the confederates, who commanded a ſmall body, more advanced than the reſt of the army. Kircaldie waiting on her, told her plainly, there were no hopes of agreement, unleſs ſhe would put away Bothwell, who was reckoned the late king's murderer, and moreover, was married to another woman; but, on that condition, the confederates would honour and obey her as they ought. The queen aſking him, whether ſhe could rely upon his word, he returned to the confederates, and brought a full power to treat with the queen upon that condition. Whereupon Bothwell, ſeeing no remedy, choſe to retire to Dunbar, and the queen put herſelf into the hands of Kircaldie, who conducted her to the confederate army. The heads received her with more reſpect than ſhe expected; but it was with great difficulty the ſoldiers were reſtrained, who cried out againſt her very irreverently. She was conducted that night to Edinburgh, and lodged in the provoſt's houſe, where a guard was ſet on her, ſo that ſhe was really a priſoner. It is likely, the heads were not yet fully determined what to do with her; but ſhe afforded them herſelf an occaſion to be reſolved. The very night ſhe came to Edinburgh, ſhe bribed one of her guard, and gave him a letter for Bothwell, full of tender and affectionate expreſſions, calling him, "her dear heart," and promiſing never to forſake him. This letter falling into the hands of the confederate lords, made them reſolve to be more watchful over her, and afforded a pretence to ſhut her up in the caſtle of Lochlevin, under the cuſtody of the earl of Murray's mother.

The queen complained grievouſly of this uſage, and wrote to Kircaldie, reproaching him that what had been promiſed her was not performed. Kircaldie anſwered, he had already upbraided the lords for the ſame; but they had ſhewed him a letter, under her own hand, which had ſtopped his mouth. He ended his letter with ſaying, he could do nothing for her, but adviſe her to think no more of a man who was married to another, and accuſed of killing her huſband. The queen, as ſhe read the letter, ſhed a flood of tears.

But a thing which happened a few days after was ſtill more prejudicial to her. Bothwell, coming to Dunbar, ſent a man to Balfour, governor of Edinburgh caſtle, for a caſket which he had truſted with him. It was a ſilver caſket, preſented to the queen by Francis II. which ſhe had given to Bothwell. Balfour delivered it to the meſſenger; but, if we may believe Buchanan, gave notice of it to the confederate lords, who took it from the bearer. However, it fell into their hands. They opened it, and found a great many love-verſes and letters, and, among the reſt, ſome that contained the whole plot againſt the late king, and the manner it was to be executed [g]. But this was not all; Buchanan ſays, there were alſo three contracts of marriage between the queen and Bothwell, one of which was written in the queen's hand before the king's death. Another was written in the earl of Huntley's hand, in the interval between the king's death and the queen's third marriage [h]; and the laſt was a contract in form, made at the time of the nuptials. Probably, the two firſt were only draughts, ſuppoſing Buchanan ſpeaks the truth; for Melvil ſays nothing of the caſket or contracts. Camden ſays, however, on another occaſion, that certain verſes and love-letters were produced againſt the queen; but mentions not the caſket ſpoken of by Buchanan.

The queen's captivity, and the ſeizing of her papers, having made Bothwell ſenſible it would not be proper for him to be in Scotland, he retired to the iſles of Orkney [i]; where he turned pirate for ſome time, either for his ſubſiſtence, or to be revenged of the Scots.

Mean while, the chiefs of the confederates, conferring together upon their affairs, conſidered that if they ſhould put the queen again in poſſeſſion of the government, they could not rely on her promiſes, or be ſecure againſt her [k]. They concluded, therefore, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to deprive her of the adminiſtration; and to that end ſent the earl of Lindſay [l], to perſuade her to reſign the crown to the prince her ſon. Camden ſays, to oblige her to this, ſhe was threatened to be brought to a public trial for the murder of the king, her huſband, for incontinency, and for breach of promiſe on the account of religion. And Melvil affirms, the earl of Lindſay had orders to threaten her, if he thought it neceſſary. The queen was ſtrangely ſurpriſed at this propoſition: but rightly judging it was not in her power to deny what was demanded, and that an obſtinate refuſal might draw upon her worſe troubles, ſhe gave her conſent. She did it the more readily, as ſhe was privately told by ſome of the confederates, and Throckmorton, the Engliſh embaſſador, that whatever ſhe ſigned in priſon would not be of any force, but might be revoked when ſhe ſhould be at liberty. The confederate lords willingly agreed ſhe herſelf ſhould nominate one or more regents to govern the kingdom during the prince's minority. She appointed the earl of Murray, either of her own choice [m], or becauſe it was hinted to her that he was deſired for regent; and, in caſe he refuſed the office, ſhe ſubſtituted the duke of Chateleraut, the earl of Argyle, and ſome other lords [n]. Then ſhe was made to ſign all the acts neceſſary for the reſignation of the crown; and notice being ſent to the earl of Murray, who was in France, the preparations were made for the inauguration of the new king, who was but a year old. The queen's reſignation was ſigned the 24th of June, and the young king was inaugurated the 29th of the ſame month by the biſhop of Orkney.

Shortly after, ſome lords [o], who were not of the confederacy, met at Hamilton-caſtle, to conſult what was to be done, at this juncture. The confederates having notice thereof, ſent James Melvil, author of the Memoirs, to know the reaſon of their being aſſembled. They replied, they could not but think it ſtrange that the king ſhould be crowned without their being called to the ceremony, ſince they had no leſs zeal than the reſt of the lords for the good of their country; and they believed to have cauſe to fear there were ill deſigns againſt them, ſince ſuch important reſolutions had been taken without conſulting them; that therefore they were met, not with intent to offend any perſon, but only to provide for their own ſafety. Melvil ſays, the wiſeſt of the confederates were for admitting theſe lords to their conſultations, but the others reſolved to exclude them, and that this advice prevailed to the great detriment of the kingdom. Indeed, from this ſmall number of lords aſſembled at Hamilton, roſe a party, which declared at length for the queen, and ſerved long to foment the troubles of the kingdom.

The chiefs of the confederates had not the ſame views. Some acted only out of private intereſt, and made uſe of the preſent juncture to ruin their enemies. Others, in ſigning the confederacy, intended to remove the ſcandal which the queen's marriage had given, to get rid of Bothwell, to put the queen again in poſſeſſion of the government, and perhaps to limit her authority by means of the ſtates. Theſe knowing the earl of Murray was returning to Scotland [p], ſent James Melvil to inform him of the ſituation of affairs, and to exhort him to behave with great moderation, and above all things to avoid an entire rupture with the queen. They repreſented to him, that his intereſt required it, becauſe he would be much more maſter of his own party, ſo long as he left the queen ſome hopes, than if he reduced her affairs to ſuch a ſtate that her enemies would have nothing more to fear from her. Murray perceived, that indeed ſuch a conduct would be advantageous to him, and promiſed to follow their advice. But he was no ſooner arrived than he ſuffered himſelf to be ſwayed by the violent men of his party, who perſuaded him to put affairs beyond the power of being ever reſtored. This is the repreſentation Melvil gives of the earl of Murray's conduct. A few days after his arrival, he waited on the queen, and inſtead of comforting her, as he had done formerly, when ſhe was under confinement at Edinburgh, he loaded her with reproaches. This had like to break her heart; for till then, ſhe was in hopes the earl of Murray would labour to reſtore her.

Mean while, the confederates praying him to accept of the regency, he ſeemed inclined to refuſe it, and deſired a few days to conſider of it: but this was all grimace, and at length he accepted it [q]. Before the ſtates, which had been convened in his abſence, met, he wrote to the Hamiltonians (for ſo were called the lords aſſembled at Hamilton), to deſire them to come and join with the reſt of the ſtates, in what ſhould be deemed neceſſary for the good of the kingdom: but they refuſed to come. An agreement was talked of ſome time, but there occurred inſuperable difficulties. Buchanan caſts the whole blame upon the Hamiltonians; and Melvil, on the contrary, upon the violent party of the confederates, with whom the regent was joined. All that can be conjectured is, that they who had procured the aſſembly at Hamilton, intended to ſerve the queen, and wanted only a pretence to declare, which the earl of Murray furniſhed them with, perhaps very imprudently. However, Murray not thinking fit to defer the convention of the ſtates, in expectation of an agreement with the Hamiltonians, which to him ſtill ſeemed more remote, the regency was confirmed by a decree, ſubſcribed by above two hundred lords and gentlemen of the greateſt diſtinction, as well catholics as proteſtants.

The new regent's firſt care was to remove Balfour, who had rendered himſelf ſuſpected, from the government of Edinburgh caſtle, and to confer it on the laird of Grange. Mean while the Hamiltonians, at the head of whom was the earl of Argyle, loudly complained of their being neglected, and refuſed to acknowledge the earl of Murray for regent. It was eaſy to perceive, their aim on that pretence was to form a party for the queen. And indeed ſome time after they met at Dunbarton, and ſigned an aſſociation, the intent whereof was to releaſe the queen, and replace her on the throne. Twelve lords [r], of whom the earl of Argyle and the biſhop of St. Andrew's were the chief, ſubſcribed the bond of aſſociation. But the earl of Argyle deſerted that party preſently after, and came to the parliament. This lord, who frequently changed ſides, did not remain long with the party he had eſpouſed. As for the duke of Chateleraut, he was then in France about his own private concerns. The aſſociation was not at firſt very formidable to the regent; but it became ſo afterwards, becauſe all the malcontents of the king's party joined it by degrees, it not being eaſy for the regent to pleaſe all.

During the reſt of the year, the regent took into his hands all the ſtrong places of the kingdom, and beſtowed the offices and governments as he judged neceſſary for the preſervation of the public peace. He took care, above all things, to cauſe juſtice to be adminiſtered punctually and impartially. Melvil blames him only for one thing, namely, his not being ſo diligent as he might have been in gaining the Hamiltonians. But it muſt be conſidered, Melvil himſelf manifeſtly leaned to that party. The queen valued and loved him, and conſequently it was natural to wiſh her reſtoration. He plainly ſhews in his Memoirs, that he heartily deſired ſhe might be replaced on the throne, which made him blame thoſe who oppoſed it.

The knowledge of the affairs of Scotland is ſo abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding the motives of queen Elizabeth's conduct and politics, that it is not to be thought ſtrange that I have given ſo particular an account of what paſſed in that kingdom. The ſequel will juſtify, as I hope, this long digreſſion. I return now to the affairs of England.

The term for the reſtitution of Calais being expired, Elizabeth ſent into France ſir Thomas Smith ſecretary of ſtate, and ſir William Winter maſter of the naval ſtores, to demand that place of the king, according to the treaty of Cateau. But nothing was farther from the king of France's thoughts. He appointed commiſſioners to treat with the Engliſh embaſſadors, as if it was to be conſidered again to whom that place was to belong, and as if the treaty of Cateau was to be reckoned as nothing. Michael Hoſpital chancellor, who was firſt commiſſioner, made on the occaſion a long ſpeech, of which it will be ſufficient to relate the ſubſtance, to ſhew how groundleſs were the reaſons with which he ſupported the refuſal of Calais. He ſaid,

"By the ſame right the Engliſh demanded Calais, they may as well claim Paris; for the one, as well as the other, was won and loſt by arms [s].

"The Engliſh plead a new title to Calais, whereas the king of France's title is of the ſame date with the monarchy itſelf.

"Though the Engliſh had it in poſſeſſion above two hundred years, yet the right was as much in the kings of France, as were the dukedoms of Guienne and Normandy, which the Engliſh detained a long time by force. And therefore it could not be ſaid, the French had conquered Calais and thoſe dukedoms, but only recovered what belonged to them.

"Preſcription of time is of no conſideration among princes, but right always takes place; and by the law of the Twelve Tables, the authority remains perpetual againſt an enemy.

"Though the Engliſh undertook the late war for the ſake of Calais, yet that place was not mentioned in the treaty of Troye, and thereby they owned they had no farther pretenſions to it.

"The clauſe inſerted in the treaty of Troye, relating to the reſervation of rights, concerns only ſmall and ſignificant matters, and not the reſtitution of Calais, which is an article of the greateſt importance.

"The pretended attempts of Francis II. in Scotland, could by no means effect the right of Charles IX. his ſucceſſor. Indeed, the very intentions of private perſons are in ſome reſpects liable to the laws; but the caſe of princes is quite different.

"The late king, in aiding the queen of Scotland his wife, did no more than the Engliſh themſelves had done in ſeizing Havre de Grace, under colour of keeping it for the king. Moreover they furniſhed the prince of Condé with money, and therefore have forfeited their claim to Calais.

"When it pleaſed God that the French ſhould recover Calais, he ſet the natural bounds between the kingdoms of France and England, according to the poet:

"Et penitus toto diviſos orbe Britannos.

"In a word, if any one had the aſſurance to propoſe to the king the reſtitution of Calais, he would deſerve not only death, but a worſe puniſhment, damnation."

Smith replied, "he would not ſtay to ſhew the weakneſs of the arguments alleged by the chancellor, becauſe he could not believe the refuſing to reſtore Calais would in good earneſt be founded upon reaſons ſo little plauſible. There was a treaty made expreſly on this account, which the chancellor never mentioned, as if he had forgot, that, upon this treaty, ſigned, ratified, and ſworn to by the king of France, the queen of England's demand was grounded. Neither did he intend to loſe time in combating maxims, which, if admitted, would render all treaties between ſovereigns of no effect: but would content himſelf with anſwering two objections, which were the moſt ſpecious. As for the treaty of Troye, he appealed to ſome of the commiſſioners who were preſent at the concluſion of that treaty, whether it was not agreed that the reſtitution of Calais ſhould be compriſed in the general reſervation of rights; and that the reaſon which they alleged to hinder the town of Calais from being reſerved by name, was, becauſe the eight years were not yet expired. As for Havre de Grace, the Engliſh made a peaceable entry, being invited by the inhabitants and the people of Normandy. In ſhort, as for the money lent to the prince of Condé, the king of France himſelf owned it was for his ſervice, ſince it was to pay the German ſoldiers, who threatened to ravage the kingdom." But all theſe reaſons were to no purpoſe, France being reſolved not to part with Calais. I ſhall obſerve here by the way, that the chancellor of France did not uſe, in order to evade the reſtitution of Calais, the arguments taken from the treaty itſelf of Cateau, as he might have juſtly done, if that treaty were expreſſed in the terms, or after the manner mentioned by the French hiſtorians.

It was not the chancellor's arguments that hindered Elizabeth from aſſerting her right to Calais, but the ſituation of her affairs, which permitted her not to enter into a war with France. Her intention was not to invade, but to defend and maintain herſelf on the throne, in ſpite of the endeavours of her enemies. This was her only care during the whole courſe of her reign. Hence it was that ſhe ſometimes ſeemed willing to marry, though in all appearance ſhe had no ſuch deſire. The firſt ſhe decoyed with this hope was the archduke Charles of Auſtria, the ſame that was propoſed to the queen of Scotland by the cardinal of Lorrain. She carried her diſſimulation ſo far, as to ſend Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Suſſex, in embaſſy to the emperor Maximilian, to ſettle the marriage articles, the emperor on his part having diſpatched count Stolberg to keep her in this good reſolution. The earl of Suſſex ſtaid five months at Vienna, about the negotiation, going thither under colour of carrying the emperor the Order of the Garter. But he was accompanied with the lord North, the earl of Leiceſter's creature, who was ordered by his patron to defeat the negotiation as much as poſſible, by tacitly hinting to the Imperial court, that the queen had no deſign to marry, whatever ſhe pretended. The emperor found afterwards that North was better informed than the embaſſador, who, fearing the queen would eſpouſe the earl of Leiceſter, did his utmoſt to adjuſt all differences and remove the objections. The main difficulty was, to find expedients upon the article of religion which ſhould ſatisfy both courts. The emperor relaxed as much as he could; and the earl, on his part, did all that lay in his power to remove this obſtacle. They were now agreed, that the archduke ſhould have the title of king of England, and guardianſhip of the children, in caſe the queen died firſt. As to religion, after the emperor had often, but in vain, demanded the privilege of a public church for the archduke, he conſented at length, that he ſhould be ſatisfied with a private chapel in ſome part of the royal palace, where no Engliſhman ſhould be admitted; and if his way of worſhip happened to give any offence, he ſhould forbear it for a time, and be preſent with the queen at the ſervice of the church of England. But this affair being debated in the council of England, the queen ſent the earl of Suſſex word, that ſhe could not admit even of this. So the negotiation was broke off, though without noiſe, with marks of eſteem and friendſhip, mutually given by the emperor and the queen. By the way, this obſtacle, concerning religion, was the means the queen always uſed to break off all the negotiations about her marriage. And therefore ſhe ever treated with catholic princes, becauſe ſhe was ſure of breaking off the negotiation whenever ſhe pleaſed. As for the proteſtant princes, who offered themſelves, whilſt ſhe was of age, to marry, ſhe took care to let them ſoon know they had nothing to hope for. This behaviour confirms the ſuſpicion which had been always entertained, that ſhe had made a ſettled reſolution never to ſubmit to the matrimonial yoke, though her affairs obliged her ſometimes to pretend the contrary.

This year arrived at London embaſſadors from John Baſilowitz, grand duke of Muſcovy. Their public commiſſion was, to confirm and renew the favours which the czar, their maſter, had granted to the Engliſh merchants, aſſociated by the name of the Muſcovy company. But with theſe embaſſadors returned Anthony Jenkinſon, an Engliſhman, who had made a long ſtay in that country, and was charged with ſome private inſtructions [t]. The Czar's deſign was to make with Elizabeth a league offenſive and defenſive, with a mutual obligation to afford each other a ſafe retreat, in caſe either ſhould be driven out of their dominions. This prince, who was a great tyrant, was willing to provide for his ſafety, being apprehenſive his ſubjects would not always ſuffer his tyranny. The queen returned him a doubtful anſwer, which he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with; and yet he granted, two years after, to the Engliſh merchants, privileges which very much conduced to render their trade with Muſcovy flouriſhing.

About this time there were commotions in Ireland, occaſioned by the rebellion of Shan-Oneal, a lord of great intereſt in the north; but which ended with the death of the rebel, who was ſlain by his own people.

The duke of Norfolk, who was one of thoſe that were moſt in the queen's favour, loſt his ducheſs this year [u], and by that means unfortunately ſaw himſelf in a condition to form projects which proved his deſtruction [w].

The affairs of the Low Countries were very much altered during this year. The great men were divided, and ſeveral had betrayed the common cauſe. The prince of Orange was withdrawn to his governments, count Horn to his own houſe, and count Egmont continued with the governeſs, who, improving the diſſention, revoked whatever ſhe had been forced to grant to the reformed. Then ſhe ſent for forces out of Germany, and raiſed ſome Walloon regiments. Shortly after, Philip II. reſolved to ſend the duke of Alva into the Low Countries with an army of native Spaniards, to chaſtiſe both the nobles and people. Whereupon the prince of Orange retiring into Germany, the duke of Alva entered the country at the head of his army without any oppoſition. At his arrival at Bruſſels, the ducheſs of Parma put the government into his hands, and then the duke exerciſed cruelties, which it is needleſs to relate, ſince they are univerſally known. The counts of Egmont [x] and Horn loſt their lives by the hand of the hangman, whilſt Montigny ſuffered the ſame puniſhment in Spain, and all the prince of Orange's lands were confiſcated.

On the other hand, the court of France, under colour of fearing the duke of Alva, who was to paſs near the borders, levied ſix thouſand Switzers, with deſign to extirpate the Hugonots, whilſt the duke of Alva ſhould do the ſame in the Netherlands, purſuant to the agreement at Bayonne. It is eaſy to ſee, that in ſuch a juncture, Elizabeth could not attempt the recovery of Calais. It was ſufficient if ſhe could avert the flames which threatened England. Mean while, the prince of Condé, having with difficulty eſcaped the ſnares of the court, re-aſſembled the Hugonots by the admiral's help, and was very likely to have ſucceeded in his deſign of carrying away the king at Meaux. After that diſappointment, he went and blocked up Paris. In ſhort, on the 10th of November was fought, at the gates of Paris, a battle, wherein the conſtable, Montmorency, was ſlain. This action not being deciſive, the prince marched to meet Caſimir, count Palatine, who was bringing him an aid of three thouſand foot and ſix thouſand five hundred horſe. In September, La Noue, one of the chief of the Hugonots, took Orleans. Thus [u] She was his third wife, with whom he had lived about a year. Her name was Elizabeth; ſhe was daughter of ſir Francis Leiburne, knight, and widow of Thomas lord Dacres, of Gilletland. Dugdale's Baron, vol. II. p. 276.

[w] This year alſo, in January, died doctor Nicholas Wotton, dean of Canterbury and York, often mentioned in this Hiſtory. Camden, p. 408.—On June 8, ſir Thomas Sackville was created baron of Buckhurſt. Stow, p. 661.

[x] Charles Lamoral, count of Egmont, was beheaded at Bruſſels in the beginning of July. The French embaſſador, who was a private ſpectator of the execution, is ſaid to have wrote to Charles IX. king of France, "That he had ſeen that head ſtruck off, whoſe valour had made France twice tremble." Alluding to the battles of St. Quintin and Graveling. The Flemings were ſo fond of him, that his execution made them loſe all patience. No offers from Philip could quiet them, and they never left purſuing their revenge, till they had entirely ſhook off the Spaniſh yoke. Strada, de Bell. Belg. l. 7.

all the neighbouring countries of England, namely, Scotland, France, and the Low Countries, were in trouble and confuſion, whilſt the Engliſh, by the wiſe management of the queen, enjoyed a profound peace.

[1568] It is however at the expence of her own, that Elizabeth ſecured the repoſe of her people. She had to fear both at home and abroad; and conſequently was obliged to attend perpetually as well to foreign as domeſtic affairs, in order to prevent the deſigns of her enemies. The ſtate of the Hugonots in France made her very uneaſy. Their enemies were likewiſe her's; and as there was little appearance of their withſtanding the catholics, who were an hundred to one, and ſupported by the authority royal, ſhe was apprehenſive that, after their extirpation, the ſtorm would fall upon England. It was ſcarce to be doubted that the war, which was waging at once with the proteſtants of France and the Low Countries, was the effect of the mutual counſels of the French and Spaniſh courts, and that the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion was the principal object theſe two courts had in view. Elizabeth therefore thought it abſolutely neceſſary to let the king of France know, ſhe was concerned for the preſervation of the Hugonots, whatever reaſon ſhe might have to complain of their behaviour to her. To that purpoſe ſhe ordered Norris, her embaſſador to Charles IX. to intercede earneſtly for them, and give to underſtand, ſhe knew her own intereſt too well to ſuffer them to be entirely ruined. Theſe threats from England, the reſolution of the Hugonots, and their aſſiſtance from Germany, produced a good effect, and procured them a peace; but it was only a treacherous peace, wherein the court intended only to deceive them and which for that reaſon was called afterwards the Lame Peace. Catherine de Medici knowing it would not be long before the war would re-kindle, reſolved to be beforehand, to prevent Elizabeth from aſſiſting the Hugonots. To that end ſhe began now to hint, to the Engliſh embaſſador, a marriage betwixt Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, who was but ſeventeen years of age. I ſhall ſpeak elſewhere of the ſequel of this project.

At the ſame time, Philip II. ſhewed his ſpite againſt Elizabeth, by confining her embaſſador [y] to a country village. On the other hand, ſir John Hawkins, an Engliſh merchant, who was gone to trade in the Bay of Mexico with five ſhips, by virtue of the treaty between Charles V. and Henry VIII. was inſulted by the Spaniſh fleet, which took and rifled three of his ſhips. Theſe outrages were very grievous to Elizabeth, eſpecially as the merchants loudly murmured, and were importunate for a war with Spain. But ſhe did not think proper then to ſhew her reſentment, for fear of being engaged farther than the ſituation of her affairs would permit. She had the more reaſon not to enter into a war of this nature, as at the ſame time the affairs of Scotland, which touched her more nearly, took a new turn, and might be to her of very great conſequence.

Queen Mary was priſoner at Lochlevin; but that did not hinder her from having ſtill a ſtrong party, conſiſting of all the catholics, with thoſe that envied and hated the earl of Murray, or ſuch as were in credit about him. Indeed, moſt of thoſe men little regarded the queen, but thought ſhe could afford them a plauſible pretence to act againſt the regent, and it was this that cauſed them to declare for her. On the other ſide, in the regent's party itſelf, which was called the king's, there were ſome who were engaged in it purely to ruin Bothwell, whom they hated and feared. Theſe imagined, if they could get him out of the way, things would return to their proper channel, and the queen might marry ſome prince, who would cauſe Scotland to flouriſh again. Kircaldie, who was of this number, being informed that Bothwell was playing the pirate near the iſles of Schetland, equipped two veſſels, and reſolved to go in chace of him, believing all troubles would ceaſe with his death. He was ſo fortunate as to meet with him. He purſued and obliged him at length to run his ſhip aſhore, and eſcape to land in his boat: but his ſhip was taken with his ſervants, who, it is ſaid, gave information of many things concerning the late king's murder, which reflected on the queen. But there is no relying upon ſuch ſort of public reports. Bothwell having the good fortune to eſcape, but not knowing which way to fly, reſolved at laſt to retire into Denmark, where he was taken up and thrown into priſon. He lived there ten years in extreme miſery, which turned his brains. Camden affirms, that before his death, "he ſolemnly proteſted, the queen was in no degree privy to the murder of the king her huſband [z]." But, according to cuſtom, this author does not ſay from whence he had this particular [a].

Bothwell being no longer to be feared, all thoſe that had declared againſt the queen from their hatred to him, forſook the king's party, ſome privately, others openly. Lidington and the lord Boyd were amongſt thoſe who feigned to be ſtill attached to the regent, in order to have a fairer opportunity to do the queen ſervice. The earl of Argyle wavered for a time, but at laſt quitted the earl of Murray, and joined the other party.

Mean while the regent, being gone to Glaſgow, heard a few days after that the queen had made her eſcape from Lochlevin [b], and was at Hamilton caſtle, but twelve miles from Glaſgow. This news quickly ſpreading, the lord Boyd, who was of the regent's council, forſook him immediately, and went to the queen.

The regent was extremely perplexed, eſpecially as he learned at the ſame time, that the queen's friends were drawing people together from all ſides, and flocked to her in great numbers. This made him ſenſible he muſt either forſake the party, or try the fortune of a battle. He choſe the laſt, and aſſembling ſome forces, though in number very inferior to the queen's, he departed from Glaſgow, at the very time the queen was marching to give him battle. Melvil ſays, the queen's deſign at firſt was not to fight, having left Hamilton caſtle only to retire to Dunbarton, but that the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, and the reſt of the heads of the party [c], were for hazarding a battle, truſting to their numbers, and hoping to govern in the queen's name, when the regent was vanquiſhed. Be this as it will, the army, ſix thouſand ſtrong [d], advancing towards Glaſgow, met the regent, who had but four thouſand men, and the battle began. It is needleſs to give a deſcription of it here [e]. It ſuffices to ſay, in a word, the queen loſt the day, and for fear of falling into the hands of her enemies, fled towards the borders of England. She choſe for her firſt retreat the houſe of Maxwell baron of Herris [f]; but a few days after, not thinking herſelf ſafe there, or in any other place of the kingdom, ſhe reſolved to retire into England. Upon the leaſt attention to what had paſſed hitherto between Elizabeth and Mary, and to the juſt reaſons they had to diſtruſt and conſider each other as real enemies, notwithſtanding their external demonſtrations of a mutual friendſhip, which was all diſſimulation, it will not be thought that Mary would have voluntarily taken refuge in England, had it been her choice to retire elſewhere: but there was a neceſſity either of falling once more into the hands of the Scots her enemies, or of throwing herſelf into the arms of Elizabeth. Of the two dangers, one was near and infallible; the other was yet diſtant, and not ſo certain as to deſtroy all hopes of finding aſſiſtance in that queen's generoſity. However, ſhe ſent one of her ſervants, John Beton, to Elizabeth, to deſire her protection and leave to retire into England. Camden ſays, ſhe ſent by the ſame meſſenger a diamond, which ſhe had received from her as a pledge of her friendſhip, and of a promiſe to aſſiſt her to the utmoſt of her power, when there ſhould be occaſion. And yet this ſame author has inſerted, under the year 1582 of his Annals, a letter of Mary to Elizabeth, wherein it appears the diamond was ſent back before the battle of Glaſgow: beſides, though Elizabeth may poſſibly have added to her preſent of the diamond, ſome tender and affectionate expreſſions, with ſome general promiſes, it is not likely ſhe intended to oblige herſelf ſo far as Camden would inſinuate. This is what I believe, for ſeveral reaſons. Firſt, it is certain Elizabeth was never ſo well affected to Mary. Secondly, ſuch an engagement was directly contrary to her intereſt, which required not that ſhe ſhould be ſo careful of her rival's proſperity. Laſtly, no time can be aſſigned when Elizabeth was under any neceſſity to carry her diſſimulation to that height. Camden adds, Elizabeth ſent word to Mary, by Beton, that ſhe would give her all the proofs of friendſhip which could be expected from a ſiſter. But, as I have often hinted, it is not always ſafe to rely wholly on the teſtimony of this author[g]. However, before this anſwer arrived, Mary, fearing to be diſcovered in her retreat, took boat[h], and came to Wirkington, in Cumberland, attended only by the lords Herris and Fleming, and a few ſervants. The ſame day ſhe wrote to Elizabeth, acquainting her with her arrival in England. She told her in the letter, that, having eſcaped out of priſon, and intending to go to Dunbarton, her enemies came againſt her to diſpute her paſſage[i], and defeated her army: that this misfortune obliged her to quit her kingdom, where ſhe could not be with ſafety, to come and implore her protection, and ſhe entreated her to cauſe her to be conducted to her preſence. She ſaid alſo, in the ſame letter, "That her enemies, after murdering her ſervant before her face, had committed a new crime, which they pretended to charge her with, though themſelves had plotted it, as appears by a writing, under their own hands and ſeals." It is this, doubtleſs, which gave Camden occaſion to ſay, under the year 1567, that the earls of Murray and Morton bound themſelves, by a writing, to ſupport Bothwell when he ſhould have killed the king[k]. If this writing, which never appeared, were really true, it would evidently follow, that Mary was not ignorant of Bothwell's being author of the king her huſband's murder, ſince ſhe knew Murray and Morton had promiſed to ſcreen him: but it is not likely ſhe would have made ſuch a confeſſion to Elizabeth. Beſides, ſuppoſing that Mary's letter was ſuch as Camden repreſents it, ſhe does not name the earl of Murray. She only imputes to her enemies the crime ſhe herſelf was accuſed of. We ſhall ſee hereafter how ſhe maintained what ſhe had advanced, and after what manner ſhe made her defence.

Elizabeth, being informed the queen of Scots was in England after the loſs of a battle, ſent ſir Francis Knolles to comfort her, and ordered her to be lodged at a gentleman's houſe, where ſhe was treated as a queen. After that, ſhe was conducted to Carliſle[l]. Here Mary writes a ſecond letter, according to Camden, entreating her either to admit her to her preſence, or give her leave to depart elſewhere. Camden ſays, "That Elizabeth was touched with compaſſion[m], becauſe the queen of Scots offered to debate her cauſe before her, and engaged to prove her adverſaries guilty of the crime they unjuſtly loaded her with." But this hiſtorian ſtretches a little too far what Mary ſaid in her letter, ſince ſhe did not offer to prove her adverſaries guilty, as indeed ſhe never attempted it. There is not a ſingle word in Camden's Annals concerning the queen of Scots, but what muſt be guarded againſt. We are going to ſee Elizabeth's compaſſion for this queen. She ſent her word, that as ſhe ſtood charged by the voice of the public with being privy to the murder of the king her huſband, or at leaſt with not enquiring after the murderers, and with keeping ſtill in her ſervice, and in her very houſe, ſuch as were accuſed of being accomplices, ſhe could not ſee her till ſhe had cleared herſelf of ſo heinous an accuſation, and deſired to know in what manner ſhe intended to juſtify herſelf. Whereupon it was agreed, that Elizabeth ſhould hear her defence, and protect her if innocent. It is very probable, or rather certain, that herein Elizabeth intended only to gain time, and have a pretence to detain her till ſhe had determined what was to be done, which her council was at no ſmall loſs to know.

There was on this occaſion ſeveral ways to be taken, and each had its difficulties. But, as is very uſual in the councils of princes, the ſtar by which the miniſters and counſellors were guided, was not juſtice or equity, but the queen's ſafety. In much the ſame caſe Henry IV. ſtayed the king of Scotland's eldeſt ſon, who was afterwards king himſelf, under colour that he was come into his dominions without his leave, and that prince was detained till the reign of Henry VI. It cannot be denied, that a ſovereign has power to ſeize a foreign prince, who enters his territories without a ſafe conduct. But there are caſes wherein ſtrict right becomes the greateſt injuſtice. Such was that of Henry IV. with regard to the prince of Scotland: but, in Mary's caſe, the circumſtances appeared ſtill more favourable. It was a woman, vanquiſhed by her own ſubjects, whoſe violence ſhe feared, and who, far from being ſuſpected of any ill deſign againſt England, was come only for refuge, and to implore the protection of a queen, her near relation, who had always affected to give her marks of her friendſhip. So, to conſider the queen's fault only as a ſort of breach of the law of nations, ſhe did not deſerve to be detained in captivity. But, as I ſaid, it is not always by theſe maxims that ſovereigns are guided. The point in debate in the Engliſh council was, not to ſearch for what was moſt conſonant to juſtice or generoſity, but what was moſt advantageous[n]. The various courſes therefore which might be taken with reſpect to the queen of Scots were examined, in order to chuſe the moſt beneficial to Elizabeth. The firſt was to reſtore her to the throne, for an example, that ſubjects ſhall not expel their ſovereigns with impunity. But though this was what Elizabeth ſhould have done as a ſovereign, yet other more particular conſiderations hindered her from endeavouring to reſtore and render more powerful, a queen whom ſhe juſtly looked upon as a dangerous rival. For the ſame reaſon it was to be feared, if ſhe ſent her back to Scotland, though without ſuccours, her faction would revive; and one victory, which was not impoſſible, might render her abſolute. In that caſe ſhe might recal the French into Scotland, and purſue the execution of the projects formed in France in the reign of Francis II. her huſband. On the other hand, if ſhe were ſent over to France, there was no certainty that ſhe would not return to Scotland. Beſides, if the king of France and the princes of Lorrain were maſters of her perſon, it was very likely they would make uſe of her name to invade England, and the pope and king of Spain join with them. There was no way therefore but to keep her in England, either free or in priſon; but to leave her at liberty was running a manifeſt hazard. Her title to the crown of England would draw to her court all the catholics and diſaffected perſons in the kingdom, as well as the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, to aſſiſt her with their counſels. That if, being abſent, ſhe had been able to form a ſtrong party in England, how much more might her preſence render the ſame party more numerous and powerful. It is certain, though Elizabeth and her miniſters pretended to think it very ſtrange Mary ſhould claim the crown of England, they knew, however, the grounds of her title, and that many people were convinced it was even more lawful than the queen's. Finally, in detaining her in priſon, there was no queſtion Elizabeth would incur the indignation of all Europe by ſuch a ſeverity, the motives whereof would not be generally known. This was, however, the courſe which Elizabeth took, by the advice of her council, and, without doubt, by her own inclination. It is certain, beſides the reaſons of ſtate which induced her thereto, ſhe was alſo moved by a perſonal jealouſy of the queen of Scots, who was handſomer and younger than herſelf, though ſhe was very far behind her in other reſpects. However, to colour in ſome meaſure the rigour which was to be uſed to the queen, Elizabeth reſolved to appear extremely concerned for her misfortune, and very deſirous to be convinced of her innocence, that ſhe might afterwards give her a powerful aſſiſtance without fear of reproach: but, withal, ſhe took a reſolution to delay the methods to be uſed for that purpoſe, till time and opportunity ſhould afford room for other meaſures. From thenceforward ſhe conſtantly refuſed to hear thoſe who ſpoke againſt the queen of Scots; but then ſhe was not ſorry that divers accuſations were publicly ſpread againſt her, that it might not be thought ſtrange the affair could not be cleared in a ſhort time. So Camden had reaſon to ſay, Elizabeth ſeemed touched with a ſenſe of the queen of Scotland's misfortunes, and openly deteſted the behaviour of the Scots. But it does not follow, theſe were her real ſentiments. Her aim being only to prolong the affair, under colour of labouring the juſtification of her priſoner, it was not proper ſhe ſhould by her diſcourſe declare herſelf a party againſt her. She ought rather to ſhew ſhe inclined to her ſide. Mary herſelf was long deceived by this policy. She imagined Elizabeth really intended to ſerve her; but, diſcovering the artifice at laſt, ſhe reſolved to take ſuch meaſures as furniſhed her enemy with a plauſible pretence to detain her in priſon. I will venture to affirm, this is the true key of the affair, which will never be well underſtood, if we ſtand to what is ſaid by the hiſtorians of either ſide.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the earl of Murray called a parliament at Edinburgh, to get thoſe condemned who had taken up arms againſt the king in favour of the queen. The oppoſite faction, ſeeing they were like to be oppreſſed by the decree of the ſtates, uſed all their endeavours to prevent their aſſembling. They even demanded aid of the French, who reſolved to ſend an army into Scotland, under the conduct of Martigues. In the mean time, the queen's friends met at Glaſgow, to conſult how to hinder the ſeſſion of the parliament; but, as they could not agree, the earl of Argyle withdrew to his houſe. The earl of Huntley, more fiery than the reſt, aſſembled ſome troops, and poſted himſelf at Perth, to alarm the regent, till the arrival of the French ſuccours. But the civil war, which re-kindled in France, obliging the king to keep the forces deſigned for Scotland, the earl of Huntley was conſtrained to retire. This reſource failing, the queen's friends applied to Elizabeth, repreſenting to her, that the regent, by an unſeaſonable ſeſſion of a parliament, was going to drive the principal lords of Scotland to deſpair, and offered to take her for umpire of their differences with the regent. This offer was very grateful to Elizabeth, becauſe ſhe could thereby render herſelf miſtreſs of the affair, and prolong it as ſhe pleaſed. She therefore let Murray know, he would oblige her in deferring the parliament till ſhe was better informed of the reaſons which had induced the Scots to deprive their queen of the government of the kingdom. But he deſired to be excuſed, and held the parliament on the day appointed. Buchanan pretends, Lidington, who feigned to be attached to the regent, managed it ſo by his intrigues, that the ſtates reſolved to puniſh only ſome of the moſt guilty, and that this indulgence was a great means to ſtrengthen the queen's party. The parliament breaking up, the regent raiſed an army to purſue thoſe who were condemned. He reduced ſeveral places to the obedience of the king, and very probably would have over-run the whole kingdom, if the court of England had not interrupted the execution of his deſigns.

Elizabeth found ſo great an advantage in becoming umpire of the affairs of Scotland, that ſhe took care not to loſe the preſent opportunity without improving it. To compaſs her ends the more eaſily, ſhe plainly intimated, that ſhe believed the queen of Scots innocent; that ſhe herſelf was concerned in the quarrel, which all ſovereigns ought to eſpouſe; and that it was their intereſt to chaſtiſe rebellious ſubjects, who might give a dangerous example to others. In a word, ſhe ſo artfully diſguiſed her ſentiments, that the Scotch queen's friends, blinded by theſe appearances, perſuaded the unfortunate queen to offer to appoint commiſſioners to defend her cauſe before Elizabeth, and ſo fell into the ſnare Elizabeth had laid for her. She had no ſooner made this imprudent offer, but Elizabeth wrote to the earl of Murray, that the proceedings of the Scots in depoſing their queen, were ſo extraordinary, that ſhe could not approve them, unleſs they ſhewed, by very good reaſons, that they could not have done otherwiſe. That if their queen were innocent, ſhe thought herſelf bound by all ſorts of conſiderations to protect her, and reſtore her to the throne; but was willing, before ſhe came to any reſolution, to hear what they had to ſay in vindication of their conduct. That therefore ſhe deſired the regent would ſend ſome well-informed perſons to York, where ſhe would order commiſſioners to hear what the Scots had to allege againſt their queen. That it was neceſſary he ſhould in perſon clear himſelf of the crimes he was accuſed of. In ſhort, ſhe gave him to underſtand, ſhe ſhould take his refuſal as an authentic proof of Mary's innocence. Elizabeth muſt have talked very high, to oblige the regent to take ſo extraordinary a ſtep. Beſides, it was no leſs neceſſary to keep by that means the queen of Scots in the belief, that Elizabeth ſought only to cauſe her to come off honourably, for fear ſhe ſhould revoke the conſent ſhe had given. Elizabeth's real aim was to have a pretence to detain the queen of Scots till the affair ſhould be cleared, well knowing ſhe ſhould not want means to prolong it as ſhe pleaſed. Beſides, how much ſoever ſhe pretended not to be fully informed, ſhe knew enough to judge that the Scots would bring good evidence againſt Mary, and thereby furniſh her with a very natural excuſe to require a farther examination. All this was extremely agreeable to the ſcheme ſhe had laid, and afforded her means to ſilence the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, who preſſed her continually in behalf of the captive queen. She told them, ſhe intended to aſſiſt Mary with all her forces, and reſtore her to her former dignity; but that decency required the queen ſhould firſt be cleared, in the eyes of the public, of the crime ſhe was charged with, and that all poſſible expedition was uſing to make her innocence appear.

The earl of Murray was very much at a loſs what anſwer he ſhould return to Elizabeth's ſummons. It was dangerous for a regent of Scotland to put to arbitration an affair already decided by the parliament, and diſhonourable to anſwer before a foreign power. But, on the other hand, he could ſupport himſelf only by the aſſiſtance of England; how much leſs, if Elizabeth ſhould reſolve to reſtore Mary to the throne? Beſides, he was afraid his refuſal would be conſtrued as a ſign he miſtruſted the juſtice of his cauſe. So, after conſulting his friends upon ſo nice a point, he reſolved to go himſelf to York with eleven deputies, who were appointed to aſſiſt him [o]. Theſe were, James Douglas, earl of Morton; Adam, biſhop of Orkney; Robert, commendator of Dumferling; and Patrick, lord Lindſay. Mary nominated the lords, Herris, Levingſton, Boyd; Gavin, commendator of Kylwyning; John Gordon, of Locheinvarr; James Cockburne, of Skirling, knt. and the biſhop of Roſs. Elizabeth commiſſioned Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk; Thomas Ratcliff, earl of Suſſex; and ſir Ralph Sadler [p], to hear what both parties had to ſay, whether for or againſt. All theſe lords came to York on the ſame day, the 4th of October.

In order to underſtand fully what paſſed at the conference of York, and at another afterwards at Hampton-court, it will be neceſſary to know what is ſaid upon the occaſion in Melvil's Memoirs. Without this key, there is no comprehending any thing by Buchanan's account, and ſtill leſs by Camden's, who endeavoured rather to darken than clear the affair. What Melvil relates is a ſecret, equally unknown to Buchanan and Camden.

Very likely the duke of Norfork, who had loſt his dutcheſs laſt year, had now formed the project of marrying the queen of Scots, before he repaired to York. At leaſt it may be affirmed, the duke was Mary's principal friend in England. For which reaſon he accepted the commiſſion of preſiding at the York conference, only to hinder the ſucceſs Elizabeth expected, and to break her meaſures. However ſecret the queen's project was, the duke of Norfolk, it ſeems, had entire knowledge of it; courtiers having uſually a wonderful ſagacity to diſcover what the prince would keep moſt private. Nay, it is ſaid, he had ordered the earl of Weſtmoreland, his lieutenant in the preſidentſhip of the north, to kill the earl of Murray when he came upon the borders, and ſeize all his papers, in order to deſtroy the proofs he was bringing againſt the queen of Scots, but altering his mind, had revoked the order. In the beginning of the conference, he ſtarted ſeveral incidents to retard the concluſion of the affair in debate. But at laſt, perceiving all his endeavours would avail only for a delay of a few days, he opened his mind to Lidington, who, though ſuſpected by all the king's party, had attended the regent as deputy and ſecretary of ſtate. The duke told this lord, that he could not imagine what had induced the Scots to come and accuſe their queen before Engliſh commiſſioners; that they greatly diſhonoured their nation, and would one day be reſponſible for it. Lidington replied, he was very glad to find him of this opinion; that for his part he had done his utmoſt to hinder the regent from taking this ſtep; that Kircaldie had done the ſame, but to no purpoſe: and if he had accompanied the regent, it was only in hopes to ſucceed better in England, and deſired him to talk with the regent, and to try to diſſuade him from accuſing the queen. The duke of Norfolk knowing by this, the earl of Murray's proceedings were not approved by all his party, and that even remonſtrances had been made to him upon this occaſion, hoped by ſpeaking to him himſelf to prevail with him in ſome meaſure. He talked with him therefore in private, and repreſenting to him what he had before ſaid to Lidington, added, he was much miſtaken, if he imagined Elizabeth intended to give ſentence upon the difference he and his party had with the queen of Scots; but that her ſole aim was to make them ſubſervient to her own ends: that if he deſired to be convinced of this, he had only to require a promiſe under her own hand to give ſentence as ſoon as the proofs ſhould be produced, and to ſupport the king of Scotland's party, in caſe the queen his mother was found guilty. He added, the queen would never give any ſuch promiſe in writing, and thereby demonſtrate ſhe ſought only to amuſe them. In ſhort, he ſo managed the regent, that before they parted, they agreed, that when he was called upon to produce his evidences, he ſhould demand a previous engagement from the queen, ſuch as the duke had ſuggeſted to him. The earl of Murray imparted this agreement to none but Lidington and ſir James Melvil, who liked it extremely [q].

At the next meeting, the regent being preſſed to give in his proofs againſt the queen of Scots, replied as he had agreed with the duke of Norfolk, to the great ſurpriſe of the hearers, except thoſe who were in the ſecret. It was reſolved therefore to write to the queen, to inform her of this new and unexpected difficulty, and to know whether ſhe would give the regent of Scotland the engagement he demaned. Her anſwer was, ſhe thought it very ſtrange her word could not be taken, but that a writing under her own hand ſhould be required; and prayed the earl of Murray to ſend two deputies to acquaint her with his reaſons. The regent choſe for this purpoſe Lidington[r], and Macgil, to the great amazement of the reſt of the deputies, who could not conceive that he ſhould truſt with ſuch a commiſſion ſecretary Lidington, of whom the whole party were ſo jealous.

Shortly after, the queen deſired the regent to come himſelf to London with the other deputies[s], to which he conſented. When they were arrived, ſhe appointed other commiſſioners to confer with them, namely, ſir Nicholas Bacon, Cecil, the earl of Leiceſter, the lord high-admiral [t], and ſir William Sadler [u]. Probably, ſhe ſuſpected the duke of Norfolk of ſome prevarication, and this ſuſpicion was not groundleſs. She earneſtly wiſhed, upon ſeveral accounts, to have in her hands the proofs intended to be uſed in ſupport of the accuſation againſt the queen of Scots. Firſt, to ſilence ſuch as murmured at her not endeavouring to reſtore that princeſs. And indeed it was manifeſt, if Mary were guilty of the crime laid to her charge, ſhe was unworthy of her protection. Secondly, having theſe proofs in her power, ſhe would not only have the management of the affair, but might alſo cauſe all delays to be conſidered as ſo many favours to Mary, who, in all appearance, would not dare to preſs her to give ſentence. Spite and jealouſy might poſſibly be a third reaſon, Elizabeth being ſecretly pleaſed with her rival's ſhame. In the firſt conference at Hampton court, the Engliſh commiſſioners were very urgent with the earl of Murray, to give in his proofs againſt the queen of Scots. He anſwered, it was with extreme reluctance that he could reſolve to accuſe the queen his ſiſter, and ſhould never proceed to that extremity, unleſs it were for the real good and welfare of all Scotland: that therefore he required the queen of England's written promiſe, to protect the king, in caſe the queen his mother were found guilty.

The affair ſtanding thus, and the earl of Murray ſtill perſiſting in his demand, the earl of Morton happened to be informed of his agreement with the duke of Norfolk, by ſome one whom Mary had truſted with the ſecret [w]. Then it was, Morton came to know the true motive of the regent's conduct, which hitherto ſeemed to him incomprehenſible, ſince he refuſed to accuſe the queen, though he was come into England for that very purpoſe. He imparted the ſecret to ſome of his colleagues, and they reſolved to acquaint ſecretary Cecil with it. What paſſed afterwards between Cecil and the earl of Murray is not known; but it may be conjectured by what followed, that Murray ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed with to act quite contrary to his engagement with the duke of Norfolk.

At the firſt meeting after this diſcovery, the Engliſh commiſſioners demanding that the proofs againſt the queen ſhould be given in, and the regent refuſing it, all the Scots, except Lidington, were for producing them. Then Wood, ſecretary to the regent, pretending a zeal for his maſter, ſaid, it was not from a ſpirit of cavil, as ſome thought, that the regent would not give in the accuſation, but becauſe the queen of England refuſed the promiſe required: that this promiſe benig given, he would immediately deliver the accuſation and proofs which he had all ready; and with that, he took the papers out of his boſom, and ſhewed them to every body. But whilſt he was holding them up, the biſhop of Orkney eaſily ſnatched them out of his hand, and gave them to the Engliſh commiſſioners. It is evident, Murray had been gained by Elizabeth's miniſters, and took this method only to ſave in ſome manner his promiſe to the duke of Norfolk. With this key it will be eaſy to underſtand what Buchanan and Camden ſay about the York conferences, which I ſhall but juſt mention, becauſe as theſe two hiſtorians, were ignorant of the duke of Norfolk's ſecret intentions, and the motives of the regent's conduct, what they have related cannot be of much ſervice towards clearing this part of the hiſtory.

At the York conferences, Mary's deputies were heard firſt. They proteſted [y], that the preſent proceeding ſhould not be prejudicial to the rights of Scotland, ſince queen Elizabeth had no power to meddle with the affairs of that kingdom. Then they ſet forth at large the injuries received by the queen of Scots from her own ſubjects, and craved Elizabeth's aſſiſtance to recover her throne. The earl of Murray anſwered, That Bothwell was author of the king's murder: That he carried away the queen with her own conſent, and publicly married her: That afterwards ſhe reſigned the crown to the prince her ſon: That the reſignation was confirmed by the ſtates, and it was not in his power to alter what the ſtates had ratified. Mary's deputies replied, That the queen's mrrriage with Bothwell was not a ſufficient reaſon to depoſe her, becauſe Bothwell was legally acquitted: That beſides, it was manifeſt, Bothwell was only a pretence uſed by the rebels to act againſt the queen, ſince they might have taken him if they had pleaſed; but they let him eſcape, becauſe the queen alone was what they aimed at. Then they made appear, that the reſignation of the crown was extorted by force, ſince it was not in the queen's power to refuſe it.

Both parties being heard upon theſe general points, the Engliſh commiſſioners declared, they could not admit of the proteſtation againſt the queen's being a competent judge, by reaſon of her right of ſovereignty over the kingdom of Scotland. As to the regent's anſwer, they ſaid, the queen having commiſſioned them to hear what the deputies of Scotland had to ſay againſt their queen, they could not allow the determination of the ſtates to be valid, becauſe the queſtion was to know, whether they had juſt grounds to determine in the manner they had done, which could not be known till the reaſons, on which their determination was built, were examined. Then they appointed the 7th of October to examine the proofs.

At the ſame meeting [z], the duke of Norfolk, who ſought only to gain time, required that the regent ſhould do homage to the queen for the kingdom of Scotland. But Lidington anſwered for him, and affirmed, the kingdom of Scotland owed no homage to England; that if the kings of Scotland had formerly done any, it was only for the earldom of Huntington and ſome other lands, which were ſince fallen into the hands of the Engliſh [a].

Between this and the next meeting, on the 7th of October, it was that the earl of Murray made the forementioned agreement with the duke of Norfolk. Lidington opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech directed to the regent and deputies of Scotland, telling them, "That whereas it appeared, by the authority granted by the queen of England to her commiſſioners, that her whole deſign was to engage the Scots to throw a blemiſh on the reputation of their king's mother, they would therefore do well to conſider carefully beforehand what hazard they expoſed themſelves to, and how they would draw upon themſelves the reſentment of the queen, her relations, and friends, and the indignation of all Europe, ſhould they impeach her of a crime which muſt ſtain her honour, and in ſo public a manner, before the Engliſh, the profeſſed enemies of Scotland: what account would they be able to give their king when he came of age, of a charge ſo bold and diſhonourable to the king, to his mother, and to the whole nation? He therefore, for his part, thought it neceſſary to wave ſo ſcandalous an accuſation; or if they would proceed, it was requiſite, at leaſt, that the queen of England ſhould expreſly engage to defend them againſt ſuch as ſhould hereafter give them any diſturbance upon this account." He concluded with ſaying, "That he thought it his duty to give them this advice, as he was ſecretary of Scotland."

It is eaſy to perceive, that the drift of this ſpeech was to give the regent an excuſe to drop the accuſation, according to his agreement with the duke of Norfolk. He was come from Scotland on purpoſe to accuſe the queen, being provided with all the proofs he intended to uſe: but the duke of Norfolk's ſuggeſtion, had altered his mind. It was neceſſary therefore to find a pretence for this change, and this pretence Lidington furniſhed him with, by laying before him ſuch plauſible reaſons. Camden and Buchanan were at a loſs for the reaſon of the earl of Murray's ſudden change. Camden would inſinuate, that the engagement he demanded of Elizabeth was only a cavil, to hide his miſtruſt of the juſtice of his cauſe. He ſays, the Engliſh commiſſioners preſſed him very much to give proofs of the accuſation, which as yet appeared to be founded only upon a few letters from the queen, ſo much the more ſuſpicious, as Lidington had privately intimated, he himſelf had often counterfeited her hand. But I believe Camden would have been puzzled to prove, that any of the articles of the accuſation were examined at York. Buchanan, who knew as little of the ſecret as Camden, though he was one of the Scotch deputies [b], pretends, the regent, purely out of conſcience, ſcrupled to accuſe his ſiſter before foreigners.

[q] And in the preſence of Lidington, it was agreed, between the regent and the duke of Norfolk, that the regent ſhould in no way accuſe queen Mary; and that the duke ſhould obtain to him the queen's favour, with a confirmation of the regency. Melvil, p. 95.

[r] Rapin, by miſtake, calls him all along earl of Lidington, whereas he was but laird Lidington.

The York conference breaking off, and being, as I ſaid, removed to Hampton-court, before new commiſſioners, the regent, or Wood his ſecretary, ſuffered the accuſation, with the proofs, to be ſnatched out of his hand. Which done, a day was appointed for the Scots to enlarge upon their proofs. The regent agreed to it, and demanded that Mary's deputies ſhould be preſent, that they might urge their objections, and matters be more fully cleared [d]. But when the day came, Mary's deputies produced a formal revocation of their commiſſion, and an exception againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners unleſs the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors were joined with them. Mary demanded farther, that the earl of Murray ſhould be ſent to priſon, affirming, ſhe could convict him of being author of the king's murder.

This revocation, juſt at the critical time, when the proofs againſt Mary were going to be examined, gave occaſion to ſuſpect, ſhe thought herſelf unable to anſwer to the purpoſe. Whilſt ſhe was made to hope that matters would not come to the producing and examining the proofs, ſhe had left a full power with her deputies. But as ſoon as ſhe found Elizabeth, inſtead of ſerving her as ſhe expected, ſought to bring to light what was capable of diſhonouring her, ſhe believed it abſolutely neceſſary to avoid ſuch an examination. For that reaſon, ſhe revoked the commiſſion to her deputies, excepted againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, and required an impoſſible condition, knowing the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors would not receive a commiſſion from Elizabeth, and that the queen would not ſuffer them to be concerned in the affair. In ſhort, ſhe did not offer to prove the earl of Murray guilty of the king's death, till ſhe had revoked the power of thoſe who were to have accuſed him in her name. All theſe things give occaſion to believe, ſhe dreaded the event of this examination, though by her letters to Elizabeth, it ſhould ſeem, ſhe moſt earneſtly deſired to have an opportunity to make her innocence appear before her.

Elizabeth did not much trouble herſelf about theſe acts. Her deſign was not to judge the queen of Scots, but to draw from her accuſation and the proofs, a pretence to detain her till the affair ſhould be fully cleared, being reſolved never to think it ſufficiently explained either for or againſt, but to teſtify however ſhe ſhould be very glad to find her innocent. I ſay only to teſtify, for certainty ſhe was pleaſed to have in her hands proper proofs to ſhew, upon occaſion, that ſhe could not juſtify her. She acted this part a good while.

In fine, though Mary had excepted againſt the Engliſh commiſſioners, they proceeded however to the examination of the proofs. The earl of Murray produced the confeſſions of thoſe who were executed for being concerned in the king's murder. Then he read the decree of the ſtates, confirming the queen's reſignation of the crown to the king her ſon. After which, he produced the fatal caſket, which Bothwell would have taken from the caſtle of Edinburgh, and ſhewed the letters, verſes, and contracts, before mentioned. This is what Buchanan, who was preſent, atteſts [e]. But Camden, without deſcending to any particulars, contents himſelf with ſaying, "The earl of Murray endeavoured to prove her guilty of her huſband's murder, by conjectural proofs and circumſtances, by ſome few affidavits, by certain love-letters and verſes wrote, as he affirmed, with the queen's own hand. But theſe letters and verſes were little regarded, there being no name or date to them."

Buchanan's Hiſtory was publiſhed when Camden wrote his Annals. The firſt atteſts, that in the caſket were found letters containing the whole conſpiracy againſt the king, and the queen's rape, beſides the contracts. Camden inſiſts upon ſome letters and verſes, and even inſinuates they were forged. Had he wrote firſt, he might have ſuppoſed his aſſertions would not be queſtioned. But as he wrote forty years after Buchanan, he ought, in my opinion, either to have poſitively denied or explained the facts related by that hiſtorian. And therefore, as he does not confute them, it is plain he had nothing material to object to them. He farther adds, Murray gave the commiſſioners a book of Buchanan's, entitled, The Detection, wherein was a particular account of the king's death, with the vouchers: but that it found little credit with the commiſſioners, "becauſe the author was a mercenary writer." As to the confeſſions of thoſe that were put to death, he ſays in another place, that all declared the queen innocent with their laſt breath. Here he owns, the depoſitions of theſe ſame people were produced againſt her, but anſwers them not. He adds however, that Elizabeth was very well pleaſed that theſe accuſations had ſullied the queen of Scots reputation [f]. But if the commiſſioners gave no credit to the proofs of the accuſers, as he would inſinuate, Mary's reputation could not be ſullied, but on the contrary, ſhe would have been fully cleared [g].

The examination being ended, Elizabeth forbore to decide either for or againſt, as ſhe had reſolved. Mean while, as Mary's friends were endeavouring to raiſe troubles in Scotland, and the regent's preſence was neceſſary, Elizabeth took occaſion to defer the concluſion of the affair till a more convenient time. Thus ſhe obtained her deſires, that is, a pretence to detain Mary till the affair was more fully cleared, and withal, proofs which would very probably hinder the queen and her friends from ſolliciting a deciſion. Buchanan affirms, ſhe cauſed the Scotch deputies to be told, that thus far ſhe did not ſee any thing blameable in the conduct of the Scots. Camden ſays, on the contrary, ſhe abhorred their inſolence. Melvil adds, ſhe acquainted Mary, that ſhe believed her wrongfully accuſed, and could not enough deteſt the inſolence of her accuſers; nor ſhould the accuſation be ever made public. The difference between Camden and Melvil is, that Melvil relates this only to ſhew to what height Elizabeth carried her diſſimulation; but Camden pretends to infer from thence, ſhe believed her innocent. After all, the accounts of theſe three authors may be equally true, becauſe Elizabeth's ſcheme was to leave the affair undetermined, and put both parties in hopes of her favour. Buchanan ſays, before the conference ended, Murray offered to clear himſelf of the king's murder before Mary's deputies, but that they thought proper to drop their accuſation [h]. They could hardly do otherwiſe, for though they might have hoped to convict him, their commiſſion was revoked.

[b] He was only one of thoſe that accompanied them. See p. 312.

[c] The conference was held at Weſtminſter, November 25, 26, 29, 30, December 1, 6, 8, 9; and at Hampton-court, December 3, 14, 15, 16. See a full and curious account of it in Anderſon's Collect. tom. II. part 2, p. 101, &c.

[d] On November 6, the accuſation againſt queen Mary was produced; and indeed it was very home and expreſs. "It is certain, and we boldly and conſtantly affirm (ſays the regent, and the reſt of the deputies), that as James, ſome time earl of Bothwell, was the chief executor of the horrible and unworthy murder, perpetrate in the perſon of the late king Henry of good memory, father to our ſovereign lord, and the queen's lawful huſband; ſo was ſhe of the foreknowledge, counſel, device, perſuader, and commander of the ſaid murder to be done, maintainer and fortifier of the executors thereof, by impeding and ſtopping of the inquiſition and puniſhment due for the ſame, according to the laws of the realm, and conſequently by marriage with the ſaid James, ſometimes earl of Bothwell, univerſally eſteemed chief author of the abovenamed murder." To this the queen's commiſſioners replied, by charging that accuſation with falſhood; by aſſerting, that ſome of the accuſers were privy to, nay, the firſt inventors of the conſpiracy for the death of the late king, as was made manifeſt before ten thouſand people at the execution of ſome of the principal offenders; and laſtly, by refuſing to proceed, unleſs queen Mary was admitted to anſwer for herſelf. See Anderſon's Collect. tom. IV. part 2, p. 126, 127, 129, 130, 145, &c.

[f] Melvil ſays, that Elizabeth was very well ſatisfied with the advantage ſhe thereby received, Firſt, ſhe thought ſhe had matter to ſhew, wherefore ſhe detained the queen, when ſhe was challenged by the foreign embaſſadors. Then ſhe was glad of the queen's diſhonour. She alſo ſent immediately to the queen to comfort her, praying her to look on herſelf in a better caſe, though for a while reſtrained of her liberty, than to be in Scotland, among ſo unworthy ſubjects, who had accuſed her falſely and wrongfully, as ſhe was aſſured; that ſhe would neither be judge, nor give out any ſentence thereupon, nor ſhould any part of the ſaid falſe accuſations be made known by her, or her council, to any. [h] According to Buchanan, they were compelled ſingly and ſeverally to confeſs, that they knew nothing of themſelves, why Murray, or any of his, ſhould be accuſed of the king's murder, lib. 19.

She

Though, according to Melvil, Elizabeth ſaid ſhe would not ſee the earl of Murray any more, ſhe had however ſeveral private conferences with him. In theſe conferences it was, that he informed her of all that had paſſed between him and the duke of Norfolk [i], and ſhewed her letters from Mary, which had been intercepted in Scotland, wherein ſhe complained, in very harſh terms, of the treatment ſhe received ſince her coming to England. Moreover, ſhe hinted to her friends, that they ſhould not be diſcouraged at what had paſſed at York and Hampton-court, and that ſhe expected a powerful aid from a certain place which ſhe would not name. Theſe letters, added to what was diſcovered at the ſame time, that the pope was labouring to raiſe a rebellion in England, by means of Ridolfi a Florentine merchant, and to Lidington's frequent conferences with the duke of Norfolk [k], who was become very ſuſpected, obliged Elizabeth to order the queen of Scots to be removed to Tutbury-caſtle [l].

The duke of Norfolk was ſo exaſperated againſt the earl of Murray, that he had reſolved to have him murdered in his return to Scotland. But Throckmorton having reconciled them, the duke deſiſted from his deſign. Melvil affirms, Murray promiſed Elizabeth to ſend her the letters the duke ſhould write to him, and that he performed his promiſe [m].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the French court was thinking of executing their deſign of carrring away by force the prince of Condé from his houſe at Noyers. The peace granted to the Hugonots was only to amuſe them. Happily for the prince, he had notice of it time enough to eſcape to Rochelle. This ſtratagem failing, the perſecution againſt the Hugonots was renewed with greater fury than ever. The king forbid them the exerciſe of their religion, and baniſhed all their miniſters. Whereupon they ſued for aid to Elizabeth, who ſent them a hundred thouſand crowns of gold, with a good train of artillery. She ſaw plainly this was a conſequence of the councils held at Bayonne, and that if ſhe ſuffered the Hugonots to be oppreſſed, the flames would ſoon reach England. What confirmed her in this opinion was, that the duke of Alva proceeded in the ſame manner in the Low Countries, and plainly ſhewed, he intended utterly to deſtroy the proteſtant religion in theſe provinces, and make the king abſolute. The prince of Orange had brought an army from Germany to try to ſtop the execution of this deſign; but for want of money to pay it, was forced to retire among the Hugonots of France. This accident compelling many Flemiſh families to fly to England for refuge, the queen gave them leave to ſettle in ſeveral good towns, where they contributed very much to cauſe trade to flouriſh [n].

About the cloſe of the year an accident happened, which occaſioned a quarrel between the queen, the king of Spain, and the duke of Alva. The Genoa merchants, and ſome others of Italy, having a great ſum of money in Spain, and reſolving to ſend it into the Low Countries [o], obtained a paſſport of the king of Spain, and put the money on board ſome veſſels of Biſcay. Theſe ſhips being attacked in their paſſage by French pyrates, did with great difficulty eſcape into Plymouth, Falmouth, and Southampton. As ſoon as the queen had notice of it, ſhe ordered the magiſtrates of thoſe places to treat the Spaniards civilly, and aſſiſt them in caſe the pyrates attempted any thing againſt them. The Spaniſh embaſſador telling her the money belonged to the king his maſter, obtained leave to have it landed. His deſign was to carry it by land to ſome port nearer the Low Countries. But, at the ſame time, cardinal de Chatillon, who was then in England [p], informed the queen that the money belonged to ſome merchants, and that the duke of Alva was to ſeize it to help him to carry on the war. This was alſo confirmed by other people. So, to deprive the duke of Alva of this ſupply, ſhe took the money by way of loan, and gave ſecurity for the payment. Some time after, the duke of Alva demanding the money, the queen replied, ſhe would punctually return it, as ſoon as it appeared by good proofs that it was the king of Spain's. Upon this refuſal, the duke ſeized the effects of the Engliſh, and ſent the owners to priſon; and the queen did the like by the Flemings. A few days after, ſhe iſſued out a proclamation upon the occaſion, which the Spaniſh embaſſador anſwered in print. But this did not ſatisfy him; he diſperſed very inſolent libels, containing grating reflections upon the queen's reputation [q]. For this he was kept under a guard for a day or two. The queen complained to the king of Spain of his embaſſador's inſolence; but could obtain no ſatisfaction [r].

[1569] This difference between the queen and Philip II. was quickly followed by a diſturbance at court. Among all Elizabeth's miniſters and counſellors, there was not one ſo heartily attached to his miſtreſs's intereſt as Cecil, who was ſecretary of ſtate. All the reſt had their private views, to which they ſtrove to adapt the queen's and the nation's intereſts. But Cecil minded only the queen's, and was in great favour with her. Therefore to him chiefly ſhe imparted her moſt ſecret thoughts, with reſpect to the government of the ſtate. Several privy counſellors were engaged in the queen of Scots party; that is, they wiſhed the crown of England was ſecured to her, in caſe Elizabeth died without iſſue. They were of opinion, it was a thing agreeable to equity, juſtice, and the laws of the land; and pretended it was the only way to prevent the troubles which might happen after the queen's deceaſe. But Elizabeth thought, that when they conſidered the public advantages, they did not ſufficiently attend to her ſafety. Mary did not pretend only to be Elizabeth's preſumptive heir: it was well known her pretenſions reached much farther, and that many were perſuaded her title was preferable to the queen's. If therefore ſhe was appointed Elizabeth's ſucceſſor, it could be only in virtue of her birthright, and not in conſequence of Henry VIII's will, where ſhe was not ſo much as named, whereas many thought Elizabeth derived her title ſolely from thence. So, in taking this courſe, the titles of the two queens would have been put in oppoſition, very much to Elizabeth's diſadvantage. Conſequently her fear was, this nomination would encreaſe the number of Mary's friends, and in the end endeavours would be uſed to ſet her on the throne before the time appointed. All who were diſpleaſed with the government thought the nation would get by the change. The catholics heartily wiſhed it, and amongſt the proteſtants themſelves, there where many to whom it was indifferent which queen was on the throne, becauſe they made no great conſcience of conforming to all the changes which might be made in religion, as was the caſe more than once. It was therefore of great moment to Elizabeth to hinder Mary from being nominated to ſucceed her. So, ſhe could not but have a great regard for thoſe whom ſhe ſaw ſincerely attached to her private intereſt. Among theſe Cecil was the chief, and it was he alſo whom Mary's friends conſidered as her moſt dangerous enemy, and the rather, as he had frequently ſhewn his inclination to the houſe of Suffolk, before the death of the ducheſs of that name. This was the real motive of a plot laid in the beginning of the year 1569, to ruin that miniſter. The duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earls of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Arundel, Pembroke, Leiceſter, and others [s], entered this ſort of conſpiracy. They accuſed Cecil of being the cauſe of the queen's detaining the Spaniſh money, and by that of her running a manifeſt riſk of a war with Spain, which could not but be very prejudicial to trade. They flattered themſelves, that upon this charge the queen would ſend the ſecretary to priſon, and then they made no queſtion they ſhould find ways enough to effect his ruin. But the queen, being too quick-ſighted not to ſee into their aim and the motive of their plot, commanded them ſilence, in ſuch a manner as deſtroyed all their hopes of ſucceſs, either then or for the future. We ſhall ſee preſently with what view they projected to deprive the queen of this miniſter

The ſudden quarrel between the queen and the king of Spain, obliging the Engliſh merchants to ſend their effects to Hamburgh, the duke of Alva prohibited all commerce with England. Then he appointed certain ſpies in all the ſea ports, to give him information of thoſe that acted contrary to the prohibition. Of this number was one Story, an Engliſh Roman catholic, who was very buſy in diſcovering the private trade ſtill driven by ſeveral perſons with the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the prohibition: but his diligence coſt him dear[t]. Some time after, being drawn on board a veſſel, which he was told had brought over Engliſh goods and heretical books, he was carried to England, where he languiſhed in priſon ſome years, and at laſt was condemned to die.

The Engliſh merchants met with no better treatment in Spain than in the Netherlands. Philip ordered all their effects to be ſeized, by way of repriſals, for the money ſtopped in England. But this did not ſatisfy him. To be more fully revenged of Elizabeth, he endeavoured to bribe the duke of Norfolk to raiſe a rebellion in England, and the earl of Ormond to do the ſame in Ireland; but theſe two lords diſcovered it to the queen. On the other hand, though there was no war proclaimed between England and Spain, the Engliſh, on pretence of the injury done to their countrymen, fell upon all the merchant-ſhips belonging to the Spaniards. They did ſo much damage to Philip's ſubjects, by theſe continual cruiſings, that the queen, fearing to be involved in a formal war, was forced to reſtrain them by proclamation.

Whilſt the Engliſh trade ſuffered in Spain and the Netherlands, it was like to be quite loſt in Muſcovy, by the avarice of the Engliſh merchants, who had angered the czar. But the queen ſpeedily ſent thither ſir Thomas Randolph, who ſo managed the czar, that he obtained divers privileges for the Ruſſia company[u]. Shortly after, the czar ſent an embaſſador to the queen, to offer a perſonal alliance. Though it was no great honour to be allied with a prince ſo notorious for his cruelties, ſhe thought proper, however, for the benefit of her ſubjects, to make a treaty with him, mutually promiſing to afford one another refuge, in caſe either ſhould be dethroned.

Whilſt Elizabeth was treating with the Ruſſian embaſſador, plots were forming in England, which might have proved fatal to her, had they not been prevented. Some of the queen of Scots chief friends, the ſame who would have deſtroyed Cecil, had projected to marry her to the duke of Norfolk. The earl of Leiceſter himſelf was in the plot; but in all appearance it was only to be let into the ſecret, and diſcover every thing to the queen. It is hardly to be doubted, that they who undertook this affair were ſet to work by the duke of Norfolk, though he let his friends proceed, without appearing in it himſelf. The occaſion or pretence of the project was this: It was ſaid, Elizabeth intending never to marry, the queen of Scotland might happen to eſpouſe a foreign prince and a papiſt, in which caſe the proteſtant religion would be liable to great danger, ſince it was not impoſſible that the young king, her ſon, ſhould die before her. It was therefore neceſſary to think betimes of marrying Mary to a proteſtant huſband, that ſhe might be reſtrained, in caſe ſhe ſhould attempt any thing againſt religion when ſhe came to the crown of England. It was ſaid further, no Engliſh lord was more worthy of this honour than the duke of Norfolk, who was a ſincere proteſtant. But, to curb the duke's ambition, in caſe he ſhould think of carrying it too far, it was reſolved, he ſhould give his daughter in marriage to the king of Scotland, that he might be concerned in the young prince's preſervation. Such was the project, which did not ſeem to have any thing criminal, eſpecially as it was agreed, it ſhould not be executed without the queen's approbation. But, very probably, the managers of this affair had farther views. For, if they intended only the good and welfare of the kingdom, why did they deſire to hide their deſigns from the queen, till they had ſo well taken their meaſures, that it ſhould be impoſſible for her to hinder the execution? But however, without ſtaying to examine whether it was the earl of Murray that firſt inſpired the duke of Norfolk with the thoughts of this marriage, as Camden affirms, contrary to all appearance[w], the queen of Scots was informed of the project by the biſhop of Roſs, who was very diligent in all her concerns. At the ſame time, ſhe was promiſed to be reſtored to the throne of Scotland, and declared preſumptive heir to Elizabeth, on the following terms:

That as to the ſucceſſion to the crown of England, ſhe ſhould attempt nothing to the prejudice of queen Elizabeth and her iſſue.

That ſhe ſhould conſent to a league, offenſive and defenſive, between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.

That ſhe ſhould confirm the eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant religion in Scotland.

That ſhe ſhould pardon ſuch of her ſubjects as had acted or appeared in arms againſt her.

That ſhe ſhould revoke the aſſignment of her right to the kingdom of England, which ſhe had made to the duke of Anjou, the king of France's brother.

That ſhe ſhould marry the duke of Norfolk.

Mary very readily accepted the offer, with the conditions annexed, all but the league, which ſhe ſcrupled at a little, becauſe ſhe was willing, before ſhe entered into it, to conſult the French king. She denied ſhe had made any aſſignment to the duke of Anjou, and yet offered to procure his renunciation, if required, for the greater ſecurity.

It is eaſy to perceive the propoſers of theſe terms had taken great care to ſcreen themſelves from the law, ſince they ſeemed very juſt in themſelves, and advantageous to both kingdoms. But they ſuppoſed the reſtoration of Mary to the throne of Scotland, and her nomination to ſucceed to the crown of England. This was to be done firſt, and then the execution of what ſhe promiſed on her part, was left to her honour. It was in this the artifice conſiſted.

As ſoon as Mary's conſent was gained, ſeveral lords and gentlemen were ſounded, who, not perceiving the venom of the project, approved it, but with this proviſo, that nothing ſhould be done without the queen's conſent. It was alſo communicated to the kings of France and Spain, who were very well pleaſed with it, though it be evident, they would have had no reaſon to be ſo, if they had believed the conditions would be punctually performed. The proceedings of thoſe who had framed ſuch a project, without conſulting the queen, plainly ſhew their deſign was to put the affair in ſuch a ſtate, that it ſhould not be in her power to hinder the execution, when propoſed to her. The duke of Norfolk thought himſelf ſo ſecure of ſucceſs, that the earl of Northumberland having acquainted him that Leonard Dacres intended to carry away the queen of Scots[x], he deſired the earl to hinder it, being apprehenſive ſhe would be conducted into Spain.

This affair paſſing through ſo many hands, and being hardly any longer a ſecret, the duke of Norfolk juſtly feared the queen would be offended that ſhe was not informed of it, and, therefore, not to incenſe her more, he deſired the earl of Leiceſter to ſpeak of it to her. Leiceſter promiſed to do it the firſt opportunity, and yet delayed it from day to day, ſo that all knew it, except the queen, who, it is likely, feigned ignorance. However, ſhe was willing to give the duke occaſion to diſcloſe his ſecret, by telling him one day[y], "to beware upon what pillow he laid his head;" but he pretended not to underſtand what ſhe meant, chuſing rather that the earl of Leiceſter ſhould ſpeak to her firſt, becauſe he thought him his friend[z]. But it is ſaid, the earl had acted in this affair only to ruin him, becauſe he conſidered him as a dangerous rival in the queen's favour. However, the court being at Titchfield, the earl of Leiceſter feigns himſelf very ill, and the queen going to ſee him, he ſhewed ſigns of fear and trouble, which ſhe eaſily perceiving, aſked him the reaſon. Then, begging her pardon for having ſo long concealed from her a ſecret which he ought to have told her, he diſcovered all that had paſſed concerning the duke of Norfolk's marriage with the queen of Scots. After which, the queen called the duke into a gallery, and taxing him with imprudence and raſhneſs for attempting the marriage, without vouchſafing to impart his deſign to her, commanded him to deſiſt from the project. The duke owned ſuch a propoſal had been made to him, and he had conſented to it; but ſhewed himſelf ſo regardleſs of it, that he told the queen, his revenues were not [u] The czar granted them an exemption from all cuſtoms, with leave to vend their manufactures through his whole dominions, and to tranſport them into Perſia and Media by the Caſpian ſea, the merchants of other nations being not permitted to trade beyond Moſcow. And now did the Engliſh venture to tranſport their goods in boats, made of one entire tree, up the river Dwina, as far as Wologda. From thence, in ſeven days, by land, to Yeraſtaw; and then, thirty days and nights, down the river to Aſtracan, by the Wolga, where they uſed to build their ſhips. From Aſtracan, they croſſed the Caſpian ſea, and made their way through the vaſt deſerts of Hyrcania and Bactriania, to Teverin and Caſbin, cities of Perſia, in hopes at length to diſcover Cathay. But by reaſon of the war between the Turks and Perſians, and the robberies committed by the Barbarians, the Londoners were diſcouraged from purſuing this glorious enterpriſe. Camden, p. 417, 418.

[w] Melvil ſeems to ſay the duke mentioned it firſt, p. 98. But Leſley affirms, that the earl of Murray firſt ſet it on foot, or at leaſt promoted it ſtrenuouſly. much leſs than thoſe of the whole kingdom of Scotland, drained by civil wars; and that when he was at his tennis-court in Norwich, he thought himſelf as good as ſome kings. In ſhort, he promiſed the queen to think no more of the marriage. Mean while, as afterwards he perceived ſhe did not look upon him with the ſame eye as before, that the earl of Leiceſter was againſt him, and the courtiers ſhunned him, he withdrew from court, without taking his leave of the queen, and came to London. The ſame day the biſhop of Roſs [a], ſuing for the enlargement of the queen of Scots, Elizabeth, in great diſguſt, told him, that his miſtreſs had nothing to do but to reſt ſatisfied, unleſs ſhe had a mind to ſee thoſe, on whom ſhe moſt relied, ſhorter by the head.

This affair being entirely divulged, the queen endeavoured by all ways to get information of ſuch particulars as might have eſcaped the earl of Leiceſter's knowledge. As ſhe knew the duke had frequent conferences with the earl of Murray, ſhe ſent ſir George Carey [b] into Scotland, to deſire him to acquaint her with what he knew of the matter. Mean while the duke being privately warned, by a meſſage from the earl of Leiceſter, that a reſolution was taken to ſend him to the Tower, retired into Norfolk. But repenting of this haſty ſtep, which might render him ſuſpected, he returns to court, after writing to the queen to beg her pardon, and to his friends to intreat them to ſpeak to the queen in his behalf. Some days after, the queen received letters from Scotland [c], informing her of ſome things which had not come to her knowledge, and which made her ſign a warrant to ſend the duke of Norfolk to the Tower. Then the biſhop of Roſs, who acted as the queen of Scots embaſſador, was examined, and Radolfi the Florentine was delivered to the cuſtody of ſir Francis Walſingham. The lord Lumley was arreſted, the earl of Pembroke was confined to his own houſe, and all the reſt who were concerned in the project of the duke of Norfolk's marriage, were baniſhed the court, except the earl of Leiceſter. The earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland made their ſubmiſſion to the earl of Suſſex, lord preſident of the north. All theſe lords endeavoured to excuſe themſelves, by declaring they had approved the project of the duke's marriage, on the expreſs condition it ſhould not be conſummated without the queen's conſent.

Elizabeth did not think fit to publiſh all ſhe knew of this affair, wherein the prime lords of the kingdom were concerned. Beſides, ſhe had received, ſome time ſince, advice of a conſpiracy ready to break out, and conſequently it might be very dangerous to uſe too great a ſeverity at ſuch a juncture. The earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, both very powerful in the north, had held together ſeveral conferences, of which the queen had notice, and which cauſed her to order them to repair to court. They made ſome dilatory excuſes, but the queen ſent them a more expreſs order, to put them under a neceſſity of relinquiſhing their enterpriſe, or engaging in an open rebellion, before they had taken proper meaſures. This ſecond order produced the effect ſhe expected. The two earls knowing themſelves guilty, and not daring to truſt to the queen's mercy, took up arms, and drew ſome forces together [d].

The rebels deſign was to free the queen of Scots, though they mentioned her not in their manifeſto. They ſaid only, their intent was, "To reſtore the religion of their forefathers, remove evil counſellors from the queen, and cauſe juſtice to be done to the duke of Norfolk, and the other lords now in priſon, or under diſgrace." At the ſame time they wrote circular letters to the catholics, inviting them to come and join with them. But moſt ſent the letters they received to the queen [e], whether they were not willing to diſturb the peace of the realm, or were diſcouraged by the duke of Norfolk's impriſonment. Mean while the rebels, coming to Durham, burn all the Engliſh Bibles and Common-Prayer books, and openly ſay maſs. Then they marched to Clifford moor, where they took a muſter, and found their army amounted to four thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe. Their chief deſign was to free the queen of Scots, in order to ſet her at their head; but upon the firſt news of this rebellion, ſhe was conveyed to Coventry [f], a ſtrong city in the middle of the kingdom, not to be taken without a formal ſiege, for which the rebels were by no means prepared. Beſides, in marching thither, they would have gone into a country where the inhabitants were not their friends.

Mean time, forces were levying for the queen in ſeveral parts. The earl of Suſſex had now ſeven thouſand men [g], the lord Clinton was at the head of twelve thouſand, and the earl of Cumberland, with the lord Scroop, were near Carliſle with a good body of troops, beſides the garriſon which they had thrown into that city. So the rebels, finding their number not encreaſe, thought proper to retire to the borders of the north [h], where they took Bernard caſtle, but preſently after, fearing to be ſurrounded, diſperſed themſelves. The earl of Northumberland concealed himſelf at Harclaw in Scotland [i]. The earl of Weſtmoreland eſcaped into the Netherlands, where he ſpent the reſidue of his days, living upon a ſlender penſion allowed him by the king of Spain. The rebels being thus diſperſed, ſome were hanged for an example [k]. Forty others, who were fled out of the kingdom, were convicted of high treaſon, and outlawed, and their ſentence was confirmed by the next parliament. Of this number were, Charles Nevil, earl of Weſtmoreland; Thomas Percy, earl of Northumberland, with his counteſs; and Egremond Ratcliff, brother to the earl of Suſſex [l]. The queen pardoned the reſt, who did not fly out of the land. Some time before this rebellion, the duke of Alva ſent to the queen Ciapine Vitelli, a famous captain, to demand the money which had been ſtopped. But his commiſſion was ſo limited, that he was forced to write to the duke of Alva for a more ample power. The real deſign of this embaſſy was to have in England an experienced leader to command the rebels, and the forces the duke of Alva was to ſend over. Lamothe, governor of Dunkirk, diſguiſed like a ſailor, had already ſounded the ports, as he himſelf confeſſed afterwards. But the queen broke all theſe meaſures, by compelling the two heads of the rebels to take up arms ſooner than they had reſolved.

This rebellion was quickly followed by another, of which Leonard Dacres, a gentleman of the north [m], was the head. He had ſome buſineſs at court, which he was ſoliciting when the firſt rebellion broke out. Upon the news, he went and offered his ſervice to the queen, who accepted it, becauſe ſhe knew he had a great intereſt in the northern parts. Having received a commiſſion from the queen to raiſe forces, he ſent to the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, that the troops he ſhould raiſe by virtue of his commiſſion ſhould be at their ſervice. He even put them in hopes of foreign ſuccours, as certain embaſſadors at London had aſſured him. His chief deſign was to carry away the queen of Scots; but he was diſappointed by her being ſent to Coventry. So, finding himſelf at the head of three thouſand men, after taking ſome caſtles [n], he reſolved to expect the lord Hunſdon, who was marching towards him with the garriſon of Berwick [o]. The battle was fought near the little river Gelt. Dacres behaved very gallantly, but being vanquiſhed, fled into Flanders, where he died. The queen pardoned all his followers.

At the ſame time there were commotions in Ireland, in which it appeared the king of Spain was concerned, ſince he had diſpatched thither Juan Mendoza, an officer, to foment them. But they were eaſily allayed [p].

It is uncertain whether the duke of Norfolk was concerned in the late rebellion in England. Several circumſtances made againſt him. Firſt, as moſt inſurrections neceſſarily require ſome preparations, it might be thought the rebels were getting ready at the very time the duke of Norfolk and his friends were preparing every thing to obtain the queen's conſent to the projected marriage. In this expectation, he had hindered Dacres from attempting to free the queen of Scots, as he had intended. Secondly, all the motions of the rebels tended to Mary's deliverance, and moſt of her friends were diſcouraged when they heard the duke of Norfolk was in the Tower. Laſtly, the rebels themſelves ſaid, in their manifeſto, they had taken up arms to releaſe him. But, on the other hand, it is certain this lord was never called to an account, and the queen was contented with keeping him in priſon till September the next year. Hence, it ſeems, it may be inferred, there was no proof againſt him. But perhaps the queen did not think it adviſeable to let the people know the firſt lords of the realm were concerned in the conſpiracy.

I left, about the end of the laſt year, the earl of Murray in England, where he had acted ſeveral and very oppoſite parts. Upon his arrival in Scotland, he aſſembled all the lords of the king's party at Sterling [q], to communicate what he had done in England, and his conduct was approved.

The duke of Chateleraut was come from France to London, a little before the earl of Murray's departure. He forthwith demanded queen Elizabeth's aid and protection to obtain the regency of Scotland, being the young king's neareſt relation. But the queen knew her intereſt too well to fall into ſuch a ſnare, and to favour a lord, whoſe conduct had ever been very equivocal, and who, in all appearance, had not imbibed at the court of France favourable notions of the king's party. The duke, not being able to obtain his deſire, let the earl of Murray depart, and came not to Scotland till ſome time after him. He brought a patent from queen Mary, wherein it appeared, that, by a new and unheard-of right, ſhe had adopted him for her father, and, as ſuch, committed to him the regency of the kingdom. The earl of Murray, hearing the duke aſſumed the title of regent in virtue of this patent, immediately aſſembled an army to compel him to ſubmit to the government, reſolving no other authority but the king's ſhould be acknowledged in Scotland. Since the queen's defeat and flight, her party was grown ſo weak, that the duke of Chateleraut was unable to reſiſt. All his dependance was upon the good ſucceſs of the project which was then forming in favour of the duke of Norfolk, after which he did not queſtion to gain the advantage of the earl of Murray. But as it was not in his power to haſten the execution of the project in England, he was forced to confine himſelf to the endeavouring to gain time, by propoſing an agreement. He plainly perceived the way of arms could not be ſucceſsful in his preſent circumſtances. He ſet therefore his friends to talk with the regent, and it was agreed, he ſhould come to Glaſgow, acknowledge the king's authority, and renounce the queen's; for which ſome advantages he had required were granted him. Notwithſtanding the agreement, he raiſed freſh difficulties to attain his end. But the regent, not being ſatisfied with all his evaſions, began to march with his army to attack him. Then the duke, having no other refuge, was conſtrained to go to the regent with the lord Herris. A few days after, the regent, having aſſembled at Glaſgow the lords of the king's party, it was reſolved that a proclamation ſhould be publiſhed, offering to all who had hitherto refuſed to own the king's authority, to receive their ſubmiſſions, and reſtore them to the enjoyment of their lands. But the earls of Argyle and Huntley would not accept of theſe terms, being extremely diſpleaſed at the duke of Chateleraut's putting himſelf into the hands of the earl of Murray. At the ſame time, queen Mary wrote letter upon letter to her friends, exhorting them to ſtand firm, and giving them hopes of a ſpeedy and happy revolution in her affairs. She was then in expectation of the ſucceſs of the projects concerning her marriage with the duke of Norfolk.

The regent's proclamation not meeting with the expected ſucceſs, and no one appearing to accept the offered favour, he departed for Edinburgh, carrying with him the duke of Chateleraut and the lord Herris. He had delayed thus long to preſs them to make their ſubmiſſion to the king, becauſe he was deſirous it might be a general affair. But at laſt, finding the queen's friends were in no haſte to make their ſubmiſſion, he reſolved to incite them by the duke of Chateleraut's example, who was the head of the party, and ſummoned him to perform the agreement made at Glaſgow. The duke, ſeeing himſelf preſſed, ſought excuſes, ſaying, he did not mean to treat for himſelf alone, but for the queen's whole party, and therefore could do nothing without the concurrence of the other lords, and the queen's approbation. Whereupon the regent aſking him, what he intended to do if the queen approved not of the agreement of Glaſgow? he replied, that he believed himſelf bound to nothing. The circumſtances of the duke of Norfolk's plot, the ſucceſs whereof he expected every moment, made him think it not very dangerous to talk thus. However, the regent, finding himſelf thus amuſed, ſent him and the lord Herris priſoners to the caſtle.

This is Buchanan's account of the occaſion of the duke of Chateleraut's impriſonment, an account which the circumſtances of affairs renders very probable. But Camden and his followers have been pleaſed to ſay only, the regent having ſummoned at Edinburgh the lords of both parties to labour an agreement, the duke of Chateleraut and the lord Herris firſt repaired thither, and were ordered to priſon. In this manner has Camden maimed and diſfigured the Hiſtory of Scotland, to give ſome colour to his invectives againſt the earl of Murray. I am going to relate another inſtance, either of his prejudice or unfaithfulneſs. I have reſerved it till now, though it be not its proper place, becauſe it would have been impoſſible to convince the reader of my aſſertion, if he was not firſt informed of what has been ſaid concerning the affairs of the queen of Scots; I hope I ſhall be pardoned this ſort of digreſſion.

Camden, after a very brief account of the murder of king Henry Darnly in the year 1567, and an inſinuation that the earl of Murray was the real author of it, ſays, that Murray earneſtly preſſed the queen to marry the earl of Bothwell, to which ſhe conſented at laſt, after much difficulty. Then he immediately adds,

"I ſhall willingly inſert here what George, earl of Huntley, and the earl of Argyle, who were the principal lords of Scotland, proteſted ſoon after, as I have taken it from an original, ſigned with their own hands, which they ſent to queen Elizabeth."

"Foraſmuch as the earl of Murray and others, to colour their rebellion againſt the queen, whoſe authority they uſurp, do openly ſlander her, as guilty of the murder of her huſband; we do publicly proteſt and witneſs theſe things following. In the month of December [r], 1566, when the queen was at Craigmillar, Murray and Lidington acknowledged, before us, that Morton, Lindſay, and Ruthven, ſlew David Rizzo, with no other intent than to ſave Murray, who was at that very time to be proſcribed. Therefore, that they might not appear ungrateful, they greatly deſired, that Morton and the reſt who were baniſhed for Rizzo's murder, might be recalled. But this they ſaid could not be done, unleſs the queen were divorced from her huſband, which they promiſed to accompliſh, would we but give our conſent. Afterwards Murray promiſed to me [Huntley] that my antient inheritance ſhould be reſtored to me, and I ſhould be an everlaſting favourite with the exiles, if I would but countenance the divorce. Then we applied to Bothwell for his conſent alſo. And laſtly, we came to the queen; and Lidington, in the name of us all, earneſtly entreated her to reverſe the baniſhment of Morton, Lindſay, and Ruthven. The king's faults and offences againſt the queen and the realm, he aggravated with very great bitterneſs; and ſhewed how much it concerned the queen and ſtate, that the divorce ſhould be made out of hand, it being impoſſible for the king and queen to live together in Scotland with ſafety. She anſwered, ſhe had rather withdraw for a time into France, till her huſband ſhould be ſenſible of the errors of his youth, being unwilling any thing ſhould be done to her ſon's prejudice, or her own diſhonour. To this Lidington replied, We, who are of your council, will look to that. But I command you, ſays ſhe, to do nothing that may blemiſh my honour, or offend my conſcience. Let the thing remain as it is, till God pleaſes to provide a remedy from above: that which you imagine will be for my good, may, I fear, turn to my hurt. To which Lidington ſaid, Pleaſe to leave matters to us, and you ſhall find nothing will be done but what is juſt, and what the parliament will approve of. A few days after, the king happening to be murdered in an execrable manner, we do, from the inward teſtimonies of our conſciences, hold it for certain, that Murray and Lidington were the authors, contrivers, and abettors of this regicide, whoever were the actors."

This proteſtation, as may be eaſily obſerved, ſquares exactly with Camden's deſign in his Annals of queen Elizabeth, namely, to clear the queen of Scots from the crime of murdering the king her huſband, and to accuſe the earl of Murray. But withal, it is directly contrary to the teſtimony of Melvil, an eye-witneſs, who, in his Memoirs, ſays not a ſingle word which can give occaſion to ſuſpect the earl of Marray was thought guilty of the murder. If this proteſtation therefore be true, Melvil's Memoirs muſt be only a heap of fables, which no man of ſenſe will ever believe. But to ſhew that this writing is counterfeit, it will be proper to examine it particularly, and make ſome remarks which will diſcover the forgery.

Camden begins with ſaying: "I ſhall willingly inſert here what George earl of Huntley, and the earl of Murray, who were the principal lords of Scotland, proteſted ſoon after."

This ſoon after muſt have been two whole years at leaſt, as I ſhall demonſtrate hereafter.

"As I have taken it from an original ſigned with their own hands."

Camden has not ſet theſe two lords hands to the writing, it may be, becauſe he did not know in what order they were to be placed. In a certificate however, one would think the ſignature is a material thing[s].

"Which they ſent to queen Elizabeth."

Suppoſing the truth of this proteſtation, it could not be ſent to queen Elizabeth till the latter end of the year 1568, at the very ſooneſt, when the earl of Murray went to York to accuſe the queen before the Engliſh commiſſioners. This remark diſcover's Camden's artifice, who deſignedly neglecting to date the writing, places it in his Annals the beginning of the year 1567, immediately after the king's murder, as if at that very time Murray had been accuſed of killing that prince; whereas it was not till after the queen's flight into England, that ſhe thought of caſting the crime upon him. It was not therefore out of pure negligence that Camden avoided dating the proteſtation.

"Foraſmuch as the earl of Murray and others, to colour their rebellion againſt the queen, whoſe authority they uſurp, do openly ſlander her as guilty of the murder of her huſband."

The earl of Murray cannot be ſaid to uſurp the queen's authority till after he was declared regent, or the queen to accuſe him publicly of killing the king, till the York conference, or rather till that of Hampton-court, that is, in October or November 1568. Now at that time the two factions were both formed. Murray was head of the one, and Huntley of the other. So, ſuppoſing this writing not to be forged, what opinion can a man have of the atteſtation of one ſworn enemy againſt another? As to the earl of Argyle, Buchanan affirms, he was retired a little before to his own houſe; ſo that it is not probable he ſhould join with the earl of Huntley to frame this certificate at the time it muſt be ſuppoſed to be drawn. If it was dated, we might ſpeak of it with more certainty.

"We do openly proteſt and witneſs theſe things following. In the month of December 1566."

This way of beginning argues it was now ſome time ſince the things they are going to mention were tranſacted.

"When the queen was at Craigmillar, Murray and Lidington acknowledged before us, that Morton, Lindſay, and Ruthven, ſlew David Rizzo, with no other intent than to ſave Murray, who was at that very time to be proſcribed."

I have already made appear, by the teſtimony of Melvil, that the earl of Murray, far from owning that Rizzo was killed on his account, would not join with the party of the murderers, but remained conſtantly attached to the queen. Beſides, the earl of Argyle, author of this proteſtation, was then a fugitive as well as Murray, and was no leſs to be condemned than he. And yet he ſpeaks here of this affair, as if he were a ſtranger to it, though he was the moſt conſiderable of thoſe who were to be baniſhed; and though Melvil affirms, it was for his and the others ſake, who had taken up arms againſt the queen, Murray excepted, that Rizzo was murdered.

"Therefore, that they might not appear ungrateful, they greatly deſired that Morton, and the reſt who were baniſhed for Rizzo's murder, might be recalled."

What has Lidington to do here, when he was never concerned in Rizzo's affair? and wherein conſiſted his ingratitude, if the exiles were not recalled?

"But this they ſaid could not be done unleſs the queen were divorced from her huſband."

Rizzo was killed by the king's order, and in his preſence, and ſolely, according to the author of the proteſtation, to ſave the earl of Murray. The point was to get the murderers recalled, who had been baniſhed for this murder committed by the king's order, and theſe exiles cannot be recalled by the queen, the only perſon offended, unleſs ſhe is divorced from the king. Let this conſequence be well examined, and it will never be thought that the earls of Huntley and Argyle were ſo weak as to reaſon in ſo wretched a manner. In December 1566[t], that is, about the time of the prince's baptiſm, the king was looked upon as a cypher, and expoſed to all ſorts of inſults from the queen.

"Which they promiſed to accompliſh, would we but give our conſent."

At that time the earl of Murray had no credit at court. It was Bothwell that ruled all. I do not know how it ſtood then with Lidington. However, Murray and Lidington are repreſented here as the perſons that were to be the chief agents in accompliſhing the queen's divorce, and as wanting for that purpoſe only the bare conſent of the earls of Huntley and Argyle. This is by no means probable.

"Afterwards Murray promiſed to me [Huntley] that my antient inheritance ſhould be reſtored to me, and I ſhould be an everlaſting favourite with the exiles, if I would but countenance the divorce."

The author of the proteſtation has confounded the times. Murray having then no power, could not make any ſuch promiſe to the earl of Huntley. None but Bothwell was able to make and perform it. Beſides, it is not likely the queen, when ſhe recalled the earl of Huntley, who was condemned to die, ſhould ſtill detain his antient inheritance which had been confiſcated.

"Then we applied to Bothwell for his conſent alſo."

This confounds the whole hiſtory of Scotland. Murray and Lidington are made authors of the project of the queen's divorce, and the earl of Bothwell as one who is only to give his conſent; though it is certain he had then an abſolute ſway over the queen, who married him very ſoon after.

"And laſtly, we came to the queen, and Lidington, in the name of us all, earneſtly entreated her to reverſe the baniſhment of Morton, Lindſay, and Ruthven. The king's faults and offences againſt the queen and the realm, he aggravated with very great bitterneſs; and ſhewed how much it concerned the queen and ſtate, that the divorce ſhould be made out of hand, it being impoſſible for the king and queen to live together in Scotland with ſafety."

Can it be conceived, that to induce the queen to pardon men who had killed her favourite in her preſence, and by the king her huſband's expreſs order, there ſhould be occaſion to aggravate the king's faults, and demonſtrate to the queen, that ſhe muſt be divorced from him?

"She anſwered, ſhe had rather withdraw for a time into France, till her huſband ſhould be ſenſible of the errors of his youth, being unwilling any thing ſhould be done to her ſon's prejudice, or her own diſhonour."

The author of this proteſtation repreſents the queen, in December 1566, as being under oppreſſion, and ſpeaking of retiring into France, till the king ſhould be pleaſed to amend his errors. This ſuffices to ſhew that the whole is a forgery; for it is not likely the earls of Huntley and Argyle ſhould talk in this manner.

"To this Lidington replied, We, who are of your council, will look to that. But I command you, ſays ſhe, to do nothing that may blemiſh my honour, or offend my conſcience. Let the thing remain as it is, till God pleaſes to provide a remedy from above: that which you imagine will be for my good, may, I fear, turn to my hurt."

The artifice of theſe words which the queen is made to ſpeak,

[s] This proteſtation is in Mr. Anderſon's Collections, tom. IV. part 2, p. 188, &c. but it is taken from a copy, without either hands or date.—However, it is to be obſerved, that in the ſame collection there follows an anſwer of the earl of Murray's to the aforeſaid proteſtation, wherein he ſays, "In caſe any man will ſay and affirm, that ever I was preſent when any purpoſes were holden at Craigmillar in my audience, tending to any unlawful or diſhonourable end; or that ever I ſubſcribed any band there, or that any purpoſe was holden about the ſubſcribing of any band by me to my knowledge, I avow they ſpeak wickedly and untruly; which I will maintain againſt them as becomes an honeſt man, to the end of my life: only thus far the ſubſcription of bands by me is true, That indeed I ſubſcribed a band with the earls of Huntley, Argyle, and Bothwell, at the beginning of October in the year 1566, which was deviſed in ſign of our reconciliation, in reſpect of the former grudges and diſpleaſures that had been among us; whereunto I was conſtrained to make promiſe before I could be admitted to the queen's preſence, or have any ſhew of her favour; and there was never any other band made or ſubſcribed, nor yet propoſed to me in any wiſe, before the murder of the late king. Anderſon, ibid. p. 194, 195.

[t] Rapin has it here and elſewhere September, which, I ſuppoſe, is a miſtake; for it is December in Camden, from whom he takes this proteſtation. King James was chriſtened December 15, 1566.

Here

conſiſts in this: The queen having commanded all theſe lords to do nothing with reſpect to her divorce, Murray and Lidington found no other way to get the exiles recalled, but by cauſing the king to be murdered. As if the king alone was an invincible obſtacle to the recalling of the baniſhed lords, who killed Rizzo by his orders, and in his preſence. I confeſs this reaſoning appears to me incomprehenſible.

"A few days after, the king happening to be murdered in an execrable manner."

What has been juſt related paſſed in December 1566, according to the proteſtation, and the king was killed in February 1567, that is, two months after. Now can it be ſuppoſed, that the earls of Huntley and Argyle could poſſibly be ſo miſtaken, as to call two months a few days?

"We do, from the inward teſtimonies of our conſciences, hold it for certain, that Murray and Lidington were the authors, contrivers, and abettors, of this regicide."

The inference the author of this paper would draw, that the earls of Murray and Lidington were the contrivers of the king's murder, from their having projected the queen's divorce, appearing to him, without doubt, liable to ſtrong objections, he ſeems to give it up in part, when he grounds it wholly upon the inward teſtimony of Huntley's and Argyle's conſciences.

"Whoever were the actors."

It was notorious that Bothwell was the contriver of the king's murder, and Camden himſelf makes no ſcruple to own it, joining, however, the earl of Murray with him. But the author of the proteſtation durſt not name him, becauſe it was giving a ſenſible wound to the queen's honour, who within a few months married the murderer.

I ſhall only add one remark, which to me ſeems deciſive to demonſtrate the forgery of this paper. Lidington was never accuſed, but in this writing only, of being concerned in king Henry's murder[u]. On the other hand, ſo far was he from being conſidered as an enemy to the queen, that he was rather very much ſuſpected by the young king's and the earl of Murray's party, and not without reaſon. What Melvil ſays of him, and of the occaſion of the York and Hampton-court conferences, is a clear evidence that he continued in the regent's party, only to have opportunities to ſerve the queen. Buchanan confirms Melvil's teſtimony, in a book, intitled, The Camelion; wherein he pretends to ſhew, that Lidington betrayed the young king's party, and in his hiſtory he drops many the like expreſſions againſt him. Now, how can it be thought, that the earls of Huntley and Argyle, heads of the queen's party, ſhould be ignorant that Lidington was privately labouring for them? If they knew it, it is by no means likely that at the very time when Lidington was at York or Hampton-court, and frequently conferring with the duke of Norfolk to hinder the earl of Murray from accuſing the queen, theſe two chiefs of the party ſhould publicly accuſe their ſecret friend of being author of the king's murder; eſpecially as there was not the leaſt ground for ſuch a charge. But very poſſibly, the author of the proteſtation was ignorant of Lidington's ſecret practices, and ſeeing him among thoſe who attended the regent at York, imagined he might ſafely join them together in the ſame accuſation.

But, however, though this proteſtation be as true as it appears to be counterfeit, it cannot ſerve for proof to ſupport what Camden advances concerning the earl of Murray, becauſe it will be ſtill true, that it came from one of his moſt mortal enemies. I return to what paſſed in Scotland during the year 1569.

Shortly after the duke of Chateleraut's arreſt, the regent convened the chief of the nobility at Perth, to communicate to them certain letters he had received, upon which it was neceſſary to conſult together. The firſt was from a friend in England[w], to give him notice of the conſpiracy in favour of the duke of Norfolk to eſpouſe the queen of Scots, telling him withal, the conſpiracy was in ſuch a ſtate, that all the forces of Great-Britain were not capable of preventing its ſucceſs; and adviſing him therefore to think in time of his own affairs.

The ſecond letter was from queen Mary, and directed to the ſtates of Scotland. It was to deſire that the validity of her marriage with the earl of Bothwell might be examined, adding, if there appeared any eſſential defect in it, ſhe would very willingly conſent it ſhould be diſſolved. As Bothwell was ſtill alive in Denmark, it was neceſſary his marriage with the queen ſhould be annulled, before ſhe could eſpouſe the duke of Norfolk. For this reaſon ſhe wanted the ſtates of Scotland to get it diſſolved, pretending only to give her conſent to, though ſhe could not proceed without it.

The third letter was from queen Elizabeth to the ſame ſtates, to demand one of theſe three things in favour of Mary. The firſt, "That ſhe ſhould be reſtored to the throne as formerly." The ſecond, "That ſhe ſhould reign jointly with the king her ſon." The third, "That ſhe might live in Scotland, with ſuch honours as ſhould not be prejudicial to the king's authority." Camden, who agrees in this with Buchanan, will have it, that theſe demands of Elizabeth are to be conſidered as the effect of her compaſſion for the queen of Scots. But where was the compaſſion, to propoſe to the ſtates three things ſo diſproportionate, and to leave the choice to them? She knew the two firſt would be rejected, and though the third ſhould be accepted, many difficulties would occur before it could be ſettled. Thus what Camden conſiders as an effect of Elizabeth's pity, was in truth only a conſequence of the project ſhe had formed to prolong the affair, under the ſpecious colour of favouring her priſoner.

The Scotch lords, aſſembled at Perth, thought Mary's letter ought not to be anſwered, becauſe ſhe addreſſed to the ſtates, as if ſhe was ſtill their queen, which they would not allow. She did what ſhe could to remove this difficulty; but all her endeavours ſerved only to confirm them the more in their reſolution. They were far from being willing to facilitate the queen's marriage with the duke of Norfolk, by cauſing Bothwell's to be nulled. Mary, who did not know they were ſo well acquainted with her ſecrets, complained very much of their ſcrupling to diſſolve a marriage, which had ſerved them for a cloak to take up arms againſt her. But her complaints were little regarded.

As to Elizabeth's demands, the lords reſolved to reject the two firſt, and accept the third, if Mary would be ſatisfied with it, and ſent their anſwer to the court of England by a young gentleman. But Elizabeth, who only ſought to gain time, wrote to them, that ſhe deſired a perſon of more conſideration to be ſent to confer with her about ſo weighty an affair. For this reaſon the lords deputed Robert Pitcairn.

Whilſt Pitcairn was on his way, the regent, perceiving the queen's faction daily grew ſtronger, by the hopes which the duke of Norfolk's project gave the whole party, thought it neceſſary to ſecure Lidington's perſon. This lord, by feigning to be attached to the king's party, ſerved the queen to the utmoſt of his power; and, as he was a man of great ſenſe and parts, did much more prejudice to the regent by outwardly embracing his ſide, than if he had openly declared for the queen. So the regent, having on ſome pretence drawn him to Sterling, ordered him to be apprehended, and ſent priſoner to Edinburgh[x]. But Kircaldie, coming unexpectedly with part of the garriſon of the caſtle, reſcued him[y], promiſing to ſee him forth-coming when it ſhould be required. This notable proceeding rendered Kircaldie very ſuſpicious to the king's whole party[z].

Mean while, the duke of Norfolk being ſent to the Tower, without effecting any thing of his projects, all Mary's deſigns, as well in Scotland as England, vaniſhed into air. Shortly after, the earls of Huntley and Argyle were reconciled to the regent, and ſubmitted to the king's authority. By that the queen's faction was in a manner extinguiſhed for ſome time. This ſhews how much queen Mary and her adherents relied on the duke of Norfolk. I ſhall cloſe this year with a brief account of what paſſed in France and the Netherlands.

The war continued in France during the whole year 1569. On the 13th of March was fought the battle of Jarnac, wherein the prince of Condé was killed. D'Andelot, the admiral's brother did not long ſurvive him. Some time after, the duke of Deuxponts led an army into France to the aſſiſtance of the Hugonots, but died there in June, leaving the command of the army to count Mansfeldt, who joined the admiral. With this reinforcement the admiral laid ſiege to Poictiers, but was forced to raiſe it in September. In October, the Hugonots loſt the battle of Moncontour. This defeat obliged the admiral to ſend for a ſpeedy aid from Elizabeth, who lent him money upon the queen of Navarre's jewels, which were ſent to her in pawn. She alſo permitted a company of a hundred gentlemen-volunteers to be raiſed, to ſerve in the army of the Hugonots[a]. The campaign ended with the taking of St. Jean d'Angeli, which the king became maſter of before the end of October.

The duke of Alva ſtill continued his oppreſſions in the Netherlands. He had ſet up the inquiſition, and ordered the council of Trent to be received, as well as the new biſhops, whoſe juriſdiction had been hitherto rejected. The bloody council ſtill acted with fury. The privileges of the cities, univerſities, provinces, were delivered to the king's mercy. In a word, the duke of Alva ordered the hundredth part of the revenues to be paid to the king; after that, the twentieth part of the real, and the tenth of the perſonal eſtates, every time they were ſold. Some of the magiſtrates of the towns having the boldneſs to appeal to the king from theſe ordinances, were ſeverely puniſhed. In ſhort, theſe provinces being now conſidered by the Spaniards but as a conquered country, all were driven to deſpair[b].

The beginning of the next year, 1570, the earl of Murray, having notice that the earl of Northumberland was concealed in Scotland, found means to ſeize him, and committed him to priſon at Lochlevin. Camden ſays, he offered to deliver this lord to Elizabeth, in exchange for the queen of Scots; but this is not likely. Mary was better guarded in England than ſhe could be in Scotland, and Murray was not ignorant of Elizabeth's reaſons never to releaſe her.

A few days after, Murray was ſhot through the body by one of the family of Hamilton, who pretended it to be only in revenge of a private injury. But it ſoon appeared to be by the direction of the queen's faction[c]. On the morrow, the Scots and the Carrs, great friends of the queen[d], entered England in arms, and deſtroyed the borders with fire and ſword. As they had no private reaſon to make this incurſion, it is eaſy to perceive they were encouraged by the heads of the queen's faction, who were willing to try to give a new turn to affairs. Their ſcheme was this.

The queen's faction was ruined, and without any likelihood of being ever able to riſe again, becauſe the earl of Murray could be always ſure of aſſiſtance from England in caſe of neceſſity. Wherefore the heads of that faction[e], who had ſubmitted to the king againſt their wills, formed new projects. They conſidered the ſtrict union between England and Scotland, as a ſtrong fence againſt all their enterpriſes in favour of Mary, and therefore reſolved to break it at any rate. To ſucceed, they deemed it neceſſary, before all things, to aſſaſſinate the earl of Murray, that the kingdom might for ſome time be in a ſort of anarchy, as it happened indeed. That done, they hoped, by provoking the Engliſh on their borders, they ſhould excite them to a revenge on all the Scots without diſtinction; that this would revive the old enmity between the two nations, and ſo all Scotland would be united againſt England; and then ſuccours might be ſafely ſent for from France and Spain, and the project be reſumed of invading the borders of England, whilſt the catholics ſhould on their part act within the kingdom. The lord Seaton's embaſſy to the duke of Alva, and the pope's bull, of which I ſhall preſently ſpeak, plainly ſhew this was their intent; though Camden is pleaſed to conſider the evaſion of the Engliſh borders as a mere caprice of the Scots and Carrs.

Immediately after the earl of Murray's death, Kircaldie releaſed Lidington, who uſed all his art to hinder the king's party from proceeding to the election of a new regent. He intimated, that Scotland would never be in peace, unleſs a regent was choſen who ſhould be approved by the two parties; and conſequently it was neceſſary to aſſemble the great men of both ſides, that they might agree together. In what he ſaid there was the appearance of good. But he knew it would be difficult to get all the great men together in one place, and though they ſhould meet, they would never agree upon the choice. However, this ſerved to gain time, in the expectation that queen Elizabeth, by reſolving to revenge the injury ſhe had received, would drive all the Scots to deſpair, and unite them all againſt her. He ſucceeded in the firſt part of his deſign, and by his intrigues managed it ſo, that the election of a regent was deferred. But he was not ſo happy in the other part of his project. Elizabeth and her council were too wiſe to fall into the ſnare. On the contrary, the more they found that endeavours were uſed to unite all the Scots in one party, the more they judged it neceſſary to keep them divided, nothing being ſo advantageous to Elizabeth as to foment confuſion and diſcord in that kingdom, till ſhe could take other meaſures.

To that purpoſe ſhe ſent Randolph into Scotland, to complain of the inroad made into England. But, inſtead of laying the fault upon the whole nation, as the authors of the invaſion expected, ſhe ſaid withal, by her embaſſador, ſhe was very ſenſible thoſe who governed Scotland were not concerned in the inſult on the Engliſh, and therefore ſhe was willing to diſtinguiſh the innocent from the guilty. That ſhe demanded, however, a ſuitable reparation, and if they who were at the helm could not procure it for her, ſhe offered them the aſſiſtance of her forces. That in caſe they refuſed it, ſhe would ſend an army into Scotland, not to attack the whole nation, but to puniſh ſuch only as wantonly, and without provocation, had inſulted the Engliſh. As it was then a time of anarchy, there being no regent yet, the giving the embaſſador an anſwer was put off till May, when the ſtates would be aſſembled. Randolph inſiſted not upon a ſpeedy anſwer[f]. He contented himſelf with exhorting the Scots to peace and concord, whilſt he privately laboured to cheriſh their diviſions, and hinder their union. This is what Melvil clearly ſhews in his Memoirs. Mean while Elizabeth prepared an army, which ſhe intended to ſend into Scotland, as well to revenge her ſubjects as to ſupport the king's party, and cauſe a regent to be elected who ſhould not be againſt the intereſt of England.

Though the heads of the queen's faction ſaw Elizabeth did not fall into their ſnare, they endeavoured however to provoke her, and incenſe her againſt the whole nation, by libels and ſlanders which they took care to publiſh. But all their artifices were not capable of making her alter her courſe. Mean while, her army, which was to be commanded by the earl of Suſſex, was preparing with all poſſible expedition.

In the mean time, Mary's adherents, taking courage ſince the earl of Murray's death, held frequent councils upon the ſituation of their affairs. Their aim was to gain time, in expectation of the ſuccours which Verac, the French envoy[g], put them in hopes of. They expected likewiſe an aid from the Netherlands; and as theſe ſuccours could not be ready ſo

[a] They were commanded by Henry Champernoon, with this motto on his colours, "Finem det mihi virtus." Amongſt the volunteers was Walter Raleigh, a very young man, who now firſt began to be taken notice of. Camden, p. 423.

[b] This year, in September, died Edmund Bonner, late biſhop of London, and was buried on September 8, in St. George's church-yard in Southwark. He is commonly reported to have been a baſtard; but Mr. Strype affirms, that he was aſſured in 1695, by the late baron Lechmere, that Bonner was born at Hanley, in Worceſterſhire, of one Bonner, an honeſt poor man, in a houſe called Bonner's Place to this day, a little cottage of about five pounds a year, purchaſed of biſhop Bonner by the ſaid baron's great grandfather. See Strype's Ann. tom. I. p. 574, 575.

[c] It was done by James Hamilton, nephew to the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, who, after the battle of Langſide, had been ſentenced to be hanged. But eſcaping, by ſurrendering his eſtate, which he endeavoured in vain to recover, he vowed revenge, which he accompliſhed at Linlithgow, on the 23d of January 1570, upon the regent, who was moſt innocent, and had reſtored him to liberty. The regent, it ſeems, was told of it, and yet would not be at the pains to ſearch the houſe. The murderer eſcaped into France, where, it is ſaid, he was offered a great reward to aſſaſſinate admiral Coligni, but refuſed to do it, ſaying, though he had, to his ſorrow, revenged his own juſt grievances, he would never commit murder for reward. Buchanan. Thuanus, lib. 46. Melvil, p. 103. Thus fell the regent, "the good regent," as Melvil calls him; who adds, "for ſo he was, and will ever deſervedly be called. He was at firſt of a gentle nature, well inclined, good, wiſe, and ſtout. In his firſt uprifing, his hap was to light upon the beſt ſort of company. He was religiouſly educated, and devoutly inclined." So that Buchanan relates, he cauſed always, after dinner and ſupper, a chapter of the Bible to be read in his houſe. "Above all his virtues, which were not a few, he ſhined in piety towards God, ordering himſelf and his family in ſuch ſort, as it did more reſemble a church than a court," ſays Spotiſwood, p. 233. Melvil, p. 103. Thuanus highly extols him for his courage, juſtice, humanity, and other virtues, in theſe words—Dum viveret, ſciſſo factionibus regno, ſiniſtris rumoribus ab æmulis laceratus, ſed poſtquam mortuus eſt, veris laudibus etiam ab inimicis laudatus, qui & præſentiam animi in periculis, felicitatem in prælis, in jure dicundo æquietatem, morum gravitatem cum liberalitate & humanitate ſumma conjunctam prædicabant, lib. 46.

[g] Thuanus calls him Verac; and ſpeaks of him as one ſent by the Guiſes, and not by the king of France. The Engliſh and Scots call him Virac, and mention him as the French king's envoy. Rapin.

ſoon as they wiſhed, they endeavoured to amuſe the king's party by propoſals of agreement; but theſe conſtantly refuſed to conclude any thing before the aſſembly of the ſtates.

In this interval, the laird of Grange releaſed the duke of Chateleraut, the lord Herris, and the reſt of the priſoners, and thereby the queen's party was conſiderably ſtrengthened. It muſt however have been ſtill very weak, ſince it could act but by negotiations. Be this as it will, the heads of that party reſolved to meet at Linlithgow [h], by the name of the ſtates, ſince, there being no regent, they thought they had as much right to convene the ſtates as the other party. In this aſſembly they vainly ſought means to engage England to break with the whole Scottiſh nation. Elizabeth was too much upon her guard to be eaſily ſurpriſed. At laſt perceiving they could not ſucceed, they believed it neceſſary for their ſafety to try to become maſters of Edinburgh. But as this could not be effected by force, they deſired the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to permit them to hold their aſſembly in the city. This was readily granted; but the inhabitants kept ſo ſtrict a watch, that the project of the queen's adherents was fruſtrated. Mean time, there were ſundry negotiations between the two parties, which came to nothing.

Preſently after, upon news of the earl of Suſſex's being come to Berwick, the aſſembly of Edinburgh broke up. The heads had now ſent deputies to Elizabeth, to try to divert the impending ſtorm, and to gain time till the arrival of the French ſuccours. They even offered to make her umpire, and were ſo well ſeconded by the French embaſſadors, that ſhe readily conſented to be mediatrix between the two parties. But ſhe pretended the affair for which ſhe ſent an army into Scotland had no relation to the differences between the two parties, for it was only to chaſtiſe the violators of the peace, who were owned by neither party, without however either being able to procure her any ſatisfaction. So the earl of Suſſex received no counter-orders. When that general was come to Berwick, the duke of Chateleraut ſent Melvil to know whether he intended to join one of the parties, or endeavour their reconciliation. Melvil ſays in his Memoirs, that in his conferences with the earl of Suſſex, he found the earl had orders indeed to favour the king's party, but would not quite diſcourage the queen's [i]. He infers, that his chief aim was to continue the troubles in Scotland, which is very likely.

The Engliſh army entering Scotland in April, ravaged the lands of the Scots and Carrs, and of thoſe who were concerned in the late incurſion into England [k]. Camden ſays, in this expedition were burnt above three hundred houſes, and about fifty caſtles. Melvil adds, the earl of Suſſex aſſaulted and took the caſtles of Hume and Falſt, belonging to the lord Hume, to oblige him, who had hitherto remained in a ſort of neutrality, to declare for Mary's party, leſt the balance ſhould incline too much to the king's ſide. This conjecture is grounded upon the project formed by the queen's faction, to unite all Scotland, and upon Elizabeth's intereſt to prevent ſuch an union.

The beginning of May, the ſtates, ſummoned in the king's name, met at Edinburgh. The chief care was to depute Robert Pitcairn to Elizabeth, to beſpeak her favour, and acquaint her they were ready to chuſe a regent to her liking.

Whilſt Pitcairn was on his way, Mary's adherents beſieged the caſtle of Glaſgow, which made a braver defence than they expected. The earl of Suſſex having notice of it, detached ſir William Drury, governor of Berwick, with a thouſand foot and two hundred horſe. At their approach the beſiegers retired, and diſperſed themſelves in the mountains. Mean while, Drury being joined by a body of Scotch royaliſts, ravaged the lands of the Hamiltons, and took the caſtle of that name, belonging to the duke of Chateleraut.

In the mean time, Pitcairn returning from England, reported to the ſtates, that Elizabeth thought it very ſtrange, that ſince Murray's death ſhe had not been informed of the poſture of affairs in Scotland; that her ignorance in that reſpect had kept her in ſuſpence concerning the courſe ſhe was to take: that at length, tired with continual ſolicitations, ſhe had conſented that a conference ſhould be held between the two parties, wherein ſhe was very willing to act as a mediatrix, provided they would both refrain from violent methods, and leave things as they were: that ſhe deſired therefore the ſtates to obſerve this condition, and defer the election of a regent till the ſucceſs of the conference ſhould be known. This demand very much embarraſſed the ſtates. They could remain no longer without a head, and yet durſt not diſoblige the queen of England, who alone was able to ſupport them. Wherefore they reſolved to elect an Inter-rex, who could be revoked without any conſequence, and the choice fell upon the earl of Lenox, then in England. Shortly after, they received a letter from Elizabeth, acquainting them with her conſent that they might chuſe a regent, and recommending to them the earl of Lenox, who was inſtantly choſen.

Mean while the earl of Huntley, receiving from Spain money and ammunition, took the field, and ſtored the caſtle of Brechin. Shortly after, the earl of Lenox arrived in Scotland, and when the ſtates broke up, reſolved to recover that caſtle which was of ſo great importance. He aſſembled for that purpoſe his forces at Linlithgow, and demanded artillery and ammunition of Grange, governor of the caſtle of Edinburgh, who refuſed them, on pretence he would not be inſtrumental in ſhedding the blood of his countrymen. Grange was properly of the queen's party, but had other views than the reſt of her friends. His project was to ſet himſelf at the head of a third party, with which he pretended the other two ſhould join, to reſtore the queen to the crown upon certain terms. This was the cauſe of his ruin, as will hereafter appear. Sir James Melvil, author of the Memoirs ſo often quoted, was in the ſame ſentiments, as he diſcovers in ſeveral places, but probably waited for a more favourable opportunity to declare.

Grange's refuſal hindered not the regent from becoming maſter of Brechin, and compelling the earl of Huntley to fly to the mountains, where it was not eaſy to purſue him. Not long after, the queen's party obtained a truce [l], at queen Elizabeth's inſtance, who ſought only to prolong the affair; as on their part, the queen's adherents tried to gain time, to wait the effects of the duke of Alva's promiſes. Some time before, they had ſent the lord Seaton to him to deſire aid, and he had promiſed them ten thouſand men. But the diſorders which unexpectedly aroſe in the Netherlands, hindered him from performing his promiſe [m].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Scotland, ſeveral plots were forming in England to free the captive queen. Monluc, biſhop of Valence, came to London, and very earneſtly ſolicited the queen of Scots' liberty. The Spaniſh embaſſador was no leſs urgent for the ſame. The queen was the more jealous of the zeal of France and Spain for Mary, as at the ſame time pope Pius V. cauſed a bull, dated the laſt year, to be fixed up in the night in ſeveral places in London [n], whereby he excommunicated Elizabeth, and abſolved her ſubjects from their oath of allegiance. On the other hand, it was diſcovered that ſome Norfolk gentlemen had reſolved to take up arms and raiſe a rebellion in that county [o]. The conſpiracy being diſcovered, the authors were apprehended. But the queen pardoned all but three; two of whom were John Throckmorton and Felton, who poſted up the bull [p]. Shortly after, ſhe heard alſo that two of the earl of Derby's ſons [q] had plotted to free the queen of Scots. As John Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, who acted as Mary's embaſſador, was the chief promoter of all theſe plots, it was thought fit to confine him again to the biſhop of London's palace. He was but lately releaſed, having been arreſted for being deeply concerned in the earl of Northumberland's conſpiracy. Notwithſtanding the juſt ſuſpicions which all theſe machinations might raiſe in the queen, of the duke of Norfolk, who was conſidered as the head of Mary's party, he was diſcharged from the Tower [r]. But it was not till after he had expreſſed great ſorrow for his fault, and proteſted, by word of mouth and under his hand, that he would never more think of marrying the queen of Scots.

It was not difficult for Elizabeth to perceive, that the queen of Scots was the ſole cauſe of all theſe embarraſſments. If repoſe would have followed upon her releaſe, ſhe would have willingly freed her. But though Mary's adherents, and thoſe who ſolicited in her behalf, pretended they acted only from a motive of compaſſion, and exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of detaining her in priſon, Elizabeth was not ignorant that their views extended much farther. The pope, Spain, the houſe of Lorrain, the duke of Alva, the Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh catholics, confined not themſelves to the freeing the unhappy queen from captivity: their aim was to ſet her on the throne of England. Conſequently it was more dangerous for Elizabeth to releaſe her than to keep her confined. But ſhe did not think proper to diſcloſe her thoughts, as on their part her enemies were extremely careful to conceal their deſigns. She continued therefore to feign, that ſhe deſired nothing more earneſtly than to find means to reſtore Mary to the throne of Scotland, provided it could be done without danger to England. To that end ſhe ſent Cecil [s] to make her ſome captious propoſal, tending only to dazzle the public. Mary, hearing the propoſals, returned a general anſwer, declining to give a particular reply to each article, without the conſent of the heads of her party in Scotland, to whom ſhe deſired they ſhould be communicated, that they might anſwer them as they ſhould think proper. The propoſals with the anſwers were to this effect:

I. The queen of Scots ſhall ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and renounce her claim to the crown of England, during the life of queen Elizabeth and her iſſue.

Anſwer. Agreed.

II. She ſhall not make nor renew alliance with any power whatever againſt England.

Anſwer. By renouncing the alliance of France, the queen will forfeit her dower, and the Scotch nation be great loſers. Wherefore the queen of England muſt make amends for theſe things ſome other way.

III. She ſhall admit no foreign troops into Scotland.

Anſwer. Agreed, with this reſtriction, unleſs ſhe is not able with her own forces to ſuppreſs the rebellions of her ſubjects.

IV. She ſhall hold no intelligence with the Engliſh or Iriſh, without the queen of England's knowledge.

Anſwer. Agreed, provided the queen of England will hold none with the Scots.

V. She ſhall deliver up the Engliſh and Iriſh rebels.

Anſwer. If there are any Engliſh or Iriſh rebels in Scotland, they muſt be demanded of thoſe who have taken up arms againſt their queen.

VI. She ſhall make the Engliſh borderers amends for the loſſes ſuſtained in the late invaſion.

Anſwer. Commiſſioners on both ſides ſhall be appointed to examine the damages which were done.

VII. She ſhall proſecute, and puniſh according to law, the murderers of king Henry and of the earl of Murray.

Anſwer. Agreed.

VIII. She ſhall give her ſon for hoſtage.

Anſwer. Her ſon is not in her power.

IX. She ſhall not marry any Engliſhman without the queen of England's knowledge, nor any other without the conſent of the ſtates of Scotland.

Anſwer. To be tied to theſe terms is a thing unworthy of a queen.

X. The Scots ſhall not paſs into Ireland without the queen of England's permiſſion.

Anſwer. Agreed, provided the Iriſh be not ſuffered to paſs into Scotland without the queen of Scots leave.

XI. She ſhall give ſix hoſtages of the queen of England's naming.

Anſwer. Agreed, provided the duke of Chateleraut, the earls of Huntley, Argyle, and Athol, be excepted.

XII. If ſhe attempt any thing againſt queen Elizabeth, ſhe ſhall forfeit the right ſhe claims to the crown of England.

Anſwer. Agreed, on condition that in the like caſe the queen of England will be liable to ſome equivalent penalty.

XIII. The caſtles of Hume and Falſt ſhall be three years in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

Anſwer. This cannot be granted: on the contrary, the queen of England is required to reſtore theſe caſtles to the lord Hume.

XIV. Some places on the borders of Galloway or Cantyr ſhall be put into the hands of the Engliſh, to hinder the Scots from infeſting Ireland.

Anſwer. To deliver ſuch places to the Engliſh would be creating a perpetual war in Scotland.

All theſe articles ſhall be confirmed and ratified by the ſtates.

There is no anſwer to this article.

It would be very eaſy, in examining of theſe propoſals, to ſhew that ſome were only to create a belief of Elizabeth's acting with moderation and ſincerity; that others were but ſnares to ſurpriſe the queen of Scots; and that ſome there were, the execution whereof were impracticable. Elizabeth's deſign therefore was only to amuſe.

On the other hand, the anſwers were as little proper to procure an agreement between the two queens. They who drew the anſwers, pretended, that Mary ſhould treat Elizabeth upon equal terms, as ſhe might have done, had ſhe been on her throne at Edinburgh: but the Engliſh meant no ſuch thing. Mary was priſoner in England, and the point was to releaſe and reſtore her to her throne. She accepted the conditions to obtain theſe two great advantages; but withal ſhe is made to ſay, that ſhe expected Elizabeth ſhould be bound to the like or equivalent terms. This was as much as to ſay, that otherwiſe ſhe would not accept what was offered her. Nothing could be more grateful to Elizabeth, ſince it was a certain means to prolong the negotiation. Had Mary accepted the propoſals without any reſtrictions, ſhe would perhaps have embarraſſed Elizabeth's council. At leaſt they would have been forced to ſeek means to obſtruct the execution, and thereby the fault would manifeſtly have been on the ſide of the court of England.

Elizabeth, it is certain, had no deſire to releaſe her priſoner on any terms whatever. She was a very dangerous rival, even when in priſon, how much more, had ſhe been at liberty? From her return to Scotland, upon the death of her firſt huſband, ſhe had never ceaſed holding intelligence in England, to try to excite the Engliſh to rebellion. This is what very evidently appears in Melvil's Memoirs. Her misfortune to fall into the hands of Elizabeth did not make her diſcontinue her practices. On the other hand, the project of her marriage with the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Northumberland's conſpiracy, and the correſpondence of her adherents with foreign courts, tended only to raiſe her to the throne of England, even in queen Elizabeth life-time. In ſhort, it was manifeſt the pope, the king of Spain, the princes of Lorrain, the Engliſh catholics, all the Iriſh, and part of the Scots, were labouring to accompliſh this deſign. How imprudent would it have been to releaſe her, that ſhe might the better proſecute her pretenſions? It is true, after the death of Francis II. ſhe quitted the title of queen of England, and proteſted ſhe claimed not the crown of England till after Elizabeth and her poſterity. But, that a bare proteſtation may ſerve for ſecurity, the ſincerity of the perſon proteſting muſt be firſt well eſtabliſhed. Here was quite the contrary, all Mary's proceedings having ſhewn ſhe deſiſted not from her claim. So her bare proteſtation was only her word, on which it was very dangerous to rely. Certainly Mary was unhappy only in having too zealous adherents, who, by all their proceedings, puſhed her continually towards her deſtruction: but this is no wonder. They acted not for her ſake, but for their own ends, and the intereſt of the Romiſh religion, to which ſhe ſerved for pretence. Sir James Melvil, who was not Mary's enemy, obſerves in his Memoirs, that both parties equally hurted her; the one in acting directly againſt her, the other in ſerving her with too much zeal. He adds, the queen's party groundleſly flattered themſelves with ruining their adverſaries, who were ſupported by England. The reaſon he gives is very ſtrong, namely, there was no likelihood that the queen's party would ever receive great aſſiſtance from the court of France, which dreaded nothing ſo much as to ſee the two crowns of England and Scotland upon the ſame head. He relates upon this occaſion a particular, which may be of great ſervice to diſcover the ſituation of Mary's affairs. Sir Robert Melvil, at his return from his embaſſy to England, gave queen Mary a paper, ſigned by five and twenty Engliſh earls and lords, promiſing to ſet her on the throne of England. Mary ſent the paper to the cardinal

[s] And ſir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the Exchequer, in October. The queen of Scots was then at Chatteſworth in Derbyſhire. Camden, p. 429. Leſley's Negotiat. p. 100.

Q. Elizabeth

of Lorrain, her uncle, deſiring withal the aſſiſtance neceſſary to execute that deſign. But the cardinal himſelf diſſuaded queen Catherine de Medici from thinking of ſuch an enterpriſe, demonſtrating the prejudice France would receive by the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. Nay, to hinder the thing from being effected by other means, they gave notice thereof to queen Elizabeth, who always feigned ignorance of what ſhe was told by the court of France. Melvil affirms, he had this from the queen of Scots own mouth, at a time when ſhe was diſſatisfied with the cardinal. It is evident, then, that the eagerneſs of Mary's friends was prejudicial to her: but eſpecially they who continued the war in Scotland, only helped to ſecure Elizabeth's affairs, who thereby was ſheltered from the quarter ſhe had moſt to fear; whereas the Scots by their union would have been more conſiderable, and doubtleſs Elizabeth would have had more condeſcenſion for her priſoner. Upon this principle it was, that Grange and Melvil laboured to procure an agreement between the two parties, wherein they endeavoured to ſerve Mary effectually. But it was not eaſy to bring paſſionate men to ſacrifice their paſſions and intereſts to the good of the public. The council of England improving theſe diſpoſitions, never ceaſed fomenting the troubles of Scotland, under colour of appeaſing them, till it ſhould be Elizabeth's intereſt to end them. This Melvil plainly ſhews in his Memoirs; but it would be too long to allege the proofs. Thus Mary was in a wretched condition by the ill counſels which were given her, and which ſhe was ſo unwiſe as to follow with ardour. The biſhop of Roſs, her agent at London, a great zealot for his religion, but whoſe views were not very extenſive, did her infinite damage by his paſſion and pains to cheriſh the diſcontent of the Engliſh catholics. As Elizabeth had good ſpies, ſhe was not ignorant that this pretended embaſſador was concerned in all the plots laid againſt her, from whence ſhe could not but infer that he acted agreeably to his miſtreſs's inclinations and orders. As ſoon as this prelate had the articles propoſed to Mary, he ſent copies to the pope, to the kings of France and Spain, to the duke of Alva, intimating to all theſe potentates, that Mary would be at length conſtrained to accept them, if ſome vigorous effort were not made in her favour. But his ſolicitations were fruitleſs. The king of Spain, being then employed in his marriage with Ann of Auſtria, his niece[t], daughter of the emperor Maximilian, left to the duke of Alva the care of aſſiſting the queen of Scots; but the duke was himſelf employed in the Netherlands. The city of Bruſſels refuſing to pay the hundredth penny, gallows were now prepared to puniſh the diſobedient, when he heard the prince of Orange was levying an army in Germany. So, inſtead of aiding the queen of Scots, he was preparing for the war which he ſaw ready to kindle in the Low Countries, and wherein probably he would have to deal with the inhabitants of theſe provinces, as well as the Germans.

As for the court of France, beſides that they never really intended to ſet the crown of England on the head of the queen of Scots, but only to create Elizabeth troubles, they began to form projects, which ſuffered them not openly to eſpouſe Mary's cauſe. Though the king had gained ſeveral victories over the Hugonots, he ſaw with grief there was no end of the affair; and that theſe people, chuſing to die ſword in hand, rather than at the ſtake or the gallows, it would be very difficult to deſtroy them by open force. He reſolved therefore, in order to attain his ends more eaſily, to amuſe them with a peace, which he granted them in Auguſt this year. From that time his ſole care was to diſſemble his ſentiments, and make them believe they had nothing more to fear from him. To convince them the better that the deſign of extirpating them was entirely relinquiſhed, Catherine de Medici propoſed a marriage between the king her ſon and Elizabeth, who replied in two words, that he was too Great and too Little. This project failing, Catherine propoſed her ſecond ſon, the duke of Anjou, as a more ſuitable match. This was therefore no favourable juncture for the queen of Scotland, ſince the court of France could undertake nothing openly in her behalf without breaking their own meaſures[u].

[1571] Secretary Cecil was created baron of Burleigh the beginning of the year 1571. No man had better deſerved than he to receive this mark of diſtinction, which was very conſiderable in the reign of a queen who conferred honours with great circumſpection.

I have ſeveral times obſerved, that Elizabeth was reſolved not to declare publicly for either of the Scotch factions, but to prolong the negotiation as much as poſſible, that ſhe might never want a pretence to detain Mary in priſon. We are going to ſee an effect of this reſolution in the courſe ſhe purſued during the year 1571. Though in June the laſt year, ſhe had agreed to a conference between the two parties, of which ſhe was to be mediatrix, ſix months were paſſed, and nothing more ſaid of it. At laſt Elizabeth, reſolving to negotiate her marriage with the duke of Anjou, did not queſtion but on that occaſion the French court would ſtrongly ſolicit her in behalf of the queen of Scots. To be provided therefore with an evaſion, ſhe cauſed at length the conference to be held in the months of February and March, that ſhe might be able to ſay to the king of France, the affair of the queen of Scots was upon terms of agreement; fully bent, however, to manage it ſo that the conference ſhould be without effect.

The earl of Morton, Pitcairn, and others[w], were ſent from Scotland to the conference, which was to be held at London, to maintain the king's cauſe. For Mary, appeared the biſhops of Roſs and Galloway, with the lord Levingſton; and the queen appointed ſeven of her privy counſellors[x] to hear the reaſons of both parties. They immediately required the earl of Morton, and his colleagues, to declare plainly the inducement of the Scots to depoſe their queen, and give the crown to the prince her ſon. The Scotch deputies delivered a large remonſtrance in writing, wherein they took for granted that the queen was privy to the king her huſband's death, and afterwards married the earl of Bothwell, the murderer; that to juſtify their conduct with regard to the queen, there were two points to be examined, the one of fact, the other of right. For the firſt, they ſtood to the proofs given by the earl of Murray at Hampton-court before the Engliſh commiſſioners, and which the queen of England had in her hands: that the earl had ſo evidently proved Mary guilty of the crime laid to her charge, that they thought it needleſs to repeat the ſame things, which beſides they could not without great reluctance. As to the point of right, which conſiſted in knowing whether the Scots had power to depoſe their ſovereigns when they became unworthy of the throne, they maintained it was an undoubted right enjoyed by the Scotch nation, ever ſince the beginning of their monarchy. They ſupported this principle with divers inſtances drawn from the hiſtory of Scotland and of other countries, as Spain and Denmark.

Elizabeth ſtill purſuing her ſcheme, not to declare herſelf, briefly anſwered to the Scots remonſtrance, which was communicated to her, that ſhe was not thoroughly convinced of the juſtice of their proceedings, and deſired them to confer with her miniſters, in order to find ſome expedient to adjuſt the affair. But they replied, it was needleſs to ſearch for expedients, ſince they had no power to agree to the diminution of the king's authority. Whereupon Elizabeth ordered a thing to be propoſed to Mary's agents, which ſhe knew they would not accept; and this was, to give her the chief lords of their party in hoſtage, with ſome places in Scotland[y]. And indeed they boldly rejected it, and made other offers which the Engliſh commiſſioners rejected in their turn. At laſt, they demanded of the Scots to give the young king of Scotland in hoſtage to the queen; to which they anſwered, they had not power to promiſe any ſuch thing. Camden ſays here, that Mary's agents made a jeſt of this evaſion, affirming, "the deputies wanted not power, ſince the ſame crime renders all the accomplices equal."

At laſt, Elizabeth admitting the Scotch deputies to an audience, agreed with them that the affair could not be determined but by the ſtates of the kingdom. Then ſhe deſired them to order it ſo, that another conference ſhould be held in Scotland during the ſeſſion of the parliament, which was to meet in May. She detained them however ſome time longer, being willing to know, before their departure, whether the queen of Scots would conſent to the conference. But ſo far was ſhe from agreeing to it, that ſhe complained very much of her deputies ſuffering her right to be called in queſtion, and revoked their powers. She ordered however the biſhop of Roſs to reſide ſtill at London, as her embaſſa-

dor. This gave Elizabeth great ſuſpicion, being ſenſible the biſhop was the chief promoter of the plots againſt her; but ſhe durſt not refuſe him, for fear of giving occaſion to ſay, ſhe did not own Mary for queen, and thereby wound her pretended impartiality. At length the Scotch deputies departed, the 8th of April, after a ſix weeks ſtay in London to no purpoſe. Wherefore it was not Elizabeth's intention that this conference ſhould produce an agreement. Though this did not evidently appear in her whole conduct, it might eaſily be ſeen in a letter of Cecil to Walſingham, then embaſſador in France, wherein he told him plainly, that the ſole aim in that conference was to gain time. Another letter to Walſingham from the earl of Leiceſter, about the ſame thing, manifeſtly diſcovers Elizabeth's policy. The earl told him, the queen agreed that Mary was unworthy to ſway the ſcepter, but could hardly believe her ſubjects had power to depoſe her. That therefore ſhe remained in ſuſpence, not being able to determine either to reſtore queen Mary or defend the cauſe of the Scots, becauſe ſhe did not think it entirely juſt. During this pretended uncertainty, Mary remained ſtill in priſon.

The truce between the two Scotch factions being expired, during the conference at London, or ſhortly after, the earl of Lenox took the town of Dunbarton by ſurpriſe, which had till then been in the hands of the queen's adherents. Verac, the French embaſſador, was taken there, and ſent to St. Andrew's, from whence he was readily ſuffered to make his eſcape. But the caſe was otherwiſe with James Hamilton, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, who, being alſo taken priſoner upon the ſame occaſion, and ſent to Sterling, was condemned to be hanged. He was accuſed of being an accomplice in the murder of the late king by a prieſt [z], who was brought face to face, of whom, inſtead of defending himſelf, he demanded, what thoſe prieſts deſerved who revealed the ſecrets of confeſſions? It is ſaid, Cardan, going to Scotland to cure him of a dropſy, told him, when he had reſtored him to health, that he had by the help of his medicines freed him from the preſent danger, but it was not in his power to prevent his dying on the gallows.

Elizabeth was not wholly taken up with the affairs of Scotland. There was another which gave her no leſs trouble, by reaſon of its difficulties, and the conſequences it might be attended with. Her miniſters knowing her enemies were in perpetual motion, and when one plot failed, were immediately forming another, were afraid her prudence would in the end be defeated. In Walſingham's Negotiations, there is a letter from the ſecretary of ſtate, telling him, that whilſt the affair of the queen of Scots was in hand, her friends were thinking of carrying her away, of which the court had ſome dark intimations. The earl of Leiceſter wrote to the ſame embaſſador, that Mary's adherents were more bold than ever, which in all appearance proceeded from their hopes of the ſucceſs of ſome freſh attempt. The miniſters therefore believed nothing but a marriage could ſecure the queen from ſo many conſpiracies which were daily renewed. An alliance with ſome powerful prince would naturally produce a good effect, by reaſon of the ſuccours which might be thence received upon occaſion; beſides that it would ſtrike a dread into the queen's enemies. On the other hand, they imagined, if it pleaſed God to bleſs the marriage, the birth of a prince would deprive the queen of Scots of great part of her adherents. Wherefore they never ceaſed to repreſent to Elizabeth the reaſons which ought to determine her to marry. At laſt, whether ſhe yielded to theſe reaſons, or to be freed from their importunities, ſhe told them, that nothing hindered her but the difficulty of finding a ſuitable match; and indeed it was not eaſy to make a fit choice: ſhe muſt take either a proteſtant or a popiſh prince. But as two principal inducements prompted her to marry, namely, to make a ſtrong alliance, and to have a ſucceſſor; in chuſing a proteſtant, the firſt of theſe inducements would not be anſwered, becauſe there was no prince of the reformed religion whoſe alliance could be very advantageous to England. In reſolving upon a catholic, there was no choice, ſince the duke of Anjou, the king of France's brother, was the only fit perſon. But this project had its difficulties. The queen gave to underſtand, that in marrying ſhe did not mean to give herſelf a maſter, or even an equal, ſince ſhe was reſolved to hold the reins of the government alone, and communicate to her ſpouſe the external honours of royalty only. In the ſecond place, ſhe did not pretend the Engliſh catholics ſhould reap any advantage from her marriage with a prince of their religion. But there was no likelihood the duke of Anjou would ſubmit to what the queen deſired, or diſſemble his religion to enjoy the bare title of king, which was not ſufficient to ſatisfy his ambition. Mean while, the miniſters were ſo urgent with the queen to marry, that at length they obtained her conſent to treat with France upon that ſubject. But very probably ſhe gave her conſent only becauſe ſhe imagined it would be in her power to break off the negotiation whenever ſhe pleaſed, by the difficulties ſhe ſhould ſtart. She concealed her ſentiments however from her miniſters: Burleigh thought her ſincere for ſome time; the earl of Leiceſter was not entirely of that opinion, but knew not what to think. Be this as it will, the queen was told that Catherine de Medici, having plainly perceived the reaſons which moved her to reject the propoſals of a marriage with Charles IX. had intimated that the duke of Anjou would be more proper for her. It was alſo hinted to her, that the young prince was by no means a bigot, and might poſſibly be brought to communicate with the church of England. The only thing therefore was ſo to manage it that the French court ſhould make the firſt advances, after which the treaty might begin. To that end, in Auguſt 1570, Norris was recalled from his embaſſy in France, to make room for ſir Francis Walſingham, who was doubtleſs thought more proper to manage the affair, being alſo a creature of the lord Burleigh, who was extremely deſirous of the marriage.

Walſingham ſtayed all the reſt of the year, and part of the next, at Paris, without any overture being made, and yet the marriage was much talked of. He informed the court of England of it, and preſently after received inſtructions from Burleigh, importing, that if any perſon of diſtinction ſhould ſpeak to him of the marriage, he might anſwer, that upon the report, he had taken care to enquire how the queen ſtood inclined in that reſpect, and found, as the good of her people was her chief view, ſhe had reſolved to marry if ſhe could meet with a ſuitable match. Shortly after the lord Buckhurſt being ſent to Paris [a], as embaſſador extraordinary, king Charles, and his mother queen Catherine opened their minds to him upon that ſubject, and a negotiation was begun. But as this project was not executed, I ſhall content myſelf, without deſcending to particulars, to ſhew here the real cauſes of the breaking off the negotiation.

It was almoſt certain neither Elizabeth nor the court of France had any deſire to conclude the marriage, though it ſeemed to be ſeriouſly negotiated on both ſides. Elizabeth found a double advantage in this feigned negotiation. Firſt, ſhe amuſed her own miniſters, who preſſed her earneſtly to marry. Secondly, her enemies believing the marriage was really going to be concluded, would of courſe remain quiet. And indeed it was not likely they ſhould think of attacking her, when they ſaw her upon the point of being ſtrictly united with France. It was requiſite therefore, the better to amuſe thoſe who might have formed plots againſt her, to ſhew ſome earneſtneſs for the marriage, leſt, if ſhe acted with indifference in the affair, her moſt ſecret thoughts ſhould be diſcovered.

On the other ſide, the court of France propoſed the marriage only to amuſe Elizabeth, and with her all the proteſtants of Europe, but particularly the Hugonots. In all likelihood Charles IX. had now formed the barbarous plot which broke out the next year. But this was only the beginning of a greater project, which was to deſtroy all the proteſtants in general, and ſuddenly attack Elizabeth herſelf. The pope and the king of Spain were engaged in the deſign, and pretended to be alarmed at what was negotiating at Paris, to enſnare the more eaſily thoſe they intended to ſurpriſe. Wherefore, it was neceſſary for the court of France to appear very deſirous of the match, and to yield as far as poſſible, but without concluding any thing in point of religion. So the difficulties ſtarted by Elizabeth in the negotiation were extremely ſubſervient to the deſigns of the French, as they gave them room to make advances capable of deceiving the public, and cauſing it to be thought they had no ill deſign againſt the proteſtant religion. By this means they removed all ſorts of ſuſpicion, both from the court of England and the Hugonots. Indeed it was hardly poſſible to conjecture, that when the king and his mother teſtified ſuch a zeal to accompliſh the propoſed marriage, they were thinking of extirpating all the Hugonots in the kingdom. Nay, they were extremely careful to remove this ſuſpicion by their great diſſimulation towards them, pretending to lend an ear to the leaders of the Hugonots, and place entire confidence in them. But, notwithſtanding all their care to conceal their deſigns, the French court made Elizabeth very jealous during the whole negotia-

of Lorrain, her uncle, deſiring withal the aſſiſtance neceſſary to execute that deſign. But the cardinal himſelf diſſuaded queen Catherine de Medici from thinking of ſuch an enterpriſe, demonſtrating the prejudice France would receive by the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. Nay, to hinder the thing from being effected by other means, they gave notice thereof to queen Elizabeth, who always feigned ignorance of what ſhe was told by the court of France. Melvil affirms, he had this from the queen of Scots own mouth, at a time when ſhe was diſſatisfied with the cardinal. It is evident, then, that the eagerneſs of Mary's friends was prejudicial to her: but eſpecially they who continued the war in Scotland, only helped to ſecure Elizabeth's affairs, who thereby was ſheltered from the quarter ſhe had moſt to fear; whereas the Scots by their union would have been more conſiderable, and doubtleſs Elizabeth would have had more condeſcenſion for her priſoner. Upon this principle it was, that Grange and Melvil laboured to procure an agreement between the two parties, wherein they endeavoured to ſerve Mary effectually. But it was not eaſy to bring paſſionate men to ſacrifice their paſſions and intereſts to the good of the public. The council of England improving theſe diſpoſitions, never ceaſed fomenting the troubles of Scotland, under colour of appeaſing them, till it ſhould be Elizabeth's intereſt to end them. This Melvil plainly ſhews in his Memoirs; but it would be too long to allege the proofs. Thus Mary was in a wretched condition by the ill counſels which were given her, and which ſhe was ſo unwiſe as to follow with ardour. The biſhop of Roſs, her agent at London, a great zealot for his religion, but whoſe views were not very extenſive, did her infinite damage by his paſſion and pains to cheriſh the diſcontent of the Engliſh catholics. As Elizabeth had good ſpies, ſhe was not ignorant that this pretended embaſſador was concerned in all the plots laid againſt her, from whence ſhe could not but infer that he acted agreeably to his miſtreſs's inclinations and orders. As ſoon as this prelate had the articles propoſed to Mary, he ſent copies to the pope, to the kings of France and Spain, to the duke of Alva, intimating to all theſe potentates, that Mary would be at length conſtrained to accept them, if ſome vigorous effort were not made in her favour. But his ſolicitations were fruitleſs. The king of Spain, being then employed in his marriage with Ann of Auſtria, his niece[t], daughter of the emperor Maximilian, left to the duke of Alva the care of aſſiſting the queen of Scots; but the duke was himſelf employed in the Netherlands. The city of Bruſſels refuſing to pay the hundredth penny, gallows were now prepared to puniſh the diſobedient, when he heard the prince of Orange was levying an army in Germany. So, inſtead of aiding the queen of Scots, he was preparing for the war which he ſaw ready to kindle in the Low Countries, and wherein probably he would have to deal with the inhabitants of theſe provinces, as well as the Germans.

As for the court of France, beſides that they never really intended to ſet the crown of England on the head of the queen of Scots, but only to create Elizabeth troubles, they began to form projects, which ſuffered them not openly to eſpouſe Mary's cauſe. Though the king had gained ſeveral victories over the Hugonots, he ſaw with grief there was no end of the affair; and that theſe people, chuſing to die ſword in hand, rather than at the ſtake or the gallows, it would be very difficult to deſtroy them by open force. He reſolved therefore, in order to attain his ends more eaſily, to amuſe them with a peace, which he granted them in Auguſt this year. From that time his ſole care was to diſſemble his ſentiments, and make them believe they had nothing more to fear from him. To that end, in Auguſt 1570, Norris was recalled from his embaſſy in France, to make room for ſir Francis Walſingham, who was doubtleſs thought more proper to manage the affair, being alſo a creature of the lord Burleigh, who was extremely deſirous of the marriage.

Walſingham ſtayed all the reſt of the year, and part of the next, at Paris, without any overture being made, and yet the marriage was much talked of. He informed the court of England of it, and preſently after received inſtructions from Burleigh, importing, that if any perſon of diſtinction ſhould ſpeak to him of the marriage, he might anſwer, that upon the report, he had taken care to enquire how the queen ſtood inclined in that reſpect, and found, as the good of her people was her chief view, ſhe had reſolved to marry if ſhe could meet with a ſuitable match. Shortly after the lord Buckhurſt being ſent to Paris [a], as embaſſador extraordinary, king Charles, and his mother queen Catherine opened their minds to him upon that ſubject, and a negotiation was begun. But as this project was not executed, I ſhall content myſelf, without deſcending to particulars, to ſhew here the real cauſes of the breaking off the negotiation.

It was almoſt certain neither Elizabeth nor the court of France had any deſire to conclude the marriage, though it ſeemed to be ſeriouſly negotiated on both ſides. Elizabeth found a double advantage in this feigned negotiation. Firſt, ſhe amuſed her own miniſters, who preſſed her earneſtly to marry. Secondly, her enemies believing the marriage was really going to be concluded, would of courſe remain quiet. And indeed it was not likely they ſhould think of attacking her, when they ſaw her upon the point of being ſtrictly united with France. It was requiſite therefore, the better to amuſe thoſe who might have formed plots againſt her, to ſhew ſome earneſtneſs for the marriage, leſt, if ſhe acted with indifference in the affair, her moſt ſecret thoughts ſhould be diſcovered.

On the other ſide, the court of France propoſed the marriage only to amuſe Elizabeth, and with her all the proteſtants of Europe, but particularly the Hugonots. In all likelihood Charles IX. had now formed the barbarous plot which broke out the next year. But this was only the beginning of a greater project, which was to deſtroy all the proteſtants in general, and ſuddenly attack Elizabeth herſelf. The pope and the king of Spain were engaged in the deſign, and pretended to be alarmed at what was negotiating at Paris, to enſnare the more eaſily thoſe they intended to ſurpriſe. Wherefore, it was neceſſary for the court of France to appear very deſirous of the match, and to yield as far as poſſible, but without concluding any thing in point of religion. So the difficulties ſtarted by Elizabeth in the negotiation were extremely ſubſervient to the deſigns of the French, as they gave them room to make advances capable of deceiving the public, and cauſing it to be thought they had no ill deſign againſt the proteſtant religion. By this means they removed all ſorts of ſuſpicion, both from the court of England and the Hugonots. Indeed it was hardly poſſible to conjecture, that when the king and his mother teſtified ſuch a zeal to accompliſh the propoſed marriage, they were thinking of extirpating all the Hugonots in the kingdom. Nay, they were extremely careful to remove this ſuſpicion by their great diſſimulation towards them, pretending to lend an ear to the leaders of the Hugonots, and place entire confidence in them. But, notwithſtanding all their care to conceal their deſigns, the French court made Elizabeth very jealous during the whole negotiation, by their preſſing and repeated inſtances for the queen of Scots liberty. Elizabeth could not underſtand this way of proceeding. The king of France, as ſhe thought, having propoſed the marriage with the duke of Anjou, and a ſtrict alliance between the two crowns, ſhould have been entirely in her intereſt; whereas ſhe ſaw him concerned for Mary's, which was directly contrary. Nay ſhe diſcovered at that time, that France privately favoured Mary's projects, which could not be reconciled with the deſign of the marriage and alliance. For this reaſon ſhe frequently intimated to the king and his mother, that ſhe was offended at their conduct. But ſhe was anſwered with proteſtations of friendſhip, eſteem, and regard; and with excuſes, that Mary being queen dowager of France, leſs could not be done than to ſolicit in her behalf. Charles did not even ſcruple to own privately, that what he did was only for forms ſake, that he might not appear entirely to forſake the unfortunate queen. Perhaps it will be thought ſtrange, that Charles ſhould not carry his diſſimulation ſo far as to declare openly, he would not concern himſelf any more about Mary; but this policy would have ſpoiled all. The deſign of the league of religion was to extirpate the Hugonots at once, that being freed from the fear of any diverſion in France, the catholics might carry their arms into England. If therefore Mary's reſtoration to the throne of Scotland could have been obtained, whether by treaty or ſolicitation, or any other way, England might have been invaded with much greater eaſe, whilſt inſurrections were raiſed within the kingdom. This was the ſcheme which had been formed from the beginning of Elizabeth's reign. To invade England by ſea would neceſſarily have been very expenſive, beſides, that ſuch an undertaking was liable to greater inconveniencies, as Philip II. afterwards experienced. Scotland therefore alone could afford a paſſage, but to that end the kingdom was to be governed by perſons well affected to the catholic religion. This was the aim of all the intrigues, public and private, for the queen of Scots reſtoration. I am perſuaded that they who have intimated that compaſſion for queen Mary made her friends act for her, had no juſt idea of the inceſſant and extraordinary pains in her favour. I do not however deny, that, among thoſe who ſerved her, ſome acted from that motive; but that was not the thought of thoſe who managed affairs. In the intention of thoſe, Mary's reſtoration was only a means to execute greater projects.

It is therefore certain the court of France never ſeriouſly thought of concluding the marriage; and, in all appearance, the queen herſelf was as little inclined to it, though her miniſters did all they could to perſuade her. As ſhe had declared at firſt, by Walſingham, that ſhe would not allow the duke of Anjou the exerciſe of his religion, the court of France imagined there would be no great danger in making ſome advances with reſpect to that point, ſince they were almoſt ſure of finding in it an occaſion of rupture, as well as a continual pretence to prolong the treaty as they pleaſed. The duke of Anjou came therefore by degrees to be ſatisfied with a little chapel in ſome private corner of the palace; and the French embaſſador had orders to proteſt, that the duke could not be contented with leſs, and to demand a poſitive anſwer in ten days. Hitherto the queen had refuſed to agree that the duke ſhould have the exerciſe of his religion at all; nay, had pretended he ſhould accompany her when ſhe went to chapel, and be preſent at divine ſervice. The buſineſs then was to anſwer the duke's propoſal, which probably was to be the laſt. But, whilſt ſhe was deliberating, the French embaſſador ſhewed, to ſome perſon of diſtinction at court, letters from Paris, whereby it appeared, the court of France did not inſiſt upon that article ſo ſtrenuouſly as ſome would have inſinuated. On the other hand, the lord Burleigh was informed, by a Frenchman of note, that, if the queen ſtood her ground, the court of France would give way in the end. Moreover Walſingham wrote from Paris, that the duke of Montmorency had given his opinion in council, that it would be beſt not to mention religion at all in the treaty of marriage, which was the ſame thing as leaving this article entirely to the queen. All theſe inſinuations were ſo many ſnares laid for the queen by the court of France, to induce her to refuſe a thing which ſeemed ſo reaſonable, and that it might appear the rupture proceeded not from the duke. She ſuffered herſelf to be ſurpriſed, and in her anſwer deviſted not from her pretenſions.

Elizabeth's obſtinacy convincing the king of France he might venture to proceed one ſtep farther, he offered to leave the article of religion undetermined. But Elizabeth would not agree to it, ſaying, it would be an infallible means to ſow diſcord between her and her ſpouſe. In ſhort, the court of France went ſo far, as to be ſatisfied with the queen's promiſe in writing, that the duke of Anjou ſhould not be proſecuted according to the laws of England, if he ſecretly exerciſed his religion in a private chapel. Whereupon Elizabeth, with great difficulty, agreed at length to this:

"That if the duke of Anjou would promiſe to accompany the queen when ſhe went to chapel, and would not refuſe to hear and learn the principles of the church of England, ſhe would agree that neither himſelf nor his family ſhould be compelled againſt their conſcience to conform to the Engliſh church, till they ſhould be otherwiſe perſuaded. Moreover, that neither himſelf nor his domeſtics, the number of whom ſhould be agreed upon, ſhould be diſturbed in the uſe of any rites and ceremonies different from thoſe eſtabliſhed by law, provided they were not repugnant to the word of God, and on condition it were done in a private place, for the ſatisfying their conſciences, and ſo as the people might not take occaſion from thence to violate the eſtabliſhed laws of the land." It was with much difficulty that the French embaſſador got the terms, "repugnant to the word of God," to be changed into theſe, "repugnant to the church of God."

It is eaſy to perceive, that when Elizabeth ſeemed to relax a little on this article, ſhe added reſtrictions which required explication, and which left a door to recede, in caſe ſhe had been taken at her word. Hence therefore it may be inferred, that ſhe did inſiſt ſo much upon the article of religion, only becauſe ſhe thought it ſerviceable to break off the negotiation. Accordingly we find, in Walſingham's Memoirs, that the earl of Leiceſter and the lord Burleigh were convinced at laſt ſhe had no mind to marry.

The affair ſtanding thus, Charles IX. told the queen, by La Mothe Fenelon, his embaſſador, that he thought her anſwer very hard, and deſired her to ſend ſome truſty perſon to ſettle with him every thing relating to the marriage. Elizabeth replied, ſhe could not proceed to any other article, without knowing firſt, whether the king and the duke intended to allow what ſhe had propoſed, with reſpect to religion. So the buſineſs ſtopped there. Charles ſtill feigned to expect the truſty perſon he had demanded, and the queen pretended ſhe ſtaid for the court of France's conſent to the article concerning religion, as ſhe had ſent it. The negotiation laſted from March till September, and the rupture altered not the good underſtanding between the two courts. On the contrary, Charles thanked the queen for dealing ſo freely with him; and, without ſaying any more of the marriage, deſired to make a defenſive league with her. Elizabeth readily conſented. As ſhe had no ally, it was her intereſt to unite with France, as well to diſengage that crown from the queen of Scots intereſt, as to diſcourage the pope, the king of Spain, and the Engliſh catholics, by the alliance. But ſhe knew not that Charles's aim was only to amuſe both her and the Hugonots, whoſe deſtruction was determined, though he affected to careſs and make uſe of them to execute his pretended projects againſt Spain. However this be, Elizabeth ſent ſecretary Smith into France, to negotiate the league jointly with Walſingham.

Whilſt the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou was treating at Paris, and, both ſides affected to publiſh it, would ſoon be concluded, the queen of Scots was in a grievous condition, becauſe ſhe plainly ſaw ſhe was going to loſe France. This obliged her, without doubt, to turn towards Spain, and try to obtain from thence the aſſiſtance ſhe wanted. To that purpoſe, ſhe diſpatched Ridolpho to the pope and the king of Spain, to inform them of the ſtate of her affairs. At the ſame time ſhe wrote to the duke of Norfolk, and ſent him in cypher the copy of her letters to Rome and Madrid, recommending him to Ridolpho, as a truſty perſon, to whom ſhe deſired him to give letters of credit. Upon the receipt of theſe letters, the duke ordered Higford, his ſecretary, who had the key, to decypher them, and then bid him throw them into the fire. But whether Higford was already gained by the court, or deſigned to betray his maſter, he hid all theſe papers under a mat in his bed-chamber.

Ridolpho, who was the pope's private agent, did all he could to perſuade the duke of Norfolk to undertake the queen of Scots defence. He repreſented to him, there were in England many malcontents, who would be glad to ſee him at their head, and by that means he might revenge the injuries he had received, and the long impriſonment he had endured. He put him in hopes of powerful ſuccours from the pope[b] and the king of Spain[c], adding, that in this he would do no wrong to Elizabeth, ſince it was only to obtain her conſent to marry the queen of Scots, and oblige her to tolerate the catholic religion in England. At the ſame time, the biſhop of Roſs frequently told the duke, by Barker, one of his confidents, that by the help of his friends, who were very numerous, it would be eaſy for him to ſeize the queen, become maſter of her perſon, and detain her in cuſtody till he had married the queen of Scots, and provided for the ſecurity of the catholic religion. But the duke rejected the biſhop of Roſs's project, and even refuſed to give Ridolpho the letters of credit, which he deſired for the courts of Rome and Madrid, and for the duke of Alva. But though all the duke of Norfolk's proceedings in this affair are not particularly known, it is however certain he engaged in it too far, in expectation of eſpouſing the queen of Scots. But it cannot well be conceived, how he intended to accompliſh his enterpriſe, or what he deſigned to do after marrying the queen of Scots. However, it is eaſy to conjecture that the pope and the king of Spain, who ſet Ridolpho and the biſhop of Roſs to work, would never have thought of employing the duke of Norfolk, if they had not had ſome aſſurances from him, that he would comply with their intentions.

Ridolpho, having conferred with the pope and the duke of Alva, informed one Baily, a Fleming, the queen of Scots ſervant, of what he had negotiated; and as this man was to go into England, gave him ſeveral letters for the queen of Scots, the Spaniſh embaſſador, the biſhop of Roſs, and the duke of Norfolk [d]. Baily was no ſooner landed at Dover, but he was ſeized. His packet was taken from him, and ſent to the lord Cobham, governor of the Cinque-ports. But the biſhop of Roſs, being informed of the accident, ſo artfully managed the lord Cobham, the duke of Norfolk's ſecret friend, that the letters were changed, and others put in their place, containing nothing criminal or of moment, which were delivered to the council. However, Baily was put to the rack, and confeſſed the true letters were in the biſhop of Roſs's hands. But the biſhop had taken care to ſend all the papers which might hurt him, beyond ſea, with his ſecretary. So nothing was found in his houſe, and yet he was arreſted and committed to the cuſtody of the biſhop of Ely [e].

Shortly after, the court made a new diſcovery, which proved fatal to the duke of Norfolk. The French embaſſador, intending to diſtribute ſome money in Scotland among the queen's friends [f], applied to the duke of Norfolk, who cauſed him to be put into the hands of Higford and Barker, to deliver it to one Brown, of Shrewſbury, who was to convey it to Lowther and Baniſter, and theſe were ordered to ſend it to the lord Herris. Brown, who was not in the ſecret, receiving the money, well packed up, and finding by the weight it was gold, whereas he had been told it was ſilver, carried it to the ſecretary of ſtate. The packet being opened, there was found a letter in cypher from La Mothe Fenelon to Verac, the French ambaſſador in Scotland. Whereupon Higford, the duke of Norfolk's ſecretary, being arreſted, preſently confeſſed, that the money was returned by the French embaſſador. He diſcovered likewiſe where he had hid the queen of Scots papers, which the duke, his maſter, had ordered him to decypher and tranſcribe. This was ſufficient to cauſe the duke of Norfolk to be apprehended, and ſent to the Tower, the 7th of September. There was found upon him a long memorial in cypher, dated the 7th of February this year, wherein the queen of Scotland told him, ſhe was adviſed to retire to Spain rather than France, by reaſon of the duke of Anjou's marriage with Elizabeth, which was much talked of. She added, when ſhe ſhould be in Spain, ſhe would feign a deſire to marry Don John, of Auſtria; but that the duke ſhould not be alarmed at it, becauſe ſhe reſerved herſelf for him. Finally, after ſpeaking of Elizabeth, in very injurious terms, ſhe deſired the duke to diſpatch Ridolpho to Rome with inſtructions [g].

The duke of Norfolk, being examined, confeſſed, that about a year ſince he received four letters in cyper from the queen of Scots, and had anſwered them; but ſaid, it was only to thank her for her good will, and to perſuade her to rely entirely on the queen. He ſaid farther, that the biſhop of Roſs having preſſed him to write to the duke of Alva by Ridolpho, he had refuſed it, neither would he give him any inſtructions about the affair for which he went to Rome. He confeſſed alſo, he had helped to convey to Verac a letter from the French embaſſador reſiding at London. As to the papers he had received from the queen of Scots by Ridolpho, he ſaid, they were burnt, as he really believed. Then his houſe was ſearched, and the cypher, which the queen of Scots and he uſed, was found with the papers hid by the ſecretary. Some of the accomplices, who were apprehended, confeſſed all they knew, without being put to the rack.

Whilſt proofs were collecting againſt the duke of Norfolk, in order to form his proceſs, the council debated on what was to be done with the biſhop of Roſs. He aſſumed the character of the queen of Scots embaſſador, and probably had been acknowledged for ſuch, Elizabeth not having thought proper to deny Mary the title of queen, or openly to own ſhe was a priſoner. So, the caſe being uncommon, ſome learned civilians were conſulted upon three queries [h]. Firſt, whether an embaſſador, convicted of conſpiring againſt the prince to whom he is ſent, ought to enjoy the privileges of an embaſſador? The civilians replied, ſuch an embaſſador, by the law of nations, forfeits his privileges. Secondly, whether a prince depoſed can give his miniſter or agent the title of embaſſador? The anſwer was, the right of ſending embaſſadors belonged only to ſovereigns, and a prince, lawfully depoſed, cannot confer that title. It muſt be obſerved, Elizabeth had not owned that Mary was lawfully depoſed. Thirdly, whether a prince, who comes into another prince's dominions, and is there kept priſoner, can have an agent? And whether that agent may be reputed an embaſſador, though it be notified to him that he ſhall be no longer acknowledged for ſuch? It was anſwered, if ſuch a prince has not forfeited his royalty, he may have an agent; but whether that agent may be reputed an embaſſador, depended upon the authority of his commiſſion. And a prince may forbid an embaſſador his dominions, if he does not keep himſelf within the bounds of his office: but, however, the privileges of embaſſadors are not to be violated [i].

Theſe queries being thus anſwered, the biſhop of Roſs was brought before the council [k], and charged with attempting to diſturb the peace of the kingdom. He refuſed at firſt to anſwer, inſiſting on the privileges of an embaſſador. But at length, ſeeing this defence was little regarded, and witneſſes began to be produced againſt him, he ſaid, that by an inviolable cuſtom, grown into a law, the Engliſh and Scots could not be witneſſes one againſt another. Whereupon it was examined, whether this cuſtom was to take place any where but on the borders, eſpecially in a caſe where the ſafety of the queen and kingdom was concerned. In ſhort, the biſhop was ſent to the Tower, and ſome time after examined [l] upon three and twenty articles, to each of which he anſwered in particular: but Camden has not thought fit to give us either the examination or the anſwers. He ſays only in general, that the biſhop excuſed the queen, his miſtreſs, for that, being a priſoner, and in the flower of her age, it was no wonder ſhe ſhould uſe her endeavours to eſcape: that the project of her marriage was formed by the advice of ſeveral Engliſh lords, ſome of whom were privy counſellors: that indeed the duke of Norfolk had promiſed to think no more of the affair; but his promiſe was not capable of breaking a prior engagement [m]: laſtly, he endeavoured to juſtify his own conduct; for that, being an embaſſador, he was obliged to ſerve the queen, his miſtreſs, to the utmoſt of his power: adding, that he propoſed the deſign of ſeizing the queen to the duke of Norfolk, only to try him; and he refuſed to name the great men who had promiſed to aſſiſt him in the attempt. But he confeſſed that, by the orders of the queen, his miſtreſs, he had conſulted the earl of Arundel, Lumley, Throckmorton, and the lord viſ-

[g] This memorial, according to Camden, was not found about the duke, but being ſent to him by queen Mary, with the copy of her letters to Rome and Madrid, he ordered it to be burnt with the reſt of the papers. But Higford, upon his being taken up, diſcovered to the council where it was hid, with the letters. It was a draught of queen Mary's deſigns, which the duke of Norfolk, imagining Higford had burnt, denied at firſt every thing that Higford had confeſſed; but when the council produced Higford's and others confeſſions, together with the draughts and letters, to the duke's face, he was amazed, thinking they had been burnt. The earls of Arundel and Southampton, the lords Lumley and Cobham, Thomas Brooke, Henry Percy, Lowder, Powell, Goodyer, Baniſter, &c. were taken up alſo, who all confeſſed what they knew. count Montague, about the queen of England's demand, that the king of Scotland ſhould be put into her hands. This is all Camden ſays of the biſhop of Roſs's defence. But it is not unlikely, the fear of death, with which he was threatened, made him diſcover ſome things which Camden has not been pleaſed to publiſh, as will appear in the ſequel.

The duke of Norfolk's impriſonment making a great noiſe in France and elſewhere, Elizabeth cauſed the reaſons to be imparted to Charles IX. by Killegrew, whom ſhe ſent to Paris to eaſe Walſingham who was ſick. The new embaſſador told the queen-mother, that it was now two years ſince the queen of Scots, without acquainting his miſtreſs with it, had deſigned to marry the duke of Norfolk, and therefore he was ſent to the Tower, without however being deprived of the enjoyment of his eſtate: that afterwards, the duke ſwore to think of that marriage no more, and the queen of Scots, both by letters and agents, promiſed the like: that nevertheleſs they had ſtill continued their intrigues, as it was eaſy to prove by their own letters; and under colour of freeing the queen of Scots, had projected to ſet her on the throne of England, by raiſing a rebellion in the kingdom, and calling in foreign troops, which evidently appeared by their letters and the confeſſion of their accomplices: that the queen of Scots had expreſly ordered her agents to conceal her deſigns from the court of France, becauſe ſhe was entirely devoted to Spain, having even reſolved to convey her ſon thither, and marry Don John of Auſtria.

In the preſent ſituation of the French court, Elizabeth's complaints againſt the queen of Scots were not much regarded. But the parliament of England[n] took the queen's intereſt extremely to heart, and to prevent the dangers to which ſhe was expoſed by theſe plots, paſſed a very remarkable act. It was provided, "that if any man ſhould attempt the perſonal hurt of the queen, or the depriving her of any part of ſovereignty; raiſe war, or ſtir up others to war againſt her; if any one ſhould dare to give out, that another perſon has a juſter title than ſhe to the crown; or ſhould ſay ſhe is an heretic, ſchiſmatic, or infidel; or ſhould uſurp her right and title during her life; or ſhould affirm the parliament has not power to ſettle and limit the ſucceſſion to the crown; every ſuch perſon ſhould be guilty of high treaſon[o]." It was alſo enacted, "That whoſoever, by bulls or other mandates of the pope, ſhould reconcile any man to the church of Rome, and thoſe who ſhould be ſo reconciled, ſhould be guilty of treaſon: that whoſoever ſhould relieve ſuch reconcilers, or ſhould bring into England any Agnus Dei's, Grains, or other things conſecrated by the pope, ſhould incur the penalty of a præmunire, loſs of goods, and perpetual impriſonment." It was provided alſo, "That all the fugitives ſhould, within ſueh a time, under forfeiture of their eſtates, return and ſubmit themſelves to the government, and that all the fraudulent conveyances of their lands ſhould be void." It was likewiſe moved, That if for the future the queen of Scots ſhould be concerned in any conſpiracy, ſhe ſhould be proceeded againſt by law, as the wife of an Engliſh peer. But the queen hindered this bill from paſſing, being ſatisfied with letting her priſoner ſee to what ſhe would be expoſed, if ſhe continued her practices[p].

Before we ſee what followed upon the late diſcoveries, it will be neceſſary to run over what paſſed in Scotland, after the earl of Morton's return. The beginning of May, the queen's party became maſter of Edinburgh, by the aſſiſtance of the laird of Grange, who favoured them, though he pretended to keep the caſtle for the king. This done, the heads of that party convened the ſtates belonging to that faction; and at the ſame time, the earl of Lenox aſſembled the ſtates of the king's party in the ſuburbs of the ſame city. Theſe two aſſemblies did nothing but mutually condemn each other, and as if they had given one another the word, they reſolved each apart to meet again in Auguſt, the king's lords at Sterling, and the queen's at Edinburgh. Theſe reſolutions being executed at the time appointed, the lords at Edinburgh formed the project of carrying away by force the lords of the contrary party, who were at Sterling, without any pretenſion. Melvil ſays, his friend Grange was the author, contriver, and manager, of this enterpriſe. He would have headed them himſelf; but his friends would not ſuffer him to be expoſed to the danger. This is the ſame Grange whom Melvil repreſents as a neutral perſon, and aiming only at the good of his country. The project was executed with ſo much conduct and ſucceſs, that the regent and the earl of Morton were preſently made priſoners. In all appearance, few of the king's lords would have eſcaped, had not the victorious ſoldiers fallen to plundering. But whilſt they were diſperſed about the town, the earl of Mar ſallied out of the caſtle with the garriſon, and compelled them to retire. In the diſorder, the earl of Morton fortunately eſcaped, but the regent was carried away, and murdered on the road in cold blood, by one hired to do it, in ſpite of David Spence, the officer who guarded him. A few days after, John Erſkin, earl of Mar, was choſen regent, to the great mortification of the earl of Morton, who aſpired to that dignity, and was ſupported by the Engliſh embaſſador.

To underſtand the ſituation of the affairs of Scotland, it is neceſſary to conſider, that though there ſeemed to be but two parties in the kingdom, namely, the king's and the queen's, there were however five, becauſe there were ſo many different opinions in both, which occaſioned that all of the ſame party did not tend to the ſame end. Some were wholly attached to the queen, and their chief view was to reſtore the catholic religion. Others earneſtly adhered to the king's party and the proteſtant religion. The new regent, like his predeceſſor, was deſirous to unite the two factions, and laboured to bring all to the obedience of the king, which he hoped to accompliſh, by granting to the queen's adherents all the favours they could reaſonably expect. Grange and his friends had formed the ſame deſign of uniting the two parties, but in ſuch a manner as that the kingdom ſhould be governed in the queen's name. In fine, the earl of Morton, who was penſioner to the court of England, was at the head of a fifth party, who, though outwardly for the king, ſought only to croſs thoſe that endeavoured to unite the two factions. This was properly Elizabeth's party, or at leaſt the party ſhe favoured moſt, though ſhe affected a neutrality. Her embaſſador Randolph, a man of a great genius, and very fit for his office, was the inſtrument ſhe made uſe of to ſtrengthen it. Nothing could be more prejudicial to England than the union of the two parties, which was endeavouring at any rate. It was to be feared, that after the union, queen Mary's friends would grow too powerful in the parliament, and procure reſolutions deſtructive of the intereſts of Elizabeth and England. Thus diſcord among the Scots was yet for Elizabeth's advantage, till affairs ſhould take another face. But as the earl of Mar, the new regent, was not to be managed as he wiſhed, ſhe laid her meaſures before hand, to procure the earl of Morton a party, capable of being oppoſed to the regent, if occaſion required. Such was the ſtate of the affairs of Scotland in the year 1571. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in France.

All this year the court of France uſed the higheſt diſſimulation to draw the Hugonots into their ſnares. There were no favours at court but for them. The king pretended to fear his brother the duke of Anjou, and to be diſpleaſed with the Guiſes, who, as he ſaid, kept him in a ſhameful captivity. Beſides this, he made uſe of two very effectual means to deceive the admiral. The firſt was, to feign a real intention to wage war with Spain, and to truſt him with the management of it. The ſecond was, to conclude the marriage of his ſiſter the princeſs Margaret with the king of Navarre. After that, the admiral and the Hugonots no longer queſtioned the king's good-will towards them, eſpecially, as they ſaw him very intent upon the marriage of the duke of Anjou with the queen of England, and as compliant as poſſible with reſpect to religion.

At the ſame time, the prince of Orange was ſtriving to put the Netherlands in motion, having reſolved to make ſome at-[n] This parliament met at Weſtminſter April 2, and was diſſolved May 29. The clergy granted a ſubſidy of ſix ſhillings to be paid in three years; and the lords and commons two fifteenths and tenths, and a ſubſidy of two ſhillings and eight-pence in the pound. D'ewes. Stow, p. 669.

[o] The act goes on: "And if any one during the queen's life, ſhould by book written or printed, maintain that any perſon is or ought to be the queen's heir and ſucceſſor, except the natural iſſue of her body," &c. Some looked upon this as too ſevere, thinking the naming of an heir would tend to the eſtabliſhing the quiet of the nation. But it ſeems, abundance of jeſts were paſſed upon the clauſe, "except the natural iſſue of her body," ſince in law, thoſe children are called natural which are begotten out of wedlock. So that Camden ſays, being then a young man, he himſelf often heard people ſay, that the word natural was inſerted into the act by Leiceſter, with a deſign, one time or other, to impoſe ſome baſtard ſon of his upon the Engliſh for the queen's natural iſſue. Camden, p. 436.

[p] The other acts made in this parliament were theſe: 1. That fraudulent deeds made to avoid the debts of others ſhall be void. 2. That for fraudulent conveyances or deeds made by ſpiritual perſons, to defeat their ſucceſſors of remedy for dilapidations, ſhall be void. 3. That no eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhall be admitted to any benefice with cure, except he be twenty-three years of age at leaſt; and ſhall firſt ſubſcribe the articles of religion in preſence of the ordinary; and within two months after induction, read the ſame in his pariſh church, in the time of common-prayer; and declare his unfeigned aſſent thereunto; and all this upon pain of deprivation. That no perſon ſhall retain a benefice with cure, being under the age of twenty-one years, or not being a deacon at leaſt. That none ſhall be admitted to preach or adminiſter the ſacraments under the age of twenty-four years; nor without a teſtimonial of his honeſt life; nor unleſs he is able to render to the ordinary an account of his faith, in Latin.

tempt, whilſt the king of Spain's arms were employed againſt the infidels. The kings of Sweden and Denmark refuſing to aſſiſt him, he applied to Elizabeth, who durſt not give him aſſiſtance, though ſhe was not ignorant of the correſpondence held by the duke of Alva in Scotland and England with Mary's adherents. She even forbid the ſhips of Holland and Zeland, which acted againſt Spain, to enter her ports. In this extremity the prince of Orange ſent his brother, count Lewis, to king Charles IX. who loaded him with careſſes, and even imparted to him the falſe ſecret of his pretended deſign to make war upon Philip. But all this was only to deceive him. In the mean time, the count de la Mark, with four and twenty ſhips, did the Spaniards all the damage he could. This was all the prince of Orange could effect during this year [q].

[1572] The 16th of January, the duke of Norfolk was brought to his trial before the peers of the realm [r]. His accuſation ran: 1. That he had attempted to deprive the queen of her crown and life, and ſeize the throne himſelf by the help of foreigners. 2. That, unknown to the queen, he had treated of a marriage with the queen of Scots, though he knew ſhe had uſurped the title and arms of England. 3. That he had lent her a great ſum of money. 4. That he had ſupplied with money the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, who were baniſhed the kingdom, and declared enemies of their country. 5. That he had written to the pope, the king of Spain, the duke of Alva, deſiring aid to free the queen of Scots, and reſtore the popiſh religion in England. 6. Laſtly, That he had ſent ſupplies to the lord Herris, and other the queen's enemies in Scotland.

It may be ſaid, in general, the duke made a very weak defence to moſt of theſe articles. But it was not eaſy for him to deny what his own letters, and the confeſſions of his ſervants and accomplices, proved againſt him. Beſides, an intercepted letter from the biſhop of Roſs in priſon, to the queen of Scots, clearly ſhewed the duke had formed pernicious deſigns againſt the government. Camden did not think fit to relate the contents of the biſhop's letter. It is probable, however, it was very much to the purpoſe, ſince the duke deſired to ſee whether it was the biſhop's own hand. When he was convinced of it by his own eyes, he made the ſame defence as the biſhop had done, namely, that the teſtimony of a Scot againſt an Engliſhman was not valid. In this they both pretended, without ground, to take advantage of a cuſtom introduced on the borders of the two kingdoms, where, in caſes of depredation, the evidence of one nation againſt the other was not admitted, becauſe they were parties. But this cuſtom was not become ſo general as to be of ſervice to the duke in his cauſe. The ſtrength of his defence was, that his deſign to marry the queen of Scots could not be reckoned high treaſon, neither could it be thence inferred that he intended to ſeize the throne. The queen's attorney replied, that all the circumſtances of the affair, and all the duke's proceedings, evidently ſhewed he aimed at ſomething more than barely to marry a depoſed and impriſoned queen; for, by the meaſures he would have taken with the foreign powers, it plainly appeared that, in eſpouſing the queen of Scots, he deſigned to aſſert her claim to the crown of England. At laſt, after a long examination, he was condemned by his peers as guilty of high treaſon: but the ſentence was not executed till June.

In the mean while the queen made Walter d'Everux earl of Eſſex. He was deſcended by the great grandmother's ſide from the noble family of Bouchier, which had long borne that title. At the ſame time the lord Clinton, high admiral, was created earl of Lincoln, and four new barons were ſummoned to the next parliament [s].

The parliament, hearing plots were formed to free the duke of Norfolk, paſſed an act, whereby it was made death to attempt to deliver a priſoner condemned for high treaſon. By the ſame act, it was perpetual impriſonment and forfeiture of eſtate, if the priſoner was only accuſed of high treaſon, though not condemned [t].

At length, the queen, after having been long in ſuſpence, ſigned a warrant for the execution of the duke of Norfolk, the 2d of June. He confeſſed part of his faults, excuſed himſelf as to the reſt, and, in general, owned he was juſtly condemned: but he declared he never had any thoughts of reſtoring the popiſh religion in England, and that he died a proteſtant [u]. He was ſon to the earl of Surrey, beheaded in the latter part of Henry VIIIth's reign, for quartering the arms of Edward the Confeſſor with his own, without the king's licence. All of that family had firmly adhered to the catholic religion, except this duke, who embraced the proteſtant in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign. Since he declared that he died in the reformed religion, I do not ſee how his ſincerity can juſtly be queſtioned. But who can tell how far his ambition might have carried him, if he had found his projects more practicable? At leaſt, it cannot be denied that they who put him in motion, thought they had reaſon to rely on him. After all, if any one doubted that the end of this conſpiracy was to reſtore the popiſh religion in England, he might be ſatisfied by the teſtimony of Hieronymo Catena, in the life of Pius V. Inſtead of clearing the pope, the author makes him glory in having been the promoter of this deſign, and in having ſent Ridolpho into England to excite the Engliſh to rebel againſt Elizabeth.

Ten days after the duke of Norfolk's death, Elizabeth ſent two privy counſellors to the queen of Scots [w], not to accuſe her criminally, as Camden affirms [x], but to inform her of what ſhe had been charged with in the trial of the duke of Norfolk and his accomplices, and to tell her the queen would be extremely glad ſhe could juſtify herſelf. This was chiefly to let her know that her practices were diſcovered, and therefore ſhe had been more cloſely confined and reduced to a ſmaller number of domeſtics. Elizabeth was alſo well pleaſed to let her ſee ſhe had good ſpies, and knew that it was not barely to obtain her liberty that ſo many powers uſed their intereſt for her, but rather to ſet her on the throne of England. Wherefore the two privy counſellors repreſented to her, 1. That ſhe had aſſumed the title of queen of England, and afterwards refuſed to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, whereby ſhe had engaged to renounce it. 2. That ſhe would have married the duke of Norfolk without the queen's knowledge; and there was no reaſon to believe it was with deſign to dethrone her, ſince ſhe would have uſed foreign troops to ſet the duke free. 3. That ſhe was deeply concerned in the northern rebellion. 4. That ſhe had relieved the rebels in Scotland and Flanders. 5. That ſhe had ſent Ridolpho to the pope and the king of Spain, to ſolicit them to invade England. 6. That ſhe had received letters from the pope, wherein he aſſured her of his protection. 7. That ſhe had procured the pope's bull to abſolve the queen's ſubjects from their oath of allegiance. 8. Laſtly, That ſhe had ſuffered her agents in foreign parts to ſtile her publicly Queen of England. All theſe facts were but too true; however, as it was not eaſy to convict her that ſhe had acted with the intention aſcribed to her, ſhe therefore boldly made her defence to this effect:

That if ſhe had taken the title of Queen of England, it was by command of the king of France, her huſband, and ſhe had quitted it after his death; nay, ſhe had declared, and ſtill did declare, ſhe would not claim it ſo long as Elizabeth or her children lived: that in deſiring to marry the duke of Norfolk, ſhe had no deſign to hurt Elizabeth, but rather was of opinion the marriage would be advantageous to England: That if ſhe had not announced the marriage, it was becauſe ſhe was contracted to the duke [y]: That ſhe thought herſelf obliged by conjugal love to warn him of the danger, and perſuade him to make his eſcape: That ſhe was acceſſary to no rebellion; but, on the contrary, was always ready to diſcover whatever came to her knowledge, if Elizabeth would have vouchſafed to ſee and hear her: That ſhe had never relieved the Engliſh rebels, but only recommended the counteſs of Northumberland to the duke of Alva: That hearing Ridolpho was in the pope's favour, ſhe made uſe of him in concerns no way relating to England: That ſhe had employed no perſon to free her, but had willingly hearkened to ſuch as offered their ſervice for that purpoſe, and with that view had given her cypher to Rolſton and Hall: That the letters ſhe had received from the pope, contained only matters of piety and conſolation: That ſhe was not the procurer of the bull, and had only ſeen a copy of it, which when ſhe had read, ſhe threw into the fire: That if any in foreign parts ſtiled her Queen of England, ſhe could not help it: That ſhe had never deſired aid of the pope, or the king of Spain, to invade England, but implored their aſſiſtance to reſtore her to her kingdom: Laſtly, That in caſe ſhe was to be tried, ſhe deſired it might be before the parliament, as a princeſs of the blood-royal of England.

Theſe anſwers ſhew that Mary did not deny the facts, but only the intention aſcribed to her. But on the other hand, though this intention could not be fully proved, her bare denial was not ſufficient to ſhew ſhe never had it, or to efface the ſuſpicions entertained of her. However, as there was no deſign to bring her to a trial, the affair reſted there; but Elizabeth was ſtill perſuaded, that the end of Mary's and her friend's intrigues was to dethrone her.

The negotiation of the defenſive league between France and England was ſtill continued at Paris, with great diſſimulation on Charles's ſide. He inſiſted upon difficulties which ought not to have cauſed any delay, ſince his ſole aim was to make uſe of this league to ſurpriſe the Hugonots; but this ſerved the better to conceal his deſigns. He pretended to be much afraid of the power of Spain, and therefore was obliged to join with England. The difficulties of the league conſiſted in two things: Firſt, Elizabeth required that both parties ſhould mutually promiſe to aſſiſt one another, in caſe either ſhould be attacked, though on account of religion. But Charles ſaid, he could not admit of that clauſe, for fear of offending his ſubjects, and all the catholic powers. He was willing however to agree, that the article ſhould be expreſſed in more general terms, which ſhould have the ſame meaning, namely, that the two parties ſhould mutually defend one another, if either was attacked upon any account whatſoever. The Engliſh embaſſadors objected that England feared no attack, but only on account of religion, whereas France had numberleſs quarrels with other ſtates, and therefore the condition would not be equal. To remove this difficulty, Charles offered to write to Elizabeth a letter with his own hand, wherein he would declare, that he underſtood the cauſe of religion to be included in the general clauſe. But the Engliſh not being ſatisfied with this ſecurity, required at leaſt a private article under the great ſeals of France and England. Whereupon Charles exclaimed againſt the injury done him, in believing him capable of breaking his word, and ſaid, he preferred his honour to his life. Walſingham, one of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, was ſo biaſſed in favour of Charles, that he thought him a perfect honeſt man. He even wrote to lord Burleigh, that he did not doubt that the ſecurity was ſufficient. In ſhort, after many debates, Elizabeth was contented with the letter offered by Charles.

The ſecond difficulty conſiſted, in that the king of France would poſitively include the queen of Scots in the treaty, to which Elizabeth would not conſent. She thought it very ſtrange that the king of France ſhould ſo heartily eſpouſe the queen of Scots' intereſts at ſuch a juncture. Mary was uſing her utmoſt endeavours to dethrone her. The deſign of the league between France and England was for a mutual defence againſt the attacks of their enemies, and at the ſame time France earneſtly laboured to have the queen of Scots releaſed, that is, to enable her to execute her deſigns. Elizabeth could not underſtand this proceeding, and it gave her great ſuſpicion. However, as ſhe believed the league neceſſary for her ſafety, ſhe overlooked many things which gave her cauſe to miſtruſt the king of France's ſincerity. There was no way found to ſurmount this difficulty, but by inſerting in the treaty a doubtful clauſe, to this effect: "That both parties ſhall maintain the preſent laws of Scotland." Elizabeth meant the preſent and actual government of that kingdom, under the king's authority; and Charles underſtood the preceding government, under the queen's authority, conſidering the preſent as unlawful. But withal, he intimated, that he deſired thoſe terms which were capable of a double meaning, to be uſed only to avoid the blame of abandoning the queen of Scots. Elizabeth imagined it a great advantage that Mary was not mentioned in the treaty. Theſe two difficulties being removed, the league was ſigned at Blois, April 11. The ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

Charles and Elizabeth ſhall mutually aſſiſt one another againſt all perſons who ſhall attack them under any pretence whatſoever.

The league ſhall remain in full force till a year after the death of either party.

The party requeſted ſhall be bound to ſend to the party requiring, an aid of ſix thouſand foot, or of five hundred lances, making up, with others, fifteen hundred horſe, at his choice, with eight ſhips of war, manned with twelve hundred ſoldiers; the whole at the expence of the party requiring.

There ſhall be no innovations made in Scotland, but both princes ſhall endeavour to preſerve the peace of that kingdom, according to the preſent laws, without ſuffering the arrival of any foreign troops.

Some time after, Elizabeth ſent the earl of Lincoln into France [z], to ſee the treaty ſworn; and the Marſhal de Montmorency came to London upon the ſame account. Elizabeth ſwore to the league the 17th of June, and honoured the marſhal with the order of the garter. Whilſt Montmorency was at the court of England, he never ceaſed ſtrongly to ſolicit for the queen of Scots' liberty, to whom this eagerneſs did more hurt than good. On the other hand, the queen ordered the earl of Lincoln to ſhew the king of France the intercepted letter from the queen of Scots to the duke of Alva, wherein it appeared that ſhe put herſelf entirely under the king of Spain's protection. Montmorency would likewiſe have reſumed the affair of the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou, but did not much inſiſt upon it. Probably he had no orders to preſs it very ſtrenuouſly, conſidering what happened in France immediately after his return; I mean the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew's, wherein admiral Chatillon, and all the Hugonots were butchered [a], who had been drawn to court, under colour of the nuptials of the king of Navarre with the princeſs Margaret, king Charles's ſiſter. It is needleſs to expatiate on this horrible maſſacre, ſo univerſally known. It ſuffices to obſerve, in a word, it demonſtrated to perſons of the leaſt penetration, that the court of France was then the moſt perfidious in the world.

This maſſacre threw all the proteſtants in Europe into the utmoſt conſternation, eſpecially when they knew it was openly approved of at Rome [b]. The proteſtant princes of Germany began to prepare for the defence, believing it was only the beginning of a combination to deſtroy their religion throughout all Chriſtendom, and the Switzers reſolved in a diet to lend France no more troops. But the court of England reflected on it particularly, not queſtioning it was an effect of the league of Bayonne, and that the ſtorm would quickly fall upon England. Walſingham, who had expreſſed ſo great an eſteem for Charles IX. wrote letter after letter, to give warning, that he was no longer to be truſted, though he ſhould repeat his proteſtations of friendſhip to the queen, and his aſſurances punctually to obſerve the late treaty [c].

It was not without reaſon that Charles ſtill deſired to keep fair with Elizabeth. Though he had maſſacred an infinite number of his Hugonot ſubjects, he ſaw the reſt ready to take up arms to ſcreen themſelves from his barbarity. The city of Rochelle, which was as their bulwark, had refuſed to open her gates to the king's forces. Some were already in arms in Languedoc and other provinces, and probably Charles was going to enter into a new war where he would have to deal with deſperate people. Apprehenſive as he was that Elizabeth would aid the Hugonots with all her forces, there was no diſſimulation but what he practiſed to divert her from it. When ſhe told him by her embaſſador, that after the late maſſacre, ſhe could no longer place any confidence in him, he endeavoured to excuſe himſelf in the beſt manner he could. One while he ſaid, it was done without his knowledge; another while, that he was forced to it, in order to prevent a conſpiracy formed by the admiral againſt him, the queen his mother, and his brothers. However, at the very time he ſhewed the greateſt deſire to live in a good underſtanding with Elizabeth, he was taking private meaſures to raiſe her diſturbances both in England and Scotland. After the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew's, the pope ſent a legate into France. The duke of Savoy, a great friend to Spain, [b] There were medals ſtruck in memory of this horrible fact, having on one ſide the king ſitting on a throne, and treading on dead bodies, with this motto, Virtus in Rebelles: and on the reverſe, the arms of France crowned between two columns, and Pietas excitavit Juſticiam 24 Auguſti 1572. See a print of this medal in P. Daniel, tom. VIII. p. 786.

[c] In one of his letters to ſir Thomas Smith, he informs him, that all the Hugonots lands, which would amount to many millions, were to be ſold, and employed in the conqueſt of countries; and if ſo, England was in no ſmall danger. See Digges's Compl. Ambaſ. p. 245.

There

was come to Paris, and Charles's pretended dread of Philip's deſign was entirely vaniſhed. Nay, there was a ſtrict union between the two kings. On the other ſide, Walſingham gave frequent notice, that the duke of Guiſe had private conferences with the Scots, and the queen-mother frequently ſent for the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's embaſſador, to her houſe at unſeaſonable hours. Theſe things were plain indications to Elizabeth and her council, that the friendſhip of France was not to be relied on, though it had been earneſtly ſought.

Affairs being in this ſituation, it was not eaſy for the queen to determine what courſe ſhe ſhould take. She ſuſpected ſome plot was formed againſt her, but was not ſure[d]. On one hand, ſhe was afraid France and Spain were in league againſt her; but ſhe could not conceive how it was poſſible for them to agree, their intereſts being directly contrary. She conſidered, however, that Charles IX. was governed by the Lorrain princes, who had different views from his, and who regarded their own private intereſt more than the welfare of France. Beſides, an exceſſive religious zeal might cauſe him to overlook his true intereſt. In this ſtate of uncertainty, ſhe thought it moſt adviſeable to ſtand upon her guard, and make preparations as if ſhe was to be ſpeedily invaded; and to equal the king of France in diſſimulation, letting him know however it would not be eaſy to deceive her. So each, playing the hypocrite, never were there ſo ſtrong and ſo frequent proteſtations of friendſhip between Charles and Elizabeth, as in the firſt months after the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew's. Both ſaid, they deſired above all things to keep the league inviolably, though Charles had no occaſion for Elizabeth's aid, and Elizabeth could no longer depend upon the amity of ſuch an ally. It was hardly poſſible for them to love one another. Charles looked upon Elizabeth as the protectreſs of the religion he was endeavouring to extirpate, and Elizabeth could conſider him but as a prince, without honour or honeſty, and as a ſworn enemy to the religion ſhe profeſſed. Notwithſtanding all this, Charles offered to renew the league with a freſh oath, and propoſed a marriage between Elizabeth and his younger brother the duke of Alençon. In ſhort, to give Elizabeth a ſenſible mark of his pretended friendſhip, he deſired her to ſtand godmother to a princeſs his queen was delivered of in October. Elizabeth anſwered to the firſt propoſal, that the treaty of Blois not having been violated on her part, ſhe did not ſee any neceſſity to renew it, or ſwear to it again. As to the marriage of the duke of Alençon, ſhe expreſſed herſelf in ſuch a manner, that ſhe left it undetermined, whether ſhe would accept or refuſe it. As to the king's requeſting her to be godmother to the princeſs, his daughter, ſhe replied, Though her own ſubjects and ſeveral foreign princes diſſuaded her from being ſpiritually allied to a ſworn enemy to the proteſtant religion, ſhe was willing however to give him a proof of her deſire to preſerve their mutual alliance, as far as lay in her power. Thus it was all diſſimulation on both ſides. But I do not know whether Elizabeth can be juſtified for not having refuſed this laſt article, in order to ſhew at leaſt her deteſtation of the deed Charles had lately committed. However, all the reſt of the year was ſpent in reciprocal proteſtations of a ſincere friendſhip, but withal in a mutual diſtruſt. Charles was afraid Elizabeth would aſſiſt the Hugonots, and thereby all his meaſures be broken. Elizabeth had a mind, before ſhe came to any reſolution, to ſee a little farther into the deſigns of her enemies, and to that purpoſe it was neceſſary for her to keep, at leaſt outwardly, ſome correſpondence with king Charles. Mean while, the Hugonots knew not what to think of her. They ſaw themſelves upon the brink of deſtruction, conſidering the great forces with which the king was preparing to attack them; and at the ſame time they ſaw Elizabeth, who was their ſole refuge, ſtand godmother to the child of their perſecutor and executioner. But the intereſt of the Hugonots was not the thing ſhe had chiefly in view. Her zeal for the proteſtant religion was always ſubordinate to her private intereſt.

The earl of Northumberland, who, after his being ſeized in Scotland, had been delivered to the queen, was beheaded in this juncture, wherein the queen thought ſhe could not take too many precautions to provide for her ſafety[e].

I muſt now mention the affairs of Scotland, to which the queen had always an eye. The diſcovery of the duke of Norfolk's plot had much weakened Mary's party. Some had forſaken it, and others were ready to do the like. If they ſtill adhered to it, it was only to obtain advantageous terms for quitting it. Grange, governor of Edinburgh caſtle, Lidington, the lord Hume, Robert Melvil, and ſome others, who were in the caſtle, ſtill affected a ſort of neutrality, and a great zeal for the good of their country. But they made this good to conſiſt in a certain union of the two factions, which ſhould not be prejudicial to the captive queen. That is, they would have the king's authority to be annulled; and if it could not be agreed, that the ſtate ſhould be governed in the queen's name, as indeed it was very difficult to gain that point, at leaſt that the adminiſtration of affairs ſhould be put into the hands of a certain number of regents choſen by the two parties, without any mention of queen or king. By this means they would have preſerved the queen's rights entire, and broken the meaſures of the contrary party. Probably, James Melvil, author of the Memoirs, was in the ſame ſentiments, though he deſires to be looked upon as neuter, and as ſuch was employed on both ſides, to ſerve for mediator. The men of this party durſt not, however, fully diſcover their minds; but flattered themſelves, that, being maſters of Edinburgh caſtle, with the help of very few ſuccours, they ſhould be able to ſupport their pretenſions. They ſpent the whole winter of the year 1572 in ſeveral negotiations in France and the Netherlands, to obtain the ſuccours they wanted. They were made to hope for aſſiſtance from both places; but it was only empty promiſes without any effect. The court of France durſt not pull off the maſk for fear of obſtructing the grand deſign, which was executed within a few months. For that reaſon, they conſented at length that the queen of Scots ſhould not be mentioned in the treaty of Blois. They were contented to agree with the Engliſh embaſſadors, that the two crowns ſhould ſend plenipotentiaries into Scotland, to adjuſt the differences between the Scots, or compel them to lay down their arms. And indeed Charles IX. nominated du Crocq, who had been often ſent into Scotland, to endeavour this agreement, ordering him to paſs through England, and ſtrongly ſolicit Elizabeth to ſend the queen of Scots into France. He gave him moreover certain inſtructions, which he was to impart by word of mouth to the captive queen. Elizabeth thought this proceeding very extraordinary, juſt as the treaty of league was going to be concluded. So, ſuſpecting ſome myſtery in this conduct, ſhe plainly refuſed du Crocq leave to ſee Mary, and even to purſue his journey to Scotland till the league was ſigned.

A few days after, ſhe made a diſcovery which much increaſed her ſuſpicions. The lord Seaton, a Scotchman, who called himſelf Mary's embaſſador to the duke of Alva, had taken a journey to Paris, and there held ſeveral conferences with the king and the queen-mother. Then he returned to Bruſſels, and ſhortly after departed for Scotland. But the ſtormy weather compelling him to land at Harwich, he diſguiſed himſelf like a ſailor, and, before it was known who he was, croſſed England, and came to Edinburgh, where he frequently conferred with Grange, and the other lords in the caſtle. But as he had not been able to carry away his papers, they were found in the ſhip, whereby it was diſcovered he had orders to encourage the lords in the caſtle of Edinburgh to hold out, and to give them hopes of a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. It was alſo known, he was commiſſioned ſome time before by the Scots of the queen's party, to tell the duke of Alva, that with a little aid it would be eaſy to carry away the young king, and ſend him into Spain. In ſhort, Elizabeth heard that Grange and his companions, who had begun to treat of an accommodation with the earl of Mar, would hear no more of it, ſince they had ſeen the lord Seaton. All this, added to du Crocq's inſtances for the queen of Scots liberty, and for leave to ſpeak with her, made Elizabeth and her council judge this envoy was not ſent into Scotland to appeaſe, but rather to foment the troubles. This was the more credible, as he had ſaid himſelf, that his inſtructions reached no farther than to exhort the Scots to peace. It would therefore have been imprudent to ſuffer him to confer with Mary, or to purſue his journey into Scotland.

I obſerved before, that the court of England was no leſs forward than that of France to perpetuate the troubles of

He was beheaded at York on Auguſt 22. Stow, p. 673. This year died alſo two great men in an advanced age, William Powlet, lord treaſurer of England (in which he was ſucceeded by Cecil lord Burleigh), marquis of Wincheſter, earl of Wiltſhire, and baron of St. John, of Baſing: He died March 10, in the 97th year of his age, and lived to ſee an hundred and three perſons deſcended from him. The other was ſir William Petre, ſecretary to Henry VIII. Edward VI. Mary, and Elizabeth: He was a great benefactor to Exeter college in Oxford, wherein he was educated; and left in lands to the value of one hundred pounds a year: He died January 13. Melvil

Scotland; and this was true, during the regency of the earl of Lenox, becauſe the queen's party was then very ſtrong, and it was to be feared the two factions would be united, to the great detriment of England. But after the duke of Norfolk's death the caſe was altered. The queen's party being conſiderably weakened, the council of England thought it time to end the troubles of Scotland, by giving ſome content to thoſe in the caſtle of Edinburgh, in order to induce them to ſubmit to the king, and deliver up the place. To that end, the earl of Mar, with Elizabeth's conſent, had begun with thoſe of the caſtle a negotiation, interrupted by the arrival of the lord Seaton.

The league between France and England being concluded ſhortly after, the earl of Mar thought it a favourable opportunity to reſume the negotiation with thoſe of the caſtle, and to that purpoſe offered them by James Melvil very advantageous terms. Melvil inſinuates, that the regent's inducement to this accommodation was only to free Scotland from the yoke of the Engliſh. He adds farther, that Grange ſcrupling to demand any terms for reſtoring peace to the kingdom, left it to the regent's diſcretion, who privately ſwore to the peace, in the preſence of two or three perſons only. But Walſingham's Memoirs ſhew that Melvil was not well informed, ſince this agreement was made with Elizabeth's approbation, and even ſome articles were ſigned, whereof ſecretary Smith ſent a copy to Walſingham at Paris.

The project was defeated by the death of the earl of Mar. He went to Edinburgh with deſign to have the private treaty approved, and the earl of Morton was the chief perſon to be prevailed with to ſign it. To that end, he made him a viſit at Dalkeith, where he was honourably received, and treated magnificently. But before the banquet was over [f], he felt himſelf ſeized with a violent illneſs, which hardly ſuffered him to ride to Edinburgh, where he died [g]. Many ſuſpected he was poiſoned. However, on the 24th of November, the earl of Morton was choſen regent by the intereſt of Elizabeth's friends in Scotland.

Nothing could be more advantageous to Elizabeth, than to ſee the regency of Scotland in the hands of a man who depended upon her, and whom ſhe could manage almoſt as ſhe pleaſed. But on the other ſide, the court of France, where the Guiſes then ruled, finding that by the earl of Morton's promotion, they were going entirely to loſe Scotland, reſolved to do their utmoſt to ruin the new regent, and ſupport thoſe who ſtill held the caſtle of Edinburgh. Indeed, that was their only way to have ſtill any influence upon the kingdom. The duke of Guiſe, who managed every thing, plainly ſaw, if the earl of Morton was left unmoleſted, he would not fail, with the help of the Engliſh, to cruſh the queen's party entirely, and ſhut out the French from Scotland for ever. He reſolved therefore to ſend Verac thither, with money to ſupply the occaſions of thoſe in the caſtle, under colour of labouring to appeaſe the troubles. But Verac not being ready ſoon enough, the money was put into the hands of Grange's brother, who had been ſent into France to ſolicit aid. At the ſame time, great pains were taken to gain the earls of Argyle and Athol; and the duke of Chateleraut was told, if Grange could hold out till Whitſuntide, he would be ſtrongly aſſiſted by the pope, Spain, and France. This was what Walſingham, who had good ſpies at Paris, had frequently wrote to the court of England. It was therefore no longer Elizabeth's intereſt to continue diſcord among the Scots. On the contrary, it was neceſſary the queen's faction ſhould be deſtroyed, before the meaſures which were taking in France and Flanders could have their effect. We ſhall ſee preſently that ſhe neglected not her intereſt.

During all this year, the queen of Scots and her adherents relied much upon the duke of Alva's aſſiſtance, and yet they had nothing to hope from thence. From the beginning of the year to the time of the maſſacre of Paris, the duke had been ſo employed, that it was not poſſible for him to think ſeriouſly of the queen of Scots concerns, though he did not want a good will to annoy Elizabeth. The count de la Mark, whom the queen had driven from her ports for not breaking with Spain, had taken the Briel in Holland, and by that unexpected blow revived the courage of thoſe who wiſhed to be freed from the dominion of the Spaniards. Shortly after, the whole province of Holland threw off their yoke, and Fluſhing, with ſome other towns in Zealand, followed that example. The duke of Medina-Celi, ſent afterwards from Spain with a fleet, was defeated by the confederates, and moſt of his ſhips taken. In a word, whilſt the duke of Alva was employed in reducing the revolted towns in Holland, the news of the city of Mons being ſurpriſed by count Lewis of Naſſau, obliged him to quit Holland, in order to attempt the recovery of that place. Mean while the prince of Orange entered the Netherlands at the head of an army raiſed in Germany [h]. On the other hand, Charles IX. ſent the count of Naſſau five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, commanded by Genlis, which were defeated by the duke of Alva, to whom the king himſelf had ſent notice of the march of this aid, deſigned only to amuſe the Hugonots. The tragedy which was acted in France ſhortly after, having opened the prince of Orange's eyes, he was forced to diſband his army, finding the king of France, who promiſed to help to maintain it, would not keep his word. In the mean time, the duke of Alva was taken up with the ſiege of Mons, which ſurrendered not till the 19th of September. After the ſiege, his troops, under the command of Frederico de Toledo his ſon, were employed in taking Zutphen, Naerden, and other places. Hence it appears, that during the courſe of this year, the duke of Alva was not able to ſend an army into Scotland, though Mary's friends were ſtill in hopes of it. Mary's expectation of aſſiſtance from Spain was very prejudicial to her, becauſe when her practices were diſcovered, Elizabeth was more intent upon ending the troubles of Scotland. Beſides, the king of France grew a little cool, when he found queen Mary threw herſelf into the arms of the Spaniard [i].

[1573] Though Charles IX. and Elizabeth were very jealous of each other, they kept however a ſtrict correſpondence, capable of deceiving thoſe who knew not the intereſts of the two courts. Nothing paſſed on both ſides but proteſtations and aſſurances of obſerving inviolably the treaty of Blois. The beginning of the year 1573, Elizabeth ſent William Somerſet earl of Worceſter to Paris, to ſtand in her ſtead to the princeſs, Charles's daughter [k], who was named Elizabeth. She had ordered her embaſſador not to be perſuaded to be preſent at the maſs in the ceremony of the baptiſm; and in caſe it was inſiſted upon, to deſire the queen of Navarre to ſtand in his room.

A little before, queen Catherine had ſent to Elizabeth the earl of Rais, her confident, to propoſe once more the marriage of the duke of Alençon her third ſon. But this was not the ſole motive of his coming. The earl had orders to obſerve what paſſed in England, where the earl of Montgomery and ſome other French refugees were equipping a fleet to relieve Rochelle, which, after a long blockade, was at length beſieged in form. The duke of Anjou commanded at the ſiege, having with him the duke of Alençon his brother, and all the catholic nobles of France. Elizabeth anſwered, concerning the propoſal of the marriage, that ſhe was very willing to begin a treaty about it, provided the article of religion was firſt ſettled, elſe it was in vain to ſay any more of it.

About the ſame time, Montgomery ſailing to the relief of Rochelle, the French embaſſador complained that he was ſuffered to depart, and that the Engliſh merchants had ſupplied the beſieged with proviſions. Anſwer was made, that the perſons who were ſailed out of the ports of England were not owned, and carried counterfeit flags, and if they could be taken ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed. As for the merchants, they were men who followed their gain wherever they hoped to find it; and not being able to ſend their commodities to any other port of France, ſince the people were left to butcher whom they pleaſed, it was no wonder they ſhould ſend them to Rochelle, where they could vend them with ſafety. Probably the court of England had connived at Montgomery's armament, which however had no effect, and at ſending proviſions to the Rochellers. This was all the aſſiſtance ſhe gave the Hugonots in their wretched condition. She had reſolved to avoid a breach with the French, whether ſhe hoped to gain them to her intereſts, or make the world believe there was a greater union between her and king Charles than there was in reality. This was doubtleſs to render her enemies both at home and abroad leſs eager to form plots againſt her.

After her recovery, ſhe ordered Portſmouth to be ſtrengthened with new fortifications, her navy to be encreaſed, muſters to be obſerved in every county, &c. Stow, p. 673.—This year, on May 8, a new parliament was held at Weſtminſter, and was prorogued June 30. The acts made now, were theſe: 1. An act, making the coining or counterfeiting of foreign coin, miſpriſon of treaſon. 2. That juſtices of peace, at the quarter-ſeſſions, ſhall rate every pariſh within the ſhire to which they belong, for the relief of the priſoners in the common gaol.

The

We are going at length to ſee an end put to the troubles of Scotland. The earl of Morton the new regent, having good intelligence of what paſſed at the court of France, and knowing it was reſolved to aſſiſt powerfully the queen's faction after the taking of Rochelle, believed he ought to improve this interval to prevent their deſigns. He propoſed therefore to Grange, by James Melvil, to renew the negotiation begun before the earl of Mar's death. Grange and his companions made ſome ſcruple at firſt, becauſe they expected the French ſuccours promiſed them by the lord Seaton. However, not to give occaſion to ſay they were entirely againſt a peace, and to try to gain time till Whitſuntide, Grange replied, he was willing to accept the ſame terms as had been offered by the earl of Mar, provided the queen's whole party were included in the treaty. The regent, who was better informed than Grange imagined, eaſily judged this anſwer tended only to prolong the agreement, by the difficulties of contenting every one. He refuſed therefore to treat with the whole party, and offered to give Grange and his companions all the ſatisfaction they could reaſonably expect; but his offer was rejected. Whereupon he turned to the duke of Chateleraut, and the earls of Huntley and Argyle, who were not ſo ſcrupulous as thoſe of the caſtle of Edinburgh. They treated for themſelves and dependents, that is, for almoſt all the reſt of the queen's party, without regarding the concerns of Grange and his aſſociates. They perceived they could no longer rely on the aſſiſtance of France, which was too remote, and withal very uncertain, conſidering the civil war which afflicted that kingdom. The treaty which they made with the regent, aſſiſted by Drury and Killegrew, the Engliſh embaſſadors, was to this effect:

That they ſhould ſubmit to the king, and conform to the eſtabliſhed religion. That if any perſon ſhould violate this article, he ſhould be declared a traitor.

That the ſentences pronounced againſt the Hamiltons and Gordons ſhould be repealed, excepting ſuch however as concerned the murders of the earls of Murray and Lenox, which ſhould be left to the queen of England's deciſion.

That the queen of England ſhould bind herſelf by ſome public inſtrument, that the Hamiltons and Gordons ſhould not be proſecuted for the murder of the earls of Murray and Lenox, without her expreſs conſent.

The eſtates of the kingdom meeting ſhortly after, confirmed this agreement by their authority.

As ſoon as Grange heard of the agreement which was negotiating between the regent and the heads of the queen's party, he endeavoured to obſtruct it, by offering to ſurrender the caſtle of Edinburgh in ſix months. But as the regent was better informed than Grange imagined, it was eaſy for him to perceive this offer tended only to gain time till the French ſuccours ſhould arrive[l]. At laſt, when Grange knew the heads of the queen's party were upon the point of ſigning their treaty, he offered to deliver the caſtle immediately, provided he might put it into the hands of the earl of Rothes. But the regent did not think fit to place in that fortreſs a governor of Grange's chuſing. Beſides, all the proceedings of thoſe of the caſtle, and the evaſions they uſed to avoid ſurrendering the place, plainly ſhewed they were not heartily inclined to an accommodation. So, without farther ceremony, he declared them traitors, and prepared in good earneſt to beſiege them. Melvil ſays upon this occaſion, that he knows not what rage poſſeſſed the regent, to deſire to have by way of ſiege a place which was offered to be ſurrendered voluntarily and inſtantly[m]. It is indeed little probable the earl of Morton ſhould deſire to expoſe himſelf to the difficulties of ſuch a ſiege, if he could otherwiſe have had the place. But what Melvil aſcribes to the regent's rage, may with much more likelihood be imputed to the cavils of thoſe of the caſtle, who ſtrove to prolong the time till the promiſed ſuccours ſhould arrive. In Walſingham's Negotiations there are ſeveral letters from the queen, the lord Burleigh, ſecretary Smith, blaming Grange and his companions for their fooliſh preſumption and invincible obſtinacy, in attempting alone to continue the troubles in Scotland. Melvil, Grange's intimate friend, gives quite another turn to this affair, and lays the whole blame upon the regent[n].

However, the earl of Morton having but few troops, and wanting artillery and ammunition, by reaſon the public magazine was in the caſtle of Edinburgh, applied to queen Elizabeth. I have already ſhewn of what conſequence it was to England, that the troubles of Scotland ſhould be ended before France could interpoſe. For this reaſon, Elizabeth immediately made a treaty with the regent, which, among others, contained the following articles:

Elizabeth ſhall ſend to the regent, men, ordnance, and ammunition, for the beſieging the caſtle of Edinburgh jointly with the Scots.

No capitulation ſhall be granted to the beſieged, without the mutual conſent of the regent and the Engliſh general.

If the caſtle be taken by the Engliſh, it ſhall be delivered to the king of Scotland.

The priſoners, after the taking of the caſtle, ſhall be detained to be proceeded againſt according to law, the queen of England being firſt acquainted therewith.

Purſuant to this treaty, Elizabeth ordered ſir William Drury, marſhal of Berwick, to march into Scotland with fifteen hundred men, and a train of artillery, which was a manifeſt breach of the treaty of Blois; which ran, "That no foreign troops ſhould be ſuffered to enter Scotland." But as ſhe had diſcovered by the lord Seaton's papers, that France intended to violate the ſame article, ſhe believed doubtleſs, it would be ſimplicity to ſuffer herſelf to be prevented. However, the caſtle was inveſted, and the beſieged defended themſelves a whole month like men in deſpair. But at laſt their water failing, they were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion, if we may believe the Engliſh and Scots of the king's party. Melvil affirms on the contrary, that they capitulated, but the capitulation was not kept. Thus much is certain, the laird of Grange, James Kirkcaldie his brother, and ſome others, were condemned to be hanged, and the ſentence was executed accordingly[o]. Lidington died in priſon, having himſelf, according to ſome, haſtened his death by poiſon. The lord Hume and ſir Robert Melvil were releaſed[p]. Thus ended the civil wars in Scotland, and thus Elizabeth's enemies loſt all hopes of invading her from that quarter. From what has been hitherto ſaid, it may be eaſily perceived of what conſequence the tranſactions in Scotland were to Elizabeth. Accordingly ſhe was ever very intent upon the affairs of that kingdom, where ſhe ſucceſsfully managed her intereſts with the moſt refined policy.

At the time the heads of queen Mary's party were about to ſign their treaty, Verac, who was ſent into Scotland to encourage the party to ſtand their ground, was forced by a ſtorm into Scarborough. The preſident of the northern marches having notice of it, ordered him to be conveyed to London, without hearkening to the reaſons he alleged againſt it, taken from his character. It was known afterwards, that the moment he was ſeized he burnt all his papers. The French embaſſador made great noiſe that Verac was hindred from going to Scotland. But he was told, the queen had no advice of the ſending of this embaſſador, and if ſhe had known it, [l] The following project was formed between the court of France and queen Mary's party: That the marquis de Maine ſhould land at Air, with one thouſand ſhot, and, after joining the queen's party, repair to Edinburgh, whoſe caſtle Lidington and Grange had promiſed to deliver to the French, and in conſideration thereof were to receive a penſion, or ſome other livelihood, in France; after which they were to fortify themſelves in Loughbreton, Brochty, Dundee, and Aymouth. And then the duke of Guiſe was to come over with forces to deliver the queen of Scots; and at the ſame time, her friends in England, who were very numerous, were to riſe in arms, and deliver her in ſpite of queen Elizabeth. See Digges's Compl. Ambaſ. p. 314.

[m] To which he adds, "ſeeing he might have obtained his intent without the help of England, having all Scotland at his devotion, ſaving that few number without the caſtle, who would likewiſe have agreed upon any reaſonable condition." p. 120.

[n] Melvil ſays, that having told the regent, Grange, for his honour's ſake, was reſolved to agree for the whole party, the regent anſwered, he would not agree with all, becauſe then their faction would be as ſtrong as ever; and beſides, as the troubles had occaſioned great wrongs and extortions, he choſe rather that the crimes ſhould be laid upon the Hamiltons, &c. becauſe their eſtates were greater than thoſe of Grange and the reſt in the caſtle, and conſequently more land would eſcheat to him as the reward of his labours. Melvil telling Grange the regent's reſolution, he inſiſted upon agreeing with all; and Morton hearing of it, pretended to like him the better for ſtanding upon his reputation and honour, and ſeemed as if he had been reſolved to agree with thoſe in the caſtle. He thanked Melvil for the trouble he had been at, deſiring him to go home, and in the mean time he would propoſe the matter to the reſt of the noblemen of his ſide, who, he doubted not, would be very well ſatisfied with his proceedings, and then he would ſend for him again, and put the form of the agreement in writing. But he took immediately another courſe, and ſent and offered an accommodation to the Hamiltons, &c. who accepted of it as above. Melvil, p. 118—120.

[o] Melvil gives Grange an extraordinary character. He ſays he heard Henry II. of France, ſay, (pointing to him) "yonder is one of the moſt valiant men of our age." The great conſtable of France would never would have taken care he ſhould have been treated with the reſpect due to his character. That he had been conducted to London, by the general order which the preſident of the north had, to deal thus by all foreigners who ſhould land in thoſe parts, unleſs they were known to be merchants.

The embaſſador was not very well pleaſed with the anſwer; but he had ſtill leſs reaſon to be ſo with that he received ſhortly after to his urgent requeſt, for leave to ſpeak with the queen of Scots in private. This requeſt had been often repeated to no purpoſe. At laſt, the queen, tired with his importunities, told him plainly, ſhe was not ignorant of the practices of the king of France, and the queen-mother, in favour of Mary, and how they ſtood affected to England: That, however, ſhe had always inviolably obſerved the late treaty [q], and would ſtill obſerve it, chuſing rather the rupture ſhould come from France than from her: That, in caſe of a breach, ſhe did not queſtion, ſhe ſhould be able to defend herſelf, being well aſſured of the affection of her ſubjects: That ſhe could hardly reſtrain ſome, who offered to relieve Rochelle at their own expence, and maintain ſix months in Gaſcogne an army of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe.

Upon the embaſſador's demanding leave for Verac to purſue his journey to Scotland, the queen agreed to it, after ſome affected delays. But, whilſt ſhe was putting obſtacles in his way, ſhe cauſed a letter to be ſent from the earl of Morton, telling her, that Verac's coming to Scotland would be very diſpleaſing to him, as well as to the duke of Chateleraut and the earl of Huntley, with whom he was in perfect friendſhip: That therefore he believed, the envoy would do well to ſave himſelf the trouble of the journey. Whilſt they were debating at London about this affair, the caſtle of Edinburgh ſurrendered, and ſo Verac's journey became entirely needleſs. Queen Catherine de Medici, politic as ſhe was, could not help making a falſe ſtep in diſcovering to Walſingham, that the French court's deſign was to foment the troubles of Scotland. Upon the embaſſador's warm complaints of the intrigues of France with reſpect to Scotland, ſhe proteſted, the king, her ſon, and herſelf, knew not what he meant, and 'that their intention was only to perſuade the Scots to agree, and acknowledge queen Mary for their ſovereign.' That is the very thing, replied the embaſſador, the queen my miſtreſs complains of, ſince it is a direct breach of the treaty of Blois. The queen perceiving ſhe had ſaid too much, turned the diſcourſe, and complained of Verac's being detained in England; to which Walſingham made the ſame anſwer as had been given to La Mothe at London.

Scotland being in peace, under the authority of the young king and of a regent devoted to England, Elizabeth was freed from a great uneaſineſs. The recalling the duke of Alva from the government of the Low-Countries, was a farther increaſe of her happineſs. The commander of Requeſens, who ſucceeded the duke of Alva, finding he had full employment, refuſed to meddle with the affairs of England and Scotland, and ſo Elizabeth had nothing to fear from that ſide. Her enemies having no longer admittance into Scotland, and England being ſafe from all attacks but by ſea, ſhe lived ſome years in great tranquillity. Beſides, France was not in condition to make any conſiderable attempt upon her, as well for want of naval forces, as becauſe of the civil wars which laid waſte the kingdom.

Mean while, Elizabeth, being deſirous alſo to ſecure herſelf from all domeſtic attempts, commanded the biſhop of Roſs, author and promoter of all the plots againſt her, to depart England. He thought himſelf happy in coming off ſo eaſily, and withdrawing into France, continued his ſecret practices, though to little purpoſe. He writ there a hiſtory of Scotland, from the beginning to the year 1561. What he ſays of the earl of Murray towards the end of his hiſtory, ſpeaking of the firſt troubles of Scotland, and which Camden has taken care to copy, plainly ſhews, what might have been expected from him, had he continued it to the end of the war.

Though Elizabeth had ſaid, in her anſwer to the propoſal concerning her marriage with the duke of Alençon, that the article of religion was firſt to be ſettled, Catherine de Medici did not fail however to ſollicit her upon that ſubject. She ſaid, the court of France would yield in that point, but did not ſay how far. Moreover, ſhe cauſed the duke of Alençon who was then at the ſiege of Rochelle, to ſend her letters, expreſſing his eager deſire to have the marriage ſucceed. At laſt, ſhe was ſollicited ſo much to permit the duke to come and ſee her, that ſhe conſented, provided he would not take it ill in caſe he was obliged to return without any thing done. But the ſiege of Rochelle holding longer than was imagined, hindered the duke from paying his viſit.

This ſiege, which had laſted ſo long, was at length raiſed on the 25th of June, after the city had withſtood thirty thouſand cannon balls, nine great aſſaults, beſides twenty leſſer ones, and the effects of ſixty mines. The duke of Anjou loſt above twelve thouſand men. The news of his being choſen king of Poland, and of the Poliſh embaſſadors being on their way to offer him the crown, afforded him a pretence to relinquiſh his enterpriſe, which perhaps would not have ended to his honor; and the raiſing the ſiege brought with it peace to the Hugonots, who were hardly able to ſupport themſelves. Charles IX. was afraid of the duke his brother, and the queen-mother loved him tenderly. This bred between the king and the queen his mother a diſſention, which it is likely proved fatal to the king. He thought it long till his brother was gone to Poland, and the queen ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe to hinder his departure. At laſt, Charles grew ſo ſuſpicious of all theſe delays, that he could not forbear threatening the queen his mother, who was forced at length to ſuffer her beloved ſon to depart, and the king was pleaſed to accompany him part of the way. But he could not go ſo far as he had reſolved, by reaſon of a diſtemper wherewith he was ſeized, and of which he never recovered. Elizabeth hearing the king of Poland was gone, and Charles taken ill, did not think proper to receive the duke of Alençon's viſit, before ſhe had a fuller knowledge of the affairs of the royal family of France. She writ to him therefore to deſire him to defer his journey, and gave him for reaſon, that the Engliſh would not look with a good eye upon a prince coming from the ſiege of Rochelle, and wearing a ſword dyed with the blood of their brethren.

This year Walter d'Evereux earl of Eſſex had leave to go into Ireland, to conquer the country of Clandeboy, at his own expence. But his enterpriſe was not crowned with ſucceſs, becauſe he was privately hindered by the earl of Leiceſter his enemy [r].

Queen Elizabeth's letter to the duke of Alençon not being capable of diſcouraging him, he made freſh inſtances for leave to come into England, to which the queen at length yielding, ſent him a ſafe conduct. But in the mean time, the queen his mother ſuſpecting him of a deſign to ſupplant the king of Poland his brother, in caſe the king happened to die, ordered it ſo that the king ſet a guard over him as well as the king of Navarre, who was accuſed of ſuggeſting this deſign to him. However, the queen-mother perceiving the king near his end, thought fit to take this precaution, to ſecure the crown to the king of Poland, who was abſent. And indeed Charles IX. died the 30th of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. The manner of his death was ſo uncommon, that it gave occaſion not only to the proteſtants, but the catholics themſelves, to conſider it as an effect of the divine vengeance for the horrible maſſacre committed by his orders. The blood guſhed out of all the paſſages of his body, and even ſpouted through his pores. The queen-mother took her meaſures ſo well, that cauſing the dying king to confer on her the regency of the kingdom, ſhe kept all quiet till the arrival of the king of Poland, who ſucceeded his brother by the name of Henry III. He arrived in France the 5th of September, but came not to Paris till about the middle of February the next year.

Nothing memorable paſſed in England during the year

ſpeak to him uncovered. Camden ſays, an hundred of the family of the Kirkcaldies, offered to be vaſſals for ever to the regent, to pay a yearly penſion of three thouſand marks, and two thouſand pounds Scottiſh in hand, if he would ſpare his life. He was (ſays Melvil) gentle and meek, like a lamb in the houſe, but like a lion in the field. King James, when he came of age, took up his bones, and buried them honourably, reſtoring his heirs, p. 122, 123.

[p] The lord Hume died ſhortly after in Edinburgh-caſtle, where he was confined. Melvil, p. 122.

[q] Probably ſhe had ſome evaſion to excuſe the ſending of her troops into Scotland. Rapin.

[r] In the beginning of the year 1573, viz. January 12, died William lord Howard of Effingham, lord privy-ſeal, ſon of Thomas Howard, the martial duke of Norfolk, by his ſecond wife, Agnes Tilney. He was made lord high admiral by queen Mary, and afterwards lord chamberlain; in which poſt he ſerved queen Elizabeth, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles, who a while after was made lord chamberlain, and alſo high admiral.—Not long after, on March 17, died alſo Reginald Grey earl of Kent, whom the queen the year before raiſed from a private man to the dignity of earl of Kent, after the title had lain dormant fifty years. His brother Henry ſucceeded him in his honour. John Caius, a famous phyſician, born at Norwich, and bred up at Padua and Cambridge, died about this time, and lies buried in Gonvil and Caius college, to which he was a great benefactor, with this inſcription on his tomb, FUI CAIUS. The commerce between England and the Netherlands, which had been prohibited ever ſince 1568, was renewed in January this year, and the articles agreed upon at Briſtol concerning it, were ratified by the king of Spain. This year alſo queen Elizabeth renewed and confirmed the charters of the city of London. Camden, p. 446, 449. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XV. p. 701, 719.

This

1574[s]. The only thing Camden has remarked in his Annals, is the marriage of Charles earl of Lenox, uncle to the king of Scotland, with Elizabeth Cavendiſh the Counteſs of Shrewſbury's daughter. As this marriage was made unknown to the queen, ſhe impriſoned the mothers of the new-married couple.

In the Netherlands, the confederates took Middleburgh in Zealand. But on the other hand, Lewis count of Naſſau, who was leading an army to his brother the prince of Orange, loſt a battle upon Moker-heath, near Nimeguen, and was himſelf ſlain, with his brother Henry and Chriſtopher count Palatine[t]. This ſame year, the Spaniſh troops mutinying, ſurpriſed and plundered Antwerp, where they made an immenſe booty. The governor of the Low Countries, to avoid greater miſchiefs, was forced to pardon them.

[1575] As ſoon as Henry III. arrived in France, it was reſolved in his council to wage war with the Hugonots, though they had given no occaſion, and preſently after hoſtilities were renewed againſt them. Mean while, as Henry was afraid the queen of England would aſſiſt thoſe whom he deſigned to extirpate, his firſt care was to renew with her the league of Blois, after moving the queſtion to her, Whether the mutual defence againſt all men, mentioned in that league, did include the cauſe of religion? Elizabeth anſwered, it did, as ſhe could prove by a letter from the late king which ſhe had by her. Adding, if he were attacked on account of religion, and required her aid in virtue of the treaty, ſhe ſhould be always ready to give it. Indeed ſhe ran no great riſk in making that offer, being fully perſuaded the French king would not uſe Engliſh troops againſt the Hugonots. Beſides, by the terms of the league, ſhe was not bound to ſend him any troops, ſince inſtead of being attacked he was himſelf the aggreſſor. However, Elizabeth's anſwer to Henry might have given the Hugonots ill notions of her, if ſhe had not privately ſupplied the prince of Condé with money to pay the army prince Caſimir count Palatine was levying for them in Switzerland and Germany.

England was pretty quiet during the year 1575. There happened only an accident on the borders of Scotland, where ſir John Forſter, warden of the Middle March[u], and Carmichel, warden of Liddeſdale in Scotland, holding a conference, each at the head of a troop of his own nation, quarrelled and fought. The Engliſh were worſted, ſir George Heron, warden of Tindale, loſt his life, and Forſter being taken priſoner[w], was conducted to the earl of Morton, who treated him very civilly, but detained him ſome time, for fear if he were preſently diſmiſſed, he would in his heat attempt a revenge. At laſt, having releaſed him, he made him promiſe to appear in Scotland at a ſet day. Elizabeth thought the regent of Scotland's proceeding very ſtrange, and at firſt took the affair very heinouſly; but Morton found means to appeaſe her, by making all the ſubmiſſions ſhe was pleaſed to require. This year died the duke of Chateleraut[x].

[1576] This year affords as little matter for the Hiſtory of England as the foregoing. We only find that the earl of Eſſex died in Ireland[y], and the earl of Leiceſter privately married his widow, unknown to the queen, though he was ſuſpected of having cauſed the huſband to be poiſoned. He was always in the queen's good graces, who was ſo biaſſed in his favour, that no man durſt tell her his thoughts of him. It was one of queen Elizabeth's greateſt failings to place her eſteem upon a perſon who ſo little deſerved it[z].

As it is neceſſary for the ſequel of the hiſtory to know what paſſed in the countries near England, I muſt make a ſhort digreſſion, not ſo much to inform the reader of things which are well known, as to refreſh his memory.

Lewis de Zuniga, commander of Requeſens, and governor of the Low-Countries, died this year. After his death, the council of ſtate adminiſtered alone the affairs of the Netherlands till a new governor ſhould arrive. The council conſiſted of natives and Spaniards. Shortly after, the Spaniſh troops happened to mutiny, and reſolved to plunder Bruſſels. The magiſtrates, alarmed at the danger, applied to the council of ſtate, who declared the mutineers rebels, though ſeveral of the counſellors favoured the ſeditions. And indeed, preſently after the little town of Aloſt was ſacked, and the council of ſtate took no care to puniſh the authors of that outrage, or prevent the like misfortune which threatened the other towns. For that reaſon ſome lords of Brabant drew together at Bruſſels ſome of the citizens, and inveſting the place where the council of ſtate held their ſeſſions, expelled ſuch of the members as were ſuſpected to countenance the mutineers, and put in their room perſons better affected to the good of their country. The new council of ſtate, thus compoſed, joined the confederates, who were now in arms in defence of their liberties, and they entered together into a league to free themſelves from the Spaniſh forces. Then Hieronymo de Roda, a Spaniard, one of thoſe who were expelled the council, headed the rebels, and ſent for the Spaniſh troops which were in Holland, with whom the Germans joined. This body, grown very conſiderable, plundered Maeſtricht and Antwerp, without any poſſibility of preventing them.

The prince of Orange, who was in Holland, ſeeing the affairs of the Netherlands reduced to this point, offered the council of ſtate his troops, his perſon, and the aſſiſtance of the provinces of Holland and Zealand, which began to make a ſeparate ſtate under his government. Upon this offer, the council of ſtate reſolved to enter into treaty with Holland and Zealand. The conferences were held at Ghent, where with an unanimous conſent, Luxemburgh excepted, was formed the union of the provinces of the Low-Countries, called the Union or Pacification of Ghent, for the defence of their laws and liberties. Notwithſtanding this, they were ſtill willing to own the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern according to the antient laws. This union being thus formed, the fortreſſes raiſed by the duke of Alva to keep the Netherlands in ſubjection, were demoliſhed every-where. Some time after, the aſſociation was ſworn by the clergy and nobility, ſolemnly approved by the council of ſtate, and publiſhed at Bruſſels. By that, Philip II. loſt almoſt all his authority in the Low-Countries, having only the bare title of ſovereign, unleſs he would confine himſelf to the rights enjoyed by his predeceſſors, which was very far from his thoughts.

France was not more quiet than the Low-Countries. The duke of Alençon had aſſembled an army againſt the king in favour of the Hugonots. On the other hand, the prince of Condé, with the forces levied by prince Caſimir in Germany, entered France and joined the duke of Alençon. Thus the Hugonots, whom the court had determined to extirpate, were in a condition to ſell their lives dear, having at their head the king's brother, the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, with an army of thirty thouſand men. But the queen-mother had the addreſs to break all their meaſures. She ſent them offers of peace, and, during the negotiation, found means to ſow jealouſy among them, and win from them the duke of Alençon and prince Caſimir. In ſhort, ſhe cauſed them to agree to a peace, which, for all its ſeeming advantages, proved fatal to them, as it diſunited their forces. The treaty was concluded the 9th of May, and enrolled ſix months after by the parliament of Paris. The Hugonots had never obtained ſo advantageous a peace ſince the beginning of the troubles. In October the duke of Alençon came to court, where the queen his mother diſengaged him entirely from the ſide of the

Upon which, Leiceſter putting away Douglas Sheffield (whether his wife or miſtreſs is not known), he made love to Eſſex's widow, daughter to ſir Francis Knolles, to whom he was afterwards doubly married: firſt privately, and then publicly, for ſir Francis's ſatisfaction, who doubted of the private marriage. Hugonots. Then it was that he aſſumed the title of duke of Anjou, borne by the king his brother before he aſcended the throne.

The peace was no ſooner ſigned, than, according to the ſincerity ſome time ſince profeſſed by the court of France, they took new meaſures to ruin the Hugonots. Treaties and oaths went then for nothing, and were conſidered only as lawful ſnares to ſurpriſe heretics. The cardinal of Eſte the pope's legate, and Don John of Auſtria, who was going to take poſſeſſion of the government of the Low-Countries, came to the court of France, and had ſeveral conferences upon the occaſion with the king, the queen-mother, and the duke of Guiſe. Guiſe was looked upon as the head of the catholic party, and for that reaſon the legate took with him meaſures, of which the king was not fully informed. The moſt proper means in their opinion, to attain their end, was to unite ſeveral aſſociations, made in divers provinces by the zealous catholics, and form one general aſſociation againſt the enemies of the antient religion. This is what was called the Holy Union, or ſimply, the League. Humieres was the firſt that ſigned it in Picardy, from whence it ſpread afterwards over the kingdom. The pope was the chief promoter of it, the king of Spain gloried in being called its protector, and the duke of Guiſe, who aimed at being declared the head, ſupported it to the utmoſt of his power. The queen-mother willingly came into it, not from a religious zeal, but becauſe the Hugonots had threatened to call her to an account for her adminiſtration during her regency. In fine, the king himſelf, ſeduced by ill counſels and his own ſupineneſs, was carried away with the torrent, and ſuffered the miſchief to increaſe, which was one day to prove his ruin.

When the late peace was negotiated, the Hugonots earneſtly ſollicited a general meeting of the ſtates, imagining, beſides a great many deputies of their religion, they ſhould have for them the duke of Alençon's party, and many others who were not pleaſed with the government. But when the deputies came to be elected, the duke of Alençon had now changed ſides. Beſides, the court by intrigues and money found means to procure a great number of deputies to be choſen who were againſt the Hugonots. So the ſtates meeting at Blois, inſtead of moving any thing in favour of the reformed religion, were going to demand of the king the confirmation of the league, and requeſt him to appoint the duke of Guiſe for head. But the king, who was now grown extremely jealous of the duke of Guiſe, reſolved to prevent it. To that end, he declared himſelf head of the league, and ſigning it firſt with his own hand, cauſed the great men of his court to ſubſcribe it, and ſent it into the provinces that every one might do the ſame. Shortly after, the ſtates having ſent to pray him that he would not allow any religion in the kingdom but the catholic, he anſwered, it was his intention; and if he was under a neceſſity of promiſing the contrary, even with an oath, he would keep his word only till he had forces ſufficient to enable him to break it. Thus the Hugonots were forced to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of their blood, without the leaſt hopes of ſeeing an end to their calamities by a treaty, ſince the king himſelf declared he would never make any with them, but only to deceive them [a].

[1577] Don John of Auſtria came into the Low-Countries the beginning of the year 1577, full of vaſt projects. He was a prince of a great genius, and of an ambition ſuitable to his birth. The condition of a ſubject was a burthen of which he would have been glad to be eaſed. All his views tended to ſovereignty. His firſt project was to make himſelf king of Tunis; that failing, he thought of marrying the queen of Scots, and becoming ſovereign of all Great Britain. Camden affirms, he had this from the mouth of Antonio Perez, who told him moreover, that the project was imparted to pope Gregory XIII. who approved it, but was concealed from king Philip. This was probably the ſubject of Don John's conferences at Paris with the duke of Guiſe. So Don John, when he arrived in the Low-Countries, had two grand deſigns in his head: Firſt, to ſubdue the Netherlands entirely: Secondly, to become maſter of England and Scotland. Elizabeth was not ignorant of the firſt, but the ſecond was ſtill a ſecret to her.

The pacification of Ghent was communicated to the Spaniſh court, and Philip giving way to the times, thought proper to confirm it by an edict. So when Don John of Auſtria came to the Netherlands, he was forced to ſign it before he was owned for governor. This was followed by an aſſembly held at Marche en Famine, where it was reſolved to publiſh a perpetual edict (as they called it) for driving the Spaniſh troops out of the Low-Countries, purſuant to the pacification of Ghent. Philip approving alſo this edict, the Spaniards were ſent into Italy, all the places remaining in the hands of the ſtates. Hitherto Don John had beed forced to diſſemble; but ſome time after, he took off the maſk, and ſurpriſed the caſtle of Namur. At the ſame time he ſollicited the German troops, who were waiting in that country for their arrears, to ſurrender the places where they were garriſoned; but he was prevented by the ſtates, who found means to gain thoſe troops before him. The ſtates imputed the rupture to Don John's ambition, aad carried their complaints to the king, to whom Don John alſo writ, that the cabals of the prince of Orange had conſtrained him to provide for his own ſafety. Be this as it will, the ſtates of Brabant called the prince of Orange to their relief, and gave him the ſuperintendency of their country by conferring on him the title of Ruart [b]. This proceeding raiſed the jealouſy of the duke of Arſcot, and ſome other Brabant lords, who, to ruin the prince of Orange's credit, propoſed to the United Provinces the electing a governor-general, under colour they ſhould all have the ſame head. The prince of Orange perceived he was aimed at, but not to give occaſion to a fatal diviſion of the forces of the confederates, oppoſed not the election. The choice fell upon the archduke Matthias, brother to the emperor Rodolphus II. and the prince of Orange was declared his lieutenant. In the archduke's patent however were inſerted certain conditions, which, giving him the title and honour of governor, left the whole authority to the ſtates. This done, Matthias ſtealing away, as it was pretended, from his brother the emperor's court, came into the Low-Countries, where he was put in poſſeſſion of his poſt. Then the ſtates proclaimed war with Don John, who had taken care to be prepared, by ſending for troops from Italy, which were now on their way.

Then, and not before, Elizabeth perceived ſhe muſt have an eye to what paſſed in the Netherlands, becauſe at the ſame time the prince of Orange informed her of Don John's deſign to marry the queen of Scots, and the ſtates ſent ambaſſador's [c] to deſire her aſſiſtance. So, finding the deſigns of the governor of the Low-Countries reached farther than ſhe imagined, ſhe immediately lent the ſtates a hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, which they deſired of her [d]. Camden ſpeaks here of a treaty whereby the queen engaged to aſſiſt the ſtates with a thouſand horſe well mounted, and five thouſand foot, on condition the general or commander, being an Engliſhman, ſhould be admitted into the council of ſtate, and nothing determined without his conſent. But Grotius does not mention this treaty in his Annals of the Low-Countries. He ſays only, from that time Elizabeth concerned herſelf ſo far with the affairs of the United Provinces, that ſhe did not ſuffer the ſtates to come to any important reſolution without giving her notice [e]. Indeed it was very much her intereſt to order it ſo, that the war now beginning in the Low-Countries ſhould be continued in ſuch a manner, as to diſable Don John of Auſtria to execute his projects upon England. Theſe projects were not the inventions of the prince of Orange, to engage Elizabeth in the defence of the Netherlands. Famianus Strada poſitively mentions them in his hiſtory. He even ſays, Gregory XIII. ſent a nuncio to Don John with the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns, to be employed in the expedition projected againſt England, but that he was forced to uſe it in his war with the ſtates. Mean while, at the very time Elizabeth lent money to Philip II.'s enemies, ſhe wrote to him [f], that ſhe by no means intended to break the antient alliance between England and the houſe of Burgundy: that, on the contrary, ſhe ſupplied the confederates with money, only to ſecure theſe provinces to him, and hinder them from desperately throwing themselves into the arms of France. It is likely Philip was not very well pleased with these reasons, but feigned to be so, not to induce Elizabeth to do more.

At this time the affairs of France were in a sad situation. The transactions of the states at Blois could not but raise a civil war in the kingdom. The Hugonots finding a resolution was taken to extirpate them, made a counter-league, whereof the king of Navarre was declared general, and the prince of Condé appointed for his lieutenant. The former edict of pacification being revoked, as had been resolved by the states, hostilities were renewed on both sides, but with great disadvantage to the Hugonots, who were very weak. However, as the war gave the duke of Guise too much credit, of whose power the king was extremely jealous, Henry thought it his interest to grant a peace to the Hugonots. From thence forward he plunged himself into pleasures, and lived at so expensive a rate, that he forfeited the love and esteem of his subjects. The prince of Lorrain knew how to improve the advantages which the king's conduct procured him, as will hereafter appear [g].

[1578] Whilst Elizabeth assisted the confederates of the Low-Countries, under colour of hindering them from submitting to France, Philip returned the favour, by endeavouring to raise a rebellion in Ireland. The project was formed some time before on account of pope Gregory XIII. who wanted to procure for his son Jacomo Boncompagno the crown of that kingdom. Thomas Stukely, an English fugitive, was the first author of it, and Philip II. undertook to supply whatever was necessary to accomplish it. In the year 1570, Stukely went to Pius V. and persuaded him, it would be very easy to burn the English fleet, and then conquer Ireland; and to that purpose he desired the command of some ships and three thousand Italians. The project, which could not then be executed, was resumed under the pontificate of Gregory XIII. who was allured with the hopes of procuring the crown of Ireland for his bastard son. As Stukely knew that, besides the navy-royal, Elizabeth could, upon occasion, equip a good number of other ships, he proposed the freighting of as many English vessels as possible, by the Flemings, French, Spaniards, Italians, and the sending them some long voyage. After that, he was to attack the royal navy, which was then very weak, and try to burn the ships in the several harbours where they lay. Which done, he intended to make a descent in Ireland, where he did not question the native Irish would join him; and after the expulsion of the English, he was to cause the pope's son to be proclaimed king. It is not very likely Philip II. depended upon the success of this enterprise; but he hoped, no doubt, to cause a diversion, which should hinder Elizabeth from assisting the rebels of the Low-Countries, or at least convince her she ought to pay him more regard. However, the pope having conferred on Stukely several honourable titles [h] taken from the kingdom of Ireland, as if he had been in possession, gave him some ships and eight hundred Italian soldiers, paid by the king of Spain. Stukely sailed from Civita Vecchia, and safely arrived at Lisbon, with intent to pursue his voyage and undertaking. But Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, being then going into Africa to war upon the Moors, persuaded him to accompany him in his expedition, and obtained Philip's leave. Shortly after, they both perished in the battle of Alcazar, and Philip relinquished the project of conquering Ireland for that of securing the crown of Portugal, after the death of the old cardinal Henry, who succeeded Don Sebastian.

The war commencing in the Netherlands, several companies of volunteers were formed in England, who went to serve the states with the queen's consent, or at least connivance [i]. On the other hand, part of the Spanish troops, disbanded at the arrival of Don John of Austria, were now returned to the Low-Countries, and moreover, Alexander Farnese, son of Octavio, had brought Don John a considerable body of Italians. With these forces, Don John gained at Gemblours a signal victory over the army of the states, which was followed with the taking of several places. Some time after, Philip II. offered a peace to the states; but as it was upon terms very different from the pacification of Ghent, and as he did not talk of recalling Don John of Austria, his offer was rejected.

The affairs of the states were however in an ill situation. The jealousies among the great men, and the diversity of religions, bred very dangerous troubles in the rising commonwealth. The duke Anjou and prince Casimir equally offered their assistance to the states, who knew not which way to turn. But at this very time a fortunate and unexpected accident happened. The city of Amsterdam, which hitherto had been for the king, resolved to join the confederates, and by that considerably strengthened their party. On the other hand, what passed soon after in the same city, very much increased the suspicion and distrust of the catholics. They who had been banished on account of religion, being recalled, found means to expel the magistrates, and put the government of the city into the hands of the reformed. The same thing was done at Haerlem, Utrecht, and other places; and this gave the catholics reason to suspect that, under colour of maintaining the cause of liberty, there was a design to abolish the antient religion, contrary to the pacification of Ghent. And therefore to prevent the execution of this project, the catholics proposed to give the government of the state to the duke of Anjou, a prince attached to his religion, and over whom they hoped the prince of Orange would not have the same influence as over Matthias. The prince of Orange not thinking proper to oppose the motion, for fear of confirming the suspicions of the catholics, the duke of Anjou was declared by the states, Protector of the Belgick liberties.

Mean while, the reformed fearing the duke of Anjou's arrival would produce some change prejudicial to their religion, presented a petition to the states, desiring to be admitted to the exercises of the public offices, as well as the catholics. This request was granted, on condition the catholics should enjoy the same privilege in Holland and Zealand; but these two provinces, without directly opposing this resolution, found means however to evade the condition annexed. Thence arose great divisions among the confederates. The catholics would yield nothing in the provinces where they were masters, since Holland and Zealand did not perform what was ordained, and the reformed would seize by force what was granted them by the states.

Whilst these differences sensibly lessened the union of the confederate provinces, it happened that the inhabitants of Ghent expelled the city all the Romish priests, and without obeying the archduke and the prince of Orange, who commanded them to recal them, prepared for their defence, in case they should be compelled to submit. On the other hand, the people of Artois and Hainault refused to suffer the reformed in their territories, and even pretended that the Gantois ought to be reduced to their duty by force. But the prince of Orange stoutly opposed all violent methods, by reason of the manifest danger of turning the arms of the confederates against themselves, at a time when Don John of Austria was preparing to do his utmost to destroy them. And indeed, shortly after, he attempted to force the army of the states, which was strongly intrenched, but was bravely repulsed. This attempt failing, contrary to his expectation, he made fresh offers of peace, to amuse the states till the arrival of a considerable body of troops which were coming to him. For the same reason, the states readily entered into treaty to gain time, because they expected prince Casimir with an army, and the duke of Anjou, who was now on the borders of Hainault with eight thousand men. Don John's succours coming first, he broke off the negotiation, and renewed the hostilities, being at the head of thirty thousand foot and sixteen thousand horse. Prince Casimir arriving also presently after, the army of the states was sixty thousand strong, whilst the duke of Anjou took in Hainault the little town of Binck. Casimir's army was chiefly paid by the queen, whose interest it was to hinder Don John from growing too powerful in the Netherlands, though feigning to be ignorant of his designs, she found other pretences to justify her assisting the states [k].

The divisions betwixt Ghent and the provinces of Artois and Hainault rendered the great armament of the states ineffectual. Some of their troops complaining they were not duly paid, suddenly quitted the army and took Menin. Shortly after, colonel Montigny followed their example with his whole regiment, and headed all the deserters. After that, he joined the troops of Artois, and made inroads into the province of Flanders. Then the Gantois, seeing their neighbours so powerful, and able to give them law, called prince

This Stukely was a profuse braging man, who, after spending his estate, fled into Ireland, where being disappointed of the hopes he had of being steward of Wexford, he vented many scurrilous things against the queen, and then made his escape from Ireland into Italy to Pius V. Caſimir to their relief, and promiſed to pay his troops. The prince accepted their offer, and, coming to Ghent, the duke of Anjou refuſed to join the army of the ſtates, unleſs prince Caſimir would return with his Germans; and as he could not prevail, he retired to France, leaving his troops free to join thoſe of Montigny. Thus theſe two princes, who came into the Low-Countries on purpoſe to aid the confederate provinces, ſerved only to ruin their affairs, by fomenting diſcord among the inhabitants. Some time after, Caſimir paſſed into England [l], probably to vindicate his conduct to Elizabeth, who had ſupplied him with money to raiſe and maintain his army.

Don John of Auſtria had not time to improve the troubles raiſed in the Netherlands, being prevented by death the 1ſt of October. There had been a conſpiracy againſt him, for which two Engliſhmen, Ratcliffe [m] and Grey, were executed. But he could not eſcape the poiſon which the king his brother cauſed to be given him, if we may believe ſome writers. After his death, Alexander Farneſe prince of Parma took upon him the command of the army, till farther orders from the court of Spain. His principal care was to cheriſh the diſſention between the Flemings and the inhabitants of Hainault and Artois, in which he ſucceeded to his wiſh.

Whilſt the duke of Anjou was in the Low-Countries, he ſent into England a gentleman called Bacqueville, to renew the treaty of his marriage with the queen. The king of France alſo ſent thither Rambouillet upon the ſame account, being very deſirous to be freed from a brother, who made him very uneaſy by his levity, which ſuffered him to be directed by people who had not always his intereſt in view. The queen received theſe envoys ſo very graciouſly, that all the world imagined ſhe really intended to marry. It is difficult to know whether, being then five and forty years old, ſhe ſeriouſly thought of eſpouſing the duke of Anjou who was but twenty, or, taking a ſort of pride in being wooed, only meant to amuſe him. For my part, I believe it to be an effect of her policy, that her enemies, upon the rumour of her going to marry the duke of Anjou, might be leſs eager to purſue their deſigns againſt her. I mean the private deſigns upon her life, ſince there was then no likelihood of her being openly attacked, nor conſequently any urgent reaſon to determine her to marry. She had nothing to fear from Scotland. France was not then in condition to make any conſiderable attempt upon England. The king of Spain was wholly intent upon procuring the crown of Portugal. In a word, the ſituation of the affairs of the Netherlands permitted not Don John of Auſtria to execute his vaſt projects. Thus, in all appearance, the queen upon this occaſion acted ſolely out of policy. But before I relate the event of the negotiation, it will be neceſſary to give a general knowledge of what paſſed in Scotland during the year 1578.

The earl of Morton ſtill governed that kingdom as regent, but in ſuch a manner, that he daily created to himſelf freſh enemies. If Melvil is to be credited, he was proud and covetous. He ſought pretences againſt the rich to rob them of their eſtates, and could ſuffer about him ſuch only as were always ready to flatter him. Elizabeth, whoſe intereſt it was to preſerve peace in Scotland, under the government of a man on whom ſhe could depend, was afraid that at length the regent's ill-conduct would deprive her of that advantage. Wherefore ſhe diſpatched Randolph into Scotland, under colour of congratulating the king, who was then between eleven and twelve years old, upon the progreſs he was making in his ſtudies. But the embaſſador's chief buſineſs was to inſtil into the earl of Morton a little more moderation, and perſuade him to live in a good underſtanding with the earls of Argyle and Athol, and ſome other lords, who being diſſatisfied might in the end raiſe troubles in the kingdom. The regent took this advice in good part, but not knowing how to improve it, was himſelf the ſole cauſe of his ruin.

The king had for governor Alexander Areſkine, ſon or brother of the late earl of Mar, and four preceptors, of whom George Buchanan was one. The earl of Morton having imprudently diſobliged theſe men, they found means to ſet the young king againſt him. This was not very difficult, conſidering the king's age, the continual acceſs they had to him, and the frequent occaſions the regent gave them to take notice of his ill-management. When they had prepared the king almoſt to their wiſh, they ſent for the earls of Argyle and Athol, who had now privately taken meaſures to execute their purpoſe. Theſe two lords very eaſily perſuaded the king to lay aſide this troubleſome regent, and take himſelf the reins of the government [n], promiſing to aſſiſt him in it. This was done ſo ſuddenly, that the earl of Morton, who ſuſpected nothing, was not able to prevent it. The ſtates of the kingdom meeting at the ſame time, confirmed by their authority what the king had done, and appointed a council of twelve lords, among whom was the earl of Morton. But inſtead of taking his place in the council, he feigned to be weary of the court, and retired to his own houſe, where he ſeemed wholly employed in cultivating his gardens.

The young king having taken the government into his hands, ſent immediate notice of it to queen Elizabeth, demanding withal the lands of the late earl of Lenox his grandfather, and the renewal of the alliance between England and Scotland. It was not the way of Elizabeth and her council to be governed by motives of generoſity, but rather to uſe artifice, in order to reap from every occurrence all the benefit poſſible. Nothing could be more juſt than the king of Scotland's demand. The counteſs of Lenox his grandmother, who lately died in England [o], had enjoyed, ſo long as ſhe lived, the eſtate aſſigned her by Henry VIII. her uncle, when ſhe married the earl of Lenox. He gave alſo certain lands to the earl her huſband, to ſupport the honour of being married to a princeſs of the blood-royal. Who could therefore be their more lawful heir, than the king of Scotland their grandſon? And yet the council of England pretended, the inheritance might be claimed by Arabella Stewart, daughter of Charles Stewart, younger brother to the late earl of Lenox, under colour that ſhe was born in the kingdom; though in England, the princes of the royal family are not to be conſidered as foreigners, in what place ſoever they are born. Not that the queen intended to debar the king of Scotland entirely of his inheritance, but had a mind to hold him in ſubmiſſion, by an intimation that the ſame reaſon might be uſed to deprive him of his right to ſucceed to the crown of England, and that he wanted her to ſurmount the difficulties which might occur. For this reaſon, ſhe ordered the rents of the lands to be ſequeſtered by the lord Burleigh, maſter of the wards. As to the renewing of the alliance between the two crowns, ſhe appointed commiſſioners to treat of that affair with the Scottiſh embaſſadors. The commiſſioners required the embaſſadors to make propoſitions anſwerable to the gratitude due from the king their maſter to the queen, for placing and ſupporting him on the throne, at the expence of her treaſure, and the blood of her ſubjects. The embaſſadors replied, they had only power to renew the alliance between the two crowns, with an additional article for the defence of the proteſtant religion [p], received in Scotland ſince the laſt treaty. The Engliſh, deſiring to make the alliance to be conſidered as very advantageous to the king of Scotland, propoſed, that in return for the favours the king had received, and daily did receive for their queen, and for the advantages the league was to procure to Scotland, he ſhould promiſe not to make any alliance with other princes or ſtates, nor to marry without the queeen of England's conſent. But the embaſſadors abſolutely rejected the propoſition.

Mean while, the earl of Morton, who had correſpondents in Sterling, where the king reſided, appearing one night at the gate of the town with a company of armed men, it was opened to him, and he entered without oppoſition. Then he went directly to the king's palace, of whoſe perſon he became maſter, and expelling his enemies, reſumed the poſt he had been obliged to relinquiſh. The earl of Athol, who had been made chancellor, died ſhortly after, not without ſuſpicion of being poiſoned. We muſt now return to the affairs of England [q].

[1579] Prince Caſimir left not the court of England till about the middle of February. He had been honoured and careſſed in an extraordinary manner, the queen having ſhewn, it would be grateful to her to render his ſtay in England as agreeable as poſſible. Before his departure ſhe conferred on him the

The Spaniards give out, that at his death he confeſſed he was let out of the town on purpoſe to commit this murder. But the Engliſh, who were preſent, deny he made any ſuch confeſſion. Order of St. George, and put on the garter herſelf about his leg[r]. It was not without reaſon ſhe uſed him thus civilly. He had ſtill a conſiderable body of troops ready to aſſiſt the proteſtants, and it was no ſmall advantage to her, that ſhe could rely on him by ſupplying him with money. In the preſent ſituation of her affairs, nothing deſerved her care more than to hinder the ruin of the proteſtants in France and the Netherlands, ſince on their preſervation depended her ſafety. Caſimir was her inſtrument to continue, in the Low-Countries, troubles which made her ſleep in peace. When he arrived in the Netherlands, he found his horſe had accepted the duke of Parma's paſſport for their ſafe return into Germany, becauſe, wanting their pay, they would neither ſerve any longer, nor ſtay in the country.

At the ſame time, the queen was employed in an affair which required her whole attention: I mean, the negotiation of her marriage with the duke of Anjou. Beſides Rambouillet and Bacqueville, who had been in England ſome time upon that account, the king of France had alſo ſent Simie[s], a man of parts, and very fit for the purpoſe. Elizabeth had a large ſhare of wit and ſenſe, and was perfectly acquainted with her own intereſts; but was not free from all the paſſions of her ſex. Simié ſoon diſcovering her temper, did not loſe his time in ſolliciting the duke of Anjou's ſuit by reaſons of ſtate and policy: ſhe knew more of that matter than himſelf. But he ſo artfully choſe the moſt proper way to win her heart, that he gained her ear more than the duke of Anjou would have done himſelf. All were ſurpriſed at the great change they ſaw in her, and at the progreſs the duke of Anjou had made by the help of Simié. Nay, it was believed he had uſed love-potions, and other unlawful arts, ſuch was his addreſs to render himſelf agreeable, if after all he was not himſelf deceived by the queen. Above all things, he took great care to ruin the earl of Leiceſter, not having the ſame reaſons as the Engliſh courtiers to manage that favourite. It was he who revealed to the queen Leiceſter's clandeſtine marriage with the earl of Eſſex's widow, and the diſcovery put her into ſuch a paſſion, that ſhe was going to ſend him to the Tower[t]. Leiceſter was vexed to ſee himſelf thus braved by a foreigner. It is even ſaid, he bribed one of the guards to aſſaſſinate him. It is at leaſt certain, the queen fearing the French envoys might receive ſome affront, took them under her eſpecial protection, and commanded by proclamation, that no man ſhould offer them any injury. It happened ſhortly after, that as the queen was in her barge on the Thames, near Greenwich, with the three French envoys[u], a piſtol was diſcharged out of a boat, and one of her bargemen wounded. The man that fired the piſtol was taken immediately, and threatened with the rack; but he cleared himſelf ſo ingenuouſly, that the queen was perſuaded of his innocence. She took occaſion from her pardoning this man, to diſplay the affection ſhe had for her ſubjects, ſaying, "She could believe nothing of her people, which a parent could not believe of his own children."

Shortly after, the duke of Anjou came incognito into England with only two ſervants. He went to court without being known, and after ſome private diſcourſe with the queen, returned into France. Two months after, the queen ordered ſome of her moſt truſty privy-counſellors[w], to examine together the advantages and miſchiefs which might ariſe from her marriage with the duke of Anjou, and report them to her[x].

Whilſt Elizabeth was intent upon gaining the king of France's friendſhip, the duke of Guiſe was framing a plot capable of creating her one day much trouble. As England could be conveniently invaded only from Scotland, Guiſe, who had not relinquiſhed the project formed by the late duke his father and the cardinal his uncle, was deviſing means to accompliſh it, by ſetting Elizabeth and the king of Scotland at variance. He made uſe for that purpoſe of Eſme Stewart, baron d'Aubigny, who came to Scotland under colour of paying his reſpects to the king as his near relation. He was ſon of John Stewart, younger brother of Matthew earl of Lenox, the young king's grandfather. This lord, who was ſettled in France, where his family held the barony of Aubigny in Berry, being come to the king, ſo artfully inſinuated himſelf into his good graces, that in a little time he became his favourite. There was alſo about the ſame time another young man, ſprung from a branch of the Stewart family, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Oghiltry, who was very much beloved by the king. Theſe two favourites joined together to ruin the earl of Morton, as well for the ſake of their own intereſt, as becauſe it was neceſſary, in order to execute the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, to be rid of a lord, who was too much attached to the intereſt of England. To compaſs their ends, they perſuaded the king to take a progreſs into ſome of his counties, well knowing the regent had buſineſs which would not ſuffer him to attend him. The earl of Morton not miſtruſting theſe young men, who ſeemed only to mind trifles, oppoſed not the king's deſign. During the progreſs, the two favourites inſtilled into the king an utter averſion to the regent, and an exceſſive deſire to be freed from him. We ſhall ſee preſently the effects of this averſion; but it will be proper firſt to mention what had paſſed in the Netherlands[y].

The army of the ſtates being much weakened by the retreat of the German troops, the prince of Parma beſieged Maeſtricht, whilſt plenipotentiaries on both ſides were treating a peace at Cologne. But this negotiation ſerved only to divide the confederates the more. From that time ſeveral lords forſook them. Montigny came to the prince of Parma's army with the forces under his command. Artois and Hainault made a ſeparate treaty, and ſome other provinces returned to the obedience of the king of Spain. The prince of Orange ſeeing this defection, uſed his endeavours to unite ſtill more ſtrictly the provinces which perſiſted in the reſolution to throw off Philip's yoke. He ſucceeded at length, and cauſed the famous union of Utrecht to be ſigned, between Holland, Zealand, Friſeland, and Utrecht; the articles whereof are to be ſeen in the hiſtories of thoſe countries. Ghent and Ypres afterwards came into the union, and the prince of Orange was made governor of Flanders. Mean while, the prince of Parma took Maeſtricht, after which he diſbanded moſt of the Spaniſh and Italian troops, according to his promiſe. This ſincerity procured him Mechlin, Liſle, and Valenciennes.

The city of London increaſing exceſſively, to the detriment of the reſt of the towns, the queen thought it neceſſary to remedy this inconvenience. She publiſhed therefore, in the beginning of the year 1580, a proclamation, prohibiting any new buildings within three miles of the gates of the city, upon pain of impriſonment, and forfeiture of the materials[z]. It were to be wiſhed for England, that this prohibition had been punctually executed even to this day, ſince the city is ſo enlarged, that it is grown a monſtrous head to a body of a moderate ſize, to which it bears no proportion.

But there was a ſtill more preſſing evil, which it was no leſs neceſſary to remedy. I mean the hindering of the Engliſh ſeminaries in foreign countries from ſending prieſts into England to preach ſedition and rebellion, under colour of adminiſtring the ſacraments to the catholics. The prieſts expelled England in the beginning of this reign, had ſet up a college at Douay in 1568, by means of William Allen an Oxford man, afterwards cardinal. Whilſt the duke of Alva was governor of the Netherlands, in this college were formed all the plots I have mentioned in favour of the queen of Scots. But Don Lewis de Requeſens having baniſhed from the Low-Countries all the Engliſh fugitives, the members of Douay-college retired, ſome to Rome, and ſome to Rheims, where they erected ſeminaries, under the protection of the pope and the cardinal of Lorrain archbiſhop of Rheims. It was theſe two ſeminaries which ſupplied the catholics in England with prieſts. Whilſt the court imagined theſe men only adminiſtred the ſacraments in private to thoſe of their religion, no notice ſeemed to be taken of it. But it was diſcovered at length, that they were diligent in ſpreading pernicious principles, which might be attended with ill conſequences. They maintained, that the pope had by divine right full power to dethrone kings, and Elizabeth being excommunicated and depoſed by Pius V.'s bull, her ſubjects were freed from their allegiance. Four of these dangerous emissaries were condemned and executed, for daring to maintain publicly that the queen was lawfully deposed [a].

This did not hinder the two seminaries from continually sending into England incendiaries, with whom were joined Robert Parsons and Edmund Campian, jesuits, who were the first of that order employed to preach the forementioned dangerous tenets. They had obtained of the pope a bull, dated the 14th of April 1580, declaring that pope Pius's bull did for ever bind Elizabeth and the heretics, but not the catholics, till a favourable opportunity should offer to put it in execution. These two jesuits had professed the protestant religion, and even bore offices in the university of Oxford [b]. After that, withdrawing out of the kingdom, they returned from time to time, appearing one while like clergymen, another while like soldiers, or in some other disguise; and frequented the houses of the catholics, under pretence of instructing and comforting them, but in reality to inspire them with sedition and rebellion. Nay, they had the confidence to challenge the protestant clergy to dispute in print [c]. All this coming to the queen's knowledge, a proclamation was issued out, commanding all those who had any children, wards, kinsmen, beyond sea, to give in their names to the ordinary in ten days, and call them home within a month [d], with a prohibition to supply them with money after that time. By the same proclamation, all persons were forbid to entertain or harbour any jesuits or priests sent forth from the seminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being punished as rebels and seditious persons.

Shortly after, printed books were dispersed, intimating, that the pope and the king of Spain had conspired to conquer England and restore the catholic religion, and exhorting the English papists to encourage the design. Whereupon the queen issued out another proclamation, declaring, she was not ignorant of the practices of her enemies, but by the blessing of God and the help of her faithful subjects, she was able to withstand their attacks, both at home and abroad: That moreover, as the plots which were contriving were not only against her person, but also against the whole kingdom, she did not intend to be cruel to the good by sparing the bad; and therefore such as would not for the future keep within the bounds of their duty, were to expect no favour [e].

The menaces from the pope and the king of Spain were not entirely fruitless, since it appeared this very year that there was a plot formed against Ireland. Arthur Grey, lord-deputy of that island, had intelligence that seven hundred Spaniards and Italians, sent by the pope and Philip II. were landed without opposition [f], under the command of San Joseppo an Italian, and had raised a fortification, which they called the Fort del Oro. The earl of Ormond, who was not far from those quarters, posting thither with some troops, took a few prisoners, who declared they had brought arms for five or six thousand men, who were to join them, in order to drive the English out of the island. The earl not having sufficient forces to besiege the fort, contented himself with investing it, till the lord-deputy, who was on the march, should join him. A little after, the fort was besieged in form, and compelled to surrender the fifth day at discretion. This success was sullied by the cruelty of the English, who, under pretence of the great difficulty of guarding so many prisoners, put the Spaniards to the sword, and hanged all the Irish.

This year was memorable for the return of Francis Drake from his voyage round the world. He had navigated in America, upon the north and south seas, and amassed a prodigious quantity of gold and silver taken from the Spaniards. At his return, which was in November, the queen knighted him, and was pleased to dine in the ship which had made so great a voyage. After that, she ordered it to be drawn up in a little creek near Deptford, and certain inscriptions to be set up in memory of the thing [g].

Bernardine de Mendoza, the Spanish embassador, made great complaints against Drake. He required, that he should be punished for his robberies, and for daring to sail in the seas which were under the dominion of the king of Spain, and all the money, plundered upon the Spaniards, restored. He was told, that the Indian ocean was common to all the nations of Europe; and that the English by no means allowed of the propriety assumed by the king of Spain, nor of the pope's pretended donation, who had no right to dispose of countries and seas which belonged not to him: That Drake should be always ready to answer in law whenever he should be attacked; and to hinder him from converting the gold and silver to his own use, the queen had ordered all the goods he had brought home to be sequestred, with design to satisfy the king of Spain, if he could prove they belonged to him or his subjects, though the charges she had been at in defending Ireland against the attacks of the Spaniards amounted to a much greater sum. The queen however repaid afterwards part of the treasure [h].

Henry Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel, died this year. He was the last of that illustrious family which had flourished in England above three hundred years [i]. One of his daughters married Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, and thence it was that the title of earl of Arundel came to the Howard family.

The religious war was renewed in France in the month of January, and ended in November by a sixth treaty of peace.

This year Philip II. seized the throne of Portugal, vacant by the death of king Henry. Don Antonio, prior of Crato, natural son to Don Lewis, brother of the late king, would have disputed the crown with the king of Spain, but the forces of the two competitors being very unequal, Don Antonio's endeavours were fruitless.

The affairs of Scotland began to give Elizabeth some uneasiness, because she knew king James's two favourites were using their utmost endeavours to turn him against England. The first point of their project was to finish the earl of Morton's ruin, whom they had already destroyed in the king's favour. The second, to engage the king to marry a French princess. The third, to persuade him, after his marriage, to declare the duke of Guise his lieutenant-general. The advices the queen received upon this occasion wanted not proof, since she had long known the design to invade her from Scotland, and since what was contriving at king James's court was very proper to accomplish that project. She saw moreover, that the two favourites, one of whom was wholly devoted to the house of Lorrain, gained more and more the love and confidence of the king, who delighted to load them with favours. Aubigny had been made earl and then duke of Lenox [k], and James Stewart was honoured with the title of earl of Arran. Upon the intelligence she had received, she believed it necessary to begin with opening the young king's eyes in relation to the plots of his favourites, or put him under a necessity to shew that he approved them, which could not but breed great discontent among the people of Scotland. To that purpose, she sent sir Robert Bowes, treasurer of Berwick, into Scotland, to accuse the duke of Lenox, before the king and council, of holding with the court of France, and particularly with the duke of Guise, intelligence destructive of Scotland and England. The council of Scotland, governed by the duke of Lenox, thought not proper to admit the accusation; but the king sent into England the lord Hume, to clear his favourite to the queen, who refused him audience. Nothing could be more grateful to the favourites than the misunderstanding which began to be formed between their master and the queen of England. Not to give him time to cool one day, as the earl of Morton was present in the council, the earl of Arran accused him of being concerned in the late king's murder. Upon which he was immediately arrested, [1581] Elizabeth hearing of the earl of Morton's diſgrace, and finding his attachment to England was the ſole cauſe of it, diſpatched Randolph immediately to ſollicit in his behalf. But the favourites intention being rather to exaſperate than appeaſe, his interceſſion was in vain. Randolph ſeeing the king ſo beſet that it was not poſſible to prevail, demanded an audience of the ſtates, then aſſembled. He repreſented, how neceſſary a good underſtanding with England was to them; what the queen his miſtreſs had done for Scotland ſince the king's birth; how great an affection ſhe had ever expreſſed for him; and with what pains and charge ſhe had always protected his faithful ſubjects: That, notwithſtanding all this, the duke of Lenox was endeavouring to ſow diſcord between the two kingdoms, and had ſo far ſucceeded, that the king now looked upon the queen of England his good kinſwoman as an enemy. The ſtates heard his harangue, and returned a general anſwer, which demonſtrated their being directed by the court. So, finding he could obtain nothing either from the king or the ſtates, he began to practiſe upon the great men, to perſuade them to riſe in arms, whilſt Elizabeth ſhould ſend forces towards the borders[1]. As all this could not be done without the knowledge of the king and his favourites, the goverment of Sterling was taken from the earl of Mar, who was ſuſpected of being too good a friend of the Engliſh, and the king publiſhed an order to all his ſubjects fit to bear arms, to hold themſelves ready to march at a moment's warning. But as Elizabeth meant only to terrify the king of Scotland, and not to wage war with him for the ſake of the earl of Morton, ſhe ordered her troops to retire. Probably Elizabeth's endeavours to ſave the priſoner's life rather haſtened his death, ſince preſently after he was condemned and beheaded. He confeſſed the earl of Bothwell imparted to him his deſign to kill the king, but denied he had any hand in the murder. He ſaid alſo, he had intended to carry the king into England, that being educated among the Engliſh, he might find the leſs difficulty to obtain the crown of that kingdom after the queen's death. Randolph, ſeeing Elizabeth had no deſign to ſupport the great men of Scotland whom he had gained, retired without taking leave.

The earl of Morton being dead, the two favourites became more and more maſters of the king and the government of the kingdom, without regarding the people's murmurs, who could not without indignation ſee themſelves at the mercy of two raw and unexperienced young men. The duke of Lenox had ſome good qualities, but had no knowledge of the affairs of Scotland, and beſides, was a catholic, and deemed the duke of Guiſe's creature. This gave occaſion to fear he had formed projects deſtructive of the religion and liberty of Scotland. The earl of Arran wa an atheiſt, and one of the moſt wicked of men, if Melvil's teſtimony is to be entirely credited. He pretended to be the duke of Lenox's friend, but laboured to ruin him, by giving him counſels capable of making him forfeit the love and eſteem of the nobles and people. On the other hand, he privately hinted to the clergy, that the reformed religion was in great danger, if timely care was not taken to oppoſe the duke of Lenox's deſigns. By theſe ſecret practices he ſo managed, that the duke became odious to the whole kingdom.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the court of France earneſtly preſſed the duke of Anjou's marriage with Elizabeth. At laſt, the queen having agreed with Simié upon the chief articles, Henry III. ſent into England an honourable embaſſy, conſiſting of Francis of Bourbon prince of Dauphiné, Arthur Caſſe marſhal of France, preſident Briſſon, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction. Theſe embaſſadors were received with great pomp and magnificence; and the queen appointed to treat with them the lord Burleigh high-treaſurer; Edward Clinton earl of Lincoln, lord admiral of England; Thomas Ratcliffe earl of Suſſex, Francis Ruſſel earl of Bedford, Robert Dudley earl of Leiceſter, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton, and ſir Francis Walſingham, who was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of ſir Thomas Smith, lately deceaſed. As every thing was almoſt ſettled, the following articles, which were to be digeſted in form of treaty, after being approved by the king of France and the duke his brother, were drawn by conſent:

The marriage ſhall be conſummated within ſix weeks after the ratifying of the treaty.

The duke of Anjou and his domeſtics who are not Engliſh ſhall have the free exerciſe of their religion, in ſome certain place to be appointed within his court.

The duke of Anjou ſhall alter nothing in the religion now received and eſtabliſhed in England.

After the conſummation of the marriage, he ſhall enjoy the title of king of England, but the adminiſtration of affairs ſhall remain in the hands of the queen alone.

Whereas the duke has demanded that he may be crowned king of England preſently after the marriage, and enjoy that honour, in caſe he ſhall come to be guardian of the children he may have by the queen, it is agreed, the queen ſhall lay the affair before the parliament, and promote it as far as lies in her power.

Letters patents, &c. ſhall run in the name of the king and queen, as in the time of Philip and Mary.

The queen ſhall aſſign the duke, by authority of parliament, an honourable penſion, to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſes.

She ſhall procure the parliament to aſſign a yearly penſion in caſe he ſurvives her.

The duke ſhall make the queen a dowry of forty thouſand crowns a year out of the dukedom of Berry, and ſhall pu her in preſent poſſeſſion thereof.

As to their children, the following articles ſhall be ſettled, which ſhall be ratified in the parliaments of England and France, namely,

All the children, as well males as females, ſhall ſucceed to their mother's inheritance, each in his order, according to the cuſtoms of England.

If the crown of France happens to fall to the duke of Anjou, or his heirs, and there be two males, the eldeſt ſhall ſucceed in the kingdom of France, and the ſecond in that of England.

If there be but one ſon, he ſhall enjoy both crowns, but ſhall be obliged to reſide in England eight months in every two years.

If the duke never comes to the crown of France, his children ſhall inherit his appendage.

If he out-live the queen, he ſhall have the guardianſhip of the children; of the males till they are eighteen, and of the females till fifteen.

If the duke die before the time of guardianſhip be expired, it ſhall be left to the diſpoſal of the parliament.

After theſe articles relating to the children, and ſerving to ſettle the ſucceſſion, it was further agreed:

The duke ſhall prefer no foreigner to any poſt or office in England.

He ſhall not carry the queen out of the kingdom, without her own and the expreſs conſent of the peers of the realm.

If ſhe die without iſſue, he ſhall pretend no claim to England.

He ſhall not convey the crown-jewels out of the kingdom.

He ſhall leave all the places in the hands of the Engliſh, and ſhall not remove from thence any warlike ſtores.

There ſhall be a particular treaty of league between France and England, with the proper ratifications.

By a ſeperate article ſigned apart by itſelf, it was agreed, "The queen ſhall not be bound to conſummate the marriage, before ſhe and the duke of Anjou ſhall thoroughly ſatisfy one another in certain points, and ſhall certify the king of France thereof within ſix weeks." It is not known upon what account it was neceſſary to take this precaution.

Ever ſince the laſt year, the ſtates of the Low-Countries had begun to treat with the duke of Anjou, concerning their offer of the ſovereignty of the confederate provinces, and the negotiation was ſo far advanced, that the conditions were now agreed. As ſoon as the prince of Orange was almoſt ſure of the ſucceſs of the affair, he ſo ordered it, that the ſtates declared the king of Spain to have forfeited the ſovereignty of the Netherlands, and the duke was expected every hour to take poſſeſſion of his new dignity, and oppoſe the prince of Parma, who was beſieging Cambray. The duke arrived indeed in Auguſt, with an army of twenty thouſand men, and conſtrained the prince of Parma to raiſe the ſiege, and retire to Valenciennes. He made his entry into Cambray the 18th of Auguſt, and was declared prince thereof, having firſt taken theoath.

In the mean time, Elizabeth ſhewed ſhe had altered her mind with regard to her marriage, or had never ſeriouſly reſolved to conſummate it. She only wanted a pretence to break it off, or at leaſt ro defer it, till time ſhould produce a more favourable opportunity. To that end, ſhe ſent into France James Sommers, clerk of the council, to require that, purſuant to the laſt marriage-article, a league offenſive and defenſive ſhould be inſtantly concluded between France and England. Henry III. anſwered, that in the articles there was no mention of an offenſive, but he was ready to ſign a defenſive league. Sommers replied, the league ſpoken of in the articles muſt be deemed offenſive, ſince there was already a league defenſive concluded in 1572, which not having been violated, wanted no renewal. Upon this, Elizabeth ſent ſecretary Walſingham to Paris, to improve this difficulty, and add ſome others. Walſingham therefore told the king, when the queen his miſtreſs firſt reſolved to marry, it was only to ſatisfy her people, who deſired a certain ſucceſſion by her children, to which end, ſhe had preferred the duke of Anjou before all other princes, on account of his perſonal qualities and royal deſcent: Nevertheleſs, ſhe could not think of conſummating the marriage, till ſhe perceived whether it was pleaſing to her people, for fear ſhe ſhould be accuſed of conſidering of it too late: That ſhe heard with grief, the minds of the beſt men were averſe to the marriage, and for that reaſon ſhe thought it neceſſary to delay it, though ſhe had ſtill the ſame eſteem for the duke of Anjou: That beſides, ſince the concluſion of the articles, things had happened which required her to think more attentively of her engagement: That the duke having accepted the ſovereignty of the Netherlands, had incurred the diſpleaſure of the king his brother, and this new dignity could not but engage England in a war with Spain, ſince it was not poſſible for the duke to be in war, without the queen his ſpouſe being ſo too: That ſhe believed therefore the preſent juncture very unſeaſonable to conſummate the marriage; and that it was proper to defer it till the duke ſhould be diſengaged from his war, and the league offenſive and defenſive between France and England concluded according to agreement. Henry plainly perceiving this was only an evaſion, briefly anſwered, he was ready to renew the league defenſive, and would treat of a league offenſive, as ſoon as the marriage was conſummated.

Theſe things paſſed whilſt the duke of Anjou was in the Netherlands. After he had raiſed the ſiege of Cambray, and taken Cateau in Cambreſis, the ſtates preſſed him to join his forces with their army, to improve ſo fair an opportunity: but the approach of winter furniſhed him with an excuſe to ſend back his troops into France, that he might go and ſollicit his affairs in England himſelf. He arrived there in November, and was received by the queen with ſo great reſpect and civility, that he thought himſelf almoſt ſure of ſucceſs. One day, as the anniverſary of her coronation was celebrating, the queen being in converſation with him, pulled off her ring from her finger and put it on the duke's, which made all preſent imagine ſhe had juſt then given him a promiſe [m].

Mean while, the marriage was exclaimed againſt publicly in the court and city. Walſingham, Leiceſter, Hatton, and others of the queen's confidents, murmured at it more than the reſt. Her maids of honour that were moſt intimate with her, never ceaſed to repreſent to her all the miſchiefs which might from thence befal her, as well as the whole kingdom, and ſtrove by perſuaſions mixt with tears to divert her from this reſolution. I know not whether I am miſtaken in ſuſpecting all this to be a mere farce, acted by the queen's private orders, to give her a pretence to go from her word. Miniſters, courtiers, favourites, are ſeldom ſeen to oppoſe ſo openly and publicly the will of their ſovereign, if they are not certain of approbation. Be this as it will, the queen having ſpent the whole night without taking any reſt, amidſt the ſighs and tears of her ladies, went to the duke's room [n], and talked with him in private. When ſhe withdrew, the duke was ſeen to throw the ring from him, and preſently to take it up again, complaining bitterly of the levity of women, and the inconſtancy of the Engliſh.

Elizabeth's conduct in every thing relating to the marriage was ſo ſingular, that there is no gueſſing her thoughts. If the buſineſs was only a bare negotiation, prolonged and broke off upon the point of concluſion, there would be no cauſe of wonder. Nothing was more agreeable to the queen's character; and I will venture to ſay, to her intereſt. But the ſigning and ſealing of the marriage-articles raiſes a difficulty not eaſy to be removed. It is ſcarce probable this wiſe politician ſhould think of amuſing to ſuch a degree a brother of the king of France, and who might himſelf one day be king, ſince Henry had no children. This is ſo much the harder to be believed, as there was then no viſible neceſſity to carry her diſſimulation ſo far. For my part, I ſee no properer way to explain this extraordinary conduct, than by ſaying, that in the beginning of the negotiation, her deſign was only to amuſe the duke of Anjou [o], that afterwards ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be won, and ſigned the articles with ſincerity, in a reſolution to perform them; but that after ſigning, ſhe repented, and choſe rather to affront the prince than keep her word. Then it was that ſhe carried her diſſimulation to the greateſt height, in expreſſing an extraordinary value for the duke, and labouring withal to put him out of conceit with the marriage. There are two facts very difficult to be reconciled, but upon my ſuppoſition. The firſt is, during the duke's ſtay at court, ſhe cauſed a man's hand to be cut off for writing a ſatire upon their marriage [p]. After that, ſhe publiſhed a manifeſto, to ſatisfy the public that the duke of Anjou had no ill deſign againſt the proteſtant religion, nor had demanded any thing in favour of the catholics. The ſecond fact, very oppoſite to the firſt, is, that ſhe took the opportunity whilſt the duke was with her to put to death Edmund Campian a jeſuit, with three other prieſts [q], convicted of endeavouring to raiſe commotions in the kingdoms, and obſtinately maintaining that the queen was lawfully depoſed. It is eaſy to perceive, if her eſteem and affection for the duke of Anjou had been ſo great as ſhe pretended, ſhe would at leaſt have deferred theſe men's puniſhment till after his departure. But doubtleſs ſhe intended to let him ſee he would not find in his marriage thoſe comforts he thought to have reaſon to expect. Be this as it will, which ever way her proceedings are explained, there is no juſtifying, in my opinion, either her ſigning the articles, or afterwards breaking her word.

Whatever the queen's intention might be in this negotiation, it is certain it was extremely prejudicial to the catholics in England, who entertaining great hopes from the marriage, were too haſty to diſcover them. When it was known in the world that the articles were ſigned, England was ſuddenly over-run with Romiſh prieſts, jeſuits, and other catholics, who hoped to be ſecure under the duke of Anjou's protection. Among theſe, ſome were ſo imprudent as to vent openly the moſt extravagant doctrines concerning the pope's power, a crime then unpardonable, becauſe it tended to deprive the queen of her royalty, and raiſe a rebellion. It is no wonder therefore, that the furious zeal and imprudence of ſome of the catholics drew upon the whole body ſeverities to which the queen would not have been eaſily led, if they had been contented to live in quiet, and exerciſe their religion in private, without attacking the government. What did them ſtill more injury was, that ſome of them owned they were come into England with power to abſolve every man in particular from his oath of allegiance, from which Pius V.'s bull had abſolved the whole nation in general.

This year, Don Antonio, prior of Crato, who pretended to the kingdom of Portugal, and had been crowned at Liſbon, being expelled thence by the arms of the king of Spain, withdrew into France. After which he came to Elizabeth, who took care of him, and put him in hopes of a greater relief.

[1582] The parliament meeting the beginning of the year 1582, whilſt the duke of Anjou was ſtill in England [r], paſſed very ſevere laws againſt the catholics, wherein all thoſe are declared guilty of high-treaſon, "who ſhall endeavour to diſſuade the ſubjects from their allegiance to the queen, and from the religion eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, or ſhall reconcile them to the church of Rome, as alſo thoſe who ſhall be thus reconciled. Thoſe alſo who are fined in two hundred marks and impriſonment for a year, who ſhall ſay maſs; and they who ſhall be knowingly preſent at maſs, are fined in a hundred marks, with impriſoment alſo for a year. Moreover they who abſented themſelves from their pariſh-churches, on the days appointed for divine ſervice, are fined in twenty pounds a month." It muſt be obſerved, that hitherto only one ſhilling to the uſe of the poor had been

[o] Strada, and ſome other hiſtorians ſay, that queen Elizabeth ſet this treaty of marriage on foot, only to break off the deſign of a match between the duke of Anjou and a daughter of the king of Spain, which had been ſome time in agitation. And this is very probable, conſidering how afraid queen Elizabeth was of an union between the crowns of France and Spain. Dec. 2. l. 4.

[p] John Stubbs, of Lincoln's-inn, publiſhed a book againſt the marriage, entitled, "The Diſcovery of a Gaping Gulph, wherein England is like to be ſwallowed by another French Marriage, if the Lord forbid not the Banns, by letting her ſee the Sin and Puniſhment thereof." Upon which he, and William Page who diſperſed the copies, were taken up and condemned to loſe their right hands. Which was done accordingly (by virtue of an act of Philip and Mary againſt ſeditious writings) by driving a cleaver through the wriſt with a mallet, upon a ſcaffold at Weſtminſter. I remember, ſays Camden, being preſent, that Stubbs, after his right hand was cut off, pulled off his hat with his left, and ſaid, with a loud voice, "God ſave the Queen." But the multitude ſtood ſilent, either out of horror of the puniſhment, or pity to the man, or their hatred of the match. Camden, p. 487. exacted for abſence on Sundays and holidays. This ſhews, that before, the laws againſt the catholics were not very ſevere; neither were they, it is certain, executed with rigour. But the indiſcreet zeal of thoſe who would not be ſatisfied with this advantage, was the occaſion that all the catholics were deprived of it.

The duke of Anjou, and thoſe who had attended him into England, could plainly perceive under what conſtraint they ſhould live, if the marriage was conſummated. In all appearance, the proceedings of the queen and the parliament againſt the catholics, did not a little contribute to comfort him, and perhaps put him out of conceit with a country ſo oppoſite to France. Nay, it is very likely, all this was done before his eyes with that view. He departed in February, having received from the queen many tokens of eſteem and affection; the moſt ſubſtantial whereof was a good ſum of money [s] to aſſiſt him in maintaining the war in the Netherlands. The queen having accompanied him to Canterbury, ordered ſeveral Engliſh lords [t] to wait upon him as far as Antwerp, were preſently after he received the ducal crown of Brabant. By all theſe marks of eſteem and friendſhip, and by all her civilities, the queen had a mind to repair in ſome meaſure the mortifications ſhe made him undergo during his ſtay in England. It is very probable this ſtay was not to his advantage, and ſerved only to diſcover the meanneſs of his genius and other qualities.

Elizabeth was too wiſe not to perceive that her conduct in the negotiation of her marriage could not but diſoblige the king of France. So ſhe plainly ſaw that though there had been no other reaſon but this alone, ſhe could not much rely on his friendſhip. On the other hand, ſhe was not ignorant how angry the king of Spain was, for that whole bodies of Engliſh troops ſerved in the army of the ſtates of the Low-Countries, under the command of Norris. Though theſe men were called volunteers, that is, owned by none, and who ſerved at their own charge, it was eaſy to judge that they were not there in ſuch numbers, without the tacit or expreſs conſent of their queen. Beſides, it was hardly poſſible for Elizabeth to conceal the ſupplies of money ſhe had given prince Caſimir and the duke of Anjou, for the maintenance of their armies. Philip II. was the moſt potent prince in Europe, and the conqueſt of Portugal had lately rendered him ſtill more formidable, particularly to the Engliſh. He was ſupported by the pope, and had but too much influence in the king of France's council. But Elizabeth had no friend on whom ſhe could depend. The duke of Guiſe was now labouring to take from her the king of Scotland. The Iriſh wanted only a favourable opportunity to revolt, and the Engliſh catholics were inceſſantly excited to rebellion by the pope's emiſſaries. To theſe may be added a great number of proteſtants, the queen of Scots adherents, who only waited an occaſion to ſhew their affection for her. Elizabeth's miniſters could not without dread think of all theſe things. They were in continual apprehenſion that ſome terrible ſtorm was going to fall upon England. To this fear were owing, firſt, the league defenſive with France, and then, the project of the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou; the miniſters judging it almoſt impoſſible for her to ſupport herſelf without ſome powerful alliance.

Mean while, whether Elizabeth thought herſelf able to prevent or repel the danger, ſhe took but few precautions, relying wholly on the affection of her people. This was her beſt, or rather her only refuge. And therefore to endeavour to corrupt, and cauſe them to loſe the love and eſteem they had for her, was wounding her in a very ſenſible part. To this muſt be aſcribed her tender expreſſions whenever ſhe ſpoke to her people. It muſt however be confeſſed, that ſhe won her people's love, not only by words and other external demonſtrations, but chiefly by very ſubſtantial deeds. Let a man peruſe the whole Hiſtory of England, and he will find no reign wherein juſtice was adminiſtered ſo impartially, or the ſubject enjoyed their privileges more peaceably, or were freer from wars abroad and at home, or from extraordinary taxes and impoſitions; in a word, wherein the kingdom was more flouriſhing. The queen ſpent no unneceſſary money, and her treaſury being regularly managed, the people had no occaſion to complain, ſince whatever they gave was employed for their own good.

But it was not only at home that the queen laboured to make her people happy, her care reached alſo abroad. This year ſhe ſent an embaſſador [u] to Frederick II. king of Denmark, under colour of carrying him the Order of the Garter. But the chief motive of the embaſſy was to induce that prince to deſiſt from certain cuſtoms paid by the Engliſh merchant-ſhips in paſſing the Sound, in which however it was not poſſible to ſucceed. Frederick gratefully received the Collar of the Order, but refuſed to take the uſual oath, becauſe he had denied the ſame thing before, when admitted into the order of St. Michael by the French king.

Though Henry III. had no reaſon to be pleaſed with Elizabeth, he gave her notice, however, that the duke of Guiſe was plotting ſomething in favour of the queen of Scots, and was to embark in Normandy ſome troops deſigned either for England or Scotland, though he pretended to ſend them into Flanders. For this reaſon ſhe recalled ſir Walter Mildmay, who had been ſent to treat with the queen of Scots, or at leaſt to pretend to do ſo.

As there was no likelihood the duke of Guiſe would invade England directly, but on the contrary every thing looked as if he intended to execute ſome project in Scotland, the queen turned her thoughts wholly to her affairs of that kingdom. They were then in a violent convulſion. Some perſons of great diſtinction, among whom were the earls of Mar, Lindſay, Goury, full of indignation to ſee the realm governed by a young prince of fifteen years and two raſh inexperienced miniſters, who had nothing leſs in view than the kingdom's welfare, conſpired together to ſeize the king's perſon and remove his two favourites. To that end, taking their opportunity whilſt they were both abſent from court, and the king intent upon hunting near Athol, they ſent and invited him by the earl of Goury to paſs a few days at his houſe at Huntingtoun, and when he came there ſecured his perſon [w]. This was called the Ruthven-conſpiracy, becauſe Ruthven was the name of the earl of Goury's family [x]. For the ſame reaſon the conſpirators were called the lords of Ruthven. The earl of Arran, one of the king's favourites, drew together ſome people, and attempted to free his maſter, but was repulſed and forced to retreat to Ruthven-caſtle, where the earl of Goury received him and ſaved his life, but kept him priſoner. The duke of Lenox hearing what had paſſed, ſpeedily retired to Dunbarton, of which he was governor, and the king was carried to Sterling, free in appearance, but priſoner in reality.

Upon this news, Elizabeth, who probably was not ignorant of the conſpirators deſign, ordered Henry Carey to go immediately and offer her ſervice to the king of Scotland. But James, terrified by thoſe who had him in their power, anſwered, that every thing was done with his conſent, and he was very well pleaſed with the lords who were about him. Melvil affirms, however, that the king found means to tell Carey in private the contrary to what he had ſaid in public. The king of France ſent likewiſe La Mothe Fenelon into Scotland [y] to try to ſupport the favourites, knowing thoſe who had ſeized the king were all friends to England. La Mothe had alſo orders to inform the king, that the queen his mother, who had hitherto refuſed to own him for king, agreed to make him partner in the royalty.

Shortly after, queen Mary wrote to Elizabeth, to try to engage her in the deliverance of the king her ſon. But ſhe took a very improper way to obtain this favour, ſince her letter is full of reproaches for the barbarous uſage ſhe meth with [z].

This year pope Gregory XIII. publiſhed his bull for reforming the calendar, and ordered ten days of this very year to be cut off at once. As England and the reſt of the proteſtant ſtates refuſed to comply with this ordinance, becauſe it flowed from the papal authority, there began from that time to be a difference of ten days in the dates, the one reckoning it the firſt day of the month, when it was the tenth with the others. This difference ſtill ſubſiſts in ſome places, and particularly in England and Swedeland, where the old way of reckoning is ſtill uſed, with the addition however of the new[a].

Camden pretends that Elizabeth was very much moved with Mary's letter, and that compaſſion for the afflicted queen made her adviſe with her council upon what terms ſhe could be releaſed. We ſhall ſee preſently that this proceeding was far from demonſtrating a deſire to ſet her at liberty. It is much more likely, ſhe ſought only to amuſe her, and by putting her in hopes of deliverance had no other view than to put a ſtop to the continual plots which were contriving in her favour, and free herſelf from the ſollicitations ſhe was perpetually troubled with. However this be, ſome time after the receipt of her letter, ſhe ſent to her Robert Beal [b], one of the clerks of the council, with certain articles founded upon Mary's offer of aſſociating her ſon in the government. Conſequently they ſuppoſed a previous agreement betwixt them; but never had there been a more improper juncture to negotiate this agreement, ſince king James was captive in the hands of queen Elizabeth's adherents. Here follow the articles, with ſome remarks, which will ſerve to ſhew Elizabeth's aim in feigning a deſire to releaſe her priſoner.

I. "The queen of Scots and the king her ſon ſhould promiſe to attempt nothing prejudicial to England."

It is eaſy to perceive that this article is expreſſed in ſuch general terms as required a large explanation.

II. "She ſhould diſclaim as unjuſt whatever was done by Francis II. her firſt huſband, and ratify the treaty of Edinburgh."

The former part of this article was very general, and liable to many cavils. As to the latter part, it muſt be obſerved, that Mary could not ratify the treaty of Edinburgh but with the reſtriction ſhe had offered. So, in propoſing to her the ratifying of that treaty ſimply and abſolutely, a ſnare was laid for her, or elſe ſhe was put under a neceſſity of rejecting the article.

III. "She ſhould diſcover and condemn all the conſpiracies againſt queen Elizabeth that were come to her knowledge."

This was accuſing her of being concerned in theſe conſpiracies, and making her own it, which was a very hard meaſure for Mary. She could have done no more, had ſhe been fully convinced of Elizabeth's ſincerity, which is not very likely.

IV. "She ſhould contrive nothing againſt the government of England, eccleſiaſtical or civil."

Mary was a catholic, and the laws of England excluded the catholics from all poſts. So if ſhe agreed to this article without farther explanation, it might have been inferred, that ſhe excluded herſelf from ſucceeding Elizabeth.

V. "She ſhould claim no right to the crown of England during queen Elizabeth's life, and after Elizabeth's death ſhould refer her title to the judgment of the parliament."

This was alſo laying a ſnare for Mary, in making her own that her title was dubious, though ſhe did maintain, and had always maintained, that it was inconteſtible.

VI. "She ſhould ſwear to theſe articles, to the end there might be no room for the objection taken from her not being at liberty."

VII. "The king her ſon ſhould ratify them by oath and writing."

To enable the king of Scotland to ratify theſe articles, it was neceſſary firſt that he ſhould agree in an authentic manner that he was king only as aſſociated by the queen his mother, which was not then in his power, ſince he was in the hands of the lords of Ruthven, who by no means acknowledged Mary's authority.

VIII. "For the performance of this article, the queen of Scots ſhould give hoſtages to the queen of England."

This article was alſo liable to many difficulties, concerning the number and quality of the hoſtages.

It is therefore evident Elizabeth propoſed theſe articles to Mary only to amuſe her and the world, at a time when it was not poſſible even to enter into a treaty upon this ſubject; beſides their being almoſt all enſnaring and liable to diſcuſſions, which the court of England might have prolonged as they pleaſed. Camden ſays, the Scots of the Engliſh party were utterly againſt the agreement, affirming it was owing to the intrigues of the French court. It is true, if the conditions propoſed had been advantageous to Mary, it is not unlikely Elizabeth would have ſet the Scots to oppoſe the concluſion of the treaty. But there was no occaſion for this, ſince ſhe had taken ſufficient care to hinder Mary, from accepting them.

I muſt now proceed to relate what paſſed in Scotland this year. If a man is confined to what Camden ſays, his idea of things will be very imperfect. This is one of thoſe paſſages wherein that hiſtorian has thought fit to be very ſhort for fear of injuring king James's reputation, for whoſe ſake he wrote the Annals of queen Elizabeth. But by good fortune, we have Melvil's Memoirs, which give us a fuller information.

The duke of Lenox ſeeing the king in the hands of the lords of Ruthven, and the little probability of forming a party ſtrong enough to free him, withdrew into France, where he died ſoon after.

Mean while, the lords of Ruthven, whoſe ſole aim had been to remove from the king his two favourites, finding that one was in priſon and the other in France, thought proper to convene the ſtates, where the king was preſent. He declared, whatever they had done was with his conſent and to his ſatisfaction. He wrote the ſame thing to the general aſſembly of the kirk; whereupon the ſtates and the kirk approved by authentic acts all that was paſſed. This done, the king was no longer watched, but left entirely at liberty.

Shortly after, the king aſſembled the nobility in the city of St. Andrew's, before whom he declared, that though he had been detained againſt his will, he owned however it was done for his ſervice: that he did not intend to call any perſon to an account, but would ſpeedily publiſh an act of oblivion. To ſhew that he forgot all that was paſt, he viſited the earl of Goury, who caſting himſelf at his feet, begged pardon, which he very readily obtained.

All being thus quiet, the king appointed twelve counſellors to aſſiſt him to govern the ſtate. But ſhortly after, his affection for the earl of Arran reviving, he wiſhed to ſee him; and as all his counſellors were unanimouſly againſt it, he proteſted he would ſend him away again within four and twenty hours, but was not as good as his word, for he kept him for ever. In a ſhort ſpace, the favourite had ſuch an influence over him, that he would not ſuffer any but him to meddle in the public affairs. Whereupon the council of twelve being no longer conſulted, broke up of themſelves. As ſoon as the earl of Arran ſaw himſelf fully reſtored, he ſuggeſted to the king, that he had made a falſe ſtep in not puniſhing the inſolence of the lords of Ruthven, and perſuaded him at length to alter his reſolution [c]. So, inſtead of an act of oblivion, he iſſued out a proclamation, commanding the accomplices of the Ruthven conſpiracy to come and beg pardon for their crime. Every one plainly ſaw the difference between the proclamation and the promiſed act of oblivion. The king being free, had declared that they who had detained him intended him no ill, and for that reaſon he had promiſed them a pardon. But by the proclamation he conſidered them as guilty, and obliged them to ſubmit to his mercy, at a time when he ſuffered himſelf to be governed by one of thoſe very favourites againſt whom they had conſpired. This was ſufficient to induce the lords to retire, ſome to their own homes, and others into England, to wait for another opportunity to ruin their enemy [d].

[1583] Elizabeth being informed of the king of Scotland's proceedings, and the danger of the earl of Arran's entirely ruining the Engliſh party, wrote to the king, repreſenting the conſequences, and mixed in her letter ſome reproaches for breach of promiſe. She told him moreover, ſhe intended to ſend ſecretary Walſingham to talk with him from her. James returned a ſtout anſwer, and vindicated himſelf for not performing his promiſe, ſince it was extorted from him when a captive. This excuſe might have ſerved with reſpect to what

[a] Three hundred and ſixty-five days ſix hours, exceeding a year by about eleven minutes, a day is gained in about a hundred and thirty-two years, by which means, from the year 325, wherein the council of Nice was held, to the year 1582, ten whole days were gained. Whereupon, to ſet matters right again, pope Gregory ordered the 5th of October, 1582, to be called the 15th, and to prevent the like error again, he decreed, that three days ſhould be taken out of every four hundred years (which comes to almoſt the ſame as taking out one day every hundred and thirty-two years), and this was done by making every hundredth year common, which, according to the Julian account, is always leap-year, but every four hundredth year to continue leap-year. Though this be the trueſt and moſt exact way of reckoning, yet ſuch was the perverſeneſs of the Engliſh, that they ſtill kept to the old way, till the year 1752, when the calendar was reformed by act of parliament. The Swedes and Ruſſians ſtill kept to the old ſtile. And hence comes what we call old and new ſtiles, which differ now by eleven days, and are thus written 1-12th of July 1733.

[c] Arran inſinuated to the king, that it would be a troubleſome buſineſs to be incumbered with ſo many contrary opinions. He deſired him to recreate himſelf with hunting and hawking, and he would attend the council, and report to his majeſty all their opinions and concluſions. This he did two or three times; but at length he gave account of no man's advice but his own, and made the king believe, it was all their opinions that it was his intereſt to follow a violent courſe. he ſaid to the ſtates; but it was inſufficient, ſince he repeated the ſame thing to the nobility when at full liberty. However, he promiſed the queen to proceed no farther till Walſingham's arrival. In the mean time, the favourite made the earl of Goury undergo ſo many mortifications, that he forced him at length to quit the court. Walſingham being arrived, imparted to the king, in two private audiences, the queen's advice concerning the management of his affairs. But as this advice tended to the earl of Arran's ruin, the embaſſador brought back no very ſatisfactory anſwer[e].

The beginning of the year, the duke of Anjou, being too much confined by the terms laid upon him by the ſtates, attempted to ſeize on the ſame day Antwerp, and ſeven or eight other towns of the Netherlands. But miſſing his aim, he was forced to retire to Dunkirk, and from thence into France. Mean while, the affairs of the ſtates were in a melancholy ſituation. The prince of Parma made great progreſs this year, and very likely would have ſucceeded at length, in obliging all the united Provinces to return to the obedience of the king of Spain.

Henry III. behaved in France after ſo ſtrange a manner, that he daily incurred the contempt of his ſubjects. In public he affected an over-ſtrained devotion, whilſt in private he plunged himſelf into the moſt criminal pleaſures. Philip II. taking advantage of Henry's indolence with regard to his moſt important affairs, ſtrove by all ſorts of ways to raiſe him troubles, which ſhould hinder him from undertaking the defence of the Netherlands, who ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to put themſelves under the dominion of France. He tried firſt to perſuade the king of Navarre to take up arms, promiſing to aid and protect the Hugonots. This way failing, he applied to the duke of Guiſe, who accepted the ſuccours offered by Philip to revenge the mortifications he daily received from the king's minions [f].

[1584] Whether queen Elizabeth's advice to the king of Scotland had a good effect upon him, or Melvil's remonſtrances, as he hints himſelf in his Memoirs, made ſome impreſſion on his mind, he ſeemed reſolved to put a ſtop to the proſecution of the lords of Ruthven. To that purpoſe, he aſſembled the nobility at Edinburgh, to end the affair with the advice of the great men as he had at firſt projected, by publiſhing an act of oblivion. But the earl of Arran, a bold and daring man, defeated this project in ſpite of the king himſelf. When the great men were come to Edinburgh, he went and talked with every one apart, intimating, that the king's intention was only to get his conduct approved with regard to the lords of Ruthven, after which he would pardon them, when they had acknowledged they owed that favour to his clemency. The great men ſeeing the point was only to ſave the king's honour, and thinking the fugitives would receive no prejudice, promiſed the favourite to do as the king deſired. So, when the king aſked their advice in the affair, they anſwered, it was their opinion he acted with great clemency in opening the fugitives a way to obtain their pardon. This done, the earl of Arran told him, if, after this declaration, he publiſhed an act of oblivion without the fugitives owning themſelves guilty, he would diſoblige the nobility by neglecting their advice, and extremely injure his own dignity. Thus the fugitives obtained no advantage, though the aſſembly was convened purely for their ſake.

The declaration of the nobility drove the lords of Ruthven to deſpair. They were required to aſk pardon for a thing which the king had approved, as done for his ſervice. Nay, they could not be ſure of their pardon, ſince, as the king had once departed from his word, they could not truſt him any more. The earl of Arran having obtained his deſire, grew more proud and inſolent, and ſo perſecuted all his enemies, that he forced them at length to form a new conſpiracy againſt him [g]. Though the earl of Goury had ſaved his life, and procured him the king's pardon, he never ceaſed to moleſt him, till he had forced him to aſk leave to go out of the kingdom. He was now at Dundee, in order to retire into England, when he heard that the earls of Mar, Angus, and Glames, who were fled into Ireland, had ſome enterpriſe in hand againſt the favourite. This news made him ſtay in Scotland, and at laſt he entered into the conſpiracy himſelf, without ſtirring however from Dundee. The conſpirators had ſo well laid their meaſures, that arriving unexpectedly in Scotland, they immediately took Sterling.

Mean while, the court having before received ſome confuſed intelligence of the conſpiracy, and knowing the earl of Goury was concerned, ordered him to be arreſted, which was done, juſt as the conſpirators became maſters of Sterling. This arreſt quite diſheartened them. As he was a near relation of the king, they fancied he had deſignedly ſuffered himſelf to be taken; and believing they were betrayed, abandoned their enterpriſe, and fled out of the kingdom. It coſt the earl his life, who being brought to Edinburgh was there beheaded [h]. Thus the earl of Arran ſtill kept his poſt in ſpite of his enemies. He was extremely odious to the whole kingdom, becauſe he was a wicked atheiſtical man, and of an inſatiable avarice. There was alſo another thing which very much troubled the Scots. And that was, the king for ſome time had held private intelligence with the queen his mother, which bred a fear that he would engage in deſigns deſtructive of the ſtate and religion. He had privately accepted of the aſſociation ſhe had offered him, and it was ſeen that none but the queen's known friends had acceſs to him. Nay, it was whiſpered, he intended to turn catholic, and began to liſten to the propoſals of the French court, or rather of the duke of Guiſe.

All theſe things were but too apt to give Elizabeth great uneaſineſs. She was afraid the king of Scotland would be perſuaded to take a French wife, and ſuch a marriage produce ill effects for England. To try therefore to prevent the miſchiefs which might happen from that quarter, ſhe ſent Daviſon into Scotland, under colour of excuſing her protection of the Scotch fugitives, though the king had demanded them by virtue of the treaty of alliance concluded between the two kingdoms. But Daviſon's chief buſineſs was to endeavour to win the earl of Arran to the queen's intereſt. This method was better and ſpeedier than to ſupport the malcontents of Scotland, who were always to be ſupplied with money, without being certain of the ſucceſs of their undertakings. Beſides, the queen ran the hazard of entirely loſing king James. That prince had ſenſe, but as he was young, unexperienced, and too much governed by his favourites, it was to be feared he would be drawn into projects detrimental to both kingdoms for the ſake of others. Daviſon ſucceeded entirely in his negotiation with reſpect to the earl of Arran, and by means that are eaſy to be gueſſed, prevailed with him to be guided by the queen. Before his return to England, it was agreed between the two courts, that the earl of Hunſdon for England, and the earl of Arran for Scotland, ſhould meet upon the borders, and make a regulation proper to preſerve a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms. Under this pretence, theſe two lords conferred together, and before they parted, made a private treaty, whereby the earl of Arran engaged to keep the king unmarried for three years. Elizabeth pretended, ſhe deſigned to give him a princeſs of the blood-royal of England, who was not yet marriageable. This was at leaſt the pretence with which the treaty was coloured.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the maſter of Gray, a young Scotch lord, inſinuated himſelf ſo far into king James's favour, that the earl of Arran growing jealous, found means to remove him, by cauſing him to be ſent embaſſador to Elizabeth. Gray was no ſooner in England, but the queen won him by her careſſes and bounties. From that time the embaſſador feigned to be ſtrongly attached to queen Mary's intereſt, and by that means drew ſecrets from her, which Elizabeth knew how to improve. The earl of Arran having ſome intelligence of the intrigue, informed the king of it, in order to ruin his rival; but as in all likelihood he could bring no proof of what he advanced, Gray being returned to Scotland, was very well received by the king, and ſpared no pains in his turn to ruin the favourite.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Scotland, plots were forming in England in favour of the captive queen. But ſome intercepted letters to queen Mary from Francis Throckmorton [i] beginning to diſcover the conſpiracy, Throckmorton was arreſted. Immediately Thomas lord Paget and Charles Arundel fled into France, and gave out that the catholics were ſo cruelly perſecuted in England, that it was not poſſible for them to ſtay there without danger of their lives: That the court had ſpies every where, not only to watch the catholics, but alſo to lay ſnares for them: That forged letters from the queen of Scots were left in their houſes, to force them either to bring them to the ſecretary of ſtate, or render themſelves guilty by concealing them. There is no doubt, the queen had ſpies to watch the motions of the catholics, having but too much reaſon to ſuſpect their fidelity [k]. Nay, it is very poſſible that among theſe ſpies there were ſome who, to improve their ſervices, laid ſnares for the catholics. Thoſe who take upon them ſuch an office, of what religion ſoever they be, are not uſually the moſt honeſt men. But the behaviour of the catholics had made theſe precautions neceſſary, the knowledge of what paſſed among them being of the utmoſt conſequence to the queen. Several books, as well printed as in manuſcript, were handed about, wherein the queen was ſlandered to the higheſt degree. She was taxed with putting to death many catholics without cauſe, having firſt racked them, to compel them to confeſs crimes of which they were innocent. Her maids of honour were exhorted to ſerve her in the ſame manner as Judith did Holofernes, and render themſelves, by ſuch an action, worthy of the applauſe of the church throughout all future ages [l]. Theſe books, with what had been diſcovered after Throckmorton's arreſt, made it thought ſome plot was ready to break out.

Mean while the queen, willing to ſhew it was not for their religion that ſome catholics had been puniſhed, ſent for the judges of the realm, and ſharply reproved them, for having been too ſevere in the tortures they had made theſe men ſuffer. Probably, this was done to afford them an opportunity to clear themſelves from this charge, by an apology which was made public. They affirmed, "That no perſon had been made to ſuffer for his religion, but only for dangerous practices againſt the queen and ſtate; that indeed Campian, the jeſuit, had been put to the rack, but with ſo little violence, that he was preſently able to walk and ſubſcribe his confeſſion: That Brian, one of his accomplices, obſtinately refuſing to ſpeak or write the perſon's name who penned the papers found about him, was indeed denied food, till he aſked it in writing." However, the queen, willing to take from her enemies all occaſion of ſlandering her in foreign parts, forbid the putting of any perſon whatever to the rack, and was ſatisfied with tranſporting out of England ſeventy prieſts who were in priſon, and of whom ſome were under ſentence of death. Among theſe were certain jeſuits [m], who afterwards proved very ungrateful for this favour. Perhaps indeed ſhe acted, upon this occaſion, not ſo much from a motive of clemency, as to ſeparate two things which were always endeavoured to be confounded, namely, religion and the crimes againſt the ſtate, under pretence that moſt of the conſpirators were catholics.

Before Throckmorton was apprehended, he ſent a cabinet full of papers to Mendoza the Spaniſh embaſſador, of which the court had notice [n]. He denied all at his firſt examination: but at the ſecond, confeſſed, "that going ſome few years ſince to the Spa, he conferred ſeveral times with Jeney and ſir Francis Inglefield, two Engliſh fugitives, how England might be invaded [o]: That after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him, the catholic princes had formed a deſign to free the queen of Scots, and to employ the duke of Guiſe for that purpoſe: That nothing was wanting, but to know what ſuccours might be depended upon from the Engliſh catholics: That in order to take their meaſures the better, Charles Paget, under the counterfeit name of Mope, was ſent into the county of Suſſex, where the duke of Guiſe intended to land: That he (Throckmorton) imparted the project to the Spaniſh embaſſador, who had been already informed of it, and ſhewed him the ports where it would be moſt proper to land: That he moreover acquainted the ſame embaſſador with the names of the great men to whom he might freely open his mind, becauſe, as he was a public perſon, he would not be ſo narrowly watched. Finally, that he conferred with him how to raiſe ſoldiers privately in England, to have them ready when the foreign troops ſhould arrive."

Upon theſe depoſitions, the Spaniſh embaſſador was deſired to come to the council, where he was told what Throckmorton had witneſſed againſt him. As he did not think himſelf, doubtleſs, innocent enough to clear himſelf from theſe accuſations, he choſe by way of recrimination to charge the queen with detaining the Spaniſh money ſhe had ſeized, and with aſſiſting the duke of Anjou. Then he ſpoke againſt the miniſters, ſaying, that by their ill counſels they inceſſantly laboured to ſow diſcord between the queen and the king of Spain. A few days after, the queen commanded him to depart the kingdom, which he readily obeyed, thinking himſelf very happy in coming off at ſo eaſy a rate. However, when he came into France, he loudly complained, as if in England the law of nations had been violated in his perſon. Mean while, the queen diſpatched Wade [p] to Spain, to inform the king of what had paſſed, and to tell him ſhe was ready to receive another embaſſador from him. But Philip would not give Wade audience, who refuſed alſo in his turn to impart the contents of his embaſſy to the prime miniſter.

When Throckmorton was brought upon his trial, he denied what he had confeſſed at his examination, affirming, he had invented it on purpoſe to avoid the rack. But after his condemnation, upon the evidence of his own letters to the queen of Scots, and the papers found in his coffers, he owned all, and even made a more circumſtantial declaration than at firſt. And yet when he came to the gallows, he denied again whatever he had confeſſed.

Elizabeth, as ſhe could not doubt her enemies were perpetually contriving to deprive her of the crown, and ſet it on the head of the queen of Scots, lived in a conſtant uneaſineſs, and under the apprehenſion that ſome one of their plots would at laſt ſucceed. So, to diſcover more fully the deſigns of her enemies, ſhe ſeemed willing to reſume the negotiation begun with the queen of Scots. To that end ſhe ſent Wade, at his return from Spain, to tell her ſhe was ready to renew the treaty which had been interrupted, and would diſpatch to her very ſoon ſir Walter Mildmay for that purpoſe. But withal, ſhe let her know ſhe inſiſted upon two conditions, namely, that ſhe ſhould prevail with the king her ſon to grant the pardon promiſed to the lords of Ruthven, and to put a ſtop to the plots of the biſhop of Glaſgow her embaſſador in France.

At this time happened the ſurpriſe of Sterling, the impriſonment of the earl of Goury, and the flight of the conſpirators into England. Whereupon Elizabeth ſent Beal to deſire the queen of Scots to intercede with the king her ſon for the fugitives, and inform her of the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, as ſhe had promiſed Wade. Mary anſwered, ſhe had promiſed nothing, but on condition ſhe ſhould be releaſed: That ſhe would readily intercede for the Scotch fugitives, provided any advantage would accrue from thence to herſelf or the king her ſon, and in caſe they would confeſs their fault. She did not deny, ſhe had deſired the duke of Guiſe to uſe his endeavours to free her; but ſaid ſhe knew nothing of his deſigns, nor, if ſhe did, would ſhe diſcover them, unleſs ſhe was aſſured of her freedom. She beſought Elizabeth to uſe her with more humanity, and deſired the treaty might be concluded with her before the Scots were treated with. Laſtly, ſhe added, that as the king of France had owned and received her embaſſador jointly with her ſon's, as princes aſſociated, Elizabeth would be pleaſed to cauſe this aſſociation to be publiſhed in Scotland.

Elizabeth took care not to ſerve her in what ſhe deſired, her aim being only to draw from her a ſollicitation in behalf of the Scotch fugitives, and an information concerning the duke of Guiſe's deſign, upon the uncertain hope of an agreement which ſhe flattered her with. But finding ſhe could get nothing out of her, ſhe relinquiſhed the negotiation as needleſs. However, perceiving by Mary's anſwer, that the king of Scotland had accepted the aſſociation, ſhe was afraid ſome dangerous plot was contriving in Scotland. It was this chiefly that made her reſolve to gain the earl of Arran at any rate, wherein ſhe ſucceeded, as I ſaid before.

Shortly after, Elizabeth alſo diſcovered that her enemies did not ceaſe their ſecret practices. Creichton, a Scotch jeſuit, going by ſea into Scotland, and his ſhip being attacked by pirates, tore ſome papers he had about him, and threw them into the ſea. But by a very extraordinary accident, the wind hindered the torn papers from falling into the water, and blew them back into the ſhip, where ſomebody took the pains to gather them up. Theſe papers being delivered to Wade, he paſted them together upon an another paper with great labour and patience, and by that means a plot was diſcovered, framed by the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Guiſe, to invade England. Whereupon, by the earl of Leiceſter's means, a general aſſociation of men of all degrees and conditions was formed in England, who bound themſelves by oath to proſecute to death thoſe that ſhould attempt any thing againſt the queen.

The queen of Scots eaſily perceived that the plots of her friends were diſcovered, ſince the aſſociation was a clear evidence that Elizabeth thought herſelf in danger. As ſhe was afraid ſhe could not avoid the efforts of this aſſociation, in caſe it came to be known that ſhe was concerned in theſe plots, ſhe uſed freſh endeavours to free herſelf from captivity. To that purpoſe ſhe ſent Naue her ſecretary to Elizabeth with theſe propoſals:

That if ſhe might be releaſed, ſhe offered to enter into a cloſer amity with the queen of England: To renounce the title of queen of England, and never lay claim to the crown of that kingdom ſo long as Elizabeth was alive: To ſign the aſſociation: To make a league defenſive with England (ſo far as might ſtand with the alliance between France and Scotland), provided that nothing was done in England to her diſadvantage, before ſhe herſelf or the king her ſon was heard in the parliament: To ſtay in England till hoſtages were given: To make no change in the religion eſtabliſhed in Scotland, provided ſhe might have the free exerciſe of her own. To bury in oblivion all injuries done to her in Scotland, on condition that whatever had been enacted to her diſgrace ſhould be repealed: To recommend to her ſon ſuch counſellors as were inclined to preſerve a good underſtanding with England: To procure a pardon for the fugitives, provided they would own themſelves guilty: To treat of no match for the king her ſon without Elizabeth's knowledge. She required on her part, that the treaty ſhould be made with her and the king her ſon jointly, and promiſed to have it ratified by the duke of Guiſe. Moreover, ſhe deſired matters might be ſpeedily concluded, for fear ſome accident ſhould obſtruct the treaty. Laſtly, ſhe prayed Elizabeth to give her ſome token of her eſteem, by granting her a little more liberty.

Had Mary made theſe offers at any other time, perhaps Elizabeth would have regarded them. But in the preſent juncture, they only ſerved to increaſe her ſuſpicions, ſince it was evident they were an effect of the fear inſtilled into the priſoner, by the aſſociation and the diſcovery of the plots. Camden pretends, contrary to all appearance, that Elizabeth being ſatisfied with theſe propoſals, was going to ſet Mary at liberty, had ſhe not been hindered by the clamours of the Scots. Hence he takes occaſion to make a long invective againſt the preſbyterians and their preachers, and to accuſe them of inſolence, contempt of the king's perſon, and rebellion againſt the laws. Here alſo he ſpeaks of the ſuppreſſion of Buchanan's writings, which was foreign to the purpoſe. In a word, he would have preſbytery to be conſidered as the ſole cauſe of the obſtacles to Mary's deliverance, in ſpite of Elizabeth's good intentions towards her. This is no wonder, for it was the modiſh ſtile in England in the reign of James I. to whom court was made by inveighing againſt the puritans. I own however, it is not wholly improbable, that on this occaſion Elizabeth even ſet the Scots upon forming the obſtacles mentioned by Camden. But it is very unlikely, that at a time when ſhe ſaw her enemies in league againſt her to place Mary, though a priſoner, on the throne of England, ſhe ſhould really intend to releaſe her, and ſo enable her the better to execute her deſigns. To take Elizabeth's diſſimulation for her real intention, was an artifice of Camden, thereby to inſinuate, ſhe thought Mary innocent of the plots which were continually framing. But he contradicts himſelf, by ſaying a little after, that Mary loſing all hopes of agreement, hearkened at length to dangerous counſels, and wrote to the pope and the king of Spain, ſolliciting them "to haſten what they had in hand with all ſpeed, let what would happen to her." It is therefore evident, there was now ſome project on foot which ſhe knew, and had hearkened to dangerous counſels before the time mentioned by Camden. But Elizabeth, better informed than Mary imagined, knowing what meaſures were taken to carry her away, took her out of the hands of the earl of Shrewſbury, and committed her to the cuſtody of Sir Drue Drury, a watchful man, if ever there was one [q]. Camden ſays, the earl of Leiceſter, willing at once to free Elizabeth from the uneaſineſs the queen of Scots created her, bribed certain murderers to aſſaſſinate the priſoner; but as none durſt give them an order for leave to approach her, Drury's watchfulneſs hindered them from getting acceſs to her. If this ſhews the earl of Leiceſter's villainy, and perhaps, in Camden's intention, that of Elizabeth herſelf, it ſhews too how dangerous a perſon the queen of Scots was deemed, ſince it was thought Elizabeth's life could not be ſafe but by her death. It is not likely therefore, that Elizabeth ſhould then think of releaſing her. The ſame author ſays, that to alienate queen Elizabeth's affection entirely from the queen of Scots, it was whiſpered in her ears, that a reſolution was taken to deprive her of the crown, and ſet it on Mary's head: That a council had been held, wherein cardinal Allen for the Engliſh eccleſiaſtics, Inglefield for the laity, and the biſhop of Roſs for the queen of Scots, all three impowered by the pope and the king of Spain, had agreed, that Elizabeth ſhould be aſſaſſinated, king James depoſed, and Mary given in marriage to ſome Engliſh catholic nobleman: That this nobleman ſhould be elected king of England, and the crown ſettled upon his heirs. He adds, Walſingham diligently inquired who this Engliſh nobleman might be, and that the ſuſpicion fell upon Henry Howard, the late duke of Norfolk's brother [r].

During this year, the affairs of the United Provinces daily grew worſe, the prince of Parma from time to time conqueing towns upon them. At laſt, to reduce them, as it were, to the laſt extremity, God permitted the prince of Orange to be aſſaſſinated by one Balthazar Gerrard, a Burgundian. Philip his eldeſt ſon being then in the hands of the king of Spain, and educated in the catholic religion, the ſtates conferred the government of Holland and Zealand upon his ſecond ſon Maurice, about eighteen years old. Mean while, the prince of Parma, improving the conſternation of the ſtates, laid ſiege to Antwerp. In this diſtreſs, the ſtates, finding it was not poſſible to ſupport themſelves with their own forces, debated, whether they ſhould put themſelves under the protection of France or England, and at length reſolved for France. But Henry III. was then involved in troubles, which ſuffered him not to accept their offer. So, finding no encouragement from that quarter, they were forced to apply to the queen of England. We ſhall ſee the next year the ſucceſs of this negotiation.

The troubles with which France had been ſo long diſturbed, and which ſeemed to be a little appeaſed, were renewed by the death of the duke of Anjou in June. As the king had no children, and was thought incapable of having any, the duke of Guiſe projected to ſeize the throne, as deſcended from Charles the Great. This at leaſt is what ſeveral have accuſed him of, not without great probability. But as Henry of Bourbon king of Navarre was become firſt prince of the blood, ſince the death of the duke of Anjou, a pretence was to be found to exclude him from the throne, otherwiſe it would not be poſſible for the duke of Guiſe to execute his project. It was not difficult to find a pretence, ſince the king of Navarre profeſſed the reformed religion. So the duke of Guiſe, hiding his ambition under the veil of religion, pretended to have no other view but to maintain the catholic religion, which would be in great danger if a Hugonot aſcended the throne. The king, who knew his deſign, did his utmoſt to perſuade the king of Navarre to change his religion; and the duke, perceiving endeavours were uſed to break his meaſures, renewed the league firſt at Paris, and then in the provinces. By this means he could have an army ready on the firſt occaſion. The people were ſo blind and ſtupid as to imagine he only aimed at the preſervation of the catholic religion. Mean while, the duke having notice that the king would cauſe him to be arreſted, withdrew to his government of Champagne, where on the laſt day of December, he ſigned a private league with the king of Spain, who, on pretence of religion, ſought only to foment the troubles in France. But as the duke would not have it appear that he aſpired to the crown, the treaty ran, that the cardinal of Bourbon ſhould be raiſed to the throne, after the death of Henry III. and to that end, the king of Spain ſhould find fifty thouſand crowns a month. Thus, by means of the duke of Guiſe, Philip II. kindled in France a flame which long conſumed that kingdom, and hindered the French from thinking of the acquiſition of the Netherlands [s].

[1585] In the beginning of the year 1585, Elizabeth diſcovered a conſpiracy, of which William Parry was the author. He was a gentleman of Wales, member of the houſe of commons, and had ſignalized his zeal for the catholic religion

[q] Sir Amias Powlet was alſo joined in the commiſſion with him, to take care of Mary. She was then in Tutbury-caſtle. Camden, p. 501.

[r] This year, in April, Walter Raleigh, eſq; went to diſcover the country adjoining to Florida in the Weſt-Indies, and returned in Auguſt, bringing two of the natives along with him. Hollingſh, p. 1369.—Within the compaſs of this year alſo, Charles Nevil, the laſt earl of Weſtmoreland of this houſe, ended his life in a miſerable exile. From this family ſprung (beſides ſix earls of Weſtmoreland) two earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, an earl of Kent, a marquis Montacute, a duke of Bedford, a baron Ferrars of Oſley, barons Latimers, barons Abergavenny, one queen, five ducheſſes, not to reckon counteſſes and baroneſſes, an archbiſhop of York, and a great number of inferior gentlemen. Camden, p. 501.

[s] Henry king of France having the laſt year been choſen into the order of the garter, queen Elizabeth ſent this year, in January, Henry earl of Derby to France, to inveſt the king with the robes and enſigns of the order. Ibid. p. 501. Stow, p. 700.

He

in oppoſing alone a bill preferred in the lower houſe againſt the jeſuits. He ſpoke upon that occaſion with ſo much paſſion and vehemence, that he was committed to cuſtody [u]; but his ſubmiſſion being made, he was in a few days re-admitted into the houſe. Hardly was he at liberty, when Edmund Nevil, who claimed the inheritance of the earl of Weſtmoreland lately deceaſed in the Low-Countries [w], accuſed him of conſpiring againſt the queen; whereupon he was ſent to the Tower. He owned, "he had a deſign to kill the queen, and was perſuaded to it by Morgan, an Engliſh catholic refugee in France; that he held intelligence with jeſuits, the pope's nuntios and cardinals [x]; that the better to deceive the queen, and procure free acceſs to her perſon, he returned from France into England, and diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to her; that afterwards, repenting of his wicked intention, he laid away his dagger every time he waited on her, leſt he ſhould be tempted to commit the murder; but at length, cardinal Allen's book, wherein he maintained it to be not only lawful but honourable to kill princes excommunicated, falling into his hands, he read it, and felt himſelf ſtrongly encouraged to purſue his firſt deſign; that Nevil his accuſer coming to dine with him, propoſed to attempt ſomething for the deliverance of the queen of Scots, to which he anſwered, he had a greater deſign in his thoughts; that a few days after, Nevil coming to ſee him, they reſolved to kill the queen as ſhe rode abroad to take the air, and ſwore upon the Bible to keep the ſecret; but that in the mean while, Nevil hearing the news of the earl of Weſtmoreland's death, accuſed him, in hopes of procuring the earl's inheritance, to which he laid claim." Upon this confeſſion, he was condemned and executed.

This conſpiracy occaſioned the parliament to take extraordinary care of the queen's and the kingdom's welfare. The general aſſociation was admitted, approved, and confirmed, by unanimous conſent [y]. It was alſo enacted, "that twenty-four or more commiſſioners choſen, and appointed by the queen, ſhould make inquiſition concerning thoſe who ſhould endeavour to raiſe a rebellion in the kingdom, or attempt the queen's life, or claimed any right to the crown of England. That the perſon for whom, or by whom any attempt ſhould be made, ſhould be utterly incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, deprived for ever of all right and title to it, and proſecuted to death, if declared guilty by the four and twenty commiſſioners."

It was impoſſible not to ſee that the queen of Scots was directly aimed at, for whoſe ſake all theſe plots were contriving. Wherefore, very probably from this time her death began to be determined; the two queens being no longer able to ſubſiſt together. The council of England at leaſt was of that opinion. Mary doubted not that the law was enacted againſt her. Perhaps ſhe would have prevented the fatal effects of it, could ſhe have reſolved to renounce all correſpondence in the kingdom and in foreign countries. But ſhe had not the prudence to take that wiſe courſe, or perhaps to avoid the ſnares laid for her, nor was quick-ſighted enough to perceive ſhe only ſerved for a blind to her pretended friends to execute other projects.

The parliament was not contented with this ſevere ſtatute for the queen's preſervation. It was farther enacted, "That all popiſh prieſts ſhould depart the realm within forty days: That thoſe who ſhould afterwards return, ſhould be guilty of high-treaſon: That to receive or harbour them ſhould be felony". It was declared alſo, "That thoſe who were educated in foreign ſeminaries, if they returned not into England within ſix months, after notice, and made not their ſubmiſſion within two days after their return, before a biſhop, or two juſtices of peace, ſhould be guilty of high-treaſon: That if any perſon ſubmitting himſelf, ſhould within ten years approach the court, or come within ten miles thereof, his ſubmiſſion ſhould be void: That thoſe who ſhould directly or indirectly convey any money to ſtudents or others in ſuch ſeminaries, ſhould incur the penalty of a præmunire, loſs of goods, and perpetual exile: That if any of the peers of the realm ſhould offend againſt this act, they ſhould be brought to their trial by their peers: That if any perſon ſhould know any popiſh prieſt or jeſuit lurking in the kingdom, and ſhould not diſcover him within four days, he ſhould be fined and impriſoned at the queen's pleaſure: That if any man ſhould be ſuſpected to be a prieſt or jeſuit, and refuſe to ſubmit himſelf to examination, he ſhould be impriſoned till he did ſubmit: That they who ſhould ſend their children to popiſh colleges or ſeminaries, ſhould be fined in one hundred pounds ſterling: That if thoſe who were ſent thither, did not return within a year, they ſhould be incapable to ſucceed as heirs to any eſtate: That if the wardens of the ports ſhould ſuffer any beſides merchants to croſs the ſeas, without the queen's licence, ſigned by ſix privy counſellors, they ſhould be turned out of their places: That the maſters of ſhips who received any paſſengers without ſuch licence, ſhould forfeit their ſhips and goods, ſuffer a year's impriſonment, and be incapable of exerciſing navigation for the future."

This is the ſevereſt act againſt the catholics in the reign of queen Elizabeth. But they could blame only themſelves, or rather the indiſcreet zeal of ſome amongſt them, who never ceaſed plotting againſt the queen, and endeavouring to ſet the queen of Scots on the throne of England. Even this ſtatute was not capable of ſtopping them, till at laſt they carried their zeal to ſuch a height, that the deſtruction of one of the queens became neceſſary for the preſervation of the other [z].

Philip earl of Arundel, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Norfolk, had through the queen's grace and favour, been reſtored in blood [a] and to his father's eſtate three years before. But afterwards he embraced the catholic religion, and being twice cited before the council to anſwer to certain accuſations entered againſt him, was confined to his own houſe. Six months after he was releaſed, and came to the houſe of lords, but withdrew the very firſt day, not to be obliged to be preſent at the ſermon. As he was extremely addicted to his religion, he reſolved to leave the kingdom to enjoy the free exerciſe of it, and before his departure wrote a letter to the queen, which was not to be delivered till after he was gone. The letter was full of complaints that his innocence was oppreſſed. He ſaid, "that to avoid the misfortune befallen his grandfather and father, and to ſerve God with freedom according to his conſcience, he had reſolved to quit the kingdom, but not his allegiance to his ſovereign." But being betrayed by his own ſervants, he was apprehended as he was going to embark, and ſent to the Tower.

Henry Percy earl of Northumberland, brother to him that was beheaded, was in the ſame Tower, having been charged with being concerned in Throckmorton's conſpiracy, and with holding correſpondence with the lord Paget and the duke of Guiſe. June 21, this year, he was found dead in his bed, ſhot with three bullets under his left pap. As he was alone in his room, which was bolted on the inſide, it was eaſy to ſee he had killed himſelf.

The calm Elizabeth had enjoyed for ſome years, began to be turned into ſtorms, which threatened her from all quarters. This change muſt be aſcribed to three principal cauſes. The firſt was the duke of Guiſe's power, which was almoſt equal to that of the French king himſelf. Philip II.'s flouriſhing condition may be reckoned a ſecond, who, after acquiring the kingdom of Portugal, was upon the point of reducing to his obedience the revolted provinces of the Netherlands. The third was the hopes queen Elizabeth's enemies flattered themſelves with, of gaining the king of Scotland, and making uſe of him to invade England. I mention not the court of Rome, or the Engliſh catholics, who always continued the ſame diſpoſition, ſo there was nothing new in that reſpect. The queen of Scots was ever the ſtumbling-block. It was ſhe that gave birth to all the contrivances. Her deliverance from captivity was deſired, in order to ſet on her head the crown of England and Scotland, and reſtore by her means the catholic religion in both kingdoms. Such was the ſcheme of Elizabeth's enemies. She could not be ignorant of it, ſince they had purſued it from the beginning of her reign, as, on her part, ſhe had made it her whole buſineſs to break their meaſures. But ſome advantages ſhe had hitherto enjoyed began to fail her. Theſe were, firſt, the jealouſy between the crowns of France and Spain, which had reſtrained both from attacking her openly. Secondly, the French

[y] This was done in the 4th ſeſſion of the parliament, which met by prorogation November 23, 1584, and was prorogued again March 29, 15[illegible]. In this ſeſſion the lords and commons granted the queen two fifteenths and a ſubſidy; and the clergy a ſubſidy of ſix ſhillings in the pound, to be paid in three years. See Statut.

[z] Beſides, the two acts already mentioned, it was alſo enacted in this ſeſſion, That no perſon ſhall be returned to ſerve upon juries, but what has an eſtate of freehold lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the clear yearly value of four pounds at the leaſt.

The

Hugonots had been ſufficiently ſtrong to ſupport themſelves, and diſable the court from attempting any thing againſt England. Thirdly, whilſt the affairs of the confederates in the Netherlands were proſperous, they had ſo employed the Spaniſh forces, that it was not poſſible for Philip II. to think ſeriouſly of foreign affairs. But at the time I am ſpeaking of, the ſcene was entirely changed. France was in ſuch a way, as Elizabeth could no longer reſt her ſafety upon the jealouſy between the French and Spaniſh crowns, that foundation being grown too weak. The duke of Guiſe, her mortal enemy, was more powerful in France than the king himſelf, and beſides, was ſupported by the king of Spain. Very probably, the Hugonots would be entirely oppreſſed, and the Low-Countries ſoon brought under the Spaniſh yoke; after which, there was no doubt, England would be invaded. Elizabeth therefore was to think betimes of preventing the impending danger, or reſolve to ſuſtain alone the efforts of her enemies. Prudence required that ſhe ſhould in the firſt place try to avoid the aſſaults which were preparing againſt her, without neglecting however the means of withſtanding them, if ſhe ſhould be forced to it. The ſcheme ſhe laid was this, as will plainly appear in the ſequel. Firſt, ſhe reſolved to make alliances, if poſſible, with the two Northern crowns and the German proteſtants, though it were only to raiſe the jealouſy of her enemies. Secondly, to ſend a ſtrong aid to the confederates of the Low-Countries, to keep the king of Spain employed there. Thirdly, to aſſiſt the French Hugonots, to prevent their being too eaſily oppreſſed: knowing the duke of Guiſe would be unable to attempt any thing againſt her, ſo long as the civil wars held him employed in France. Laſtly, ſhe thought there was no better way to break her enemies meaſures, than to endeavour, if poſſible, to have the king of Scotland in her power; or, if that failed, to raiſe troubles in Scotland, which ſhould hinder that young prince from framing projects detrimental to England. It is alſo very likely, that at this time the death of the queen of Scots was determined, ſince her life was the foundation of all the plots againſt Elizabeth both at home and abroad. At leaſt, if this reſolution was not abſolutely taken, very probably Elizabeth and her council were determined not to ſpare Mary, when the neceſſity of affairs required her to be ſacrificed to the public ſafety. I own this is only a conjecture, but it is built upon the ſituation of Elizabeth's affairs at that time.

To execute the firſt part of her ſcheme, ſhe ſent ſir Thomas Bodley into Germany and Denmark, to endeavour to perſuade the proteſtant princes to make a league defenſive with England [b]. He had orders, among other things, to acquaint the king of Denmark, that the duke of Lorrain, when he courted Elizabeth, pretended a right to the crown of Denmark as grandſon to Chriſtiern II. by his daughter. I do not know the ſucceſs of Bodley's negotiations; but as Elizabeth was extremely frugal of her money, it is likely ſhe uſed not the propereſt means to gain the German princes to her intereſt. I ſhall ſpeak preſently of the ſecond and third articles of Elizabeth's ſcheme relating to France and the Netherlands. As to the fourth concerning Scotland, we find it explained in Melvil's Memoirs, if we may however give entire credit to this author, who ſeems extremely prejudiced againſt Elizabeth.

The king of Scotland being determined to marry, caſt his eyes on the king of Denmark's eldeſt daughter, who having ſome notice of it, reſolved to ſend an embaſſy into Scotland, under colour of propoſing an alliance between the two kingdoms, and withal to give king James an opportunity to propoſe his marriage. Melvil pretends, Elizabeth having intelligence of the project, reſolved to uſe her endeavours to render it abortive [c]. Not that the marriage was unſuitable for the king of Scotland, but it was requiſite for Elizabeth that he ſhould not marry, unleſs he would take an Engliſh wife of her chuſing, or rather, ſhe wiſhed to have him in her power before he was married. She wrote to him therefore, that to preſerve with him always a good underſtanding, ſhe intended to ſend an embaſſador, who ſhould reſide at his court, not to trouble his majeſty with buſineſs, but entertain him with merry diſcourſe, and bear him company in his recreations: that ſhe had choſen for that purpoſe Edward Wotton, a man of wit and a great traveller, imagining he would be very proper to divert him agreeably, and hoped he would take great delight in his converſation. Melvil, who was ordered to receive the embaſſador, remembered to have ſeen him formerly at Paris, at his uncle Dr. Wotton's the Engliſh ambaſſador; and that, young as he was, he had enſnared that able miniſter the old conſtable Montmorency [d]. He warned the king of it, who regarded it not. On the contrary, he made the embaſſador partner of all his pleaſures, and one of his greateſt favourites.

The Daniſh embaſſadors being arrived in Scotland, Wotton and ſome of the king's miniſters ſo ordered it, that they received ſo many mortifications that they were going to return in very great diſcontent [e]. But Melvil informing them of the ſtate of affairs, purſuaded them to have patience; and indeed, the king being undeceived of ſome notions inſtilled into him againſt the king of Denmark, ſent them back better ſatisfied. Shortly after, he diſpatched Peter Young [f] his almoner to the ſame prince, to thank him for his embaſſy, and to acquaint him that he would very ſoon ſend embaſſadors to him. The real motive of Young's voyage was to ſee the king of Denmark's two daughters, and inform the king his maſter of their qualifications.

In the mean while, the earl of Arran's credit ſenſibly decreaſed by the addreſs of the maſter of Gray his rival, who knew better how to manage the king. Moreover, Wotton helped with all his power to ruin the favourite; for, beſides that Elizabeth had no farther need of him ſince ſhe had won Gray, he was a man on whom ſhe could not much rely. An accident alſo on the borders did the earl of Arran great injury. Thomas Carr the laird of Fernihurſt, who had married his niece, holding a conference with ſir Francis Ruſſel [g], the earl of Bedford's ſon, upon affairs relating to both kingdoms, an Engliſhman being taken pilfering, raiſed a quarrel between the two guards [h], wherein Ruſſel was ſlain. The Engliſh embaſſador made great noiſe about the affair, pretending the earl of Arran had raiſed this quarrel by his nephew, to breed a rupture between the two kingdoms. Upon his complaints, the earl of Arran was confined to his own houſe, and Fernihurſt ſent to priſon, where he died quickly after.

Elizabeth having notice of the fact, demanded a ſolemn reparation. James did not refuſe it; but pretended he could do nothing before he had proofs. This was not eaſy, by reaſon of the cuſtom which allowed not the evidence of the Engliſh againſt the Scots, or the Scots againſt the Engliſh, concerning what paſſed on the borders. This difficulty cauſing the affair to be prolonged, and the earl of Arran having his liberty, Elizabeth took occaſion to permit the Scotch fugitives who had fled into England to return home. Wotton being informed of the queen's deſign, laboured to corrupt ſeveral Scotch courtiers [i], and gain them to Elizabeth's intereſt. If Melvil is to be credited, the king's greateſt confidents were of this number. So Wotton, finding himſelf well ſupported, formed the project to ſurpriſe the king in Sterling park and carry him into England. But being diſappointed, he reſolved to force the guard of the caſtle, and had now prepared every thing neceſſary to execute his deſign, when the king having ſome intelligence of it, broke his meaſures by a ſudden departure from Sterling. Then Wotton perceiving he was diſcovered, privately retired without taking leave. This was the man ſent by Elizabeth to king James to entertain and divert him.

But all the danger was not over. James was ſurrounded with perſons who correſponded with the fugitives, and hindered him from providing for his ſafety. The fugitive lords were now entered Scotland, where they had drawn together three thouſand men, and were marching directly to Sterling, where the king was returned, without any precaution taken at court to ſtop their proceedings. This negligence, cauſed by the traitors about the king's perſon, afforded the malcontents an opportunity to come to the gates of Sterling, where the king was ſo ſurpriſed, that he was forced to put himſelf into their hands; but the earl of Arran had time to eſcape. The malcontents having the king in their power, treated him with ſuch reſpect and ſubmiſſion, that they perſuaded him at length they were not his enemies, as he had been made to believe. He owned he had been miſled by Arran's pernicious counſels; and conſented that the exiles ſhould be reſtored to their eſtates. By this revolution, Elizabeth had the ſatisfaction to ſee the king of Scotland guided by counſellors from whom ſhe had nothing to fear, whereas before ſhe was under continual apprehenſions with reſpect to the affairs of that kingdom. Shortly after, colonel Stewart going to Copenhagen, began there a treaty about the king's marriage with one of the princeſſes of Denmark.

In the mean time, the affairs of the United Provinces were in ſo dangerous a ſituation, that the ſtates could no longer hope to withſtand the king of Spain, unleſs they were ſtrongly aſſiſted. Henry III. having refuſed the ſovereignty offered him by the ſtates, they applied to Elizabeth, who alſo refuſed it, for fear of engaging in a very troubleſome affair. She perceived a war with Spain, for the preſervation of that ſovereignty, would draw her into extraordinary charges, which ſhe ſhould not be at liberty to leſſen as ſhe pleaſed. She choſe rather, in purſuance of her ſcheme, to give the ſtates a powerful aid, and the king of Spain a diverſion, becauſe the aid might be increaſed or leſſened, according to the ſituation of her affairs. She made therefore a treaty with them, promiſing to find them five thouſand foot [k] and a thouſand horſe, under the command of an Engliſh general. It was agreed, ſhe ſhould pay theſe troops, on condition of being repaid at the end of the war, namely, in the firſt year of the peace, the expences advanced in the firſt year of the war, and the reſt in four years: That for ſecurity of payment, Fluſhing and Rammekins in Zealand, and the Briel in Holland, ſhould be delivered into her hands: That the governors, ſhe ſhould place there [l], ſhould exerciſe no authority over the inhabitants: That the money being repaid, theſe places ſhould be reſtored, not to the king of Spain, but to the ſtates: That the Engliſh general, and two others, whom ſhe ſhould name, ſhould have a place in the council of ſtate, and no peace or truce be made without a mutual conſent: That if the queen ſhould ſend a fleet to ſea, the ſtates ſhould be obliged to join it with an equal number of ſhips, under the command of the Engliſh admiral: Laſtly, That the ports ſhould be open and free to both nations [m].

The treaty being concluded, the queen appointed for general of her auxiliary forces the earl of Leiceſter, for whom ſhe had ever a great affection; but he came not into Flanders till about the end of the year. Some time after, ſhe publiſhed a manifeſto, wherein ſhe alleges as a reaſon for her aiding the confederate provinces, that the alliance between the kings of England and the princes of the Netherlands, was not ſo much between their perſons, as between their reſpective ſtates. Whence ſhe inferred, that without breach of the alliance, ſhe might aſſiſt the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, oppreſſed by the Spaniards.

Mean while, as ſhe judged this reaſon would not be ſatisfactory to the king of Spain, and that he would doubtleſs conſider this extraordinary aid given his rebellious ſubjects as a declaration of war, ſhe reſolved to prevent him. To that purpoſe, ſhe equipped a fleet of one and twenty ſail, whereon were embarked two thouſand three hundred ſoldiers, beſides mariners, to carry war into America, where the Spaniards little expected any ſuch thing. The fleet was commanded by the earl of Carliſle, who had under him the famous ſir Francis Drake [n]. The Engliſh immediately took St. Jago, one of the iſles of Cape Verd. After that they ſailed to St. Domingo, or Hiſpaniola, and became maſters of the capital. Having ſpent there all January of the year 1586, they went and took Carthagena. Then they burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena in Florida. A violent ſtorm diſperſing the fleet, as they were going upon new expeditions, they joined not again till they came into England [o], where they brought a booty valued at ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling; but in this expedition ſeven hundred men periſhed.

At the ſame time, John Davis, an Engliſhman, went [p] in ſearch of a ſhorter paſſage through the North of America to the Eaſt Indies. The ice preventing his paſſing, he long roved on the northern ſeas, and accidentally diſcovered a ſtreight under the polar circle, which ſtill bears his name, but was not what he ſought [q].

Before I leave the year 1585, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in France. After the duke of Guiſe had concluded his treaty with the king of Spain, he tried all ways to corrupt the French, and gain them to his party. His aim was to ſeize the crown, either before or after Henry III.'s death. He could not expect that the king, who hated him mortally, would countenance his deſign; and, on the other hand, he had no manner of colour to aſpire to the crown, except his pretended deſcent from the houſe of Charles the Great. And even in that caſe, the duke of Lorrain, head of that houſe, would have been before him. To aſſert therefore ſo extraordinary a title, the people's affection and a religious zeal were to ſupply all defects, otherwiſe there was not the leaſt appearance, that in cold blood the French ſhould ſet on the throne, after the king's death, a foreign prince, in prejudice of the king of Navarre, who was deſcended from St. Lewis. To accompliſh his project, the duke of Guiſe began, by means of his emiſſaries, to diſparage the king as a favourer of heretics, and to rouze the zeal of the catholics againſt the Hugonots, and particularly againſt the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, who profeſſed the reformed religion after a public abjuration. Mean while, as the duke of Guiſe did not think proper to diſcover his deſigns, he publiſhed a manifeſto in the cardinal de Bourbon's name, wherein he pretended to demonſtrate, that the crown belonged to the cardinal after the king's death. Not that he deſired to place him on the throne; but it was ſufficient firſt to ſet aſide the king of Navarre. That done, under colour of hindering the throne from being filled with a heretic, he poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral places, pretending however, it was for the king's ſervice and the good of the realm.

The life led by the king for ſome time, cauſed him to forfeit the eſteem of moſt of his ſubjects. The duke of Guiſe's intrigues, who repreſented him a favourer of heretics, becauſe he ſupported the houſe of Bourbon's title, helped alſo to alienate the people from him. In ſhort, the court of Rome, the clergy, the friers, were for the duke of Guiſe, and ſerved him to the utmoſt of their power. So the king being unable to reſiſt, was forced to forſake the king of Navarre, publiſh an edict againſt the Hugonots, and join with the duke in their extirpation. Nay, he had the vexation to be obliged to give him the command of the army.

The king of Navarre and the Hugonots, finding themſelves thus attacked, aſſembled all their forces in their abſence. But theſe forces were ſo inconſiderable in compariſon of their enemies, that there was no likelihood of withſtanding them long. The prince of Condé, attempting to relieve the caſtle of Angers, which was beſieged, was ſuddenly ſurrounded by enemies, and forced to ſteal away from his army, and fly into England. Elizabeth received him very civilly, and as ſhe knew the enemies of the Hugonots were alſo hers, promiſed to aſſiſt him [r]. It was not without reaſon that ſhe concerned herſelf with the affairs of the Hugonots, ſince the league was not limited to their deſtruction, but aimed at the ruin of the proteſtant religion throughout Europe, and eſpecially in England. Of this had been ſeen a very ſenſible proof this ſame year. Gregory XIII. dying in April, Sixtus V. his ſucceſſor, thundered the cenſures of the church againſt the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, calling them not only heretics and relapſes, but alſo a baſtard progeny. Hence it was eaſy to ſee, how much the pope countenanced the duke of Guiſe's deſigns, and the queen of England might infer, how great reaſon ſhe had to fear, if the duke ſhould one day become king of France, being ſupported by the pope and the Spaniard. Upon this account it was ſhe ſupplied the prince of Condé with fifty thouſand crowns, to aſſiſt him in maintaining the war, and lent him ten ſhips, with which he raiſed the blockade of Rochelle.

with almoſt an abſolule power [u]. Very probably their aim was to engage the queen farther than ſhe intended. She had refuſed the offered ſovereignty, and it was deſigned to give it her in ſome meaſure, whether ſhe would or no, by inveſting her general with almoſt a ſovereign authority. But Elizabeth was too wiſe to be enſnared by this artifice. She ſharply complained to the ſtates of this ſort of deceit, and gave withal the earl of Leiceſter a ſevere reprimand for accepting the honour, without having firſt conſulted her. She told him, he had acted directly contrary to her intention, ſince ſhe had publicly declared in her manifeſto, that ſhe was very ready to relieve her diſtreſſed neighbours, but never meant to aſſume any power over them [w]. The ſtates excuſed themſelves by ſaying, the neceſſity of their affairs had obliged them to confer ſuch an authority on the earl of Leiceſter, that he might be the better able to heal their diviſions, which put them in continual danger of periſhing: That they could not revoke the authority granted to her general without great inconveniences, and had not however diveſted themſelves of the ſupreme power. The earl of Leiceſter appeaſed the queen by his ſubmiſſions. In fine, ſhe conſented the patent ſhould ſubſiſt, but intimated to the ſtates, they vainly hoped to induce her to accept of the ſovereignty of their country, and that her intention was to keep within the bounds ſhe had preſcribed to herſelf, that is, not to be obliged to aſſiſt them any farther than her affairs would permit.

The earl of Leiceſter, a man of great pride and ambition, was no ſooner clothed with this exorbitant power, than he began ſecretly to form projects deſtructive of the liberties of the country he was come to defend. At leaſt, this is what all the Dutch hiſtorians tax him with. They pretend, his deſign was to render himſelf ſovereign or perpetual dictator of the provinces, with whoſe government he had been intruſted. He made uſe of ſuch means as bred an univerſal diſcontent againſt him. In ſhort, after a campaign, wherein he performed no great exploits, he returned to England, to take proper meaſures to facilitate the execution of his projects, and probably to perſuade the queen to ſupport him [x].

Whilſt France and the Netherlands were in commotion, Elizabeth wiſely provided for her own and her people's ſecurity. This ſhe did, not only by aſſiſting the Hugonots and the confederate provinces, but alſo by preventing the dangers which might come from Scotland, in caſe the king of Spain and the duke of Guiſe ſhould be ever able to invade her [y]. The preſent juncture was very favourable. The king of Scotland had about him only men well-affected to the reformed religion, and the intereſts of England. The opportunity therefore was not to be neglected of ſtrictly uniting the two kingdoms; this union being of the utmoſt conſequence to Elizabeth. Accordingly ſhe diſpatched Randolph to king James, to repreſent to him, that the enemies of the proteſtant religion openly joining together for its deſtruction, it was the intereſt of the proteſtant ſtates to unite alſo for their common defence. That England and Scotland were the bulwarks of the true religion, and the union of their forces the only poſſible means to preſerve it. That therefore ſhe thought it their common intereſt to join in a league for the defence of their religion, againſt all who ſhould attempt to deſtroy it, at leaſt in England and Scotland. The better to perſuade the king to do what the queen deſired, Randolph told him, that as his revenues were extremely diminiſhed, by reaſon of the troubles which had ſo long afflicted his kingdom, the queen was willing to grant him a penſion to aſſiſt him in ſupporting his dignity [z]. James readily conſented to what was propoſed to him, but on condition, nothing ſhould be done in England in prejudice to his right to the crown of that kingdom, and this article, with that of the penſion, be inſerted in the treaty. Randolph anſwered, he did not believe that would be poſſible. As to the penſion, he ſaid, if it was put into the treaty, the queen would ſeem to be tributary to Scotland, to which ſhe would never agree. As to the article of the ſucceſſion, the queen could not ſettle it by a public treaty without the concurrence of the parliament; and the diſcuſſion of ſuch an affair might retard the treaty too long, and perhaps give birth to great difficulties, becauſe of the queen his mother's religion: but he did not queſtion, Elizabeth would be very willing to ſatisfy him in theſe two points, by means of two ſecret articles. James being contented with this expedient, Deſneval the French ambaſſador did all that lay in his power to diſſuade him from the league. He told him, that Elizabeth's aim was only to ſecure herſelf from the attacks of thoſe who were combined for the deliverance of queen Mary. That it was a ſtrange thing he ſhould think of uniting with a queen, who kept his mother in priſon, againſt thoſe who were labouring to free her from captivity. He added, the king his maſter could not but conſider the league as an expreſs breach of the ancient alliance between France and Scotland. James anſwered, that the queen his mother's misfortunes proceeded wholly from her own friends, who, under colour of ſerving her, only aimed at executing their own projects. That, as to the alliance between France and Scotland, he did not ſee wherein he ſhould violate it, ſince France pretended not to break it, when, without ſignifying it to him, ſhe made a league defenſive with England.

James having reſolved upon what the queen deſired, the plenipotentiaries of the two kingdoms met at Berwick, and ſigned a treaty of alliance and ſtricter amity between the two crowns [a].

The motive of the treaty was, that whereas the princes, who called themſelves catholics, were entered into leagues for extirpating the proteſtant religion, not only in their own dominions, but alſo in foreign countries, it was neceſſary the proteſtants ſhould unite for its defence. That therefore the queen of England and king of Scotland did agree upon the following articles:

I. By this treaty, they ſhall be obliged to defend the evangelical religion againſt all thoſe who ſhall attack it in either kingdom.

II. This league ſhall be offenſive and defenſive againſt thoſe who ſhall hinder the free exerciſe of the ſaid religion in either of the two kingdoms; all other treaties and alliances to the contrary notwithſtanding.

III. If one of the two parties be invaded, the other ſhall not directly or indirectly aſſiſt the invader, notwithſtanding any alliance or treaty formerly entered into.

IV. If England be invaded in any parts remote from Scotland, the king of Scotland ſhall find the queen of England two thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot, at the queen's charges from the day of their entering England; and in the like caſe, the queen ſhall ſend the king of Scotland ſix thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe.

V. If England be invaded in any place within ſixty miles of Scotland, the king of Scotland ſhall draw together all his forces, and join the ſame with the queen's, in order to purſue the invaders for the ſpace of thirty days together; or if neceſſity require, for ſo long time as the vaſſals of Scotland are bound to furniſh the king with troops for the defence of the kingdom.

VI. If Ireland be invaded, the king of Scotland ſhall hinder the inhabitants of the county of Argyle from entering in a hoſtile manner into that kingdom.

VII. The king and queen ſhall mutually deliver all rebels, who ſhall have attempted any thing againſt either of the two kingdoms, or at leaſt, they ſhall compel them to retire from their dominions.

VIII. Within ſix months, commiſſioners ſhall be ſent to compound and adjuſt all differences, which have happened on the borders between the two nations.

IX. Neither of the two princes ſhall make any treaty to the prejudice of the articles of this preſent league, without the conſent of the other.

X. This treaty ſhall be ratified on both ſides by letters patents.

XI. This preſent treaty ſhall in no way derogate from former treaties between the two kingdoms, or from thoſe before made by the two crowns with any princes or ſtates, what relates to religion excepted. As to the article concerning religion, it is agreed, this alliance and league offenſive and defenſive ſhall remain firm and inviolate.

XII. The treaties ſhall be confirmed by the ſtates of Scotland, as ſoon as the king ſhall attain to the age of twenty-five years; and in like manner, the queen ſhall cauſe it to be approved by the parliaments of England and Ireland.

Shortly after the concluſion of this league, a conſpiracy was diſcovered in England, which coſt the queen of Scots her life. As this is one of the moſt important events of queen Elizabeth's reign, it will be neceſſary to relate all the particulars. But it is a ſad thing, theſe particulars muſt be taken from the annals of Elizabeth, written by Camden, a very ſuſpicious author with reſpect to the queen of Scots. In all the former reigns, there is no remarkable event but what is traced, and in ſome meaſure cleared in the collection of the public acts. But as to this, all the acts relating to queen Mary are totally deſtroyed [b]. On the other hand, James I. ſon of Mary, ſucceeding Elizabeth, there was not an Engliſhman who dared to write in his reign the truth of what paſſed in the foregoing, whilſt the memory of it was yet freſh. Camden was the only perſon that undertook to publiſh the annals of queen Elizabeth's reign; not ſo much to make known as to diſguiſe the events, as far as they concerned queen Mary, and to give an air of innocence to whatever ſullied her reputation when alive. This evidently appears in his account of king Henry Stewart's murder, which has given occaſion to preſume he has been no faithfuller in what he ſays of Mary's trial and death. He affirms, however, he has followed the Memoirs of Edward Barker [c] principal regiſter to the queen, of Thomas Wheeler public-notary, cryer of the court of Canterbury, and other perſons of credit whom he does not name. I do not know whether the Memoirs he ſpeaks of were ever publiſhed, or are ſtill extant. However, from Camden's annals the following account is taken, for want of a more impartial hiſtorian.

William Gifford, doctor of divinity in the ſeminary at Rheims, Gilbert Gifford [d] and Hodgeſon, Engliſh prieſts, had inſtilled into one John Savage their countryman, that it would be a meritorious act to kill Elizabeth, and had cauſed him to vow it during the Eaſter-holidays this year 1586 [e]. At the ſame time, Ballard an Engliſh prieſt of that ſeminary, who had been in England, notwithſtanding the prohibition, returned into France, where he had ſeveral conferences with Mendoza and the lord Paget, how to invade England [f]. As the chief end of the conſpiracy was to reſtore the catholic religion in England, the point was not only to make away with Elizabeth, but forces alſo were to be ready to deliver Mary and ſet her on the throne of England. Theſe two projects could not be ſeparated. Ballard was accompanied by one Maud, whom he thought a friend, but who was however ſecretary Walſingham's ſpy.

About Whitſuntide, Ballard was ſent back into England by the conſpirators, to gain proper perſons to facilitate the execution of the project. They told him, he would meet at London with a young gentleman called Anthony Babington [g], whom he might truſt. This Babington, who was a zealous catholic, having been lately in France, was gained there by the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's embaſſador, and by Morgan an Engliſh fugitive. He was ſo prepoſſeſſed in favour of the queen of Scots, that he was thought qualified for any enterpriſe, and for that reaſon had been recommended to Mary without his knowledge. So, upon his return to England, ſhe wrote to him, and from that time he was employed to convey to her the letters which came from France, till ſhe was committed to the cuſtody of ſir Amias Powlet and ſir Drue Drury. Then Babington, fearing the watchfulneſs of the new keepers, would have nothing more to do with the letters either to or from her.

Ballard, when he came to England, ſaw Babington, and imparted to him the deſign to invade England, free the queen of Scots, and ſet her on the throne. Babington anſwered, he very much doubted the poſſibility of executing this project ſo long as Elizabeth lived. Whereupon Ballard acquainted him alſo with Savage's vow, to which Babington replied, it was too hazardous to commit the execution of ſuch a deſign to a ſingle perſon; that there ſhould be ſix at leaſt, and Savage, not to break his vow, might be one of the number [h]. Then they conferred together how a foreign army might be brought into the kingdom, otherwiſe they judged the death of Elizabeth would ſignify nothing.

A few days after, Babington received, by an unknown hand, a letter in cypher from the queen of Scots, blaming him for his ſilence, and deſiring him to ſend her the pacquet of letters come from Morgan, and delivered by the French embaſſador's ſecretary. Babington returned an anſwer, and after excuſing his ſilence, by reaſon of his fear of Powlet's and Drury's great watchfulneſs, imparted to her the plot he had laid with Ballard. In a ſecond letter from Mary, of the 27th of July, ſhe highly commended his zeal for the catholic religion, but adviſes him to attempt nothing till he was ſure of foreign aſſiſtance. Beſides this, ſhe preſcribed ſeveral things for executing the project, as to ſend privately for the earl of Weſtmoreland and the lord Paget [i]. She chalked out the way for her deliverance [k], and charged him to promiſe in her name a good reward to the ſix perſons.

Mean while, Babington had gained ſome other perſons [l], among whom was Polly, Walſingham's ſpy, who by his means was daily informed of what paſſed among the conſpirators. He learnt from him, that the ſix who had engaged to aſſaſſinate the queen, were Savage, Tilney, Charnock, Abington, Tichburn, and Barnwel, and that they were all ſix drawn in one picture with Babington in the middle, and a certain motto obſcurely ſignifying their deſign [m]. Nay, he found means to ſhew this picture to the queen, who knew only Barnwel [n]. She retained however the idea of their faces ſo well, that walking abroad, a little after, and ſeeing Barnwel, ſhe looked ſtedfaſtly on him, and then turning to the captain of the guard, ſaid, "Am not I fairly guarded, that have not a man in my company that wears a ſword?"

Babington was ſo impatient to ſee the foreign ſuccours ready to depart for England, that he gave Ballard money, who had undertaken to go into France and haſten them. But as it was not eaſy to procure paſſports, Babington found means to be introduced to ſecretary Walſingham [o], who, knowing what he was, received him very civilly, and expreſſed a great value for him. Encouraged by this kind reception, he deſired a paſſport for himſelf and another for Ballard, under a counterfeit name, and affirmed, that by means of his friends at Paris, he ſhould diſcover many ſecrets concerning the queen of Scots. Walſingham commended his zeal, and promiſed him a good reward, if he did the queen any conſiderable ſervice. He put him likewiſe in hopes of the paſſports he deſired.

Polly was not the only perſon from whom Walſingham learnt the ſecrets of the conſpiracy. Gilbert Gifford, who had been employed to corrupt Savage, being ſent into England to confirm the villain in his reſolution, ſerved at the ſame time to convey letters to the queen of Scots, and ſend back her anſwers. To make trial of his fidelity, ſeveral blank papers, made up like letters, were ſent at firſt, and as it was known by the anſwers that they were delivered, he was employed without ſcruple. Some time after, Gifford, whether ſtruck with remorſe, or allured with the hopes of reward, came to Walſingham, and informed him of all he knew. The ſecretary received him very kindly, and promiſed to uſe his intereſt for him with the queen, and procure him a good reward. Then inſtructing him how to behave, he ſent him to the place where the queen of Scots was kept, with a letter to ſir Amias Powlet, deſiring him to connive at the bearer's corrupting one of his ſervants to deliver letters to the queen of Scotland, and bring back her anſwers. But Powlet would not ſuffer any of his domeſtics to be concerned in ſuch an intrigue. He only hinted at a certain brewer, whom he thought fit for the purpoſe, and who indeed ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted. By this means, Gifford conveyed to the captive queen letters, whereof Walſingham had taken copies [p], and received her anſwers, which were ſerved in the ſame

They alſo got a report ſpread, that George Gifford, one of the queen's gentlemen penſioners, had ſworn her majeſty's death, and had received a ſum of money from the duke of Guiſe for that purpoſe. manner. At length, when the court was ſufficiently inſtructed, Ballard was apprehended, under colour, that being a popiſh prieſt, he had entered the kingdom without a licence. At this news, Babington was in the utmoſt conſternation. He recovered however out of his fright, as it did not appear, that Ballard was arreſted for the conſpiracy, and nothing was ſaid at court intimating the diſcovery of the plot. He reſolved therefore to try to ſave Ballard, and to that end repreſented to Walſingham, that he would be of great ſervice to him in France, to diſcover the ſecret practices of the queen of Scots, and intreated him for his releaſe. Walſingham laid the blame of Ballard's being arreſted, upon the watchfulneſs of the ſpies employed to diſcover the popiſh prieſts and jeſuits. He promiſed to endeavour to procure his releaſe, and fed him with hopes that the paſſports would be ready very ſoon. Mean while, he ſo managed that Babington was narrowly watched. In ſhort, Babington and all the reſt of the conſpirators were ſeized at the ſame time, and being ſeverally examined, impeached one another, and diſcovered the plot [q].

It is very likely, as I ſaid, that queen Elizabeth's council had reſolved, on the firſt pretence, to put the queen of Scots to death. Her life continually endangered Elizabeth's, and of this there was but too much reaſon to be convinced by the late diſcoveries. So this opportunity was embraced. Great care was taken to hinder her being informed of the ſeizing of the conſpirators, and ſir Thomas Gorges, an officer was ſent to acquaint her with it, who ſurpriſed her with the news, juſt as ſhe had taken horſe to ride a-hunting. She would have returned to her apartment, but was not permitted [r] till ſuch time as all her papers were ſeized and ſent to court. Naue and Curle her ſecretaries, the one a Frenchman, the other a Scot, were apprehended at the ſame time, and without being ſuffered to ſpeak with her, conducted to London. But to have ſtill more convincing proofs againſt her, a method was uſed which ſucceeded according to expectation. Gifford having revealed, that he had delivered to the French ambaſſador ſeveral papers of moment concerning the queen of Scots, a falſe action, no way relating to the conſpiracy, was brought againſt him, for which he was baniſhed the realm. Before his departure, he waited on the embaſſador, and acquainting him with the ſentence paſſed upon him, left a paper cut after a certain manner, and charged him to deliver the queen of Scots papers to him only that ſhould produce the counter-part. Which counter-part he gave to Walſingham, who by that means came at every thing the embaſſador had in his hands [s].

The court being thus ſufficiently informed of all the circumſtances of the plot, fourteen of the conſpirators were arraigned, who received ſentence of death, and confeſſed all [t]. Care was taken, before their execution, to record all their confeſſions. Naue and Curle, Mary's ſecretaries, being examined, confeſſed they had wrote in cypher the letters found in the queen their miſtreſs's cabinet [u], or intercepted by Gifford's means. Camden inſinuates here, that Curle was bribed by Walſingham with the promiſe of a reward, which he afterwards refuſed to perform. However, ſir Edward Wotton was ſent to the court of France with authentic copies, atteſted by ſeveral lords, of the queen of Scots letters, that he might ſhew them to the king. Probably, theſe letters diſcovered how far Mary was concerned in the plot, and her correſpondence with the king of Spain and the duke of Guiſe.

At laſt, the reſolution being taken of trying and condemning queen Mary [w], as the prime cauſe of the dangers to which Elizabeth was continually expoſed, it was debated, on what ſtatute ſhe ſhould be proceeded againſt. But there was only one that could ſerve for that purpoſe, namely, the act paſſed the laſt year, which concerned her in particular. It was ſo uncommon a caſe to try a foreign queen, who was come unarmed into the kingdom to ſeek for refuge as a ſupplicant, that it would have been in vain to ſearch, in all the ancient ſtatutes, after any thing to ſerve for ground to ſuch a proceeding. This gives occaſion to preſume, when the act was made the laſt year, the queen of Scots death was already determined, and this ſtatute was to ſerve for foundation to her ſentence. Some however pretend, the intent of the act was only to keep her in awe, and let her ſee what ſhe was to expect if ſhe continued her practices, and that it was her own fault if ſhe did not make a good uſe of the warning. Wherefore in virtue of the act, Elizabeth, by letters patents under the great ſeal, appointed forty-two commiſſioners, with whom ſhe joined five judges of the realm, to try the queen of Scots. Some days before, certain lords, as well privy-counſellors as others, fell on their knees, and beſought her to take pity on herſelf, the whole nation, and all their poſterity, by puniſhing the queen of Scots. It muſt be obſerved, that throughout this whole affair, Elizabeth always pretended to act with regret, and from the neceſſity ſhe was under of ſaving her people, whom ſhe beheld in extreme danger. So the proceeding of theſe lords agreed with her deſigns. The queen's commiſſion ran in this manner:

"Elizabeth, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, queen, defender of the faith, &c. To the moſt reverend father in Chriſt, John archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate and metropolitan of all England, and one of our privy-council; and to our truſty and well-beloved ſir Thomas Bromley, knight, chancellor of England, &c. Greeting [x].

"Whereas by an act of parliament held in the 26th year of our reign, it was enacted that, &c."

Here was inſerted the act mentioned under the laſt year.

"And whereas ſince the 1ſt day of June, in the ſeven and twentieth year of our reign, divers matters have been compaſſed and imagined, tending to the hurt of our royal perſon, as well by Mary daughter and heir of James V. king of Scotland, and commonly called queen of Scots, and dowager of France, pretending title to the crown of this realm of England, as by divers other perſons, with the privity of the ſame Mary, as we are given to underſtand: And whereas we do intend and determine that the act aforeſaid be in all and every part thereof duly and effectually executed, according to the tenour of the ſame, and that all offences aboveſaid in the act aboveſaid mentioned, as aforeſaid, and the circumſtances of the ſame be examined, and ſentence or judgment thereupon given, according to the tenour and effect of the ſaid act. To you, and the greater part of you, we do give full and abſolute power, faculty, and authority, according to the tenour of the ſaid act, to examine all and ſingular matters compaſſed and imagined, tending to the hurt of our royal perſon, as well by the aforeſaid Mary, as by any other perſon or perſons whatſoever, with the privity of the ſame Mary, and all circumſtances of the ſame and all other offences aboveſaid, in the act aboveſaid, as aforeſaid mentioned, and all circumſtances of the ſame, and of every of them; and thereupon, according to the tenour of the act aforeſaid, to give ſentence or judgment, as upon good proof of the matter ſhall appear to you. And therefore we do command you, that you at certain days and places which you or the greater part of you ſhall thereunto fore appoint, diligently proceed upon the premiſſes in form aforeſaid, &c. [y]"

[q] Walſingham had carried on matters himſelf as far as Ballard's taking up, without acquainting the reſt of the queen's council, and would have gone on, but the queen would not ſuffer him. Wherefore he ſent a note to his man Scudamore, whom he had ordered to watch Babington, that he ſhould obſerve him more ſtrictly. The man read the note, ſo that Babington, ſitting near him, read it along with him. Whereupon ſuſpecting all was diſcovered, he roſe from table, as they were at ſupper in a tavern, and leaving his cloak and ſword behind him, went out of the room, as if he intended to pay the reckoning, and made all the haſte he could to Weſtminſter, and changing clothes with Charnock, withdrew into S. John's wood with him and others, and lurking about for ten days, were at laſt diſcovered near Harrow on the Hill, hid in barns, and dreſſed like countrymen. Camden.

[r] She was led from one gentleman's houſe to another in the neighbourhood. Camden, p. 518.

[s] Camden ſays, the embaſſador was to deliver the letters from the queen or the fugitives, to the perſon who ſhould bring him the counter-part; but mentions no papers left in the embaſſador's hands by Gifford, p. 518.

[t] On the 13th of September, ſeven were arraigned and condemned of high treaſon; and two days after, the other ſeven were ſentenced in like manner. The firſt ſeven were executed on the 20th, cut down, their privities cut off, and their bowels taken out whilſt alive. But on the morrow, the other ſeven, by the queen's order, hung till they were dead before they were cut down and bowelled. Camden, p. 518.

[u] There were found in it many letters from perſons beyond ſea, from ſeveral Engliſh noblemen, &c. and anſwers to them, with about ſixty tables of private cyphers and characters. Ibid.

[w] Some hiſtorians ſay, that queen Elizabeth endeavoured to have her poiſoned by her cook. And that afterwards, the earl of Leiceſter adviſed to diſpatch her by poiſon, and privately ſent a divine to Walſingham to perſuade him to it. But Walſingham urged, that, beſides the injuſtice of the thing, it was both dangerous and diſhonourable to the queen. Martyre de Marie, p. 275. Camden, p. 519. Spotiſwood, p. 351.

[x] The reſt of the commiſſioners were, the lord Burleigh, the marquis of Wincheſter, the earl of Oxford great chamberlain, the earl of Shrewſbury earl marſhal of England; the earl of Kent, the earl of Derby, the earl of Worceſter, the earl of Rutland, the earl of Warwick maſter of the ordnance; the earls of Pembroke, Leiceſter, and Lincoln; viſcount Montague; the lord Howard high-admiral of England; Hunſdon lord chamberlain; Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Cobham lord warden of the Cinque-Ports; Stafford, Grey of Wilton, Lumley, Stourton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordant, St. John of Bletſho, Buckhurſt, Compton, Cheney; ſir Francis Knolles treaſurer of the houſhold, ſir James Crofts comptroller, ſir Chriſtopher Hatton vice-chamberlain, ſir Francis Walſingham and William Daviſon ſecretaries of ſtate, ſir Ralph Sadler chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, ſir Walter Mildmay chancellor of the exchequer, ſir Amias Powlet captain of Jerſey, John Woolley, eſq. ſecretary for the Latin tongue; ſir Chriſtoper Wray, ſir Edmund Anderſon, ſir Roger Manwood, ſir Thomas Gawdy, William Periam, judges. Camden, p. 519.

[y] Very great care was taken in drawing up this commiſſion, as the reader may ſee in Strype's Ann. tom. III. p. 362, &c.

It muſt be obſerved, that among the commiſſioners were the lord treaſurer Burleigh and ſecretary Walſingham, both Elizabeth's moſt truſty miniſters, known enemies of the queen of Scots, and probably authors and promoters of the reſolution to bring her to a trial. As it was hard to believe that Elizabeth had taken ſuch a reſolution without imparting it to her miniſters and council, and without her council's approbation, it ſhould ſeem ſhe ought not to have appointed her miniſters and privy-counſellors for Mary's judges. But on the other hand, as ſhe was willing to be ſure of the ſucceſs of the trial, ſhe had a mind doubtleſs that perſons of ſo great weight as miniſters and privy-counſellors ſhould be ready to turn the ſcale, in caſe of oppoſition from the other judges.

Thirty-ſix of the commiſſioners meeting the 11th [z] of October at Fotheringhay-caſtle in the county of Northampton, where the queen of Scots was then in cuſtody, ſent her queen Elizabeth's letter [a], which when ſhe had read, ſhe anſwered, "She was ſorry the queen her ſiſter was miſinformed of her. That ſhe had ever thought the aſſociation and the ſubſequent act of parliament aimed wholly at her, and that ſhe ſhould bear the blame of whatever was contrived in foreign countries. That it was very ſtrange the queen of England ſhould conſider her as a ſubject, and command her to ſubmit to a trial. That ſhe was a ſovereign queen, and would do nothing prejudicial to royal majeſty, to herſelf, or the king her ſon. That beſides, the laws and ſtatutes of England were unknown to her, and who were her peers ſhe could not tell. That ſhe was deſtitute of counſellors, and all her papers were taken from her. That ſhe had ſtirred up no man againſt Elizabeth, nor committed any crime. That ſhe was not to be charged but upon her own words or writings, and ſhe was ſure nothing criminal could be produced againſt her, except the recommending her cauſe to foreign princes, which ſhe did not pretend to deny."

On the morrow, the commiſſioners ſent her [b] a copy of her anſwer, and after it was read to her, ſhe ſaid, "It was rightly taken; but ſhe had forgot one very material thing, namely, that it was ſaid in Elizabeth's letters [c], ſhe was ſubject to the laws of England, becauſe ſhe had long lived under their protection; but all the world knew ſhe came into England to crave the aſſiſtance of the queen her ſiſter, and had been ever ſince detained in priſon; and therefore had not enjoyed the protection of the laws, nay, had not been able to underſtand what manner of laws they were."

In a word, ſhe diſputed two whole days the authority of the judges, and would not own that in any caſe Elizabeth had other juriſdiction over her than what was uſurped by force Nay, ſhe perſiſted in it after ſhe was threatened to be ſentenced for non-appearance, as an abſent perſon. But at laſt Hatton, one of the commiſſioners, made a ſpeech to her which ſhook her reſolution. He told her, "that indeed ſhe was accuſed, but not condemned: That if ſhe were innocent, ſhe injured her reputation extremely in avoiding a trial: That the queen would be very glad nothing could be proved againſt her, as he heard her ſay himſelf when he took his leave of her [d]."

Had Mary been provided with counſel, ſhe would doubtleſs have been told that Hatton's ſpeech tended only to enſnare her, and engage her to anſwer, that ſhe might be condemned by a peremptory ſentence. If ſhe had perſiſted in her refuſal, Elizabeth would have been perhaps greatly embarraſſed. Though ſhe was reſolved to put her to death, ſhe wiſhed however that the public was convinced of the juſtice of the thing, in order to avoid part of the blame of ſo rigorous a proceeding. But a ſentence given upon non-appearance would not have produced this effect, ſince it could not be denied, that the refuſing to plead was founded upon very good reaſons. Mary ſtood out however till the 14th of October, when ſending for ſome of the commiſſioners, ſhe told them, Hatton's arguments had convinced her of the neceſſity to make her innocence appear. Adding, ſhe conſented therefore to anſwer before them, provided her proteſtation were admitted: to which the commiſſioners agreed, without approving however the reaſons on which it was grounded.

Preſently after, the judges met in the hall of the caſtle, to the number of thirty ſix, and the queen came to the ſame place [q]. When they were ſeated, the chancellor turning to Mary, ſaid, "She was accuſed of conſpiring the deſtruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the proteſtant religion, and they were commiſſioned to examine the truth of the accuſation, and to bear her anſwer." The chancellor having done ſpeaking, the queen roſe up and ſaid, "That ſhe came into England to crave the aid which had been promiſed her: That ſhe was a queen, and no ſubject of Elizabeth, and if ſhe appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her honour and reputation." The chancellor would not own that any aid had been promiſed her. As to the proteſtation, he anſwered, "it was in vain, ſince the law upon which the accuſation was grounded, allowed of no diſtinction in the perſons of the tranſgreſſors, and therefore it was not to be admitted." The court ordered however that the proteſtation ſhould be recorded, with the chancellor's anſwer.

This done, the attorney general read to her aloud the commiſſion, with the act of parliament [e], and after an account of Babington's plot, concluded that Mary had broken the act, becauſe ſhe knew of the conſpiracy, and even ſhewed the ways and means to effect it. She anſwered, "She knew not Babington, or ever received any letters from him, or wrote any to him. She never plotted the queen's deſtruction, and to prove any ſuch thing, letters under her own hand ought to be produced, which was impoſſible. She knew not Ballard, nor ever heard of him; and, in a word, being a priſoner, ſhe could not hinder the plots of others."

Whereupon the copies of Babington's letters to her were read, containing all the circumſtances of the conſpiracy [f]. It ſhould ſeem, ſince her papers were ſeized, Babington's original letters might have been produced. But as probably ſhe had burnt them, only the copies could be uſed, which Walſingham took when he had the originals in his hands. To this Mary anſwered, "Babington might poſſibly write theſe letters, and therefore the point was not to know whether he wrote them or not, but whether ſhe received them." To prove this, there was read Babington's confeſſion before his execution, wherein he ſaid, he had ſent ſeveral letters to the queen of Scots and received ſeveral from her. After that, were read the copies of certain letters in cypher from Mary to Babington, which he had received, where mention was made of the earls of Arundel and Northumberland. Then the queen with tears in her eyes, ſaid aloud, "Alas! What has the noble houſe of the Howards endured for my ſake!" She added, "That Babington might write what he pleaſed: That as for her own letters in cypher, which were produced, ſhe knew nothing of them, and it was very eaſy for her enemies to get her cyphers, and write forged letters in her name: That in ſhort, the letters were not her hand-writing; and beſides it was not likely, that to execute the deſign ſhe was charged with, ſhe ſhould employ the earl of Arundel, who was priſoner in the Tower, or the earl of Northumberland, who was very young, and to her entirely unknown."

There were alſo read Savage's and Ballard's confeſſions, which ran, That Babington communicated to them ſeveral letters which he had received from the queen of Scots. To this ſhe anſwered with a proteſtation, that Babington never received any from her.

Before I proceed, I ſhall here make two or three ſhort remarks. Firſt, it is ſurpriſing that Babington, Savage, and Ballard, ſhould be executed before the queen of Scots trial, ſince their teſtimony was uſed againſt her. In the next place, hitherto the whole evidence conſiſted only in Babington's confeſſion, that he had received letters from the queen of Scots; but as he was dead, it could not be proved that theſe were the ſame letters that were read, which too were only copies of letters decyphered. My third remark is, that though Mary proteſted ſhe never received any letters from Babington, nor wrote any to him, Camden muſt have been ſatisfied of the contrary, ſince in his account of the conſpiracy, he ſpeaks of a correſpondence by letters between Mary and Babington as a

But upon the lord treaſurer's ſaying, Every perſon in the kingdom was bound by the laws, though never ſo lately made; and that the commiſſioners were reſolved to proceed according to that law, what proteſtations ſoever ſhe interpoſed, ſhe anſwered at length, "That ſhe was ready to hear and anſwer touching any fact whatſoever committed againſt the queen of England." thing certain. This is farther confirmed by a little book, entitled, The Hiſtory of the Martyrdom of the Queen of Scots, printed at Paris in 1589, where the author, though a great friend of queen Mary, does not deny that ſhe held a correſpondence with Babington [g].

After this were produced ſeveral letters in cypher from the queen of Scots, wherein ſhe approved of the conſpiracy. Theſe were probably the letters Walſingham intercepted by Gifford's means, or thoſe he artfully drew out of the hands of the French embaſſador. The queen anſwered, She wrote not thoſe letters; and probably they were forged by her alphabet of cyphers in France; and accuſed Walſingham of doing it, who ſo cleared himſelf as ſhe ſeemed ſatisfied with his anſwer [h]. But to prove that ſhe wrote them, the confeſſions of Naue and Curle her ſecretaries were produced, who owned they wrote them by her order.

This is all that paſſed in the firſt ſeſſion the 14th of October. In the afternoon were read the copies of the letters received by Mary, concerning the conference at Paris between Ballard, Paget, and Mendoza, for invading England; and it was proved by the teſtimony of Curle her ſecretary, that ſhe had received them. She anſwered, This did not prove her intention to kill the queen. It is proper to obſerve here, ſhe was accuſed of three things, of conſpiring the queen's death; of procuring England to be invaded; and of contriving the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion. She conſidered the firſt as the principal, to which ſhe was very ready to anſwer, well knowing ſhe could not without great injuſtice be condemned for the other two. In anſwer to the proof taken from the teſtimony of her ſecretaries, ſhe ſaid, "She believed Curle the Scot to be an honeſt man [i], but had not the ſame opinion of Naue the Frenchman, who might poſſibly be corrupted: beſides, he abuſed Curle's eaſineſs in ſuch a manner, that he made him write what he pleaſed. In a word, her ſecretaries might inſert in her letters things which ſhe never dictated; and therefore, ſhe ought to be convicted only by her own hand-writing, and not by that of her ſecretaries, who would aſſuredly clear her if they were preſent."

It cannot be denied that this proceeding was very irregular: firſt, becauſe three men had been put to death, on whoſe evidence it was pretended to convict the queen; ſecondly, as her ſecretaries, who were alive, were never brought face to face, though their teſtimony was uſed. This was the more ſtrange, as by an act of parliament paſſed in the 13th year of this very reign, it was expreſly ordained that the witneſſes ſhould be confronted with the parties accuſed.

Upon this account doubtleſs it was, that the lord treaſurer Burleigh, perceiving the embarraſſment occaſioned by the queen's anſwer grounded on the laws of England, thought proper to proceed to other matters. He charged her therefore with having intentions to ſend the king her ſon into Spain, and reſign to Philip II. her right to the kingdom of England. It is eaſy to perceive the firſt of theſe accuſations was very foreign to the purpoſe, ſince the affairs of Scotland were not in diſpute. Accordingly ſhe made no anſwer to it. As to the ſecond, ſhe only ſaid, "That by her birth ſhe was preſumptive heir to queen Elizabeth, and it was lawful to convey her right to whom ſhe pleaſed; but that all this amounted not to any proof of her having conſented to the project of killing the queen."

It being objected to her, that ſhe had ſent an alphabet of cyphers to ſome Roman catholics, as Curle had teſtified, ſhe denied it not, and briefly anſwered, "It was not unlawful to hold correſpondence and negotiate her concerns with men of her religion." But theſe objections ſerved only to divert them from the main point, ſince none of theſe things were contained in the accuſation. At laſt, ſhe was again urged with the teſtimonies of her ſecretaries, to which ſhe made the ſame anſwer as before, proteſting ſhe knew neither Babington nor Ballard. "But (ſaid the lord treaſurer) you know Morgan very well, who ſent Parry over to kill the queen, and have aſſigned him a penſion." To this ſhe anſwered, "She was ignorant of what Morgan had done, but knew that he had loſt all for her ſake, and ſhe might as well give him a penſion, as Elizabeth give one to Patrick Gray and the king himſelf."

Then they proceeded to the other two articles of the impeachment, concerning the invaſion of the kingdom and the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion; and to prove that Mary was concerned in theſe plots, the letters were read which ſhe wrote to Mendoza, Ingleſield, and the lord Paget. She anſwered, "That theſe things did not prove ſhe had any hand in the conſpiracy againſt the queen's life: That ſhe had nothing to ſay to the reſt, and had often declared to the queen herſelf, ſhe would try all methods to procure her own liberty." In this manner paſſed the ſecond ſeſſion.

The next day the court being met, Mary repeated her proteſtation againſt the authority of her judges, and required it to be recorded, and a copy delivered to her. She complained, "That all her offers for an accommodation were rejected [k], and herſelf moſt unworthily dealt with, whilſt all her letters were publicly read, in which were many things no way relating to the impeachment." To this the lord treaſurer replied, "That he was going to anſwer her in a double capacity, as commiſſioner and as privy-counſellor. As commiſſioner, he told her, her proteſtation was recorded, and a copy thereof ſhould be delivered her. As to their authority, it was grounded on the power conferred on them by letters patents under the queen's own hand and the great ſeal. That for the peruſing her letters, which ſhe complained of, it was neceſſary to read them whole and entire, becauſe they contained things, which by their circumſtances were ſo interwoven that there was no ſeparating them. Here ſhe interrupted him, and ſaid, "Though the circumſtances were proved, it would ſignify nothing if the principal fact was not: That her integrity depended not upon the credit of her ſecretaries, ſince they might very poſſibly be corrupted: That theſe letters having no ſuperſcription might be directed to others, and many things inſerted without her knowledge: but if ſhe had her papers, ſhe could the more eaſily vindicate herſelf." The lord treaſurer anſwered, "Nothing ſhould be objected but what paſſed ſince the 19th of June laſt, concerning which her memory could furniſh her with what ſhe thought requiſite for her defence: That her papers would be of no ſervice to her, ſince Babington and her ſecretaries, without being put to the rack, had owned theſe letters came from her: That it was left to the commiſſioners to judge whether more credit were to be given to her bare negation than to their affirmation." He added, as a privy-counſellor, "That it was true ſhe had made ſeveral eſſays to procure her liberty; and if they proved fruitleſs, it was owing to herſelf and the Scots: That the lords of Scotland had refuſed to give the king in hoſtage; and when the laſt treaty was holden concerning her releaſe, Morgan her vaſſal ſent Parry into England to kill the queen." Mary eaſily perceived the venom of theſe words, whereby, under colour of juſtifying the council, the lord treaſurer would have inſinuated to the other commiſſioners, that ſhe was concerned in Parry's plots. Wherefore upon hearing him ſay this, "Ah! (ſaid ſhe) you are my adverſary." "Yes, (ſaid he) I am adverſary to all queen Elizabeth's enemies."

Now were read again her letters to Charles Paget, wherein ſhe told him, there was no other way for the king of Spain to reduce the rebellious Netherlands, but by ſetting a catholic on the throne of England. There was read likewiſe the copy of cardinal Allen's letter to her, wherein he called her his moſt dread ſovereign lady, and told her, the buſineſs was recommended to the prince of Parma's care. She anſwered, ſtill adhering to the firſt article of the impeachment, "That Babington and her ſecretaries had accuſed her to ſave themſelves: That ſhe had never heard of the ſix murderers; and all the reſt was of no ſervice to prove the principal crime ſhe was accuſed of: That ſhe held Allen for a reverend prelate, and acknowledged the pope for the true head of the church; neither could ſhe hinder foreigners from giving her what titles they pleaſed: That as for her ſecretaries, ſhe was willing to add to what ſhe had already ſaid

[g] Thuanus alſo affirms, that Babington and Ballard confeſſed, and their intercepted letters confirmed the ſame, that Mary was informed of the conſpiracy, and the deſign of deſtroying queen Elizabeth was undertaken for her ſake, and upon her account.---Qui ſeorſim interrogati, ac poſt confeſſiones inter ſe commiſſi, atque ex epiſtolis interceptis poſtremo convicti, in eo conveniebant, ut Mariam facti non ignaram, atque ejus cauſſa conjurationem ſuſceptam ad Eliſabetham èmedio tollendam dicerent, l. 86. And the continuator of Hollingſhead ſays, that the conſpirators owned the Scottiſh queen to be the principal comforter, director, and embracer, of theſe treaſons, p. 1578.

[h] Upon her charging Walſingham with forging the letters, he roſe up, and proteſting that his heart was free from all malice, ſaid, "I call God to witneſs that, as a private perſon, I have done nothing unbecoming an honeſt man; neither in my public condition and quality have I done any thing unworthy of my place. I confeſs that, out of my great care for the ſafety of the queen and realm, I have diligently endeavoured to ſearch and ſift out all plots and deſigns againſt the ſame. If Ballard had offered me his aſſiſtance, I ſhould not have refuſed it, yea, I ſhould have rewarded him for his pains and ſervice. If I have tampered any thing with him, why did he not diſcover it to ſave his life?" With this anſwer (ſhe ſaid) ſhe was ſatisfied; and prayed him not to be angry that ſhe had ſpoken ſo freely what ſhe had heard reported; and that he would give no more credit to thoſe that ſlandered her, than ſhe did to ſuch as accuſed him. Spies (ſhe ſaid) were men of little credit; and deſired he would not in the leaſt believe, that ever ſhe had conſented to queen Elizabeth's deſtruction. Camden, p. 523.

of them, that they deſerved no credit; for as they had ſworn ſecrecy to her, they could be deemed no other than perjured perſons, when they gave in their evidence againſt her: That Naue had often wrote otherwiſe than ſhe dictated, and Curle, whatever Naue bid him: That they had poſſibly confeſſed ſeveral falſehoods to ſave their lives, imagining that her royalty would ſcreen her from puniſhment: That ſhe had never heard of any ſuch man as Ballard, but of one Hallard, who had offered her his ſervice, which however ſhe refuſed, becauſe ſhe knew him to be one of Walſingham's ſpies." It muſt be confeſſed, Mary was afforded great advantage in not confronting the witneſſes, though it be a neceſſary formality in criminal trials.

Laſtly were read ſome particular paſſages out of Mary's letters to Mendoza, wherein mention was made of her deſign to convey to the Spaniard her right to the crown of England. To this ſhe anſwered, "That ſhe being cloſe priſoner and in a declining condition, it ſeemed good to her friends, that the ſucceſſion to the crown of England ſhould be ſettled upon the king of Spain, or ſome Engliſh catholic; and that a book was ſent her to juſtify the Spaniards title, which ſhe would not read; but deſpairing to recover her liberty by any other means, ſhe had reſolved not to refuſe foreign aſſiſtance." When ſhe had done ſpeaking, the lord treaſurer aſked her, if ſhe had any more to ſay in her defence [l]? To which ſhe anſwered, "That ſhe required to be heard in full parliament, or before the queen and council [m]." Then the court adjourned till the 25th of October to the Star-chamber at Weſtminſter.

This is Camden's account of the queen of Scots trial at Fotheringhay. As there are no better Memoirs, we are forced as it were to ſuppoſe what he ſays to be true. There is however but too much cauſe to ſuſpect he has curtailed or altered in ſeveral places, what he pretends to take from the Regiſter's Memoirs. For inſtance, it may eaſily be remarked in this narrative, that whatever is objected to the queen of Scots, is indeterminate and general, without deſcending to particulars. Of all the letters that were read for her conviction, he cites not one extract; ſo that ſhe ſeems to have been accuſed of holding a correſpondence by letters with Babington, and other of Elizabeth's enemies, rather than of engaging in a ſettled plot to kill the queen, though this was the principal point. In a word, this hiſtorian's partiality for the queen of Scots on other occaſions, gives reaſon to think, he did not forget himſelf in this capital article, but uſed all his art to render doubtful the fact ſhe was accuſed of. However, as this is only a conjecture, I do not pretend to inſiſt upon it [n]. I ſhall content myſelf, in order to clear the affair, with making ſome obſervations on this famous trial.

It is hardly to be queſtioned that Mary's death was determined, when Elizabeth and her council reſolved to have her tried by commiſſioners. But it muſt not be imagined, their intention was to puniſh her for attempting the life of Elizabeth. If that had been all, they would never have proceeded to extremities, but would doubtleſs have been ſatisfied with putting it out of her power to contrive any ſuch plots for the future, which would have been eaſy, by confining her more cloſely. But it was not ſo eaſy to hinder the pope, the king of Spain, the houſe of Guiſe, the Engliſh catholics, the Iriſh, the Scottiſh malcontents, from conſidering her as a princeſs to whom of right belonged the two crowns of England and Scotland, and from uſing their continual endeavours to reſtore her to the throne of Scotland, and place her on that of England, even in Elizabeth's life-time. Though ſhe had been ſo cloſely confined, that ſhe could not herſelf have been concerned in theſe plots, it would not have prevented her friends from acting in her favour. Nothing therefore but her death could break their meaſures, and put an end to the plots which were daily framing on her account. So, it might with truth be ſaid, that as Elizabeth's death was Mary's life, ſo Mary's death alone could preſerve Elizabeth, and with her, liberty and the proteſtant religion in England. But as it was not likely Mary, who was the younger, ſhould die firſt by a natural death, recourſe was to be had to violence, that the queen and the realm might be freed from their imminent danger. The ſhare Mary had in Babington's conſpiracy, and which probably was greater than what Camden intimates, was not therefore the cauſe of her condemnation, but the pretence uſed to be rid of a queen, on whoſe life Elizabeth's adverſaries built all their hopes. It was therefore Mary's own friends that occaſioned her misfortune by ſerving her too zealouſly, or rather by making her their inſtrument to execute their grand projects againſt the proteſtant religion. The pope flattered himſelf with reſtoring, by her means, the catholic religion in England; and the Engliſh catholics looked upon her as the only perſon that could free them from the intolerable yoke of a proteſtant government. Philip II. ſaw no other way to ſubdue the Netherlands. In ſhort, the houſe of Guiſe, whoſe ambitious projects are well known, thought to find in her an infallible means to cruſh the Hugonots of France, who ſupported the title of the lawful heir to the crown of that kingdom. Mary herſelf gave too much countenance to all theſe plots. She was ſo important, as, being a priſoner, inceſſantly to confound two things, which could well be diſtinguiſhed and ſeparated; I mean, her liberty, and her title to the crown of England. She thereby gave Elizabeth occaſion to confound them too, and to ruin her, in order to preſerve her own life and crown.

Theſe were the real motives of Mary's condemnation. If we conſider them politically, they may be ſaid to be good and neceſſary; but it happens very frequently that policy is repugnant to juſtice and equity. Upon this condemnation it is that Elizabeth's enemies have triumphed, and indeed it is a very fit ſubject for rhetoric. But if it is conſidered who they were that exclaimed the loudeſt againſt Elizabeth, they will be found to be the very perſons who would have murdered her to ſet Mary on the throne of England. Had they ſucceeded in their deſign, would their deed have been more juſt or more agreeable to the precepts of the chriſtian religion? Doubtleſs it would, were the thing to be tried by the principles of the adverſaries to Elizabeth and her religion. But if it were allowed by the laws of religion, juſtice, and equity, to take away the life of Elizabeth, in order to ſet Mary on the throne, and reſtore the catholic religion in England, was it leſs allowable for the Engliſh to put Mary to death, in order to preſerve their queen and religion from the deſtruction they were continually threatened with? Let us ſay rather, theſe maxims are equally blameable and repugnant to the rules of the Goſpel, to whatever party they are applied.

Having ſeen the real motives of queen Mary's condemnation, there is no great cauſe to wonder at the irregularities to be obſerved in her trial. The point was not ſo much to puniſh her for her part in the plot, as to ſatisfy the public ſhe was concerned in it, that her condemnation might be thought the leſs ſtrange, or rather abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of England. The queen and the council believed to have ſufficient evidence, that Mary was acquainted with the conſpiracy, had conſented to it, and promoted the execution to the utmoſt of her power. This ſufficed for their deſign. They knew the people would eaſily excuſe ſome irregularities in an affair where their own perſervation was concerned.

Since therefore Mary's condemnation can be conſidered only as the effect of Elizabeth's policy, it is in vain that the following queries are put concerning her trial. 1. What authority had Elizabeth over her? 2. Whether Mary could be conſidered as ſubject to the laws of England, under colour that ſhe had lived there eighteen years, being a priſoner? 3. Whether it could be ſaid, ſhe had enjoyed during that time the protection of the laws, and be thence inferred that ſhe ought to be liable to them? 4. Whether, even upon ſuch a ſuppoſition, ſhe had enjoyed in her trial the benefit of the laws of England? 5. Whether ſhe were tried by her peers according to the conſtant and immutable privilege of the Engliſh? 6. Who could be her peers? 7. Whether Elizabeth's commiſſion was according to law? 8. Whether the formalities requiſite in a trial of this nature were obſerved? 9. Whether ſhe can be ſaid to have been legally convicted by the teſtimony of perſons that were dead, and whom it lay in Elizabeth's breaſt to keep alive and bring face to face? 10. Whether the evidence of her ſecretaries, who were ſtill alive, could be deemed valid without being confronted, contrary to expreſs acts of parliament? 11. Whether a captive queen's conſent to the invaſion of a kingdom, were ſhe is unjuſtly detained, is a crime worthy of death? 12. Whether the letters in cypher, wrote by her ſecretaries, were a ſufficient proof that the whole contents were dictated by her? 13. Laſtly, ſuppoſing ſhe had given a full and entire conſent to the plot, whether the manner of her being detained in England, her long confinement, the loſs of her kingdom procured partly by Elizabeth's ſecret practices, did not merit, that her crime ſhould be reckoned of a different nature from that of a ſubject who conſpires againſt his ſovereign? I do not think it poſſible to vindicate Elizabeth upon each of theſe queries. We muſt therefore keep to the neceſſity ſhe was under of deſtroying Mary to ſave herſelf, and juſtify her by the natural law of ſelf-preſervation, the only one which can be pleaded in her favour [o].

[l] Before Burleigh aſked her this, the ſollicitor put the commiſſioners in mind what would become of them, their honours, eſtates, and poſterities, if the kingdom were aſſigned to the Spaniard. But the lord treaſurer ſhewed, the kingdom of England could not be conveyed at all, but was to deſcend by right of ſucceſſion, according to the laws; and then aſked the queen, if ſhe had any more to ſay? Camden, p. 525.

The commiſſioners being aſſembled [p] in the Star-chamber at Weſtminſter, the 25th of October, ſent for Naur and Curle, who confirmed upon oath their former evidence, after which ſentence was pronounced. It ran in general, that Mary had broken the ſtatute paſſed the laſt year. This is all that was divulged. It is not known whether the commiſſioners expreſly condemned the queen of Scots to die, or whether, after their judgment of the fact, they left it to the laws and the queen to decide what puniſhment the crime deſerved. What follows is all that was publiſhed afterwards by the queen's order. "That ſince the 1ſt day of June, in the 27th year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, divers matters have been compaſſed and imagined within this realm of England, by Anthony Babington and others, with the privity of the ſaid Mary, tending to the hurt, death, and deſtruction of our ſaid lady the queen. And alſo, that ſince the aforeſaid day, the ſaid Mary pretending a title to the crown of this realm, has compaſſed and imagined, within this realm, divers matters tending to the deſtruction of the royal perſon of our ſovereign lady the queen, contrary to the tenor of the ſtatute in the commiſſion aforeſaid ſpecified."

It is eaſy to perceive by this very extract, that the ſentence muſt have been longer and fuller, as may be judged by the terms of the "ſaid Mary," which ſhew that ſhe was mentioned before. But the queen thought not proper to publiſh more of it. The author of the book entitled, "The Hiſtory of the Martyrdom of Mary Stuart," ſays, ſo great care was taken to conceal the ſentence, that he could never poſſibly recover a copy of it, notwithſtanding all his pains. "Without doubt (continues he) there were myſteries in it which were not to be divulged."

The ſame day the ſentence was pronounced, the judges declared, it did nothing derogate from the king of Scotland, that is, his title to the crown of England did ſtill remain intire. But was it their buſineſs to give ſuch a determination concerning the ſucceſſion, when they were not impowered by their commiſſion? It is viſible, they acted by the queen's direction, who was willing by this means to pacify the king of Scotland. Otherwiſe, the judges would not have taken upon them to make ſuch a declaration, which was beyond their power.

The parliament meeting four days after [q], and the 29th of October, approved and confirmed the ſentence given againſt the queen of Scots. But whether this was without a perfect knowledge or upon a diligent enquiry, it is hard to know, though afterwards Elizabeth pretended it was not till after a long and ſerious examination [r]. However, the parliament having confirmed the ſentence, preſented a petition to the queen, beſeeching her to order it to be put in execution. The petition contained reaſons taken not from the heinouſneſs of the crime, but the danger to which Elizabeth and the realm would be expoſed, if the queen of Scots were ſuffered to live [s]. The queen returned to the petition an anſwer, the intent whereof was to ſhew the parliament ſhe was extremely troubled and irreſolute. She had a mind to inſinuate, ſhe was inclined to mercy, but that her affection for her people extremely embarraſſed her. It was eaſy to conclude from this ſpeech, ſhe deſired to be preſſed, that ſhe might not ſeem to act from a motive of revenge. Here follows the anſwer, which perfectly diſcovers Elizabeth's character.

"SO many and ſo great are the bottomleſs graces and immeaſurable benefits beſtowed upon me by the Almighty, that I muſt not only moſt humbly acknowledge them as benefits, but admire them as miracles, being in no ſort able to expreſs them. And though there liveth not any, that may more juſtly acknowledge himſelf bound to God than I, whoſe life he hath miraculouſly preſerved from ſo many dangers; yet am I not more deeply bound to give him thanks for any one thing, than for this which I will now tell you, and which I account as a miracle, namely, That as I came to the crown with the moſt hearty good-will of all my ſubjects, ſo now after a twenty-eight years reign, I perceive in them the ſame, if not greater good-will towards me; which if once I loſe, well might I breathe, but never think I lived. And now though my life hath been dangerouſly ſhot at, yet I proteſt there is nothing hath more grieved me, than that one not differing from me in ſex, of like rank and degree, of the ſame ſtock, and moſt nearly allied unto me in blood, hath fallen into ſo a great a crime. And ſo far have I been from bearing her any ill-will, that upon the diſcovery of certain treaſonable practices againſt me, I wrote unto her ſecretly, that if ſhe would confeſs them by a private letter unto myſelf, they ſhould be wrapped up in ſilence. Neither did I write thus in mind to intrap her, for I knew then as much as ſhe could confeſs. And even yet, though the matter be come thus far, if ſhe would truly repent, and no man would undertake her cauſe againſt me, and if my life alone depended hereupon, and not the ſafety and welfare of my whole people, I would (I proteſt unfeignedly) moſt willingly pardon her. Nay, if England might by my death obtain a more flouriſhing eſtate, and a better prince, I would moſt gladly lay down my life. For, for your ſakes it is, and for my people's, that I deſire to live. As for me, I ſee no ſuch great cauſe why I ſhould either be fond to live, or fear to die. I have had good experience of this world; and I know what it to be a ſubject, and what to be a ſovereign. Good neighbours I have had, and I have met with bad; and in truſt I have found treaſon. I have beſtowed benefits upon ill-deſervers; and where I have done well, have been ill requited. While I call to mind theſe things paſt, behold things preſent, and expect things to come; I hold them happieſt that go hence ſooneſt. Nevertheleſs, againſt ſuch miſchiefs as theſe, I put on a better courage than is common to my ſex; ſo as whatſoever befal me, death ſhall not take me unprepared.

"And as touching theſe treaſons, I will not ſo prejudicate myſelf or the laws of my kingdom, as not but to think that ſhe, having been the contriver of the ſame treaſons, was bound and liable to the ancient laws, though the late act had never been made. So far was it from being made to intrap her, that it was rather intended to forewarn and terrify her from attempting any thing againſt it. But ſeeing it was now in force of a law, I thought good to proceed againſt her according to the ſame. But you lawyers are ſo curious in ſcanning the nice points of the law, and following of precedents and form, rather than expounding the laws themſelves, that by exact obſerving of your form, ſhe muſt have been indicted in Staffordſhire, and have holden up her hand at the bar, and have been tried by a jury of twelve men. A proper courſe, forſooth, of tryal againſt a princeſs! To avoid therefore ſuch abſurdities, I thought it better to refer the examination of ſo weighty a cauſe to a good number of the nobleſt perſonages of the land, and the judges of the realm; and all little enough. For we princes are ſet as it were upon ſtages in the ſight and view of all the world: the leaſt ſpot is ſoon ſpied in our garments, a blemiſh quickly noted in our doings. It behoveth us therefore to be careful that our proceedings be juſt and honourable. But I muſt tell you one thing, that by this laſt act of parliament, you have brought me to a narrow ſtraight, that I muſt give order for her death, which is a princeſs moſt nearly allied unto me in blood, and whoſe practices againſt me have ſtricken me into ſo great grief, that I have been glad to abſent myſelf from this parliament [t], leſt I ſhould increaſe my ſorrow, by hearing it ſpoken of, and not out of fear of any danger, as ſome think. But yet I will now tell you a ſecret (though it is well known that I have the property to keep counſel), it is not long ſince theſe eyes of mine ſaw and read an oath, wherein ſome bound themſelves to kill me within a month. Hereby I ſee your danger in me, which I will be very careful to avoid.

"Your aſſociation for my ſafety I have not forgotten, [o] This is indeed the beſt, and the only excuſe that can be alleged in vindication of queen Elizabeth. Accordingly, Dr. Welwood obſerves, "That when every day produced ſome new conſpiracy againſt the life of queen Elizabeth, and that in moſt of them the queen of Scots was concerned, either as a party, or the occaſion, queen Elizabeth was put under a fatal neceſſity of either taking off the queen of Scots, or expoſing her own perſon to the frequent attempts of her enemies." Memoirs, p. 13. Du Maurier alſo expreſly ſays, That queen Mary was the cauſe of her own ruin, by her reſtleſs temper, and her repeated deſigns againſt queen Elizabeth's life. Preface to his Memoirs. For queen Mary's friends would never ſuffer her to be quiet, but were eternally plotting and contriving, bribing and conſpiring, how to murder queen Elizabeth, and ſet up the queen of Scots in her ſtead, to reſtore their beloved popery here in England. [r] In the Journals of the Houſe of Lords it is ſaid, that the committees of both houſes, "upon hearing the ſentence, and divers of the ſpecial evidences and proofs whereupon the ſentence was grounded, openly read unto them, after long deliberation and conſultation had betwixt them, both publicly and privately, they all with one aſſent allowed the ſame ſentence to be juſt, true, and honourable." which I never ſo much as thought of, till a great number of hands, with many obligations, were ſhewed me. Which as I do acknowledge as a ſtrong argument of your true hearts and great zeal to my ſafety, ſo ſhall my bond be ſtronger tied to a great care for your good. But foraſmuch as this matter now in hand is very rare, and of greateſt conſequence, I hope you do not look for any preſent reſolution: for my manner is, in matters of leſs moment than this, to deliberate long upon that which is once to be reſolved. In the mean time, I beſeech Almighty God to illuminate my mind, that I may foreſee that which may ſerve for the good of his church, the proſperity of the commonwealth, and your ſafety. And that delay may not breed danger, we will ſignify our reſolution with all conveniency. And whatever the beſt ſubjects may expect at the hands of the beſt princeſs, that expect from me to be performed to the full."

It is not very difficult to perceive in this ſpeech, notwithſtanding her affected obſcurity, the double view Elizabeth propoſed to herſelf. One was to make the public believe, ſhe could not, without extreme concern, reſolve to put the queen of Scots to death: the other, to inſinuate to the parliament, that there was a neceſſity of diſpatching queen Mary, or reſolving to loſe the beſt of queens, who was very ready to lay down her life for the good of her ſubjects. She dwelt chiefly upon her tenderneſs for her people, that they might fear to be deprived of ſo gracious a queen, and earneſtly require the death of her adverſary. But leſt the parliament's affection for her ſhould not be ſufficiently ſtrong, ſhe took care to hint ſeveral times, that their own ſafety depended on her preſervation. She ſaid, if her welfare only were at ſtake, ſhe would readily pardon, ſince ſhe was not fond of life; but that it was ſolely the danger of the ſtate which made her uneaſy. Was not this very plainly ſaying, the death of the queen of Scots was neceſſary for the ſafety of the realm? She would have it believed, ſhe was inclined to favour Mary, but alleged no reaſon for her. On the contrary, ſhe uſed the arguments of ſex and kindred to aggravate her crime, and clearly ſet forth the reaſons which might determine her to conſent to her death. She magnified the care ſhe had taken, not to ſuffer her dignity to be debaſed by trying her like a common perſon. This was all the favour ſhe ſhewed her. But what favour was it to give her judges, among whom were her greateſt enemies, perſons who had before voted againſt her in the council, and had been for bringing her to a trial; Hatton, one of the judges, drew her into a ſnare by perſuading her to anſwer for herſelf, and the lord treaſurer acted in ſome meaſure the part of an accuſer. On the other hand, we ſee in ſeveral of Walſingham's letters ſent from France when he was embaſſador, that it was his opinion, Elizabeth could never be ſafe ſo long as the queen of Scots was alive. Was it not a great favour to give her ſuch judges? In ſhort, with what intent did Elizabeth tell the parliament, ſhe knew for certain ſome had bound themſelves by an oath to kill her within a month? Was it not to incite the two houſes to prevent this misfortune by the ſpeedy execution of the ſentence againſt Mary? All this ſhews, that her aim was to engage the parliament to preſs her upon that head, that ſhe might in ſome meaſure be juſtified to the world, by aſcribing the execution of the ſentence to the inſtances of the parliament. But the ſequel will ſtill more plainly ſhew it.

On the 12th day after, the queen ſent the lord chancellor to the upper houſe, and Puckering[u] to the lower, to deſire them to find ſome expedient, whereby the queen of Scots life might be ſaved, and her own ſafety provided for. The two houſes, after a ſerious debate, anſwered her, that her ſafety could not poſſibly be ſecured ſo long as the queen of Scots lived. That there were but four ways to be deviſed to that end, which were all inſufficient. The firſt was, that the queen of Scots ſhould ſeriouſly repent: but ſuch a repentance was not to be expected, ſince ſhe would not ſo much as acknowledge her fault. The ſecond, that ſhe ſhould be kept with a cloſer guard, and bound to her good demeanour by bond and oath. The third, that ſhe ſhould give hoſtages. But theſe two ways were inſufficient, ſince if the queen's life were once taken away, all theſe precautions would vaniſh. The fourth, that ſhe ſhould depart the kingdom. But this was the moſt dangerous: for if, whilſt a priſoner, ſhe ſtirred up ſo many in her favour, what would ſhe do if ſhe were at liberty? In a word, the two houſes in their anſwer repreſented to the queen, that if it were juſtice to deny execution of the law to the meaneſt of her ſubjects, how much more to the whole body of the people, unanimouſly and with one voice ſuing for the ſame. They who have the leaſt knowledge what influence the court party uſually have upon the two houſes, will very eaſily judge, that the parliament would never have expreſſed themſelves in this manner, if they had not known it to be grateful to the queen. But to diſcover more fully Elizabeth's character, it will be neceſſary to inſert her anſwer, which will evidently ſhew, not her perplexity and uncertainty, as ſhe pretended, but her extreme diſſimulation, on this article.

"FULL grievous is the way, whoſe going on and end yield nothing but cumber for the hire of a laborious journey. I have this day been in greater conflict with myſelf, than ever in all my life, whether I ſhould ſpeak, or hold my peace. If I ſpeak, and not complain, I ſhall diſſemble; and if I ſhould be ſilent, your labour taken were all in vain. If I ſhould complain, it might ſeem ſtrange and rare. Yet I confeſs, that my moſt hearty deſire was, that ſome other means might have been deviſed to work your ſecurity and my ſafety, than this which is now propounded. So I cannot but complain, though not of you, yet unto you, that I perceive by your petitions, that my ſafety dependeth wholly upon the death of another. If there be any that think I have prolonged the time, of purpoſe to make a counterfeit ſhew of clemency, they do me the moſt undeſerved wrong, as he knoweth which is the ſearcher of the moſt ſecret thoughts of the heart. Or if there be any that be perſuaded, that the commiſſioners durſt not pronounce other ſentence, as fearing thereby to diſpleaſe me, or to ſeem to fail of their care for my ſafety, they do but heap upon me moſt injurious conceits. For either thoſe whom I have put in truſt have failed of their duties; or elſe they ſignified unto the commiſſioners in my name, that my will and pleaſure was, that every one ſhould deal freely, according to his conſcience: and what they would not openly declare, that they ſhould reveal unto me in private. It was of my moſt favourable mind towards her, that I deſired ſome other means might be found out to prevent this miſchief. But ſince now it is reſolved, that my ſurety is moſt deſperate without her death, I have a moſt inward feeling of ſorrow, that I, which have in my time pardoned ſo many rebels, winked at ſo many treaſons, or neglected them with ſilence, muſt now ſeem to ſhew cruelty upon ſo great a princeſs.

"I have, ſince I came to the crown of this realm, ſeen many defamatory books and pamphlets againſt me, accuſing me to be a tyrant. Well fare the writers hearts; I believe their meaning was to tell me news. And news indeed it was to me, to be branded with the note of tyranny. I would it were as great news to hear of their impiety. But what is it which they will not write now, when they ſhall hear that I have given conſent that the executioner's hands ſhould be imbrued in the blood of my neareſt kinſwoman? But ſo far am I from cruelty, that, to ſave mine own life, I would not offer her violence: neither have I been ſo careful how to preſerve mine own life, as how to preſerve both: which that it is now impoſſible, I grieve exceedingly. I am not void of judgment, as not to ſee mine own perils before mine eyes; nor ſo mad to ſharpen a ſword to cut mine own throat; nor ſo careleſs as not to provide for the ſafety of mine own life. But this I conſider with myſelf, that many a man would put his own life in danger to ſave a princeſs's life: I do not ſay, ſo will I. Yet have I many times thought upon it.

"But ſeeing ſo many have both written and ſpoken againſt me, give me leave, I pray you, to ſay ſomewhat in my own defence, that ye may ſee what manner of woman I am, for whoſe ſafety you have paſſed ſuch careful thoughts. Wherein as I do with moſt thankful heart conſider your vigilant care; ſo am I ſure I ſhall never requite it, had I as many lives as you all.

"When firſt I took the ſcepter, I was not unmindful of God the giver, and therefore began my reign with his ſervice, and the religion I have been both born in, bred in, and I truſt ſhall die in. And though I was not ignorant how many perils I ſhould be ſet withal at home for altering religion, and how many great princes abroad of a contrary profeſſion would attempt all hoſtility againſt me; yet was I no whit diſmayed, knowing that God, whom only I reſpected, would defend both me and my cauſe. Hence it is, that ſo many treacheries and conſpiracies have been attempted againſt me, that I rather marvel that I am, than muſe that I ſhould now be alive at this day, were it not that God's holy hand hath protected me beyond all expectation. Then, to the end I might make the better progreſs in the art of ſwaying the ſcepter, I entered into long and ſerious cogitations, what things were worthy and fitting for kings to do; and I found it moſt neceſſary that they ſhould be abundantly furniſhed with thoſe ſpecial virtues, juſtice, temperance, prudence, and magnanimity. As for the two latter I will not boaſt myſelf, my ſex doth not permit it. But for the two former, I dare ſay (and that without oſtentation) I never made a difference of perſons where right was one. I never preferred for favour whom I thought not fit for worth: I never bent my ear to credit a tale that was firſt told; nor was ſo raſh to corrupt my judgment with prejudice, before I heard the cauſe. I will not ſay but many reports might haply be brought me into much favour of the one ſide or the other; for we princes cannot hear all ourſelves. Yet this I dare ſay boldly, my judgment ever went with the truth, according to my underſtanding. And as full well Alcibiades wiſhed his friend not to give any anſwer till he had run over the letters of the alphabet; ſo have I not uſed raſh and ſudden reſolutions in any thing.

"And therefore as touching your counſels and conſultations, I acknowledge them to be ſo careful, provident, and profitable for the preſervation of my life, and to proceed from minds ſo ſincere, and to me moſt devoted, that I ſhall endeavour myſelf all I can to give you cauſe to think your pains not ill beſtowed, and ſtrive to make myſelf worthy of ſuch ſubjects.

"And now for your petition, I pray you for this preſent to content yourſelves with an anſwer without anſwer. Your judgment I condemn not, neither do I miſtake your reaſons; but pray to accept my thankfulneſs, excuſe my doubtfulneſs, and take in good part my anſwer anſwerleſs. If I ſhould ſay, I would not do what you requeſt, I might ſay perhaps more than I think; and if I ſhould ſay I would do it, I might plunge myſelf into peril, whom you labour to preſerve, which in your wiſdoms and diſcretions, ye would not that I ſhould, if ye conſider the circumſtances of place, time, and the manners and conditions of men."

This ſpeech, which was of the ſame nature and ſpirit with the former, was not an anſwer to the petition of the two houſes, as the queen herſelf owned, but only an intimation to the Engliſh, how imprudent it would to hazard the life of ſo good a queen, in order to ſave Mary's. She ſeemed in a great perplexity, and yet gave to underſtand, ſhe was fully determined. And indeed ſince ſhe perferred the good of her ſubjects before all other things, and Mary's death was neceſſary to them, what could be the occaſion of her doubts? In comparing the reaſons which inclined her to mercy with thoſe which concerned her own ſafety, there was need of no great penetration to ſee to which ſide ſhe would turn, howſoever irreſolute ſhe ſeemed. So in this, as in the former ſpeech, her ſole aim was to make the public believe ſhe yielded with reluctancy to the ſollicitations of the parliament, though ſhe took care not to object any ſtrong reaſons to theſe ſollicitations. But her actions were ſtill plainer indications than her ſpeeches of what paſſed in her mind.

Immediately after this anſwer without anſwer, the parliament was prorogued[w], for fear doubtleſs her feigned perplexities ſhould be taken literally, and ſome expedient found to ſave the queen of Scots. After what had been done, Elizabeth had no farther occaſion for the parliament; and in cauſing the ſentence to be executed, could ſay, ſhe only yielded to the preſſing inſtances of the two houſes. It will perhaps be thought ſtrange that I am thus peremptory in a thing ſo hard to be known, as Elizabeth's inmoſt thoughts. But in my opinion, very evident proofs may be drawn both from her actions and words, that throughout this whole affair ſhe acted with great diſſimulation.

A few days after the prorogation of the parliament, the lord Buckhurſt and Beale were ſent to the queen of Scots. They had orders to tell her, that her judges had condemned her to die, that the parliament had confirmed the ſentence, and deſired the execution thereof, believing, if ſhe remained alive, the religion eſtabliſhed in England could not ſubſiſt. She received the news with great reſolution, and even ſeemed to triumph that religion was the cauſe of her death[x]. Then ſhe ſaid with ſome emotion, "It is no wonder if the Engliſh, who have often put their own ſovereigns to death, ſhould treat in the ſame manner a princeſs ſprung from the blood of their kings."

L'Aubeſpine the French embaſſador, who was entirely devoted to the houſe of Guiſe, ſtopped for ſome days the publication of the ſentence by his ſollicitations. But at laſt it was proclaimed all over London[y] by the queen's expreſs order, who forgot not to declare to the people that her conſent was extorted by the preſſing intreaties of the parliament. In the proclamation the queen ſaid, that being informed of the queen of Scots' devices, the lords of the council, with many others, earneſtly beſought her to bring her to juſtice, and try her in the moſt honourable manner. That upon theſe inſtances ſhe granted a commiſſion to forty-two lords, thirty-ſix of whom met at Fotheringhay, and after a very ſtrict examination, gave ſentence to this effect: "That Mary had broken the ſtatute made the laſt year." That the parliament having examined the ſentence, and the proofs on which it was founded, required the execution thereof, notwithſtanding her frequent inſtances, that ſome other expedient might be found: that therefore moved with her own and the nation's welfare, ſhe had ordered the ſentence to be notified to her good ſubjects.

Mary, when ſhe received the news of this publication, plainly ſaw there was no mercy to be expected. She wrote a long letter to Elizabeth, deſiring certain favours concerning her death, burial, and ſervants[z]. But it is uncertain whether the letter was ever delivered. The king of Scotland wrote alſo to queen Elizabeth, and ſent Patrick Gray and Robert Melvil to implore her mercy for the queen his mother; but it was to no purpoſe. Nay, it is ſaid, Gray, who had been many years attached to Elizabeth's intereſts, after having publicly ſollicited her to favour Mary, adviſed her in private to make away with her, ſaying, "A dead woman bites not."

Henry III. ſent alſo the preſident de Bellievere into England, to intreat Elizabeth in behalf of the condemned queen. The embaſſador diſcharged his commiſſion like a man who ſeemed very deſirous to ſucceed. He preſented a long memorial, which was publiſhed, containing the ſtrongeſt reaſons he could deviſe to perſuade Elizabeth to ſpare the unfortunate queen; to which memorial the queen returned an anſwer in the margin of each article. The ſubſtance of the anſwers was, "That things were come to that point, that one or other of the two queens muſt periſh, and Elizabeth flattered herſelf that the king of France had her intereſts no leſs at heart than Mary's." But if du Maurier is to be credited, in his preface to his father's Memoirs, the embaſſador acted the counterfeit, and impoſed upon the world and Mary's friends. He affirms to have heard his father ſay, that Bellievere, though he feigned to have inſtructions to the contrary, had private orders to ſollicit the death of the queen of Scots[a]. This is not unlikely, conſidering the ſituation of the affairs of France at that time, and the king's juſt apprehenſions of the duke of Guiſe's ambitious deſigns[b].

Whilſt all the world was in expectation of the effects of this extraordinary ſentence, the court diſcovered that L'Aubeſpine the French embaſſador had bribed two aſſaſſins[c] to murder the queen. One of the villains repenting, and informing the miniſters of the plot, the embaſſador was deſired to come to the lord treaſurer's houſe, where the council was aſſembled, and the two witneſſes were brought face to face. If Camden is to be credited, he made but an ill defence, contenting himſelf with pleading the privilege of embaſſadors, who were accountable only to their own maſters. The lord treaſurer,

The clergy granted alſo a ſubſidy of ſix ſhillings in the pound, to be paid in three years. And moreover, gave a contribution or benevolence of three ſhillings in the pound for the ſupport of the wars in the Netherlands. And without allowing or diſputing the privilege, gravely reproved him, and adviſed him to beware for the future how he provoked a queen, who was too much injured already, and had it in her power to be revenged. It muſt be obſerved, the French tranſlator of Camden's Annals thought fit to paſs over in ſilence this whole conſpiracy.

It was no proper ſeaſon to inquire any farther into the circumſtances of this plot, which probably was entirely owing to the embaſſador's furious zeal for the houſe of Lorrain. Nay, who knows whether it was not a ſnare laid for him, to make him inſtrumental, contrary to his intention, in haſtening the queen of Scots execution? When the affair became public, it was every where ſaid, there was no ſafety for the queen ſo long as Mary was alive. This was preciſely what the court wiſhed, that the people being ſatisfied of the neceſſity of executing the ſentence, might be leſs attentive to the irregularities. Camden ſays, Elizabeth was ſtill in ſuſpence, and diſtracted in her thoughts, not being able to reſolve to put to death a queen her near relation, over whom ſhe had no juriſdiction. He adds, means were found however to determine her, by ſpreading a report that England was going to be invaded: That the Spaniſh fleet was already arrived at Milford Haven: That the duke of Guiſe was landed in Suſſex with an army: That the queen of Scots was eſcaped out of priſon, and was raiſing troops in the North: That ſeveral plots were on foot to kill the queen, and ſet the city of London on fire; yea, that the queen was dead. By theſe artifices, according to that hiſtorian, Elizabeth was prevailed with to ſign a warrant for Mary's execution. For my part, who verily believe Mary's death was reſolved, even before her trial, I rather think all theſe reports were ſpread by the emiſſaries of the court, to terrify the people, and to let them ſee how neceſſary Mary's death was. There is not the leaſt probability that the queen and her miniſters ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be deceived by ſuch reports, the falſhood whereof it was ſo eaſy for them to diſcover. But Camden's aim is to inſinuate, that Elizabeth was convinced of Mary's innocence, and therefore diſtracted in her thoughts.

We are now come to the laſt act of the tragedy, for ſo it may well be called with reſpect to the queen of Scots, though with regard to Elizabeth it was a real comedy, or at leaſt a continued ſcene of diſſimulation, acted ſo artfully, that it can hardly be conceived how it could be carried farther. Before Elizabeth ordered the commiſſion to try Mary to be drawn, ſeveral lords, as I ſaid, caſt themſelves at her feet, and begged her to take pity of them and their poſterity, and to provide by Mary's death for the ſecurity of the church and ſtate. Afterwards, when ſentence was given, ſhe waited till ſhe was twice ſollicited by the parliament, with the ſharp reproach that ſhe denied her people juſtice. To carry on the farce, ſome formalities were likewiſe to be acted after the publication of the ſentence, before the warrant was ſigned for execution. All this was done: but there was ſtill ſomething more. Elizabeth undertook to make the public believe the execution was done againſt her will, and without her knowledge, and the method ſhe uſed to accompliſh it was this.

Daviſon, without his knowing it, was her inſtrument to act this ſort of comedy. A little before the queen of Scots trial, he was made ſecretary of ſtate, and very likely was put into that office on purpoſe to be inſnared and made accountable for Mary's death. All the forementioned rumours being ſpread, and the queen feigning to be terrified, delivered to Daviſon a writing ſigned with her own hand, and ſealed with her ſignet, commanding him to draw a warrant under the great ſeal for the queen of Scots execution, but enjoined him withal to keep the warrant by him [d], and acquaint no man therewith [e]. The lord chancellor however muſt have been informed of it, unleſs ſhe had taken the great ſeal from him and given it to Daviſon, of which there have been inſtances. However, the next day ſhe ordered Daviſon by Killigrew not to draw the warrant [f]. Whereupon Daviſon came to the queen, and told her, it was drawn and under ſeal already; at which ſhe was angry, and blamed him for making ſuch haſte. The warrant was dated the 1ſt of February, and directed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Derby, Kent, Cumberland, and Pembroke, to ſee the queen of Scots executed in their preſence. Mean while, though the queen ſeemed diſpleaſed with the ſecretary for making too much haſte, ſhe left the warrant in his hands, without telling him what he was to do with it. This puzzled him extremely, ſince by her contrary proceedings with reſpect to the warrant, ſhe had not diſcloſed to him her intention. In this uncertainty, he choſe to impart the tranſaction to a privy counſellor, who was of opinion that the reſt of the counſellors ſhould be informed, that nothing might be done raſhly; and Daviſon fell into the ſnare. Whereupon the council being met, it was unanimouſly reſolved to execute the warrant, though nothing was eaſier than to advertiſe the queen of their embarraſſment. To that end, the warrant was given to Beal, who took care to acquaint the four lords, to whom it was addreſſed, and departed for Fortheringhay with two executioners. Certainly, it is very hard to believe that a ſcore of privy counſellors (among whom were the queen's miniſters and her intimate confidents) would have undertaken to order the warrant to be executed unknown to her [g], had they not been perſuaded it was agreeable to her will. Eſpecially as Daviſon had communicated the ſecret to them, only becauſe of his uncertainty concerning the queen's intention [h].

After Beal's departure, the queen told Daviſon, ſhe had changed her mind. This ought to have aſtoniſhed the council, who had ordered execution by their own authority; and yet no care was taken to recal Beal, though there were ſeven days ſpace between his departure and Mary's execution. But what is ſtill more ſtrange, is, that during theſe ſeven days, though the queen had declared that her mind was altered, not one of her counſellors or miniſters thought of informing her of what was tranſacting. This is a clear evidence, that it was very well known ſhe did not deſire to be informed.

However this be, the four lords, appointed to ſee execution done, being come to Fotheringhay, admoniſhed the queen of Scots to prepare for her death [i]; and on the morrow, being the 8th of February, they ſaw her beheaded. I ſhall not relate here all the circumſtances of this tragedy. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that ſhe died with great reſolution, and in an inviolabe attachment to her religion. The earl of Kent telling her, "That her life would be the death of the proteſtant religion in England," ſhe rejoiced and ſaid, ſhe was condemned as guilty of plotting againſt the queen of England's life, and yet the earl of Kent had juſt told her, ſhe was to die for her religion, wherein ſhe gloried. If Camden is to be credited, ſhe proteſted ſhe knew nothing of Babington's practices, and that her ſecretaries were ſuborned to witneſs againſt her [k].

The news of Mary's execution being brought to Elizabeth, ſhe appeared extremely diſpleaſed. Sighs, tears, lamentation, [d] And only have it in readineſs, in caſe any danger happened to break out in that time of jealouſy and fear. Camden, p. 534. Melvil ſays, that it was not to be delivered without her majeſty's expreſs command; nevertheleſs, Daviſon being deceived by the council, delivered it to them, p. 172.

[e] This Daviſon abſolutely denied in his examination. See Strype's Ann. tom. III. p. 375.

[f] Rapin ſays, the queen ſent Daviſon word to haſten the warrant. But it is a miſtake; for Camden ſays, the queen changed her mind, and ſent to him not to draw it. Camden, p. 534.

[g] And yet Thuanus thinks ſo, l. 86.

[h] Camden ſays, Daviſon perſuaded the council that the queen had commanded it ſhould be executed, p. 534.

[i] Upon which ſhe told them, I did not think the queen my ſiſter would have conſented to my death, who am not ſubject to your law and juriſdiction; but ſeeing her pleaſure is ſo, death ſhall be to me moſt welcome. Camden, p. 534.

[k] When the earls had told her to prepare for death, ſhe deſired that ſhe might have a conference with her almoner, confeſſor, and Andrew Melvil the maſter of her houſhold. But they would not allow her confeſſor to come near her, but recommended to her biſhop or dean of Peterborough, whom ſhe refuſing, the earl of Kent, out of his zeal to the reformed religion, ſaid to her the words above-mentioned. After they were gone, ſhe ordered ſupper to be haſtened, that ſhe might have the more time to diſpoſe of her concerns. She ſupped temperately, as ſhe uſed to do. Towards the end of ſupper ſhe drank to all her ſervants, who pledged her in order upon their knees, begging pardon for their neglect of duty, as ſhe alſo did of them. After ſupper ſhe peruſed her will, and wrote down the names of thoſe to whom ſhe bequeathed her goods and jewels. At her wonted time ſhe went to bed, ſlept ſome hours, and then awaking, ſpent the reſt of the night in prayer. The fatal day being come, ſhe dreſſed herſelf as ſhe was wont to do upon feſtival-days, and calling her ſervants together, commanded her will to be read, and then retired into her oratory, where ſhe ſtayed till Thomas Andrews the ſheriff acquainted her that ſhe muſt now come forth. She appeared with a compoſed countenance and cheerful look; her head was covered with a veil hanging down to the ground, her beads hanging at her girdle, with a crucifix in her hand. In the porch ſhe was received by the earls and other noblemen, where ſpeaking a ſhort ſpeech to Melvil, who bewailed his hard hap that he was to carry into Scotland the woeful tidings of the unhappy fate of his lady and miſtreſs, ſhe bade him farewel; and, turning to the earls, deſired that her ſervants might ſtand by her at her death. Then the earls of Kent and Shrewſbury, and Thomas Andrews, eſq; ſheriff of Northamptonſhire, going before her, ſhe came to the ſcaffold, at the upper end of the hall, on which was placed a chair, a cuſhion, and a block covered with black cloth. As ſoon as ſhe was ſat down, Beal read the warrant, to which the queen liſtened with a careleſs, or rather merry countenance; which done, Dr. Fletcher dean of Peterborough began a long ſpeech to her, concerning her life paſt, preſent, and to come. She interrupted him, praying not to trouble himſelf, for ſhe was reſolved to die in the catholic religion. Then they appointed the dean to pray; after which, the executioner having aſked her forgiveneſs, her women took off her upper garments, and covering her face with a handkerchief, ſhe laid down her head on the block, which was ſevered from her body at two ſtrokes. She was buried in a royal manner, in the cathedral of Peterborough, on Auguſt 1, where ſhe lay till her ſon king James's acceſſion to the crown of England; but he had her corps removed in 1612, into the ſouth aiſle of king Henry VIIth's chapel at Weſtminſter, where it now lies, and a ſtately monument erected to her memory, of which the reader may ſee a print in Sandford, p. 533.—Camden, p. 534, 535. And and mourning, were the ſigns ſhe gave of her grief, which ſeemed immoderate. She drove the privy-counſellors from her preſence [l], and commanded them to be examined in the Star-chamber, and Daviſon to be tried for his diſobedience. A few days after, ſhe ſent the following letter to the king of Scotland by Robert Carey.

My dear brother,

" I would you knew, though not felt, the extreme dolour that overwhelmeth my mind, for that miſerable accident which farre contrary to my meaning hath befalne. I have ſent this kinſman of mine [m], whom ere now it hath pleaſed you to favour, to inſtruct you truly of that which is too irkſome for my pen to tell you. I beſeech you, that as God and many more know how innocent I am in this caſe, ſo you will believe me, that if I had done it, I would have abode by it: I am not ſo baſe minded, that the fear of any living creature ſhould make me afraid to do what is juſt; or done, to deny the ſame; I am not ſo degenerate, nor carry ſo vile a mind. But as not to diſguiſe, fits moſt a king, ſo will I never diſſemble my actions, but cauſe them ſhew as I mean them. This aſſure yourſelf from me, that as I know it was deſerved, if I had meant it, I would never over another's ſhoulders, and to impute to myſelf that which I did not ſo much as think of: I will not. The circumſtances you will be pleaſed to hear of this bearer: and for my part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinſwoman, and more dear friend, nor any that will watch more carefully to preſerve you and your ſtate. And if any would otherwiſe perſuade you, think they bear more good-will to others than to you. Thus in haſte, I leave to trouble you, beſeeching God to ſend you a long reign."

Whilſt Carey was upon the road, Daviſon was cited into the Star-chamber, to anſwer to the accuſation of contempt and diſobedience entered againſt him. The accuſation ran, " That he had contemned the queen's orders, broke his oath of allegiance, and neglected his duty: That the queen never intending (for reaſons beſt known to herſelf) that the queen of Scots, though condemned, ſhould have been put to death, had however, for preventing of dangers, commanded a warrant for her execution to be drawn, and committed it to his truſt and ſecrecy; but that he forgetting his duty, had acquainted the council therewith, and put the warrant in execution unknown to the queen."

Daviſon anſwered, " That he was extremely ſorry to find himſelf accuſed of contempt to the queen, who had loaded him with favours: That he choſe rather to confeſs himſelf guilty of the crimes he was charged with than conteſt with her majeſty, ſince he could not vindicate himſelf without failing in the reſpect and duty he owed her. He proteſted however, he had offended wholly out of ignorance, being perſuaded he had done nothing contrary to the queen's will and pleaſure. He affirmed, that when the queen blamed him for making ſuch haſte to get the warrant ready, ſhe gave ſome intimation, but no expreſs command, that he ſhould keep it by him, neither did he believe himſelf guilty of breach of truſt by communicating it only to the council. As to his being accuſed of not recalling the warrant, after ſhe had told him ſhe had changed her mind, he proteſted, it was the opinion of the whole council that it ſhould be preſently executed, leſt the queen or ſtate ſhould receive any hurt by too long a delay."

After he had done ſpeaking, the queen's council preſſed him with his own confeſſion, and with what the lord treaſurer had teſtified, That doubting whether the queen had abſolutely conſented to have execution done, Daviſon affirmed, it was her intention. Then Daviſon, with tears in his eyes, prayed the queen's council not to urge him any farther, but remember that he would not conteſt with the queen, to whoſe conſcience, and his judges cenſure, he intirely ſubmitted himſelf. After that were made ſeveral ſpeeches, ſome tending to aggravate his offence, and others, to ſhew he had only acted imprudently [n]. In ſhort, he was condemned to be fined in ten thouſand pounds, and impriſoned during the queen's pleaſure. The lord Lumley, in his ſpeech on this occaſion, was not ſatisfied with blaming Daviſon; but, accuſing chiefly the whole council, ſaid, " Never was there ſuch a contempt againſt a prince heard or read of, that privy-counſellors, in the queen's palace, and when they had free acceſs to her, ſhould attempt ſuch a thing without her advice or knowledge; proteſting, that if his own ſon were guilty of the like fault, he would be the firſt to condemn him." But it was not the queen's intention to puniſh the counſellors, who probably had acted only by her private orders. And therefore to ſcreen them from theſe and the like reproaches, the lord privy-ſeal told the aſſembly, that though the queen, being juſtly offended with her council, had left them to a ſtrict examination, yet now being ſenſible they had tranſgreſſed out of an exceſs of zeal for her and the ſtate, ſhe forgave them. Thus Daviſon was the only ſacrifice, though the council was ſtill more guilty than he, ſuppoſing he had acted contrary to the queen's intention. Daviſon remained long in priſon without obtaining any other favour than ſome preſents of money from the queen, to relieve his wants.

Camden, whoſe aim was not to vindicate Elizabeth in any thing relating to the queen of Scots, has inſerted in his Annals an apology, which Daviſon, being in priſon, ſent himſelf to ſecretary Walſingham; and leaves his readers to give their judgment of it, without making himſelf any remark. The apology was worded in the following manner:

" The queen, after the departure of the French and Scotch embaſſadors, of her own accord, commanded me to deliver her the warrant for executing the ſentence againſt the queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, ſhe readily ſigned it with her own hand; when ſhe had ſo done, ſhe commanded it to be ſealed with the great ſeal of England; and in a jeſting manner ſaid, Go, tell all this to Walſingham, who is now ſick; though I fear he will die for ſorrow when he hears it. She added alſo the reaſons of her deferring it ſo long; namely, leſt ſhe might ſeem to have been violently or maliciouſly drawn thereto, whereas in the mean time ſhe was not ignorant how neceſſary it was. Moreover ſhe blamed Powlet and Drury, that they had not eaſed her of this care, and wiſhed that Walſingham would feel their pulſes touching this matter.

" The next day after the warrant was under the great ſeal, ſhe commanded me by Killegrew, that it ſhould be done; and when I had informed her that it was done already, ſhe found fault with ſuch great haſte, telling me, that in the judgment of ſome wiſe men, another courſe might be taken. I anſwered, that the courſe which was juſt was always beſt and ſafeſt. But fearing leſt ſhe would lay the fault upon me (as ſhe had laid the putting of the duke of Norfolk to death upon the lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, proteſting, that I would not plunge myſelf any deeper in ſo great a buſineſs. He preſently imparted it to the lord Burleigh, and the lord Burleigh to the reſt of the council; who all conſented to have the execution haſtened, and every one of them vowed to bear an equal ſhare in the blame, and ſent Beal away with the warrant and letters. The third day after, when by a dream, which ſhe told of the queen of Scots death, I perceived that ſhe wavered in her reſolution, I aſked her whether ſhe had changed her mind? She anſwered, No; but another courſe (ſaid ſhe) might have been deviſed: and withal ſhe aſked me, whether I had received any anſwer from Powlet? whoſe letter when I had ſhewed her, wherein he flatly refuſed to undertake that which ſtood not with honour and juſtice: ſhe waxing angry, accuſed him and others (who had bound themſelves by the aſſociation) of perjury and breach of their vow, as thoſe that had promiſed great matters for their prince's ſafety, but would perform nothing. Yet there are (ſaid ſhe) who will do it for my ſake. But I ſhewed her how diſhonourable and unjuſt a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger ſhe would bring Powlet and Drury by it. For if ſhe approved the fact, ſhe would draw upon herſelf both danger and diſhonour, not without cenſure of injuſtice; and if ſhe diſallowed it, ſhe would utterly undo men of great deſert and their whole poſterity. And afterwards ſhe gave me a light check the ſame day that the queen of Scots was executed, becauſe ſhe was not yet put to death."

If this apology be true, one cannot deſire a more convincing proof of Elizabeth's diſſimulation. The point was not Mary's death, for that was fully determined, but the manner. It appears in this writing, that Elizabeth would have been glad the queen of Scots two keepers had diſpatched her, that ſhe might have been able to clear herſelf, which ſhe would not have failed to do, by putting them both to death. There remains but one ſcruple, which is, that we have this from Camden only, whoſe teſtimony cannot be reckoned very certain [o].

[l] And particularly the lord Burleigh; who, upon his diſgrace, wrote ſeveral very ſubmiſſive letters to the queen, which the reader may ſee in Strype's Ann. tom. III. p. 371, 372. He chiefly pleaded ignorance, and offered to reſign his places. If there was any precipitation uſed in this affair of the death of the queen of Scots, the lord Burleigh, ſecretary Walſingham, and a few others, may reaſonably be ſuppoſed the authors of it, in order to ſecure themſelves; for they had acted ſo openly againſt Mary, that had ſhe ever mounted the throne of England, they muſt have been utterly undone.

[m] He was kin to her by Ann Boleyn her mother. Rapin.

[n] The commiſſioners, being thirteen in number, made each a ſpeech, wherein they owned that ſentence was juſtly pronounced againſt the queen of Scots; but that Daviſon deſerved to be puniſhed for acting without the queen's advice and conſent. Camden, p. 537.

The king of Scotland having received the news of the queen his mother's tragical end, expreſſed a very lively reſentment at the ſame. His firſt thoughts prompted him to revenge. The ſtates of Scotland, then aſſembled, promiſed him their aſſiſtance, and there was not wanting ſome about him, who perſuaded him to join with the pope, France, and Spain, to revenge ſo great an affront. Others adviſed him not to break with England, for fear of hazarding upon the uncertain chance of war his undoubted title to the crown of that kingdom; eſpecially as the Engliſh only wanted perhaps a pretence to hinder a Scotch prince from aſcending the throne of England; which therefore he ought to take care not to furniſh them with. Some were of opinion, he ſhould declare openly for neither of the two religions, but keep himſelf always ready to improve the events time ſhould produce. Carey arriving ſhortly after, the king refuſed him his audience, and it was not without great difficulty that he was perſuaded to receive Elizabeth's letter. We find however in Melvil's Memoirs, that ſome lords of the court of Scotland had wrote to England, that whenever queen Mary ſhould be put to death, the king her ſon would not highly reſent it; and accordingly, Melvil affirms, he quickly forgot it. When Elizabeth heard that king James's grief began to abate, ſhe cauſed ſome of thoſe whom ſhe moſt truſted [p], to repreſent to him, "That in the preſent ſituation of Scotland, there was no room to expect that a war with England could be ſucceſsful: If he pretends to rely on foreign aid, his mother's ſad experience might teach him how uncertain that was. The king of France would be ſo far from countenancing him, that it was his intereſt to hinder the two kingdoms of Great Britain from being united under the ſame dominion. Nay, he would oppoſe to the utmoſt of his power the ſucceſs of his arms, for fear he ſhould afterwards aſſiſt the duke of Guiſe, who aſpired to the crown. The king of Spain, in pretending to aid him, would only ſerve himſelf, on account of his groundleſs claim to the crown of England, as deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter. Even the queen his mother had made a will the night before her death, whereby ſhe excluded him from the ſucceſſion, in caſe he perſevered in the proteſtant religion, and nominated Philip II. for her heir, which will was ſent into Spain. He was therefore to expect no aſſiſtance from Philip, but rather to conſider him as an enemy. In a word, if he made war upon Elizabeth, and the parliament paſſed an act againſt him, he ran the hazard of being excluded for ever from a noble ſucceſſion, which he could not fail to enjoy, provided he would but remain in peace. "To all theſe arguments it was alſo added, "That Elizabeth had an affection for him, and beſides would think herſelf bound in honour and duty to repair the mother's wrongs by leaving her crown to the ſon, in caſe he gave her no occaſion to do otherwiſe." Theſe repreſentations had their effect. James ſaw it to be his intereſt to keep fair with Elizabeth, and that, added to the ſentence given againſt Daviſon, which was ſent him, ſo ſtifled his reſentment, that he ſhewed no farther marks of it [q].

Mean while Elizabeth, hearing the Spaniard was making great preparations to invade England [r], ſent Drake with a good fleet [s] upon the coaſt of Spain, with orders to burn all the Spaniſh ſhips he ſhould meet, The admiral's firſt expedition was to the port of Cadiz, where he burnt above an hundred veſſels laden with victuals and ammunition, and a large galeon of the marquis of Santa Cruz, with another of Raguſa, full of rich merchandize. Then returning to Cape St. Vincent, he did great damage to the inhabitants along the coaſt; after which he came to the mouth of the Tagus, where he in vain provoked the marquis of Santa Cruz, by plundering and burning the ſhips he found there. From thence he ſailed to the Azores, and meeting in the way with a rich carack called the St. Philip, returning from the East-Indies, eaſily took her [t]. The proviſions and ſtores which the Spaniards loſt at Cadiz, the taking of the galeons and carack, and the reſt of the damages they ſuſtained, obliged Philip to defer till the next year the expedition he had projected againſt England [u]. While Drake was acting in Europe againſt Spain, Cavendiſh was doing the ſame in America, having entered the South-ſea by the ſtraits of Magellan. He plundered without oppoſition the coaſts of Chili and Peru, and did the Spaniards great damage in thoſe parts.

I left, about the end of the laſt year, the earl of Leiceſter returning into England, after having ſet on foot his project to become ſovereign of the United Provinces, by cheriſhing confuſion and diſcord. Before his departure, the ſtates began to perceive his deſigns, and the orders he left when he went away, and which the officers his creatures punctually executed, fully confirmed their ſuſpicions. For this reaſon they ſent embaſſadors to Elizabeth to complain of him: but his credit, and the queen of Scots affair, which then held the court employed, hindered the embaſſadors from being ſo ſpeedily diſpatched as they deſired. It even happened in this interval, that Stanley and York, who held of the earl of Leiceſter the governments of Deventer and a fort near Zutphen, delivered theſe two places to the duke of Parma. So, the ſtates no longer truſting that general, gave the command of their army to count Maurice of Naſſau, the late prince of Orange's ſecond ſon. They did likewiſe ſome other things, which plainly ſhewed that, having diſcovered the earl of Leiceſter's deſigns, they would not ſuffer him to put them in practice. In the mean while, the duke of Parma beſieging Sluys, the earl returned from England to raiſe the ſiege, but had not the good fortune to ſucceed [w]. At laſt, finding he was every where miſtruſted, he reſolved to execute by force the project he had formed. To that end, he would have made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places at once in the heart of the country, to keep the reſt in awe. But his deſign to ſurpriſe Leyden being diſcovered in ſeaſon, all correſpondence between him and the ſtates intirely ceaſed. Whereupon the queen was obliged to recal him, and ſend in his room Peregrine Barty lord Willoughby of Ereſby, but with no other authority than the command of the Engliſh forces. Then the ſtates appointed count Maurice their captain-general.

Mean time the king of Spain, ever intent upon the project of invading England, continued to make extraordinary preparations. The project was formed ever ſince the queen of Scots had been perſuaded to convey to him her right to England, as being the only means to reſtore the catholic religion. According to the received maxim in the church of Rome, that a heretic is unworthy and incapable of enjoying a crown, Philip II. thought he might juſtly claim that of England, as being the next catholic prince deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter. But that the reader may the better know the ground of his pretenſions, it will be proper to caſt an eye upon his genealogy, which ſhews him ſprung from the two daughters of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon of Edward III. Upon this deſcent therefore, and the queen of Scots conveyance and will, he had projected the conqueſt of [o] This matter is alſo undeniably confirmed by the two letters, inſerted by Mackenzie, in his Life of Queen Mary (if they are genuine). In the firſt, written on February 1, 1586-7, by Walſingham and Daviſon, to ſir Amias Powlet, and ſir Drue Drury, it is ſaid—"her majeſty doth note in you, both a lack of that care and zeal for her ſervice, that ſhe looketh for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time (of yourſelves, without other provocation) found out ſome way to ſhorten the life of the Scots queen, conſidering the great peril ſhe is hourly ſubject to, ſo long as the ſaid queen ſhall live.—She taketh it moſt unkindly, that men profeſſing that love towards her that you do, ſhould in a kind of ſort, for lack of the diſcharge of your duties, caſt the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her indiſpoſition to ſhed blood."—Sir Amias Powlet, in his anſwer dated February 2, has theſe words, "—My anſwer—I ſhall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterneſs of mind, in that I am ſo unhappy, as living to ſee this unhappy day, in which I am required by direction from my moſt gracious ſovereign, to do an act, which God and the law forbiddeth.—God forbid I ſhould make ſo foul a ſhipwreck of my conſcience, or leave ſo great a blot to my poor poſterity, and ſhed blood without law or warrant," p. 270—273. Oſborn alſo obſerves, that "our queen may be found, in many of her letters, intimating ſo much [as the making her away] to ſuch as kept her, who were ſo wiſe, as not to underſtand what was meant." [r] Their preparations were ſo extraordinary great, that ſir Francis Drake ſays, in a letter, the Spaniards had proviſions of bread and wine ſufficient to maintain forty thouſand men a whole year. See Strype's Ann. tom. III. p. 451—That theſe great preparations were aimed at England, was diſcovered by Walſingham, in the following remarkable manner: he had intelligence from Madrid, that Philip had told his council, he had diſpatched an expreſs to Rome, with a letter wrote with his own hand to the pope, acquainting him with the true deſign of his preparations, and aſking his bleſſing upon it; which for ſome reaſons he would not yet diſcloſe to them, till the return of the courier. The ſecret being thus lodged with the pope, Walſingham, by the means of a Venetian prieſt retained at Rome as his ſpy, got a copy of the original letter, which was ſtolen out of the pope's cabinet by a gentleman of the bed-chamber, who took the keys out of the pope's pocket while he ſlept. [u] There was another remarkable thing which retarded this expedition, and was the contrivance of the great ſtateſman Walſingham; namely, he got all the Spaniſh bills, that were to ſupply the king with money to carry on his preparations, proteſted at Genoa. Welwood's Mem. p. 9.

England. Elizabeth not being ignorant of it, took all poſſible care to be in a poſture of defence; and both coloured their preparations with divers pretences. To amuſe Elizabeth, Philip ſent and propoſed her mediation for a peace between him and the revolted provinces of the Netherlands. Elizabeth perfectly knew Philip's aim, and, to amuſe him in her turn, accepted the mediation, in hopes the negotiation would give her more time to be prepared. She propoſed therefore to the ſtates a peace with Spain, intimating, they could not refuſe to enter into treaty, without incurring the blame of continuing the war out of obſtinacy. She promiſed them moreover to have their intereſts as much at heart as her own. But the ſtates abſolutely refuſed to treat, knowing, by frequent experience, that ſuch negotiations were ever fatal to them. Nevertheleſs, ſhe ſent plenipotentiaries [x] into Flanders, imagining the ſtates would be forced, as ſhe hinted, to agree to her deciſions with Spain. Three months paſſed before the place of congreſs could be ſettled. Elizabeth required as preliminaries, a general pardon for the confederates; that the towns of the Netherlands ſhould enjoy all their ancient privileges, and the old alliance between England and Spain be renewed; that ſome good fund ſhould be aſſigned her for the payment of what was due from the ſtates, and the forces on both ſides be diſbanded. As to religion, the Spaniards demanded, that it ſhould be entirely as the king pleaſed, ſince he did not hinder Elizabeth from ſettling it in her dominions according to her pleaſure. Elizabeth did not inſiſt much upon this article, whether ſhe believed every ſovereign to have a right to impoſe a religion upon his people, or, to amuſe the Spaniard, feigned to relax, that ſhe might not obſtruct a negotiation, the continuance whereof could not but be advantageous to her. Be this as it will, ſhe went ſo far as to be ſatisfied that the exerciſe of the reformed religion ſhould be tolerated two years only in the United Provinces. As for the places in her poſſeſſion, ſhe refuſed not to reſtore them, provided ſhe were reimburſed. Upon theſe mutual demands, the Spaniards took care to delay the concluſion of the preliminaries, imagining that the hopes of a ſpeedy peace would prevent Elizabeth's preparations againſt their attacks. They refuſed to come to any agreement with reſpect to religion; and as for Elizabeth's charges in ſupporting the confederates, they pretended they were to be balanced by the expences ſhe had put their king to. At length, the preparations which were making againſt England in all the Spaniſh ports became ſo public, that this feigned negotiation broke off without any ſucceſs, after laſting till March the next year.

I have already mentioned Philip's pretenſions to England and Ireland. Ferdinand the Catholic, his great-grandfather, had not ſo plauſible a claim to the kingdom of Naples and Navarre, which he ſeized, and which ſtill are part of the Spaniſh monarchy. But beſides theſe pretenſions, Philip made uſe of another thing, very proper to impoſe upon the world, namely, a great zeal for the reſtoration of the catholic religion in the three kingdoms of Great Britain. By that he had perſuaded pope Sixtus V. to come into the project, the execution whereof would be as well glorious as advantageous to both, but of which Philip was to bear the whole charge. As for Sixtus, he had nothing to contribute, but what the popes were wont to ſupply on ſuch occaſions, namely, vows, prayers, and anathemas. To countenance therefore the king of Spain's undertaking, the pope thundered againſt Elizabeth a bull, abſolving her ſubjects from their oath of allegiance, and giving her kingdoms to the firſt that ſhould ſeize them [y]. This was the king of Spain, who was now ready to embrace the pope's offer.

He had prepared in Portugal, at Naples, and in Sicily, a fleet, called the Invincible Armada. It conſiſted of one hundred and fifty great ſhips, in which were embarked nineteen thouſand men, and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty pieces of cannon [z]. It was to be commanded by the marquis De Santa Cruz, but that admiral dying whilſt the fleet was equipping, the duke of Medina-celi was appointed in his room. On the other hand the duke of Parma had cauſed an army of thirty thouſand men [a] to advance towards the coaſts of the Low-Countries, and prepared a great number of veſſels to tranſport them, in order to join the Spaniſh fleet, and land in England [b]. The project was to ſtation the fleet at the mouth of the Thames, to aſſiſt the troops who were to march directly to London. Elizabeth, who wanted not good ſpies, having timely notice of theſe great preparations, provided for the defence of her kingdom with great care and diligence. She fitted out a conſiderable fleet, which however was inferior to that of Spain, both in the number and largeneſs of the ſhips, and gave the command to Charles lord Howard of Effingham, high admiral of England, and very expert in ſea-affairs. He had for vice-admirals, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, three of the beſt ſea-officers then in the world [c]. On the other hand, Henry Seymour, ſecond ſon of the late duke of Somerſet, lay upon the coaſt of Flanders, with forty ſail of Engliſh and Dutch, to hinder the prince of Parma from joining the Spaniſh fleet. Moreover, Elizabeth had in England an army of forty thouſand men, whereof three thouſand, under the command of the earl of Leiceſter, were poſted near the Thames mouth. The reſt were near the queen's perſon, ready to march where it ſhould be deemed neceſſary [d]. Beſides this, there was in each county a body of militia well armed, under leaders who had orders to join one another as occaſion ſhould require. It is certain, there are no trained-bands in the world more proper for a bold action than thoſe of England. So in caſe the Spaniards had landed, they would have met with a warm reception. The ſea-ports were fortified [e] as much as the time would permit, and ſignals were every where appointed to ſhew the places where the troops were to march. In ſhort, it was reſolved, that if the Spaniards made a deſcent, the country about them ſhould be laid waſte, that they might have nothing to ſubſiſt upon but what they brought from the fleet [f]. This was the courſe taken by Francis I. in Provence againſt Charles V. with a ſucceſs that anſwered his expectations. Theſe meaſures being taken, the enemy was expected with uncommon alacrity, though it ſhould ſeem that on ſuch an occaſion every one ſhould have been in the utmoſt conſternation [g].

[1588] Mean while, Elizabeth was not without uneaſineſs. The hour ſhe had always dreaded was at length come. Her crown lay at ſtake, and ſhe was to defend it, without the aſſiſtance of any ally. This ſhe had always endeavoured to prevent, from the beginning of her reign, by all the artifices her policy could ſuggeſt, by fomenting the troubles of Scotland, by making an alliance with France, by feigning to marry the duke of Anjou, by aſſiſting the Hugonots of France and the malcontents of the Netherlands, and finally, by beheading the queen of Scots. She had ſucceeded hitherto, and though ſurrounded with enemies, had found means to employ them at home, and prevent them from directly invading England. But the time was now come that her right muſt be expoſed to the chance of war. Though ſhe was generally beloved by her ſubjects, ſhe was not ignorant that there were many diſaffected perſons in the kingdom, and eſpecially among the catholics. Nay, ſhe had reaſon to fear, they correſponded with the king of Spain and favoured his invaſion. On the [z] The Spaniard, the more to advance his glory, and terrify his enemies, publiſhed an account of this fleet in Spaniſh, Latin, French, and Dutch. The Spaniſh book ſoon came into the hands of the lord treaſurer Burleigh, in divers places whereof Strype ſaw notes added by that lord ſoon after the defeat. From this book he has inſerted a brief account of the Spaniſh Armada, in his appendix of original papers, Ann. vol. iii. N. 51. The ſum whereof is this, That there were in all 130 ſhips of 57,868 tuns, 19,295 ſoldiers, and 8450 mariners, 2088 ſlaves, and 2630 great braſs pieces of all ſorts, beſides 20 caravels for the ſervice of the army, and 10 ſalves with ſix oars a-piece. Upon this emergency the city of London lent the queen great ſums of money. And being deſired to furniſh five thouſand men, and fifteen ſhips, they granted ten thouſand men, and thirty ſhips. No words, ſays Stow, can expreſs the great forwardneſs of the people, in their zealous love and duty towards their ſovereign, at this juncture. See Stow, p. 744, 750. Camden, p. 543, 548. other hand, ſhe was not eaſy with reſpect to Ireland, becauſe of the religion of the Iriſh, and the correſpondents the pope and Philip II. had there. But ſhe was under a ſtill greater concern on account of Scotland. She had juſt put king James's mother to death by the hand of the executioner, and if that prince ſhould be tranſported with the deſire of revenge, he could never have a fairer opportunity, ſince it was in his power to favour the deſcent of the Spaniards in one extremity of the kingdom, by making a diverſion in the other. In a word, if ſhe could not hinder the Spaniards from landing in England, ſhe muſt neceſſarily reſolve to hazard a battle, the country not being proper to prolong the war. All this was more than ſufficient to inſpire her with a juſt dread, which however ſhe very carefully concealed. If ever ſhe diſcovered ability, it was on this important occaſion. Far from ſhewing the leaſt faint-heartedneſs, ſhe encouraged her people by her looks, her reſolution, her affability, which made them think ſhe was troubled only for their ſakes; and on her own account, regardleſs of the danger. Mean while, ſhe looked to every thing with a wonderful prudence, and a preſence of mind rarely to be found in the greateſt men, and which gained her the admiration and praiſes of all the world. Some adviſed her to put to death, or ſend beyond ſea, the leading catholics. But ſhe thought it would be diſcovering too much fear, beſides that it would have been great injuſtice to puniſh men upon bare ſuſpicions. She contented herſelf with cauſing ſome to be arreſted, and put into cuſtody, telling them however, it was only by way of precaution, which, inſtead of injuring, would ſcreen them from the violence of their enemies.

As for Ireland, ſhe ſent orders to ſir William Fitz-williams, who was then lord deputy, diſtinctly pointing out to him what precautions he ſhould uſe to hinder the Iriſh from riſing. But above all things, ſhe took care to careſs the king of Scotland, and put him in hopes of an ample acknowledgment, if on this occaſion he inviolably adhered to the proteſtant religion and the intereſt of Great Britain. She repreſented to him, that, in reſpect to England, he was to conſider the king of Spain as a dangerous competitor, and that the loſs of one of the realms of Great Britain would not fail of being attended with the loſs of the other. But her uneaſineſs with regard to Scotland was not long-lived, ſince ſhe had quickly the ſatiſfaction to hear that James, knowing perfectly his own intereſt, had no correſpondence with the king of Spain, but even ſtood upon his guard for fear of being invaded himſelf.

The duke of Medina-celi ſailed out of the Tagus with the Invincible Armada, the 3d of June [h], and ſteered his courſe towards the north. Within a few days, a ſtorm ariſing, ſo diſperſed the ſhips, that they could not rejoin till they came to the Groyne. This accident occaſioned a report over Europe, that the Spaniſh fleet was entirely deſtroyed. Walſingham himſelf, ſecretary of ſtate, thought his intelligence ſo certain, that he wrote to the lord admiral Howard, to ſend home four of the largeſt ſhips, there being no farther danger this year. But the admiral anſwered, he could not think of parting with the four ſhips, though he ſhould be obliged to keep them at his own charge, till he had more certain advice. The better to know the truth, the wind turning to the north, he ſailed with all his fleet towards Spain, with deſign to complete the deſtruction of the enemy's Armada, which was repreſented to him as diſabled. But when he approached Spain, he heard the fleet had not ſuffered ſo much damage as was reported. At the ſame time, the wind changing to the ſouth, he ſailed back to his ſtation at the mouth of the Channel, for fear with the ſame wind the enemies fleet ſhould advance towards England.

But it was the 12th of July before the Spaniards departed from the Groyne, and two days after, the duke of Medina-celi ſent a yacht to notify the ſame to the duke of Parma, that he might be ready to join him. The 19th, the Spaniſh fleet entered the Channel, and the 20th, appeared in ſight of the Engliſh, who let it paſs in order to follow it before the wind. Camden has inſerted in his Annals, a journal of what paſſed in the Channel till the Spaniards retired to the north. I do not think it very neceſſary to copy the journal, which beſides is a little obſcure, and gives but an imperfect idea of the bravery and conduct of the Engliſh. It will ſuffice to ſay, that whilſt the Spaniards were in the Channel, the Engliſh kept cloſe to them, and even took ſome of their ſhips. Of this number were a galeon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdis, which was ſent to Dartmouth, and a ſhip of Biſcay, in which was the king's treaſure; but the Spaniards had taken out the money, becauſe the ſhip had been fired.

The 23d of July, the wind being in the north, the duke of Medina-celi ſtood towards the Engliſh fleet. There was that day a ſharp engagement, wherein the Spaniards, though much ſuperior in number of ſhips, obtained no advantage. The unweildineſs of their ſhips, and the agility of the Engliſh, made it eaſy for theſe to ſtand off or on, as they ſaw fit, and ſo to balance the ſuperiority of their enemies. The trial the Spaniards made on this occaſion of the Engliſh valour and ſkill in ſea-engagements, began doubtleſs to give them quite another notion of their enterpriſe than they had hitherto conceived.

Mean while, the duke of Medina-celi ſent daily meſſengers to preſs the duke of Parma to put to ſea with his army. But that was not practicable, by reaſon of the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, poſted advantageouſly to hinder the junction. It was neceſſary for the Spaniards to approach the coaſt of Flanders, to compel them to retire [i]. But the 27th in the evening, they were no farther than off Calais, where they came to an anchor, being ſtill followed by the Engliſh, who lay within ſhot. Here the Engliſh fleet was joined by a good number of ſhips, not only of the queen's, but of divers private perſons, who had fitted out ſeveral at their own expence [k]. And now the fleet conſiſted of one hundred and forty ſhips of war, ſmall indeed in compariſon of the Spaniſh, but however with the advantage of moving more eaſily, and retiring into the ports of England in caſe of neceſſity. The duke of Parma, who was to ſail from Dunkirk and Newport, was ſtill earneſtly ſollicited by the duke of Medina-celi to put to ſea, and make a deſcent in England, as it had been reſolved. But, beſides that the ſhips which expected him, were not yet withdrawn, notwithſtanding the neighbourhood of the Spaniſh Armada, many of his mariners had deſerted, and his fleet was ill-provided with victuals. In ſhort, he could not or would not embark.

Whilſt the Spaniards lay before Calais, the Engliſh admiral ſent in the night eight fire-ſhips among their fleet [l]. This ſight ſtruck them with ſuch a terror, that inſtantly cutting their cables, they put to ſea to avoid the impending danger. In this confuſion, the Admiral-galeaſs, commanded by Hugo de Moncada, having loſt her rudder, floated up and down till the next day, when ſhe was taken by the Engliſh after a ſharp engagement, wherein Moncada was ſlain. Though the Spaniſh admiral had ordered every ſhip to return to her ſtation as ſoon as the danger was paſſed, and made a ſignal for that purpoſe, there were but few that endeavoured to obey. So, the fleet remained diſperſed, ſome of the ſhips being driven to the north, and others upon the ſhallows of Flanders, where they were in great danger. They had not only to guard againſt the ſands, but alſo againſt the Engliſh, who ſo played upon them with their cannon, that ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips were that day diſabled, and the galeons, called St. Philip and St. Matthew, fell into the hands of the Zealanders. At laſt, a north-weſt wind driving the fleet upon the coaſt of Zealand, were they were like to be loſt, the Engliſh gave over the chace, for fear of being expoſed to the ſame danger. Happily for the Spaniards, the wind turned to the ſouth-weſt very ſeaſonably, and freed them from their diſtreſs. But now, perceiving the impoſſibility of executing their project, they reſolved to return home by ſailing round Scotland and Ireland, and the rather, as ſome of their ſhips had already ſteered that courſe. The Engliſh admiral ſeeing them ſtand to the northward, left part of his fleet to have an eye upon the coaſt of Flanders, and gave them chace, though at a little diſtance, till they were paſt Edinburgh-frith. The courſe they ſteered gave ſome ſuſpicion, that they were ſure of a retreat in the ports of Scotland. Whereupon the Engliſh embaſſador at king James's court made him large offers, and even ſome promiſes, which he had not power to make, and which were never performed [m].

Mean while, the Spaniſh fleet continuing their courſe, ſuſtained ſome farther damage by contrary winds, which cauſed ſeveral of their ſhips to be loſt on the coaſts of Scotland and Ireland. Seven hundred ſoldiers and mariners, who had eſcaped to land in the king of Scotland's dominions, were ſent to the duke of Parma with Elizabeth's conſent. But thoſe who were ſhipwrecked in Ireland, and caſt aſhore, were all put to the ſword, or periſhed by the hands of the executioner; the lord-deputy, by whoſe orders it was done, fearing they would join with the rebels. At leaſt this was his pretence to excuſe this barbarity [n].

Philip II. received the news of the ill-ſucceſs of his fleet with an heroic patience. He had ſpent three years in preparing the Armada with an incredible expence, and when he heard of the defeat, ſo contrary to his expectation, thanked God it was no greater [o].

Upon the retreat of this ſo formidable a fleet, England was filled with an univerſal joy. Elizabeth ordered a public thankſgiving for the deliverance, to be made in all the churches of the kingdom, and went herſelf to St. Paul's [p] in great ſolemnity to perform the ſame duty. After that, ſhe conferred on the lord-admiral a yearly revenue, in recompence of his great ſervice to his country, and beſtowed penſions on the wounded. For the reſt, their rewards conſiſted more in words than in deeds.

Sir Robert Sidney, who had been ſent into Scotland before the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet, at the time the queen was afraid king James would think of being revenged, returned home when the danger was over. He reported that the king of Scotland had teſtified his ſincere attachment to the intereſt of England, and the proteſtant religion, and had told him, "That he looked for no other favour from the Spaniards, than what Polyphemus promiſed Ulyſſes, namely, that he ſhould be devoured the laſt."

On the 4th of September [q] died the earl of Leiceſter, a man little deſerving his greatneſs, if moſt of the hiſtorians are to be credited. His death drew tears from the queen, who nevertheleſs ordered his goods to be ſold at a public ſale, for payment of the ſums ſhe had lent him [r].

After the Spaniſh fleet had left the coaſt of Flanders, the duke of Parma ſeeing the enterpriſe blaſted, beſieged Bergen-op-zoom, where was an Engliſh governor, with a garriſon of the ſame nation. The ſiege acquired the governor great reputation, who by a gallant defence obliged the duke at length to raiſe it [s].

The ſame year, ſo memorable for England, was no leſs ſo for France. The duke of Guiſe, grown more powerful than the king, came to Paris in May, and by the favour of the people, whoſe idol he was, obliged the king to depart, having firſt ſeen the furious populace chaining the ſtreets, and preparing to attack his perſon in the Louvre. This is what was called, The barricadoes of Paris [t]. This inſolent action was followed by an agreement, which the king was forced to make with the heads of the league, whereby he put ſeveral places into their hands. But in December following, Henry perceiving himſelf ruined, if he did not make away with the duke of Guiſe, and his brother the cardinal, cauſed them both to be aſſaſſinated at Blois, where the ſtates of the kingdom were aſſembled. Thus he freed himſelf from a preſent danger, but it was only to fall into another, for this action made the league and the city of Paris openly declare againſt him.

As for Scotland, all was quiet there during the whole year 1588. So long as the king had about him miniſters and counſellors attached to the intereſts of England, he generally led an eaſy and peaceable life. So, the only thing that troubled him this year was his marriage, which he could not accompliſh, though he paſſionately wiſhed it himſelf. Melvil inſinuates, that chancellor Maitland, who then managed that prince's affairs, was bribed by Elizabeth; that ſhe gave penſions to moſt of the counſellors of Scotland, and that her aim was to hinder the king from marrying. He had ſent embaſſadors [u] to Copenhagen, to treat of his marriage with the eldeſt daughter of Frederic II. but by the artifice of his miniſters, the embaſſadors power was ſo limited, that it was impoſſible for them to conclude, On the other hand, whilſt the marriage was negotiating, one Dubartus [w], a French poet, ſervant of the king of Navarre, came to Edinburgh, under colour of paying his reſpects to the king, who had expreſſed ſome eſteem for his works, and propoſed, as of himſelf, the king's marriage with Catherine his maſter's ſiſter. He ſaid ſo many fine things of the lady, that the king, by the advice of his council, ſent the lord Tungland, Melvil's brother, into France to ſee her, on pretence of negotiating ſome affair with the king her brother. The king of Denmark hearing of it, and ſeeing, moreover, the limited power of the Scotch embaſſadors, believed he was mocked, and gave his daughter to the duke of Brunſwick. Melvil aſcribes, not without great likelihood, this whole intrigue to Elizabeth, and affirms, it was ſhe that informed the king of Denmark of the lord Tungland's being ſent to the court of Navarre.

[1598] Shortly after, in the beginning of the year 1589, was diſcovered in Scotland a conſpiracy againſt the king, contrived by the earls of Huntley and Bothwell, ſon of John Prior of Coldingham, natural ſon of James V [x]. Their deſign was to ſeize the king's perſon, and compel him to reſtore the catholic religion in Scotland [y]. It is ſaid, they were excited by emiſſaries from Spain [z]. The king prevented the execution of the plot by his diligence. He purſued the earl of Huntley, who had taken up arms, till at laſt he conſtrained him to yield at diſcretion. As for Bothwell, he withdrew to his own houſe, where he meditated new projects, which I ſhall mention hereafter. I return to the affairs of England.

Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, eldeſt ſon of the late duke of Norfolk, who had been three years priſoner in the Tower, was at laſt brought to his trial before his peers, being accuſed of conſpiring againſt the queen and the ſtate. Camden ſhews, he was convicted at moſt but of being diſaffected to the government, and too much attached to the catholic religion [a]. He was however condemned to die; but the queen gave him his life [b].

Elizabeth enjoyed now a tranquillity, to which ſhe had been a ſtranger ever ſince the beginning of her reign. The queen of Scotland was no longer in the world; and the king her ſon, in expectation of one day ſucceeding Elizabeth, ſtifled his reſentment, or rather had entirely forgot the tragical death of his mother. The king of Spain was diſabled to make a freſh attempt upon England, ſince the unfortunate ſucceſs of his invincible Armada. The affairs of the United Provinces began to be reſtored by the valour and prudent conduct of count Maurice, and thoſe of France were in ſuch a ſituation, that England had nothing to fear from that quarter. The duke of Guiſe, Elizabeth's great enemy, was dead, his ſon in priſon, and the duke of Mayenne wholly bent upon revenging the death of his brothers. As for Sixtus V. though very capable of forming great projects, he could not execute them without the aid of ſome catholic potentate; and the king of Spain, on whom alone he could depend, was wholly engroſſed with the thoughts of improving the troubles of France. As for the Engliſh catholics, there was no likelihood of their ſtirring, at a time when they could not expect any foreign aſſiſtance.

In this proſperous ſtate, Elizabeth having nothing to fear either at home or abroad, had a mind to ſhew the Spaniard, the Engliſh could attack as well as defend. But as ſhe was extremely frugal, and an undertaking againſt Spain could not but be very expenſive, ſhe ordered it, that Drake and Norris took upon them to be at the charge, in hopes of making themſelves amends by the booty they ſhould meet with. So [n] Of the Spaniſh Armada were taken and deſtroyed in July and Auguſt, fifteen great ſhips, and 4791 men, in the fight between the Engliſh and Spaniſh navies in the Channel: and on the coaſt of Ireland, in September, ſeventeen ſhips, and 5394 men. In all thirty-two ſhips and 10,185 men. See Strype's Append. Numb. 53. Upon the diſappearance of this mighty fleet, the following writing was faſtened up to Paſquil at Rome; Pontificem mille annorum indulgentias largiturum eſſe de plenitudine poteſtatis ſuæ, ſiquis certò ſibi indicaverit, quid ſit factum de claſſe Hiſpanicâ, quò abierit: in cœlumne ſublata: an ad tartara detruſa: velin ære alicubi pendeat, an in aliquo mari fluctuet. other hand, ſhe was not eaſy with reſpect to Ireland, becauſe of the religion of the Iriſh, and the correſpondents the pope and Philip II. had there. But ſhe was under a ſtill greater concern on account of Scotland. She had juſt put king James's mother to death by the hand of the executioner, and if that prince ſhould be tranſported with the deſire of revenge, he could never have a fairer opportunity, ſince it was in his power to favour the deſcent of the Spaniards in one extremity of the kingdom, by making a diverſion in the other. In a word, if ſhe could not hinder the Spaniards from landing in England, ſhe muſt neceſſarily reſolve to hazard a battle, the country not being proper to prolong the war. All this was more than ſufficient to inſpire her with a juſt dread, which however ſhe very carefully concealed. If ever ſhe diſcovered ability, it was on this important occaſion. Far from ſhewing the leaſt faint-heartedneſs, ſhe encouraged her people by her looks, her reſolution, her affability, which made them think ſhe was troubled only for their ſakes; and on her own account, regardleſs of the danger. Mean while, ſhe looked to every thing with a wonderful prudence, and a preſence of mind rarely to be found in the greateſt men, and which gained her the admiration and praiſes of all the world. Some adviſed her to put to death, or ſend beyond ſea, the leading catholics. But ſhe thought it would be diſcovering too much fear, beſides that it would have been great injuſtice to puniſh men upon bare ſuſpicions. She contented herſelf with cauſing ſome to be arreſted, and put into cuſtody, telling them however, it was only by way of precaution, which, inſtead of injuring, would ſcreen them from the violence of their enemies.

As for Ireland, ſhe ſent orders to ſir William Fitz-williams, who was then lord deputy, diſtinctly pointing out to him what precautions he ſhould uſe to hinder the Iriſh from riſing. But above all things, ſhe took care to careſs the king of Scotland, and put him in hopes of an ample acknowledgment, if on this occaſion he inviolably adhered to the proteſtant religion and the intereſt of Great Britain. She repreſented to him, that, in reſpect to England, he was to conſider the king of Spain as a dangerous competitor, and that the loſs of one of the realms of Great Britain would not fail of being attended with the loſs of the other. But her uneaſineſs with regard to Scotland was not long-lived, ſince ſhe had quickly the ſatisfaction to hear that James, knowing perfectly his own intereſt, had no correſpondence with the king of Spain, but even ſtood upon his guard for fear of being invaded himſelf.

The duke of Medina-celi ſailed out of the Tagus with the Invincible Armada, the 3d of June [h], and ſteered his courſe towards the north. Within a few days, a ſtorm ariſing, ſo diſperſed the ſhips, that they could not rejoin till they came to the Groyne. This accident occaſioned a report over Europe, that the Spaniſh fleet was entirely deſtroyed. Walſingham himſelf, ſecretary of ſtate, thought his intelligence ſo certain, that he wrote to the lord admiral Howard, to ſend home four of the largeſt ſhips, there being no farther danger this year. But the admiral anſwered, he could not think of parting with the four ſhips, though he ſhould be obliged to keep them at his own charge, till he had more certain advice. The better to know the truth, the wind turning to the north, he ſailed with all his fleet towards Spain, with deſign to complete the deſtruction of the enemy's Armada, which was repreſented to him as diſabled. But when he approached Spain, he heard the fleet had not ſuffered ſo much damage as was reported. At the ſame time, the wind changing to the ſouth, he ſailed back to his ſtation at the mouth of the Channel, for fear with the ſame wind the enemies fleet ſhould advance towards England.

But it was the 12th of July before the Spaniards departed from the Groyne, and two days after, the duke of Medina-celi ſent a yacht to notify the ſame to the duke of Parma, that he might be ready to join him. The 19th, the Spaniſh fleet entered the Channel, and the 20th, appeared in ſight of the Engliſh, who let it paſs in order to follow it before the wind. Camden has inſerted in his Annals, a journal of what paſſed in the Channel till the Spaniards retired to the north. I do not think it very neceſſary to copy the journal, which beſides is a little obſcure, and gives but an imperfect idea of the bravery and conduct of the Engliſh. It will ſuffice to ſay, that whilſt the Spaniards were in the Channel, the Engliſh kept cloſe to them, and even took ſome of their ſhips. Of this number were a galeon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdis, which was ſent to Dartmouth, and a ſhip of Biſcay, in which was the king's treaſure; but the Spaniards had taken out the money, becauſe the ſhip had been fired.

The 23d of July, the wind being in the north, the duke of Medina-celi ſtood towards the Engliſh fleet. There was that day a ſharp engagement, wherein the Spaniards, though much ſuperior in number of ſhips, obtained no advantage. The unweildineſs of their ſhips, and the agility of the Engliſh, made it eaſy for theſe to ſtand off or on, as they ſaw fit, and ſo to balance the ſuperiority of their enemies. The trial the Spaniards made on this occaſion of the Engliſh valour and ſkill in ſea-engagements, began doubtleſs to give them quite another notion of their enterpriſe than they had hitherto conceived.

Mean while, the duke of Medina-celi ſent daily meſſengers to preſs the duke of Parma to put to ſea with his army. But that was not practicable, by reaſon of the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, poſted advantageouſly to hinder the junction. It was neceſſary for the Spaniards to approach the coaſt of Flanders, to compel them to retire [i]. But the 27th in the evening, they were no farther than off Calais, where they came to an anchor, being ſtill followed by the Engliſh, who lay within ſhot. Here the Engliſh fleet was joined by a good number of ſhips, not only of the queen's, but of divers private perſons, who had fitted out ſeveral at their own expence [k]. And now the fleet conſiſted of one hundred and forty ſhips of war, ſmall indeed in compariſon of the Spaniſh, but however with the advantage of moving more eaſily, and retiring into the ports of England in caſe of neceſſity. The duke of Parma, who was to ſail from Dunkirk and Newport, was ſtill earneſtly ſollicited by the duke of Medina-celi to put to ſea, and make a deſcent in England, as it had been reſolved. But, beſides that the ſhips which expected him, were not yet withdrawn, notwithſtanding the neighbourhood of the Spaniſh Armada, many of his mariners had deſerted, and his fleet was ill-provided with victuals. In ſhort, he could not or would not embark.

Whilſt the Spaniards lay before Calais, the Engliſh admiral ſent in the night eight fire-ſhips among their fleet [l]. This fight ſtruck them with ſuch a terror, that inſtantly cutting their cables, they put to ſea to avoid the impending danger. In this confuſion, the Admiral-galeaſs, commanded by Hugo de Moncada, having loſt her rudder, floated up and down till the next day, when ſhe was taken by the Engliſh after a ſharp engagement, wherein Moncada was ſlain. Though the Spaniſh admiral had ordered every ſhip to return to her ſtation as ſoon as the danger was paſſed, and made a ſignal for that purpoſe, there were but few that endeavoured to obey. So, the fleet remained diſperſed, ſome of the ſhips being driven to the north, and others upon the ſhallows of Flanders, where they were in great danger. They had not only to guard againſt the ſands, but alſo againſt the Engliſh, who ſo played upon them with their cannon, that ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips were that day diſabled, and the galeons, called St. Philip and St. Matthew, fell into the hands of the Zealanders. At laſt, a north-weſt wind driving the fleet upon the coaſt of Zealand, were they were like to be loſt, the Engliſh gave over the chace, for fear of being expoſed to the ſame danger. Happily for the Spaniards, the wind turned to the ſouth-weſt very ſeaſonably, and freed them from their diſtreſs. But now, perceiving the impoſſibility of executing their project, they reſolved to return home by ſailing round Scotland and Ireland, and the rather, as ſome of their ſhips had already ſteered that courſe. The Engliſh admiral ſeeing them ſtand to the northward, left part of his fleet to have an eye upon the coaſt of Flanders, and gave them chace, though at a little diſtance, till they were paſt Edinburgh-frith. The courſe they ſteered gave ſome ſuſpicion, that they were ſure of a retreat in the ports of Scotland. Whereupon the Engliſh embaſſador at king James's court made him large offers, and even ſome promiſes, which he had not power to make, and which were never performed [m].

Mean while, the Spaniſh fleet continuing their courſe, ſuſtained ſome farther damage by contrary winds, which cauſed ſeveral of their ſhips to be loſt on the coaſts of Scotland and Ireland. Seven hundred ſoldiers and mariners, who had eſcaped to land in the king of Scotland's dominions, were ſent to the duke of Parma with Elizabeth's conſent. But thoſe who were ſhipwrecked in Ireland, and caſt aſhore, were all put to the ſword, or periſhed by the hands of the executioner; the lord-deputy, by whoſe orders it was done, fearing they would join with the rebels. At leaſt this was his pretence to excuſe this barbarity [n].

Of

Philip II. received the news of the ill-ſucceſs of his fleet with an heroic patience. He had ſpent three years in preparing the Armada with an incredible expence, and when he heard of the defeat, ſo contrary to his expectation, thanked God it was no greater [o].

Upon the retreat of this ſo formidable a fleet, England was filled with an univerſal joy. Elizabeth ordered a public thankſgiving for the deliverance, to be made in all the churches of the kingdom, and went herſelf to St. Paul's [p] in great ſolemnity to perform the ſame duty. After that, ſhe conferred on the lord-admiral a yearly revenue, in recompence of his great ſervice to his country, and beſtowed penſions on the wounded. For the reſt, their rewards conſiſted more in words than in deeds.

Sir Robert Sidney, who had been ſent into Scotland before the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet, at the time the queen was afraid king James would think of being revenged, returned home when the danger was over. He reported that the king of Scotland had teſtified his ſincere attachment to the intereſt of England, and the proteſtant religion, and had told him, "That he looked for no other favour from the Spaniards, than what Polyphemus promiſed Ulyſſes, namely, that he ſhould be devoured the laſt."

On the 4th of September [q] died the earl of Leiceſter, a man little deſerving his greatneſs, if moſt of the hiſtorians are to be credited. His death drew tears from the queen, who nevertheleſs ordered his goods to be ſold at a public ſale, for payment of the ſums ſhe had lent him [r].

After the Spaniſh fleet had left the coaſt of Flanders, the duke of Parma ſeeing the enterpriſe blaſted, beſieged Bergen-op-zoom, where was an Engliſh governor, with a garriſon of the ſame nation. The ſiege acquired the governor great reputation, who by a gallant defence obliged the duke at length to raiſe it [s].

The ſame year, ſo memorable for England, was no leſs ſo for France. The duke of Guiſe, grown more powerful than the king, came to Paris in May, and by the favour of the people, whoſe idol he was, obliged the king to depart, having firſt ſeen the furious populace chaining the ſtreets, and preparing to attack his perſon in the Louvre. This is what was called, The barricadoes of Paris [t]. This inſolent action was followed by an agreement, which the king was forced to make with the heads of the league, whereby he put ſeveral places into their hands. But in December following, Henry perceiving himſelf ruined, if he did not make away with the duke of Guiſe, and his brother the cardinal, cauſed them both to be aſſaſſinated at Blois, where the ſtates of the kingdom were aſſembled. Thus he freed himſelf from a preſent danger, but it was only to fall into another, for this action made the league and the city of Paris openly declare againſt him.

As for Scotland, all was quiet there during the whole year 1588. So long as the king had about him miniſters and counſellors attached to the intereſts of England, he generally led an eaſy and peaceable life. So, the only thing that troubled him this year was his marriage, which he could not accompliſh, though he paſſionately wiſhed it himſelf. Melvil inſinuates, that chancellor Maitland, who then managed that prince's affairs, was bribed by Elizabeth; that ſhe gave penſions to moſt of the counſellors of Scotland, and that her aim was to hinder the king from marrying. He had ſent embaſſadors [u] to Copenhagen, to treat of his marriage with the eldeſt daughter of Frederic II. but by the artifice of his miniſters, the embaſſadors power was ſo limited, that it was impoſſible for them to conclude, On the other hand, whilſt the marriage was negotiating, one Dubartus [w], a French poet, ſervant of the king of Navarre, came to Edinburgh, under colour of paying his reſpects to the king, who had expreſſed ſome eſteem for his works, and propoſed, as of himſelf, the king's marriage with Catherine his maſter's ſiſter. He ſaid ſo many fine things of the lady, that the king, by the advice of his council, ſent the lord Tungland, Melvil's brother, into France to ſee her, on pretence of negotiating ſome affair with the king her brother. The king of Denmark hearing of it, and ſeeing, moreover, the limited power of the Scotch embaſſadors, believed he was mocked, and gave his daughter to the duke of Brunſwick. Melvil aſcribes, not without great likelihood, this whole intrigue to Elizabeth, and affirms, it was ſhe that informed the king of Denmark of the lord Tungland's being ſent to the court of Navarre.

[1598] Shortly after, in the beginning of the year 1589, was diſcovered in Scotland a conſpiracy againſt the king, contrived by the earls of Huntley and Bothwell, ſon of John Prior of Coldingham, natural ſon of James V [x]. Their deſign was to ſeize the king's perſon, and compel him to reſtore the catholic religion in Scotland [y]. It is ſaid, they were excited by emiſſaries from Spain [z]. The king prevented the execution of the plot by his diligence. He purſued the earl of Huntley, who had taken up arms, till at laſt he conſtrained him to yield at diſcretion. As for Bothwell, he withdrew to his own houſe, where he meditated new projects, which I ſhall mention hereafter. I return to the affairs of England.

Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, eldeſt ſon of the late duke of Norfolk, who had been three years priſoner in the Tower, was at laſt brought to his trial before his peers, being accuſed of conſpiring againſt the queen and the ſtate. Camden ſhews, he was convicted at moſt but of being diſaffected to the government, and too much attached to the catholic religion [a]. He was however condemned to die; but the queen gave him his life [b].

Elizabeth enjoyed now a tranquillity, to which ſhe had been a ſtranger ever ſince the beginning of her reign. The queen of Scotland was no longer in the world; and the king her ſon, in expectation of one day ſucceeding Elizabeth, ſtifled his reſentment, or rather had entirely forgot the tragical death of his mother. The king of Spain was diſabled to make a freſh attempt upon England, ſince the unfortunate ſucceſs of his invincible Armada. The affairs of the United Provinces began to be reſtored by the valour and prudent conduct of count Maurice, and thoſe of France were in ſuch a ſituation, that England had nothing to fear from that quarter. The duke of Guiſe, Elizabeth's great enemy, was dead, his ſon in priſon, and the duke of Mayenne wholly bent upon revenging the death of his brothers. As for Sixtus V. though very capable of forming great projects, he could not execute them without the aid of ſome catholic potentate; and the king of Spain, on whom alone he could depend, was wholly engroſſed with the thoughts of improving the troubles of France. As for the Engliſh catholics, there was no likelihood of their ſtirring, at a time when they could not expect any foreign aſſiſtance.

In this proſperous ſtate, Elizabeth having nothing to fear either at home or abroad, had a mind to ſhew the Spaniard, the Engliſh could attack as well as defend. But as ſhe was extremely frugal, and an undertaking againſt Spain could not but be very expenſive, ſhe ordered it, that Drake and Norris took upon them to be at the charge, in hopes of making themſelves amends by the booty they ſhould meet with. So ſhe only found them ſhips of war [c], with leave to raiſe ſoldiers and ſailors for the expedition. Drake had already tried the Spaniards in America and the Channel, and was convinced they were more formidable in common opinion, than in reality. Wherefore, joining with Norris, and ſome other private perſons, they equipped a fleet, and embarked eleven thouſand ſoldiers, and fifteen hundred mariners. The Hollanders having alſo added ſome ſhips, the fleet conſiſted of fourſcore ſail [d] of all ſorts. Drake commanded at ſea, and Norris was general of the land forces. They took with them Don Antonio, who ſtiled himſelf king of Portugal, and hoped, by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, to be put in poſſeſſion of that kingdom, where he pretended to have many friends.

[n] Of the Spaniſh Armada were taken and deſtroyed in July and Auguſt, fifteen great ſhips, and 4791 men, in the fight between the Engliſh and Spaniſh navies in the Channel: and on the coaſt of Ireland, in September, ſeventeen ſhips, and 5394 men. In all thirty-two ſhips and 10,185 men. See Strype's Append. Numb. 53. Upon the diſappearance of this mighty fleet, the following writing was faſtened up to Paſquil at Rome; Pontificem mille annorum indulgentias largiturum eſſe de plenitudine poteſtatis ſuæ, ſiquis certò ſibi indicaverit, quid ſit factum de claſſe Hiſpanicâ, quò abierit: in cœlumne ſublata: an ad tartara detruſa: velin ære alicubi pendeat, an in aliquo mari fluctuet. [b] Henry earl of Derby was made lord high-ſteward of England for this purpoſe. Camden, p. 551.

They ſailed from Plymouth the 18th of April, and ſoon after arrived at the Groyne, where landing their troops, they aſſaulted the lower town and carried it by ſtorm. Then they beſieged the upper town. But Norris having advice that the Condé de Andrada was approaching with a body of troops to relieve the place, ſuddenly raiſed the ſiege to march againſt him; but the Spaniſh Condé thinking proper to retire, he purſued him, and overtaking him, ſlew three thouſand of his men. This done, he burned ſeveral villages, and, without returning to the ſiege, reimbarked his troops. The principal deſign of the Engliſh was to exert themſelves chiefly againſt Portugal.

Whilſt they were ſailing towards the coaſts of that kingdom, they met the earl of Eſſex, who joined the fleet with ſome ſhips he had armed at his own charge, and unknown to the queen. Some days after, they arrived at Penicha, a little town of Portugal, and taking it, reſtored it to Don Antonio. From thence Norris marched by land to Liſbon, Drake promiſing to follow with the fleet up the Tagus. The army marched ſixty miles without any oppoſition, and encamping before Liſbon, took the ſuburbs of St. Catherine. But as Drake performed not his promiſe, and the army wanted cannon and ammunition, it was reſolved in a council of war to retire. This reſolution was taken, becauſe there was no appearance that the Portugueze were inclined to revolt, as Don Antonio had expected, and alſo becauſe there was no news of the ſuccours he had boaſted of, from the king of Morocco. The army marching towards the mouth of the Tagus, met Drake, who had taken the town of Caſcaes, and excuſed himſelf upon the impoſſibility of performing his promiſe. Some days after, the caſtle of Caſcaes ſurrendering, it was blown up; and, to make themſelves amends for the charges of the expedition, the Engliſh ſeized ſixty veſſels laden with corn [e] belonging to the Hans-towns. Then they went and took Vigo, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, and firing the town returned to England. This expedition did ſome damage to the king of Spain, but was of no benefit to Elizabeth, and the booty was not ſufficient to pay for equipping the fleet [f]. Beſides this, above ſix thouſand men periſhed by ſickneſs. The only advantage reaped by the Engliſh, was, that they were more convinced of the weakneſs of the Spaniards in their own country.

The Hans-towns made great noiſe on account of the ſeizure of their ſhips in the Tagus, and ſent embaſſadors to the queen with their complaints. They were told, in the firſt place, that in the patent granted them by Edward III. it was expreſly provided, they ſhould not import any commodities into the dominions of the profeſſed and open enemies of England. Secondly, that a neutrality was ſo to be ordered, that in aſſiſting one of the parties, the other ſhould not be damaged; and that it was a thing well known, that warlike proviſions carried to one of the contending parties, were contraband goods, and liable to ſeizure. In the third place, they could not juſtly complain of the taking their veſſels, ſince the queen had warned them not to import any proviſions to Spain and Portugal, unleſs they would hazard their being ſeized by the Engliſh.

This affair was of little moment: but what paſſed in France this year was much more conſiderable. The ſtep Henry III. had taken, in cauſing the duke of Guiſe to be ſtabbed, ſerved only to throw him into greater trouble. His ſwearing again to the league in the preſence of the ſtates before he diſmiſſed them, ſignified nothing. The leaguers, as they could no longer truſt to his promiſes and oaths, almoſt entirely alienated the whole kingdom from him. Hence he ſaw himſelf forced to call the king of Navarre and the Hugonots to his aſſiſtance, and join with them againſt the league. It is a thing very remarkable, that this prince, who had ſworn to extirpate the Hugonots, and ſolemnly declared he would never keep promiſe with them, ſcarce found any other ſubjects but the Hugonots in whom he could confide. The forces brought him by the King of Navarre, and ten thouſand Switzers, two thouſand Landſquenets, with ſome horſe, which came in ſeaſon, enabled him to beſiege or block up Paris with an army of thirty-eight thouſand men. But juſt as he ſaw himſelf upon the point of compelling the Pariſians to return to their duty, James Clement, a Jacobin monk, ſtabbed him in the belly with a dagger, of which he died in two days. Before he expired, he nominated for his ſucceſſor, the king of Navarre, head of the houſe of Bourbon, who aſſumed the name of Henry IV.

The league refuſed to acknowledge the new king. Nay, he ſaw himſelf deſerted by ſeveral great men of the late king's party; and, in order to retain ſome of the catholic nobility, he was obliged to promiſe them, that he would within ſuch a time be inſtructed in the principles of the Romiſh religion; that is, would turn catholic; for that was the meaning given to theſe words. Mean while, he had neither men nor money, the Switzers and Germans who had ſerved Henry III. threatening to leave him, unleſs he would pay them their arrears, which he was not able to do. In this extremity he had recourſe to Elizabeth, who generouſly promiſed him both men and money. In expectation of theſe ſuccours, he ſtood firm againſt the duke of Mayenne, who had forced him into Normandy, and even attacked him at Arques, but without ſucceſs. Henry thought himſelf in ſuch danger, that he would have taken the advice given him by ſome to fly into England, if the marſhal de Biron had not ſtopped him. At laſt, the Engliſh ſupplies arrived, conſiſting of four thouſand men, under the command of Peregrine lord Willoughby [g], and of twenty-two thouſand pounds ſterling in gold. With this reinforcement he was able to approach Paris, and take one of the ſuburbs of that city. But the duke of Mayenne having entered with his army, he was forced to retire. Mean while, the duke of Mayenne had cauſed the old cardinal de Bourbon to be proclaimed king, and himſelf had aſſumed the title of lieutenant-general of the crown of France. Henry leaving the country about Paris, returned into Normandy, where he reduced ſome places to his obedience, after which he ſent home the Engliſh forces.

Though the king of Denmark had given his eldeſt daughter to the duke of Brunſwick, the king of Scotland perſiſted in his deſign to marry into his family, and demanded his ſecond daughter. Frederick granted his requeſt, but on condition he ſhould cauſe her to be demanded by a ſolemn embaſſy before the 1ſt day of May. But he died in this interval, leaving his ſucceſſor under age. This did not hinder James from thinking ſeriouſly of his marriage with the princeſs Ann, the new king's ſiſter. But when he moved in council the ſending of an embaſſy to Copenhagen, he was told, he would hazard a rupture with the queen of England, if he married without conſulting her. The authors of this advice knew Elizabeth would raiſe obſtacles to the marriage. And indeed, in her anſwer to the king, ſhe tried to make him ſenſible of ſundry inconveniencies if he eſpouſed the princeſs of Denmark; and, to divert him from it, propoſed to him Catherine, the king of Navarre's ſiſter, who was not yet come to the crown of France, promiſing to ſerve him to the utmoſt of her power. Elizabeth's anſwer being laid before the council, there was not a privy-counſellor but what declared againſt the Daniſh match. James was ſo vexed to be thus contradicted, that by means of a truſty ſervant, he cauſed the inhabitants of Edinburgh to raiſe in arms, and threaten to tear the chancellor and privy-counſellors in pieces, if the king's marriage with the princeſs of Denmark was not concluded. Theſe threats terrifying the council, embaſſadors were inſtantly appointed to negotiate the marriage. But withal, care taken to inſert in their inſtructions a clauſe, which put them to a ſtand in the very beginning of their negotiation, and obliged them to ſend home the lord Dingwal to demand fuller powers, or leave to return. This lord arriving at court when the chancellor was abſent, the king himſelf drew the power required by his embaſſadors, whereupon the marriage was ſoon concluded. Preſently after, the new queen was delivered to the embaſſadors to be conducted into Scotland: but a ſtorm ariſing whilſt ſhe was at ſea, drove her upon the coaſt of Norway, where ſhe was forced to land. The wind continued ſo long contrary, that James, impatient to ſee his bride, could not ſtay till it changed. So, embarking in a ſmall veſſel, he went to his queen, and paſſed the whole winter in Norway and Denmark, from whence he returned not to Scotland till May the next year, bringing his queen with him [h].

[1590] The tranquillity enjoyed by Elizabeth was liable to be diſturbed only from Spain. France was not in condition to create her any uneaſineſs, and the king of Scotland thought only of living peaceably, in expectation of the noble ſucceſſion that was to come to him. Philip II. was therefore the ſole enemy Elizabeth had to fear. But, to ſecure herſelf from all ſurpriſe, ſhe took the moſt juſt though expenſive precautions. She had always a good fleet ready to put to ſea at the firſt notice [i]. The fortified towns and ſea-ports were likewiſe in good condition [k], and this coſt her as much as if ſhe had been in actual war with Spain. But ſhe ſupplied all by her good œconomy, expending no money but what was abſolutely neceſſary. This diſpleaſed her hungry courtiers, who would have been very glad ſhe had been a little more liberal. But though ſhe knew herſelf taxed with avarice, ſhe thought not proper to alter her conduct. She thereby avoided being troubleſome to the parliament, and when ſhe wanted an extraordinary aid, was ſure to find a ready compliance in the houſe of commons, without any murmurs among the people. This advantage outweighed the ſatisfaction of being called liberal by her courtiers. Beſides, ſhe was perſuaded that what was termed avarice in her, was only good œconomy. The truth is, with the ordinary revenues of the crown, ſhe found means to ſupply the expences of her houſhold, maintain a fleet, pay the public debts, and aſſiſt her neighbours in their diſtreſs, which none of her predeceſſors had ever done. On the contrary, moſt of them, by their miſtaken bounties, had ruined their ſubjects for the pleaſure of enriching a ſmall number of courtiers. Beſides, Elizabeth had a particular reaſon to ſpare the purſes of her ſubjects, in order to gain their affection, the ſtrongeſt ſupport of her throne. Wherefore, one of the chief objects of her care was a due management of her treaſury, with intent to be always able to withſtand the attacks of her enemies both at home and abroad. Her inſpection in the year 1590 into the cuſtoms, notwithſtanding the endeavours that were uſed to divert her from it, occaſioned her raiſing them from fourteen thouſand pounds a year (at which ſum they were farmed by ſir Thomas Smith) to forty-two thouſand, and at laſt to fifty thouſand. But her great œconomy hindered her not from parting with her money when it was neceſſary. Though, in the two foregoing years ſhe had lent about two hundred thouſand crowns to the king of France, ſhe ſupplied him with ſixty thouſand more, becauſe ſhe plainly ſaw of what conſequence the ruin of that prince might be to England. Moreover, the garriſons of the Briel and Fluſhing, beſides the three thouſand men maintained by her in the Low-Countries, coſt her yearly above four hundred thouſand florins [l], becauſe ſhe was forced to advance the money till the ſtates ſhould be able to repay her. In fine, ſhe paid alſo conſiderable penſions to ſeveral perſons of the court of Scotland, whoſe buſineſs it was to acquaint her with all that paſſed there, and to keep the king well affected to England, as he had been for ſome time.

Whilſt Elizabeth enjoyed ſome tranquillity, France was troubled with the wars between the king and the league. In March the king gained the battle of Yvry againſt the duke of Mayenne, after which he inveſted Paris, and even took the ſuburbs. That great city was now reduced to extremity, when the duke of Parma arrived from the Netherlands, and forced the king to raiſe the blockade. That done, he returned without the king's being able to oblige him to fight.

On the other hand, in the duke of Parma's abſence, count Maurice, who had already taken Breda by ſurpriſe, made ſome farther progreſs, which helped to put the affairs of the United Provinces in a better ſituation than before.

The ſame year the duke of Mercœur, of the houſe of Lorrain, became maſter of Bretagne, by the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards, who took Hennebond and Blavet. This affair diſturbed Elizabeth, who did not care to have the Spaniards ſo near her, eſpecially as Philip II. might claim Bretagne for his daughter the infanta Iſabella, whoſe mother was daughter of Henry II.

Sir Francis Walſingham ſecretary of ſtate, who had long ſerved the queen with great zeal and ability, died this year, ſo poor that he was buried privately to ſave charges [m]. Thomas Randolph, who I have frequently mentioned, and who had been employed in ſeveral embaſſies, particularly in Scotland, ſoon followed Walſingham.

[1591] The civil wars of France were then the moſt material affair of Europe. It could no longer be doubted, that Philip II. was thinking either to diſmember that kingdom, or procure it for his daughter Iſabella, grand-daughter to Henry II. notwithſtanding the Salic law. Sixtus V. favoured the project to the utmoſt of his power, under colour of hindering a heretic from being acknowledged king of France. If this deſign was not executed, it muſt be wholly aſcribed to the duke of Mayenne's jealouſy, who did not intend to labour for others. Mean while, Henry IV. was extremely embarraſſed. The forces of the Hugonots alone were not ſufficient to enable him to ſurmount all obſtacles, ſince he had no leſs to do than to conquer the whole kingdom of France, and the catholic nobles in his army ſerved him with reluctance. Nay, they had required him, in return for their ſervice, to be inſtructed, and in ſuch a manner, that the inſtruction ſhould produce in him a change of religion. In this preſſing neceſſity, he could not be without foreign ſuccours, and theſe ſuccours could be had only from Germany or England. It was viſibly the intereſt of Elizabeth and the proteſtant princes to ſupport Henry, not to ſee the king of Spain's power increaſed by the acquiſition of France. But, however, it was not eaſy to perſuade them, that they ought to employ all the forces to maintain a war, of which Henry was to reap all the benefit. They were very ready to ſupply him with troops, but not to pay them. It was his buſineſs to find money. Elizabeth plainly perceived of what conſequence it was to her to preſerve France; but expected that the ſuccours ſhe gave the king, ſhould be employed in driving the Spaniards out of the maritime provinces of Bretagne, Normandy, and Picardy, for that was what moſt nearly concerned her. It was the king's intereſt, on the contrary, to expel his enemies from the center of the kingdom, before he thought of attacking them on the borders; and the more, as he thereby put Elizabeth under a continual neceſſity of aſſiſting him. However, to receive aid from Elizabeth, he was to promiſe what Elizabeth required. They agreed therefore upon a treaty, whereby Elizabeth engaged to ſend three thouſand men into Bretagne and Picardy, to hinder the Spaniards from ſettling in thoſe provinces, on condition ſhe ſhould be repaid within a year [n] all her charges in raiſing and keeping the troops. Henry conſented to every thing, not to delay the negotiation, though he was fully convinced of the impoſſibility to perform his promiſe by the time appointed. Preſently after, the three thouſand Engliſh paſſed, part into Bretagne, under the conduct of Norris, and part into Picardy, under the command of ſir Roger Williams.

At the ſame time Henry had negotiated in Germany, a levy of eleven thouſand men, by means of the elector of Brandenburgh and Caſimir prince palatine. But this ſupply not ſufficing, he ſent and demanded a ſecond from Elizabeth, and, to obtain it the more eaſily, gave her to underſtand that with this reinforcement he ſhould be able to undertake the ſiege of Roan. Elizabeth's great deſire to ſee the maritime towns of France out of the power of the leaguers, cauſed her to fall into the ſnare. She made therefore with Henry a new treaty, whereby ſhe engaged to ſupply him with four thouſand men more, and pay them two months, imagining that that time was ſufficient for the ſiege of Roan. When theſe ſupplies were ready, ſhe gave the command to the earl of Eſſex [o], a young nobleman, who had much of her favour, and for whom it was believed ſhe felt ſomething more than a bare eſteem, though ſhe was then fifty-eight years of age. The earl of Eſſex, greedy of glory, departed from England full of hopes to ſignaliſe himſelf at the ſiege of Roan, but at his arrival in France, found the ſiege had not been ſo much as thought of; that the king was employed before Noyon, and intended to ſend the Engliſh forces into Champagne. Whereupon he returned into England, having firſt given the king his parole of honour to come and join him as ſoon as the ſiege of Roan ſhould be undertaken. He left his troops however in France under the command of ſir Roger Williams.

Elizabeth was extremely offended to be thus deceived. She wrote to Henry, that ſince he had broke his word, he might for the future proceed without her aſſiſtance, and that ſhe intended to recal all her troops, unleſs he immediately performed his promiſe. Elizabeth's letter embarraſſed Henry greatly. He had certain advice that the duke of Parma was preparing to return into France, and in ſuch a juncture the recalling of the Engliſh forces would have been very unſeaſonable. He was forced therefore, in order to ſatisfy Elizabeth, to cauſe Roan to be inveſted by the marſhal de Biron. But he took a freſh occaſion from thence to demand of Elizabeth a new ſupply of five thouſand men, on pretence that the troops already ſent were extremely diminiſhed by ſickneſs and deſertion. At the ſame time the earl of Eſſex, knowing Roan was inveſted, went over to the ſiege [p], contrary to the queen's expreſs orders; ſuppoſing, that ſince he had given the king his parole, nothing could free him from his engagement. Elizabeth was ſo diſpleaſed with the king and the earl, that ſhe returned a very rough anſwer to the French embaſſador, who preſſed her for the five thouſand men demanded by the king his maſter, and left him no hopes of obtaining them. At the ſame time ſhe diſpatched ſir Thomas Leyton, the earl of Eſſex's uncle, with an expreſs order to him inſtantly to return, if he would not be entirely diſgraced. Mean while, Henry hearing the duke of Parma was departed from Bruſſels about the end of November, repaired to his army before Roan to carry on the ſiege, hoping to take the city before the duke of Parma's arrival. Shortly after, he ſent Du Pleſſis Mornay to Elizabeth, to try to obtain the deſired ſupply.

Du Pleſſis, accompanied with the embaſſador in ordinary, being admitted to audience, and telling the queen his buſineſs, ſhe plainly anſwered, ſhe would not be the French king's dupe; neither would ſhe for the future concern herſelf any more with his affairs, nor was he to expect any other aſſiſtance from her than her prayers: That he had demanded a ſpeedy aid for the ſiege of Roan, which ſhe had accordingly ſent him; but inſtead of executing their treaty, he had loſt his time before Noyon, and ſuffered the Engliſh troops to decay, whilſt he was making war in Champagne: That he had given the duke of Parma four months to prepare, and then a ſpeedy ſupply was deſired of her, which would not have been wanted, had things been done in time. To this ſhe added great threats againſt the earl of Eſſex, ſaying, he would have it thought that he ruled in England, but nothing was more falſe, and ſhe would make him the moſt pitiful fellow in the kingdom; that, inſtead of ſending freſh troops into France, ſhe was determined to recal thoſe that were there. Then pretending to be indiſpoſed, ſhe deſired the embaſſadors to be contented with this ſhort audience, hardly giving Du Pleſſis time to return any anſwer to her complaints. But he had taken care beforehand to prepare a memorial which he would have preſented to her, but ſhe bid him give it the lord treaſurer. In ſhort, Du Pleſſis returned without obtaining any thing, and the earl of Eſſex was forced to go back to England, where he found means to appeaſe the queen. Mean while, the duke of Parma having entered France, and being joined by the duke of Mayenne and the young duke of Guiſe, who had eſcaped out of priſon, raiſed the ſiege of Roan. Henry eaſily perceived by Elizabeth's conduct, ſhe would not ſuffer herſelf to be amuſed by his artifices, and for fear of loſing ſo neceſſary an aſſiſtance, laboured ſo effectually to be reconciled with her, that at laſt ſhe ſent him two thouſand freſh men; but it was not till after the raiſing of the ſiege.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, the late duke of Norfolk's ſon was gone with ſix men of war to the Azores, to wait for the Spaniſh plate-fleet, homeward bound from America. Having ſtayed ſix months in the Iſle of Flores, he was himſelf almoſt ſurpriſed by Alphonſo Baſſano, who was ſent to convoy home the fleet with fifty-three ſhips of war. He had the good fortune to eſcape the danger by a timely retreat; but one of his ſhips that was not ſpeedy enough, was taken by the Spaniards after a ſharp engagement [q]. The Engliſh made themſelves ample amends for this loſs by ſeveral prizes, and particularly by taking a ſhip richly laden, bound for the Weſt-Indies, in which, it is ſaid, they found two and twenty thouſand indulgences for the Spaniards of America [r].

This year the queen publiſhed two proclamations, the firſt of which prohibited the carrying of any warlike ſtores or proviſions into the king of Spain's dominions. The ſecond, publiſhed in October, expreſly forbid the harbouring any perſon who ſhould come from the Engliſh ſeminaries, at Rome or Rheims, or from a third lately founded by the king of Spain at Valladolid [s].

[1592] The war which was continued in France made Elizabeth very uneaſy, becauſe the Spaniards had got footing in Bretagne, from whence they might readily make ſome attempt upon England. Henry, perfectly knowing her extreme deſire to diſlodge them from that poſt, demanded a farther aid to carry the war into that province. Though Elizabeth had experienced that ſhe could not much rely on his word, becauſe it was not always in his power to make war where he pleaſed, ſhe concluded with him however a new treaty to this effect: That ſhe ſhould furniſh him with four thouſand men, ſome pieces of ordnance, and a certain quantity of ammunition; That he ſhould add to the Engliſh troops four thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe: and this army be employed to recover Bretagne: That he ſhould within a year repay all her charges: That he ſhould not make peace with the leaguers till they promiſed to aſſiſt him in driving the Spaniards out of the kingdom: That England ſhould be expreſly included in the peace he ſhould make with Spain. Elizabeth ſincerely performed her engagement, and ſent four thouſand men into Bretagne, under the command of Norris [t]. But Henry, inſtead of joining his troops with the Engliſh, and carrying the war into Bretagne, ordered them to ſerve in Normandy, whether he was moſt preſſed in thoſe parts, or had made treaty only to amuſe the queen. However this be, Elizabeth reſented it extremely to be again deceived. She often wrote to the king, complaining of his proceedings, but to no purpoſe. In her anger, ſhe was going to recal all her troops; but hearing the duke of Parma was preparing to make a third expedition into France, ſacrificed her reſentment to the good of that kingdom, which was in ſome meaſure her own. Indeed the duke of Parma was upon the point of re-entering France; but death, which ſeized him at the ſame time, freed Henry as well as Elizabeth from their uneaſineſs.

Scotland was then diſturbed by Bothwell, who made this year a freſh attempt to become maſter of the king's perſon. As his deſign was diſcovered before it could be executed, he was forced to fly into England. Elizabeth being informed of it, wrote to the king that ſhe would cauſe thoſe who had harboured the fugitive to be ſeverely puniſhed. And yet, when James ſent and required her to deliver him up purſuant to their treaty, ſhe evaded his demand, being well pleaſed to keep that prince always in a ſort of uneaſineſs which ſhould oblige him to regard her.

The riches brought by the Spaniſh fleets from the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies were a continual allurement to the Engliſh, who attempted almoſt every year to take them. Sir Walter Raleigh with that deſign departing this year with fifteen ſail, met near the Azores a ſeven-decked carrack, one hundred and ſixty-five feet long, moſt richly laden, which he took without much difficulty. This prize made him ſome amends for his charges in fitting out his fleet. But the contrary winds hindered him from executing a more important enterpriſe projected againſt America [u].

There was a ſort of prodigy this ſummer at London: the Thames was ſo dried up and the channel ſo ſhallow, that a man might ride over it near London-bridge [w].

[1593] The parliament meeting in February 1593 [x], paſſed an act which troubled not only the catholics, but even proteſtants who differed in certain points from the church of England, and were called Puritans. By this act, thoſe who neglected to be preſent at divine ſervice, eſtabliſhed by law, were liable to certain penalties [y]; and ſo, not only was it no longer permitted to be a Roman catholic with impunity, but even a proteſtant without conforming to the church of England. Thus in ſome meaſure were renewed the days of Henry VIII. when it was unlawful to ſwerve ever ſo little from the religion of their ſovereign: with this difference, that under Elizabeth the penalty was not death as in the reign of her father. Nevertheleſs there was in this laſt act ſomething more hard than in thoſe of Henry VIII. That prince, abſolute as he was, contented himſelf with puniſhing ſuch as by ſome overt-act oppoſed the eſtabliſhed religion; but by this new ſtatute, the ſubjects were obliged openly to profeſs the religion of the church of England. Elizabeth, exaſperated againſt the catholics, who had made frequent attempts upon her crown, and even her life, would have been very glad to have cleared the kingdom of them. On the other heard, ſhe could not endure the puritans, looking upon them as obſtinate people, who for very frivolous cauſes bred a ſchiſm in the proteſtant church. Whilſt ſhe was in danger from the queen of Scots, France, and Spain; in a word, whilſt her affairs remained in a ſort of uncertainty, ſhe left the puritans unmoleſted, for fear of uniting them in the ſame intereſt with the catholics. But no ſooner was ſhe firmly eſtabliſhed, but ſhe hearkened to the ſuggeſtions of the clergy, who repreſented the puritans as ſeditious perſons, who rebelled againſt the laws, and by their diſobedience ſhook the foundations of the government. This is not the only time, nor is England the only ſtate, where diſobedience in point of religion has been confounded with rebellion againſt the ſovereign. There is ſcarce a chriſtian ſtate, where the prevailing ſect will ſuffer the leaſt diviſion, or the leaſt ſwerving from the eſtabliſhed opinions, no, not even in private. Shall I venture to ſay it? It is the clergy chiefly who ſupport this ſtrange principle of non-toleration, ſo little agreeable to chriſtian charity. The ſeverity which from this time began to be exerciſed in England upon the non-conformiſts [z] produced terrible effects in the following reigns, and occaſioned troubles and factions which remain to this day, and of which perhaps there will be no end theſe many years.

The ſame parliament taking into conſideration the queen's great expences, both in defending the kingdom againſt the Spaniſh invaſion, and in aſſiſting the French king and the United Provinces, granted her an extraordinary aid of money. But it was inſerted in the act, that ſo large and unuſual a ſupply, granted to a moſt excellent queen, who made ſo good uſe of the public money, ſhould not be drawn into a precedent [a]. The queen coming to the houſe to give the royal aſſent to this act, made a fine ſpeech, wherein ſhe forgot not to extol her love and care of her ſubjects, and her attachment to the proteſtant religion. She ſpoke in lofty terms of the bravery of the Engliſh, and ſhewed how formidable they were to all the nations in Europe [b]. No perſon was ever more maſter of the art of gaining the affection of her people, by expreſſing an uncommon value and tenderneſs for them.

Amidſt all the occaſions the queen had to congratulate herſelf upon her good fortune, ſhe ſtill felt ſome uneaſineſs with reſpect to the tranſactions of Scotland. King James began to be ruled by ſuſpicious perſons, and the queen received advice that the Spaniards, aſſiſted by the catholics, were contriving ſome dangerous plot [c], and were countenanced by the earls of Huntley, Angus, and Errol. She heard farther that the king acted not with the vigour neceſſary to prevent their deſigns, and thereby gave cauſe to ſuſpect he was himſelf inclined to innovations. She did not entirely rely on that prince. Beſides his ſuffering himſelf to be always guided by thoſe whom he entruſted with the adminiſtration of his affairs, ſhe was afraid he had been inſpired with the deſire to revenge the queen his mother's death; and that his proteſtations of being ever attached to her intereſt, were only intended to amuſe her. For this reaſon, ſhe ſent the lord Borough to give him advice, and deſire him to inform her of what he knew concerning the plots of the Spaniards and catholics. She wiſhed moreover, he would ſhew himſelf a little more ſevere to thoſe who endeavoured to raiſe troubles in Scotland, and would admit to his council only perſons of known loyalty. James anſwered, he would do what the queen deſired, as far as his own intereſt and the laws of the land would allow. But withal he told the embaſſador, that his revenues being extremely diminiſhed, he expected the queen to furniſh him with means to puniſh thoſe who ſhould dare to diſturb the public peace. He alſo required ſhe ſhould deliver up Bothwell, who had twice attempted his life, and even ſent Robert Melvil to Elizabeth, to demand him expreſly. But ſhe refuſed to ſurrender him, and only baniſhed him out of England, as ſhe was bound by the treaty of league made with the king.

Bothwell not being able to ſtay longer in England, returned into Scotland, and withdrew to his own houſe. Shortly after, his party ſo increaſed, by accidents which it is needleſs to mention, that he had the boldneſs to come into the king's preſence, under colour of begging his pardon. James was ſurpriſed to ſee him, but was more ſo, when he perceived that his whole court, except ſome of his miniſters, were Bothwell's friends. He was therefore forced as it were to grant him a pardon, on condition that he ſhould depart the kingdom, and not return unleſs recalled. Bothwell accepted the condition, and concealed himſelf on the borders of England. But at his departure, he left ſo ſtrong a party in the court, that the king was at laſt obliged to diſmiſs the chancellor, the lord treaſurer, and others whom he moſt truſted. Bothwell was ready to improve this change, but the king broke his meaſures by declaring to the ſtates, he was compelled to pardon him, and by deſiring their aid to free him from his yoke. The ſtates declaring for the king, he recalled his miniſters, and Bothwell's friends were driven from the court.

In this aſſembly of the ſtates, an ordinance was made for ſupporting the proteſtant religion, as eſtabliſhed in Scotland. But as the king and his council were ſuſpected of favouring the plots of the catholics, this ordinance was not deemed ſtrong enough by the people, who thought that in ſuch a juncture, the ſtates ſhould have taken more vigorous reſolutions. However this be, the king's obſtinacy in keeping in the miniſtry and about his perſon, men who ſeemed to have no zeal for the proteſtant religion, gave occaſion to ſuſpect ſome dangerous plot was contriving for its deſtruction.

What paſſed in France made Elizabeth no leſs uneaſy than the king of Scotland's inconſtancy. General Norris was ſtill in Bretagne with the Engliſh forces. He had been promiſed a place in that province for a retreat, and that the duke d'Aumont and Eſpinay ſhould join him; but he was long left there without being thought of. At laſt, Eſpinay being arrived, they made together ſome little conqueſts, too inconſiderable to requite Elizabeth for the maintenance of her troops, which coſt her weekly three thouſand two hundred pounds ſterling [d]. D'Ewes, p. 470.

[y] In the preamble it is ſaid, That this act was made for the preventing and avoiding ſuch great inconveniencies and perils as might happen and grow by the wicked and dangerous practices of ſeditious ſectaries and diſloyal perſons. The act ran, That if any perſon above the age of ſixteen years, ſhall refuſe to repair to ſome church, or forbear to do the ſame for the ſpace of a month, ſhall be committed to priſon, there to remain without bail or mainpriſe, till they ſhall conform---and make ſuch open ſubmiſſion and declaration of their conformity, as by this act is appointed. The offenders againſt this ſtatute, who refuſed to make this ſubmiſſion, were to abjure the realm, and not to return without her majeſty's licence, under the penalty of ſuffering as felons, without benefit of the clergy. This bill met with great oppoſition in the houſe of commons, as the reader may ſee in D'Ewes, p. 474, &c. where the ſpeeches on both ſides are inſerted. There was an act made alſo againſt popiſh recuſants, by which they were confined within five miles of their reſpective dwellings, on forfeiture of all their goods and chattels, together with lands, during life. By another act, all the abbey-lands are confirmed to to the crown and grantees.

[z] Theſe ſeverities were probably occaſioned by the diſturbances cauſed by Hacket, and ſome other enthuſiaſts. However this be, the ſame Hacket, on July 28, 1591, and alſo Henry Barrow, John Greenwood, Daniel Studley, and two more, were executed April 6, 1593, for writing and publiſhing ſeditious books; as was the next year John Penry, for writing a book called Martin Mar-Prelate. See Stow, p. 764—766.

[a] The laity granted three ſubſidies of 2s. 8d. in the pound of goods, and 4s. of lands; together with ſix fifteenths and tenths, amounting in all to 280,000l. And the clergy advanced two whole ſubſidies of 4s. in the pound, to be paid in two years. This ſubſidy-bill paſſed with great difficulty the lower houſe, being debated on February 16, March 2, 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 12, 16, and 19. See the debates in D'Ewes, p. 473, 477, &c. 483. Let it be obſerved here, that a fifteenth and a tenth was a certain tax on every city, borough, and town, not upon every man in particular, but a general ſum, in proportion to the fifteenth part of the wealth of the reſpective places. Subſidy was impoſed on every ſingle perſon, as they are aſſeſſed by poll, according to the value of their goods and lands.

[b] She made this ſpeech the laſt day of the ſeſſion, April 10, 1593.

[c] This plot was, to raiſe a ſubſcription for a large ſum of money in Scotland; and then an army of thirty thouſand Spaniards was to land in that kingdom, about the end of the year 1592, which was to be joined by Bothwell, &c. with a body of troops: and all theſe were to march into England, to revenge the queen of Scot's death. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 190—194.

[d] It appears by a paper in Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 194, that the king of France was then indebted to her 52,783l.

to drive the Spaniards out of Bretagne, Henry uſed them only to keep his enemies in awe, and hinder them from making greater progreſs, whilſt he was warring elſewhere. Elizabeth ſeeing herſelf thus deceived, would have recalled her troops, but was perſuaded by the marſhal d'Aumont, not only to leave them, but even to ſend freſh ſupplies, upon the hopes he gave her that the king would very ſoon make a powerful effort to reduce that province.

The queen's vexation at Henry's proceedings was nothing in compariſon of her concern when ſhe heard he was going to change his religion. At the firſt news, ſhe diſpatched Thomas Wilks to diſſuade him, if poſſible, from that deſign; but at his arrival, Wilks found the thing already done. However Henry thought proper to inform him of the reaſons of his change, that he might acquaint the queen his miſtreſs with the ſame. All he ſaid on the occaſion tended to this [e], that he had changed his religion againſt his will, and after as long a delay as poſſible; but being at laſt convinced he ſhould never be fixed in his throne whilſt a proteſtant, he had determined to embrace the catholic religion; that is, in other words, having put his conſcience in the balance with his crown, he had given it for the latter. After ſo expreſs a declaration of the inſincerity of his converſion, it is no wonder Elizabeth ſhould loſe much of her eſteem for him, and the pope and leaguers not conſider him as a true catholic; or rather, it is ſtrange they ſhould be ſatisfied with an outward profeſſion. Morlant the French embaſſador at London, having told Elizabeth the ſubſtance of the king's diſcourſe to Wilks, ſhe wrote the king the following lines:

"IT is hardly poſſible to expreſs the extreme grief and diſſatisfaction which has ſeized me upon Morlant's repreſentation of things. Good God! what a miſerable world do we live in? Could I, ever have thought, ſir, that any ſecular conſideration could have prevailed with you to diſcard a juſt ſenſe of God and his fear? Or can you ever reaſonably expect that providence will grant this change of your's a happy iſſue? Or could you entertain a jealouſy that the gracious being, who had ſo long ſupported and preſerved you, would fail and abandon you at laſt? It is, believe me, a dangerous experiment, To do evil that good may come. But I hope you may be yet recovered to a better inclination, even the ſpirit of a ſound mind. In the mean time I ſhall not ceaſe to recommend your caſe to God in my daily prayers, and earneſtly to beſeech him that Eſau's hands may not pollute the bleſſings and birth-right of Jacob. The promiſe you make of a ſacred and friendly alliance, I conceive myſelf to have deſired, and even earned as a vaſt expence; but I had not mattered that, had you ſtill kept yourſelf the ſon of the ſame father. From henceforth I cannot look on myſelf as your ſiſter, in reſpect to our common father; for I muſt and ſhall always pay a much greater regard to nature than choice in that relation; as I may appeal to God, whom I beſeech to recover you into the path of a ſafer and ſounder judgment."

Your ſiſter after the old-faſhioned way.
As for the new I have nothing to do with it.
ELIZABETH.

This war is not the only affair Wilks was charged to mention to the king of France. He had orders to complain from the queen, that the late treaty was not executed, and d'Aumont's delay had been very expenſive to the queen. Henry threw all the blame on the marſhal, and poſitively promiſed to march himſelf into Bretagne, when the truce for that province was expired. He added, that in the mean time he would adviſe with his council concerning the place of retreat for the Engliſh troops. But theſe were only empty words. The king's intention was not to employ his forces againſt Bretagne, before he had reduced the reſt of France, but only to uſe the Engliſh troops by way of diverſion to the duke of Mercœur, for fear, when he had made himſelf abſolute maſter of Bretagne, he ſhould aſſiſt the duke of Mayenne. Still leſs did he intend to give a place of retreat to the Engliſh in that province, leſt he ſhould find it very difficult to diſlodge them. Theſe things troubled the queen exceedingly, and certainly had ſhe aided Henry only from a motive of friendſhip and generoſity, as ſhe would have made him believe, ſhe would never have ſuffered ſuch infringements of the treaties. But it was manifeſtly her intereſt to oppoſe the Spaniard's deſigns, who had a mind to become maſter of France, under pretence of maintaining the catholic religion. Henry perfectly knew Elizabeth's policy, and therefore gave her only good words, well knowing ſhe was concerned to aſſiſt him. At length the king of Spain preparing to exert his utmoſt in ſupport of the league, which was declining ſince the king's turning catholic, Elizabeth readily made a league offenſive and defenſive with Henry, whatever reaſon ſhe had to complain of him. This league was concluded and ſigned at Melun in October, and among other articles it was agreed, that a peace ſhould not be made without a mutual conſent.

About this time it was diſcovered in England, that one Heſquet had been ſent by ſome Engliſh fugitives, to perſuade Ferdinand earl of Derby to aſſume the title of king, as great grandſon of Mary daughter of Henry VII [f]. When this was propoſed to the earl, Heſquet added, he might rely on the aſſiſtance of Philip II. but if he refuſed to do what he propoſed, or did not keep the thing ſecret, he might be aſſured he ſhould not live long. The earl of Derby fearing to be inſnared, informed againſt Heſquet, who was taken and hanged. But he died himſelf within four months by a ſtrange poiſon, which made him vomit himſelf to death [g]. His gentleman of the horſe was ſuſpected of the deed, becauſe he rode away the firſt day of his lord's illneſs. The Engliſh fugitives imagined there were ſuch numbers of malcontents in England, that ſome great man's declaring againſt the queen would be ſufficient to raiſe a general rebellion. This is not the only time, that in the like juncture fugitives had flattered themſelves with ſuch vain hopes [h].

The duke of Parma's death had not entirely hindered the expedition deſigned by the Spaniards againſt France. Their army had entered Picardy and taken Noyon, and was returned into Flanders. After Parma's death, the count de Fuentes and D. Diego d'Ibarra were at the head of the council, expecting a new governor. While the adminiſtration of affairs reſted in their hands, they inceſſantly endeavoured to excite troubles in Scotland, by aſſuring the catholics of a powerful aſſiſtance from the king of Spain. [1594] Their project was to ſend a Spaniſh army into Scotland, to aſſaſſinate or poiſon queen Elizabeth, and then invade England with their army from Scotland, which the general conſternation upon her death would render leſs difficult. To execute the deſign upon Elizabeth, they had caſt their eyes on Roderigo Lopez a Jew, and two Portugueſe. Lopez the queen's phyſician had promiſed to poiſon her for fifty thouſand crowns. This plot being diſcovered, the three accomplices confeſſed they had been corrupted by the count de Fuentes and Don Diego d'Ibarra, to undertake ſo execrable a deſign. Lopez however pleaded in his excuſe, that his intention was only to draw money from the king of Spain, and that he had even preſented to the queen a rich jewel received from that prince. But as he had given no intimation of the plot, his excuſe was not allowed. At the gallows he affirmed, "That he loved the queen as well as Jeſus Chriſt." This was a plain indication that he was not unjuſtly condemned.

The day after theſe three villains were executed, a fourth, one Patrick Cullen, an Iriſh fencing-maſter, who had been ſent from the Low-Countries to kill the queen, underwent the ſame fate. Edmund York and Richard Williams, who had been ſuborned by Ibarra to commit the ſame crime, were alſo arreſted, and others were diſcovered who had engaged to fire the navy. Elizabeth on this occaſion wrote to the archduke Earneſt, who had been appointed governor of the Low-Countries, to demand the puniſhment of the authors. She told him moreover, that to clear the king of Spain from ſuſpicion, the moſt proper way would be to ſurrender all the fugitive Engliſh in his dominions, or at leaſt thoſe who were concerned in the conſpiracies [i]. But foreſeeing that Antonio Perez, who had endeavoured to excite troubles in Arragon, and was then in England, might likewiſe be demanded, ſhe told the archduke, the king of France had ſent him to his embaſſador at London without her knowledge, and he had never been aſſiſted by her: but all this was to no purpoſe. On the other hand, the earl of Eſſex received Perez into his houſe to learn of him the ſecrets of the Spaniſh monarchy.

It was not only in England that the Spaniards had the mortification to ſee their projects miſcarry. In France likewiſe their affairs were in a very ill ſituation ſince Henry's embracing the catholic religion. The cities and great men who had been for the league, returned in crowds to the obedience of the king, and all the people manifeſtly tended to ſhake off the Spaniſh yoke. The 22d of March, the city of Paris was ſurrendered to the king by count Briſſac, and the duke of Feria who was there was obliged to take a ſafe-conduct from the king, to retire with his Spaniſh troops to the duke of Guiſe's army. It was then only that Henry ſeriouſly reſolved to drive the Spaniards out of Bretagne, who were in poſſeſſion of many places in that province. The marſhal d'Aumont having been intruſted with the management of the war, made good uſe of the Engliſh troops, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves with that bravery, that the queen was obliged to write to Norris, not to be ſo laviſh of the blood of her ſubjects. Martin Forbiſher, a famous ſea officer, was killed at a ſiege in this war [k]. Some time after, the queen recalled Norris, to ſend him into Ireland.

The affairs of Scotland gave Elizabeth perpetual uneaſineſs. She had intimations from thence, that the Spaniſh faction was powerful at court, that ſomething was contriving againſt the proteſtant religion, and that the king ſeemed to incline to the popiſh party. This filling the queen with ſuſpicions, ſhe reſolved to ſend the lord Zouch into Scotland, as well to be informed of the truth, as to fortify the Engliſh party and inſtruct king James in his true intereſt. The embaſſador repreſented to the king from his miſtreſs, that the late act of the ſtates was not capable to reſtrain the inſolence of the Roman catholics, who affected publicly to exerciſe their religion, and held an almoſt open correſpondence with the king of Spain. James anſwered, that he would proceed againſt the catholics by the eſtabliſhed laws; and if they refuſed a ſubmiſſion to the laws, he would proſecute them with the ſword, provided the queen, who had the ſame intereſt as himſelf, would contribute to the expence of the war. The embaſſador, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, earneſtly preſſed him to procure other laws againſt the catholics more ſevere than the preſent. To this James, with ſome heat, replied, he was not at the queen's command, nor did it belong to her to preſcribe in what manner he ſhould govern his kingdon. After that he demanded Bothwell, who was retired into England.

But Elizabeth was very far from giving him this ſatisfaction. On the contrary, it was probably from her that Bothwell was enabled to enter Scotland at the head of four hundred men, with whom he ſurpriſed the town of Leith. He afterwards publiſhed a manifeſto, importing, "That perſons dangerous to the church and ſtate, having by ſome artifice procured admiſſion into the council, gave occaſion by their conduct to believe, they were forming deſigns againſt the evangelical religion: That for ſome time the Romiſh prieſts had been ſeen running from village to village, and celebrating the maſs in the moſt public manner: That they endeavoured to animate the people againſt the Engliſh, in order to kindle a war between the two nations, which could not but prove fatal to Scotland: That to give a check to theſe dangerous conſpiracies, he had, with the concurrence of divers lords and gentlemen, taken up arms to drive theſe pernicious counſellors out of the kingdom, or bring them to an account for their actions: That the thing was the more urgent, as the Spaniards were going to invade the kingdom; and therefore he exhorted the Scots to join with him to prevent greater miſchiefs, and induce the king to favour ſo juſt a deſign." He wrote in the ſame manner to the general ſynod of the kirk aſſembled at Dunbar, and to the Engliſh embaſſadors. When the coherence between Bothwell's manifeſto and the lord Zouche's repreſentation to the king is conſidered, Elizabeth muſt be ſuſpected of being concerned in this undertaking.

Mean time the king having aſſembled ſome forces, prepared to oppoſe Bothwell's deſigns, who declined not however to meet him. But the rebel, having ſome diſadvantage in the firſt engagement, and finding himſelf not ſupported, was ſeized with fear, and retired to the borders. Whereupon Elizabeth forbid any to harbour or conceal him. This was very agreeable to the Scotch king, who was afraid ſhe would think of ſupporting him. Though Bothwell's undertaking miſcarried, it however produced a very good effect. James perceiving the danger he might incur by a breach with Elizabeth, reſolved at laſt to alter his conduct, leſt his vain projects ſhould cauſe him in the end to forfeit the Engliſh crown. He therefore aſſembled the ſtates, and prevailed to have the catholic lords, who had appeared too zealous for the Spaniard, to be baniſhed the kingdom. They made ſome efforts to reſiſt, but were at laſt obliged to obey. Then the ſtates enacted new laws againſt the catholics, and even formed an aſſociation like that in England ſome years before. One Graham Feintry, a zealous adherent of Spain, endeavouring to excite new troubles, was puniſhed with death [l].

[1595] The king of Scotland's change, and the vigor he exerted on this occaſion, deſtroyed the hopes entertained by the catholics of engaging him in their intereſt. They therefore formed new projects to place the crown of England on the head of ſome perſon devoted to their religion, or at leaſt not very zealous for the proteſtant. The Engliſh catholics caſt their eyes on the earl of Eſſex, who, they had obſerved, approved not the laws made againſt them [m]. But the Engliſh fugitives in the Low-Countries were for the Infanta Iſabella, daughter of Philip II. They even publiſhed a genealogy, to ſhew, that the king of Scotland being a heretic, the crown was devolved to the king of Spain, whence they inferred, he had power to diſpoſe of it in favour of his daughter. Nor was this a bare project founded on the paſſion of the Engliſh catholics. It is certain, Philip, though he wanted not employment ſince the king of France had declared war againſt him, intended to make extraordinary efforts to procure his daughter the crown offered her by the Engliſh fugitives. The fame of his preparations was now flown over Europe, and produced miſchievous effects in Ireland, where Hugh O'Neal, earl of Tiroen had rebelled, in expectation of the aſſiſtance promiſed by the Spaniard. This obliged Elizabeth to prepare for the defence of her dominions, and to ſend a ſtrong reinforcement to Norris now in Ireland.

Henry IV. had, as I ſaid, declared war againſt Spain, though unadviſedly, if it could have been avoided, conſidering the miſerable ſituation of France. But Philip II. by his continual and powerful ſupport of the league, had ſufficiently declared war againſt Henry, though he pretended to make war not upon but for France. However this be, Henry was indiſpenſably obliged to maintain a war againſt Spain, and therefore believed it would be better to attack Philip directly, than to ſtand upon the defenſive. But as France was drained both of men and money, it was not eaſy for him to ſupport the war alone, and come off with honour. He had therefore recourſe to Elizabeth, as to his laſt refuge in his preſſing neceſſities. And perhaps he was encouraged to break openly with Spain, by the hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance from England. To that end, he wrote to the queen, that the recalling of Norris and his forces had broke all his meaſures, and he rather expected ſhe would ſend greater ſuccours, ſince he had declared war againſt Spain. Elizabeth anſwered, "That ſhe commended his reſolution to attack the king of Spain's dominions: That this was a good expedient to prevent an invaſion, as ſhe had experienced: That as to the recalling of her troops out of Bretagne, he could not juſtly complain of it, ſince they had not only remained there longer than their treaty required, but even notwithſtanding the manifeſt breach of that treaty and the violation of his promiſe: That he had poſitively engaged to ſurrender to the Engliſh the town or Morlaix, when taken, for a place of retreat: But that this very place, conquered at the expence of Engliſh blood, had been denied to the juſt expectation of the Engliſh, by a fraudulent capitulation of the marſhal d'Aumont, to have none but catholics admitted into it: That he ought not to be ſurpriſed, if ſhe was unwilling to be his dupe any longer, ſince ſhe could rely neither on his promiſes nor his treaties: That beſides, ſhe wanted her forces in Ireland, where there was danger of a general revolt." It is certain, Henry's behaviour to Elizabeth was no encouragement to her to grant him any great aſſiſtance. And therefore, it was only her fear of the Spaniards taking advantage of the weakneſs of France which ſtill kept her attached to Henry's intereſt, for whom ſhe had no longer her former eſteem and regard. It may alſo be ſaid, that ſince his aceeſſion to the throne of France, he had done nothing tending to preſerve Elizabeth's friendſhip.

The queen, in the preſent ſituation of her affairs, not being able to rely much on the king of France, and looking upon all her expence, on his account, as intirely fruitleſs, reſolved to keep her forces and treaſure for the defence of her own dominions, in caſe they ſhould be attacked by the Spaniard. England was properly in danger only from Scotland; but the news ſhe received of the change in king James, freed her from all uneaſineſs. That prince perceiving Philip's aims were levelled as much againſt Scotland as England, ſaw at laſt that the beſt way to break his meaſures, was to live in union with Elizabeth. So, to ſhew that he meant to preſerve that union, he publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding, under ſevere penalties, his ſubjects on the borders to injure the Engliſh; and the queen put forth another to the ſame purpoſe. From this time he lived with Elizabeth in a good underſtanding, which nothing was capable to diſturb, being ſenſible this was the ſureſt way to aſcend one day the throne of England.

Edmund York and Richard Williams, who had been arreſted the laſt year, being tried and convicted of a deſign to murder the queen, were executed in February. They confeſſed, that Ibarra had promiſed them forty thouſand florins, if they accompliſhed their enterpriſe.

Henry IV. after his declaration of war with Spain, formed a deſign of penetrating into the Low-Countries, and making conſiderable conqueſts; but he was ſoon ſenſible his meaſures were not juſt. In April 1595, Ferdinand de Velaſco, conſtable of Caſtile, came into Franche-Comté at the head of eighteen thouſand men, and threatened the duchy of Burgundy. This obliged Henry to lead thither in perſon the beſt part of his army. Whilſt he was thus employed in Burgundy, the count de Fuentes, who commanded in the Netherlands after the death of the archduke Erneſt, entered Picardy, and became maſter of Catelet. Then he beſieged Dourlens, beat the French who came to its relief, and took the town by ſtorm. Henry, upon this mortifying news, ſent Chevalier immediately into England to demand a ſupply of forces for the defence of Picardy, according to his treaty with the queen. In the inſtructions given to his envoy, he ordered him to take care, that this ſupply ſhould be ready in a fortnight after the date: but the Chevalier ſpent twelve days in his voyage. The queen anſwered, ſhe would not fail to ſend a body of troops into Picardy, as ſoon as they could be ready, to defend Calais, Dieppe, and Boulogne. Indeed the ſole motive of her treaty with Henry, was to prevent the Spaniards from becoming maſters of thoſe maritime places; but ſhe had never pretended to defend the inland towns of that province, for which ſhe was little concerned. This was not what the king wanted, having no deſire to put the Engliſh into theſe places. He pretended that, without any diſtinction, the queen ſhould ſend him a body of troops, to aſſiſt him in driving the Spaniards out of all Picardy. At the ſame time, the duputies of the province of Bretagne arrived at London, to demand ſupplies of the queen, without ſpecifying either the number of ſervice, and without offering a place of retreat; but this demand of troops was rejected by the queen.

The Spaniards, after the taking of Dourlens, beſieged Cambray, and became maſters of that important place. Henry ſeeing himſelf thus preſſed, ſent Lomenie, ſecretary of ſtate, to Elizabeth, to demand of her a ſpeedy and powerful aid. He expected, by entering into a league with Elizabeth, to engage her to make war with Spain in the kingdom of France, ſo that it ſhould ſeem, ſhe was obliged to ſend him forces and money whenever he had occaſion, though the treaty contained nothing like it. But Elizabeth had no ſuch intention, being unwilling to ſend her forces into France, when her own dominions were in danger, or ſo make war with Spain that all the profit ſhould be Henry's, and the loſs her's [n]. Therefore ſhe told the embaſſador, ſhe could not comply with his maſter's demand. Lomenie, vexed with the ill ſucceſs of his negotiation, ſpoke to her very haughtily, and charged her with being the cauſe of the loſs of Cambray, by her having not ſent the deſired ſupplies into Picardy. He added, that ſhe ſeemed to rejoice at the misfortunes of France, but ſhe might ſoon repent, and by her conduct be forced to make a diſadvantageous peace with Spain [o]. Theſe menaces, and the haughtineſs wherewith they were ſpoken by Lomenie, intirely offended Elizabeth. Nevertheleſs, as Henry's affairs were in a very ill ſituation, ſhe thought it not proper to deprive him of all hopes of her future aſſiſtance. She anſwered Lomenie however ſuitable to her dignity, but leſs ſharply than ſhe would have done at another juncture. Afterwards, when he demanded a ſecond audience, her anſwer was, that ſhe would acquaint the king of France by her embaſſador [p], with her reaſons for keeping her troops and money.

Elizabeth's refuſal offended Henry's council, in which the leaguers had now too great an influence. Several adviſed him to make a ſeparate peace with Spain, ſince he could hope for no aſſiſtance from Elizabeth. They ſeemed to talk as if ſhe had been obliged to ſend forces to Henry whenever they were demanded, and had violated her engagements. This was doubtleſs what was intended by the league: the French had reckoned to manage her as they pleaſed, but being diſappointed were very angry with her. Beſides, Henry's council being moſtly compoſed of the declared enemies of the proteſtant religion, and of whom ſome had been the moſt zealous leaguers, conſidered Elizabeth not as a friend whom they were hereafter to regard, but as a temporary friend, from whom they were to draw all poſſible advantages. It was not without reaſon that Elizabeth miſtruſted the king of France, who, to obtain his abſolution from the pope, had ſubmitted to terms unbecoming a king, and tending to the ruin of the proteſtants [q], thereby ſhewing he no longer conſidered them as his friends. It was not therefore proper for her to aſſiſt powerfully a friend, who was only ſo in name. Wherefore ſhe left him to manage his affairs as he pleaſed, without giving herſelf any concern. Beſides, ſhe could expect from him only a bare diverſion to the arms of Spain, which probably would laſt no longer than required by the intereſts of France. Henry's conduct gave her no room to expect any thing farther, ſince he had left the Spaniards unmoleſted in Bretagne, though her greateſt danger was from thence. And indeed, in July this year, the Spaniards, who were ſettled in Bretagne, made a deſcent in Cornwal and burnt ſome villages [r]. Though this expedition was inconſiderable, it however obliged Elizabeth to be upon her guard, and demonſtrated the neceſſity of diſlodging the common enemy from that province. But the intereſt of England was not the motive of Henry's actions.

It was not of Elizabeth only that the king of France complained after the loſs of Cambray. He accuſed alſo the ſtates of the United Provinces of violating their alliance with him, in ſuffering a town of that importance to be taken, and threatened to make a ſeparate peace. The ſtates, ſeeing the advantage of a war between France and Spain, appeaſed the king with a round ſum of money, two regiments, and a conſiderable quantity of corn.

This proceeding of the ſtates cauſed Elizabeth to tell them [s], ſince they had money enough to lend the king of France, they were doubtleſs able to pay their debts, and therefore ſhe demanded to be reimburſed of what ſhe had advanced for them. Adding, that unleſs ſpeedy ſatisfaction was given her, by a diſcharge of part of the debt, and an aſſurance of the remainder within ſuch a time, ſhe would take proper meaſures to do herſelf juſtice. The ſtates being thus preſſed, had recourſe to intreaties and ſubmiſſions to appeaſe her. They repreſented, that the ſtate of their affairs did not permit them to ſatisfy her. But as excuſes ſignified little, they urged their treaty with her, by which they were not obliged to repay her, till the end of the war. She replied, that when ſhe aſſiſted them, they were reduced to a deplorable ſtate, and ſhe ſhewed her bounty and generoſity in not requiring a reimburſement till after the peace, becauſe it was not likely they ſhould be able to pay her before. But ſince they were rich enough to lend the king of France money, it was evidently in their power to reimburſe her. That therefore the article of the treaty on which they inſiſted, ought naturally to be thus interpreted, "That they ſhould not be in a condition to repay her before the concluſion of the war." There were great and even warm conteſts upon this ſubject. But at laſt the affair was adjuſted for a time, on theſe conditions: That the ſtates ſhould promiſe for the future to pay the Engliſh forces in their ſervice [t], and to join the queen's fleet with a certain number of ſhips, in caſe ſhe ſhould be attacked by the Spaniards.

Elizabeth had alſo a conteſt to maintain with the Hanſe-towns, who complained to the diet of the Empire that their corn was ſeized by the Engliſh in Portugal, and their privileges infringed, formerly granted them by Edward III. As this affair was more warmly puſhed ſome years after, I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it elſewhere.

This year, ſir Walter Raleigh made, at his own charge, a ſecond expedition into America, from which he reaped no great advantage. The queen likewiſe fitted out twenty-ſix ſhips to carry the war into that country, under the command of ſir Francis Drake and ſir John Hawkins [u]. But as the Spaniards had taken great precautions, the Engliſh admirals performed nothing memorable. Nay, they both died in this expedition.

Norris, as I ſaid, was diſpatched into Ireland to command the forces againſt the rebels, at the head of which was the earl of Tiroen. The jealouſy which aroſe between that general and the lord Ruſſel lieutenant of Ireland, was the reaſon the Engliſh made no greater progreſs in that kingdom. The earl of Tiroen even obtained a truce, upon giving hopes he would lay down his arms, and ſubmit to the queen. But this was only a feint to gain time till the arrival of the ſuccours promiſed him from Spain. The war was continued for ſome years; but my deſign is not to relate the Iriſh affairs, which would require a ſeparate hiſtory. Beſides, the manner in which hiſtorians deliver them is ſo confuſed, and the Iriſh names as well of perſons as places are ſo barbarous and hard to remember, that it is difficult to form a clear idea of this war [w].

[1596] Whatever reſolution had been made by Elizabeth to concern herſelf no more with the affairs of France, ſhe was however forced to take other meaſures, by reaſon of the great ſucceſs of the Spaniſh arms in that kingdom. Cardinal Albert of Auſtria, who had ſucceeded his brother Erneſt in the government of the Low-Countries, arrived there the beginning of the year 1596. He immediately made great preparations as if he intended to relieve La Fere, which had been for ſome time blockaded by the French king, and at laſt beſieged in form. But ſuddenly, after throwing ſuccours into the town, the archduke marched to Calais and inveſted it. This place had been formerly of great repute, but whether from the change in the method of beſieging towns, or from being neglected ſince it was recovered by France, is was now of little note. Henry, alarmed at the ſiege, diſpatched Sancy into England to demand ſuccours. The marſhal de Bouillon quickly followed him, and ſo preſſed the queen, that ſhe ordered eight thouſand men to be ready under the command of the earl of Eſſex. But ſhe required, in caſe the ſiege was raiſed by the Engliſh, to have the town delivered to them, ſince it was in effect loſt to France. The marſhal and Sancy evaded this demand, by ſaying, they had no inſtructions upon that ſubject; knowing the king had rather ſee the place in the hands of the Spaniards than reſtored to the Engliſh. So, under pretence that the relief of Calais was too preſſing to allow time to diſcuſs that propoſal, they ſo managed, that the queen gave orders for the embarkation of the troops. But at the ſame time, news came that the place was taken, after a reſiſtance but of twelve days. Then the archduke alſo took Ardres with the ſame eaſe. This was the ſixth place taken from France by the Spaniards within a year. The ſuccours deſigned for Calais not having been ready in time, the new-levied troops were diſmiſſed; but the queen lent money to Henry on the ſecurity of his two embaſſadors.

Mean time, the queen having advice that the king of Spain was preparing to invade England and Ireland, reſolved to prevent him. For that purpoſe, ſhe fitted out a fleet of one hundred and fifty ſail, with two and twenty Dutch ſhips and ſeven thouſand ſoldiers. Charles Howard commanded as admiral, and the earl of Eſſex was appointed general of the land forces [x].

The fleet ſailed from Plymouth the beginning of June, and kept at a diſtance from the coaſts of France and Spain, for fear of alarming the Spaniards, the commanders intending to ſurpriſe Cadiz. It was with great joy that they learned from the maſter of an Iriſh veſſel returning from that port, that every thing there was in the greateſt ſecurity: That the garriſon was weak, and the port full of ſhips of war, galeons, gallies, and merchant-men freighted for the Indies. This news filling them with hopes, they arrived the 20th of June on the weſt-ſide of the iſle of Cadiz, and at their approach the Spaniſh ſhips retired to the Puntals. The next day the Engliſh attacked them with great reſolution [y], but met with ſo warm a reception, that the fight laſted from break of day till noon. At laſt, the Spaniards deſpairing to make a longer defence, reſolved to ſink their ſhips, and eſcape to land. Their admiral-ſhip called the St. Philip was burnt to aſhes, with two others near her, the Spaniards themſelves ſetting it on fire to prevent its falling into the hands of the Engliſh. The St. Matthew and St. Andrew were taken, and moſt of the others ran aſhore.

During the engagement at ſea, the earl of Eſſex with eight hundred men landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Three or four hundred paces from the city, he met with five hundred Spaniards, who, when they ſaw him, retired into the town, and were ſo cloſely purſued, that the Engliſh had like to have entered with them. The conſternation was ſo great in the town, that before any meaſures could be taken for its defence, the Engliſh had time to force the gate [z] and throw themſelves into the town. Though they found ſome reſiſtance in the ſtreets, yet in half an hour they made themſelves maſters of the market-place. Then the garriſon and inhabitants retired into the caſtle and town houſe, but the ſame or the following day, were obliged to ſurrender. By the capitulation, they were to have their lives on payment of ſeventy thouſand ducats, for which four principal citizens were given in hoſtage [a]. The town being thus in the power of the Engliſh, the earl of Eſſex turned out all the inhabitants, and then ordered to be carried on board a great quantity of ſilver, ammunition, and other valuable things, beſides what the ſoldiers had plundered.

On the other hand, admiral Howard ſent ſir Walter Raleigh to burn the merchant ſhips at Port Real. The admiral was offered two millions of ducats for their ranſom, but rejected the offer, ſaying, he came to burn and not to ranſom the ſhips. Mean time, the duke of Medina found means to unload ſome of theſe ſhips and fire others, to deprive the Engliſh of their riches. Beſides the merchantmen, the king of Spain loſt two galeons, taken by the Engliſh, with above a hundred braſs guns [b], thirteen men of war, eleven ſhips freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, without reckoning the ſtores prepared for the intended expedition againſt England. The Engliſh eſtimated his loſs at twenty millions of ducats.

The earl of Eſſex propoſed in a council of war to keep Cadiz, and even offered to ſtay there, provided he might have four hundred men and three months proviſions; but his advice was not followed, every one being impatient to return with his plunder to England. So the fleet ſet ſail, after burning the town with ſome adjacent villages. While the fleet was ſailing for England, a north wind ariſing, the earl of Eſſex propoſed to ſteer for the Azores, and wait for the Indian carracks; but he was not heard, every one fearing to loſe what he had gained.

The queen received theſe brave men with great marks of eſteem, and expreſſed her acknowledgment of the ſervice they had done her. But the earl of Eſſex met with a mortification on his arrival at court, for having, before his departure, recommended ſir Thomas Bodley to be ſecretary of ſtate, the queen, without regarding his recommendation, had conferred that office on ſir Robert Cecil the lord treaſurer's ſon, who was not his friend. Some days after, he had alſo the vexation to ſee Francis Vere made governor of the Briel [c], though he had ſtrongly ſollicited for another. This convinced him that his credit was declining, and his uneaſineſs at it engaged him in extravagant projects which coſt him his life.

The king of Spain having been for ſome time unable to purſue his deſigns againſt England, Elizabeth renewed her applications to the ſtates of the United Provinces for payment of her arrears. The ſtates, to be excuſed, alleged the ſame reaſons as before, which were no better received. The queen ſaid, it was unjuſt her payment ſhould depend on a peace, which the ſtates might defer as long as they pleaſed. That beſides, the treaty ſhe had made with them contained in expreſs terms, that the war ſhould continue no longer than ſhe ſaw convenient. But the ſtates pretended, this article was inſerted in the treaty only in honour to her. This conteſt held till the report of new preparations in Spain for an invaſion of England cauſed the queen to ceaſe by degrees her ſollicitations. The truth is, the ſtates delayed to pay her, not ſo much out of inability, as to keep her always attached to their intereſt. On the other hand, the queen did not make theſe preſſing inſtances for want of money, but becauſe ſhe would not have her payment depend on the ſucceſs of the affairs of her debtors. They were then able to pay, but ſhe knew not what alterations time might produce.

When the marſhal de Bouillon was ſent into England to demand aid, he had made ſome propoſal of a ſtricter alliance between France and England. But the French king had neglected the affair, becauſe he ſaw Elizabeth upon her guard, and unwilling to furniſh him with either men or money, but upon good grounds. Mean while, the deſigns and preparations of the Spaniard becoming public, Henry believed Elizabeth would be more tractable, and he might treat with her upon better terms. In this belief he diſpatched the marſhal de Bouillon and Sancy into England, to negotiate with the queen a league offenſive and defenſive. The treaty was ſoon concluded, for the queen was afraid the ill ſituation of the king's affairs would force him to a ſeparate peace with Spain. The principal articles of the league were, That the queen ſhould furniſh four thouſand men for the defence of Picardy and Normandy: That the king of France, in caſe the queen was invaded, ſhould find the like number for the defence of England, not to ſerve above fifty miles from the ſea: That neither of the two crowns ſhould make peace without the conſent of the other. By a ſecret article it was agreed, that Elizabeth ſhould this year furniſh no more than two thouſand men [d]. Very probably, Elizabeth concluded this league with France with the ſole view of keeping Henry engaged in the Spaniſh war, by means of the ſupplies ſhe was to ſend him. But it is unlikely ſhe expected the ſame aſſiſtance in caſe of need, becauſe Henry could not himſelf be without the Engliſh auxiliaries. On the other hand, Henry knowing that Elizabeth had conſented to the treaty from the ſole motive of intereſt, ſcrupled not to act on the ſame motive; that is, to uſe the queen's aſſiſtance, till he could with honour diſengage himſelf from a war he had ſo unſeaſonably declared againſt Spain. There are few leagues but what have the like foundation. Wherefore they are commonly ſeen to ceaſe, when the intereſt of one of the parties begins to change. The ſtates of the United Provinces entered into the league, with ſome additional articles which concerned them in particular. But Elizabeth's jealouſy of their attachment to France, retarded ſome time the concluſion of their treaty. She pretended, they ought not to come into it as ſovereigns, but as aſſociated towns which had put themſelves under her protection. But the king of France prevailed with her to deſiſt from that pretenſion.

Philip II. was enraged to be prevented by Elizabeth, and to be unable to defend his own dominions, he who had his whole life been ſo greedy of thoſe of others. So, reſolving neither to deſiſt from his projects, nor ſuffer Elizabeth to enjoy the ſatisfaction of her happy ſucceſs, he determined to make another effort, not only to be revenged of Elizabeth, but alſo to conquer England. Though he had received great damage from the Engliſh, yet as it was only in one of the places where he made his preparations, he ſtill believed himſelf in condition to purſue his deſigns. He therefore aſſembled all the ſhips he had left, freighted many foreign ones, and by that means had a formidable fleet, when Elizabeth thought him intirely unable to act againſt her. This fleet ſailed from Liſbon to take up the land forces at Fariola, and then ſteered directly for England. But a violent ſtorm ariſing in the midſt of the voyage, ſeveral of the ſhips were loſt, and the reſt ſo diſperſed, that the fleet was rendered unſerviceable for this year. Thus Elizabeth had the pleaſure to hear it was unable to hurt her, before ſhe knew of its ſailing. But not to be expoſed again to the like danger, ſhe took care to fortify the places where the Spaniards could moſt eaſily have landed [e], if heaven had not blaſted their projects [f].

[1597] In the beginning of the year 1597, during a moſt ſevere winter, prince Maurice gained a battle againſt the Spaniards at Turnhout. But on the other ſide, in March, Hernando Tellez Portocarrero, governor of Dourlens, found means to ſurpriſe Amiens. This accident diſturbed the ſecret negotiations of peace, which by the mediation of the pope were on foot between Henry and Philip. The treaty was now well advanced without Elizabeth's knowledge, notwithſtanding Henry's late treaty with her, of which the principal article was, that no peace ſhould be made without a mutual conſent.

Philip II. relying on a ſeparate peace with France, had reſolved to make an effort againſt Ireland, where he had correſpondents, and even prepared a fleet to execute his deſign. The notice the queen received of it, made her reſolve to prevent him, as ſhe had often done with ſucceſs. For that purpoſe, ſhe equipped a fleet of ſix ſcore veſſels, with ſix thouſand land forces, and gave the command to the earl of Eſſex [g]. The earl's project was to ſail to the Groyne, and deſtroy the armament preparing there, then to wait at the Azores for the Spaniſh fleet returning from the Indies. But contrary winds, ſtorms, and a quarrel betwixt the earl of Eſſex and ſir Walter Raleigh, broke theſe meaſures, and the fleet returned to England without any memorable action. It is needleſs therefore to be more particular concerning an expedition from which Elizabeth received but little advantage. I ſhall only ſay, that whilſt the Engliſh were returning, a fleet from Fariola was ſteering the ſame courſe, in order to make a deſcent in Cornwal. But a tempeſt from the north ſo diſperſed the two fleets, that they could not even get ſight of each other.

The earl of Eſſex being returned to court about the end of October, met with a freſh cauſe of diſcontent. The queen had created admiral Howard, earl of Nottingham, and inſerted in his patent, that it was for his ſervices to his country in 1588, againſt the fleet of Spain, and afterwards in taking the town of Cadiz, jointly with the earl of Eſſex. This patent offended the earl, who thought himſelf affronted by the queen, in her aſcribing any ſhare of the taking of Cadiz to the admiral. Beſides, by this creation the new earl of Nottingham was to take place of him by an act of Henry VIII. which gave the precedence to the lord high ſteward, the lord chancellor, the lord treaſurer, the lord preſident, the lord privy ſeal, the lord chamberlain, the lord high conſtable, the earl marſhal, the lord high admiral, and the lord ſteward, who are called the great officers of the crown, before all the peers of equal degree [h]. But the queen, to ſoften his reſentment, created him earl marſhal of England, which preſerved him the precedence of the lord admiral.

The Hans-towns, as I ſaid, had made great complaints to the diet of the empire, concerning the corn taken from them in Portugal, and their privileges loſt in England. Elizabeth ſent an embaſſador to the diet to anſwer theſe accuſations. He repreſented, That the Hans-towns, by the abuſe of their privileges, had cauſed them to be annulled by an act of parliament in the reign of Edward IV. That afterwards Mary had for a time ſuſpended the execution of that act; but at laſt, even in her reign, thoſe privileges had been entirely aboliſhed, for which he alleged ſeveral reaſons mentioned in Edward's reign. That as to the ſeizure of their ſhips in Portugal, they were freighted with proviſions for the Spaniards, and by the law of nations the Engliſh could ſeize proviſions which were carrying to their enemies, and even confiſcate the ſhips; which, however, were reſtored to the owners. This affair ſeemed ſuppreſſed, and it had not been mentioned for two years, when ſuddenly the emperor, at the ſollicitation of the Hans-towns, prohibited the commerce of the Engliſh merchants, called the Adventurers, with the empire. This obliged the queen to prohibit the commerce of the Hans-towns in England.

Mean time, the king of France was greatly embarraſſed, ſince the Spaniards were become maſters of Amiens, from whence they could make incurſions to the gates of Paris. He reſolved therefore at any rate to recover that place, and formed the ſiege about the end of May. At the ſame time, he ſummoned queen Elizabeth to ſend him four thouſand men, according to their treaty. The queen anſwered, ſhe was ready to ſend the forces, provided he would pay them, becauſe her expences in equipping a fleet, and maintaining an army in Ireland, rendered her unable. Troops without money did not ſuit with Henry, whoſe exchequer was exhauſted. Wherefore, to induce Elizabeth to comply with his demand, he ordered her to be told, that offers of peace had been made him, with the reſtitution of all his places, except Calais and Ardres, if he would abandon England. He meant to inſinuate, that it was ſolely on her account he had refuſed a ſeparate peace, though in truth, the ſurprize of Amiens was the real cauſe of the diſcontinuance of the treaty, which he would not have begun without her participation, if he had retained the leaſt regard for her. However, the queen, yet ignorant of the ſecret, told him, by her embaſſador, ſhe could never believe that ſo great a prince would violate a ſolemn treaty ſo lately made, and confirmed with reciprocal oaths. She prayed him to look into the treaty, where he would find this article in expreſs terms: "The queen of England ſhall ſend this year four thouſand foot to ſerve the king for the ſpace of ſix months: They ſhall likewiſe ſerve him as long in the following years, if the queen of England's affairs will conveniently permit, in which point the king of France is to take her honour and conſcience for ſecurity." That therefore it was manifeſt, the treaty was not violated by her, as ſhe offered to ſend forces, provided he would promiſe to pay them. All this ended at laſt, in what probably Henry propoſed, which was, that Elizabeth, inſtead of forces, ſhould ſupply him with money. For ſecurity, Henry offered her Calais, provided ſhe would recover it within ſuch a time with her own forces. This was engaging her to make a diverſion more advantageous to France, than the four thouſand men he demanded. It was even uncertain, whether the town could be taken within the limited time, which probably would have been very ſhort. But Elizabeth was not to be thus enſnared, eſpecially as ſhe knew the king of France had rather ſee Calais in the hands of the Spaniards than of the Engliſh. But the retaking of Amiens, which ſurrendered in September, finiſhed this diſpute.

The ſurrender of Amiens renewed the negotiations between France and Spain, which had been interrupted. Henry's conduct on this occaſion did not correſpond with the ſervices he had received from Elizabeth in his moſt preſſing neceſſities. He deferred to acquaint her, that a peace was abſolutely neceſſary for him, till he had privately ſettled the principal articles. He thought, probably, as Elizabeth had only conſulted her own intereſt in their league, he might likewiſe conſider only his own advantage. Such a principle allows the breach of any alliance without ſcruple. He could not however ſo ſecretly tranſact the affair but Elizabeth had notice of his proceedings and deſigns. For that reaſon ſhe called a parliament [i] to demand an aid in ſuch a juncture, intimating, ſhe was going to be abandoned by her ally, though he ſtill pretended not to treat without her. The parliament perceiving the danger of an immediate invaſion, voted an extraordinary ſupply, on condition it ſhould not be drawn into a precedent [k].

[1598] Elizabeth knew Henry was treating with Spain, but was ignorant the peace was now almoſt concluded, and the more, as he had deſired her to ſend embaſſadors to ſettle the points on which they were to treat. She ſent therefore Thomas Wilks, ſir Robert Cecil, and John Herbert, maſter of requeſts. The firſt died preſently after his arrival at Paris. The two others waited on the king at Angers, to know upon what terms the negotiation ſtood with Spain. Henry gave a general anſwer, declaring, he wanted a peace, and that the welfare of his people, which he preferred to all other conſiderations, abſolutely required it. Cecil anſwered, the queen his miſtreſs deſired it no leſs, but wanted to know upon what conditions it was propoſed by the king of Spain, and whether the ſtates of the United Provinces were to be included. Henry replied, the king of Spain offered to reſtore all the places taken in France, Calais not excepted; that this offer could not be rejected, without expoſing his kingdom to utter ruin. Adding, he would ſoon cauſe the king of Spain to grant honourable conditions to the queen and the United Provinces.

This was ſufficient to ſhew the embaſſadors, that the peace between France and Spain was already concluded, and no care taken of Henry's allies. Elizabeth having ſome intelligence of it, ordered her embaſſadors to complain to the king; and the embaſſadors of the ſtates received alſo the ſame orders from their maſters. But Henry, not to hear himſelf reproached, which muſt have been very mortifying to him, appointed commiſſioners to treat with the embaſſadors, inſtead of granting the audience they demanded. The commiſſioners and the embaſſadors being met, Oldenbarnevelt, one of the ſtates embaſſadors, ſpoke boldly of the inſincerity wherewith the king had treated his maſters. He adjured the king, though abſent to declare in his conſcience, if he thought it becoming a prince, to ſeparate from his allies without any provocation. Then, to confound the French commiſſioners, he read aloud the treaty of league, concluding with theſe words: "That ſome kings preferred their private intereſts to their alliances; but that this often proved fatal to them; for when princes have parted with their faith and honour, it is in vain to think of ſupporting themſelves by mere power [l]. The chancellor, who was one of the commiſſioners, anſwered the embaſſador, that what he ſaid deſerved great regard, and ſhould be reported to the king, proteſting, however, that France could not ſubſiſt without peace.

Cecil ſpoke next, and ſaid, That being impowered only to treat of a general peace, ſince the ſtates of the United Provinces were not to be included in the king's treaty with Spain, he could proceed no farther. Then, after a juſtification of Elizabeth's conduct, and a bold cenſure of the French king's, he demanded time to inform the queen of what paſſed. But his demand being eluded, he prayed the commiſſioners to remind the king of the oath he had taken before God and man. He concluded with ſaying, That the queen expected to be repaid the ſums lent the king in his preſſing neceſſities. But whatever the embaſſadors alleged ſignified nothing, ſince the peace between France and Spain was concluded, and nothing was wanting but the formality of having it publicly ſigned by plenipotentiaries, who were to meet at Vervins.

Elizabeth was extremely provoked with the French king's proceedings, and the more, as ſhe ſaw no other cauſe which could oblige him to negotiate a peace without giving her notice, than complaiſance to the pope and the king of Spain. It is certain, Henry might have diſengaged himſelf with ſome appearance of good faith, if he had but pretended an unwillingneſs to treat without his allies, and afterwards, upon the difficulties which ſhould ariſe, had urged the neceſſity he was under of making a peace. But concluding it without their knowledge, he clearly diſcovered, that he preferred the king of Spain's intereſt before that of his antient allies. This was indeed his character. He was ſo impatient to ſee himſelf in peaceable poſſeſſion of the crown of France, that to compaſs his ends he never ſcrupled to ſacrifice his old friends, who were unable to hurt him, to his moſt mortal enemies, who might ſtill create him diſturbance. He had no perſon about him who dared to cenſure ſuch a conduct; but in Elizabeth he found one of an equal rank, who uſed him with leſs ceremony. She ſent him a letter, in which after other ſevere expreſſions, ſhe told him, "That if in temporal concerns, there was ſuch a thing as a ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it was doubtleſs ingratitude: That if he had obtained advantageous terms from Spain, he ought to thank England for them: And that ſolemn oaths, and mutual compacts, were never intended for ſnares, unleſs by the worſt of men." Henry was ſtung with theſe reproaches, but as they admitted of no reply, choſe to take no notice of them. He excuſed himſelf upon the urgent neceſſity which forced him to make peace, and endeavoured to perſuade Elizabeth, that whereas he had hitherto been only a burden to her, he would for the future give her marks of his acknowledgment, in procuring her a ſafe and honourable peace, and in never forſaking her intereſts. But this was only words, which were not much regarded by the queen.

During theſe tranſactions, ſome articles of little moment, which had remained undecided, were finiſhed at Varvins. Mezerai owns, the peace might have been concluded and ſigned in leſs than three weeks, if Henry had not effected to perſuade the public he would not abandon his allies. But all this tended only to obtain for the embaſſadors of England and of the ſtates, an admiſſion to the conferences, without any declaration of what he would do in their favour. But Philip,

[l] Then he propoſed, that if the king of France would lay aſide the thoughts of peace, and beſiege Calais, the ſtates would advance pay for ſeven thouſand men to aſſiſt in it, and furniſh twenty-five men of war; and at the ſame time lay ſiege to ſome other place, to divide the enemies forces. who knew how far he ſhould be ſollicited, remained inflexible, and would never grant a power to his plenipotentiaries to treat either with England or the ſtates. At laſt, after Henry had made all the neceſſary excuſes to clear himſelf to the public, he gave orders to his plenipotentiaries to ſign the treaty, promiſing however his allies, that he would not ratify it till forty days after, as if that time had been ſufficient to make their peace with the Spaniard, who even refuſed to treat with them. Mean while, he exhorted them, whether ſeriouſly or jeſtingly, to embrace the opportunity he was procuring them. This peace was ſigned at Vervins the 2d of May, and ratified by Henry the 12th of June.

It was now incumbent upon the queen and the ſtates to take proper meaſures to ſuſtain the war againſt all the forces of Spain: and, in order to this, Elizabeth ſent Francis Vere to the ſtates to know their reſolution. Mean while, it was debated in council, whether it was proper to make peace or continue the war. The council being divided upon this queſtion, ſeveral reaſons were alleged on both ſides. But the queen, who knew perfectly her intereſt, readily declared for war. She perceived, that in making a ſeparate peace, as it would have been very eaſy, ſhe ſhould oblige the ſtates to put themſelves again under the Spaniſh yoke. In that caſe, ſhe foreſaw, ſhe ſhould ſtand ſingle without any ally, and expoſed to the inſults of Philip, who would never want pretences to quarrel with her, and reſume his former projects againſt England. Nay, it was to be feared, the king of France, incited by the pope and a catholic council, where the ancient leaguers had great influence, would ſuffer himſelf to be engaged in a plot to dethrone her. She was alſo apprehenſive, the king of Scots, in order to aſcend the ſooner the throne of England, would be tempted by promiſes to abandon the intereſts of the proteſtant religion. In a word, by forſaking the ſtates, ſhe expoſed herſelf to the danger of ſeeing the ſtorm fall upon her own head, which ſhe had all her life been labouring to turn upon her neighbours. On the contrary, in ſupporting them ſhe employed the Spaniard, and hindered him from making any conſiderable attempts upon England. Moreover, if by a vigorous war ſhe could oblige Philip to a peace, without any danger to the liberty of the ſtates, ſhe would thereby ſecure friends, who might be very ſerviceable on occaſion.

Theſe were the reaſons which determined the queen to continue the war. But ſhe was very careful to conceal her intentions from the ſtates, and rather ſhewed a great inclination to peace, pretending ſhe was unable to carry on ſo burdenſome a war. She intimated to them, that her intereſt was not concerned, and that Philip's efforts againſt England plainly ſhewed ſhe was in no danger from him. The ſtates not being able to diſſemble like her, becauſe their all was at ſtake, ſhe brought them to acknowledge, that if the war was continued, it was ſolely for the preſervation of their liberty, and therefore it was neceſſary to treat anew upon that foundation. In ſhort, ſhe ſo artfully managed, that they came to a new agreement with her, entirely to her advantage. The ſtates choſe rather to ſubmit to her terms than be forced to make a peace, by which, in that juncture, they muſt have loſt their liberty, their religion, and the fruits of thirty years labour. The articles of the new treaty were [m]:

That the ſtates ſhould give ſecurity to Elizabeth for eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, to which all her claims were limited.

That the half of this ſum ſhould be diſcharged by yearly payments of thirty thouſand pounds ſterling, as long as the war ſhould continue; and if, at the end of the war, any thing remained of this half, the annual payments ſhould be but twenty thouſand pounds.

That as to the other half, and the reſtitution of the places which were in the queen's hands, there ſhould be an amicable agreement when the peace was concluded.

That for the garriſons of Fluſhing, the Briel, and other forts, the queen ſhould furniſh eleven hundred and fifty men, to be paid by the ſtates, at the rate of one hundred and ſeventy pounds ſterling a month, beſides utenſils, and other uſeful neceſſaries for ſoldiers in garriſon.

That for the future the queen ſhould be diſcharged of her engagement to furniſh the ſtates with auxiliaries; and that the Engliſh who now ſerved, or ſhould hereafter ſerve in the Low-Countries, ſhould be paid by the ſtates, take an oath to them, and obey the orders of their generals.

That by this means, the authority of the Engliſh deputy, ſtipulated in the former treaty, would be aboliſhed, the queen nevertheleſs reſerving a power to put one perſon into the council of ſtate.

That if, during the war, the common enemy or his adherents ſhould ſet out a fleet to invade England, or the iſles belonging to it, namely, thoſe of Wight, Scilly, Guernſey, and Jerſey, the ſtates ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt her majeſty with a fleet of thirty or forty ſhips of war; and, in caſe of an invaſion, with five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe: That if her majeſty ſhould equip a fleet of fifty or ſixty ſhips to act offenſively, either in Spain, Portugal, or the Weſt Indies, the ſtates ſhould join her with the ſame number of ſhips. And if any Engliſh forces, as ten thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe at the leaſt, were ſent over into Flanders or Brabant, the ſtates ſhould furniſh out half the ſame number of men.

It is eaſy to obſerve from this treaty, how well the queen knew to improve the preſent circumſtances of the ſtates, and their fear of being forced to make a diſadvantageous peace with Spain, though, for reaſons before mentioned, it was her intereſt to continue the war. Beſides, when this treaty was negotiating, the earl of Tiroen was very formidable in Ireland. In fine, the king of Scotland almoſt openly demanded to be declared the queen's preſumptive heir. He diſperſed written or printed books, in which he pretended to prove that no perſon whatever could deprive him of his right. A letter was even ſhewn to Elizabeth ſubſcribed with his own hand, and addreſſed to the pope [n]. Camden ſays, he had been ſurpriſed into this letter; but that author is too partial in every thing concerning king James to deſerve entire credit. Shortly after, one Edward Squire was apprehended in London, for having undertaken to kill the queen by poiſoning the pummel of her ſaddle. All this ſhews ſhe had no leſs reaſon to fear for herſelf than for the ſtates, and that it was her intereſt to ſupport them, and procure them a peace which ſhould ſecure their liberty.

The death of Philip of Spain, which happened in September this year, ſomething allayed Elizabeth's uneaſineſs. That prince was ſeventy-two years old, and had reigned forty-two, in continual troubles to enlarge the bounds of his monarchy. He caſt his ambitious views upon France, England, and Portugal, and of all theſe grand projects, the laſt only ſucceeded. But he loſt ſeven provinces in the Netherlands, which were well worth the kingdom he acquired. He died a dreadful death, being devoured by lice ſwarming from ulcers with which he had been ſome time afflicted: but he bore his calamity with admirable conſtancy. Some time before his death, he had aſſigned the ſovereignty of the Low-Countries in dower to the infanta Iſabella his daughter, when he married her to archduke Albert. But the conditions annexed to this grant ſhew he had no intention to diſmember thoſe provinces from the Spaniſh monarchy. Beſides the reſervation of homage, and a power to keep garriſons in the citadels of Antwerp and Cambray, he had ſtipulated the reverſion of theſe provinces to the crown of Spain, in default of heirs deſcending from the princeſs his daughter; and it is even pretended he had rendered her incapable of ever having any. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Philip III.

This year a troubleſome affair happened at the Engliſh court. The queen conſulting the earl of Eſſex and the admiral [o], concerning a fit perſon to be ſent into Ireland, diſcovered an inclination for ſir William Knolles; but the earl of Eſſex, though his nephew, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, contending for ſir George Carew, in order to remove him from court, as being jealous of him. He ſupported his opinion with great haughtineſs and obſtinacy, and perceiving the queen immoveable, turned his back upon her with ſuch an air of contempt, that, provoked at his inſolence, ſhe gave him a box on the ear [p]. He immediately laid his hand on his ſword, and being prevented from drawing it by the admiral, ſwore, "That he neither could nor would put up with ſo great an indignity; nor would he have taken it from Henry VIII. himſelf were he alive," and inſtantly retired from court. The lord privy ſeal repreſenting to him in a letter, the folly of his menaces, and adviſing him to aſk the queen's pardon, he ſent a long and paſſionate anſwer, wherein he ſpoke very diſreſpectfully of the queen [q]. But at laſt being brought to himſelf by the advice of his friends, he was re-admitted to favour. Few believed this reconciliation ſincere, and the earl's friends were in great fear for him.

William Cecil baron Burleigh, lord treaſurer, and for many years prime miniſter and confident of the queen, died this year in extreme old age [r]. [1599] The lord Buckhurſt ſucceeded him in his office of treaſurer.

The affairs of Ireland were in ſo ill a ſituation, that a ſpeedy remedy was to be applied, or the kingdom expoſed to the hazard of being entirely loſt. Since the advantages gained by the earl of Tiroen over the Engliſh, the whole province of Munſter had revolted. The natives in every other part of the iſle were in the ſame diſpoſition, flattering themſelves that with the aſſiſtance of the pope and the Spaniards [s], the earl of Tiroen would free them entirely from the Engliſh yoke. The queen, informed of the ſtate affairs, believed no time was to be loſt to reduce the Iriſh to their duty, and ordered her council to conſider in her preſence how to execute her reſolution. The earl of Eſſex ſpoke long upon the ſubject, blaming the conduct of the former lord deputies, who, he ſaid, amuſed themſelves with trifles, inſtead of acting directly againſt the earl of Tiroen, without giving him any reſpite; that by truces granted him from time to time he had reſtored his affairs; and withal, the queen had been put to a needleſs expence, ſince her troops were paid in a truce as well as during the war. This opinion was grateful to the queen, who loved not to be laviſh of her money without occaſion. When a deputy came to be named, moſt of the council were for the lord Montjoy. This was oppoſed by the earl of Eſſex, becauſe that lord had never commanded in chief, and was too much addicted to books; whereas the affairs of Ireland required an active and warlike general. He added, that to put a ſpeedy end to the war in Ireland, the management of it ought to be given to a general of reputation, and who was acceptable to the people. In a word, he ſo plainly pointed out himſelf, that he was choſen to the employ. His friends thought to oblige him, and his enemies hoped that this poſt, and his abſence from the court, would afford them means to ruin him.

What this lord's deſigns were is not known, but for ſome time he had made himſelf ſo popular, and gained ſo far upon the people by his affable behaviour, that he was almoſt adored [t]. He only wanted to gain the affection of the ſoldiery, and probably this was his aim in deſiring to command in Ireland. But as he had enemies intent upon his ruin, it was on this employment they founded their hopes of ſucceſs. On the other hand, his friends in ſerving him too zealouſly did him a diſkindneſs. They affected to publiſh his deſcent from the royal houſe of Scotland, and from that of England by his great-grandmother, who numbered amongſt her anceſtors Edmund de Langley duke of York, and Thomas of Woodſtock, both ſons of Edward III. Hence it was intended to inſinuate, that after the queen's death it would be better to place him on the throne than a foreign prince. A book was alſo dedicated to him, in which the author overthrew the titles of all the pretenders to the crown, except the Spaniſh infantas [u]. His enemies, perceiving he was forming ſome dangerous conſpiracy, took care not to divert him from it. On the contrary, they everywhere and on all occaſions extolled his valour, his prudence, and his attachment to the proteſtant intereſt, in order to engage him in meaſures which would more clearly diſcover his deſigns. He had a lively wit, and many amiable qualities, but was too much intoxicated with his own merit, and regarded the reſt of the nobility as very much his inferiors. He was made lord deputy with a very extenſive commiſſion, to continue or end the war as he pleaſed, and even to pardon the earl of Tiroen, and the other rebels, which was an authority never before granted to any of his predeceſſors. But it was inſerted in his commiſſion, that laying aſide all other affairs, he ſhould apply himſelf wholly to purſue and ruin the earl of Tiroen, chief of the rebels. He could not complain of this clauſe, becauſe it was only what was propoſed by himſelf in the council.

About the end of March the earl of Eſſex ſailed for Ireland with an army of 20,000 foot and 1300 horſe [w]. The Engliſh had never before ſeen ſo formidable an army in that iſland. The queen had made this great effort purſuant to the earl's advice, in order to put a ſpeedy end to the rebellion, and terminate the war in one campaign. On his arrival he affected, whether of himſelf or by the advice of his pretended friends, to act directly contrary to his inſtructions. He immediately gave the command of the horſe to his intimate friend the earl of Southampton, contrary to the queen's expreſs orders, who was offended with that lord for marrying without her permiſſion [x]. Then, inſtead of marching againſt Tiroen, he turned his arms againſt ſome rebels in Munſter, whom he drove indeed into the woods and mountains, but with the loſs of many of his men [y]. This expedition of little importance, detained him in thoſe parts till the end of July. Mean time the queen, informed of his proceedings, wrote to him in an angry ſtile, and reproached him with acting contrary to orders founded upon his own advice, commanding him withal to march into Ulſter againſt Tiroen himſelf. He excuſed himſelf, by ſaying, that the council of Ireland, which knew beſt the affairs of that kingdom, had adviſed him firſt to clear Munſter; and promiſed poſitively to march the firſt opportunity againſt the chief rebel. But ſhortly after, he wrote to the court, that he was obliged to return to Dublin [z], to chaſtiſe ſome Iriſh who infeſted the country, and indeed he ſuppreſſed them. But after this ſecond expedition, his army was ſo diminiſhed that he wrote for a reinforcement, without which, he ſaid he could not perform any great exploits in Ulſter. He began however to march thither, but his vanguard, conſiſting of 1500 men, under the command of ſir Conyers Clifford, fell into an ambuſh and was entirely defeated.

Though it was aſtoniſhing that with ſo fine an army he had done nothing conſiderable, but on the contrary was forced to demand a reinforcement, the queen immediately ſent him ſome freſh troops. But ſoon after, he let the court know that all he could do this campaign was to poſt himſelf on the frontiers of Ulſter with thirteen hundred foot and three hundred horſe. On his arrival in that province, the earl of Tiroen deſired a parley, which he refuſed. The next day, when the armies were near one another, Tiroen ſent Hagan, an officer, to tell him he was ready to ſubmit to the queen, and deſired him to grant him a conference on the banks of a ſmall river [a], where they might confer, each remaining on his own ſide. The earl of Eſſex conſented, and they talked together about an hour, without any witneſs. Two hours after, Tiroen demanded a ſecond conference, in preſence of ſome of the chief officers of the two armies [b]. The earl of Eſſex granted his requeſt, and in this ſecond conference it was agreed that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to treat of a peace the next day. This negotiation ended in a treaty of truce which was ſpeedily concluded. The truce was to continue from ſix weeks to ſix weeks, till May the next year, with this condition, that either party ſhould be at liberty to break it upon giving fourteen days notice.

Mean time, the queen having received the earl of Eſſex's laſt letter, was extremely provoked. She could not forbear ſaying, ſhe ſuſpected him of ill deſigns. She was adviſed to recal him immediately; but ſhe feared to incenſe him too much, whilſt he had the ſword in his hand. Nevertheleſs ſhe wrote to him very ſharply, and reproached him with his contempt of her orders. The letter made ſuch impreſſion on the earl, that he inſtantly reſolved to return into England with the flower of his army, and be revenged of his enemies, flattering himſelf with a general inſurrection in his favour. But the earl of Southampton diſſuaded him from ſo dangerous a reſolution. The queen, informed of this project, countenanced a report that a fleet was preparing in Spain to invade England, and under that pretence raiſed ſix thouſand men. Some time after, ſhe augmented her army, and gave the command to the lord admiral, who was no friend to the earl of Eſſex. But this terror being diſpelled by advices from Ireland, ſhe diſbanded the greateſt part of her forces.

The news of what paſſed in England convincing the earl of Eſſex that he was ſuſpected by the queen, he took a ſudden reſolution to go and juſtify himſelf, without demanding the queen's leave. He was accompained by the earl of Southampton and ſeveral officers, who on their arrival in England diſpoſed of themſelves different ways. He reſerved only ſix men to attend him, and poſted with all diligence in order to be with the queen before ſhe had notice of his arrival; but he found, notwithſtanding his care, he had been prevented. The queen was then at Nonſuch, ten miles from London. She received him without any emotion, and with ſome marks of favour; but after ſome reproaches for his irregular conduct, ſhe commanded him to his apartment till farther orders. After that, being aſked why he made a truce with the earl of Tiroen, which might at any time be broken at a fortnight's warning, ſince he was empowered to conclude a peace? he anſwered, that the earl of Tiroen was ſo unreaſonable in his demands, that they could not be granted[c]; but it was his opinion, that a truce might bring him to more equitable terms. This anſwer did not ſatisfy the queen, who was moreover provoked at his leaving his government without her permiſſion; beſides that, the perſons who attended him into England were very apt to cauſe her to ſuſpect him. Wherefore ſhe committed him to cuſtody at the lord keeper's, to prevent his running into new exceſſes.

In Camden's Annals, there is an apology wrote by the earl himſelf, in which it appears that he very lamely anſwered the accuſation of having neglected to attack the earl of Tiroen, and employed his army in expeditions of little conſequence. He contented himſelf with ſaying, that he had put the Iriſh affairs in ſuch a ſituation, that, during his nine months government, the Engliſh had ſuſtained no damage. But he was not entruſted with an army of twenty thouſand men to ſtand upon the defenſive. As for his return without leave, he mentioned it not. Concerning the perſons who attended him, he ſaid only, that not above ſix came to court with him, but of the reſt who accompained him from Ireland he did not ſpeak. The commiſſion given to the earl of Southampton, contrary to the queen's expreſs orders, he alſo paſſed over in ſilence. The reſt conſiſted wholly in exclamations upon the injuſtice of ſuſpecting him, and in magnifying the merits of his father, and his brother (killed in the queen's ſervice), and his own. At the ſame time his friends and relations loudly complained of the rigour with which he was treated, repreſenting it as exceſſive. Some even plotted to reſcue him by force, but he would not conſent to it.

Mean while, the earl of Tiroen, hearing the earl of Eſſex was arreſted, broke the truce, and did great miſchief to the Engliſh inhabitants in Ireland. He flattered himſelf with a great and ſpeedy aſſiſtance from Spain[d], and the pope, who had made him a preſent of a pretended Phœnix plume. In this expectation, he formed a no leſs project than to drive the Engliſh entirely out of Ireland.

In the mean time, the earl of Eſſex's friends were inciting the people to an inſurrection in his favour, repreſenting him as the moſt accompliſhed lord England ever ſaw ſince the foundation of the monarchy. At the ſame time they inveighed againſt the miniſtry, not without malicious reflections on the queen's conduct, as if ſhe took no care of the Iriſh affairs. This extremely injured the earl, aad increaſed the queen's ſuſpicions of him. As ſhe had provoked him, ſhe eaſily believed he was meditating revenge. Wherefore, in the beginning of October, ſhe aſſembled the council in the Star-chamber, where the earl's conduct was examined, and unanimouſly condemned by all the privy counſellors. Nothing more however was done againſt him, the queen only deſiring to ſatisfy the people that it was not out of caprice that he was under confinement. He remained therefore at the lord keeper's houſe, where he gave himſelf up to devotion, ſpending his time in prayer, and writing letters to his friends in ſo devout a ſtrain, that he was thought to have renounced all worldly vanities[e].

In the cloſe of the year, the archduke Andrew, governor of the Low-Countries in his brother Albert's abſence, who was gone into Spain to marry the infanta, propoſed a peace to Elizabeth. She anſwered, ſhe would freely conſent to it, if the ſtates of the United Provinces were included. This condition put a ſtop to the negotiation at once. The queen ſuſpected the propoſal was made only to amuſe her till a fleet, then preparing in Spain, ſhould be ready to invade England. But this pretended fleet, which gave her ſome uneaſineſs, ended at laſt in a few gallies, put to ſea by Frederick Spinola, a Genoeſe in the king of Spain's ſervice, and carried by him into the harbour of Sluys.

[1600] The earl of Tiroen improved the diſorder created by the earl of Eſſex in the Iriſh affairs. He reduced the whole province of Ulſter to his obedience, and hoped to be ſoon maſter of the whole kingdom. For his encouragement, pope Clement VIII. ſent him a bull, by which he granted to him and his adherents the ſame indulgences as to thoſe who fought againſt the Turks for the recovery of the Holy Land. But Charles Blount lord Montjoy, appointed lieutenant of Ireland in the room of the earl of Eſſex, found means to ſtop the progreſs of the rebels, and give a check to their inſolence.

At the ſame time archduke Albert, called alſo the Cardinal Infant, being returned from Spain, made new propoſals of peace to Elizabeth. Henry IV. ſupported them with all his intereſt, and ſucceeded ſo far that the queen ſent plenipotentiaries to Boulogne, where the peace was to be negotiated: But after the embaſſadors of the two contending crowns had been four months in that place, they parted without ever aſſembling, by reaſon of a diſpute of precedency between England and Spain. After great conteſts on that ſubject, queen Elizabeth had at laſt conſented to an equality, but the Spaniard would not quit his pretenſions. If the plenipotentiaries had met, another obſtacle would have occurred, which would never have been ſurmounted. This was, that the Spaniards were for a ſeparate peace or truce with England, to which Elizabeth doubtleſs would not have conſented. Beſides, the king of Spain pretended that Elizabeth ſhould ſurrender the places mortgaged to her by the ſtates. The Spaniſh embaſſadors having ſounded the Engliſh on theſe two articles, and finding they ſhould never obtain their deſires, uſed the pretence of precedency to break off the negotiation.

The 2d day of July, prince Maurice gained the famous battle of Newport over the archduke. The Engliſh, to the number of fifteen hundred, under the conduct of ſir Francis Vere, diſtinguiſhed themſelves glorioufly; but there remained eight hundred dead upon the ſpot.

Elizabeth being now ſixty-ſeven years old, it was with extreme vexation that the catholics ſaw the Engliſh crown ready to fall on the head of a proteſtant prince. Clement VIII. being deſirous to prevent it to the utmoſt of his power, ſent two briefs into England, one addreſſed to the Romiſh clergy, and one to the people. In theſe briefs they were fordid to acknowledge, after Elizabeth's death, any prince who would not ſwear not only to tolerate their religion, but even to ſupport it with all his power. Theſe briefs were privately conveyed into the nation, and communicated but to few, all dreading the penalties enacted by law.

But at the ſame time ſome found a more ready and effectual way to prevent the king of Scots aſcending the throne of England. The Ruthvens, ſons to earl Goury beheaded in 1584, conſpired againſt him, and inviting him to their houſe at Perth, on ſome pretence, deſigned to murder him, but he eſcaped by a ſort of miracle[f]. The two Ruthvens were killed, and their accomplices condemned to die. Afterwards, by an act of parliament, all who bore the name of Ruthven, were obliged to quit it, that the very name of the family might be aboliſhed.

The earl of Eſſex was ſtill under arreſt at the lord privy ſeal's, where he cloſely applied himſelf to devotion. He wrote from time to time ſuch ſubmiſſive letters to the queen, that he ſeemed to have loſt that extreme haughtineſs ſo prejudicial to him. At laſt the queen, content with having humbled him, permitted him to retire to his own houſe, under the free cuſtody of ſir Richard Berkley, who was to watch him. Probably he had been ſoon reſtored to favour, the queen clearly diſcovering her ſentiments in that reſpect[g]; but his friends and domeſtics ruined him. They had made ſuch ſtrong cabals among the people, that nothing was talked of but the earl of Eſſex's innocence. Whereas the queen pretended to have treated him with great lenity and moderation, it was given out that he was unjuſtly perſecuted, and even his life attempted on falſe ſuggeſtions. Elizabeth, who was very nice in ſuch a point, and conſidered the people's prejudices againſt her as a great misfortune, reſolved to ſhew the earl had more reaſon to praiſe her moderation than complain of her rigour. To that purpoſe, ſhe ordered him to be brought before the privy council, to which ſhe had added four earls, two barons, and four judges. But ſhe told theſe commiſſioners, it was not her intention to condemn him to any infamous puniſhment, as guilty of treaſon or treachery, but only to convince him of having failed in his allegiance, and ſlighted her orders and inſtructions through exceſs of vanity. The queen's deſign was to ſhew the prejudiced people, that the earl of Eſſex deſerved a ſeverer puniſhment than a few months impriſonment.

When he appeared before his judge, he was firſt accuſed of contemning the queen's orders, in making the earl of Southampton general of the horſe. Secondly, of making knights, contrary to the expreſs words of his patent. Thirdly, of neglecting to purſue the earl of Tiroen, though that was the principal end of his commiſſion. Fourthly, of ſecretly conferring with that rebel. Fifthly, of granting a truce very prejudical to the queen's affairs. Sixthly, of abandoning his government, without vouchſafing to aſk the queen's permiſſion. Some inferences were likewiſe drawn from his diſreſpectful expreſſions in his apology, and from certain dangerous principles contained in a book dedicated to him, concerning the depoſing of Richard II.

After hearing the articles of his accuſation, he kneeled down, and thanked God for all his mercies, and his ſovereign for not ordering him a hearing in the Star-chamber. He declared, he would neither excuſe his faults, either in whole or in part, nor contend with the queen: he acknowledged his guilt, but proteſted upon his honour that his heart had been always free from the leaſt thought of rebellion. However, in continuing to ſpeak, he began to urge ſome excuſes in his own behalf. But the lord keeper interrupted him, by reminding him, that he had taken a good method, but was now ſwerving from it: That in extenuating his faults, he likewiſe extenuated the queen's clemency; and that, in fine, a manifeſt diſobedience was but an ill proof of a good intention. The lord keeper, in preventing him from enlarging on his juſtification, did him a good office. The queen's intention was not to have him rigorouſly tried, but only to ſhew, he had been treated more gently than he deſerved. His confeſſion led him to the ſame end, whereas his juſtification would have obliged his judges to a more ſevere examination. So, whether he underſtood his own intereſt of himſelf, or was warned what to do, he held his peace. After this, the commiſſioners conſulting together, were of opinion, that he ought to be removed from the council-board, ſuſpended from his offices of earl marſhal and maſter of the ordnance, and committed to priſon during the queen's pleaſure. His office of maſter of the horſe was untouched at the queen's expreſs command, who was unwilling to give occaſion to believe ſhe had entirely withdrawn her confidence from him. She even ordered, the ſentence ſhould not be recorded. The earl received this chaſtiſement with ſo much humility [h], that the queen, pleaſed with his deportment, removed Berkley from him, and left him at full liberty. But ſhe adviſed him to be his own keeper, and forbid him the court.

For ſome years the queen had honoured the earl of Eſſex with a particular eſteem and affection. She had given him marks of it on ſundry occaſions; and particularly by the poſts, offices, and commands he had enjoyed. This diſtinction had ſo filled him with pride, that he ſolely aſcribed to his merit theſe extraodinary favours, which were the pure effect of the queen's inclination. For this cauſe, he had not always that regard for her ſhe had reaſon to expect from him, imagining ſhe could not be without his aſſiſtance. In a word, he was a very bad courtier. It is not ſtrange, that ſo imprudent a conduct altered the queen's affection, and yet, it appeared in all her proceedings, that it was not entirely extinguiſhed. Her deſign was only to humble that proud ſpirit, which ſeemed to vie with her, wherein ſhe believed to have now been ſucceſsful. It ſeemed, he was at laſt ſenſible, that humility was the only way to reſtore him entirely to favour, and had reſolved to purſue that method as the ſureſt. Immediately after his ſentence, while he was preparing to retire into the country, he told the queen by the lord Howard, "That he kiſſed the rod and the queen's hand, which had only corrected and not ruined him, but ſhould enjoy no peace, till he ſaw again thoſe eyes which had once ſhined ſo propitiouſly on him: That he had reſolved to atone for his error, and like Nebuchadnezzar, to dwell with the beaſts of the field, eat graſs as an ox, and be wet with the dew of heaven, till it ſhould pleaſe his queen to reſtore him to his ſenſes."

This ſubmiſſion was very agreeable to the queen, and yet ſhe anſwered, ſhe would not be amuſed with vain words; but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience, ſhe would take ſome time to try his humility. This was a plain intimation, that with a little patience he would appeaſe her entirely, and it was in ſome meaſure directing him how to form his conduct. But he was ſo unwiſe as not to improve this advantage, and to follow the intereſted counſels of his domeſtics [i], who adviſed him to petition the queen for the continuation of the farm of the ſweet wines [k], which had been very profitable to him. The queen, to prove his humility, refuſed his petition, knowing it to be in her power to repair the loſs whenever ſhe pleaſed. But, inſtead of receiving the denial with the humility and reſignation he had profeſſed ſince his diſgrace, he diſcovered paſſion and reſentment, which made the queen think he was not yet ſufficiently humbled. Whereupon Cuff, his ſecretary and confident, ſuggeſted to him, that the queen not only intended to humble but beggar him, and render him contemptible to all the world. Cuff was ſeconded by other incendiaries, who at laſt inſpired him with the deſign to reſtore himſelf to favour by force, and deſtroy all his enemies about the queen's perſon. After this reſolution, his houſe was open to all the malcontents. The earl of Southampton, who had withdrawn into the Netherlands, returned to England; and the earl of Eſſex, leaving the country, came to reſide in his houſe at London. When he arrived, Merrick his ſteward kept open houſe for all who thought they had cauſe to complain of the queen or her miniſters, and a great number of ſuſpicious perſons reſorted to his houſe. In ſhort, his whole conduct ſhewed he was meditating ſome dangerous deſign. His enemies improving theſe proceedings, found means to infuſe ſuſpicions into the queen, and to have ſpies placed upon him, who informed the court of what paſſed in his houſe [l].

[1601] It is pretended, his enemies, who had projected his ruin, knowing his pride and haughtineſs, cauſed his friends at court to write to him, not to diſcover ſo much impatience in his diſgrace, but to throw himſelf entirely upon the queen's mercy, as the readieſt way to her favour. Theſe advices drew from him anſwers agreeable to the intentions of his enemies, which being told to the queen, completed his ruin. They were filled with expreſſions denoting his anger and impatience, and even intimating his deſigns. He ſaid, that a ſtorm was fallen upon him when he expected a harveſt: That the queen had reduced him to a private life, which was diſagreeable to him: That he was incapable of ſo vile a ſubmiſſion as was expected from him: That he had been unjuſtly impriſoned: That ſovereigns had not an unlimited power, nor were infallible: That he had been wounded in every pore of his body:" That his enemies triumphed, but ſhould never have the ſatisfaction to ſee him cringe to them. To theſe expreſſions, which were no ſigns of repentance, care was taken to add reports, capable to make him forfeit the queen's favour for ever. She was told he had ſaid, "She was grown an old woman, and no leſs crooked and diſtorted in her mind than in her body." Camden ſeems to intimate, that he deſignedly paſſes over in ſilence things ſtill more offenſive to the queen.

Probably, the earl of Eſſex thought all farther caution needleſs, his project being now formed, though he had laid his meaſure very ill. Thoſe who ſpeak moſt favourably of it, ſay, his project was to ſeize the queen's perſon, and drive his enemies from court, as was practiſed in Scotland with regard to king James. But he ſeems to have had greater deſigns, ſince he courted the king of Scotland's aſſiſtance, perhaps to place him on the throne before the queen's death. It was known, he had wrote to that prince that a plot was formed to deprive him of the ſucceſſion, and give the crown to the infanta of Spain: That for this purpoſe, the projectors, who governed at court, had filled the moſt conſiderable poſts with the infanta's adherents: That ſecretary Cecil, ſon of the late treaſurer, was at the head of the party, and had engaged in it the lord treaſurer Buckhurſt, with the earl of Nottingham the lord admiral: That, the better to execute his project, he had committed the government of the maritime places to his creatures [m], where the Spaniards might moſt conveniently land: That the queen was ſo impaired in her underſtanding, that ſhe was incapable to act of herſelf, and was entirely guided by her miniſters: That he was therefore neceſſarily obliged to proceed openly to defeat this conſpiracy; and to that end, ought ſpeedily to diſpatch embaſſadors to England, to demand a public declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, creatures and penſioners of Spain, from the court and council. At the ſame time he furniſhed him with proofs to be uſed by the embaſſadors, to ſhew the truth of the plot. Laſtly, he inſinuated that his embaſſadors ſhould be ſufficiently ſupported. Camden, who wrote in the reign of James I. has not thought proper to tell us, how theſe propoſitions were received by that prince; but it may be judged, they were not diſapproved, ſince embaſſadors were preſently ſent into England, who however came too late. This hiſtorian adds, the earl of Eſſex gained to his party ſome preſbyterian miniſters, and even ſome papiſts, by commiſerating their afflicted condition, under the queen's tyrannical government, and by inſpiring them with hopes of being eaſed. Then he hired the ſwordſmen about London, and placed them near his houſe. After that, he eſtabliſhed a council, compoſed of the earl of Southampton, ſir Charles Davers, ſir Ferdinando Gorges governor of Plymouth fort, ſir John Davis a great mathematician and ſurveyor of the ordnance, John Littleton, a man of great ſenſe and judgment, and equally qualified for the cabinet and camp.

This junto meeting in Drury-houſe, the earl of Eſſex gave them a liſt of certain noblemen whom he believed at his devotion, containing one hundred and twenty earls, barons, knights, and gentlemen, and deſired them to conſult whether it was moſt proper to ſeize the Palace or the Tower, or both at once. The reſult of their deliberations was, that the queen's perſon and palace ſhould firſt be ſeized, and when ſhe was in their power, the earl ſhould diſmiſs certain perſons from her preſence, and turn them out of their places; but that nothing ſhould be done, till the arrival of the Scotch embaſſadors [n].

Mean time, the great reſort of ſuſpected perſons to Eſſex's houſe [o], ſome words unwarily dropped by the conſpirators, and the reports of the ſpies, confirming the court's ſuſpicions, the council met at the treaſurer's houſe, and ſent one of the ſecretaries [p] to the earl of Eſſex, to require his attendance. But at the ſame time a note was delivered him, adviſing him to take care of himſelf. Whereupon he told the ſecretary he was indiſpoſed, and could not ſtir from his houſe. Immediately after, he conſulted whether he ſhould purſue his firſt project of ſeizing the palace, or attempt to raiſe the city of London, or make his eſcape, ſince his plot was undoubtedly diſcovered. The firſt of theſe projects was deemed impracticable, becauſe the guards had been doubled. The ſecond occaſioned long debates on the uncertainty of the execution, becauſe the diſpoſition of the Londoners was not ſufficiently known. In the mean time one of the conſpirators entered, affirming he came from the city, and that the inhabitants were ready to defend the earl againſt all his enemies. He added, that Thomas Smith, the ſheriff, who commanded a thouſand of the trained-bands, had promiſed to join him. Probably, the perſon who made this falſe report had been induced to it by ſome of the principal conſpirators, who finding the earl begin to relent, was willing to engage him ſo far, that it ſhould not be poſſible for him to recede. This was ſufficient to make the earl reſolve to raiſe an inſurrection in the city, being perſuaded the people were inclined to his cauſe. It was therefore agreed, that the next day the earl, attended by five hundred men [q], ſhould repair to the city, and aſſembling the aldermen and people, require their aſſiſtance. That if the citizens were well diſpoſed, they ſhould be employed to gain acceſs to the queen, or, in caſe of diſappointment, the conſpirators ſhould retire to ſome other part of the kingdom.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the earls of Rutland and Southampton went next morning to Eſſex's houſe, with three hundred gentlemen [r], and immediately the gates were ſhut, and no perſon ſuffered to come in or out. But ſir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the moſt zealous of his party, was permitted on ſome pretence to go out [s]. It was probably he who diſcovered the plot to the court; for ſoon after, the queen ſent to the mayor of London, to order the trained bands to be ready to march upon the firſt notice. At the ſame time ſhe ſent the lord keeper, the earl of Worceſter, and ſir William Knollys [t], to the earl's houſe, who were let in through a wicket without any of their attendants, except the purſe bearer. In the court yard they ſaw the earls of Eſſex, Rutland, and Southampton, ſurrounded with a crowd of armed men, and the lord keeper advancing towards them, told the earl of Eſſex, he was ſent by the queen to know the reaſon of ſo great a concourſe. Then the earl raiſing his voice, told him "he certainly knew that it was deſigned to murder him in his bed [u]: That his hand-writing was counterfeited, in order to have a pretence to deſtroy him: That he had aſſembled his friends for the ſecurity of his life, ſince his enemies could not be ſatisfied without having his blood." The lord keeper anſwering, the queen would do him juſtice, provided he would diſcover his grievances, was interrupted by a voice, crying out, "My lord, you are betrayed, they deſign only to ruin you, we loſe time, let us be gone." Upon this, the earl made a ſign to thoſe ſent by the queen to follow him [w], and while they were croſſing the court, they heard a confuſed noiſe, ſaying, "Kill them, away with the great ſeal, ſecure them in priſon." When they were in the houſe, the earl told them, "if they would have a little patience, he would go and adviſe with the lord mayor and ſheriffs, and return immediately." Upon theſe words, he left them, and, ordering the door to be ſhut, ſet a guard upon them.

Immediately after, he began to march with his company, and entering the city, cried out, "For the queen! for the queen! A plot is laid for my life!" Then he went to the ſheriff's houſe, which was at a diſtance [x], and during his march was not joined by one citizen, though numbers led by curioſity crowded to ſee him paſs. In vain did he cry, "Arm, my friends, or you can do me no good;" not a man ſtirred in his favour. The ſheriff, who ſaw him approaching, withdrew himſelf by a back door to the lord mayor's. The ſheriff's flight convinced the earl he had been deceived, when he was told he might depend on his aſſiſtance. While he was at the ſheriff's, uncertain what to do, he was informed that a herald [y] had proclaimed him a traitor in one of the wards of the city, and that the earl of Cumberland had done the ſame in another. Upon this, he left the ſheriff's houſe, and crying in the ſtreets, "that England was going to be delivered to the infanta of Spain, conjured the inhabitants to take up arms for the prevention of ſo great a misfortune." But ſeeing no man prepare to ſupport him, and hearing withal, that the lord admiral was marching againſt him with a ſtrong party, he reſolved to return to his own houſe. But coming to Ludgate, he found ſir John Laviſon poſted there with a company of ſoldiers to oppoſe his paſſage. He inſtantly ſent Gorges to deſire leave to go through; but being denied, was obliged to return to St. Paul's. Here Gorges repreſented to him, that it would be proper to diſcharge the three counſellors, and having the earl's leave, he freed them immediately, and accompanied them himſelf to Whitehall. Probably, Gorges had betrayed him from the very beginning.

Mean time, the earl perſiſting in his reſolution of returning home, found the ſtreet chained and guarded by ſoldiers [z]. As he ſaw no other way to paſs than by attacking the guard, he ordered Blunt to fall on, and ſeconded him ſword in hand with great reſolution. But he was repulſed and ſhot through the hat [a], and Blunt was taken priſoner. By this reſiſtance, he was forced to go to Queenhithe, and taking boat with a few followers, the reſt being diſperſed, retired to his houſe on the Thames ſide [b]. When he came there, his firſt care was to burn ſome papers, and then fortify his houſe in the beſt manner he could, ſtill expecting to be relieved by the Londoners. Shortly after, the lord admiral inveſted the houſe, both from the ſtreet and the gardens which reached to the river [c]. Then he ſummoned thoſe within to ſurrender, to which they anſwered, they would die ſword in hand. This was the opinion of the lord Sands, who preſſed the earl of Eſſex to fight his way out, repreſenting, it was more honourable to die by the ſword than the ax. And indeed the beſieged ſeemed to be all fixed to that reſolution. But the earl of Eſſex ſuddenly changed his mind, and offered to ſurrender on theſe three conditions: That they ſhould all be civilly treated; tried according to the laws; and that Aſhton the miniſter ſhould be ſent to him to comfort him in priſon. The lord admiral anſwered, that he engaged for the firſt; that the queen would doubtleſs perform the ſecond; and as to the third, he promiſed his intereſt to obtain it. Aſhton was a preſbyterian miniſter. This done, the earls of Eſſex, Rutland, Southampton, the lords Sands, Cromwell, Monteagle, with Davers and Bromley, were put into boats and conducted to the Tower. The reſt were committed to other priſons. The next day the queen by proclamation thanked the Londoners for their fidelity, warning them withal to have a watchful eye on whatever paſſed in the city, the conſpiracy being, ſhe ſaid, more dangerous than was imagined.

The 13th of February, Thomas Lee, the earl of Eſſex's creature, and intimate friend of the earl of Tiroen, was hanged, for ſaying to a certain officer, that it would be a glorious action for ſix brave fellows to force the queen to releaſe Eſſex and the other priſoners. Two days after, the queen publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all vagabonds to leave the city on pain of death. The court had received information, that a great number of ſuch perſons lay hid in the city to reſcue the earl of Eſſex, when an opportunity offered.

At laſt, ſome of the priſoners having diſcovered the moſt ſecret reſolutions of the conſpirators, the earls of Eſſex and Southampton were tried the 19th of February [d]. They were accuſed of the crimes I have mentioned, and their ſole defence was, that they had done nothing but for their own preſervation; however, they could not prove their lives had been in danger. The earl of Eſſex expreſſed a diſregard of his life, but the earl of Southampton implored the queen's mercy, and deſired the peers to intercede for him. They were both condemned to die as traitors.

The earl of Eſſex after his ſentence ſeriouſly reflected on his paſt conduct, and appeared very penitent. Aſhton greatly contributed, by his exhortations and remonſtrances, to put him into this diſpoſition. But becauſe this preſbyterian miniſter adviſed him to declare whatever he knew, and probably, by that means, the king of Scotland was known to be concerned in the conſpiracy, Camden ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner as ſhews, he approved not this conduct. "By the impreſſions (ſays he) left upon him by his miniſter, Eſſex could think of nothing but damnation, unleſs he diſcovered the whole ſcene, and confeſſed who were his accomplices." An author who talks in this manner, is eaſily perceived to be ſecretly intruſted in the depoſition of the criminal. However, the earl of Eſſex deſiring to ſpeak with ſome of the privy counſellors, the lord keeper, the lord treaſurer, the lord admiral, and ſecretary Cecil, went to him. He immediately aſked the lord keeper's pardon for detaining him at his houſe, and Cecil's for accuſing him of aſſerting the infanta's title to the crown of England, and was ſincerely reconciled to both. Then he declared, that the queen could not be ſafe whilſt he lived, and deſired he might ſuffer privately in the Tower. He owned, that ſome of his friends and domeſtics were wicked perſons and public peſts, and deſired to ſpeak with Blunt and Cuff, who were immediately ſent for. When he ſaw them, he exhorted both to aſk pardon of God and the queen, and told Cuff that this diſloyalty was owing to his advice. He declared that ſir Henry Nevil, embaſſador to France, was privy to the conſpiracy. This probably occaſioned the recalling of that embaſſador as he was going to Paris, and his being ordered into the cuſtody of the lord admiral. The earl of Eſſex ſaid alſo, that Montjoy lord deputy of Ireland, and ſeveral others in Scotland, France, and the Low-Countries, were acceſſary to the deſign. But the lord Montjoy's behaviour in Ireland had ſo recommended him to the queen, that ſhe took no notice of the earl's depoſition againſt him. In ſhort, the penitent criminal made a full diſcharge of his conſcience, and concealed nothing of what he knew. "Eſſex (ſays Camden) thought a verbal confeſſion too little, and therefore being moved by the diſmal ſcene preſented to his conſcience, by the perſon whom he choſe to guide it, he delivered the ſame in writing under his own hand, which his enemies ſhewing to king James ſome time after, brought the earl and his friends into great diſeſteem with that prince." If king James had not been concerned in the affair, there is no viſible reaſon why Eſſex's declaration ſhould have made him forfeit his eſteem. But according to the earl's project, the embaſſadors of Scotland were now on their way to London, and king James ever after ſpoke of this lord as of one who was his marryr.

The 25th of February was appointed for the earl of Eſſex's execution. That day the queen appeared a little irreſolute. She even ſent an order to the lieutenant of the Tower to countermand his execution: but preſently after, ordered him to proceed. This irreſolution, pretended or real, has afforded plenty of matter for plays and romances, in which Elizabeth is repreſented as ſtruggling with love and anger, not knowing which of the paſſions ſhe ſhould obey. She was now however in her 68th year, an age wherein the motions of love could not be very violent. But without dwelling on theſe trifles, it ſuffices to ſay, that the earl of Eſſex died like a good Chriſtian, with all the ſigns of a ſerious repentance. His head was not ſeparated from his body till the third ſtroke, but the firſt deprived him of all ſenſe of pain. The marſhal de Biron being told in what manner he died, ridiculed it, and ſaid, ſuch a death was more becoming a prieſt than a ſoldier.

Thus ended the life and projects of the earl of Eſſex; projects which were never yet thoroughly known. Though they ſeem to have tended only to dethrone Elizabeth, and ſet the crown on the head of the king of Scotland; however it is not unlikely that he only uſed that prince's title as a pretence to ruin Elizabeth, and that his confidence in the people's affection inſpired him with greater deſigns. It is certain, the queen had given occaſion to think ſhe had more than a common eſteem for this lord. When he was but one and twenty years old, ſhe forgave him what ſhe had lent his father for his expedition into Ireland; and he was the only perſon to whom ſhe was ever ſo liberal. The earl of Leiceſter dying ſhortly after, ſhe ordered his goods to be expoſed to ſale, for payment of the ſums ſhe had lent him. Before the earl of Eſſex had done her any great ſervice, ſhe made him knight of the garter, and gave him a place in her privy council. She continued afterwards to diſtinguiſh him from all other courtiers, not only by the poſts, offices, and commands ſhe honoured him with, but chiefly by particular marks of her favour, which were viſible to all, and made him to be conſidered as a favourite. Theſe favours produced their uſual effect, that is, rendered him proud and vain. He could not bear that any perſon ſhould be promoted but by his means, and was a ſworn enemy to all who were truſted by the queen. Nay, he grew ſo exceſſively proud, that he pretended to lord it over the queen herſelf, and force her to follow his advice in every thing. This procured him that unfortunate box on the ear, which, doubtleſs, inſpired him with thoughts of a ſignal revenge. For, from that time, he began to meditate projects which proved his ruin, and might have been attended with that of the queen herſelf: ſo careful ought ſovereigns to be, not to affront perſons of honour. His family was originally from Evreux in Normandy, and from thence borrowed its ſirname. It was noble and antient, as may be inferred from his alliances with the beſt families in England, ſome of which were derived from the royal family. Walter his father was however the firſt of his houſe honoured with the title of earl [e].

The earl being dead, his principal accomplices were brought to their trials [f]. In Blunt's examination, Eſſex's written confeſſion was read to him. Blunt, ſeeing it ſigned with the earl's own hand, was ſo confounded that he could only ſay, with his eyes lifted up, "Lord, thou knoweſt from what deſigns I endeavoured to divert him." After that, Lee's confeſſion, who had been executed, was read, in which he ſaid, Blunt had permitted him to ſend to the earl of Tiroen, who told the meſſenger, "that if Eſſex would be guided by him, he would make him the greateſt man in England." Lee had likewiſe depoſed, that the two earls and Blunt were in the ſame plot, and formed the ſame projects. Blunt made a weak defence, as well as Davers, Davis, Cuff the earl's ſecretary, and Merrick his ſteward, and they all received ſentence of death. Blunt ſaid upon the ſcaffold, that for three years he had obſerved the earl was diſcontented, and fired with ambition. That when they were in Ireland, the earl told him his deſign of taking with him the flower of the army; of ſeizing Milfordhaven in Wales; of raiſing men in thoſe parts, and marching directly to London. That he had diſſuaded him from an undertaking ſo dangerous and difficult; but had indeed adviſed him to take a ſelect company of men and ſeize the queen's perſon, and in her name to act afterwards as he ſaw convenient: "But, added Blunt, though it is true, that in all our debates we never thought of embruing our hands in the queen's blood, yet had we ſucceeded, I cannot ſay but her life might have been in danger." He declared, that he died a Roman catholic, but ſuch a one, as ſolely relied on the merits of Chriſt's death and ſufferings.

The queen and council believed it prudent to end the executions with theſe few perſons, by reaſon of the number and quality of the accomplices. The earl of Southampton was kept in priſon, and the reſt were fined, though very few paid their fines. Henry Nevil was only condemned to impriſonment at the queen's pleaſure, though it was proved againſt him that he knew of the conſpiracy, and made no diſcovery [g].

The earl of Mar and the lord of Kinloſs, the Scotch embaſſadors, arrived too late, when the earl of Eſſex was in cuſtody. It is well known with what view the earl of Eſſex had deſired them, but we are ignorant of the inſtructions given them by the king of Scotland concerning the plot. It ſeems, however, it may be inferred from Eſſex's propoſal, and the arrival of theſe embaſſadors at the very time the conſpiracy was diſcovered, that king James was not againſt it. Be this as it will, theſe embaſſadors confined themſelves to congratulate the queen upon the diſcovery of ſo dangerous a plot; to demand the puniſhment of one Valentine Thomas, who, in 1598, had accuſed their maſter of ill deſigns againſt the queen, for which he was now in priſon; to complain that two Engliſh fugitives had been drawn out of Scotland by ſtratagem, who had fled thither for protection; and laſtly, to demand the aſſignment of ſome lands in England for the king their maſter [h]. Elizabeth, without taking notice of what ſhe knew, anſwered, She received very kindly the king's congratulation, and wiſhed that no ſuch thing might ever happen in his kingdom: That ſhe had not put Valentine to death, to ſhew how little ſhe credited his depoſition: That the two fugitives had been artfully recovered by the warden of the march, who was to blame for ſuffering them to eſcape; and that ſhe was aſtoniſhed the king of Scotland ſhould demand them, ſince to protect the ſeditious ſubjects of another prince was teaching his own to rebel: That as to the aſſignment of the lands, ſhe had given a ſufficient anſwer before: However, ſhe would make a yearly augmentation of two thouſand pounds, provided he would ſincerely maintain their mutual friendſhip, without ſuffering himſelf to be influenced by men, who ſought their own private advantage in the public calamities.

The ſiege of Oſtend, begun in July this year, furniſhed ample matter for the affairs of the Netherlands. Sir Francis Vere, the firſt governor, and the Engliſh troops which ſerved under him, ſignalized themſelves, and were a great honour to their nation [i].

Henry IV. came to Calais in Auguſt, as it were to ſee more nearly what paſſed at the ſiege, which made the archduke uneaſy. But this journey was not ſo much to obſerve the ſiege, as to confer more eaſily with Elizabeth on his project againſt the houſe of Auſtria. Mezerai pretends, Elizabeth firſt conceived this deſign, and earneſtly deſired to confer in perſon with Henry, in a veſſel between Dover and Calais. But I can hardly believe, that at her age, and having no children, ſhe would form a deſign of this nature, the execution whereof required much time and expence. I ſtill leſs believe, that ſhe would have expoſed herſelf to the dangers of the ſea to confer with Henry, whom for ſome time ſhe had neither valued nor truſted. It is more likely, this prince meditating then the deſign which he would have afterwards executed, was deſirous to engage Elizabeth in it. The Engliſh hiſtorians only ſay, that the queen hearing of the king's arrival at Calais, ſent ſir Thomas Edmunds to pay her compliments, and that in return, Henry ſent the marſhal de Biron and the count d'Avergne, with duke d'Aumont, who were received very graciouſly. Mezerai adds, that the queen ſhewed theſe French lords the earl of Eſſex's ſkull in her cloſet. But Camden has confuted this ſtory in his Annals, by affirming, the head was buried with the body. He ſays only, that the queen ſpeaking to the marſhal de Biron concerning the earl of Eſſex, told him, that it was her advice to the king of France, never to ſpare the heads of thoſe who attempted to diſturb his tranquility.

The parliament meeting in October [k], great complaints were made in the lower houſe, concerning divers monopolies authorized by the queen's letters patents, which gave private perſons the ſole privilege of ſelling certain commodities, excluſively of all others. The queen being informed, that the commons conſidered theſe monopolies as ſo many breaches of the people's privileges, annulled moſt of theſe grants, and left the reſt to be tried by the laws. This proceeding, even before ſhe had been addreſſed, who ſo pleaſing to the commons, that one hundred and forty of their members were appointed to wait upon her with their thanks. She did not omit this opportunity to teſtify to the houſe her great affection for her people. When ſhe had received the compliment of the members, ſhe returned an anſwer in the following ſpeech:

GENTLEMEN,

"I owe you hearty thanks and commendations for your ſingular good will towards me, not only in your hearts and thoughts, but which you have openly expreſſed and declared, whereby you have recalled me from an error proceeding from my ignorance, not my will. Theſe things had undeſervedly turned to my diſgrace (to whom nothing is more dear than the ſafety and love of my people), had not ſuch harpies and horſe-leaches as theſe been made known and diſcovered to me by you. I had rather my heart or hand ſhould periſh, than that either my heart or hand ſhould allow ſuch privileges to monopoliſts, as may be prejudical to my people. The ſplendor of regal majeſty hath not ſo blinded mine eyes, that licentious power ſhould prevail with me more than juſtice. The glory of the name of a king may deceive princes that know not how to rule, as gilded pills may deceive a ſick patient. But I am none of thoſe princes: for I know that the commonwealth is to be governed for the good and advantage of thoſe that are committed to me, not of myſelf to whom it is intruſted; and that an account is one day to be given before another judgment ſeat. I think myſelf moſt happy, that by God's aſſiſtance I have hitherto ſo proſperouſly governed the commonwealth in all reſpects; and that I have ſuch ſubjects, as for their good I would willingly leave both kingdom and life alſo. I beſeech you, that whatever miſdemeanors and miſcarriages others are guilty of by their falſe ſuggeſtions, may not be imputed to me; let the teſtimony of a clear conſcience intirely in all reſpects excuſe me. You are not ignorant, that princes ſervants are oftentimes too much ſet upon their own private advantage; that the truth is frequently concealed from princes, and they cannot themſelves look narrowly into all things, upon whoſe ſhoulders lieth continually the heavy weight of the greateſt and moſt important affairs."

Elizabeth had the good fortune to be believed when ſhe ſpoke in this manner, becauſe in reality the Engliſh in her reign were the happieſt people under the ſun. They ſaw no deſigns upon their liberties, nor any infringement of their privileges encouraged. Juſtice was adminiſtered impartially, and the revenues of the crown, and the ſubſidies granted by parliament for the public occaſions, were not idly conſumed. They had therefore reaſon to think the queen truly loved them, ſince ſhe cauſed them to enjoy ſo great happineſs. Some ſucceſſors of this illuſtrious queen have talked in the ſame manner to their parliaments, nay, it is in great meaſure become cuſtomary; but they have not all gained the ſame credit, becauſe it is not words but deeds that perſuade. This affair did not end in mutual compliments. The commons, willing to ſhew their gratitude to the queen, granted her the largeſt ſubſidy they had ever given her ſince the beginning of her reign [m]. Happy are the kings of England, who by a free

[l] Sir Robert Naunton partly aſcribes the cauſe of this mutual love between the queen and her parliaments, to the choice of parliament-men. For, ſays he, I find not that they were at any time given to any violent or pertinacious diſpute, elections being made of grave and diſcreet perſons, not factious and ambitious of fame; ſuch as came not to the houſe with a malevolent ſpirit of contention, but with a preparation to conſult on the public good, p. 14.

[m] The laity granted her four entire ſubſidies, and eight fifteenths and tenths. And the clergy gave four ſubſidies of four ſhillings in the pound. See Statut. c. 17, 18. The reader may obſerve, that when in 1592 there were granted to the queen three ſubſidies, and ſix fifteenths and tenths, it was eſpecially provided, That it might not hereafter be drawn into a precedent for future times. And yet in the very next parliament, the ſame ſubſidies were granted again; and increaſed in this. From whence it is plain, as Mr Simmonds D'Ewes juſtly obſerves, p. 574, "That whatſoever is once granted by the ſubject, may often be raiſed, but ſeldom falleth."—The acts made in this parliament, where, 1. and ſincere conduct wiſely preſerve ſuch a correſpondence between them and their parliaments [n]!

The war in Ireland was carried on this year more ſucceſsfully than in the two former. The rebels received however an aid from Spain, under the command of Don Juan d'Aquila, who landed at Kinſale, and became maſter of the town. He inſtantly publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that Elizabeth being lawfully depoſed by the pope, her ſubjects were abſolved from their oath of allegiance, and he was come to deliver Ireland "from the jaws of the devil [o]." But inſtead of making the progreſs he expected, he found himſelf beſieged in Kinſale by the lord deputy. Shortly after, the earl of Tiroen approaching the Engliſh to raiſe the ſiege, was utterly routed, after which the Spaniſh general was forced to capitulate. He was permitted to retire with his forces into Spain, having firſt ſurrendered the caſtles he had taken. The capitulation was ſigned the 2d of January 1602. During the reſt of the winter, the lord deputy had ſuch ſucceſs againſt the rebels, that the earl of Tiroen's affairs were reduced to a very ill ſtate.

[1602] Mean while the queen, to divert the Spaniards from making freſh attempts upon Ireland, armed eight large ſhips, with ſome others of leſſer burthen, under the command of ſir Richard Leviſon and ſir William Mounſon. Theſe two commanders being ſeparated, Leviſon met with thirty-eight Spaniſh veſſels coming from the Weſt Indies, and attacked them, but without ſucceſs. Mounſon joining him ſome time after, they went together and aſſaulted a large carack of ſixteen hundred tons, richly laden from the Eaſt Indies, and which lay under the caſtle of Zizambra in Portugal, where ſhe was guarded by eleven gallies commanded by Spinola. Notwithſtanding the difficulty of the undertaking, they attacked the carack, and, after diſperſing the gallies, took that rich ſhip, valued at a million of crowns, and brought her to England, with the loſs only of twelve men.

In September following, Spinola, with ſix gallies he had ſaved, ſailing for Flanders, met in the Channel ſome Engliſh and Dutch ſhips [p], with whom he had a ſharp engagement. Two of his gallies were ſunk, one taken, and with the other three he retired into Sluys.

This ſame year, there was a great conteſt in England between the jeſuits and the ſecular prieſts. Theſe accuſed the jeſuits of being the ſole cauſe of the ſevere laws enacted againſt the catholics, becauſe they had been concerned in all the conſpiracies, and had even ſuborned aſſaſſins to murder the queen. In the height of the quarrel, the queen had intelligence that the jeſuits, and ſuch of the ſecular prieſts as eſpouſed their principles and party, were contriving ſomething againſt the government. Whereupon ſhe baniſhed them the realm by proclamation, forbidding them ever to return to England on pain of death. The other ſecular prieſts, who joined not with the jeſuits, were alſo liable to the ſame penalty, unleſs they would take the oath of allegiance.

It was likewiſe in the courſe of this year that Henry IV. ordered the marſhal de Biron's head to be ſtruck off, for conſpiring with ſome others to diſmember the French monarchy. The marſhal had been his right hand, whilſt his affairs were in an ill ſtate. Bnt ſince the peace with Spain, he thought the beſt way to procure quiet was to gain by favours the French lords, who had moſt oppoſed him. This could not be done without neglecting his old friends, and from thence ſprung the plot whereof the marſhal de Biron was head. His accomplices, as the count d'Auvergne and ſome others, eaſily obtained their pardon. But the marſhal de Bouillon, who was alſo of the number, thought is ſafeſt to withdraw into Germany, from whence he wrote to Elizabeth, deſiring her to intercede for him. The king of France wrote to her alſo, acquainting her with the conſpiracy, and aſking her advice concerning the marſhal de Bouillon. The queen anſwered, ſhe could not adviſe him, till ſhe certainly knew whether the marſhal was guilty. She warned him alſo to take care that it was not a Spaniſh artifice to cauſe him to entertain ſuſpicions of his beſt ſubjects. But Henry, not conſidering the marſhal as ſuch, told the Engliſh embaſſador, that the queen his miſtreſs had a better opinion of him than he deſerved, ſince it was certain he was concerned in the earl of Eſſex's plot, and had not even diſowned it.

The earl of Tiroen's affairs in Ireland daily declined. The lord deputy having cloſely purſued him, without giving him any reſpite, even to the places where he thought himſelf moſt ſafe [q], compelled him at length to caſt himſelf upon the queen's mercy: but he would not receive his ſubmiſſion without an expreſs order from the court. The order coming at laſt, the earl of Tiroen yielded himſelf to the lord deputy [r], who reſolved to carry him into England and preſent him to the queen.

[1603] About the end of January 1603, Elizabeth began to feel the firſt attacks of a diſtemper which brought her at length to her grave. Her being obliged to have the ring ſhe wore on her finger filed off, was looked upon as an ill omen, becauſe ſhe was wont to ſay, with that ring ſhe had been married to her people. As ſhe was now very old, it was eaſily believed ſhe would not recover. Accordingly, ſome time before her death, ſhe had the mortification to ſee herſelf forſaken by moſt of her courtiers, who ſtrove with emulation to court the favour of the king of Scotland her preſumptive ſucceſſor. This threw her into a melancholy, of which it was not poſſible to conceal the cauſe, eſpecially as it was openly talked of ſending for king James before ſhe expired. In the beginning of March ſhe was ſeized with a heavineſs in all her limbs, which rendered her motionleſs, and even cauſed her to ſpeak with great difficulty. This was attended with great frowardneſs, ſo that ſhe could not bear any one near her but the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who comforted her, and joined with her in prayer. In ſhort, when it was perceived ſhe was near her laſt hour, the council ſent the lord admiral, the lord privy ſeal, and the ſecretary, to pray her to name her ſucceſſor. She faintly anſwered, "That ſhe had always ſaid, her throne was the throne of kings, and ſhe would have no mean perſon to ſucceed her." The ſecretary repreſenting to her, that theſe words were very obſcure, and the council deſiring ſhe would declare her pleaſure more plainly, "I will (ſaid ſhe) that a king ſucceed me: and who ſhould that be but my neareſt kinſman, the king of Scots?" Then being admoniſhed by the archbiſhop to fix her thoughts upon God, "That I do (ſaid ſhe) neither doth my mind wander from him at all." When ſhe could no longer pray with her tongue, ſhe lifted up her hands and eyes to heaven, and giving ſome other ſigns of her confidence in the mercy of God, ſhe expired on the 24th of March, old ſtyle, in the ſeventieth year of her age, and the forty-fourth of her reign [s].

To diſplay in few words the elogy of this illuſtrious queen, it ſeems to be ſufficient to obſerve, that her name is ſtill of bleſſed memory with the Engliſh, now when flattery cannot be ſuppoſed to have any ſhare in the veneration they pay her. But Elizabeth baniſhed from England the catholic religion, and reſtored the reformation. This alone was the cauſe that two parties have been formed on her account, who mutually tax each other with flattery or animoſity. The proteſtants, conſidering that this queen was the ſole bulwark of their religion, which probably without her would have been deſtroyed in England, Scotland, Ireland, and perhaps in France and the Low-Countries, cannot forbear giving her great commendations, and feel themſelves inclined to excuſe her failings. For the ſame reaſon, the Roman catholics look upon her with another eye; nay, ſome have not ſcrupled to paint her in the blackeſt colours, and give her the moſt odious epithets. This makes it impoſſible to give her a character that ſhall pleaſe all the world. I ſhall content myſelf therefore with making ſome reflections which will aſſiſt thoſe who ſeek only truth, to paſs an impartial judgment on this famous queen, free from party-paſſion and prejudice.

Elizabeth had great ſenſe, and a judgment naturally ſound and ſolid. This appeared in her whole conduct, from the beginning to the end of her reign. Nothing ſhews her capacity more, than her addreſs in ſurmounting the difficulties and troubles created by her enemies, eſpecially when it is conſidered what theſe enemies were, the moſt powerful, the moſt artful, the moſt ſubtle, and the leaſt ſcrupulous in Europe [t]. The bare naming of them is a ſufficient demonſtration. The court of Rome under ſeveral popes, Philip II. king of Spain, the duke of Alva, Henry II. and Charles IX. kings of France, Catherine de Medici, the duke of Guiſe, the cardinal of Lorrain, Mary queen of Scots, all the Romiſh clergy, and particularly the jeſuits. Had her forces been proportionable to thoſe of her enemies united together, there would be nothing very extraordinary. Strength often ſupplies the want of capacity. But in what manner did ſhe withſtand ſo potent, ſo formidable enemies? It was by two or three maxims which ſhe made the rule of her conduct, and from which ſhe never ſwerved: "To make herſelf beloved by her people: To be frugal of her treaſure: To cheriſh diſſenſion amongſt her neighbours." If things are rightly conſidered, ſhe had no other way to ſecure herſelf. It cannot therefore be denied, that this is a clear evidence of her ability. But as her ability was never queſtioned, it is not this I am chiefly to deſcribe. On the contrary, her enemies have taken occaſion from thence to defame her, by repreſenting as vices diſguiſed, what her friends extol as ſo many virtues. They pretend, that her ability conſiſted wholly in an overſtrained diſſimulation, and a profound hypocriſy. In a word, they ſay ſhe was a perfect comedian. For my part, I do not pretend to deny that ſhe made great uſe of diſſimulation, as well to the courts of France and Spain, as in regard to the queen of Scotland and the Scots. This would be denying a manifeſt truth. The court of Rome was the only court ſhe never diſſembled with. I am alſo perſuaded, that being ſo much concerned to gain the love and eſteem of her ſubjects, ſhe affected to ſpeak frequently, and with exaggeration, of her tenderneſs for them, and deſired to have it believed, that ſhe did through an exceſſive love to her people things wherein her own intereſt was moſtly concerned. But the queſtion is to know, whether in her circumſtances her diſſimulation was blameable. What injury was it to her ſubjects to endeavour to perſuade them, ſhe loved them tenderly, ſince ſhe actually and really did whatever was neceſſary to convince them? As to foreigners, it muſt be carefully obſerved, that her diſſimulation and artifices tended not to invade their poſſeſſions, but to preſerve her own. Her enemies frequently attempted to deprive her both of crown and life, and ſhe ſaved both by her policy and diſſimulation. Where is the harm of ſuch a conduct? Can the diſſimulation and artifices which aim only at ſelf-preſervation, be without extreme prejudice confounded with the diſſimulation and artifices that tend to ſurpriſe the innocent, and invade the property of others; can theſe, I ſay, be conſidered upon the ſame foot? For my part, I am ſo far from thinking that this ſort of diſſimulation is any blemiſh to Elizabeth's reputation, that I rather believe it ought to be reckoned among her commendable qualities.

Avarice is another failing imputed to her by her own friends. I will not deny that ſhe was too parſimonious, and upon ſome occaſions ſtuck too cloſe to her maxim, not to be at any expence but what was abſolutely neceſſary. However, in general I maintain, that her circumſtances required her, if not to be covetous, at leaſt not to part with her money but with the greateſt caution, both to preſerve her people's affection, and enable her to withſtand her enemies. After all, whom did ſhe wrong by her extreme frugality? A dozen of hungry courtiers, who would have been very glad ſhe had laviſhed her treaſure like the king her father in the beginning of his reign. As for the reſt of her ſubjects, inſtead of having cauſe to complain of this pretended avarice, they had reaſon to be pleaſed with it, ſince it conſiſted not in robbing them of their property by illegal methods, as Henry VII. her grandfather had done, but in huſbanding her revenues, and conſequently their own [u].

She is alſo accuſed of not being ſo chaſte as ſhe affected to appear. Nay, ſome pretend there are now in England the deſcendants of a daughter ſhe had by the earl of Leiceſter. But as hitherto no proof of this accuſation has been produced, it may be ſafely reckoned among the calumnies with which her reputation has been attacked, as well during her life as after her death.

It is not ſo eaſy to juſtify her concerning the death of the queen of Scots. Here it muſt freely be owned that ſhe ſacrificed equity, juſtice, and perhaps her own conſcience, to her ſafety. If Mary was guilty of her huſband's Murder, as there is reaſon to believe, it belonged not to Elizabeth to puniſh her. And indeed it was not for that ſhe took away her life; but ſhe uſed that pretence to detain her in priſon, under the deceitful excuſe of making her innocence appear. On this occaſion her diſſimulation was blame-worthy. This firſt injuſtice engaged her afterwards to uſe numberleſs arts and devices to have a pretence to render Mary's impriſonment perpetual. Hence aroſe at laſt the neceſſity of putting her to death on the ſcaffold. In ſhort, this exceſs of violence gave birth to more artifices and acts of diſſimulation to juſtify herſelf, and caſt the blame on the innocent. This doubtleſs is Elizabeth's great blemiſh, which manifeſtly proves to what height ſhe carried the fear of loſing a tottering crown. This continual fear and uneaſineſs is what characterizes her reign, becauſe it was the ſpring of almoſt all her actions. All that can be ſaid for Elizabeth is, that the queen of Scots and her friends had brought things to ſuch a point, that one of the two queens was to periſh, and it was natural that the weakeſt ſhould fall. But this does not excuſe Elizabeth's injuſtice to Mary in detaining her in priſon, which had no other foundation than Elizabeth's fear concerning her crown.

I come now to Elizabeth's religion. I do not believe her being a true proteſtant was ever queſtioned. But as it was her intereſt to be ſo, ſome have taken occaſion to doubt whether the zeal ſhe expreſſed for her religion was the effect of her perſuaſion or policy. What may have occaſioned this doubt is, that it clearly appears in her hiſtory, that in aſſiſting the proteſtants of France and the Netherlands, as well as thoſe of Scotland, ſhe had only temporal views, namely, her own ſafety and defence againſt impending invaſions. But it cannot thence be inferred, ſhe was not a good proteſtant, or had no religion at all, ſince it is not impoſſible that her religion ſhould agree with her temporal intereſt. All that can be ſaid is, that ſhe happened ſometimes to prefer her temporal before her religious concerns.

She is warmly accuſed of perſecuting the catholics, and putting ſeveral to death. It is true, there were ſome that ſuffered death in her reign. But one may venture to affirm, that none were puniſhed but for conſpiring againſt the queen or ſtate, or for attempting to deſtroy the proteſtant religion in England, and reſtore the Romiſh by violent methods. The catholics, who lived peaceably, were tolerated, though with ſome reſtraint as to the exerciſe of their religion, but with none as to their conſciences. If this may be called perſecution, what name ſhall be given to the ſufferings of the proteſtants in the reign of Mary [w]?

The preſbyterians think alſo they have reaſon to complain of the ſtatute enacted in this reign, which deprived them of liberty of conſcience, though they were proteſtants. I ſhall not take upon me to determine whether they had cauſe to complain of this rigour. I ſhall only ſay, that in my opinion they had too much obſtinacy, and their adverſaries too little charity.

To ſum up in few words what may ſerve to form Elizabeth's character, I ſhall add, that ſhe was a good and illuſtrious queen, with many virtues and noble qualities, and few faults. But what ſhe ought to be eſteemed for above all things is, that ſhe cauſed the Engliſh to enjoy a felicity unknown to their anceſtors under moſt of the kings her predeceſſors. This doubtleſs is the teſt, by which we are to judge of thoſe whom God has ſet over us.

BY an indenture of the 2d of Elizabeth, a pound weight of gold, of the old ſtandard, of 23 carats 3 grains and a half fine, was coined into 36 pounds by tale; namely, into 24 ſovereigns, at thirty ſhillings a piece, or 48 rials at fifteen ſhillings, or 72 angels at ten ſhillings a piece, or 144 half angels at five ſhillings a piece: and a pound weight of crown gold of 22 carats fine, and 2 carats allay, was coined into 33 pounds by tale: namely, 33 ſovereigns at twenty ſhillings a piece, or 66 half ſovereigns as ten ſhillings a piece, or 132 crowns at five ſhillings a piece, or 264 half crowns. And a pound weight of the old ſterling ſilver, viz. 11 ounces 2 penny weight fine, and 18 penny weight allay, was coined into 3 pounds by tale, of half ſhillings, groats, quarter ſhillings, half groats, 3 halfpenny pieces, pence, and farthings. In the 19th of her reign, a pound of gold, of the old ſtandard, was coined into 72 angels, at ten ſhillings a piece, 143 half angels at five ſhillings a piece, or 281 quarter angels, amounting in tale to 36 pounds; and a pound of old ſterling ſilver, into half ſhillings, threepences, 3 halfpenny, or 3 farthing pieces, to make 3 pounds by tale. And in the 25th, into 60 ſhillings, or into 3 pounds by tale. In the 26th, a pound troy of old ſtandard gold, was coined into 48 nobles at fifteen ſhillings a piece, or 24 double nobles at thirty ſhillings a piece, making 36 pounds. In the 35th year of this reign, a pound weight of gold, of 22 carats

The corruptions which the laſt year of Henry VIII. had brought into the Engliſh money was not quite rooted out till queen Elizabeth's reign; but her firſt buſineſs was to mark all the baſe pieces, either with a greyhound, portcluſe, lion, harp, roſe, or fleur-de-lis. Her gold coins, as appears from the foregoing indentures, were ſovereigns, half ſovereigns, or rials, nobles, double nobles, angels, half angels, pieces of an angel and a half, and three angels, crowns, and half crowns. The ſovereign has on one ſide the queen's figure in armour, and ruff, hair diſheveled, crowned with the imperial crown of England (conſiſting of the double arch, as borne ever ſince; ll, except Henry VI. having borne it before her with the ſingle arch) ELIZABETH. This ſilver money, from the crown to the threepence, is the ſame, viz. ELIZABETH. D. G. ANG. FRA. ET. HIB. REGINA. Reverſe, the arms and POSVI, &c. On the crown and half crown, ſhe appears with the ball and ſcepter (Fig. 2.) which latter never appeared upon the monies from the reign of Henry III. The ſhillings are of ſeveral kinds, ſome with a croſs croſlet, another with a dove or drake upon it, which laſt is ſaid to be in memory of ſir Francis Drake's voyage round the world; a third very fair, mill'd, a ſtar the Mint mark (Fig. 4.) The portcluſe ſhilling and crown piece, both which are very rare, inſtead of the queen's head, have the arms crowned between E. R. and ELIZABETH. D. G. ANG. FR. ET. HIB. REGINA. Reverſe, a portcullice crowned, and POSVI, &c. an annulet the Mint mark. The ſixpences are of different mints, as the ſhillings; ſome with a roſe behind the queen's head, another marked with the Belgick lion upon the queen's breaſt. Of groats there are the drake, ſtar, or mill'd, and croſs croſlet, Mint marks, &c. Of the threepences, ſome have a croſs, others a ſword for the Mint mark; others the ſtar, cinque-foil, pheon, &c. all having the roſe behind the head, and motto as the larger pieces. The farthings have all the roſe on each ſide, and weigh from three to five grains.---Beſides theſe, Elizabeth coined alſo Iriſh money, namely, ſhillings called Harpers, from the arms of that kingdom, viz. three harps crowned on the reverſe (Fig. 5.)

THE

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XVIII.

The Reign of JAMES I. Containing the Space of two and twenty Years, and three Days.

24. JAMES I.

[1603] ELIZABETH had no ſooner breathed her laſt, but the council met to conſult about the meaſures that were to be taken in the preſent juncture. The queen, who had delayed to name her ſucceſſor till the end of her days, at laſt declared, the king of Scotland was to aſcend the throne of England after her, and it was not doubted but her will agreed with this declaration. So the council deemed it neceſſary, before all things, to be aſſured of it, by peruſing the will, which was immediately opened, and found to confirm what the queen had declared by word of mouth. The king of Scotland had therefore in his perſon a threefold right, which rendered his title indiſputable. The firſt was what is called in England, a parliamentary right, which derived its validity from the act of parliament, ſecuring the crown to Henry VII. and his heirs. The ſecond was hereditary right, for this prince was the neareſt relation, and natural heir to Elizabeth. Theſe two rights were farther ſtrengthened by the queen's will, which made the third. So the council readily judged he ought to be acknowledged for king of England. This reſolution being imparted to the lord mayor of London, the new king was proclaimed by the name of James I. ſix hours after the queen's death.

Though the council had been careful to ſend the king the firſt news of his acceſſion to the crown of England, ſir Robert Carey, the lord Hunſdon's youngeſt ſon, found means to be before them [a]. James, who impatiently expected the news, received it however without altering his countenance; the queen's illneſs having been long enough to afford him time to be compoſed when the news ſhould arrive. Nevertheleſs, he could not forbear lifting up his eyes to heaven; probably to thank God for the favour he had long expected, not without great anxiety. Elizabeth would never poſitively declare ſhe intended to name him for her ſucceſſor. She contented herſelf with keeping him in hopes, but in ſuch a manner, that ſhe ſeemed to reſerve the power of depriving him of the ſucceſſion, if his conduct diſpleaſed her. James's correſpondence with the earl of Eſſex, which, though connived at, was not unknown to the court of England, might give him ſome apprehenſions. Beſides, Elizabeth never loved him, whether becauſe he was ſon to her mortal enemy, or had ſhewn too much impatience to poſſeſs the crown of England; or, in fine, by reaſon of his inclination to the catholics. All theſe reaſons made this prince very uneaſy, in the expectation of a crown which his birth intitled him to, but which, however, he might have loſt, had Elizabeth been pleaſed to take meaſures to deprive him of it. The news of the queen's death could not therefore but be agreeable to him, ſince, by his correſpondence with one of the chief miniſters, he was aſſured ſhe had done nothing to his prejudice.

Preſently after Carey's arrival, came ſir Charles Percy, and Thomas Somerſet, who, by order of the council of England, notified to him the queen's death, and the council's diligence in proclaiming him [b]. Theſe were quickly followed by Sir Thomas Lake, who was ſent by the council to inform him of the ſtate and condition of the realm [c].

Whilſt the news of his acceſſion to the crown was carrying to the king, the Engliſh were reflecting on the alterations which the queen's death was likely to produce. The people in general lamented the loſs of their queen. They had been happy under her, and were not ſure their happineſs would continue in the new reign. A king of Scotland on the throne of England, was to moſt no pleaſing object. Beſides, ſince James was of age, he had given no very advantageous idea of himſelf. His unſteadineſs, his weakneſs for his favourites, his inclination to the catholics, of which, on ſeveral occaſions, he had given viſible marks, were not qualities apt to prepoſſeſs the Engliſh in his favour. It was hoped, however, he would tread in the ſteps of the illuſtrious queen, his immediate predeceſſor, becauſe it was thought he could not follow a better courſe; and what is deſired is eaſily believed. As for the deceaſed queen's miniſters and courtiers, the good and welfare of the realm was what leaſt affected them. Every one was wholly intent upon gaining the favour of the ſucceſſor. Towards the end of the late reign there were two factions at court; the one conſiſting of Eſſex's friends, and the other of his enemies. The firſt was intirely humbled by the death of their head; and the other had ſo far the aſcendant, that they abſolutely ruled in the council. Sir Robert Cecil, ſecretary of ſtate, and ſecond ſon of the late lord treaſurer Burleigh, was at the head of this party. But this politic courtier, foreſeeing, that after the queen's death his party could not fail of ſinking, ſince king James conſidered the earl of Eſſex as his martyr, had taken timely meaſures for his ſupport. Before the queen's deceaſe, he had devoted himſelf to the king of Scotland, and held a private correſpondence with him, to inform him of what paſſed at court. By this means, he had ſecured that prince's favour, though it was not without danger of loſing the queen's, had ſhe known his ſecret practices [d]. He was the only man of his party that had gained the new king's favour, which he ſo artfully cultivated, that in the end he became his prime miniſter.

There was alſo another thing which engaged the attention of the Engliſh, namely, the affair of religion. The king's conduct in Scotland gave occaſion for ſundry reflections, which kept people in uncertainty, none knowing poſitively what was to be hoped or feared. James was born of Roman catholic parents, but being taken from his mother in his infancy, had been educated in the proteſtant religion, and always profeſſed it. On the other hand, the religion he had been brought up in, though proteſtant, differed a little from the religion eſtabliſhed in England, if not in doctrine, at leaſt in diſcipline, and ſome other points of external worſhip, which were conſidered by the two churches as very important. In a word, it was the preſbyterian or puritanical religion. In fine, this prince had ſhewn on numberleſs occaſions, that he was far from being an enemy to the Romiſh religion. All this formed a certain contraſt, which bred an univerſal ſuſpenſe. The catholics hoped to meet, under his government, with gentler treatment, and more indulgence than under Elizabeth, nay, they carried their expectations much farther. The preſbyterians flattered themſelves, that James, who had been educated in their religion, would promote the reforming of the church of England upon the plan of that of Scotland, and hoped ſhortly to ſee the downfal of the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy. Finally, the church of England men thought to have reaſon to expect, that the new king would conform to their religion, ſince it was eſtabliſhed by law. But after all, the hopes of the three parties could not but be mixed with fears, ſince the [b] The council's letter to him begins with theſe pompous words: Right high, right excellent, and mighty prince, and our dread ſovereign lord, &c. See Spotiſwood, p. 473.

[c] Several other perſons of diſtinction came to pay their reſpects to him, and among the reſt John Peyton (ſon of Sir John Peyton, lieutenant of the Tower of London), whom he knighted, being the firſt on whom he conferred that honour. Stow, p. 818.

[d] The perſon that managed Cecil's correſpondence at the court of Scotland, was Bruce, a younger brother of a noble family in Scotland, who carried the matter with ſuch addreſs and ſecrecy, that all the great men in England, without knowing of one another's doing it, and without the queen's ſuſpecting any thing, ſigned in writing an engagement to aſſert and ſtand by the king of Scots right of ſucceſſion. Burnet's Hiſt. p. 8. Cecil was very like to have been diſcovered a little before the queen's death. Being in the coach with her as ſhe was taking the air, on Black-heath, a poſt from Scotland came by. Whereupon the queen ſtopped her coach to receive the packet. Cecil dreading ſome of his ſecret conveyances might be diſcovered, and having a ready wit, haſtily calls for a knife to cut it open. But, juſt as he was going to do ſo, he pretended it had a very naſty ſmell, and ought to be aired before her majeſty ſaw it; which the queen, miſtruſting nothing, and hating ill ſcents of all things, ordered to be done. king had not yet declared himſelf. Such were the ſentiments of the Engliſh concerning their new king, whom as yet they knew only by report.

As ſoon as James was informed by the perſons ſent from the council of England that he was proclaimed, he diſpatched Aſton to acquaint the privy counſellors, that he was preparing for his journey, and accordingly he left Scotland the 5th of April, eleven days after Elizabeth's death. The principal Scotch lords, by whom he was attended into England, were the duke of Lenox, the earl of Mar, the lord Hume, and the lord Kinloſs, with ſeveral others of leſs diſtinction, but who afterwards were promoted to Engliſh honours and dignities. He ſpent above a month in his journey from Edinburgh to London [e], where he arrived the 7th of May. He had no ſooner entered England, but the people ſtrove to demonſtrate their reſpect by magnificent entertainments in all the towns he paſſed through. Such were their acclamations, their wiſhes for his proſperity, their praiſes and joy for his arrival, that an honeſt plain Scotchman could not forbear ſaying, "This people will ſpoil a gud king." Meanwhile, the multitudes which flocked from all parts to ſee their new ſovereign, grew at laſt ſo troubleſome to him, that he was forced to ſet bounds to their curioſity by a proclamation. This was very ſurpriſing to the people, who did not underſtand that a little inconveniency ſhould hinder the king from receiving the reſpects of his new ſubjects. But perhaps this was owing to the king's fear, that among the crowd ſome aſſaſſin might lurk, and attempt upon his life. It may be too, he had a mind to accuſtom his ſubjects not to be too familiar with their ſovereign. However, it did not hinder the people from paying him every due reſpect, and expreſſing great ſatisfaction to ſee him paſs, in order to be ſeated on the throne.

At York, moſt of the Engliſh lords came and paid him their homage. Among theſe was ſecretary Cecil, who was now conſidered as out of favour, becauſe he had been Eſſex's ſworn enemy. But great was the ſurpriſe when the king received him with extraordinary marks of eſteem. This gave occaſion to ſuſpect, he had taken care beforehand to gain his favour, and the king's behaviour to him afterwards confirmed the ſuſpicion. Some accuſe this lord of inſpiring the king with the deſign of ſetting himſelf above the laws, and not ſuffering the parliament to ſhare the ſupreme authority with him. At leaſt, it is certain, James's chief care, after his acceſſion, was to maintain the prerogative royal in its utmoſt extent, nay, to carry it higher than any of his predeceſſors. He muſt, at the time I am now ſpeaking of, have conceived a larger notion than had been hitherto formed, of the power of an Engliſh king, ſince when he came to Newark, he ordered a cut-purſe to be hanged by his ſole warrant, and without trial. It cannot be denied that this was beyond the lawful power of a king of England, and directly contrary to the privileges of the Engliſh nation. Probably, care was taken to warn him of the ill effects ſuch illegal acts might produce among the people, ſince he refrained from them ever after.

On the 3d of May he came to Theobald's, ſecretary Cecil's houſe [f], where he ſtaid ſome days. Here the council came to pay their reſpects to him, and here paſſed what was moſt remarkable in his journey till his arrival at London. When he was about to leave Scotland, he ſent Carey to tell the privy counſellors, that his intention was to continue every man in his poſt. However, at his coming to Theobald's, he increaſes their number with ſeveral others, moſt of whom were Scots, his deſign being, as he more plainly ſhewed afterwards, to make but one kingdom of England and Scotland. The new Scotch counſellors were the duke of Lenox, the earl of Mar, the lord Hume [g], and Sir James Elphinſton his ſecretary. He nominated alſo two Engliſh noblemen, the lords Zouch, and Burleigh, ſecretary Cecil's eldeſt brother. I find likewiſe that at the ſame time, or preſently after, he admitted into his council the earls of Northumberland and Cumberland [h], the lords Thomas and Henry Howard, the one ſon, the other brother to the late duke of Norfolk, of whom the firſt was a ſuſpected, the laſt a known papiſt, but upon the king's arrival he had embraced the proteſtant religion. The king's gratitude to the Howard family, who, for the ſake of the queen his mother, were in diſgrace in the late reign, did not ſtop there. The lord Thomas was made earl of Suffolk, and then lord treaſurer, and the lord Henry was created ſome years after earl of Northampton. Moreover, Philip earl of Arundel, the late duke of Norfolk's eldeſt ſon, having loſt his title by his condemnation, though Elizabeth gave him his life, the king created his ſon Thomas, earl of Arundel and Surrey [i]. Thus the king's regard for the duke of Norfolk's family, plainly ſhewed what he thought of Elizabeth's treatment of that duke and his houſe. It was not in this alone that he expreſſed his reſentment againſt the late queen. Upon all occaſions he affected to ſhew, it was only out of policy that he had, whilſt ſhe lived, concealed his averſion for her. The moſt notable mark he gave of it was, that he neither went into mourning himſelf, nor would admit any perſon to his preſence in a mourning habit.

From the king's arrival in England to his departure from Theobald's, he made about two hundred knights, and ſome days after his coming to London he made many more. As Elizabeth had been ſparing in the diſtribution of honours, with which ſovereigns are wont to reward the merit and ſervices of their ſubjects, her ſucceſſor, on the contrary, beſtowed them with a liberal, or rather profuſe hand. Never had the like number of knights, barons, and earls, been made in any former reign. This occaſioned a ſatirical libel, entitled, "A help for weak memories to retain the names of the nobility [k]." The truth is, James made ſo many knights and peers, particularly in the firſt years of his reign, that ſuch a help was very neceſſary. Indeed it is pretended, the current of honour was ſo ſtopped in Elizabeth's reign, that ſcarce a county had knights enough to make a jury [l].

Beſides the three Howards, Thomas Sackville, lord Buckhurſt and high treaſurer, was made earl of Dorſet; ſir Robert Cecil was at firſt created baron of Effingdon, then viſcount Cranburne, and afterwards earl of Saliſbury; and Philip Herbert, the earl of Pembroke's brother, was made earl of Montgomery. I confine myſelf to theſe, becauſe their names moſt frequently occur in the beginning of this reign [m]. I muſt alſo add, that the earl of Southampton, who had been condemned to die, and the earl of Eſſex's ſon, were reſtored to their eſtates and honours before the king reached London. But the lords Grey, Cobham, Carew [n], and ſir Walter Raleigh, who had been enemies to the earl of Eſſex, were very coldly received by the king. Theſe four courtiers of Elizabeth had not a little contributed to the earl of Eſſex's death, as well as ſecretary Cecil; but Cecil, as I obſerved, had wiſely gained the king's favour. Nothing could more plainly ſhew that the king conſidered the earl of Eſſex as his martyr, as he himſelf called him, than his gracious reception of the earl of Southampton when that lord came to wait on him. This was publicly owning that he approved of theſe two lords conſpiracy, the intent of which was to ſet him on the throne before the queen's death. This gained him credit with the diſintereſted. But from that time he began to liſten to the flatteries of his courtiers, who extolled all his actions to the ſkies, and that continued but too much throughout his whole reign.

[e] At Hitchinbrooke, in Huntingdonſhire, he was more handſomely received and entertained by ſir Oliver Cromwell, than he had been all the way before, ſays Stow, p. 822.

Anne daughter of king Edward IV. by whom he had Thomas, who died young. 2. Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, by whom he had Henry earl of Surrey, beheaded 13 Henry VIII. and Thomas, created viſcount Howard of Bindon, 1 Elizabeth.—The ſaid Henry married Frances, daughter of John de Vere earl of Oxford, and by her had Thomas, the fourth duke of Norfolk (reſtored 1 Mary, and beheaded for attempting to marry the queen of Scots), and Henry made earl of Northampton, 1 James I.—The laſt mentioned Thomas had two wives, 1. King James, with good natural parts, had a great ſhare of learning. He was able to form the plan of a good government, the general maxims whereof he perfectly knew. But his averſion to war, his weakneſs for his favourites, certain prejudices he had imbibed, wherein all that approached him helped to confirm him, ever hindered him from putting his theory in practice. He was perſuaded, that the authority of ſovereigns over their ſubjects was unlimited, and that all monarchical governments ought to be abſolute, not conſidering that theſe maxims could not be applied to the government of England, without deſtroying the conſtitution. Moreover he was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favour of his own merit and capacity. As ſoon as his courtiers diſcovered his genius and character, they failed not to attack him in the moſt ſenſible part. That is, they took all occaſions to applaud his wiſdom, learning, parts, and to talk in the higheſt ſtrain of the regal power. As this pleaſed him infinitely, ſo it was the beſt way to gain his favour. Hence aroſe ſeveral expreſſions little known in the former reigns, but which were common in this. The king was called the Solomon of the age, and ſtiled his Sacred Majeſty, and theſe flattering titles, which he greedily received, confirmed him the more in his prejudices. He had one amongſt the reſt which greatly influenced his whole adminiſtration. And that was, he verily believed he was come to the crown of England ſolely by hereditary right, and could not bear it ſhould be thought he was obliged to queen Elizabeth, or that his title proceeded from any act of parliament. If this had been only a ſpeculative notion, it would not have much diſturbed the Engliſh. But he drew from this principle terrible conſequences, tending to no leſs than arbitrary power, and of courſe to the ſubverſion of the Engliſh conſtitution. From his being king by hereditary right he inferred, that his will ought to be the ſole rule of the government, and conſidered as undeniable truths all the wild aſſertions of certain writers concerning the regal power. This pretended hereditary right, with its conſequences, were the fountain of the diviſions which began in this reign, between the king and parliament, and which continued during the three following reigns. This alſo gave birth to the tory and whig factions, who worry one another to this very day. It is requiſite therefore, for the reader's information, to obſerve, before we proceed, that this hereditary right by which James I. pretended to reign, was not ſo indiſputable as he then did, and as many ſtill do imagine it.

In the firſt place, no law can be produced on which may be founded the hereditary ſucceſſion of the crown of England. Secondly, there are many precedents in the Engliſh hiſtory, which ſhew that the parliament aſſumed a power to diſpoſe of the crown, and ſettle the ſucceſſion without any regard to the next heir. In the third place, more kings, ſince the conqueſt, have mounted the throne by virtue of acts of parliament, or ſome other means, than by hereditary right. The four firſt eſpecially, namely, William the Conqueror, William Rufus, Henry I. and Stephen, moſt certainly came not to the crown by this right. When was it then that the crown became hereditary? It is their buſineſs who maintain this opinion, to point out the time. In the fourth place, of all the kings from William the Conqueror to James I. there was not one who had leſs right to the crown than Henry VII. before he was confirmed by the parliament [o]. It was therefore from the parliament's confirmation, rather than from Henry the Seventh's hereditary right, that James I. could derive his own title. Laſtly, if ſome inſtances may be produced of kings ſucceeding from father to ſon, and if from thence it be inferred, it was by hereditary right, it will alſo be eaſy to ſhew that this right vaniſhes when traced to the ſource. For example, if it be ſuppoſed that Elizabeth, Mary, Edward VI. and Henry VIII. came to the crown by hereditary right, though there would be much to be ſaid concerning the two queens, the fountain of this right ſprings from Henry VII. who was heir neither of the houſe of York, nor the houſe of Lancaſter. Henry VI. and Henry V. ſucceeded from father to ſon, to Henry IV. who was not the next heir of Richard II. Edward III. could not ſucceed Edward II. his father, who was yet alive, by hereditary right. Edward II. Edward I. and Henry III. from the longeſt hereditary ſucceſſion from father to ſon that occurs in the Engliſh hiſtory; but they derived their right from John Lackland, who certainly was not Richard I.'s next heir. I paſs over in ſilence the former kings, becauſe the thing is too evident to need any farther explication. Thus of twenty-three kings from the conqueſt to James I. above one half at leaſt did not aſcend the throne by hereditary right. As for thoſe who ſucceeded from father to ſon, and may be ſuppoſed to have reigned by hereditary right, they could ſupport their right of ſucceſſion only by acts of parliament, adjudging the crown to ſome one of their anceſtors, contrary to hereditary right. How then can the hereditary ſucceſſion of the crown of England be indiſputably eſtabliſhed? It follows from what has been ſaid, that nothing is more uncertain than the right by which the kings of England reigned from the conqueſt to the time of James I. ſince it is not poſſible to lay down any undoubted principle upon this head. It is much eaſier to combat all the different opinions concerning the ſucceſſion, than to eſtabliſh any one by ſolid and undeniable reaſons. I ſhall add here, in confirmation of what I have ſaid, that the kings who were reckoned the wiſeſt and moſt able, took care to have their titles confirmed by the parliament, when they believed them liable to any objections. So James I. in reſolving to eſtabliſh this pretended hereditary right, was the firſt cauſe of the troubles which afflicted England, and which are not yet ceaſed.

This prince's choice of the miniſters who were to manage the public affairs, greatly conduced to cheriſh his high conceit of his perſonal qualities, and of the regal authority. The firſt was ſir Robert Cecil, afterwards earl of Saliſbury; this lord, who had been Eſſex's ſworn enemy, knowing how much the king was concerned in that earl's diſgrace, found no better way to keep in his favour than by flattering him continually, and making his court to him by talking of kingly government according to his notions. He was accuſed at leaſt of inſpiring him with ſentiments very diſadvantageous to the people and parliament. He was in other reſpects a man of a great genius, conſummate prudence, vaſt capacity, and perfectly acquainted with the ſtate and intereſt of the nation. The earls of Suffolk and Northampton, the one lord chamberlain, and the other lord keeper, were much inferior to the earl of Saliſbury in parts and ability. But it is pretended they were papiſts in their hearts; and as the catholic religion could be reſtored in England but by an arbitrary power, they earneſtly laboured to indulge the king in his notions concerning the regal authority. To theſe three lords the king chiefly committed the management of his affairs. All the reſt of the courtiers followed the ſame method, and emulouſly ſtrove to gain the king's favour by a blind ſubmiſſion to his will.

Shortly after the king's arrival at London, he ſent a numerous train of lords and ladies [p] into Scotland to attend the queen and his children who were ready to come to him. He had three children, namely, Henry nine years old, Elizabeth, and Charles [q]. This laſt being indiſpoſed, was left in Scotland till September the next year.

Whilſt the queen was on her journey, the king remembered he had complained to Elizabeth of Valentine Thomas, who had ſlandered him, and was now in priſon. It is not known wherein the ſlander conſiſted; but whatever it was, about a month after the king's arrival, Thomas was ordered to be brought upon his trial, and received ſentence of death, for conſpiring againſt Elizabeth and ſome of her council [r].

About the ſame time, and before the queen's arrival, the marquis of Roſny came from the king of France, to congratulate the king upon his acceſſion to the crown of England. He had expreſs orders from the king his maſter to appear in mourning with all his train, at his firſt audience; but he was told he would diſoblige the king, who would doubtleſs look upon this affectation as a reproach for not going himſelf into mourning for the queen. The marquis ſays in his Memoirs, That the king being at table, boaſted publicly, that for ſeveral years before Elizabeth's death, it was he properly that governed England, and that no reſolution was taken in the council but by his direction. He would perhaps have been nearer the truth, had he ſaid Elizabeth governed Scotland and himſelf too, without his perceiving it. The French king's deſign was not only to congratulate the king; his chief aim in ſending the marquis of Roſny his favourite, was to hinder James from being gained hy the Spaniards, and to renew his defenſive alliance with Elizabeth, in which the embaſſador ſucceeded to his wiſh.

Count Aremberg, embaſſador from the archduke Albert and the infanta Iſabella, ſovereigns of the Low-Countries, was come to London ſome time before; but was ſick, or feign-

The lord Montjoy was honourably received, ſworn of his majeſty's privy council, and afterwards made earl of Devonſhire. ed to be ſo, all the while the marquis of Roſny ſtaid in England. It was not till after the marquis's departure that he deſired the king to ſend one of his privy council to hear the occaſion of his embaſſy. Cecil, whom the king choſe, was ſtrangely ſurpriſed to hear nothing from him but compliments. Probably this embaſſador was ſent into England only to obſerve what paſſed there, and to ſound the new king's intention concerning a peace between England and Spain. James had now ſhewn by his proceedings that he was inclined to peace, ſince without any ſollicitation he had revoked the letters of marque granted by Elizabeth to ſeveral private perſons [s]. Some time after, Taxis came alſo to London from the king of Spain; and having congratulated the king upon his acceſſion to the crown, deſired commiſſioners might be appointed to treat with him of a peace. This negotiation, which was then only begun, ended at length in a treaty of peace, concluded the next year [t].

The plague, which began to break out in December, increaſing at London during the hot weather, the king retired for ſome time to Wilton, the earl of Pembroke's ſeat, near Saliſbury.

Whilſt the court was at Wilton, a conſpiracy, or rather the plan of a conſpiracy, was diſcovered, the authors whereof were Thomas lord Grey of Wilton, Henry Brooke lord Cobham, ſir Walter Raleigh, George Brook, two prieſts Watſon and Clark, and ſome others [u]. The deſign was to place on the throne Arabella Stuart, the king's couſin-german. To that end the lord Cobham was to treat with the archduke at Bruſſels, and to try to obtain ſix hundred thouſand crowns, of which Raleigh was to have ſeventy thouſand. Cobham was alſo to carry Arabella's letters to the archduke, the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, wherein ſhe ſhould promiſe to marry the perſon they ſhould name, and to grant a full toleration to the catholics. It was farther agreed, that the lord Grey [w] ſhould aſk the king's leave to raiſe two thouſand men for the ſervice of Holland, and with theſe troops ſhould ſeize his perſon. But this was only a project, unexecuted in every point, except that ſome of the conſpirators had conferred with count Aremberg. It is thought the count occaſioned this plot to deſtroy Raleigh, who of all England was the man moſt dreaded by the Spaniards, and that afterwards he himſelf informed the king of it [x]. However, the conſpirators being apprehended, were tried at Wincheſter in November following, and condemned to die. Raleigh was found guilty upon the written evidence of one ſingle witneſs, namely, the lord Cobham, even without being confronted, contrary to the expreſs law of the land [y]. Only George Brook however, the lord Cobham's brother, and the two prieſts were executed, the king having ordered the reſt to be ſent back to priſon, but without giving them a pardon. The lord Grey died ſoon after [z], and the lord Cobham obtained his liberty at laſt [a]: but ſir Walter Raleigh remained twelve years in the Tower, where he wrote a hiſtory of the world, much eſteemed in England. I ſhall have farther occaſion to ſpeak of him in the courſe of this reign.

Not long after the diſcovery of the plot, the king and queen were crowned at Weſtminſter with the uſual ſolemnity, on the 25th of July, St. James's day [b]. Immediately after the coronation, the king iſſued out a proclamation expreſly forbidding all perſons, who had any buſineſs at court, to repair thither till winter, by reaſon of the plague which raged then exceedingly, and ſwept away above thirty thouſand [c] in London only. Proclamations were much more frequent in this reign than in the former ones: in the eight or nine firſt months, there were no leſs than twelve.

I juſt mentioned the hopes conceived by the papiſts and puritans of ſome happy change in this new reign. The papiſts could not believe that a prince, who had never expreſſed any hatred of them, ſhould ſuddenly alter his mind, and chuſe to tread in the ſteps of Elizabeth. The puritans imagined that James, having been educated in their religion, and profeſſed it all his life till his arrival in England, would be propitious to them. They expected he would at leaſt reform good part of the faults they found in the church of England. Both were deceived, but the laſt much more than the firſt. Of the catholics, James hated only the jeſuits, and ſuch as were too ſervilely attached to the court of Rome and the prerogatives of the pope. But on the other hand, he ſaw it would not be in his power to grant a full toleration to the other catholics, though he ſhould be inclined to it: for that reaſon he believed it adviſeable not to diſcover too openly his thoughts of them. Thus the catholics, who had expected at leaſt a full toleration of their religion, were very much ſurpriſed when, upon preſenting a petition to the king on that occaſion, they received for anſwer, that he thought himſelf obliged to ſupport what he found eſtabliſhed in the kingdom.

The puritans, believing to have more reaſon to hope than the catholics, preſented alſo their petition [d], not only for a toleration, but moreover to pray the king that ſundry articles of the church of England, with which they could not comply, might be reformed. The biſhops failed not ſtrenuouſly to oppoſe the petition, and to intreat the king to leave religion as he found it at his acceſſion to the crown, without any innovation. This was what the king fully intended. When he firſt came into the kingdom, he not only went over to the church of England, but even meant to force the puritans to conform, and to be revenged on them for what the preſbyterian ſynods had made him ſuffer in Scotland. Beſides, the government of the church by preſbyters too much reſembled a commonwealth to be agreeable to a prince ſo ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favour of monarchy. The government of the church of England was much more conformable to his principles [e]. Mean while, not to appear at firſt too partial, and to make believe he would not be determined without hearing the arguments of both ſides, he appointed a conference between the two parties, wherein he would be moderator himſelf. In the mean time he publiſhed a proclamation, commanding both ſides to remain quiet till matters were regulated as he ſhould judge proper.

[1604] The conference between ſome biſhops and preſbyterian miniſters was held at Hampton-Court, the 14th, 16th, and 18th of January, 1604 [f]. The king let the miniſters ſee immediately what they were to expect: he declared, "That following the example of all Chriſtian princes, who uſually began their reigns with the eſtabliſhment of the church, he had now, at his entering upon the throne, aſſembled them

[x] The beſt account that can be given of this obſcure affair is this: ſir John Forteſcue, ſir Walter Raleigh, the lord Cobham, and ſome others, deſired that king James might be tied to ſome articles at his acceſſion to the crown, on account of the known feud between the two nations; but by the artful management of the lord treaſurer Buckhurſt, and the ranting proteſtants of the earl of Northumberland, who threatened to bring the king in by the ſword, all articles and conditions to bind him were dropped. However, for this propoſal, Raleigh and the reſt were frowned upon by the king, and at the king's coming to London, forbid their attendance at court. This undoubtedly occaſioned diſcontents among them, and probably might induce them to uſe diſaffected expreſſions, and keep ſuſpicious company. But, "what their treaſon was, as no man could then tell, ſo it is with ſo dark a comment that poſterity will never underſtand the text, or remember any ſuch treaſon. It is true ſome loſt their lives, yet the world was never ſatisfied of the juſtice.—It was then believed an errand trick of ſtate, to overthrow ſome and diſable others, knowing their ſtrong abilities might otherwiſe live to overthrow Cecil earl of Saliſbury, for they were intimate in all his ſecret councils for the ruin of the earl of Eſſex. Saliſbury in this had a double benefit; firſt, in ridding himſelf of ſuch as he feared would be thorns in his ſides; ſecondly, in endearing himſelf to the king, by ſhewing his diligence and fidelity for his ſafety." [z] The lord Grey remained a priſoner the reſt of his days, but did not die till the year 1614.

[a] But lived many years in miſery, being deprived of his eſtate; which, as Oſborn well obſerves, is a puniſhment contrary to the law of God and nature, who ſaith, "the perſon offending ſhall only die," and no puniſhment deſcend to the innocent children. He died louſy for want of apparel and linen; and had ſtarved, had not one, ſometime his laundreſs in court, relieved him with ſcraps, in whoſe houſe he died, which was ſo mean, that he was forced to creep up a ladder into a little hole to his chamber. A hard fate, for a man who was poſſeſſed before his arraignment of 7000l. a year, and 30,000l. in money. In his perſon ended that noble family, which had flouriſhed for many ages. Sir Griffith Markham was alſo releaſed and retired beyond ſea, where he lived in a mean condition. Weldon, p. 37. Oſborn, § 6.

[e] Wilſon ſays, that the king thought if church power were in the hands of many, it would not be ſo eaſy to be managed, as when in the hands of one, who had dependence upon him, and with whom he might better grapple: and therefore the king would often ſay, "No biſhop, no king." p. 665. [f] The biſhops were Canterbury, London, Wincheſter, Durham, St. David's, Worceſter, Chicheſter, Carliſle, and Peterborough, with eight deans, Dr. Field, and Dr. King. The petitioners were Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Spark, Mr. Knewſtubb, and Mr. Chaderton. See Barlow's account of this conference, and Neal, tom. II. p. 5, &c.—Dr. Welwood ſays, that this conference was but a blind to introduce epiſcopacy in Scotland, all the Scotch noblemen then at court being deſigned to be preſent, and others, both noblemen and miniſters, being called up from Scotland by the king's letter to aſſiſt at it. Notes on Wilſon, p. 665. Comp. Hiſt.

for ſettling an uniform order in the ſame, for planting unity, removing diſſentions, and reforming abuſes, which were naturally incident to all politic bodies. And that he might not be miſapprehended, and his deſigns in aſſembling them miſconſtrued, he farther declared, that his meaning was not to make any innovation of the government eſtabliſhed in the church, which he knew was approved of God, but to hear and examine the complaints that were made, and remove the occaſion of them; therefore he deſired the petitioners to begin, and to ſhew what were their grievances." Dr. Reynolds being the ſpokeſman, reduced what he had to ſay to two heads; the firſt whereof related to the doctrine, and the ſecond to the diſcipline of the church. As to the doctrine, he ſaid, the articles of the church of England were in ſome places obſcure, and in others defective. Then he mentioned the articles he ſpoke of, and deſired that they might be ſo explained as to leave no ambiguity, and that what was defective might be ſupplied. Whereupon a diſpute was begun, wherein the king always replied, anſwering the miniſters arguments himſelf, one while with reaſons, another while with authority and threats. The miniſters ſeeing the king become their adverſary, which they did not expect, choſe to be ſilent, and feigned to be ſatisfied. Then the king upbraided their preſumption, ſaying, they ought not to have importuned him for ſuch trifles. Indeed, this was not their great grievance: the government and external worſhip of the church was what troubled them moſt. The points they inſiſted upon were, 1. That ſufficient care was not taken to plant good and learned paſtors in the churches, to the great prejudice of the people. 2. That ſubſcription was required to the Common-Prayer-Book, wherein they ſaw ſeveral things which their conſcience would not ſuffer them to receive. 3. That the clergy were liable to the cenſures of lay-men, by means of the high-commiſſion [g]. 4. They objected againſt the croſs in baptiſm, the ring in marriage, the ſurplice, with ſome other things, which they looked upon as ſuperſtitious. There were warm diſputes upon all theſe points, wherein the king took care to reply to the miniſters himſelf, without giving the biſhops time to ſpeak. The king's conduct was ſo agreeable to the biſhops and their friends, that the lord chancellor Egerton, unwilling to miſs ſo fair an opportunity to flatter the king, ſaid aloud, "He had often heard that the prieſthood and royalty were united, but never ſaw it verified till now." Whitgift, archbiſhop of Canterbury, carried his flattery ſtill farther, and ſaid, "He verily believed the king ſpoke by the ſpirit of God." After this the king diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and ordered the biſhops and miniſters to meet again in three days at the ſame place.

On the 18th of January, the day appointed by the king, the biſhops were called firſt into his preſence, and delivered to him an explanation of the Liturgy. Then the king queſtioned them about excommunication, the high-commiſſion, the oath ex officio, the ſubſcription to the Common-Prayer-Book; and approving their anſwers, ordered the miniſters to be called in, and the writing preſented by the biſhops to be read before them. The miniſters believing it was in vain to make any reply, kept ſilence. Nay, it is pretended that ſome of them declared their doubts were ſufficiently cleared. However, the king ſuppoſing they had nothing to object, and had reaſon to be ſatisfied with the condeſcenſion that was ſhewn them, exhorted the biſhops to treat with lenity ſuch as were of a contrary opinion, and commanded the miniſters to preſerve the unity of the church, and beware of obſtinacy and diſobedience. "Obedience and humility (added he) are the marks of good and honeſt men; ſuch I believe you to be, but it feareth me that many of your ſort are humorous, and too buſy in the perverting of others. The exceptions taken againſt the Communion Book, as I perceive, are matthers of mere weakneſs, and they who are diſcreet will be gained with time and by gentle perſuaſions; or if they be indiſcreet, better it is to remove them than to have the church troubled with their contentions, For the biſhops, I will anſwer, that it is not their purpoſe preſently and out of hand to enforce obedience, but by fatherly admonitions and conferences to induce ſuch as are diſaffected. But if any be of an oppoſite and turbulent ſpirit, I will have them enforced to a conformity. Neither tell me, that the wearing of a ſurplice, or uſing the croſs in baptiſm, will diminiſh the credit of miniſters that have formerly diſallowed the ſame; for that is juſt the Scottiſh argument, when any thing was concluded that ſorted not with their humour, the only reaſon why they could not obey was, 'That it ſtood not with their credit to yield, having been ſo long of a contrary opinion.' I will none of that, but that a time be limited by the biſhops of every dioceſe to ſuch, and they that will not yield, whatſoever they are, let them be removed: for we muſt not prefer the credit of a few private men to the general peace of the church."

In this manner paſſed the pretended conference, whoſe ſole end was to make the public believe the miniſters were convinced and fully inſtructed; that therefore it was out of pure obſtinacy that they ſtill ſeparated from the church. Hence it was natural to infer, that to conquer their obſtinacy, it was requiſite to uſe ſome ſeverity. And this was what the king plainly intimated, when he ſaid, "he would anſwer for the biſhops, that it was not their deſign immediately to enforce obedience," and when he afterwards added more clearly, "that after ſuch a time, they ſhould be dealt with in another manner." But this conference wrought not the conviction of the puritans; and all the fruit the king reaped by it was, to ſhew them how much they were miſtaken in depending upon his protection.

Whitgift was a mild and peaceable man, who would have been very glad to reclaim the puritans by gentle methods, agreeable to the goſpel, but he died quickly after, on the 29th of February. He was ſucceeded by Richard Bancroft, a prelate of a very different character, who, inſtead of dealing gently with the puritans, never ceaſed incenſing the king againſt them, and doing them all the miſchief he could. Herein he was but too cloſely imitated by the reſt of the biſhops, who found a double advantage in deſtroying the puritans. In the firſt place they made their court to the king, who hated them mortally. Secondly, they preſerved the hierarchy, which the puritans were deſirous to overthrow. The perſecution, which theſe ſuffered whilſt Bancroft was at the head of the clergy, induced many families to withdraw out of the kingdom, to enjoy elſewhere liberty of conſcience, denied them at home [g]. Bancroft is alſo accuſed of having been one of the moſt zealous to inſtil into the king the maxims of arbitrary power.

The 22d of February the king publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all jeſuits and other prieſts having orders from any foreign power, to depart the kingdom [h]. This proclamation was ſo worded, that the king was extremely careful to ſhew, he did not baniſh the jeſuits in hatred to the catholic religion in general, but only on account of their attachment to the doctrine of the pope's unlimited power over crowned heads. This is what the king very diligently obſerved throughout his whole reign. He conſtantly affected to conſider the Romiſh religion ſo far only as it might be contrary to civil government, that is to ſay, with reſpect to the pope's unlimited power. As for the other doctrines, he was very willing to allow the catholics to believe what they pleaſed, provided they renounced the belief of the pope's ſuperiority over kings. He was perſuaded this equity would procure him a peaceable reign; but he had too much reaſon afterwards to be convinced that he was taking wrong meaſures, and yet would never alter his conduct. Moſt of the catholics were not ſatisfied with ſo limited a toleration, and the zealous proteſtants repreſented the king as a papiſt. It is certain, he gave occaſion to think he was inclined to the catholic religion, by his conſtant care to ſhew he was diſpleaſed only with the pope's abſolute power, and valued not the other doctrines, which diſtinguiſhed the two religions. This obliged him to take, in favour of the moderate catholics, ſome ſteps which rendered him very ſuſpicious to many proteſtants [i], whilſt others conſidered his zeal againſt the preſbyterians at an undeniable evidence of his attachment to the proteſtant religion.

The proclamation againſt the jeſuits was ſoon followed by another, enjoining the puritans to conform to the worſhip of the eſtabliſhed church [k]. There was not ſeen here the ſame care to juſtify the king's conduct with reſpect to this ſort of perſecution, The king intimated in the firſt, that he would have regard to the tender conſciences of ſuch catholics as

The chief explanations now added were, the whole Rubrick before private baptiſm; all the latter part of the Catechiſm from the Lord's Prayer to the end; prayers in the daily Service and Litany for the reſt of the royal family; thankſgivings for rain, fair weather, plenty, peace, and victory, deliverance from the plague, &c. There could not comply with the received doctrines of the church of England. But in this, there was not the leaſt indulgence for the tender conſciences of the puritans. Theſe were all a ſet of obſtinate people, who deſerved to have no favour ſhewn them!

As the parliament was to meet the 19th of March, the king thought it neceſſary to gain the affections of his ſubjects by ſuppreſſing ſome abuſes introduced about the end of the late reign, tending to the oppreſſion of the people. This he did by ſeveral proclamations againſt certain monoplies: againſt protections frequently hindering the courſe of juſtice; againſt ſalt-petre men, who dug up people's houſes, unleſs they were well feed; againſt the king's purveyors, who ſeized any man's horſe and cart, under colour of employing them for the king, and then excuſed them for money. Among theſe proclamations, there was one not ſo acceptable to the people, namely, that againſt hunting, on very ſevere penalties to the offender. This reign was a reign of proclamations. The king and his miniſters would have been glad to have had them regarded as laws; but neither the judges nor people were yet accuſtomed to it.

Shortly after, another appeared, appointing the 5th of Auguſt to be kept as a holy-day. It was ordered, that every year on that day public thanks ſhould be returned God in all the churches, for the king's miraculous deliverance in the year 1600, from the conſpiracy of the Gouries, who made an attempt upon his life[l]. This new holy-day was not univerſally liked. Beſides that the occaſion of it happened to the king before his acceſſion to the crown of England, there were people as well in Scotland as England, who had the malice to affirm it was only a fiction to cover a real conſpiracy of the king againſt the two Ruthvins or Gouries, who were killed on that occaſion. I do not relate this with intent to blemiſh king James's reputation, or to queſtion the deliverance for which he was pleaſed to thank God, but only to ſhew that from the beginning of his reign in England, there were ſome who had no great opinion of him [m].

As the time of the parliament's meeting approached, the king and queen made their entry into London four days before, not having been able to do it ſooner by reaſon of the plague. The king had need that day of all his patience, nothing being more diſagreeable to him than the ſolemnities which drew a crowd of people about him [n]. Herein he differed from queen Elizabeth, who took a pleaſure in ſeeing her people preſs to behold her, and in hearing their acclamations.

James the Firſt's notion of the Engliſh conſtitution was, as I obſerved, very different from what had been hitherto current. If any of his predeceſſors had been of his opinion, they had, at leaſt, taken care to conceal it, or to ſhew it but on extraordinary occaſions. For his part, he did not think fit to follow their example, ſince he omitted no opportunity to diſcover his thoughts. He was perſuaded the privileges of the nation and parliament were ſo many uſurpations, or at beſt, but revocable conceſſions of the crown, and gave frequent occaſion to believe he had formed a deſign to free both himſelf and ſucceſſors from the reſtraint which the laws, cuſtoms, and privileges of the Engliſh nation had laid on his predeceſſors. However, from one end of his reign to the other, he embraced all opportunities to improve his prerogative-royal, to which he ſet no bounds but his will. The firſt public ſtep which diſcovered his ſentiments, was the calling of his firſt parliament, of which I am now going to ſpeak. Both in the writs and the proclamation, he takes upon him to deſcribe what ſort of repreſentatives ſhould be elected, not by way of exhortation, as the former kings had done, but by way of command, and as conditions without which they ſhould not to be admitted into the houſe. This was directly ſtriking at the commons, whoſe privilege of deciding the validity of elections had never been queſtioned.

"We notifye by theis preſentes, that all retornes and certificates of knights, citizens and burgeſſes, oughte and are to be brought to the chauncery, and there to be fyled of record; and if any ſhall be founde to be made contrarie to this proclamation, the ſame is to be rejected as unlawful and inſufficient, and the citie or borough to be fyned for the ſame; and if it be founde that they have commytted any groſſe or wilful default and contempt in their election, retorne or certificate, that then their liberties, according to the lawe, are to be ſeized into our handes as forfeited; and if any perſon take upon him the place of a knight, citizen or burgeſſe, not beinge duely elected, retorned and ſworn according to the lawes and ſtatutes in that behalfe provided, and according to the purport, effect, and true meaning of this oure proclamation, then every perſon ſoe offending, to be fyned and impriſoned for the ſame."———

Thus the king aſſumed a power, not only to enjoin penalties on ſuch as ſhould offend againſt the ſtatutes concerning elections, but alſo to enjoin them by a bare proclamation, the authority whereof he rendered equal to that of the laws. We ſhall ſee preſently this was not done without deſign.

At the opening of the parliament, the king being ſeated on his throne, ſent for the commons as uſual; but as the crowd was great, it happened that ſeveral of the members could not enter. Sir Herbert Crofts, one of the repreſentatives, ſtriving to get in, was rudely thruſt back by one of the king's guards, who knowing him to be what he was, ſaid to him in a jeer, "Goodman burgeſs, you come not here." This affair made ſome noiſe afterwards; but the houſe thought proper to take no notice of it. The commons being entered, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, which, though very long, deſerves to be inſerted at length, that from ſome certain paſſages may be diſcovered the genius, character, and deſigns of this prince:

"IT did no ſooner pleaſe God to lighten his hand, and relent the violence of his devouring angel againſt the poor people of this city, but as ſoon did I reſolve to call this parliament, and that for three chief and principal reaſons. The firſt whereof is (and which of itſelf, although there were no more, is not only a ſufficient, but a moſt full and neceſſary ground and reaſon for convening of this aſſembly; this firſt reaſon, I ſay, is, that you, who are here preſently aſſembled to repreſent the body of this whole kingdom, and of all ſorts of people within the ſame, may with your own ears hear, and that I out of mine own mouth may deliver unto you, the aſſurance of my due thankfulneſs for your ſo joyful and general applauſe, to the declaring and receiving of me in this ſeat (which God, by my birth-right and lineal deſcent, had in the fulneſs of time provided for me; and that, immediately after it pleaſed God to call your late ſovereign, of famous memory, full of days, but fuller of immortal trophies of honour, out of this tranſitory life. Not that I am able to expreſs by words, or utter by eloquence, the vive image of mine inward thankfulneſs, but only that out of mine own mouth you may reſt aſſured to expect that meaſure of thankfulneſs at my hands, which is according to the infiniteneſs of your deſerts, and to my inclination and ability for requital of the ſame. Shall I ever? nay, can I ever be able, or rather ſo unable in memory, as to forget your unexpected readineſs and alacrity, your ever memorable reſolution, and your moſt wonderful conjunction and harmony of your hearts, in declaring and embracing me as your undoubted and lawful king and governor? Or ſhall it ever be blotted out of my mind, how at my firſt entry into this kingdom, the people of all ſorts rid and ran; nay rather flew to meet me? Their eyes flaming nothing but ſparkles of affection; their mouths and tongues uttering nothing but ſounds of joy; their hands, feet, and all the reſt of their members in their geſtures, diſcovering a paſſionate longing, and earneſtneſs to meet and embrace their new ſovereign. Quid ergo retribuam? Shall I allow in myſelf that which I could never bear with in another? No, I muſt plainly and freely confeſs here, in all your audiences, that I did ever naturally ſo far miſlike a tongue too ſmooth, and diligent in paying their creditors with lip-payment and verbal thanks, as I ever ſuſpected that ſort of people meant not to pay their debtors in more ſubſtantial ſort of coin. And therefore for expreſſing my thankfulneſs, I muſt reſort unto the other two reaſons of my convening of this parliament, by them in action to utter my thankfulneſs: both the ſaid reaſons having but one ground, which is the deeds, whereby all the days of my life I am by God's grace to

But afterwards (ſays Wilſon) in his public appearances, the crowds of people made him ſo impatient, that he often diſperſed them with frowns, not to ſay curſes. expreſs expreſs my ſaid thankfulneſs towards you, but divided in this, that in the firſt of theſe two mine actions of thanks are ſo inſeparably conjoined with my perſon, as they are in a manner become individually annexed to the ſame. In the other reaſon, mine actions are ſuch, as I may either do them, or leave them undone, although by God's grace I hope never to be weary of the doing of them.

" As to the firſt, it is the bleſſings which God hath in my perſon beſtowed upon you all, wherein I proteſt I do more glory at the ſame for your weale, than for any particular reſpect of mine own reputation, or advantage therein.

" The firſt then of theſe bleſſings, which God hath jointly with my perſon ſent unto you, is, outward peace; that is peace abroad with all foreign neighbours: for I thank God, I may juſtly ſay, that never ſince I was a king, I either received wrong of any other Chriſtian prince or ſtate, or did wrong to any. I have ever, I praiſe God, yet kept peace and amity with all, which hath been ſo far tied to my perſon, as at my coming here, you are witneſſes, I found the ſtate embarked in a great and tedious war; and only by mine arrival here, and by the peace in my perſon, is now amity kept, where war was before, which is no ſmall bleſſing to a Chriſtian commonwealth; for by peace abroad with their neighbours, the towns flouriſh, the merchants become rich, the trade doth increaſe, and the people of all ſorts in the land enjoy free liberty to exerciſe themſelves in their ſeveral vocations, without peril or diſturbance. Not that I think this outward peace ſo unſeparably tied to my perſon, as I dare aſſuredly promiſe to myſelf, and to you, the certain continuance thereof: but thus far I can very well aſſure you, and in the word of a king promiſe unto you, that I ſhall never give the firſt occaſion of the breach thereof; neither ſhall I ever be moved for any particular or private paſſion of mind, or interrupt your public peace, except I be forced thereunto, either for reparation of the honour of the kingdom, or elſe by neceſſity for the weale and preſervation of the ſame: in which caſe a ſecure and honourable war, muſt be preferred to an unſecure and diſhonourable peace. Yet do I hope, by my experience of the by-paſt bleſſings of peace, which God hath ſo long, ever ſince my birth beſtowed upon me, that he will not be weary to continue the ſame, nor repent him of his grace towards me; transferring that ſentence of king David's, upon his by-paſt victories of war, to mine of peace: 'That that God who preſerved me from the devouring jaws of the bear, and of the lyon, and delivered them into my hands, ſhall alſo now grant me victory over that uncircumciſed Philiſtine.' But although outward peace be a great bleſſing, yet it is as far inferior to peace within, as civil wars are more cruel and unnatural than wars abroad. And therefore the ſecond great bleſſing that God hath within my perſon ſent unto you, is peace within, and that in a double form: Firſt, by my deſcent lineally out of the loins of Henry the Seventh, is reunited and confirmed in me the union of the two princely roſes of the two houſes of Lancaſter and York, whereof that king of happy memory was the firſt uniter, as he was alſo the firſt ground-layer of the other peace (the lamentable and miſerable events, by the civil and bloody diſſention betwixt theſe two houſes, was ſo great, and ſo late, as it need not be renewed unto your memories), which as it was firſt ſettled and united in him, ſo is it now reunited and confirmed in me; being juſtly and lineally deſcended, not only of that happy conjunction, but of both the branches thereof in any times before. But the union of theſe two princely houſes is nothing comparable to the union of theſe two antient and famous kingdoms, which is the other inward peace annexed to my perſon.

" And here I muſt crave your patiences for a little ſpace, and give me leave to diſcourſe more particularly of the benefits that do ariſe of that union which is made in my blood, being a matter that moſt properly belongeth to me to ſpeak of, as the head wherein that great body is united. And firſt, if we were to look no higher than to natural and phyſical reaſons, we may eaſily be perſuaded of the great benefits that by that union do redound to the whole iſland; for if twenty thouſand men be a ſtrong army, is not the double thereof forty thouſand, a double the ſtronger army? If a baron enricheth himſelf with double as many lands as he had before, is he not double the greater? Nature teaches us, that mountains are made of motes; and that at the firſt, kingdoms being divided, and every particular town, or little country, as tyrants or uſurpers could obtain the poſſeſſion, a ſigniory part; many of theſe little kingdoms are now, in proceſs of time, by the ordinance of God, joined into great monarchies, whereby they are become powerful within themſelves, to defend themſelves from all outward invaſions, and their head and governor thereby enabled to redeem them from foreign aſſaults, and puniſh private tranſgreſſions within. Do we not yet remember that this kingdom was divided into ſeven little kingdoms, beſides Wales? And is it not now the ſtronger by their union? And hath not the union of Wales to England added a greater ſtrength thereto? Which, though it was a great principality, was nothing comparable in greatneſs and power to the antient and famous kingdom of Scotland. But what ſhould we ſtick upon any natural appearance, when it is manifeſt that God by his almighty providence hath pre-ordained it ſo to be? Hath not God firſt united theſe two kingdoms, both in language, religion, and ſimilitude of manners? Yea, hath he not made us all in one iſland, compaſſed with one ſea, and of itſelf by nature ſo indiviſible, as almoſt thoſe that were borderers, themſelves on the late borders, cannot diſtinguiſh, nor know, or diſcern their own limits; theſe two countries being ſeparated neither by ſea, nor great river, mountain, nor other ſtrength of nature, but only by little ſmall brooks, or demoliſhed little walls, ſo as rather they were divided in apprehenſion than in effect; and now in the end and fulneſs of time united, the right and title of both in my perſon, alike lineally deſcended of both the crowns, whereby it is now become alike a little world within itſelf, being intrenched and fortified round about with a natural, and yet admirable ſtrong pond or ditch, whereby all the former fears of this nation are now quite cut off; the other part of the iſland being ever before now, not only the place of landing to all ſtrangers, that were to make invaſion here, but likewiſe moved by the enemies of this ſtate, by untimely incurſions to make enforced diverſion from their conqueſts, for defending themſelves at home, and keeping ſure their back-door, as then it was called, which was the greateſt hindrance and lett that ever my predeceſſors of this nation gat, in diſturbing them from their many famous and glorious conqueſts abroad: 'What God hath conjoined then, let no man ſeparate.' I am the huſband, and all the whole iſland is my lawful wife; I am the head, and it is my body; I am the ſhepherd, and it is my flock. I hope therefore no man will be ſo unreaſonable as to think, that I, that am a Chriſtian king, under the goſpel, ſhould be a polygamiſt and huſband to two wives; that I being the head, ſhould have a divided and monſtrous body; or that being the ſhepherd to ſo fair a flock, (whoſe fold hath no wall to hedge it but the four ſeas), ſhould have my flock parted in two. But as I am aſſured that no honeſt ſubject, of whatſoever degree, within my whole dominions, is leſs glad of this joyful union than I am; ſo may the frivolous objection of any that would be hinderers of this work (which God hath in my perſon already eſtabliſhed) be eaſily anſwered; which can be none, except ſuch as are either blinded with ignorance, or elſe tranſported with malice, being unable to live in a well-governed commonwealth, and only delighting to fiſh in troubled waters: for if they would ſtand upon their reputation and privileges of any of the kingdoms; I pray you, were not both the kingdoms monarchies from the beginning? And conſequently, could ever the body be counted without the head, which was ever inſeparably joined thereunto? So that as the honour and privileges of any of the kingdoms could not be divided from their ſovereign; ſo are they now confounded and joined in my perſon, who am equal and alike kindly head to you both. When this kingdom of England was divided into ſo many little kingdoms, as I told you before, one of them behoved to eat up another, till they were all united in one. And yet can Wiltſhire or Devonſhire, which were of the Weſt-Saxons although their kingdom was of longeſt durance, and did by conqueſt overcome divers of the reſt of the little kingdoms, make claim to priority or place of honour before Suſſex, Eſſex, or other ſhires, which were conquered by them? And have we not the like experience in the kingdom of France, being compoſed of divers duchies, and one after another conquered by the ſword? For even as little brooks loſe their names by their running and falling into great rivers, and the very name and memory of the great rivers ſwallowed up in the ocean; ſo by the conjunction of divers little kingdoms in one, are all theſe private differences and queſtions ſwallowed up. And, ſince the ſucceſs was happy of the Saxon kings, being conquered by the ſpear of Bellona, how much greater reaſon have we to expect a happy iſſue of this greater union, which is only faſtened and bound up by the wedding-ring of Aſtrea? And as God hath made Scotland (the one half of this iſle) to enjoy my birth, and the firſt and moſt imperfect half of my life; and you here to enjoy the perfect and laſt half thereof; ſo cannot I think that any would be ſo injurious to me, no, not in their thoughts and wiſhes, as to cut

" Now although theſe bleſſings, before rehearſed, of inward and outward peace be great; yet ſeeing that in all good things, a great part of their goodneſs and eſtimation is loſt, if they have not appearance of perpetuity or long continuance; ſo hath it pleaſed Almighty God to accompany my perſon alſo with that favour, having healthful and hopeful iſſue of my body, whereof ſome are here preſent, for continuance and propagation of that undoubted right which is in my perſon; under whom I doubt not but it will pleaſe God to proſper and continue for many years this union, and all other bleſſings of inward and outward peace, which I have brought with me.

" But neither peace outward, nor peace inward, nor any other bleſſing that can follow thereupon, nor appearance of the perpetuity thereof, by propagation in the poſterity, is but a weak pillar, and a rotten reed to lean unto, if God do not ſtrengthen, and by the ſtaff of his bleſſing make them durable; for in vain doth the watchman watch the city, if the Lord be not the principal defence thereof; in vain doth the builder build the houſe, if God give not the ſucceſs; and in vain, as Paul ſaith, doth Paul plant, and Apollo water, if God give not the increaſe: for all wordly bleſſings are but like ſwift-paſſing ſhadows, fading flowers, or chaff blown before the wind, if by the profeſſion of true religion, and works according thereunto, God be not moved to maintain and ſettle the thrones of princes. And although that ſince mine entry into this kingdom, I have both by meeting with divers of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and likewiſe by divers proclamations, clearly declared my mind in points of religion, yet do I not think it amiſs in this ſo ſolemn an audience, I ſhould now take occaſion to diſcover ſomewhat of the ſecrets of my heart in that matter. For I ſhall never, with God's grace, be aſhamed to make public profeſſion thereof at all occaſions, leſt God ſhould be aſhamed to profeſs and allow me, before men and angels; eſpecially, leſt that at this time men might preſume farther upon the miſknowledge of my meaning, to trouble this parliament of ours than were convenient.

" At my firſt coming, although I found but one religion, and that which by myſelf is profeſſed, publicly allowed, and by the law maintained; yet found I another ſort of religion, beſides a private ſect, lurking within the bowels of this nation. The firſt is the true religion, which by me is profeſſed, and by the law is eſtabliſhed; the ſecond is, the falſely called catholics, but truly papiſts; the third, which I call a ſect, rather than a religion, is the puritans and noveliſts, who do not ſo far differ from us in points of religion, as in their confuſed form of policy and purity, being ever diſcontented with the preſent government, and impatient to ſuffer any ſuperiority, which makes their ſect unable to be ſuffered, in any well-governed commonwealth. But as for my courſe towards them I remit it to my proclamations made upon that ſubject.

" And now for the papiſts, I muſt put a difference betwixt my own private profeſſion of mine own ſalvation, and my politic government of the realm, for the weale and quietneſs thereof. As for mine own profeſſion, you have me your head now amongſt you, of the ſame religion that the body is of: as I am no ſtranger to you in blood, no more am I a ſtranger to you in faith, or in the matters concerning the houſe of God. And although this my profeſſion be according to mine education, wherein, I thank God, I ſucked the milk of God's truth, with the milk of my nurſe; yet do I here proteſt unto you, that I would never for ſuch a conceit of conſtancy, or rather prejudicate opinion, have ſo firmly kept my firſt profeſſion, if I had not found it agreeable to all reaſon, and to the rule of my conſcience. But I was never violent, nor unreaſonable in my profeſſion: 'I acknowledge the Roman church to be our mother church, although defiled with ſome infirmities and corruptions,' as the Jews were, when they crucified Chriſt. And as I am none enemy to the life of a ſick man, becauſe I would have his body purged of ill humours; no more am I enemy to their church, becauſe I would have them reform their errors, not wiſhing the downthrowing of the temple, but that it might be purged, and cleanſed from corruption; otherwiſe how can they wiſh us to enter, if their houſe be not firſt clean? But as I would be lother to diſpenſe in the leaſt point of mine own conſcience, for any worldly reſpect, than the fooliſh preciſion of them all; ſo would I be as ſorry to ſtrait the politic government of the bodies and minds of all my ſubjects to my private opinions; nay, my mind was ever ſo free from perſecution, or thralling of my ſubjects in matters of conſcience, as I hope thoſe of that profeſſion within this kingdom, have a proof ſince my coming, that I was ſo far from increaſing their burthens with Rehoboam, as I have ſo much, as either time, occaſion, or law could permit, lightened them. And even now at this time, have I been careful to reviſe and conſider deeply upon the laws made againſt them, 'That ſome overture might be proponed to the preſent parliament, for clearing theſe laws by reaſon, which is the ſoul of the law) in caſe they have been in times paſt further, or more rigorouſly extended by judges, than the meaning of the law was, or might tend to the hurt as well of the innocent, as of guilty perſons.' And as to the perſons of my ſubjects which are of that profeſſion, I muſt divide them into two ranks, clerics and laics; for the part of the laics, certainly I ever thought them far more excuſable than the other ſort, becauſe that ſort of religion contained ſuch an ignorant, doubtful, and implicit kind of faith in the laics, grounded upon their church, as except they do generally believe whatſoever their teachers pleaſe to affirm, they cannot be thought guilty of theſe particular points of hereſies and corruptions, which their teachers do ſo wilfully profeſs. And again, I muſt ſubdivide the ſame laics into two ranks, that is, either quiet and well-minded men, peaceable ſubjects, who either being old, have retained their firſt drunken in liquor, upon a certain ſhamefacedneſs to be thought curious, or changeable; or being young men, through evil educations, have never been nurſed or brought up but upon ſuch venom, inſtead of wholeſome nutriment: and that ſort of people, I would be ſorry to puniſh their bodies for the error of their minds, the reformation whereof muſt only come of God, and the true ſpirit. But the other rank of laics, who either through curioſity, affectation of novelties, or diſcontentment in their private humours, have changed their coats, only to be factious ſtirrers of ſedition, and perturbers of the commonwealth; their backwardneſs in their religion giveth a ground to me (their magiſtrate), to take the better heed to their proceedings, and to correct their obſtinacy.

" But for the part of the clerics, I muſt directly ſay and affirm, that as long as they maintain one ſpecial point of their doctrine, and another point of their practice, they are no way ſufferable to remain in this kingdom. Their point of doctrine is, that arrogant and ambitious ſupremacy of their head the pope, whereby he not only claims to be ſpiritual head of all Chriſtians, but alſo to have an imperial civil power over all kings and emperors, dethroning and decrowning princes with his foot as pleaſeth him, and diſpenſing and diſpoſing of all kingdoms and empires at his appetite. The other point which they obſerve in continual practice is, the aſſaſſinates and murthers of kings; thinking it no ſin, but rather a matter of ſalvation, to do all actions of rebellion and hoſtility againſt their natural ſovereign Lord, if he be once curſed, his ſubjects diſcharged of their fidelity, and his kingdom given a prey, by that three-crowned monarch, or rather monſter, their head. And in this point I have no occaſion to ſpeak further here, ſaying, 'That I could wiſh from my heart, that it would pleaſe God to make me one of the members of ſuch a general chriſtian union in religion, as laying wilfulneſs aſide on both hands, we might meet in the midſt, which is the centre and perfection of all things. For if they would leave, and be aſhamed of ſuch new and groſs corruptions of theirs, as themſelves cannot maintain, nor deny to be worthy of reformation, I would for my own part be content to meet them in the midway, ſo that all novelties might be renounced on either ſides.' For as my faith is the true, ancient, catholic, and apoſtolic faith, grounded upon the Scriptures and expreſs Word of God; ſo will I ever yield all reverence to antiquity, in the points of eccleſiaſtical policy: and by that means ſhall I ever, with God's grace, keep myſelf from either being an heretic in faith, or ſchiſmatic in matters of policy.

" But of one thing would I have the papiſts of this land to be admoniſhed, that they preſume not ſo much upon my lenity (becauſe I would be loth to be thought a perſecutor), as thereupon to think it lawful for them daily to increaſe their number and ſtrength in this kingdom; whereby, if not in my time, at leaſt in the time of my poſterity, they might be in hope to erect their religion again. No, let them aſſure themſelves, that as I am a friend to their perſons, if they be good ſubjects; ſo I am a vowed enemy, and do denounce mortal war to their errors. And that as I would be ſorry to be driven by their ill behaviour, from the protection and conſervation of their bodies and lives; ſo will I never ceaſe, as far as I can, to tread down their errors and wrong opinions. For I could not permit the increaſe and growing of their religion, without firſt betraying of myſelf and mine own conſcience: Secondly, this whole isle, as well the part I am come from, as the part I remain in; in betraying their liberties, and reducing them to the former slavish yoke, which both had casten off before I came amongst them: and Thirdly, the liberty of the crown in my posterity, which I should leave again under a new slavery, having found it left free to me by my predecessors. And therefore would I wish all my good subjects that are deceived with that corruption, first, if they find any beginning of instruction in themselves of knowledge, and love to the truth, to foster the same by all lawful means, and to beware of quenching the spirit that worketh within them. And if they can find as yet no motion tending that way, to be studious to read and confer with learned men, and to use all such means as may further their resolution; assuring themselves, that as long as they are disconformable in religion from us, they cannot be but half my subjects, be able to do but half service, and I to want the best half of them, which is their souls.

"And here I take occasion to speak to you my lords the bishops; for as you my lord of Durham said very learnedly to day in your sermon, 'Correction without instruction is but a tyranny:' So ought you, and all the clergy under you, to be more careful, vigilant, and diligent, than you have been to win souls to God, as well by your exemplary life as doctrine. And since you see how careful they are, sparing neither labour, pains, nor extream peril of their persons, to pervert (the devil is so busy a bishop), ye should be the more careful and wakeful in your charges. Follow the rule prescribed to you by St. Paul, 'Be ye careful to exhort and instruct, in season, and out of season:' And where you have been any way sluggish before, now waken yourselves up again with a new diligence in this point, remitting the success to to God, who calling them either at the second, third, tenth, or twelfth hour, as they are alike welcome to him, so shall they be to me his lieutenant here.

"The third reason of my convening you at this time, which containeth such actions of my thankfulness towards you, as I may either do, or leave undone, yet shall, with God's grace, ever press to perform all the days of my life. It consists in these two points, in making of laws at certain times, which is only at such times as this, in parliament; or in the careful execution thereof at all other times. As for the making of them, I will thus far faithfully promise unto you, that I will ever prefer the weal of the body, and of the whole commonwealth, in making of good laws and constitutions, to any particular or private ends of mine, thinking ever the wealth and weal of the commonwealth to be my greatest weal, and worldly felicity: a point wherein a lawful king doth directly differ from a tyrant. But at this time I am only thus far to forewarn you in that point, that you beware to seek the making of too many laws, for two especial reasons: first, because "in corruptissimâ republicâ plurimæ leges," and the execution of good laws is far more profitable in a commonwealth, than to burthen men's memories with the making of too many of them. And next, because the making of too many laws in one parliament will bring in confusion, for lack of leisure wisely to deliberate before you conclude: For the bishop said well to day, 'that to deliberation would a large time be given; but to execution a greater promptness was required.' As for the execution of good laws, it hath been very wisely and honourably foreseen, and ordered by my predecessors in this kingdom, in planting such a number of judges, and all sorts of magistrates, in convenient places, for the execution of the same. And therefore must I now turn me to you that are judges, and magistrates under me, as mine eyes and ears in this case: I can say none otherwise to you, than as Ezekias the good king of Juda said to his judges, 'Remember that the thrones you sit on are God's, and neither yours nor mine.' And that as you must be answerable to me, so must both you and I be answerable to God, for the due execution of our offices. That place is no place for you to utter your affections in; you must not there hate your foe, nor love your friend; fear the offence of the greater party, or pity the misery of the meaner; ye must be blind, and not see distinctions of persons; handless, not to receive bribes; but keep that just temper and mid-course in all your proceedings, that like a just balance, ye may neither sway to the right nor left hand. Three principal qualities are required in you, knowledge, courage, and sincerity; that you may discern with knowledge, execute with courage, and do both in upright sincerity. And as for my part, I do vow and protest here in the presence of God, and of this honourable audience, I never shall be weary, nor omit no occasion wherein I may shew my carefulness of the execution of good laws. And as I wish you that are judges, not to be weary in your office, in doing of it, so shall I never be weary, with God's grace, to take account of you, which is properly my calling.

"And thus having told you the three causes of my convening of this parliament, all three tending only to utter my thankfulness, but in divers forms: the first by word, the other two by action; I do confess, that when I have done, and performed all that in this speech I have promised, 'Inutilis servus sum.' Inutile, because the meaning of the word Inutilis in that place of Scripture, is understood, that in doing all that service which we can to God, it is but our due, and we do nothing to God, but that which we are bound to do; and in like manner, when I have done all that I can for you, I do nothing but that which I am bound to do: and am accountable to God upon the contrary. 'For I do acknowledge that the special and greatest point of difference that is betwixt a rightful king, and a usurping tyrant, is in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think his kingdom and people are only ordained for satisfaction of his desires and unreasonable appetites; the righteous and just king doth by the contrary acknowledge himself to be ordained for the procuring of the wealth and prosperity of his people, and that his greatest and principal worldly felicity must consist in their prosperity.' If you be rich, I cannot be poor; if you be happy, I cannot but be fortunate; and I protest, that your welfare shall ever be my greatest care and contentment. And that I am a servant is most true; that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, who are my natural vassals and subjects, considering them in numbers and distinct ranks; so if we will take the whole people as one body and mass, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, so must a righteous king know himself to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: for although king and people be relata, yet can he be no king if he want people and subjects: but there be many people in the world that lack a head; wherefore I will never be ashamed to confess it my principal honour, to be the great servant of the commonwealth; and ever think the prosperity thereof to be my greatest felicity, as I have already said.

"But as it was the whole body of this kingdom (with an uniform assent and harmony), as I told you in the bebeginning of my speech, which did so far oblige me, in goodwill and thankfulness of requital for their alacrity and readiness in declaring and receiving me to that place which God had provided for me, and not any particular persons (for then it had not been the body), so is my thankfulness due to the whole state. For even as in matters of faults, Quod à multis peccatur impunè peccatur; even so in matters of virtuous and good deeds, what is done by the willing consent and harmony of the whole body, no particular person can justly claim thanks, as proper to him for the same; and therefore I must here make a little apology for myself, in that I could not satisfy the particular humours of every person that looked for some advancement or reward at my hand, since my entry into this kingdom. Three kinds of things were craved of me, advancement to honour, preferment to place of credit about my person, and reward in matters of land or profit. If I had bestowed honour upon all, no man could have been advanced to honour; for the degees of honour do consist in preferring some above their fellows: If every man had the like access to my privy or bed-chamber, then no man could have it, because it cannot contain all; and if I had bestowed lands and rewards upon every man, the fountain of my liberality would have been so exhausted and dried, as I would lack means to be liberal to any man: and yet was I not so sparing, but I may without vaunting affirm, that I have enlarged my favour in all the three degrees, towards as many, and more than ever king of England did, in so short a space. No, I rather crave your pardon, that I have been so bountiful: for, if the means of the crown be wasted, I behoved then to have recourse to you my subjects, and be burthensome to you; which I would be lothest to be of any king alive. For as it is true, that as I have already said, it was a whole body which did deserve so well at my hand, and not every particular person of the people: yet were there some who by reason of their office, credit with the people, or otherwise, took occasion both before, and at the same time of my coming amongst you, to give proof of their love and affection towards me. Not that I am any way in doubt, that if other of my subjects had been in their places, and had had the like occasion, but they would have uttered the like good effects (so general and so great were the love and affection of you all towards me): but yet this having been performed by some special persons, I could not without unthankfulness but requite them accordingly. And therefore had I just occasion to advance some in honour, ſome to places of ſervice about me, and by rewarding to enable ſome who had deſerved well of me, and were not otherwiſe able to maintain the ranks I thought them capable of, and others who although they had not particularly deſerved before, yet I found them capable and worthy of place of preferment and credit, and not able to ſuſtain thoſe places for which I thought them fit, without my help. Two eſpecial cauſes moved me to be ſo open-handed, whereof the one was reaſonable and honourable, but the other (I will not be aſhamed to confeſs unto you) proceeded of mine own infirmity. That which was juſt and honourable, was, that being ſo far beholden to the body of the whole ſtate, I thought I could not refuſe to let run ſome ſmall brooks out of the fountain of my thankfulneſs to the whole, for refreſhing of particular perſons that were members of that multitude. The other, which proceeded out of mine own infirmity, was, the multitude and importunity of ſuitors. But although reaſon come by infuſion in a manner, yet experience groweth with time and labour: and therefore do I not doubt, but experience in time coming will both teach the particular ſubjects of this kingdom, not to be ſo importune and undiſcreet in craving; and me not to be ſo eaſily and lightly moved in granting, that which may be harmful to my eſtate, and conſequently to the whole kingdom.

"And thus having at length declared unto you my mind, in all the points for the which I called this parliament, my concluſion ſhall only now be, to excuſe myſelf, in caſe you have not found ſuch eloquence in my ſpeech, as peradventure you might have looked for at my hands. I might, if I liſt, allege the great weight of my affairs, and my continual buſineſs and diſtractions, that I could never have leiſure to think upon what I was to ſpeak, before I came to the place where I was to ſpeak: and I might alſo allege, that my firſt ſight of this ſo famous and honourable an aſſembly, might likewiſe breed ſome impediment: but leaving theſe excuſes, I will plainly and freely in my manner, tell you the true cauſe of it; which is, that it becometh a king, in my opinion, to uſe no other eloquence than plainneſs and ſincerity. By plainneſs I mean, that his ſpeeches ſhould be ſo clear, and void of all ambiguity, that they may not be thrown, nor rent aſunder in contrary ſenſes, like the old oracles of the pagan gods. And by ſincerity, I underſtand, that uprightneſs and honeſty which ought to be in a king's whole ſpeeches and actions; that, as far as a king is in honour erected above any of his ſubjects, ſo far ſhould he ſtrive in ſincerity to be above them in all, and that his tongue ſhould be ever the true meſſenger of his heart. And this ſort of eloquence may you ever aſſuredly look for at my hands."

This ſpeech was not received with the applauſes expected by the king. Beſides the exceſſive length, ſeveral things were remarked which gave occaſion for cenſure. In the firſt place, no body could tell what to make of his "actions of thanks inſeparably conjoined in his perſon," and containing two bleſſings, the firſt whereof was confined to theſe two points: 1. That having never had war with any of his neighbours, he inferred from thence that he brought peace with him every where. But it was no great wonder he had not been hitherto in war with his neighbours, ſince Scotland has properly no neighbours but the Engliſh. 2. That without being ſollicited, he had revoked the letters of mark againſt Spain. The other bleſſing of his "actions of thanks," conſiſted in the union in his perſon of the titles of the two houſes of Lancaſter and York. Hence he would have inſinuated, that by his acceſſion to the throne of England, he freed the Engliſh from the dread of ſeeing a renewal of the civil wars occaſioned by the title of the two houſes. But this pretended dread was only a chimera of his own forming. Since Henry VIII. who much more juſtly united in his perſon the rights of the two contending houſes, the dread of a civil war had ſo diſappeared, that it was entirely forgot. As for his efforts to ſhew the great advantages which would accrue to England from the union of the two kingdoms, they were entirely vain, as will hereafter appear. Beſides, his inferences from the arbitrary compariſons of a head with a divided body, a huſband with two wives, a ſhepherd with two flocks, ſeemed ſo little ſolid, that they were turned to ridicule. What he ſaid about religion, was diſpleaſing to all. The catholics were not ſatisfied with his diſtinctions. The puritans were extremely offended, that he ſhould poſitively ſay of them, "They were ever diſcontented with the preſent government, and impatient of any ſuperiority, which made their ſect inſufferable in a well-governed commonwealth." The proteſtants in general remarked in his ſpeech too great condeſcenſion for the papiſts, and even contradiction in what he ſaid about them. On the one hand, he affirmed, he was of the church of England, and his faith grounded upon the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, he was ready to lay aſide all prejudice, and meet the catholics half way. He declared himſelf a mortal enemy to their errors, but took care to intimate, that he confined, as I may ſay, theſe errors to the doctrine of the pope's exorbitant power. Upon the other ſort of "actions of thanks," conſiſting in the making and executing of laws, it was ſaid, that a king of England might extol his condeſcenſion concerning ſome particular law, made to his own detriment, and the nation's benefit: but no king before him ever pretended to lay an obligation upon his people, for giving his aſſent to ſuch laws as were for his own and the kingdom's good. It was alſo obſerved, that he admoniſhed the parliament not to enact too many laws, as if he feared to be obliged to carry his pretended thankfulneſs too far. That as for the few good laws he was willing to admit, all the effects of his thankfulneſs conſiſted in giving the judges a very common and trivial charge. Finally, it was remarked, that this thankfulneſs upon which his whole ſpeech turned, was as imaginary as the cauſe which produced it. In thanking the people of England "for receiving and embracing him as their undoubted and lawful king and governor," he did not mean to declare that the people had made him ſo, but only that being undoubted king by his birth-right, they had received and owned him as ſuch. This was leſſening the obligation, and conſequently the thankfulneſs too. Wherefore it was thought by many, that the king's aim, in this long harangue, was not ſo much to expreſs his thankfulneſs to the Engliſh, as to inſinuate to them, that all he was obliged to them for, was, their not oppoſing his undoubted right: that his chief intention was, to obtain of the parliament the union of the two kingdoms; to prevent any new laws againſt the papiſts, and to have the execution of thoſe already in force left to him. What was only conjectured at firſt, became certain afterwards, as the king's intentions were diſcovered. In this very parliament therefore, a ſuſpicion and jealouſy of the king began to be entertained by the people. This alſo put the houſe of commons upon their guard, and made them carefully weigh the king's words and actions, who, notwithſtanding the maxims laid down in the concluſion of his ſpeech, was a great maſter in the art of chuſing ambiguous expreſſions. This muſt always be remembered, in order to underſtand the events of this reign [o].

The firſt thing the parliament did, was to prepare an act for acknowledging the king's title to the crown of England. James had not required it. On the contrary, in all appearance, by repeating ſeveral times in his ſpeech, that he was undoubted king by birth-right, he deſigned to intimate, he did not want the parliament's confirmation. But if this was his intent, the two houſes did not, or ſeemed not to underſtand it, whether they reſolved to preſerve a privilege hitherto enjoyed, or feared ſuch an omiſſion might occaſion troubles and rebellions. The king on his part thought it not prudent to refuſe the act.

After the parliament had conſidered of ſome other affairs, they appointed commiſſioners to examine the king's propoſal concerning the union of the two kingdoms. But the king had already obſtructed it, by laviſhing riches and honours upon his Scotch courtiers. This convinced the Engliſh, they could not but loſe by a union, whoſe end, as they believed, was to render the Scots partakers of the riches of England, whereas the Engliſh had nothing to expect in Scotland [p]. Hence the king's ſpeech was cenſured, where he ſpoke of Scotland as the one half of the iſland, though the Engliſh were perſuaded, there was a great inequality between England and Scotland. The eager purſuit of the Scots after places, penſions, and rich matches, raiſed the jealouſy of the Engliſh, and rendered them very averſe to the union projected by the king. With theſe diſpoſitions the commiſſioners met to examine the advantages and inconveniences, in order to make their report to the two houſes [q].

Whilſt this affair was in hand, moſt people could not forbear ſhewing diſcontent with regard to religion. The catholics expected greater favours from a prince, whom they imagined in their intereſt. His diſtinctions between the clerics and laics, between thoſe who aſcribed to the pope an unli-

[o] A modern author ſays, this ſpeech diſplays fully king James's character, and proves him to have poſſeſſed more knowledge and greater parts, than prudence or any juſt ſenſe of decorum and propriety. He obſerves, it wants that majeſtic brevity and reſerve which becomes a king in his addreſſes to the great council of the nation. It contains however a remarkable ſtroke of candor, where he confeſſes his too great facility in yielding to the ſollicitations of ſuitors; a fault, which he promiſes to correct, but which adhered to him during the whole courſe of his reign. Hume, p. 11.

[p] It was ſaid, that if the Scots had already impoveriſhed the kingdom, they would by the union bankrupt it. Weldon, p. 58.

[q] There were in all forty-three commiſſioners, lords and commons, who were empowered to meet and treat with certain ſelect commiſſioners to be appointed by the parliament of Scotland. Wilſon, p. 673, &c. Spotiſwood, p. 480.

The

mited power, and ſuch as received not that doctrine, made them fear, the advantages they had promiſed themſelves in this new reign would be very inconſiderable. The preſbyterians were enraged to ſee the king ſo openly prefer the papiſts before them. All the proteſtants in general heard with grief the advances made by the king to the papiſts: eſpecially, the offer of meeting them half way, and the affectation of condemning only a ſingle tenet, gave occaſion to fear, he had indeed the ſentiments he was ſuſpected of in Scotland. "What means, ſaid they, his offer to the papiſts of meeting them half way, upon their renouncing the doctrines repugnant to the regal authority? Where is this half way to be? Does it relate to the hierarchy? But if the pope's authority is not received, there will be no difference between the Engliſh and catholic church. Does he reckon the catholics will have come half way, when they have renounced the pope's exorbitant power? If ſo, we muſt, in order to go the other half, yield them the reſt of the articles, which were the cauſe of our ſeparation." In a word, it was not known how far this offer was to extend, or where to ſtop, ſo obſcure and doubtful was the expreſſion, though he had declared, he would uſe no other eloquence than plainneſs and ſincerity. Moſt of the biſhops, and the zealous church of England-men, were alone pleaſed, becauſe the king ſeemed bent not to ſuffer the puritans, who where no leſs odious to them than the bigotted papiſts. It is certain, their zeal for the church of England was carried a little too far, and the king, by declaring himſelf ſo plainly a ſworn enemy to the puritans, bred a mutual enmity between the two parties, which was but too much cheriſhed, and which, at another time, proved fatal to the eſtabliſhed church. The puritans were ſo offended at this uncharitableneſs for them, and the great condeſcenſion for the papiſts, that they did not ſcruple to charge the king, the biſhops, and the zealous epiſcopalians, with being ſo many popiſh agents. Amidſt theſe diviſions, the Romiſh emiſſaries had but too many opportunities to foment the animoſity of the two parties, and carry it to the utmoſt height, knowing they could not better execute their deſigns than when the kingdom was involved in troubles. It is pretended, at this time many jeſuits, with their ſuperiors permiſſion, were received, ſome as preſbyterian miniſters, others as church of England prieſts; and that under theſe diſguiſes, they ſo ſtretched the principles of the two parties in their writings and ſermons, that the breach was rendered irrepairable.

At the ſame time, thoſe who approached the king's perſon, both Engliſh and Scots, thought only of making their court, in order to obtain his good graces and favours. The jealouſy between the two nations, helped to ſtrain the flattery uſed by the whole court to the king. Every one ſtrove to keep in his eſteem by whatever was moſt grateful to him, and nothing was more ſo than to be extolled for his learning and parts, and to hear the royal authority talked of according to his principles. It was ſome time before the people had a clear knowledge of this prince's genius and character; but when he was once well known, the eſteem at firſt entertained of him very ſenſibly diminiſhed, to which the king himſelf greatly contributed by his ſtrange conduct, as will hereafter appear.

The principal affair for which the king had ſummoned the parliament was, the union of the two kingdoms, though he pretended, his ſole motive was to expreſs his thankfulneſs to the Engliſh. He had ſo good an opinion of his eloquence, that he did not queſtion the ſucceſs of the affair, and the nomination of the commiſſioners for that purpoſe confirmed his belief. So, whether through impatience, or to engage the parliament the ſooner to unite the two kingdoms, he ordered himſelf to be proclaimed king of Great Britain, without ſtaying for the parliament's determination. From thenceforward he would hear no more of the diſtinction of the two kingdoms. St. Andrew's croſs was quartered with St. George's in the flags, and by proclamation the Scottiſh coins were made current in England. This ſhewed the king did not doubt the affair of the union would ſucceed to his wiſh. But he did not yet know the genius and character of the Engliſh. Such as had no ſhare in his bounties, loudly murmured to ſee his Scotch attendants grown ſo rich in a very ſhort ſpace, that the Engliſh could not imitate their magnificence without ruining their eſtates [r]. Several paſquils were daily made upon the occaſion, not much to the advantage of the Scots, nor conſequently to the deſign of the union of the two kingdoms.

There was alſo another thing which did not render the people favourable to the king. This was an occaſion of the diſcontent given to the houſe of commons, and which it will be neceſſary to mention, in order to ſhew this prince's idea of the Engliſh conſtitution, and the juſt cauſe he gave the commons to fear, he deſigned to invade their privileges. Immediately after the opening of the parliament, the commons examining, according to cuſtom, the conteſted elections, there was a debate in the houſe about the return of ſir Francis Goodwin, and ſir John Forteſcue, for knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks; and upon a full hearing, ſir Francis was declared duly elected. Three days after, the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons, that there might be a conference about Goodwin's election. The commons, ſurpriſed at ſo extraordinary a meſſage, anſwered, they did not think themſelves obliged to give an account of their proceedings, and therefore could not grant the conference required. The lords replied, the king having been acquainted with what had paſſed in Goodwin's caſe, thought himſelf engaged in honour to have the affair debated again, and had ordered them to confer with the commons upon it. Whereupon the commons, by their ſpeaker, gave their reaſons to the king why they could not admit of that innovation. But all they could obtain was, that inſtead of a conference with the lords, the king commanded them to confer with the judges. This pleaſed them no more than the other. They delivered their reaſons in writing, at the council-chamber, deſiring their lordſhips to intercede for them to the king, not to violate their privileges. The anſwer was, the king abſolutely commanded them to have a conference with the judges [s]. The commons were extremely ſurpriſed at ſo abſolute an order. Mean while, fearing to be accuſed of too eaſily engaging in a quarrel with the king, they thought it more proper to yield than ſtand out; fully bent, however, to adhere to what had been determined in the caſe of the conteſted election. Certainly the king had engaged in a very nice affair, and probably, would not have come off with honour, had he not been diſengaged by Goodwin's moderation. Sir Francis, chuſing to forfeit his right rather than occaſion a quarrel between the king and the commons, deſired the houſe to order the county of Bucks to elect another knight in his ſtead. The king and commons equally accepted of this expedient, which prevented them from coming to extremities; but the king found from hence, that no great account was made of the proclamation upon calling the parliament, whereby he meant to be maſter of the elections.

The commons perceived by this affair, that the king's intention was to ſound them, and that hereafter ſuch incidents might frequently be revived. For which reaſon, on the 16th of June, addreſſing the king concerning certain grievances, they took occaſion to repreſent their privileges, of which they ſuppoſed him not yet fully informed.

This addreſs ſo diſpleaſed the king, that on the 7th of July he prorogued the parliament to the 7th of February, to have time to think of means to humble the commons [t].

It is certain, moſt of thoſe who approached the king, laboured to inſpire him with the deſign of rendering himſelf abſolute, or rather to confirm him in this reſolution, by which they perfectly made their court. Beſides, arbitrary power is as advantageous to miniſters and courtiers, as it is prejudicial to the reſt of the nation. Several authors accuſe the biſhops of having been of the number of the flatterers. Perhaps matters have been a little aggravated. However, many things give occaſion to believe, that the clergy of the church of England were inclined to aſcribe to the king, more power

[r] The Engliſh repined, as Wilſon ſays, to ſee the Scots advanced from blue bonnets to coſtly beavers, wearing inſtead of wadmeal, velvet and ſattin, p. 673.

[s] The king ſaid, he deſired and commanded, "as an abſolute king," that there might be a conference between the houſe and the judges. He had before ſaid, he had no purpoſe to impeach their privilege, but ſince they deſired all matters of privilege "from him and by his grant," he expected they ſhould not be turned againſt him. This caſe of Sir Francis Goodwin was printed by order of the houſe of commons, 1704, on occaſion of the famous debate at that time upon the Ayleſbury election.

[t] This parliament granted the king tunnage and poundage. The tunnage was 3s. on every tun of wine, imported, and on a tun of ſweet wine 6s. and for every awm of Rheniſh 1s. The poundage was 1s. on every twenty ſhillings-worth of goods and merchandiſe imported and exported, excepting woollen manufactures; and tin and pewter alſo excepted, which were to pay 2s. A denizen was to pay, for every ſack of wool, 33s. 4d. for every two hundred and forty woolfells 33s. 4d. and for every laſt of hides and backs 3l. 6s. 8d. But a ſtranger was to pay for every ſack of wool 3l. 6s. 8d. for every two hundred and forty woolfells the ſame; and for every laſt of hides and backs 3l. 13s. 4d. See Statut. c. 33.—There were ſeveral ſtatutes made in this parliament, the chief of which are: 1. An act for the due execution of the laws againſt jeſuits, ſeminary-prieſts, and recuſants. 2. A continuance of the ſtatute 39 Elizabeth, concerning the puniſhment of rogues, vagabonds, &c. By this ſtatute, people that go about the country to ſell glaſſes, are to be adjudged as rogues and vagabonds. 3. An act to reſtrain the inordinate haunting and tipling in inns, alehouſes, &c. 4. A wife act againſt conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil ſpirits. 5. One for the relief of creditors againſt bankrupts. 6. And another againſt brokers, &c. See Statut. 1 James I.

They

than his predeceſſors had hitherto enjoyed. At leaſt, it is certain that from the reign of James I. to this preſent time, many of the clergy have endeavoured to perſuade the people, that they ought to acknowledge in the ſovereign an unlimited authority, and have extended paſſive obedience in England as far as in the moſt arbitrary monarchies.

Bancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a moſt zealous aſſertor of the prerogative royal, was one of the firſt who attempted to go beyond the uſual bounds, by cauſing things to depend on the king's will, which were undeniably within the parliament's juriſdiction. He exhibited to the king and council twenty-five grievances of the clergy [t], which were deſired to be reformed in granting prohibitions, that the king's courts might not have cognizance of what concerned theſe articles. It is ſaid, his intention was to ſhew others the way to apply directly to the king, without regarding the parliament or convocation. But the king was told, in caſe he granted the archbiſhop's requeſt, he would be engaged in inextricable difficulties, becauſe the redreſſing of grievances had ever belonged to the parliament. Whereupon, the king conſulted the judges, who anſwered unanimouſly, he ought to refrain from deciding any thing concerning the archbiſhop's requeſt.

The concluſion of the peace with Spain ſoon followed the prorogation of the parliament. Taxis having informed the king of Spain how the court of England ſtood affected, the conſtable of Caſtile was ſent into the Low-Countries, with orders to paſs into England and conclude the peace. But the conſtable being detained by ſome affairs in the Netherlands, conveyed his power to Taxis and Richardot. Theſe two deputies being come to London [u], agreed upon a treaty, which was not however ſigned till the 18th of Auguſt, after the arrival of the conſtable of Caſtile. Some ſay, this embaſſador purchaſed the peace with large ſums of money, diſtributed among the king's miniſters. But this can only be ſaid by conjecture, thoſe who are intruſted with ſuch ſort of intrigues not being uſed to diſcover them [w]. However, the treaty with the king of Spain was twofold, there being one relating intirely to commerce.

"By the IVth article of the firſt treaty it was agreed, That neither the kings of England nor Spain ſhould directly or indirectly, give aid to the enemies or rebels of either part, of what nature or condition ſoever they were.

"By the Vth, They renounced all former leagues, confederacies, capitulations, and intelligences contrary to that treaty.

"In the VIIth, king James excuſes the delivery of the cautionary towns to the king of Spain; and promiſes to enter into a treaty with the ſtates, wherein he will aſſign a competent time to them, to accept and receive terms for a pacification with the archduke; which if they refuſed, he would from thenceforth think himſelf freed from the former conventions with them."

Theſe, doubtleſs, are the articles which have given occaſion to ſay, the Spaniards bought the peace. It does not however appear, that after the treaty James withdrew his troops from the ſervice of the ſtates, as he ſhould have done by virtue of the IVth article, nor that he fixed a time for the ſtates to make a peace, purſuant to the VIIth. On the contrary, it will be ſeen, that he delivered to them the cautionary towns for a much leſs ſum than was agreed on with Elizabeth. Moreover, Andrew du Cheſne, in his hiſtory of England, ſpeaking of this treaty, relates only four articles; whereof the laſt is directly contrary to the forementioned fourth article. According to that hiſtorian the article ran:

"That as to the ſtates of Holland and Zealand, things ſhould remain as they were, as well with reſpect to the cautionary towns, as to the other articles of the treaties between Elizabeth and the ſtates, without the king of England's being obliged to recal his troops from the Low-Countries; or to forbid his ſubjects to ſerve the ſtates. Moreover, that the commerce, trade, and navigation, between the Engliſh and the ſtates, ſhould continue upon the ſame foot as in Elizabeth's life-time."

This contrariety makes me think, that James, to pleaſe the Spaniard and the archduke, was purſuaded to agree that the fourth article ſhould be inſerted in the treaty in the manner firſt mentioned, in order to induce the ſtates to haſten a peace; and that this ſame article, as related by du Cheſne, was a reſtriction of the firſt, or a ſecret article, which was alone to take place. This is ſo common a thing in treaties, that the conjecture cannot be conſidered as groundleſs, eſpecially as it is confirmed by the event.

The peace with Spain being concluded, the king was perſuaded to grant a monopoly of the trade with Spain and Italy to a company of merchants, and to forbid all his ſubjects, except ſuch as were authoriſed by this company, to traffic in thoſe countries. But in the next ſeſſion of the parliament, the commons taking into conſideration how deſtructive to trade ſuch a monopoly was, repreſented ſo plainly to the king the ill conſequences of it, that the company's patent was revoked, and the trade with Spain and Italy declared free as before.

During the reſt of the year 1604, nothing remarkable paſſed in England. The king led a peaceable life amidſt the flatteries of his court, and very laviſhly beſtowed his favours on his minions. But this liberality bred a great diſcontent in thoſe who had no ſhare in it, and thought themſelves however no leſs worthy than the others. Queen Elizabeth took a very different method, but James did not think fit to be her imitator. Never were honours beſtowed with leſs diſcretion and more profuſion than in this reign. Accordingly, they were no longer conſidered as the reward of merit, but only of adulation [x].

The town of Oſtend, beſieged now three years by the Spaniards, was at laſt forced to capitulate the 20th of September. By the taking of that place the conquerors gained only heaps of ruins, which had coſt them immenſe ſums, and the loſs of numberleſs officers and ſoldiers [y]. Before James concluded the peace with Spain, he ſeemed willing to concern himſelf in the preſervation of Oſtend; but when the peace was made, he thought only of ſtrengthening his new friendſhip with the king of Spain and the archduke, by ſending them embaſſadors.

[1605] The king made choice of his high admiral the earl of Nottingham for embaſſador extraordinary to Spain. The earl departed in March 1605, with a very numerous retinue, conſiſting, according to ſome, of no leſs than ſix hundred and fifty perſons [z].

At the ſame time, the earl of Hertford was ſent in embaſſy to Bruſſels. Whilſt he was at ſea, a Dutch man of war ſailed by, and refuſing to ſtrike, the Engliſh captain, ſir William Monſon, prepared to compel him, but the embaſſador would not give him leave. This was the firſt indignity of that nature received by England from the Dutch, whoſe ſovereignty was not yet ſo much as acknowledged by any potentate in Europe. If James had demanded reparation, doubtleſs, he might eaſily have obtained it, conſidering the then circumſtances of the United Provinces. But very likely, he did not think it worth his while to make a noiſe about an affair of ſo little importance. The Engliſh however murmured at it, and many took occaſion to compare the king's indolence with Elizabeth's ſpirit, who, doubtleſs, would not have been ſo eaſy under ſuch an affront. James gave himſelf no trouble about it, believing, that to avoid all occaſion of rupture with his neighbours was a more effectual way to procure his own and the nation's welfare, than to engage in a war for ſuch a trifle.

The jealouſy the Engliſh began to conceive of the Hollanders, was nothing in compariſon of that cauſed by the king's prodigal favours to the Scots [a]. Moſt hiſtorians ac[t] They were called Articuli Cleri. See them in Sir Edward Coke's 2d. Inſtitute.

[u] The Engliſh commiſſioners were, Thomas Sackville earl of Dorſet, Charles Howard earl of Nottingham, Charles Blount earl of Devonſhire, Henry Howard earl of Northampton, and Robert lord Cecil baron of Eſingden. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 580, &c. 586.

[w] Weldon, p. 26, 27, ſays, there was not one courtier of note but what taſted of Spain's bounty, either in gold or jewels; and among them not any had ſo large a proportion as the counteſs of Suffolk, who ſhared in her lord's intereſt, being then a potent man, and in that intereſt which ſhe had, in being miſtreſs to that little great Secretary (little in body but great in policy) the ſole manager of ſtate affairs. So it may be ſaid, ſhe was a double ſharer: And in truth, Audley-End, that famous great ſtructure, had its foundation of Spaniſh gold. He ſays, all Chriſtendom has ſince felt and ſeen the lamentable effect of this diſadvantageous peace.—A peace, ſays Oſborn, more deſtructive to England than a war. He alſo obſerves, that the earl of Northampton was by the Spaniſh gifts enabled to build a noble houſe in the Strand; and there were many others in the kingdom, that had their foundation, if not their walls and roofs, plaiſtered with the ſame mortar. Sect. 4, 5.

[x] This year, in September, the king borrowed ſeveral ſums of money, by privy ſeal, from the wealthieſt citizens in London. And in October, the cuſtoms of merchandiſes, both inward and outward, were raiſed, and let out to farm. Howes's Contin. of Stow, p. 856.—The king, who was a great enemy to tobacco, as appears by his writings againſt it, ordered by a proclamation, dated October 7, that beſides the cuſtom of two-pence in the pound it uſed to pay, there ſhould be an additional duty of 6s. 8d. on every pound imported into the realm. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 601.

[y] Above one hundred and twenty thouſand men are ſaid to be ſlain on both ſides. The town was taken by the marquis of Spinola, for which he was made duke of Santa Severina. Sir Francis Vere, general, and his brother Horatio, had ſhewn great valour in the defence of this place. Stow, p. 856. Howes's Contin.

[z] The Spaniards were aſtoniſhed at the magnificence of the embaſſy, and the handſome gentlemen: for it ſeems, the jeſuits reported our nation to be ugly, and like devils, as a puniſhment for caſting off the pope; and they pictured Sir Francis Drake generally half a man half a dragon. So eaſy is it, ſays Wilſon, for thoſe jugglers, when they have once bound up the conſcience, to tie up the underſtanding alſo. Weldon, p. 42. Wilſon, p. 673.

[a] This jealouſy occaſioned many inſolencies; the ſtreets of London ſwarmed night and day with bloody quarrels: and private duels were every where cuſe the catholics of cheriſhing the jealouſy between the two nations, in order to make an advantage of their diviſions. But without being forced to recur to ſo remote a cauſe, the old enmity between the two kingdoms, and the king's inclination for the Scots, were in my opinion much more natural cauſes of it. The king was no ſtranger to this jealouſy, and uſed ſome endeavours to allay it. He ordered this year in England, Thomas Douglas, a Scotchman, to be hanged, for counterfeiting the king's privy-ſeal to ſeveral princes of Germany. This man falling into the hands of the elector Palatine, who diſcovered the fraud, was ſent into England, where he met with his deſert.

Hitherto the king was undiſturbed, and ſurrounded with plenty; whereas he had ſpent in Scotland the firſt years of his life in troubles and want. Since his acceſſion to the throne of England, he had not been obliged to aſk money of his parliament, becauſe when he came to the crown, he found the deceaſed queen had not yet touched the ſubſidy granted her by the parliament, amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, which he had entirely received. This, with his uſual revenues, enabled him to be liberal to his favourites of both nations, who quickly grew very rich. On the other hand, he took a pleaſure in raiſing to honours and dignities ſeveral perſons, who would not have aſpired to them in Elizabeth's reign. In ſhort, he ſaw himſelf inceſſantly flattered by his courtiers, who omitted no opportunities to ſhew how much they admired his wiſdom and all his other virtues. This was a neceſſary method to acquire his favour. To ſay all in a word, he led a very eaſy and peaceable life, in the midſt of plenty and pleaſures, to which ſome pretend he was a little too much addicted [b]. But this prince has had the misfortune to have for hiſtorians, ſuch as loved him not, as on the other hand, he has had the good fortune to have ſome who have endeavoured to praiſe all his actions. So, there is danger of being greatly miſtaken, if an idea of his character is formed upon the commendations or invectives of his hiſtorians. It is better to keep ſolely to the examination of his actions themſelves.

Whilſt every thing ſeemed to procure king James a quiet and peaceable reign, the devil, envying the happineſs of the Engliſh, inſpired ſome of his agents with one of the moſt horrible plots that ever was heard of. I mean the gun-powder treaſon plot, which has made ſo much noiſe in the world, and of which I ſhall relate the particulars, without any aggravation.

Whatever might be the ground of the hopes entertained by the catholics, when they ſaw king James aſcend the throne of England, it is certain they expected great things from him, and at leaſt a full toleration, with liberty of publicly exerciſing their religion. Upon this toleration they built their hopes of reſtoring by degrees their religion in England. But the king's ſpeech to the parliament diſcovered two things: The firſt, that the toleration, which till then had been hardly doubted, was not yet ready to come. The ſecond, that though they ſhould obtain it of the king, it would not be for ſuch as acknowledged the pope's authority in its utmoſt extent. Theſe were the men however that were moſt active and eager to re-eſtabliſh their religion in the kingdom. They deſpiſed a bare liberty of conſcience for the moderate catholics, to which the king ſeemed to confine his favours. They believed it to be the king's intention to divide the catholics, and make two ſects, whereof one, renouncing the doctrine of the pope's ſupremacy, ſhould be tolerated in the kingdom, and the other expelled. This diviſion appeared to them ſo deſtructive to the catholic religion, that they imagined, the king by this artful and political conduct, intended to reconcile to the church of England, ſuch as ſhould imprudently reject the papal authority, as it happened in the reign of Henry VIII.

To prevent the execution of this pretended deſign, which might be very prejudicial to the church of Rome, ſome of theſe zealots conſulted together, and formed a horrible plot, which was afterwards approved by the reſt. The chief of theſe wretches was Robert Cateſby, a gentleman of Northamptonſhire, deſcended from the Cateſbies mentioned in the reign of Edward V. This man having gained Thomas Percy the earl of Northumberland's couſin, John Grant, Ambroſe Rookwood, John and Chriſtopher Wright, Francis Treſham, Guy Fawkes, Sir Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter [c], Thomas Bates, and Robert Keys, choſe five of them to conſult how to reſtore the Romiſh religion in England. Percy, one of the moſt zealous, propoſed killing the king, and offered to perform it. To this Cateſby replied, "Though the king was dead, their cauſe would not be advanced, ſince he would leave ſons, who perhaps would not be more favourable to the catholics. Nay, ſuppoſing the king and his children were removed, there would remain ſo many of the nobles and gentry, that probably it would be very difficult to accompliſh their deſign." He added, "he had thought of a way to deſtroy in an inſtant, almoſt all the principal enemies of the catholic religion, and to throw the kingdom into ſuch a conſternation, that not a man would be able to take proper meaſures to oppoſe the execution of their deſigns." This way was to blow up the parliament houſe [d] whilſt the king ſhould be ſpeaking his ſpeech from the throne to the lords and commons. Then he ſhewed them in what manner the project might be executed, and was applauded by all. However, as ſo deteſtable a plot could not but breed ideas frightful and ſhocking to conſcience, ſome moved to have the lawfulneſs of the project examined by their divines. It is ſaid, that Henry Garnet, Oſwald Teſmond, and John Gerrard being conſulted, approved of the plot as juſt and lawful, ſince it was againſt excommunicated heretics. I cannot warrant this, becauſe I never ſaw their trials. But thus much is certain, they ſuffered death for not diſcovering the conſpiracy of which they were informed; and the king, in an apology publiſhed ſome time after, affirmed that Garnet was legally convicted, and had confeſſed his crime [e].

Be this as it will, the thing being determined, they took an oath of ſecrecy, adminiſtered as it is ſaid by father Garnet [f]. Then Percy, being one of the gentlemen-penſioners, was appointed to hire a houſe adjoining to the upper-houſe of parliament. This paſſed in November or December 1604; and the king was to make his ſpeech to the parliament on the 7th of February. Percy having hired the houſe, the conſpirators began with no ſmall labour to dig in the cellar through the partition-wall, which was very thick [g]. But as the parliament was prorogued to the 3d of October, they had as much time as was neceſſary to finiſh their work. In the beginning of February 1605, they had almoſt digged through the wall, when on a ſudden they heard a noiſe on the other ſide: this threw them into a great fright, being apprehenſive of a diſcovery; but their courage reviving, Fawkes, who paſſed for Percy's footman, was ſent to ſee what had occaſioned their fear. Preſently after he returned, and ſaid, the place from whence the noiſe came was a large cellar under the upper-houſe of parliament, full of ſea-coals, which were now under ſale, and the cellar offered to be let. As nothing could be more favourable to their deſign, Percy immediately hired the cellar, and bought the remainder of the coals: then he ſent for thirty-ſix barrels of powder from Holland, and lodging them at Lambeth, cauſed them to be conveyed in the night into the cellar, and covered with coals and faggots [h].

The plot being thus in a fair way, it was conſidered what was to be done when the king, prince Henry his eldeſt ſon, the lords and commons, ſhould be buried in the ruins of the parliament-houſe. The duke of York, the king's ſecond ſon, being yet very young, was not to be preſent at the parliament, and the princeſs Elizabeth his ſiſter was educated at fomented betwixt the Engliſh and Scots. Wilſon, p. 674——The Scots complaining at firſt to the king, that they were ſo poor, they underwent the by-word of beggarly Scots; the king replied to them, Content yourſelves, I will ſhortly make the Engliſh as beggarly as you, and ſo end that controverſy. Weldon, p. 57.

[b] Mr. Chamberlain, in a letter to Mr. Winwood, tells him, That the king "finds ſuch felicity in a hunting life, that he has written to his council, and deſires them to take the charge and burden of affairs, and foreſee that he be not interrupted nor troubled with too much buſineſs." Winwood's Mem. tom. II. p. 46.

[c] This Thomas Winter ſeems to have been the firſt contriver of the plot, about Eaſter 1604; but Cateſby invented the manner of putting it in execution. See Fawkes's Confeſſ.

[d] That place they made choice of, becauſe the catholic religion having been ſuppreſſed there, they thought it fitteſt, that juſtice and puniſhment ſhould be executed there. Winter's Confeſſ.

[e] This is confirmed by Garnet's anſwer to ſome Engliſh lords, who aſked him, whether he approved that the church of Rome ſhould one day declare him a martyr: "Martyrem me (cried he) O qualem martyrem!" See Caſaubon's letter to Fronto Ducæus the Jeſuit, Caſaub. Epiſt. edit. of 1709. p. 414.

[f] Cateſby, Percy, Wright, Fawkes, and Winter, met behind St. Clement's church, in London, and upon a Primer gave each other the oath of ſecrecy, and afterwards went into the next room, where they heard maſs, and received the ſacrament upon the ſame. Ibid. In their indictment it is ſaid, "that they received the euchariſt by the hands of Garnet, Teſmond," &c. but not the oath. See State Trials.

[g] It was about three yards thick. They that worked in this mine were Percy, Cateſby, Thomas and Robert Winter, John and Chriſtopher Wright, and Fawkes. They began to work December 11, and about Candlemas had worked the wall half through. They all ſeven lay in the houſe, and had ſhot and powder, being reſolved to die rather than yield or be taken. They had provided themſelves with baked meats, to have the leſs occaſion for ſending out; and they went in the night and were never ſeen. Fawkes's and Winter's Confeſſ.

[h] They put in at firſt but twenty barrels, but fearing they might be damp, they added ſixteen more. There were a thouſand billets and five hundred faggots to cover them. Winter's Confeſſ.—In their indictment it is ſaid, they put in thirty barrels and four hogſheads of gun-powder, and laid on them great iron bars and ſtones. State Trials.

a houſe belonging to the lord Harrington in Warwickſhire. It was reſolved therefore that Percy, who had free admittance into the king's palace, ſhould undertake to kill the duke of York [i]; and that others, under colour of a hunting-match, ſhould meet on the ſame day near the lord Harrington's houſe, and ſecure the princeſs Elizabeth. As all this could not be effected without money, Treſham offered two thouſand pounds ſterling, Digby fifteen hundred, and Percy promiſed to ſupply four thouſand. Some moved for foreign aid beforehand, but the motion was rejected: it was reſolved only to demand aſſiſtance of France, Spain, and the archduke, when the plot ſhould be executed. Then, after ſome conſultation, they agreed to ſave the princeſs Elizabeth, and proclaim her queen. To that end they drew up a proclamation, taking care to inſert nothing concerning religion, for fear of alarming the people, till they were ſtrong enough to execute all their deſigns. Finally, they reſolved to ſpread a report after the blow ſhould be given, that the puritans were the authors of it.

The parliament being farther prorogued to the 5th of November, the conſpirators expected the day with the utmoſt impatience, not one being touched with remorſe of the crime they were going to commit. But God, abhorring ſo deteſtable a plot, inſpired one of the conſpirators with a deſire to ſave William Parker lord Monteagle, ſon of the lord Morley. This lord going home about ſeven in the evening, a letter was given him by his ſervant, who received it from an unknown perſon, with a charge to deliver it into his maſter's own hand. The letter was without name or date [k], and expreſſed in theſe words:

"My lord,

"OWT of the love I beare to ſome of your frends, I have a care of your preſervation. Therefore I would adviſe you, as you tender your life, to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance at the parliament. For God and Man have concurred to puniſh the wickedneſſe of this tyme. And thincke not ſlightlie of this advertiſement, but retire yourſelf into your countrey, where you may expect the event in ſafetie. For though there be no appearance of any ſtirre, yet I ſay, they ſhall receave a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they ſhall not ſee who hurt them. This counceill is not to be contemned, bicauſe yt may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is paſt ſo ſoon as you burne this letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good uſe of yt: to whoſe holy protection I commend you."

This letter was delivered to the lord Monteagle ten days before the meeting of the parliament. Though it was unintelligible to him, nay, though he imagined it only an artifice to frighten him, he carried it that very evening to the earl of Saliſbury, ſecretary of ſtate. The earl ſhewed it to ſome privy counſellors, who underſtood the meaning of it no more than he [l]. However, they reſolved to do nothing till the king's return, who was then at Royſton.

The king returning to London the laſt day of October, the earl of Saliſbury read the letter to him on the morrow, and concluded that it was written by ſome fool or madman; to convince the king, he repeated this ſentence, "The danger is paſt ſo ſoon as you burne this letter;" for, ſaid he, if the danger be paſſed when the letter is burnt, what ſignifies this warning? But the king ordering the letter to be read again, explained the words otherwiſe, and ſaid, "So ſoon as you burne the letter," was to be interpreted, "In as ſhort a ſpace as you ſhall take to burn the letter." Then comparing this ſentence with the foregoing, "That they ſhould receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet ſhould not ſee who hurt them," he concluded that ſome ſudden blow was preparing by means of gun-powder [m]. This interpretation being deemed very plauſible, it was reſolved that all the rooms and cellars adjoining to the parliament-houſe ſhould be ſearched, to ſee whether there was any powder concealed. This ſearch was however deferred till the day before the meeting of the parliament, in a belief that the nearer the execution was, the more ſigns would be found. The earl of Suffolk lord chamberlain went himſelf to ſearch, without noiſe or hurry [n]. When he came to the cellar where the powder was, and ſaw the coals and faggots with which it was covered, he aſked Whyneard, the keeper of the wardrobe, who attended him, to what uſe he had put the cellar? Whyneard anſwered, Mr. Percy had hired it, and very probably the coals and wood were the gentleman's fuel for winter. At the ſame time the chamberlain perceiving a man ſtanding in a corner, aſked who he was, and being told he was Mr. Percy's ſervant, did not ſeem to take any farther notice [o]. This affected negligence made the conſpirators think there would be no farther ſearch, ſince nothing was found in the cellar to create any ſuſpicion, and they prepared to execute their plot the next day.

The earl of Suffolk having made his report to the council, it was thought if there was any powder concealed, it was in the large cellar, under the faggots and coals. But as the parliament was to meet on the morrow, it was reſolved not to ſearch under the wood till midnight, in hopes to find in or about the cellar ſome perſons from whom information might be had. Purſuant to this reſolution, ſir Thomas Kneyet, gentleman of the privy-chamber and juſtice of peace for Weſtminſter, going to the cellar about midnight, found at the door a man in a cloak and boots, whom he immediately apprehended [p]. This was Guy Fawkes, who paſſed for Percy's ſervant [q]. Then cauſing the wood and coals to be removed, they found underneath thirty-ſix barrels of powder. After this diſcovery, Fawkes being ſearched, there was found upon him a dark lantern, a tinder-box, and three matches [r]. The villain, inſtead of being diſmayed, boldly told them, if he had been taken within the cellar, he would have blown up himſelf and them together. The king being acquainted with the diſcovery [s], ordered the priſoner to be examined concerning the circumſtances of the plot. He confeſſed the deſign was to blow up the king and parliament, and expreſſed great ſorrow it was not done, ſaying, it was the devil and not God that was the diſcoverer. He obſtinately refuſed all that day to name any of his accomplices, but on the morrow, being ſhewed the rack, confeſſed all he knew.

The opening of the parliament, which was to be the ſame day, being deferred, and the news of the conſpiracy beginning to ſpread in London, Cateſby, Percy, Winter, and the two Wrights, fled by ſeveral ways to their companions, who were to ſecure the princeſs Elizabeth. Theſe were ready to execute their deſign the moment they ſhould hear of the ſucceſs of the mine at Weſtminſter. As they did not queſtion it would ſucceed to their wiſh, and believed they had nothing more to manage, they had the night before broke open a ſtable and carried away twelve horſes [t]. This action had alarmed ſir Richard Verney ſheriff of the county, who had drawn the people together to ſeize the robbers. Preſently after came the conſpirators that fled from London, and told their companions the plot had miſcarried; whereupon they reſolved to keep together, to endeavour to make the catholics riſe, and to put themſelves at their head; but all their efforts ended only in raiſing about a hundred horſe [u].

Mean while, the ſheriffs of the neighbouring counties [w] having ſent notice to one another, called the people to arms, and purſued the conſpirators from place to place, till at length the villains were forced to take harbour at Holbeach [x], where the ſheriff ſummoned them to ſurrender. They anſwered, he had not a ſufficient force to compel them, and prepared to defend themſelves, or fight their way through; but in opening a barrel of powder to charge their muſkets, it took fire and blew up part of the houſe [y]. This accident conſtrained them to open the gate and try to eſcape. Some were killed immediately by the people who ſurrounded them: Cateſby, Percy, and Winter, ſtanding back to back, fought deſperately, till the two firſt were killed with one ſhot, and the other taken a live after receiving ſeveral wounds. Digby, Rookwood, Grant, and Bates, yielded or were taken in trying to eſcape. Treſham, who ſtaid at London with Robert Winter brother of Thomas Winter and Littleton, was diſcovered and apprehended with his two companions. All the priſoners were ſent to the Tower, and ſtrictly examined. Thomas Winter confeſſed himſelf guilty, and wrote his confeſſion with his own hand. Digby extenuated his crime, becauſe having expected the king would grant a free toleration to the catholics, and not ſeeing any likelihood of their obtaining it, he was driven by deſpair to engage in the plot. Treſham ſaid at firſt that father Garnet the jeſuit was privy to the conſpiracy, but afterwards denied it by his wife's inſtigation, as it is pretended, affirming he had not ſeen him for ſixteen years: but Garnet, who was apprehended after Treſham's death, confeſſed he had frequently conferred with him within ſix months. The earl of Northumberland was ſent to the Tower, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in the plot. This ſuſpicion was grounded upon his being captain of the band of gentlemen penſioners, and admitting into it his couſin Percy, without adminiſtring to him the oath of ſupremacy, though he knew his religion. The affair being afterwards brought into the ſtar-chamber, the earl was fined in thirty thouſand pounds ſterling, deprived of all his poſts, and impriſoned during the king's pleaſure.

The ſeſſion of the parliament began not till the 9th of November, though it was fixed to the 5th. The king made a long ſpeech, repreſenting the heinouſneſs and conſequences of this horrible plot, and magnifying the mercy of God in the miraculous diſcovery. But withal he took great care to clear the catholic religion, and to obſerve that this abominable plot was to be aſcribed to ſuch only as were truly papiſts, and imbrued with the deteſtable principles mentioned in his firſt ſpeech to the parliament. He affirmed, there were not many of theſe, and it would be extremely injurious to accuſe the catholics in general of following ſuch extravagant maxims.

"For (added he) although it cannot be denied that it was only the blind ſuperſtition of their errors in religion that led them to this deſparate device; yet doth it not follow that all profeſſing the Romiſh religion were guilty of the ſame: for as it is true that no other ſect of heretics, not excepting Turk, Jew, nor Pagan, no, not even thoſe of Calicute, who adore the devil, did ever maintain by the grounds of their religion, that it was lawful, or rather meritorious (as the Romiſh catholics call it) to murder princes or people for quarrel of religion; yet it is true on the other ſide, that many honeſt men, blinded peradventure with ſome opinions of popery, as if they be not found in the queſtions of the real preſence, or in the number of their ſacraments, and ſome ſuch ſchool queſtion; yet do either not know, or at leaſt not believe, all the true grounds of popery, which is indeed the myſtery of iniquity. And therefore do we juſtly confeſs, that many papiſts, eſpecially our forefathers, laying their only truſt upon Chriſt and his merits, at their laſt breath, may be and oftentimes are ſaved; deteſting in that point, and thinking the cruelty of puritans worthy of fire, that will admit no ſalvation to any papiſt."

And then concluding that part of his diſcourſe, he declared, "As upon the one part many honeſt men ſeduced with ſome errors of popery, may yet remain good and faithful ſubjects; ſo upon the other part none of thoſe that truly know and believe the whole grounds of popery, can ever prove either good Chriſtians or faithful ſubjects."

This ſpeech was much applauded by the courtiers, who admired its wiſdom, juſtice, and equity, and remarked the king's greatneſs of ſoul, who at the very time he had ſo much reaſon to complain of the catholics, took care to juſtify their religion, and hinder the innocent from being confounded with the guilty. But the reſt of the people were not of the ſame opinion. They conſidered with grief and aſtoniſhment the tender regard the king expreſſed for the catholics in general, under pretence of a diſtinction which was thought imaginary, or at leaſt very uſeleſs, by reaſon of the difficulty of diſcerning thoſe who held the maxims condemned by the king, from thoſe who were willing to renounce them. They obſerved alſo the difference the king put between the Romiſh religion and that of the puritans: the firſt hindered not its profeſſors from being faithful ſubjects; but the laſt was not to be tolerated in any well-governed commonwealth, as he expreſſed himſelf in his former ſpeech. Here, to turn the hatred of the good proteſtants upon the puritans, he is not content with deteſting an opinion indifferent in itſelf, and which had no relation to the ſtate, but even thinks it worthy of fire, either temporal or ſpiritual, for he does not ſay which, whilſt he calls the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation a mere ſchool-queſtion. It was alſo ſaid, that if upon this ſame opinion, he had been pleaſed to diſtinguiſh the puritans who did not, from ſuch as did damn all the catholics, this diſtinction would have been as well grounded as that between the catholics and papiſts. In ſhort, it was obſerved, that he affected to aſcribe to the puritans alone this opinion worthy of fire, which he might much more juſtly have imputed to the Roman catholics, as all the world knew. It cannot be denied, that throughout the whole courſe of his reign, this prince ſhewed an extreme fondneſs for the Roman catholics. This will ſtill more plainly appear in the ſequel, ſince what I have hitherto related may be deemed doubtful marks of his ſentiments, and capable of admitting a favourable conſtruction.

As ſoon as he had ended his ſpeech, the king prorogued the parliament to the 21ſt of January: ſo that it evidently appeared he had cauſed them to meet for one ſingle day, on purpoſe to ſhew his thoughts of the conſpiracy, and the manner in which he would have it examined, that is, with reſpect to ſuch only as were concerned in it.

The lords Mordant and Sturton, ſuſpected of being privy to the plot, were fined, the firſt ten thouſand marks, the other ſix thouſand, though there was no other proof againſt them, but their not coming to the parliament. They were ſentenced by the ſtar-chamber, which was then the terror of the great men, and which for the leaſt offence, condemned the parties accuſed in exorbitant fines to the king's uſe[z].

[1606] The diſcovery of the powder-plot was univerſally aſcribed to the king's penetration, who alone diſcovered the meaning of the letter to the lord Monteagle [a]. Nay, ſome of his flatterers did not ſcruple to ſay, he could never have found out the myſtery, without the immediate aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt [b].

The king of Spain's and the archduke's embaſſadors teſtified their joy for this deliverance, by bonfires before their doors, and fountains of wine to the mob. This was not perhaps a very proper way to remove the ſuſpicions of the Engliſh, who were apt to believe the Spaniards were concerned in the horrible plot[c]. It was remembered that when the conſtable of Caſtile was in England, he ſaid publicly, in caſe the king refuſed to tolerate the catholics, there would be found perſons capable of any attempt. Nay, after the plot was diſcovered, the archduke refuſed to deliver ſome of the accomplices who had eſcaped into the Netherlands[d], and ſent the chief of them to Spain, where he was very well received. It is certain however, theſe embaſſadors were not accuſed by the depoſitions of the criminals. Nay, the king publicly declared, he was ſure no foreign prince was privy to the plot. Indeed, all the princes, as well catholic as proteſtant, expreſſed their abhorrence of ſo damnable a deſign, and congratulated him upon his deliverance.

The parliament meeting on the 21ſt of January, the king appointed commiſſioners to try the conſpirators. He had till now delayed to give the people the ſatisfaction to ſee theſe villains puniſhed. But perceiving if he did not do it of himſelf, the parliament would not fail to petition him, he reſolved to give them over to juſtice. There were but eight

[a] The king gave the lord Monteagle, the firſt diſcoverer of the treaſon, two hundred pounds a year, in fee-farm rents, and five hundred pounds a year during life, as a reward for his good ſervice. Wilſon, p. 676.

[b] After all, it is ſaid, that the letter to the lord Monteagle was an artifice of Cecil's, and that the firſt intimation of the powder-treaſon came from the king of France, who received it from the jeſuits of his faction, to the end he might ſhare in our ruins. The reaſons why the moſt chriſtian king did advertiſe our court of the plot were, firſt, becauſe he found that nothing was to be feared from one of king James's complexion. Another (a weak one, though ſtrongly preſt by the miniſters) was, the favours received from hence during the league. But the moſt probable was, the advantage the king of Spain was likely to make of it, by reaſon he had an army then ready in Flanders to land in the huge miſt ſo black a cloud muſt needs have cauſed over the nation, the kingdom of England, being in the pope's own judgment, too great an addition to that of Spain. Oſborn, p. 437, &c. Welwood, p. 19. Mr. Winwood tells the earl of Saliſbury, in a letter to him, that he was informed "the papiſts did not ſo much ſeek after the life of the king, as the life of the earl of Saliſbury." See Winwood's Mem. tom. II. p. 264.

[c] The king of Spain ſent an agent on purpoſe to congratulate king James's great preſervation. A flattery ſo palpable, as the pope could not refrain laughing in the face of cardinal d'Oſſat, when he firſt told him of it: It being notorious, that when king James came to the crown of England, none ſought his deſtruction more cordially than the Spaniards, till a continued tract of experience had fully acquainted him with his temper, and the impoſſibility of purſuading him to form any league with France or other chriſtian prince againſt him. Oſborn, p. 438.

Sir

executed the 31ſt of January [e], though the number of the guilty was much greater. Some time after, Oldcorn, a jeſuit, ſaying openly, that the ill ſucceſs of the conſpiracy did not render it the leſs juſt, was ſent to priſon, condemned, and executed. Henry Garnet, provincial of the Engliſh jeſuits, having alſo been arreſted, was ſentenced to die as a traitor, upon the depoſitions of thoſe that were already executed. Some ſay, he only confeſſed, he had heard of a conſpiracy to reſtore the catholic religion in England, but was ignorant of the circumſtances. Others pretend, the plot was revealed to him only in confeſſion, and he was not obliged to diſcover it. The king, as I ſaid, publicly declared afterwards Garnet was legally convicted [f]. The jeſuits have been pleaſed to honour theſe men with the title of martyrs, as if they had ſuffered only in hatred to their religion. But king James's humour and character will not permit it to be thought, that he put men to death only becauſe they were catholics.

Whilſt the parliament was conſidering the powder-plot, it was ſuddenly rumoured that the king was ſtabbed at Oking with a poiſoned knife. This rumour inſtantly threw the people into the utmoſt conſternation, imagining it was the effect of ſome freſh conſpiracy. But the alarm was ſoon over. Two hours after came a certain advice that the king was alive, and he even returned to London that very day, and publiſhed a proclamation to quiet the people. The Spaniſh embaſſador diſtinguiſhed his affection for the king, by preſenting ſir Lewis Lewkenor with a gold chain [g] for bringing him the news of his ſafety.

Mean while, the parliament ſeriouſly applied themſelves to prevent the deſigns of the popiſh recuſants, that is, of ſuch as refuſed to acknowledge the king's independent authority. For the more eaſy diſcovery of ſuch perſons, the two houſes agreed to draw up an oath, which all ſubjects, without exception, ſhould be obliged to take. This oath was called the oath of allegiance, that is, of ſubmiſſion and obedience to the king, as ſovereign, independent of any other power upon earth. It differed from the oath of ſupremacy, as it concerned only the king's temporal ſovereignty, and his independence of the pope; whereas the other, enacted in the reign of Henry VIII. obliged the ſubjects to acknowledge the king for ſupreme head of the church of England. So, every catholic could ſafely take this new oath, unleſs he was one of thoſe who thought, that to be a true catholic it was neceſſary to believe, the pope had power to depoſe kings and give away their dominions. Nay, the king was extremely careful not to have any clauſe inſerted in the oath that might give juſt offence to the catholics. The commons having put in the rough draught of the oath, "That the pope has not power to excommunicate the king:" He ſaid, theſe words might offend his good catholic ſubjects, and it ſufficed to aſſert, the pope's excommunication could not authoriſe ſubjects to riſe againſt their ſovereign. Here follows the oath which has been, and ſtill is ſpoken of by many, without well knowing what it is.

"I A. B. do truly and ſincerely acknowledge, profeſs, teſtify, and declare in my conſcience before God and the world, that our ſovereign lord king James, is lawful king of this realm, and of all other his majeſty's dominions and countries: and that the pope neither of himſelf, nor by any authority of the church or ſee of Rome, or by any other means with any other, hath any power or authority to depoſe the king, or to diſpoſe of any of his majeſty's kingdoms, or dominions, or to authoriſe any foreign prince to invade or annoy him or his countries, or to diſcharge any of his ſubjects of their allegiance and obedience to his majeſty, or to give licence or leave to any of them to bear arms, raiſe tumults, or to offer any violence or hurt to his majeſty's royal perſon, ſtate, or government, or to any of his majeſty's ſubjects within his majeſty's dominions. Alſo I do ſwear from my heart, that, notwithſtanding any declaration or ſentence of excommunication, or deprivation made or granted, or to be made or granted by the pope, or his ſucceſſors, or by any authority derived, or pretended to be derived from him or his ſee, againſt the ſaid king, his heirs or ſucceſſors, or any abſolution of the ſaid ſubjects from their obedience; I will bear faith and true allegiance to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, and him and them will defend to the uttermoſt of my power, againſt all conſpiracies and attempts whatſoever, which ſhall be made againſt his or their perſons, their crown and dignity, by reaſon or colour of any ſuch ſentence, or declaration, or otherwiſe, and will do this my endeavour to diſcloſe and make known to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, all treaſons and traiterous conſpiracies, which I ſhall know or hear of to be againſt him or any of them. And I do further ſwear, that I do from my heart abhor, deteſt, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and poſition, that princes which be excommunicated or deprived by the pope, may be depoſed and murthered by their ſubjects or any other whatſoever. And I do believe, and in conſcience am reſolved, that neither the pope, nor any perſon whatſoever, hath power to abſolve me of this oath, or any part thereof; which I acknowledge by good and full authority to be lawfully miniſtred unto me, and do renounce all pardons and diſpenſations to the contrary. And all theſe things I do plainly and ſincerely acknowledge and ſwear, according to theſe expreſs words by me ſpoken, and according to the plain and common ſenſe and underſtanding of the ſame words, without any equivocation, or mental evaſion, or ſecret reſervation whatſoever. And I do make this recognition and acknowledgment heartily, willingly, and truly, upon the true faith of a chriſtian.

So help me God."

It is eaſy to ſee this oath contained nothing repugnant to the eſſential articles of the Romiſh faith, and concerned only the unlimited power, which by ſome is aſcribed and by others denied to the pope. Accordingly, moſt of the Engliſh catholics, with the archprieſt Blackwel their ſuperior, made no ſcruple to comply with it. Nay, when Urban VIII. ſent them a brief, dated October 31, 1606 [h], forbidding them to take the oath, they thought the brief was forged by their enemies, to draw them into a non-compliance. But the pope ſpoke more fully the next year, and by a ſecond brief plainly told them, if they took the oath they forfeited all hopes of ſalvation. At the ſame time, cardinal Bellarmine under the feigned name of Tortus, wrote a book againſt the oath, and a letter to the archprieſt Blackwel, to admoniſh him to repent, as if in taking the oath he had committed the moſt heinous offence. This occaſioned king James's apology for himſelf, publiſhed ſome time after, with a preamble, addreſſed to all chriſtian princes, wherein he cleared himſelf from the falſe imputation of being a perſecutor of the catholics. He began the apology with juſtifying queen Elizabeth's conduct to the Romaniſts, after which he added the following words:

"But now having ſacrificed (if I may ſo ſay) to the manes of my late predeceſſor, I may next with St. Paul juſtly vindicate mine own fame, from thoſe innumerable calumnies ſpread againſt me, in teſtifying the truth of my behaviour toward the papiſts: wherein I may truly affirm, that whatſoever was her juſt and merciful government over the papiſts in her time, my government over them ſince hath ſo far exceeded her's in mercy and clemency, as not only the papiſts themſelves grew to that height of pride, in confidence of my mildneſs, as they did directly expect and aſſuredly promiſe to themſelves liberty of conſcience, and equality with other of my ſubjects in all things; but even a number of the beſt and faithfulleſt of my ſaid ſubjects were caſt in great fear and amazement of my courſe and proceedings, ever prognoſticating and juſtly ſuſpecting that ſour fruit to come of it, which ſhewed itſelf clearly in the powder treaſon. How many did I honour with knighthood, of known and open recuſants? How indifferently did I give audience and acceſs to both ſides, beſtowing equally all favours and honours on both profeſſions? How free and continual acceſs had all ranks and degrees of papiſts in my court and company? And above all, how frankly and freely did I free recuſants of their ordinary payments? Beſides, it is evident, what

[e] Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, were executed at the weſt end of St. Paul's church, January 30; and the next day, Thomas Winter, Ambroſe Rookwood, Robert Keyes, and Guy Fawkes, ſuffered the puniſhment of traitors, in the Old Palace-yard at Weſtminſter. State trials, vol. I. The attainders of them, and reſt of their accomplices, were confirmed in this parliament. See Statut. 3. Jac. c. 2.

[f] Garnet owned upon his trial, that Cateſby told him of the plot only in general terms, and Teſmond, "ſubſigillo confeſſionis," proteſted he had diſſuaded it, and prayed againſt it, and made no queſtion but God heard his prayer. He had, it ſeems, by the cunning of his keepers, divers conferences with Hall, his brother prieſt, in the Tower, which were over-heard by ſpies ſet on purpoſe. Being charged with this, "he proteſted upon his ſoul and ſalvation, there had no ſuch conferences paſſed. But being confronted with Hall, he was driven to confeſs. And being aſked how he could ſalve this leud perjury? He anſwered, "ſo long as he thought they had no proof, he was not bound to accuſe himſelf, but when he ſaw they had proof, ſtood no longer in it." And then fell into a large defence of equivocations. See Winwood's Mem. vol. II. p. 26.—He was arraigned at the Guild-hall in London, March 28, and hanged at the weſt-end of St. Paul's, May 3. State Trials, vol. I.

[g] Of ſixſcore pounds. Winwood's Mem. vol. II. p. 205.

[h] It is dated the 10th of the kalends of October 1606. Apology, p. 252.

ſtrait order was given out of my mouth to the judges to ſpare the execution of all prieſts (notwithſtanding their conviction), joining thereunto a gracious proclamation, whereby all prieſts that were at liberty, and not taken, might go out of the country by ſuch a day: my general pardon having been extended to all convicted prieſts in priſon; whereupon they were ſet at liberty as good ſubjects: and all prieſts that were taken after, ſent over and ſet at liberty there. But time and paper will fail me to make enumeration of all the benefits and favours that I beſtowed in general and particular upon papiſts: in recounting whereof, every ſcrape of my pen would ſerve but for a blot of the pope's ingratitude and injuſtice, in meeting me with ſo hard a meaſure for the ſame."

All the king ſaid in this part of his apology was very true. But it is ſurpriſing, that ſince he thought proper to make a long apology to clear himſelf to foreign princes from the aſperſion of being an enemy to the papiſts, he ſhould never think of excuſing to his own ſubjects his too great condeſcenſion to theſe ſame papiſts, and his extreme care to hinder the execution of the laws enacted againſt them. There is another very extraordinary particular in this apology. The king evidently ſhews that cardinal Bellarmine confounds in his book the oath of allegiance with that of ſupremacy, whereby it was manifeſt he did not underſtand the point in diſpute [i]. But I have ſaid enough of this ſubject; I ſhall only add, to conclude what relates to the powder-plot, that the parliament appointed the 5th of November to be a public thankſgiving-day for ſo great a deliverance, which day has been conſtantly ſolemniſed to this preſent time.

The common danger which threatened the whole kingdom, ſtifled for a time the diſputes between the king and the commons, which aroſe in the firſt ſeſſion of the parliament. The commons were ſo far from intending to revive them, that on the contrary, to gain the king's good-will, they granted him one of the largeſt ſubſidies that had ever been given to his predeceſſors in the moſt urgent occaſions of the ſtate, though he was then in profound peace, and wanted money only to enrich his favourites. This aid conſiſted of three whole ſubſidies and ſix fifteenths and tenths, beſides four ſubſidies of four ſhillings in the pound granted at the ſame time by the clergy [k]. But the affair of the union of the two kingdoms was deferred to the next ſeſſion. So the king, having no farther occaſion for the parliament, prorogued it from the 27th of May to the 18th of November [l].

The conſternation cauſed by the powder-plot in the court and the whole kingdom, was at length turned into a pleaſing tranquillity. The king and people were equally pleaſed with being delivered from ſo great a danger; and the king had the more reaſon to be ſo, as he had brought the parliament to be of his moderate ſentiments with reſpect to the Roman catholics, of whom ten only had been left to the rigour of the law. Their yoke was not aggravated, unleſs the obligation of bearing allegiance to their king, or departing the realm, was to be deemed an aggravation. On the other hand, the king was able to gratify his favourites by means of the money granted by parliament, and the whole court rejoiced, every one expecting to partake of the king's bounties.

This money came very ſeaſonably to the king to give a ſplendid reception to his brother-in-law the king of Denmark, who arrived ſhortly after on purpoſe to viſit the queen his ſiſter, and the king [m]. No coſt was ſpared on this occaſion, to demonſtrate the king's and queen's affection for this prince, and to ſhew him the riches of the kingdom they had acquired. During his ſtay in England, there was one continued, though various, ſcene of diverſions, as plays, fights, entertainments [n], balls, maſquerades, hunting; in a word, every thing that was thought proper to divert him.

Some time after, the prince of Vaudemont, the duke of Lorrain's third ſon, made the king another ſuch viſit, attended by ſeven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and ſix ſcore domeſtics. He ſtayed a fortnight with the king, by whom he was with his whole train royally entertained. Theſe two viſits conſumed good part of the money lately granted by parliament [o].

The ſeſſion of the parliament, which began the 18th of November, was chiefly employed in the affair of the union, which the king ſtrongly ſollicited. Sir Francis Bacon, the king's ſollicitor, was ordered to move and ſupport it with the beſt arguments he could deviſe. But though he was learned and eloquent, he met in the houſe of commons with perſons able to withſtand him, and to allege as ſtrong reaſons againſt, as he did for, the union. The chief objections were, the inequality between the ſtate and riches of the two kingdoms, the difference of the laws and cuſtoms, and Scotland's perpetual alliance with France. But the moſt prevailing argument, though it was not publicly inſiſted upon, was the jealouſy of the Engliſh, which baffled all Bacon's rhetoric [p].

[1607] The king hearing the affair was not like to ſucceed in the parliament, ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, and endeavoured in a long ſpeech to ſhew the neceſſity of the union, and the common advantage it would procure. He anſwered the objections alleged in the two houſes, ſpeaking one while with great mildneſs, another while with a menacing tone, turning himſelf every way to attain his ends. He ſaid, it was not reaſonable the Engliſh and Scots ſhould conſider one another as enemies, whilſt ſubjects of the ſame king, and conſequently it was neceſſary all hoſtile laws ſhould ceaſe, meaning the laws made from time to time upon the frequent invaſions of the Scots on the borders of England. He added, it was no leſs reaſonable, there ſhould be between the two nations community of commerce, ſince he was no ſtranger, but deſcended from the antient kings of England, and could not be natural liege-lord to both, whilſt they were ſtrangers to one another. Finally, it was againſt nature, for people who lived under the ſame dominion, to be no more united than Frenchmen and Spaniards.

He then proceeded to a nice point, as he had himſelf determined a thing which properly belonged to the cognizances of the parliament. He ſaid, he was informed by the judges there was a difference between the Ante-nati and Poſt-nati of each kingdom; that is, between ſuch as were born before, and ſuch as were born after, his acceſſion to the crown of England. That therefore he had publiſhed a proclamation, declaring all thoſe to be naturalized in both kingdoms who were born ſince his acceſſion. That indeed he confeſſed the judges might err, but admoniſhed both houſes, "to beware to diſgrace, either his proclamations or the judges, for ſo they might diſgrace both their king and the laws, who have power, when the parliament is done, to try both their lands and lives."

In anſwering the objection taken from the perpetual alliance between France and Scotland, he affirmed, the alliance was not between the two nations, but only between their kings. I do not know whether this was really fact.

He concluded his ſpeech with ſaying, "What is now deſired hath often before been ſought, and not obtained; to refuſe it now then were double iniquity. And for their ſecurity in ſuch reaſonable points of reſtriction, which he ſhall agree to, they need not doubt his inclination; for (added he), I will not ſay any thing which I will not promiſe, nor promiſe any thing which I will not ſwear; what I ſwear, I will ſign, and what I ſign, I ſhall, with God's grace, ever perform."

The earneſtneſs which the king expreſſed for the union of the two kingdoms, was not capable of prevailing with the parliament, ſo inconvenient was it thought. All he could obtain was the repealing of the hoſtile laws. So the union was rejected, without any mention however of the proclamation concerning the Poſt-nati. But by not approving it, the parliament did in effect reject it, ſince a proclamation in England is not conſidered as a law. Nevertheleſs, two years after, the king cauſed the ſame thing to be determined by the judges of the realm, though this determination was of no more force than the proclamation [q].

The ill ſucceſs of this affair extremely troubled the king.

[i] Bellarmine, in his anſwer to king James's Apology, took the opportunity of diſcovering, that his majeſty had formerly wrote a letter to pope Clement VII. and thereupon upbraided him with inconſtancy. See Spotiſ. p. 507.

[k] The whole was payable at eleven ſeveral payments, and amounted to the ſum of 453,000l. In the ſeventh year of this reign there was granted by the laity throughout all England, one entire ſubſidy, and one fifteenth and tenth. For the ſubſidy, there was paid into the exchequer by the collectors 69,666l. and ſo by eſtimation a ſubſidy is valued. One fifteenth and tenth of the laity comes to 36,000l. Truth brought to Light, p. 10, 70, 71. where the reader may ſee what each county paid towards a ſubſidy. As for fifteenths and tenths, every city, hundred, town and village, were to pay in no more than they were chargeable by the antient roll and tax ſet upon them, ſo that their payments were certain. Ibid. Hence it appears alſo, the clergy's four ſubſidies of four ſhillings in the pound, amounted to 25,002l. for ſo much remained after the laity's three ſubſidies and ſix fifteenths and tenths are ſubſtracted from the whole ſum of 453,000l.

[l] The acts made in this parliament were: 1. An act for the better diſcovering and repreſſing popiſh recuſants. 2. Another to prevent the dangers which may grow by popiſh recuſants. 3. An act to reform the multitudes and miſdemeanors of attorneys and ſollicitors, and to avoid unneceſſary ſuits and charges in law. 4. One for the recovering of ſmall debts, and for the relieving of poor debtors in London.

[m] He came to England July 17, and went back Auguſt 14. Howes's Contin. of Stow, p. 885---888.

[p] The reader may ſee in Wilſon's hiſtory, the chief arguments for and againſt the union, p. 667—679.

[q] The king obtained a judgment in Weſtminſter-hall, in a caſe called Cal-

In his firſt ſpeech to the parliament, he called ſuch as were againſt the union of the two kingdoms, blind, ignorant, reſtleſs, and diſaffected; and affirmed, no honeſt ſubject whatever was leſs glad of this union than himſelf. But he now found the lords and commons againſt it, and this caſt a ſort of ridicule upon his too haſty judgment. From thenceforward he always appeared very averſe to parliaments; as on the other hand, the people began to diſlike him. They could not ſee without grief ſo many proclamations, which ſeemed to ſuppoſe the king's will to be the ſole rule of the government. The king's needleſs expences were another cauſe of complaint, becauſe they were compared with queen Elizabeth's frugality and good management. It was conſidered, the three hundred thouſand pounds received by the king at his coming, with what was lately granted by the parliament and clergy, ſerved only to enrich his favourites and miniſters. All this began to form a cloud, which perhaps would have been followed by a ſtorm, had not the king, on the 4th of July, prorogued the parliament to the 16th of November, and afterwards to the 9th of February [q].

Before the parliament was prorogued, there were ſome commotions in Northamptonſhire [r], where the country people roſe in arms, under the conduct of one John Reynolds, who ſtiled himſelf captain Pouch [s]; but theſe troubles were ſhortlived; the ſheriff of the county found means to diſperſe the rebels, without the aſſiſtance of any regular troops.

The earl of Tiroen, the famous Iriſh rebel, pardoned by queen Elizabeth, was brought to London the beginning of this reign by the lord Montjoy, and preſented to the king, who received him very graciouſly. Shortly after, he returned to his native country, where he could not live in peace. He not only attempted once more to raiſe a rebellion in Ireland, but alſo applied to foreign princes for aſſiſtance. His ſecret practices not ſucceeding to his expectation, he was afraid of being apprehended, and choſe to leave Ireland, taking with him the earl of Tirconnel, whom he had drawn into his plots [t]. When he was come to a place of ſafety, he gave out, that the outrages committed in Ireland upon the catholics, had conſtrained him to forſake his eſtate and country. But the king repelled this aſperſion by a ſort of apology publiſhed on the occaſion, not enduring that the world ſhould think him a perſecutor of the catholics.

In the beginning of the year, the archduke and the infanta his ſpouſe, ſent into Holland father Ney, provincial of the order of St. Francis, to propoſe a peace with the ſtates of the United Provinces. Ney lying concealed for a time at Ryſwick, was at laſt admitted to audience by prince Maurice, who told him plainly, there was no hopes of a peace, unleſs the United Provinces were owned for a free and independent ſtate. This declaration obliged the father to return to Bruſſels, from whence he came ſome time after, with a writing ſigned by the archduke and the infanta, with which the ſtates were ſatisfied, provided it was ratified by the king of Spain, which ratification Ney undertook to procure. Henry IV. hearing what was tranſacting at the Hague, diſpatched preſident Jeannin to offer his mediation to the ſtates, which was accepted. But as they feared to create jealouſy in king James, if France alone was concerned in the affair, they wrote to him for his advice and aſſiſtance, and ſhortly after, ſent an embaſſador to inform him more particularly of the ſituation of their affairs. Mean while, the king of Spain's ratification being come, the ſtates found it full of equivocal and captious expreſſions, which gave them occaſion to require explanations. This prolonged the negotiation, the ſucceſs whereof ſhall be related hereafter [u].

[1608] April 11, George Gervis, a ſeminary prieſt of Rheis, was hanged at Tyburn; and the 23d of June, Thomas Garnet, a jeſuit, had the ſame fate. Garnet was offered a pardon, provided he would take the oath of allegiance, which he reſolutely refuſed.

Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, and lord treaſurer, dying ſuddenly as he was ſitting at the council-table, Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, ſucceeded him in his poſt. He was a lord of a great genius, and though crooked before and behind, nature ſupplied that defect with noble endowments of mind.

The chief concern of the miniſters was to ſee that the king did not want money. He had occaſion for great ſums, being extremely liberal, or rather prodigal [w]; and it may well be thought, that in procuring money for the king, the miniſters did not forget themſelves. But this is ſo cuſtomary a thing with favourites and miniſters, that it would be wrong to upbraid theſe with it in particular. As to foreign affairs, they were little regarded throughout this whole reign.

One of the propereſt means deviſed to procure the king money, was the monopoly of the ſale of cloths, at the ſollicitation of a certain merchant, who, in all appearance, dearly purchaſed his patent. At this time, the Engliſh were not ſkilled in the art of dreſſing and dying Engliſh woollen manufactures. They ſent them into Holland white, and the Hollanders, after they had dyed them, ſent them back, and ſold them in England. The merchant I juſt mentioned, intimating to the king and miniſtry that a great profit would accrue to England if the cloths were dreſſed at home, obtained a patent to dreſs and dye them, excluſive of all others. Then the king publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all perſons to ſend any white cloths abroad: whereupon the Hollanders prohibited the importation of dyed cloths from England. So the merchant who obtained the patent, not being able to ſell his dyed cloths any where but in England, was forced to dreſs and dye only a ſmall quantity. This raiſed ſuch clamours amongſt the cloth-weavers, that the king was obliged to permit the exportation of a certain quantity of white cloths. At length, the court by degrees connived at the offenders, and the woollen-trade continued upon the ſame foot as before [x].

The ſame year, the king ingroſſed to himſelf the ſelling of allum, which had been lately found out in England, and prohibited the importation of foreign allum by proclamation [y].

Whether the king intended to be revenged of the Hollanders for breaking his meaſures, with reſpect to the woollen manufactures, or only to draw money from them, a proclamation was publiſhed, prohibiting all foreign nations to fiſh on the coaſts of Great Britain. This occaſioned the next year a treaty, whereby the Hollanders engaged to pay an annual ſum for leave to fiſh. The king would have afterwards broke the treaty, and taken from them the licence he had granted them; but they maintained their privilege againſt his conſent, by guarding their fiſhing-boats with men of war. James, being a pacific prince, did not think this a ſufficient motive to quarrel with them.

Archbiſhop Bancroft never ceaſed to plague the puritans, to oblige them to conform to the church of England. For that reaſon, great numbers of theſe people reſolved to go and ſettle in Virginia, diſcovered in the late reign by Sir Walter Raleigh. Accordingly, ſome departed for that country; but the archbiſhop ſeeing many more ready to take the ſame voyage, obtained a proclamation, enjoining them not to go without the king's expreſs licence. The court was apprehenſive this ſect would become in the end too numerous and powerful in America. This very year the archbiſhop made a freſh attempt concerning the twenty-one articles formerly mentioned: but the oppoſition of the judges was ſo ſtrong, vin's caſe, that the Poſt-nati in Scotland, after the king's aſſumption to the crown of England, were free to purchaſe and inherit therein. Rog. Coke, p. 62. This caſe (ſays Wilſon) was reported by lord chief juſtice Coke, who was fit metal for any ſtamp-royal, and adjudged by him, the lord chancellor Elleſmere, and moſt of the judges of the kingdom, in the Exchequer chamber, though many ſtrong and valid arguments were brought againſt it: ſuch power is in the breath of kings! and ſuch ſoft ſtuff are judges made of, that they can model their precedents into as many ſhapes as they pleaſe! Wilſon, p. 680.

But by reaſon of the Hollanders prohibition, and Cockaine's dying and dreſſing cloths worſe and dearer than they were in Holland, infinite numbers of poor people lay idle, and were reduced to a ſtarving condition. So the matter fell to the ground. Coke, p. 70.

that the king, however desirous he was to please the prelate, durst not proceed.

The treaty at the Hague, concerning a peace between the archduke and the states, was an important affair, in which it seemed, the king should have had a great share, and yet he appeared not to be much concerned. However, he made two treaties with the states, the first whereof was concerning the payment of what was due to him; the other contained an alliance, which was not to take place till after they had concluded a peace with Spain [z]. Then he sent Sir Robert Spencer to the Hague, to assist at the negotiations of peace, jointly with Sir Ralph Winwood, his embassador in ordinary. Numberless difficulties occured in the affair, the chief whereof was, that the king of Spain refused to speak plainly with respect to the liberty of the states. He had ratified the archduke's declaration, but it was on condition the peace should be made, and the states would treat only upon the foot of free states. Besides, in the king of Spain's ratification were certain ambiguous expressions, which the states were not pleased with. They knew also, that whilst they were negotiating at the Hague, the Spanish court was endeavouring to gain the king of England, and for that purpose had sent to him Don Fernando de Gironne, a lord of great distinction, as embassador extraordinary. This made the states extremely uneasy, and the more, as James affected on all occasions to intimate, that he looked upon them as rebels. He applied to their case the general maxims of sovereignty, and firmly believed, what he would have had universally thought, that subjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their prince upon any account whatsoever. Hence may be judged what effect his mediation could have. Accordingly his embassadors made a very little figure throughout the whole negotiation. Jeannin managed every thing, the English embassador acting but faintly, and shewing little or no desire that the treaty should succeed.

What endeavours soever Jeannin might use, it was not possible for him to cause the parties to consent to a peace. And therefore he proposed at least a twelve or fifteen years truce, during which both parties should remain in possession of what they held without prejudice to their rights. But the states rejected it, unless their liberty was plainly established. Whereupon the embassadors of Spain and the archduke withdrew, as seeing no likelihood of peace or truce. However, Jeannin continued his instances to persuade the states to accept of the ratification as it was, and consent to some other articles, on which there had been great debates. At length, by his many representations, he obtained of the United Provinces, Zealand excepted, which stood out till the next year, what he desired to accomplish for the conclusion of the truce.

King James did not gain much credit by this negotiation. Besides his leaving every thing to the king of France, he acted not with sincerity, if we may believe president Jeannin, who in a letter to the king his master on this occasion, speaking of king James, says, "He pretends a willingness to procure a peace, and yet obstructs it, by publicly saying, he cannot forbear condemning the states for rebelling against the king of Spain their sovereign." Indeed, Richardot did not scruple to own in a letter to Jeannin, that the king of Spain's firmness was entirely owing to the king of England's promise, that the liberty of the states should not be mentioned in the treaty of truce [a]. Henry IV. had no great opinion of James, as appears from his writing to Jeannin, "that he knew what "that—was capable of, but however it did not break his rest."

[1609] The province of Zealand, resolving to follow the sentiment of the other provinces, the conferences were renewed at Antwerp, where a twelve years truce was signed, April the 9th, 1609. By the truce, the states obtained that the king of Spain and the archduke owned them as free and independent, and even avoided the renouncing the navigation and trade to the Indies, which had been a principal obstacle to the negotiation.

James discovered no satisfaction at the advantage obtained by the states, because he considered it as a precedent very dangerous and prejudicial to the sovereign authority of kings, with which he was ever extremely possessed. This evidently appeared at present, by his licensing two books, which maintained the most extravagant maxims of arbitrary power. The first, wrote by Cowel, doctor of civil-law [b], laid down these three principles:

1. That the king was not bound by the law, or his coronation-oath.

2. That the king was not obliged to call a parliament to make laws, but might do it alone by his absolute power.

3. That it was a great favour to admit the consent of the subjects in giving subsidies.

The other book was composed by Dr. Blackwood a clergyman, who laid down this principle, that the English were all slaves by reason of the Norman conquest.

The parliament which met the next year, took this affair to heart, and would have severely punished the authors of these books; but the king interposed, and frustrated the parliament's design, by publishing a proclamation, to forbid the reading of these books, and to order the copies to be delivered to the magistrates. But such proclamations are usually ill obeyed, especially when it is not the king's interest to see them strictly executed [c].

[1610] The king's proceedings increased the discontent of most of the English. The proclamations which were every day published, and whereof several were upon subjects not used to be decided by the former kings without the concurrence of the parliament, and the indiscreet speeches of the courtiers, who rallied the people's privileges, bred suspicions and jealousies, which the king was not careful enough to stifle in their birth. On the other hand, his condescension for the Roman catholics, whose cause he espoused on all occasions, their access and credit at court, even to their being admitted into the most important offices and into the ministry itself, created fears in the people, and caused them to suspect some plot was formed against the protestant religion. The ministers knowing these dispositions, were justly apprehensive of meeting great difficulties in the parliament, which was to sit the 9th of February. The king intended to procure money, of which he was in great want, though he had no war upon his hands, nor any affair which seemed to require an extraordinary aid. It was therefore necessary at least to give the parliament good words, and try to palliate his immense expences since his accession to the crown. But James believing it to be derogatory to the dignity of a sovereign, to make an apology himself to his subjects, ordered the earls of Suffolk and Salisbury to do it for him.

The earl of Salisbury, who was the spokesman, declared to both houses, "That they were met, first to supply his majesty's wants; secondly, to redress the people's grievances." Then he told them, "that the king, willing to shew them a singular mark of his favour, had resolved to create his eldest son prince Henry prince of Wales during the session of parliament, though he was free to do it at any other time, as by many precedents was evident." Having thus endeavoured to gain the king the good-will of both houses by so strong an argument of his majesty's regard for them, he demonstrated, "it was not without just reasons that the king demanded money, since what he had received had been laid out in very necessary expences: first, as for the three hundred and fifty thousand pounds due in the late queen's time, he no sooner received the money with one hand, but he paid it away with the other, in redeeming the crown-lands she had mortgaged to the city of London [d]. Secondly, He was forced to keep on foot for some time an army of nineteen thousand men in Ireland, not deeming it proper to make peace with Spain, without sword in hand. Thirdly, he was obliged to bury queen Elizabeth, whose funeral was very expenfive [e]. Fourthly, His own journey from Edinburgh to London could not be performed without money; for it would not have been decent for a king to come the firſt time to his kingdom like a private perſon, and without a numerous train. Fifthly, Neither was it fit that his royal conſort, with his children, the kingdom's future hopes, ſhould be expoſed to robbers, without a guard and retinue, and conſequently their journey muſt have been very chargeable. Sixthly, The king of Denmark's viſit was ſo honourable to his majeſty, that he could not diſpenſe with giving him a ſuitable and magnificent reception. Seventhly, The embaſſadors who came from all parts to congratulate him upon his acceſſion to the crown of England, could not be ſent back without preſents for the honour of the Engliſh nation, beſides the charge to entertain them during their ſtay [f]. Eighthly, The king was obliged to ſend embaſſadors to the princes by whom he was congratulated, and to return their civilities [g]."

[z] These two treaties bear date June 26. The sums due from the states to king James, are in the former treaty computed at eight hundred and eighteen thousand four hundred and eight pounds sterling. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 674.

[a] The earl of Salisbury, in a letter to sir Ralph Winwood, of the 23d of December 1608, clears the king from this imputation. And in another letter of the 1st of January 1608-9, to sir Charles Cornwallis, then embassador in Spain, he tells him, "That Richardot had reported he was the person that had given this promise to Spain. And adds, I am sure you never received any such direction from me, that am appointed your principal correspondent, for his majesty is so much persuaded of your faith and discretion, that you will not intermeddle in any thing beyond the scope of your direction." In another letter of the 27th of January 1608-9, to the same sir Charles, the earl says, "Richardot does not directly clear you, and cast the imputation upon the Spanish embassador, who should have given such hopes by letters, as having received them from the mouth of us that are of his majesty's council. But the embassador being challenged, did protest to the contrary, with all the vows that may be. So we see it was a device set on foot at Brussels, to colour the delays from Spain, and to save themselves from being disavowed in their proceedings." See the Collection of State Papers in the reign of James I. p. 469, 472, 474, where it seems to be plain that it was all a fiction of Richardot's to serve his master's turn.

[b] Cowel was not a clergyman (as Rapin, by mistake, says), but doctor and professor of civil law in Cambridge, and vicar-general to archbishop Bancroft. He published a book called the Interpreter, containing the signification of such words and terms as are mentioned in the law-writers and statutes. It was printed at Cambridge, first in quarto, in the year 1607. It hath been enlarged and reprinted in folio; but in all the later editions, the dubious and offensive passages have been corrected or omitted.

Theſe were the cauſes, according to the orator, of the king's wants, and not, as ſome affected to give out, his indiſcreet bounty to his ſervants. "But (added he) how could a bounty ſo worthy of a king be blamed? If he did not give to his ſervants, they would be miſerable in a country abounding with riches. As for the Scots, it muſt be remembered, that though they were not born in the kingdom, his majeſty was born among them; and not to have them taſte of the bleſſing he had attained, were to have him change his virtue with his fortune. Upon all theſe accounts his majeſty deſires the commons to ſupply his wants, which mark of eſteem could not be denied to a king, who is not only the wiſeſt of kings, but the very image of an angel, that has brought good tidings to the Engliſh, and ſecured them in the enjoyment of perfect happineſs; to a king who, by his vaſt knowledge and noble endowments, deſerves the title of Defender of the Faith; to a king, who has ſhut the back door by which England was liable to invaſions, and who only ſeeks that every man may live happy under his own olive. That none will wonder or ſtartle at the king's deſiring a ſupply, but ſuch as ſtudy to ſerve their own turns, and believe nothing but what they find written in the ſtories of their own ignorance. Among whom are to be reckoned thoſe, who hearing of an order to bind up the printed proclamations in a book, that the better notice may be taken of the things contained in them, have ſpread a report that the king intended this parliament to make proclamations equal to the laws, which never entered into his thoughts. That ſo far is he from governing by will and pleaſure, that he is ready to hearken to any motion from the two houſes, provided they keep a juſt proportion, and obſerve what is due to a great and gracious king."

This ſpeech produced not the effect hoped by the king and his miniſters. Some of the commons loudly complained of the king's prodigality and exceſſive bounty to the Scots [h]: they ſaid, the whole wealth of England would not ſerve to ſatisfy their avidity; that ſince the king's acceſſion, gold and ſilver were as common in Edinburgh as ſtones in the ſtreets, and that all the riches of England flowed thither, where they were ſwallowed up as in a gulph, and never returned. Others ſaid, it was viſible the king was gradually undermining the nation's privileges by continual incroachments; that he deſigned to eſtabliſh the civil law in the room of the common law, and had dropped ſome expreſſions to that purpoſe at his own table: finally, he had approved of a book lately written, the deſign whereof was to render the common law contemptible.

But what made moſt noiſe in the lower houſe was the high commiſſion, which exerciſed in the kingdom a kind of inquiſition for matters of religion and ſtate. For the better underſtanding this cauſe of complaint, it muſt be remembered that when Henry VIII. was declared ſupreme head of the church of England, he appointed Cromwell for his vicegerent in religious affairs, with power to exerciſe the ſupremacy in his name. After the tragical end of this firſt and only vicegerent, this office was executed by commiſſioners; and this is what was called the high commiſſion, which continued during the lives of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. and ceaſing in Mary's reign, was revived by Elizabeth: in her reign the high commiſſion exerciſed its authority with great moderation. But the caſe was otherwiſe under James I. This prince, as I have frequently obſerved, mortally hated the puritans; and after his proclamation for uniformity, it was the high commiſſion's buſineſs to ſee his injunctions executed. It may be eaſily gueſſed that the commiſſioners, who were all named by the king, were not favourable to the puritans; accordingly they very rigorouſly exerciſed their power. Had they ſtopped there, this ſeverity upon a ſet of obſtinate people, as they were reckoned, and whoſe number was ſmall in compariſon of the epiſcopalians, would not have excited the complaints of the lower houſe. But they went much farther. I have obſerved, that becauſe the puritans were againſt the hierarchy, the king inferred they were alſo againſt monarchy, and there were but too many who laboured to confirm him in that notion. For this reaſon, all who were not very ſubmiſſive to the king's orders, or great aſſertors of the privileges of the people, were affectedly called puritans [i]. Under that pretence the high commiſſion proceeded againſt them, and wanted not means to moleſt them. Thus, to be really a proteſtant and member of the church of England, communicating in that church, and complying with the external worſhip, were not ſufficient, the king's authority was alſo to be acknowledged as extenſive as his flatterers were pleaſed to make it. They who ventured to cenſure his conduct and queſtion his unlimited power, were deemed infected with puritaniſm, and to reaſon upon puritannical principles. So, there were then two ſorts of puritans, church-puritans and ſtate-puritans. But the high commiſſion affected to confound them one with another, in order to exerciſe authority upon both. This was the occaſion of the complaints in the houſe of commons.

The king being informed of what was talked in the parliament, ſent for both houſes to Whitehall, and endeavoured to ſhew he was unjuſtly complained of. But withal he intimated, by ſome expreſſions which plainly diſcovered his ſentiments, that if he did not rule with an abſolute ſway, it was not for want of power, but entirely owing to his equity.

He told them, "Though the king's heart be in the hands of the Lord, yet he will ſet it before the eyes of the people; aſſuring them, that he never meant to govern by any law, but the law of the land; though it be diſputed among them, as if he had an intention to alter the law, and govern by the abſolute power of a king. He knew, he ſaid, the power of kings, reſembling it to the power divine: for as God can create and deſtroy, make and unmake at his pleaſure, ſo kings can give life and death, judge all, and be judged of none. They can exalt low things, and abaſe high things, making the ſubjects like men at cheſs, a pawn to take a biſhop [k]. And when he had raiſed the king's power to the height, with, Ye are gods, he brings them down again with, They ſhall die like men: and that all kings, who are not tyrants or perjured, will bound themſelves within the limits of their laws; and they that perſuade them the contrary, are vipers and peſts both againſt them and the commonwealth. Yet as it is blaſphemy to diſpute what God may do, ſo it is ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute what a king may do in the height of his power. And as he will not have his ſubjects diſcourſe of what he may, ſo he will do nothing but what ſhall be conſonant to law and reaſon." Then he ſtrives to mitigate the ſharpneſs of the words dropped from him at his table, to the diſparagement of the common law, on which he beſtows very high encomiums; but recalling himſelf, he points out ſome corruptions in it [l].

"After which, he addreſſed himſelf to the houſe of commons, and not only thanks them for the bonfire they made of certain papers, which were preſented as grievances from ſome diſcontented murmuring ſpirits; inſtructing them how to receive ſuch grievances hereafter: in which he would have them careful to avoid three things.

"The firſt, That they meddle not with the main points of government, that is his craft. To meddle with that were to leſſen him, who hath been thirty years at the trade in Scotland, and ſerved an apprenticeſhip of ſeven years here in England.

"Secondly, He would not have ſuch antient rights as he hath received from his predeceſſors accounted grievances;

[k] But the king left out the power of a pawn to take a queen, or check a king. Wilſon.

[l] He wiſhed that three things eſpecially were reformed in the common law: 1. That it were written in the vulgar tongue, and made plain to the people's underſtanding. 2. That it might have a ſettled text in all caſes, and the expoſition of it were fixed by act of parliament. 3. That the divers contrary reports and precedents, and the ſeveral ſtatutes and acts of parliament that croſſed one another, might be reviewed and reconciled. See Wilſon, 684.

that were to judge him unworthy to enjoy what they left him.

"And laſtly, That they ſhould be careful not to preſent that for a grievance, which is eſtabliſhed by a law; for it is very undutiful in ſubjects to preſs their king wherein they are ſure to be denied. Complaints may be made unto them of the high-commiſſioners, let the abuſe appear then, and ſpare not: there may be errors among them; but to take away the commiſſion, is to derogate from him; and it is now in his thoughts to rectify it in a good proportion.

"Then he ſhews the emergent cauſe of his great expences, ſince his coming to the crown, which makes him deſire a ſupply from them. And if they refuſe to grant it him, his reputation will ſuffer at home and abroad; for the world will think it want of love in them, or merit in him; that both leſſened their hearts, and tied up their hands towards him."

There was need of no great penetration to perceive in the king's ſpeech, the maxims on which he pretended to have a right to govern the Engliſh nation, and his idea of monarchy in all countries without diſtinction. He ſpoke ſo plainly, that it would have been difficult not to underſtand him. If it was ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute about the extent of the regal power, it neceſſarily followed, the king might do any thing; and if he ruled not like a tyrant, it was not for want of power, but entirely owing to his juſtice and clemency. In ſhort, if the whole ſpeech be examined, there is ſcarce a word but what tends, either plainly or ambigouſly, to eſtabliſh in the king an abſolute and deſpotic power. The Engliſh had not been uſed to hear their kings ſpeak in this manner. Henry VIII. the moſt arbitrary of all, managed the parliament, in order to procure acts in favour of the ſovereign, but never pretended to eſtabliſh his authority upon ſuch principles. So, the commons, evidently perceiving what the king had in his thoughts, reſolved ſtrenuouſly to oppoſe his deſigns. But it was not yet a proper ſeaſon to begin: ſuch great bodies require time to form and execute their projects. They feigned therefore to take no notice of the maxims the king would have eſtabliſhed, and granted a ſubſidy, though a much ſmaller than he expected [m]. This done, the parliament, having ſat till July 23, was prorogued to the 16th of October [n].

Before the end of the ſeſſion, the king created his eldeſt ſon Henry prince of Wales [o], and ſettled his houſhold, ſo that the young prince kept his court at St. James's, whilſt the queen kept her's at Somerſet-houſe, to which ſhe gave the name of Denmark-houſe; but it was called ſo only during her life, and among her own people. Thus the king had three courts to maintain, which was very expenſive.

All the hiſtorians affirm the prince of Wales was of a very different character from that of the king his father. Though he was but ſixteen years old, there appeared in him principles of equity, juſtice, moderation, magnanimity, which ſo gained him the love and eſteem of the Engliſh, that the king could not forbear being jealous. His court was well regulated, no extravagancies or indecencies were ſeen there, except perhaps the too frequent maſquerades, which were then much in vogue, becauſe the queen was paſſionately fond of them. As for the king, it is ſaid he did not ſpend much of his time in ſtate affairs, but entirely truſted to his miniſters. It may be this is a little aggravated, though it is not very unlikely that a prince who was in peace with all the world, and a great lover of books and hunting, ſhould leave common affairs to his miniſters.

Whilſt James lived in profound tranquillity, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon Henry IV.'s grand project to humble the houſe of Auſtria. This houſe daily grew ſo formidable, that it might very juſtly raiſe the jealouſy of the other ſtates. What had lately happened on account of the ſucceſſion of John William duke of Cleves, was a clear evidence how attentive the houſe of Auſtria was to aggrandize itſelf on all ſides. The duke of Cleves dying the 25th of March 1609, his four ſiſters, or their heirs, claimed his inheritance, containing the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, and the earldoms of la Marck, Bergh, Ravenſbergh, and Raveſtein. The chief competitors were, Wolfgang-William, ſon to the duke of Newburgh, John duke of Deuxponts, both of the Palatine family; John Sigiſmund, elector of Brandenburg; Chriſtian II. elector of Saxony; and Charles of Auſtria, marquis of Burgaw. Whilſt theſe princes contended about the ſucceſſion, the emperor Rodolphus II. pretended it was to be committed to his truſt, till the affair was decided. To that purpoſe, he ſent his orders to Leopold of Auſtria, biſhop of Straſburg, who entering the duchy of Juliers at the head of an army, took the capital city, and left a garriſon in it. This proceeding convincing the elector of Brandenburgh and the duke of Newburgh, that whilſt they were contending about the duke of Cleves's ſucceſſion, they both run the riſk of loſing it, they joined in a league, and taking poſſeſſion of the reſt of the deceaſed duke's dominions, implored the aſſiſtance of France and Holland to ſupport them. Henry IV. who had now made great preparations againſt the houſe of Auſtria, promiſed to aſſiſt them in perſon. At the ſame time, he ordered the troops he had in Holland, to be ready to join him in the duchy of Cleves, and deſired the ſtates to ſend thither alſo prince Maurice, with part of their own forces. But whilſt he was preparing for this expedition, he was murdered by Ravaillac, a frier, in his own coach, in the midſt of Paris [p].

The murderer's confeſſion [q] diſcovered, that this regicide was committed in conſequence of that doctrine of the Romiſh church, which was ſo diſagreeable to king James, and the jeſuits were univerſally believed to be concerned in it. Wherefore James, finding how much it behoved him to remove from his perſon men who held ſo deteſtable a doctrine, iſſued out a freſh proclamation, commanding all jeſuits and prieſts to depart the kingdom, and all recuſants not to come within ten miles of the court. Then he cauſed all his ſubjects to take the oath of allegiance, which the parliament, then ſitting, had firſt taken.

The court of Spain was generally ſuſpected of contriving the king of France's murder; becauſe that prince was known to be making great preparations againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and that houſe was not ſeen to prepare to oppoſe his deſigns. Mean while, whether James did not believe it, or thought it adviſeable to gain the friendſhip of a houſe ſo formidable to the proteſtants, he ſent to Sir Charles Cornwallis [r] his embaſſador to negotiate a marriage between the prince of Wales and the king of Spain's eldeſt daughter [s].

Richard Bancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury, and grand adverſary of the puritans, died about this time. He had procured the king's patent to found a college at Chelſea, for the maintenance of a certain number of able controverſiſts, who were to combat with their ſermons and writings the adverſaries of the church of England, as well puritans as papiſts; but his death put an end to the project [t]. George Abbot, who ſucceeded him, was of a very different character. He was even ſuſpected and accuſed of being a puritan, becauſe he would not, like his predeceſſor, perſecute that ſect, nor blindly follow the maxims of the court with reſpect to government.

The parliament meeting the 16th of October, the commons were in a humour which pleaſed not the king. And therefore he determined to diſſolve the parliament by proclamation the 31ſt of December, having firſt prorogued it [u]. The miniſters finding, by the motions made in the lower [m] They granted him one ſubſidy, which brought into the exchequer 69,666l. and a fifteenth and tenth, which amounted to 36,500l. See Truth brought to Light, p. 10, 70. The clergy granted alſo a ſubſidy. See Stat. 7 Jac. cap. 22.

An act for the due execution of divers laws and ſtatutes againſt rogues, vagabonds, and other lewd and idle perſons; whereby it is provided, that there ſhall be a houſe of correction erected in every county, to ſet ſuch perſons to work. 3. An act to avoid the double payment of debts. See Stat. 7. Jac.

[o] He was knighted before, in 1609. Upon which occaſion the king forgot not to require the aid uſually paid the kings of England upon making their eldeſt ſon a knight. This aid was twenty ſhillings out of every knight's fee; and the ſame out of every twenty pounds worth of lands immediately holden of the king in ſocage; and amounted in all to 21,800l. See Rymer's Fœdera, tom. XVI. p. 678, &c. Declarat. of the Revenue, p. 10.

[t] There is a formal act of parliament in being for the eſtabliſhment of this college. Wilſon, p. 685. Dr. Welwood thinks, archbiſhop Bancroft was not the author, though he might be an encourager of this foundation. Notes on Wilſon, p. 685. The founder was Dr. Sutcliffe dean of Exeter. This college was to conſiſt of a provoſt and twenty fellows, to be choſen by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London, and the vice-chancellors of the two univerſities. Sutcliffe endowed it with 300l. a year, and 4000l. in money. Three of the farms wherewith it was endowed, were afterwards adjudged by a decree in chancery to Mr. Halſey, as heir general to Dr. Sutcliffe. The ſite of this college coming in proceſs of time into the king's hands, it was founded anew for old and diſabled ſoldiers, as it now ſtands. See Fuller, B. X. p. 15, &c. Stow's Survey, vol. I.

[u] It was prorogued to February 9, and not diſſolved till that day, as appears by the Journals of parliament.

There

houſe, that a reſolution was taken to uſe the moſt effectual methods to redreſs the grievances, thought it againſt the king's and their own intereſt, to ſuffer the commons to execute this project. The pretences for diſſolving the parliament ſet forth in the proclamation, were,

"That the king had propoſed many things far differing and ſurpaſſing the graces and favours of former times, both in nature and value, in expectation of a good concluſion of ſome weighty cauſe, which had been there in deliberation, not only for the ſupply of the neceſſities of his majeſty's eſtate, but for the eaſe and freedom of his ſubjects: but theſe being, the two laſt ſeſſions, little taken notice of, and that the members, by reaſon of the length of the parliament, were debarred from the hoſpitality they kept in the country, and that divers ſhires, cities, and boroughs, had been burdened with expence of maintaining their members; for theſe reaſons he diſſolved them." This parliament, being the firſt of this reign, had ſat ſeven years. From its diſſolution to the year 1614, it had been the miniſtry's buſineſs to deviſe ways and means to ſupply the king's wants.

On the 1ſt of September prince Maurice became maſter of Juliers, with the aid brought him by the marſhal de la Chatre from France, and the Engliſh forces that were in the ſervice of the ſtates, under the command of Sir Edward Cecil, the earl of Saliſbury's nephew [w].

[1611] The king being freed from the incumbrance of the parliament, and reſolving never to call another, the courtiers greatly applauded his deſign. An abſolute government was much more for their advantage than a government bounded by the laws, where the king in ſome meaſure depends on the people. The whole court was overjoyed at the king's ſhaking off the troubleſome yoke of a parliament. The three courts were a continued ſcene of mirth and diverſions, and eſpecially the queen's, where ſcarce any thing elſe was regarded. She had her favourites, as the king had his, that is, perſons whoſe avidity was to be ſatisfied [x]. The king however had not yet a favourite, according to the uſual ſenſe of the word, though, whilſt he reigned in Scotland, he had plainly ſhewed he could hardly be without one. Perhaps the ill offices the Engliſh and Scots did one another, had, till now, prevented the king from fixing. Beſides, this prince's taſte was very different from that of moſt others. Neither virtue, nor merit, nor eminent qualities, had any charms for him. He was to be captivated only by ſomething external and dazzling, as youth, gracefulneſs of perſon, fine clothes, and the like. Never was prince ſo much taken with ſuch ſort of outward accompliſhments. I ſpeak upon the teſtimony of the lord Clarendon [y], and ſeveral others, and upon the characters of this prince's favourites as well in England as Scotland, in whom no other merit was ever acknowledged. However, among the Engliſh and Scots who approached the king, there was not yet found any one poſſeſſed of the qualities requiſite to become his favourite. He wanted an unexperienced youth, whom he might mould as he pleaſed. The Engliſh and Scots accounting it a ſort of miracle that he could live ſo long without abandoning himſelf to ſome perſon, ſtrove with emulation to give him a favourite, without his perceiving it, by cauſing all the youths of their nation, whom they thought moſt capable of gaining his heart, to appear in his ſight. But hitherto neither had been able to compaſs their ends. It was not till 1611, that the Scots found means at laſt to gain the advantage of their rivals, giving the king a favourite of their nation.

Robert Carr, a young Scotch gentleman, about twenty years of age, juſt come from learning his exerciſes in France, going to court to wait on the lord Hay, his countryman, to whom he was recommended, that lord had no ſooner caſt his eyes on him, but he imagined him a fit perſon to fix the king's affection. With that view, he reſolved to ſhew him at court, and ſurpriſe the king, by preſenting to him, as by chance, this new object. One day, at a tilting, he choſe Carr to preſent his ſhield and device to the king, according to cuſtom. The king being on horſeback, and Carr advancing to perform his office, his horſe by ſome accident happened to ſtart, throw him down, and broke his leg. The king, ſorry for the misfortune, aſked who the young man was, and hearing his name was Carr, remembered he had had a page of that name in Scotland, which proved to be the ſame. This made him ſtill more concerned for his fall, and was the cauſe of his ordering him to be lodged in the palace, and all poſſible care to be taken of him. The tilting was no ſooner over, but he viſited Carr in his room: the next day he came again. In ſhort, as long as Carr kept his bed, not a day paſſed but the king ſpent an hour or two with him. He found in this young Scot no great depth of learning or experience, yet ſuch a calm outſide, as made him think there might be a fit harbour for his moſt retired thoughts. Wherefore he reſolved to fix his inclination upon this object, hoping to render him, by his inſtructions, as great a man as any of his miniſters. As ſoon as Carr was recovered, the king made him a knight, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, and took the pains himſelf to teach him Latin. In a word, Carr became a perfect favourite. All ſuits, all petitions, were addreſſed to him, and no favours granted but by his means. Happily for him George Hume, earl of Dunbar, a Scotchman, who was very much eſteemed by the king, died about this time. So Carr enjoyed the king's favour without a rival, and was raiſed to the office of lord treaſurer of Scotland, vacant by the death of Dunbar.

The king's new inclination hindered him not from interpoſing in the diſputes cauſed in Holland by the diverſity of opinion upon certain religious points between the Gomariſts and the Arminians or Remonſtrants. Theſe diſputes are ſo well known, that it would be loſt time to explain them. It will ſuffice to relate the occaſion of the king's interpoſing without being applied to, and even with an extraordinary zeal, for the preſervation of orthodoxy in that church, though foreign and preſbyterian.

Franciſcus Gomarus and Jacobus Arminius, both divinity profeſſors in the univerſity of Leyden, had ſome years ſince diſcovered a difference in opinion, concerning abſolute predeſtination, inamiſſability of grace, and ſome other theological points. They begun their diſputes at the end of the laſt century; but the war at that time not permitting people to attend to their controverſy, it was confined to their ſchools till the year 1608. Gomarus followed the opinion of the firſt reformers, and Arminius took a contrary courſe. At laſt, the ſtates of Holland perceiving a ſchiſm was forming in their church, endeavoured to prevent it by means of a conference, which ſerved only to inflame it. The diſputes continued; each ſtrengthened his party; and the ſtates, being then employed in the important affair of the truce, could not attend to this, and prevent its conſequences. Arminius dying in 1608, his diſciples and followers continued the diſpute. At length they preſented to the ſtates a petition, containing the articles of their faith; and as, inſtead of the term Petitioners, they uſed that of Remonſtrants, they were ſo called, and gloried in the name. The Gomariſts preſented likewiſe their petition, ſtyling themſelves Contra-Remonſtrants. For ſome time the two parties were known by no other names; but afterwards that of Contra-Remonſtrants was ſcarce heard of, whilſt Arminius's followers are ſtill called Remonſtrants or Arminians.

Arminius's profeſſorſhip was filled with Conrade Vorſtius, divinity profeſſor at Steinfort, in the county of Bentheim. This divine had publiſhed a treatiſe concerning God, which had ſo excited the Gomariſts againſt him, that he was obliged to clear himſelf in a printed apology from their imputations. But however, before he came to Leyden, he was repreſented as a real ſocinian. In 1611 he was attacked by ſome divines, who offered to ſhew damnable errors both in his treatiſe concerning God, and in his apology. Theſe two books being ſent into England, the king read them, and preſently after ſent to Sir Ralph Winwood, his embaſſador at the Hague, a liſt of the errors he had remarked, ordering him withal to declare to the ſtates, that he was reſolved to publiſh in print, how much he deteſted ſuch abominable errors, and the allowers and tolerators of them. This was directly attacking the ſtates, who had acquitted Vorſtius. The embaſſador preſented therefore on that occaſion a memorial, to which the ſtates returned a modeſt anſwer, though they had reaſon to complain of the haughtineſs the king treated them with. Before the king received the anſwer, he had ordered ſome of Vorſtius's books to be publicly burnt at London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Notwithſtanding all this, Vorſtius was received at Leyden, and the king wrote againſt [z] him to the ſtates with ſo much vehemence, that, in his opinion, burning was too good for him. Nay, he threatened, that in caſe they continued to tolerate that profeſſor, he would cauſe the churches of England and Scotland to withdraw from the communion of that of Holland, and exhort all other reformed churches to follow the example. Winwood, when he delivered this letter, made a ſpeech to the ſtates, wherein he perfectly ſeconded his maſter's intentions.

[w] There were four thouſand Engliſh at this ſiege. Wilſon, p. 683. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 684. Rapin ſays brother, by miſtake, he was ſon of Thomas Cecil earl of Exeter.

[x] Her chief favourite was the elder brother, the earl of Pembroke; and the king's the younger, Philip Herbert, earl of Montgomery. Wilſon, p. 685.

[y] Of all wiſe men living, he was the moſt delighted with handſome perſons and fine clothes. Clarendon, vol. I. p. 9.

[z] The king's ſecond letter was ſent, though not delivered, before Vorſtius was ſettled at Leyden. K. James's Works, p. 358.

King

Though the ſtates of Holland thought it very ſtrange to be thus checked, they believed however it was proper to ſhew a regard to the king of England, though without complying with what he required. To that end, they anſwered the embaſſador, that they had proviſionally ordered, that Vorſtius ſhould forbear the functions of his office till the next aſſembly upon the affair, and in the mean time remain at Leyden only as an inhabitant. Winwood took this anſwer for a denial, and complained in very haughty terms of their little reſpect for the king his maſter. Not long after, the king publiſhed a declaration againſt Vorſtius, wherein he uſes the ſtates of Holland very roughly. Then the ſtates, who were unwilling to quarrel with him, ordered Vorſtius to remove from Leyden to Gouda, where he had another ſettlement provided for him.

It is difficult to gueſs the true cauſe of the king's great zeal on this occaſion. It ſeems, on the contrary, that he ought not, upon many accounts, to have interpoſed in a theological diſpute, about which the ſtates had not aſked his advice, and which concerned a church over which he could not challenge the leaſt juriſdiction. How could he, who in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, called the queſtions about tranſubſtantiation, and the number of the ſacraments, mere ſchool queſtions, how could he, I ſay, account the queſtions concerning grace in Holland, to be of ſo much greater moment? Moreover, he who thought the papiſts might be tolerated in England, provided they behaved like good ſubjects, could not bear that Vorſtius ſhould be tolerated in Holland, or even ſo much as ſuffered to live [a]. Theſe are contradictions which I can only venture to explain by three conjectures: Firſt, As he pretended to be very learned in divinity, he imagined, that having declared for one of the opinions, he was bound in honour to ſupport it. Secondly, Looking upon himſelf ſtill as protector of the ſtates, he had a mind to exert his authority on this occaſion, and oblige them to do as he required. Thirdly, He was willing to favour prince Maurice, who had declared for the Gomariſts againſt the Arminians, who had penſionary Barnevelt at their head. I return to the affairs of England [b].

[1612] The king's fondneſs for his new favourite continually and ſwiftly encreaſed. The favours the king loaded him with, ſeemed to exceed all bounds. Having made him knight, gentleman of the bed-chamber, lord treaſurer of Scotland, he created him, the 25th of March 1612, baron of Branſpeth, and viſcount Rocheſter. A month after, he made him privy counſellor, and then knight of the garter. Every thing at court paſſed through his hands, and whoever deſired any favour of the king, was firſt to make the viſcount Rocheſter his friend. So many favours heaped on the favourite, convinced the miniſters and courtiers it would be in vain to endeavour to ruin him; and even to attempt it, would be very dangerous. So every one reſolved to pay his adorations to the perſon the king was pleaſed to honour. The earl of Saliſbury however, was not pleaſed to be ſurpaſſed by this new-comer, and continually obliged to uſe all his art to find money, in order to ſee it ſhowered on a man whoſe ſervices were yet ſo inconſiderable. All hiſtorians agree, the king was liberal beyond meaſure in his preſents to his young favourite, as if he had been poſſeſſed of an inexhauſtible fountain of treaſure, though he was ever in want. One day, as the ſtory goes, the king having given him an order under his own hand, to receive twenty thouſand pounds at the Exchequer, the lord treaſurer Saliſbury, ſurpriſed at the immenſeneſs of the preſent, conſidering how little money there was then in the treaſury, ſucceſsfully uſed a ſtratagem to demonſtrate to the king the exceſs of his bounty. He ordered the money, all in ſilver, to be laid on four tables in a room of his houſe, and inviting the king to an entertainment, cauſed him to paſs through the room, as by accident. The king failed not, as the lord treaſurer foreſaw, to aſk for what all that money was deſigned; to which Saliſbury careleſly anſwered, it was for the viſcount Rocheſter, according to his majeſty's command. Whether the king underſtood his meaning, or had not conſidered the greatneſs of the preſent, he ſaid, it was too much for one man, and bid the treaſurer give him but five thouſand pounds [c].

It is agreed by all the hiſtorians, that Carr behaved at firſt very wiſely, as favourite. He was neither greedy nor inſolent; he did every one what ſervice he could, and eſpecially the Engliſh, whoſe friendſhip he preferred before that of his countrymen. He had but one Scotch ſervant, and one friend of that nation, a couſin german. This conduct rendered him agreeable to the Engliſh. The prince of Wales alone affected ſometimes to mortify him, becauſe they were both enamoured of the counteſs of Eſſex, who gave the preference to the favourite. This was ſufficient to gain him the prince's enmity, who nevertheleſs would not be revenged of him. He choſe rather to turn into contempt his love for the lady, who, as we ſhall ſee preſently, was not worthy of ſuch a lover. Except this amour, which proved his ruin, the favourite carried himſelf very prudently, being guided by the counſels of Sir Thomas Overbury, a man of parts and great wiſdom, who took care to keep him clear of thoſe rocks, on which favourites ſeldom fail to run.

But though the viſcount Rocheſter carefully avoided being troubleſome, his modeſty ſerved only to inflame the king's deſire, to render him inſtantly rich and powerful. This, added to the many bounties he beſtowed on his courtiers both Engliſh and Scotch, and to the maintenance of three ſeveral courts, threw him perpetually into ſtraits. His miniſters were inceſſantly deviſing means to raiſe money without a parliament, of which he would not hear the leaſt mention. It may be eaſily conceived, theſe means were not all legal, but that many of them occaſioned murmurs among the people; as monopolies, benevolences, and loans. A king of England can very hardly encreaſe his revenue by ſuch methods, without giving his ſubjects cauſe to believe, he intends to encroach upon their privileges, and James was now but too much ſuſpected of ſuch a deſign.

The king to his great misfortune loſt, in May the next year 1613, the earl of Saliſbury, who was perfectly acquainted with the affairs of the ſtate, and genius of the Engliſh. He was a check to the reſt of the miniſters, and hindered them from running upon precipices, the danger whereof they did not know ſo well as he. Moreover, he had a wonderful art of diverting the king himſelf from hurtful reſolutions, though he did not always ſucceed [d]. The earl of Suffolk was made lord treaſurer; but he was very different from the perſon he ſucceeded, both for parts and uprightneſs. Beſides, he had a wife who was very greedy of money, and made no ſcruple to take bribes with both hands.

During the great tranquillity enjoyed by the king, he cauſed the body of the queen his mother to be removed to Henry VII.'s chapel at Weſtminſter from Peterborough, where it was interred at firſt, and had lain ever ſince.

About the middle of the year, Robert Creighton lord Sanquir, a Scotch nobleman, was condemned to be hanged, for hiring two of his countrymen to murder a fencing-maſter [e]. The archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſeveral great men interceded for him in vain. Nothing could prevail with the king to pardon him, who thought this example neceſſary to curb the inſolence of the Scots, who had already committed ſeveral outrages in England. His clemency to ſome had produced ſuch ill effects, that he did not think proper to continue the.

[a] King James, in his declaration againſt Vorſtius, ſays, "If the ſubject of Vorſtius's hereſies had not been grounded upon queſtions of higher quality than touching the number and nature of the ſacraments, the points of merit, of juſtification, of purgatory, of the viſible head of the church, or any ſuch matters, as are in controverſy at this day betwixt the papiſts and us—in that caſe we ſhould never have troubled ourſelves with the buſineſs in ſuch faſhion, and with that fervency as hitherto we have done." p. 365 of his Works. As if wrong notions or errors concerning the eſſence of God, were more pernicious than ſuch corrupt notions and principles as are deſtructive of morality, and repugnant to God's moral character!

[b] In January this year, the king granted the learned Iſaac Caſaubon, a prebend in the cathedral church of Canterbury, and a penſion of 300l. a year. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVI. p. 709, 710.—This year, on December 12, died Thomas Sutton, eſq; founder of the Charter-houſe in London. This noble foundation he endowed with about 4500l. a year, for the maintenance of a maſter, a preacher, a free-ſchool in which are forty ſcholars, and a maſter and uſher: and alſo for the maintenance of eighty poor people, who are to be provided with ſufficient clothing, meat, drink, lodging, wages, &c. Stow's Survey, p. 207.

[c] Rapin, by miſtake, makes the whole to be but 5000l. and the king to reduce it to 2000l.

[d] Weldon gives him this character; he had great parts, was very wiſe, full of honour and bounty, a great lover and rewarder of virtue and able parts in others, ſo as they did not aſpire too high in places, or look narrowly into his actions, p. 14. Oſborn, who owns he was a man of an incomparable prudence, applies to him, what was in other words ſaid of Gregory the Great, that, "he was the firſt ill treaſurer, and the laſt good one ſince queen Elizabeth's days." The worſt thing he lays to his charge, was, "the ſale of the crown timber," millions of Engliſh oaks being felled, and ſold at vile prices, not only during the life of the earl of Saliſbury, but all the reign of king James, to the great detriment of the navy, the walls of the kingdom, p. 461. He alſo fleeced the cream of the king's manors in many counties. Weldon, p. 51. He died at Marlborough, on Sunday, May 24, 1612, and was buried at Hatfield. Dugdale's Baron. vol. II. p. 408.

[e] This young lord, it ſeems, having a mind to diſgrace one Turner, a fencing-maſter, in his own art, had one of his eyes thruſt out by him. Some time after, the king of France aſked him, "how he loſt his eye?" And Sanquir telling him, "it was done with a ſword." The king replies, "does the man live?" This queſtion made ſuch an impreſſion upon the young lord, that at his return to England, he cauſed Turner to be piſtoled, at his houſe in White-Friars. Wilſon, p. 688. He was tried in the court of king's-bench, June 27, and executed before Weſtminſter-hall gate, the 29th. Howes, p. 1002. Oſborn ſays, it was thought the king would not be prevailed with to pardon Sanquir, as he had done ſome other of his countrymen for the like offence, by reaſon of his love to the king of France, and not making any reply, when he ſaid in his preſence, to one that called our king James, Solomon, that "he hoped he was not David the fidler's ſon." p. 457.

ELIZABETH PRINCESS of PALESTINE & QUEEN of BOHEMIA

G. Honthorst pinxit. Taylor sculpsit.

In the Royal Collection at St. James's.

Publish'd as the Act directs, 6th Dec.r 1787.

ſame courſe, for fear in the end a general quarrel between the two nations, which muſt have been to the diſadvantage of the Scots [f].

Shortly after, arrived in England a very extraordinary embaſſy. Sir Robert Sherley an Engliſhman, who had ſerved the king of Perſia many years in his army, deſiring to ſee his native country, obtained of that monarch the character of his embaſſador, and a letter of credit to the king. His inſtructions were only to pay his compliments to the king, with the offer of a free trade to the Engliſh throughout the Perſian dominions. The embaſſador had paſſed through the Hague, where he demanded audience of the ſtates, to propoſe to them a treaty with the king of Perſia. But becauſe he came from Spain, where he had made ſome ſtay, the ſtates ſuſpecting he had ſome other deſign, aſked to ſee his inſtructions, and upon his ſcrupling to ſhew them, he was deſired to withdraw. As he had been alſo at other courts, it was believed, he had put the king of Perſia in hopes of engaging all the chriſtian princes in a war with the Turks, who were preparing to invade him. He had married a Perſian wife, who was delivered of a ſon in England, to whom the queen ſtood godmother, and prince Henry godfather. After a year's ſtay in England, he returned into Perſia [g].

The arrival of this embaſſador did not make ſo much noiſe as that of Frederic V. elector Palatine, who came in October to marry the princeſs Elizabeth, the king's daughter. He was received with all the reſpect imaginable, and for ſome time nothing was ſeen at court but entertainments and diverſions on his account. But amidſt the univerſal joy for the marriage, the prince of Wales was ſeized with a diſtemper, which at firſt was not thought dangerous. It begun on the 10th of October, a few days before the elector Palatine's arrival; but he himſelf believed it of ſo little conſequence, that he accompanied the elector every where for ſome days. He was not forced to keep his bed till the 25th of the ſame month, and died the 6th of November, at the age of eighteen years [h].

He was one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever was, I will not ſay in England, but in all Europe, if we may believe what hiſtorians relate of him. He was ſober, chaſte, temperate, religious, full of honour and probity. He was never heard to ſwear, though the example of his father and the whole court, was but too apt to corrupt him in that reſpect [i]. He took great delight in the converſation of men of honour; and thoſe who were not reckoned as ſuch, were looked upon with a very ill eye at his court. He had naturally a greatneſs of mind, noble and generous thoughts, and was as much diſpleaſed with trifles, as his father was fond of them. He frequently ſaid, if he ever mounted the throne, his firſt care ſhould be to try to reconcile the puritans to the church of England. As this could not be done without conceſſions on each ſide, and as ſuch a condeſcenſion was directly contrary to the temper of the court and clergy, he was ſuſpected to countenance puritaniſm. He was naturally gentle and affable: but however, in his carriage had a noble ſtateline ſs without affectation, which commanded eſteem and reſpect. He ſhewed a warlike genius in his paſſionate fondneſs for all martial exerciſes. A French embaſſador coming to take his leave of him, found him toſſing the pike, and aſking him, "what ſervice he would command him to his maſter?" The prince bid him tell him, "what he was doing." In ſhort, to ſay all in a word, though he was eighteen years old when he died, no hiſtorian has taxed him with any vice. The king his father is ſaid to have been jealous of him, and to aſk one day, "If his ſon would bury him alive [k]?" I paſs over in ſilence many things ſaid upon this occaſion, particularly what ſome authors would inſinuate, that the king cauſed him to be poiſoned. In ſuch a caſe, the proofs ought to be as clear as the ſun; and I find in the moſt inveterate hiſtorians againſt king James, only bare ſuſpicions and naked conjectures, which probably were but fruits of the blackeſt malice. Others are contented with accuſing the viſcount Rocheſter of this crime, but without any manner of proof. Some ſlight preſumptions, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of elſewhere, may have helped to breed this ſuſpicion, which indeed was ſpread immediately after the prince's death. Wherefore his head and body were ordered to be laid open in the preſence of many phyſicians and ſurgeons, who gave their opinion upon oath, that no marks of poiſon appeared [l]. But what reflected moſt upon the king, was his commanding that no perſon ſhould appear at court in mourning, whether he was willing to remove all melancholy objects from his ſight, that might conſtantly renew his concern, or did not think proper to interrupt the diverſions prepared for his daughter's marriage. Decency obliged him however to defer the nuptials a few weeks, as the prince's funeral could not be performed till the 7th of December.

Preſently after, the king held a chapter of the order of the garter at Windſor, wherein the elector Palatine and prince Maurice, Stadtholder of Holland, were made knights. They were inſtalled in February following, both on the ſame day, the one at Windſor, the other at the Hague [m].

[1613] The beginning of the year 1613 was wholly ſpent in preparations for the princeſs's wedding, which was ſolemnized the 14th of February, the elector having been inſtalled knight of the garter on the 7th. Nothing was ſpared to render the entertainments on theſe occaſions as magnificent as poſſible. To that end the king demanded aid money of his ſubjects, according to the antient cuſtom obſerved when the kings married their eldeſt daughter. Though it was now a hundred years ſince this cuſtom had been uſed, there having been no occaſion ſince the reign of Henry VII. yet few or none durſt refuſe to give what the king demanded. Great ſums were raiſed by this means, which were all expended in the marriage [n]. The elector and the princeſs ſtayed in England till April, during which time there was nothing but entertainments, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions. The city of London made the new married couple a ſplendid feaſt; after which the lord-mayor and aldermen preſented the bride with a chair of oriental pearl, worthy the greatneſs and riches of that metropolis [o].

By the departure of the elector and electoreſs [p], the court became a little more quiet as to public rejoicings, which had held ſeveral months without ceaſing. But at the ſame time, a private ſcene was acting, the plots whereof began to open this year, but were not quite unravelled till two years after, I mean, the annulling of the earl of Eſſex's marriage: his counteſs's ſecond marriage with the viſcount Rocheſter: and the violent death of Sir Thomas Overbury. As theſe three incidents did not happen all at once and by accident, but

[f] Ramſey ſwitched Philip Herbert the earl of Pembroke's brother, over the face at a horſe-race, which he not reſenting, the king made him a knight, a baron, a viſcount, and an earl, in one day. Mr. Edward Hawley of Grey's-Inn, coming to court one day, Maxwell led him out of the room by a black ſtring he wore in his ear, a faſhion then much in uſe. But this had like to have coſt warm blood; not only Grey's-Inn ſociety, but all the gentry in London, thought themſelves concerned in the affront; and Hawley threatened to kill Maxwell wherever he met him, if he refuſed to fight; which ſo frightened the king, that he ſent for the benchers, and made up the quarrel. One Murray, a Scot, killed a ſerjeant that came to arreſt him; which things, with Sanquir's piſtoling Turner, and other inſolencies, occaſioned the following verſes on the Scots:

They beg our lands, our goods, our lives,
They ſwitch our nobles, and lie with our wives;
They pinch our gentry, and ſend for our benchers;
They ſtab our ſerjeants, and piſtol our fencers. Oſborn, p. 752.

[g] He was ſecond ſon to ſir Thomas Sherley of Suſſex, and had been abroad ſixteen years, five whereof he had ſpent in the ſervice of divers chriſtian princes, eſpecially the emperor Rodolphus, who made him a count of the empire. He afterwards travelled into Perſia, and ſerved that emperor ten years, who made him general of the artillery, and gave him in marriage the lady Tereſia, ſiſter to one of the queens of Perſia. He left his young ſon in England. Howes, p. 1002.

[h] He died (not on the 12th, as Rapin ſays), on the 6th of November, being eighteen years, eight months, and ſeventeen days old; and was buried at Weſtminſter the 7th of December following. Coke. Wilſon, p. 690. Howes, p. 1004. His funeral charges came to ſixteen thouſand and ſixteen pounds. State of the Revenue, p. 13.

[i] Being once hunting the ſtag, a butcher's dog chanced to kill the ſtag, and ſpoil the ſport, which the prince not reſenting, the huntſmen and company, to incenſe him againſt the butcher, told him, "If his father had been ſerved ſo, he would have ſworn ſo as no man could have endured it." Away (ſays the prince), all the pleaſure in the world is not worth an oath. This R. Coke the hiſtorian had from his father, who was about the prince's age. Coke, vol. I. p. 70.

[l] They gave their opinions on November 7, under their hands, as follow: his liver wan and paler than ordinary. His gall without choler, and diſtended with wind. His ſpleen unnaturally black; his lungs ſpotted, with much corruption. The diaphragma blackiſh; add the head full of blood in ſome places, and in others of water. As if (ſays Wilſon) no poiſon could produce ſuch effects, p. 690. See Hiſtoric. Narrat. c. 15. Howes ſays, he died of a malignant fever, which reigned that year in moſt parts of the land, and carried away a great number of people of all ſorts and ages, p. 1004.

[m] They were both inſtalled on the 7th of February (or, according to Camden's Ann. on December 20, 1612). Lodowick count of Orange being prince Maurice's proxy. Prince Maurice, it ſeems, wore his garter conſtantly, till a groom of his chamber happened to ſtrangle a jeweller with one of his blue ribbons, in order to rob him. After which he would never wear it. Wilſon, p. 690.—This year was finiſhed Hick's Hall, in London. [p] They embarked at Margate, April 25, and landed at Fluſhing the 29th. The elector behaved, during his ſtay in England, ſo nobly and diſcreetly in all reſpects, that he gained the general applauſe and love of all men: And gave away to the full value of 120,000 French crowns. Howes, p. 1007.

were gradually brought in by diabolical practices, it will be neceſſary to relate ſome things already paſſed, and which were deferred, that the thread of the ſtory might not be interrupted.

Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, was, as I obſerved, a mortal enemy to the late earl of Eſſex, and one of the chief inſtruments of his ruin. This earl left a ſon, who being but nine years old, did not give Cecil much uneaſineſs, though the king at his coming to England, reſtored him to his eſtate and honours. Mean while, as this able miniſter could not be ignorant of the king's affection for the father, he was apprehenſive, that one time or other he ſhould be made to pay for all his artifices to ruin that lord. It was chiefly upon this account, that in order to preſerve the king's favour, he judged it proper to unite cloſely with the Howard family by his ſon's marriage with the earl of Suffolk's eldeſt daughter [q]. After which, perceiving the earl of Eſſex to grow up, and fearing he might one day prove a thorn in his ſide, he believed it for his intereſt to be reconciled to him, and to confirm the reconciliation with the marriage of this young lord to the earl of Suffolk's ſecond daughter, younger ſiſter of his daughter-in-law. Beſides his own advantage by the alliance, he gave the king the pleaſure to ſee in ſtrict union three families, for whom he had the greateſt affection, namely, thoſe of Howard, Devreux and Cecil. This marriage was accompliſhed in 1606, the earl of Eſſex being then in his fifteenth, and Frances Howard his bride in her thirteenth year. As the married couple were yet very young, their relations thought fit the earl ſhould travel into France and Germany, till they were both a little more advanced in years. During his abſence, his counteſs became a perfect beauty, and eclipſed all the court ladies.

The earl of Eſſex returned into England in the year 1610. He found his counteſs in the prime of her age and beauty; but withal, extremely proud of her own merit, by reaſon of the praiſes beſtowed on her by all. He was himſelf charmed with her, but met not with that return he expected. She daily coined freſh excuſes to delay the conſummation of the marriage, and ſhewed as much reluctance as he did eagerneſs. He bore it patiently for ſome time, being unwilling to uſe compulſion, for fear of giving his bride an averſion to him. Shortly after, he fell ſo dangerouſly ill of the ſmall-pox [r], that his life was deſpaired of; but the ſtrength of his conſtitution overcame his diſtemper, though it was long before he was quite recovered.

In this interval it was that Robert Carr became the king's favourite. When he gained his maſter's heart, he made a conqueſt almoſt at the ſame time of the counteſs of Eſſex's, who ſuffered herſelf to be taken with the charms of this young Scot, and entirely gave herſelf over to this new paſſion, without daring however to reveal it to the perſon that cauſed it. Mean while, the earl of Eſſex finding himſelf perfectly recovered, preſſed his ſpouſe to conſent to the conſummation of their marriage; but he found her reluctance the greater, as ſhe was enamoured of another. In ſhort, after trying all ſorts of ways to prevail with her, without being able to ſucceed, he had recourſe to the earl of Suffolk his father-in-law, and entreated him to uſe his endeavours to vanquiſh his daughter's obſtinacy. The earl of Suffolk, ſurpriſed at what his ſon-in-law told him, ſharply reprimanded his daughter, and poſitively told her, ſhe muſt reſolve to conſummate the marriage. Then the counteſs, not daring to diſobey her father directly, deſired only a little longer delay. She believed in caſe ſhe could avoid conſummating her marriage with the earl of Eſſex, it would not be impracticable to procure a divorce, and then marry the viſcount Rocheſter. Indeed, the viſcount knew nothing yet of her paſſion; but ſhe had too good an opinion of her charms not to hope an eaſy conqueſt, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould have occaſion to diſcover it. On the other hand, the great credit of Rocheſter and the earls of Suffolk and Northampton did not ſuffer her to queſtion, that if the favourite undertook to marry her, he would eaſily accompliſh it. But ſhe wanted ſome time to lay her meaſures, wherein however ſhe met with great oppoſition both from her huſband and father.

In this extremity, knowing how to proceed, ſhe opened her mind to one Mrs. Turner a phyſician's widow, a woman of a diſſolute life, and capable of the baſeſt actions. As this woman had no good advice to give her, ſhe perſuades her to apply to one Dr. Foreman, who paſſed for a conjurer, He had perhaps ſome ſecrets of nature, but was not ſorry to be thought ſkilled in the magic-art, becauſe many women came to conſult him and paid him well for it [s]. To this man the counteſs of Eſſex told her ſecret, and deſired two things of him: Firſt, to manage it ſo that the earl of Eſſex ſhould be incapable to conſummate his marriage. Secondly, to make the viſcount Rocheſter in love with her. Foreman very confidently promiſed both, and gave her certain powders for her huſband to take, and to be put amongſt his linen, with inſtructions how ſhe ſhould behave to him. As for Rocheſter, he himſelf undertook to perform upon him the neceſſary operations.

Mean while, the counteſs could no longer diſobey her father's command, ſo was forced at laſt to cohabit with her huſband. But though they lay together, the marriage was not conſummated, whether it was owing to Foreman's powders, or to ſome other more effectual means uſed by the counteſs to fruſtrate her huſband's efforts. However, the earl of Eſſex imagined, that his living in London and at court might contribute to his misfortune, and therefore reſolved to carry his lady to Chartly in Staffordſhire, a country ſeat about a hundred miles from London. The counteſs could not be excuſed from going with her lord: but all the while ſhe was there ſhut herſelf up in a room, and would not ſo much as ſuffer the light of the ſun to enter, giving herſelf over to an exceſſive melancholy, whether out of vexation or policy, the better to deny her huſband. After this manner ſhe lived ſome time with her huſband in the country, who did not underſtand the meaning of this ſtrange behaviour. In the mean while, ſhe wrote ſeveral letters to Mrs. Turner and Foreman, telling them, "She was afraid Foreman's powders were not ſtrong enough: her huſband was as luſty as ever: it would be very difficult for her to hold out for ever, and if ſhe ſhould chance to yield, ſhe ſhould become the moſt unfortunate woman in the world: ſhe entreated them to free her from her miſery, and they ſhould have what money they deſired." Theſe letters were found in Foreman's ſtudy, and read in open court, upon an occaſion which I ſhall mention preſently [t].

At laſt, the earl of Eſſex ſeeing himſelf in ſo uneaſy a ſituation, reſolved to carry his lady back to London, and give her full leave to live as ſhe pleaſed. He began to perceive there was ſomething extraordinary in her carriage, which he choſe rather to be ignorant of than endeavour to diſcover.

The counteſs being returned to court, and miſtreſs of herſelf, no longer delayed to let Rocheſter know what ſhe endured for his ſake. There was no occaſion to uſe magic to produce the deſired effect. He was young, and ſhe the fineſt lady in the kingdom. So any advances from the counteſs, were more than ſufficient to kindle a flame in the favourite's breaſt. As ſoon as they began to underſtand one another, aſſignations became frequent. They were at firſt very private: but in time, the two lovers uſed ſo little caution, that not a courtier was ſtranger to their amours. The king very probably was informed of it, ſince nothing delighted him more than to hear of the love-intrigues of his courtiers. The earl of Eſſex, who had alſo notice of it, choſe to ſhut his eyes, and ſcorn an object ſo unworthy of his love.

The counteſs of Eſſex having ſucceeded in her intended conqueſt, and finding herſelf ſure of her lover's heart, would not allow his paſſion time to cool. Every thing ſeemed to favour the execution of her deſigns, that is, her divorce from the earl of Eſſex, and marriage with the viſcount Rocheſter. Eſſex ſaw her no more, and ſeemed to concern himſelf very little about her, and Rocheſter was ſo beloved by the king, that in all appearance, nothing would be impracticable. So ſhe let her lover know her deſires, and without much difficulty brought him to ſecond her projects. But as he was wont to impart his moſt ſerious affairs to Overbury, he believed he ought not to conceal this from him, and the more, as he expected from him ſome good advice to accompliſh it. But ſo far was Overbury from approving ſuch a project, that he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade him from it. He repreſented to him the injuſtice and indignity of the thing, his danger of being ruined by ſuch an action; and laſtly, the little value he ought to have for a woman, who, though married, ſcrupled not to throw herſelf into the arms of another man: That ſhe had already loſt her reputation in the world, and when ſhe ſhould be his wife, all the diſhonour would reflect upon him [u]. Rocheſter, who did not expect ſo great oppoſition from his friend, could not forbear ſhewing ſome reſentment. He had the addreſs however to contain himſelf ſo far, as not to give him room to think he would proceed notwithſtanding his advice, and continued as uſual, to communicate to him his other affairs. The counteſs was in a violent paſſion when ſhe heard Overbury's advice, and from that moment ceaſed not to excite her lover to revenge. She was the more incenſed againſt Overbury, as ſhe feared, that being acquainted with the deſign, he would labour to render it abortive. In ſhort, Rocheſter was ſo complaiſant and blind, as to promiſe her to ſacrifice his friend. He might have eaſily diſmiſſed him; but it would have been too dangerous not to ruin him entirely, after truſting him with the ſecret. It is pretended, that to ſtrike the more ſurely, he conſulted the earl of Northampton, uncle to the counteſs of Eſſex, and by his advice uſed this artifice to ruin him. He extolled to the king Overbury's abilities; but intimated withal, that he took too much upon him, and was grown intolerably inſolent; and therefore he ſhould be very glad to have him removed, by ſome honourable employment, praying his majeſty to ſend him embaſſador to Ruſſia [w]. The king liking the propoſal, inſtantly appoints Overbury for the embaſſy. Rocheſter, having proceeded thus far, acquaints Overbury with the king's intention, and pretending he could not live without him, entreats him to refuſe the employment, promiſing to procure him a better at court. He added, that indeed he believed it would not be in his power to hinder the king from being angry at firſt, who probably would reſent his refuſal, but he did not queſtion to appeaſe him in a few days. Overbury fell into the ſnare, and when the king ſent for him to acquaint him with the employment deſigned for him, he moſt humbly beſought his majeſty to make choice of ſome other perſon. As ſoon as he retired, Rocheſter aggravated his pride and inſolence, in daring thus to refuſe his maſter's gracious offer, adding, it was requiſite to chaſtiſe him: That he was himſelf affected by it, for he ſhould be infallibly blamed for uſing his intereſt for him. In ſhort, by Rocheſter's inſtances, the king commanded Overbury to be ſent to the Tower [x]. Some days before, the favourite had cauſed ſir Gervaſe Elweys, his creature, to be made lieutenant of the Tower [y]. Overbury was cloſely confined in a in a room, and not ſuffered to keep one of his ſervants, or receive any viſits from his relations and friends, a rigour not uſed even towards the greateſt offenders. He was now where the viſcount Rocheſter and the counteſs of Eſſex wiſhed him, in order to diſpatch him the more eaſily. However, there were ſtill ſome difficulties. It could not be done by ſtabbing, becauſe the lieutenant of the Tower, who is to anſwer for the priſoners, would not have ſuffered it; and beſides, a murder openly committed in one of the king's priſons, would have made too much noiſe in the world. It was reſolved therefore to make uſe of poiſon. To that end Mrs. Turner provided a truſty perſon, one Weſton [z], who had been a ſervant to her huſband, and ſir Thomas Monſon recommended this man to the lieutenant of the Tower, to wait on the priſoner as footman. But even this was not ſufficient. Whatever was brought to Overbury to eat, being dreſſed in the lieutenant's kitchen, it was almoſt neceſſary to engage him in the plot. Some ſay, the earl of Northampton ſpoke to him of it, hinting that every thing was done with the king's privity. Others affirm, the lieutenant refuſing to be concerned in the crime, and not daring however to diſcover it, by reaſon of the quality of the parties, took care to ſeize the victuals ſent from time to time by the viſcount Rocheſter to the priſoner, and threw them into the houſe of office [a]; and this is moſt likely, ſince otherwiſe, Overbury would have been ſoon diſpatched. He could not however hinder Weſton from giving him a certain jelly ſent by ſir Thomas Monſon, which almoſt killed him. Whereupon the lieutenant of the Tower was ſtill more careful, that Overbury ſhould be ſeen but by Weſton alone. This was a check upon Weſton, becauſe he perceived none could be accuſed but himſelf; wherefore he durſt not make ſuch haſte as Overbury's enemies deſired. There aroſe however, an inconvenience from this delay, which was, that every one was ſurpriſed to ſee the king uſe ſo great rigour upon a friend of the viſcount Rocheſter for ſo ſlight an offence, if the refuſing to go in embaſſy to Ruſſia could be deemed any crime at all. It could not be conceived, and it was vainly endeavoured to diſcover, the cauſe of the extreme ſeverity with which Overbury was treated.

Whilſt the unfortunate priſoner languiſhed in his confinement, the viſcount Rocheſter and the counteſs of Eſſex were thinking of executing their project, that is, of annulling the counteſs of Eſſex's marriage, that ſhe might afterwards eſpouſe the viſcount. To effect this, without Rocheſter's appearing to be concerned, the earl of Northampton, who was in the two lovers ſecrets, undertook to ſpeak to the king. Some ſay the viſcount Rocheſter had already acquainted the king with the counteſs's deſign to be divorced, and prayed his majeſty to procure him the lady when the marriage ſhould be diſſolved; but I do not know if this be well atteſted. However, the earl of Northampton preſented to the king the counteſs of Eſſex's petition [b], that the earl her huſband being incapable of conſummating their marriage, ſhe beſought his majeſty to let her complaint be examined, and if found well grounded, to have liberty to marry another. Upon this petition, the king commiſſioned the archbiſhop, ſeveral other biſhops, and ſome laymen, to hear and determine the affair. This court proceeded very gravely to the trial of the cauſe, and entered into ſuch particular and ſecret examinations, as did not very well become clergymen. The earl of Eſſex being examined, briefly anſwered, he had never conſummated his marriage, neither did he think he ſhould ever be able to conſummate it: but did not feel the ſame inability with regard to other women. Though this confeſſion greatly favoured the counteſs's cauſe, the court deemed it proper to be certain of the truth by another method, and ordered the counteſs to be inſpected by a jury of matrons, aſſiſted by ſome midwives. The inſpection being made, the matrons declared ſhe was a virgin. But it is pretended the counteſs, under colour of ſaving her modeſty, was permitted to appear in a veil before the matrons, and that Mrs. Fines, a young gentlewoman of her age and ſtature, was introduced in her place [c]. I omit numberleſs circumſtances of this trial, which are to be found in ſeveral authors, and which it is indecent to relate. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that by the ſentence, the marriage was diſſolved, contrary to the opinion of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who even publiſhed his reaſons againſt it. But the king himſelf took the pains to anſwer the archbiſhop's arguments, and to maintain the juſtice of the ſentence, upbraiding the prelate with founding his opinion on puritan principles. Dr. Bilſon, biſhop of Wincheſter, one of the judges, having ſpoken very ſtrenuouſly to prove the nullity of the marriage, his ſon was ſoon after knighted. But the public was ſo malicious as to call him Sir Nullity Bilſon. This affair made a great noiſe, and brought little honour to the judges, moſt of whom could not be ignorant of the counteſs of Eſſex's ill character [d].

If after her divorce, the counteſs had married any other than the viſcount Rocheſter, her conduct might have been eaſily juſtified. This was not the firſt marriage annulled upon the like account. But the ſentence was hardly publiſhed, when the viſcount openly made his addreſſes to the lady, and their marriage was quickly concluded. The king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the counteſs, but alſo made him earl of Somerſet on the 4th of November, that the ſecond huſband might be of equal rank with the firſt. The nuptials were ſolemnized a month after, with ſuch extraordinary rejoicings, that had the king's own ſon been married there could not have been greater. The city of London ſignalized itſelf on the occaſion, by a ſplendid entertainment, which the lord-mayor and aldermen gave the new-married couple, and to which the king, queen, and the whole court, were invited. For ſome time nothing was talked of but banquets, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions, in honour of the new earl of Somerſet's nuptials.

Theſe things gave occaſion to the diſaffected to talk freely of the king. They reported, that in Scotland the earl of Arran, formerly the king's favourite, married the earl of Athol's daughter, having procured, by the like means, and on the ſame account, a diſſolution of that lady's marriage with the earl of March. It was thereby inſinuated, that the king had taught his favourite the way to attain his miſtreſs. But theſe inſinuations reached not the king's ear, thoſe about him not being ſo ill courtiers as to carry him ſuch reports.

Whilſt the counteſs of Eſſex's marriage was annulling, the unfortunate Overbury was cloſely confined, without having the comfort of ſeeing any of his friends [e], as if he had been guilty of the moſt heinous of crimes. He had been extremely ſick with the poiſon that was given him, without knowing the cauſe of his illneſs. But when he heard what was tranſacting, he no longer doubted concerning the author of his miſery. In this lamentable ſtate, he ſaw no other remedy but to write to the favourite, entreating him to deliver him out of his wretched condition [f]. Rocheſter anſwered, that the king being ſtill highly incenſed, he had not yet been able to ſpeak in his behalf, but hoped to do it within a few days. Nay, it is ſaid, he ſent a certain powder in the letter, as a ſure remedy to cure his diſtemper. But Overbury was ſo wiſe as not to take it [g]. In ſhort, the two lovers being impatient to ſee a man live ſo long, who might one day be their ruin, cauſed an impoiſoned clyſter to be adminiſtered by one Franklin an apothecary's apprentice, which ended his miſeries with his life. Some ſay, that Weſton and Franklin ſeeing the extraordinary effects of the clyſter, and fearing if they ſuffered the poiſon to operate any longer, it would leave marks on the body, which would riſe in judgment againſt them, ſmothered him with the bed clothes. When he was dead, he was ſpeedily buried without any ceremony, and a report ſpread, that dying of the pox, he was ſo rotten he could not be kept any longer. This was the earl of Northampton's account in his letter to the favourite, to acquaint him with Overbury's death, admiring withal, the juſtice of God upon ſuch wicked inſtruments [h].

The earl of Somerſet thought it a great advantage to have diſpatched Overbury. But on the other hand, he found himſelf much more embarraſſed in the management of affairs, ſince he was no longer aſſiſted by that faithful counſellor. As his ſmall experience rendered every thing difficult, he was forced to chuſe another friend, and it was the earl of Northampton that ſupplied Overbury's place. But there was a great difference between theſe two counſellors. Overbury's ſole view was to procure his friend honour and glory, and the earl of Northampton's chief aim was to make uſe of his credit to countenance the catholics. Ever ſince his being in favour, he had always protected them to the utmoſt of his power, as was obvious to all the world. But when he came to rule the favourite, he acted without any reſerve. As he was warden of the Cinque-ports, the jeſuits and Romiſh prieſts could ſafely land there without being examined at their arrival. By this means their number ſo encreaſed in a very ſhort ſpace, that the people loudly murmured as it, and caſt the blame on the earl of Northampton. Wherefore, to ſilence thoſe who talked too freely, he took out a writ of Scandalum Magnatum againſt ſome of them. He believed, it was not poſſible to convict him of a thing founded only upon common report, and that, ſuch evidence not being valid in law, he ſhould ſilence his enemies by the puniſhment of ſome of the moſt forward to ſpeak againſt him. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury broke his meaſures, by producing a letter under the earl's own hand to cardinal Bellarmine, wherein he ſaid, "That however the ſituation of the affairs of England, and the inſtances of the king compelled him to be a proteſtant in ſhew, nevertheleſs his heart ſtood firm with the catholics, and he would be ever ready to countenance them to the utmoſt of his power." Upon this letter the parties accuſed was diſcharged. Nay the king ſo repremanded the earl, that he retired to his country-houſe, where he died ſoon after [i]. He declared in his laſt will and teſtament, that he had always been a catholic, and would die in that religion. [1614] Thus ſeveral hiſtorians ſpeak of him. But the anonymous author of the Annals of James I. and Charles I. who endeavours to vindicate theſe princes, their miniſters, and government, in every thing without exception, forgets not to juſtify alſo the earl of Northampton. He ſays, among other things, that the charge of being concerned in Overbury's murder was only a rumour ſpread after his death, as if that were a certain proof of his innocence. As to the earl's religion, the ſame author ſays, He died ſuſpected more catholic than ſome will think reaſonable, though in the form of a church-papiſt [k]."

The court was not ſo well affected to the puritans as to the papiſts. The puritans were conſidered as enemies to the king and to monarchy, but the papiſts was hearty wiſhers that the king might meet with no oppoſition to his will. This was ſufficient to induce the court to countenance the latter, and cauſe the former to endure continual mortifications. In the ſpring this year, ſome preſbyterian families reſolved to go and ſettle in New England, to enjoy there that peace which they could not find at home. The author I juſt mentioned concerning the earl of Northampton, ſays, theſe people were notorious ſchiſmatics of ſeveral ſects, known by the general name of Puritans, which term included good and bad in their diſtinct kinds, truly and ingeniouſly diſtinguiſhed into the Puritan-knave, and the Knave-puritan. As it was not impoſſible, by the encreaſe of preſbyterian families, the Engliſh plantations might become nurſeries for non-conformiſts, the court gave orders not to let them depart. But afterwards, ſuch as deſired to remove beyond ſea, being examined, ſome were allowed to purſue their voyage, and others were detained as ſureties for thoſe that went away.

It was now four years ſince the king had called a parliament. It was a great comfort to him to have no diſputes with a houſe of commons, ever ready to complain of grievances, and take occaſion to examine the conduct of the ſovereign or his miniſters. He was much better pleaſed to command abſolutely and without controul. But this was attended with great inconvenience: he was forced continually to invent new methods to raiſe money; and theſe methods, grounded upon abſolute authority, cauſed loud murmurs among the people. Neither did theſe methods bring in ſufficient ſums for the king's occaſions, who loved magnificence, and was always ready to give. Hence ſprung his wants, which inceſſantly encreaſed, his revenues as well ordinary as extraordinary not ſufficing for his expences; he ſeemed however to have an inexhauſtible fund, ſo profuſe was he, without conſidering how he ſhould recover what was unneceſſarily given. The following inſtance of his bounty may ſerve to ſhew his character. Being one day in the gallery at Whitehall, and none with him but ſir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, and James Maxwel, one of his bed-chamber, ſome porters paſſed by with three thouſand pounds, going to the privy-purſe; Rich ſeeing the money, turned to Maxwel, and whiſpered him: the king perceiving it, aſked what he ſaid? Maxwel told him, Rich ſhould think himſelf very happy if he had ſuch a ſum. Whereupon the king calling to the porters, ordered them to carry the money to Rich's lodgings, ſaying at the ſame time, "You think now you have a great purchaſe; but I am more delighted in giving you the money, than you can be in receiving it."

If the king had been thus laviſh out of his abundance, or out of his ſavings, his generoſity muſt have been laudable. But unhappily, in order to be thus profuſe to a few private perſons, he gained the ill-will of all the reſt of the nation, and was forced to uſe, in order to raiſe money, ſeveral extra-

[f] In one of his letters he tells the earl of Somerſet, "You and I will come to public trial before all the friends I have. They ſhall know what words have paſſed betwixt us heretofore.—I have all this vacation wrote the ſtory betwixt you and me, from the firſt hour to this day, &c." Theſe threats, probably, haſtened Overbury's death; and hurried the earl on to diſpatch him quickly out of the way, for fear he ſhould tell tales. See Winwood's Mem. tom. III. p. 478.

He was warden of the Cinque Ports, and conſtable of Dover-caſtle, lord privy ſeal, and chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge. His body was carried to be buried at Dover. But it was vulgarly rumoured (ſays Wilſon) that his body was carried there, in order to be tranſported to Rome, p. 694.—Weldon gives him this character: Though a great clerk, yet he was not a wiſe man, but the groſſeſt flatterer in the world, who raiſed himſelf by his flattery.—He was of ſo venomous and cankered a diſpoſition, that he hated all men of noble parts, nor loved any but flatterers like himſelf: He uſed to ſay, that he would be content to be damned perpetually in hell, to be revenged of that proud Welſhman, ſir Robert Manſell, p. 15, 22.

ordinary methods, which were looked upon as ſo many grievances, and loudly complained of. Moreover, he was obliged either not to call a parliament, or to quarrel with the houſe of commons. James was however the Solomon of the age, the wiſeſt, moſt prudent, and moſt juſt of kings. Theſe at leaſt are the epithets generally given him, and which are even to be found in ſeveral hiſtories penned ſince the reſtoration of Charles II.

The king's exceſſive liberality reducing him continually to ſtraits, he had at laſt recourſe to a project formed by the late earl of Saliſbury, namely, to create knights-baronets, a ſort of middle nobility between barons and knights-bachelors. Their number was not to exceed two hundred: but the king, at the firſt promotion, made only an hundred [m]. To purchaſe this honour, which was to be hereditary, every baronet was obliged to pay to the king a thouſand pounds. But in order to give ſome colour to this new inſtitution, every baronet was obliged by his patent to maintain thirty foot ſoldiers in Ireland for three years, at eight pence a day each ſoldier [n]. Afterwards it was hinted to them, that if they would compound with the king, and pay the whole ſum at once, part ſhould be abated, and the king would maintain his troops in Ireland himſelf; and there was not one but what accepted the offer. The author of the Annals above mentioned, affirms that the king received only about an hundred thouſand pounds of the baronets, and that the maintenance of the troops in Ireland coſt him much more. So, according to him, this new order was inſtituted merely to eaſe the ſubjects.

Beſides this method, the king made uſe of others to fill his empty coffers, without being obliged to have recourſe to the parliament. I ſhall only mention them, without pretending to determine whether the king exceeded his prerogative or not: 1. The king, by his letters patents, granted monopolies to private perſons, excluſive of all others, and raiſed great ſums by theſe ſorts of favours. 2. He iſſued out commiſſions for reviving obſolete laws, for making men who could expend forty pounds a year, to compound for not being knighted. Formerly, an eſtate of forty pounds a year in land was conſiderable; and therefore the owners of ſuch an eſtate were deemed proper to be made knights, and as ſuch to ſerve the king in his wars, or find ſoldiers; but in king James I.'s time, ſuch a revenue was inconſiderable; there were infinite numbers who had more, but not deſiring to be knights, choſe rather to give the king money than be obliged to receive an honour which rendered them very dependent. 3. The king made a certain number of knights of Nova Scotia [o], each of which paid him ſuch a ſum. 4. The dignities of baron, viſcount, and earl, had a fixed price ſet upon them: the king received for making a baron ten thouſand pounds, for a viſcount fifteen thouſand, and twenty thouſand for an earl. Thus whoever had money might be made a peer of the realm. 5. The ſame honours were rated likewiſe in Scotland and Ireland, though at lower prices [p]. 6. Thoſe who had defective titles were obliged to compound with the king for rectifying them, otherwiſe they were declared null and void [q]. 7. The ſtar-chamber condemned in exceſſive fines, to the king's uſe, ſuch as were cited thither: I have already related ſome inſtances, and ſhall have occaſion to take notice of ſome others hereafter. 8. To all this may be added the ſums levied by the king upon his ſubjects, when the prince his ſon was knighted, and his daughter married.

He would have had alſo a good means of raiſing money, if he had demanded of the United Provinces the ſums that were due to him. But, if we believe certain hiſtorians, he durſt not claim his debt, for fear of engaging in a war in caſe of refuſal. A more probable reaſon might be given, by ſaying the places he held in Holland and Zealand kept the States in a ſort of ſubjection, if he had not ſhewn two years after that this was not the true ſeaſon, by receiving his money when offered him by the States.

In fine, the king's revenue not anſwering his expences, recourſe was to be had to a parliament. The earl of Somerſet, having with him neither Overbury nor the earl of Northampton, was at a loſs how to find the king money, and the lord treaſurer his father-in-law was no leſs embarraſſed. All extraordinary means ſeeming to be exhauſted, they propoſed to the king the calling of a parliament. To induce him to it, they put him in hopes that by their intereſt and management, the majority of the commons ſhould be at his devotion. The king was very loth to conſent; but at length was perſuaded, and a parliament was ſummoned to meet the 1ſt of April [r].

This parliament conſiſted not of ſuch members as the king was made to expect. The people, who were diſcontented, inſtead of being gained by the court, choſe repreſentatives of a quite different character from what the miniſters deſired. The very firſt day, the king demanded an aid of money for the marriage of his daughter, and told the commons, after diſpatching that affair, he would give them leave to examine the grievances of the nation. But the commons thought proper to invert the method preſcribed them, and begin with the grievances. Inſtead therefore of granting the money firſt, as the king expected, they examined to what uſes the revenues of the crown had been applied. The reſult was, that the king had beſtowed on the Scots exceſſive grants, both in land and money, and that the Scots having ſold theſe lands to the Engliſh, had conveyed the money into Scotland, to the great detriment of England. If what the king had given to the Engliſh had been as carefully examined, it would have been found ten times more, by the confeſſion of the hiſtorians themſelves [s]; but herein was not ſeen the ſame inconvenience.

Then the houſe enquired into the cauſes of the encreaſe of popiſh recuſants; ſince it ſhould rather ſeem that the laws enacted after the gun-powder plot, ſhould have very much leſſened their number. The firſt cauſe appeared to be the king's admitting into his council popiſh lords, publicly known for ſuch. A ſecond was, the negotiations abroad for the marriage of the late prince Henry and prince Charles, with popiſh princeſſes.

After that, the commons took into conſideration the monopolies authoriſed and licenſed by the king's letters patents, to the great prejudice of trade; and the extraordinary levies of money, without the conſent of the parliament. Upon all theſe grievances it was reſolved to repreſent them in a petition to his majeſty, and to pray him to redreſs them, and eſpecially to hinder the future ſettlement of the Scots in England.

The behaviour of the commons was ſo different from that of the courtiers, who never ſpoke of the king but with admiration, that his majeſty had not patience to bear it: ſo, on the 7th of June he diſſolved the parliament, after a ſeſſion of about two months, wherein one ſtatute was not enacted. The parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, but the king committed to priſon ſeveral members of the houſe of commons, who had ſpoken the moſt freely, without admitting them to bail [t].

The parliament not anſwering the king's expectation, and his exchequer being empty, there was a neceſſity of recurring to new expedients to fill it. But before we ſpeak of theſe expedients, it will not be amiſs to ſhew one of the chief cauſes of the king's being reduced to ſtraits: I mean the electreſs his daughter's marriage, which had coſt him very near an hundred thouſand pounds, according to the following account, inſerted in his book by the anonymous author of the Annals above mentioned.

[m] The firſt baronets were created on May the 22d, 1611, by patent. See Britiſh Compend. part. II. p. 352. They were to have theſe privileges to them and their heirs for ever: place before all Knights, Bachelors, and of Bath, and all Bannerets; to be impleaded by the addition of Baronet, and the title Sir, and their wives Lady. The king ſhall not create any degree under the dignity of a baron, that ſhall be ſuperior or equal to them, no more to be made, but the full number of two hundred, until ſome died; but the younger ſons of viſcounts and barons (by decree of the king and council upon controverſy) were adjudged to take place before them; and that their heirs male at one-and-twenty ſhall be knighted; and ſhall have either a canton in their coat of arms, or an eſcutcheon, at their election, the arms of Ulſter, argent, a hand gules; their place in the king's armies to be in the groſs, near the king's ſtandard, for defence thereof. Annals of K. James, p. 8. There were made at firſt but ninety; of whom Sir Nicolas Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, was the firſt.

[n] Which comes to juſt one thouſand and ninety-five pounds, and not two thouſand, as Rapin ſays by miſtake. And it has been cuſtomary for thoſe who have ſince been admitted into this order without money, to have a receipt endorſed on their patent for the ſaid ſum of 1095l. to be appropriated to the ſame uſes; and for want of ſuch endorſement, ſeveral baronets were compelled in king Charles II.'s time to pay 1095l.

[o] This order of baronets was firſt erected for advancing the plantation of Nova Scotia in America, and for ſettling a colony there, to which the aid of theſe knights was appropriated. It was intended in 1621, but not actually founded till 1625. Scottiſh Comp. p. 502.

[p] Scottiſh honours of the ſame title, to have the precedence of an Iriſh, as a Scottiſh baron, viſcount, or earl, to have the precedence of an Iriſh; and though an Engliſh honour of like degree, had the precedence of either of the other, yet if either of the other had a higher title, he ſhould precede an Engliſh peer under a leſs; as a Scottiſh or Iriſh viſcount, ſhall precede an Engliſh baron. Coke, vol. I. p. 66.

[q] And likewiſe compoſitions for aſſart lands, i. e. for grubbing up the thickets and coverts for the deer in foreſts. Ibid. p. 67.

[r] It did not meet till April 5. Jour. Proceed.

[s] Of this ſir Anthony Weldon gives a notable inſtance. He ſays, Saliſbury would make the Scots buy books of fee-farms, ſome 100l. per annum, ſome one hundred marks, and would compound with them for a thouſand pounds, which they were willing to embrace, becauſe they were ſure to have them paſs without any controul or charge; then would Saliſbury fill up his book with ſuch prime land as ſhould be worth ten or twenty thouſand pounds, which, as treaſurer, he might eaſily do, and ſo enrich himſelf infinitely, and caſt the envy on the Scots, in whoſe names theſe books appeared, and are ſtill upon record to all poſterity, p. 60.

[t] Theſe were Chutts,—Nevil lord Abergavenny's ſon, Wentworth, Jo. Hoſkins. Camden's Annals. This (ſays Coke) was the greateſt violation of the privileges of parliament that ever was done by any king of England before, p. 79.

The king reſolving to call no more parliaments, extraordinary means were to be deviſed to ſupply his expences, his ordinary revenues being far from ſufficient. To that end, certain perſons diligently ſearched into hiſtory to diſcover what had been done by former kings in the like caſes, or when there was not time to call a parliament. Among all theſe methods the court choſe the way of benevolence invented by Edward IV. aboliſhed by Richard III. and once revived; if I am not miſtaken, by the parliament itſelf in the reign of Henry VIII. Nevertheleſs, the author of the Annals pretends that James only followed the conſtant example of all his predeceſſors, and upon theſe pretended examples, and the cuſtom in France and Spain, undertakes to vindicate him. But there would be too many things to be ſaid upon this head, if it ſhould be inſiſted on.

The reſolution being taken not only to demand but exhort a benevolence, all the ſheriffs were ordered by the council to aſk of all private perſons within their diſtrict a free gift in proportion to the king's wants. At the ſame time they were expreſly commanded to return to the council the names of ſuch as ſhould refuſe to contribute, or not give according to their abilities. This ſhews the king did not mean the benevolence ſhould be entirely voluntary. This method however was not ſo ſucceſsful as the king had expected. The more eager the ſheriffs and court-party were to excite the people's liberality, the more induſtrious were others to diſſuade them from it, by ſetting before them the conſequences. So if we may believe the author of the Annals, the benevolence procured the king but 52,909l. "which yet (continues he) madded the ill-minded men (pillars, ſo ſome call them, to the kingdom's liberties), always plotters to the kingdom's miſeries, who being aſhamed to be out-done in honeſty and honour, they juſtly drew upon themſelves a mark of malignity.---And yet they would be meddling, deviſing poor arguments, to pretend it was againſt the ſubjects liberties, though accuſtomed evermore by examples of all former ſovereigns." Others ſpeak of it very differently, and repreſent this way of raiſing money upon the people as a real extortion and encroachment on the nation's liberties. Thus do king James's hiſtorians contradict one another, not in facts but in principles, ſome deeming illegal what others maintain to be the undoubted prerogative of the crown.

The money ariſing to the king from the benevolence, though no great ſum, came however very ſeaſonably for the king of Denmark's reception, who made him a ſecond viſit with a train of forty perſons only. During the fortnight he ſtayed in England [w], entertainments and diverſions never ceaſed.

Shortly after, the king received with great pomp the Ruſſian embaſſador ſent by the czar, to deſire him to be mediator between him and the king of Sweden, on account of their differences.

Hitherto the earl of Somerſet poſſeſſed the king's heart ſo entirely, that the queen herſelf grew jealous. Some ſay ſhe inwardly grieved for the death of prince Henry, and ſuſpected him to be the author: others ſay only, that his greatneſs had ſo blinded the favourite, that he was wanting in reſpect to the queen [x]. However, ſhe had conceived a very violent hatred of him; and to ruin him the more eaſily, ſhe thought proper to gain Sir Ralph Winwood, who was ſtill ſecretary of ſtate [y], but without exerciſing the office, at leaſt in important affairs, becauſe the earl of Somerſet had ſeized the management of every thing. Winwood readily joined with the queen to ruin the earl, who left him only the title of ſecretary. This was a preparative to the revolution which happened the next year.

Before I end this year, I muſt not forget to mention the memorable undertaking of Mr. Hugh Middleton, citizen and goldſmith of London, who, having an act of parliament for his warrant, found means to bring water from Hertfordſhire to the principal parts of the city, for the conveniency of the inhabitants [z].

[1615] The king was wont twice a year to take a journey into ſome part of the kingdom; theſe journies were called Progreſſes, one whereof was made in winter, the other in ſummer. In his winter progreſs in the year 1615, he paſſed through Cambridge, where the ſcholars entertained him with a comedy called Ignoramus, which ridiculed the common law. Nothing could be more diverting to the king: the civil law, or the laws made by the ſupreme authority of the Roman emperors, appeared to him of much greater value than the common or ſtatute law; and he could not forbear now and then to ſpeak of theſe with contempt: wherefore he was ſo delighted with the play, that he cauſed it to be acted twice in his preſence during his ſhort ſtay at Cambridge.

At this play it was, that the king was ſtruck with a new object, which made the ſame impreſſion upon his mind as Robert Carr did the firſt time he ſaw him [a]. This was George Villiers, a young gentleman, who appeared before him with all the advantages of a good mien, a fine ſhape, and a handſome and well-made ſuit of clothes. Every one perceived he looked upon this young man with pleaſure, and from that moment it was thought Villiers might ſupplant the earl of Somerſet. And indeed with that view it was that certain lords had brought him before the king, and placed him at the play juſt oppoſite to him.

George Villiers was of a good and antient family in Leiceſterſhire, ſon of ſir George Villiers [b], of Brookeſby, by a ſecond wife, who bore him three ſons, of whom this George was the ſecond [c]. After the death of ſir George, his widow married ſir Thomas Compton, brother of the lord Compton [d]. As George Villiers was but a younger ſon of a ſecond bed, his fortune could be but ſmall; nevertheleſs, his mother took great care of his education. After he had finiſhed his ſtudies, ſhe ſent him into France, where he made himſelf perfect maſter of the French tongue, with all the exerciſes proper for a gentleman, and eſpecially dancing, wherein he excelled. When he returned from his travels, his mother ſent him to court to make himſelf known, and endeavour to procure himſelf friends and a place [e]. He no ſooner appeared there, but the earl of Pembroke, the earl of Bedford, and ſome other lords, enemies to the favourite, and who ſought his deſtruction, fancied this young man might be ſubſervient to their deſign. They knew the king ſufficiently, to hope he would be taken with the outward accompliſhments of this new comer. To that end, they liberally ſupplied him, where-

My lady dying ſoon after, ſir George became ſo enamoured of Mary, that he married her, and at his death, left her a jointure of 200l. a year. This account Roger Coke, eſq; had from a lady, whoſe youngeſt ſiſter was married to the viſcount Purbeck, eldeſt ſon of ſir George Villiers, by Mary Beaumont. with to deck himſelf and attract the king's eyes. Their project ſucceeded to their expectation. The king being at the play, looked with admiration on George Villiers, and could not help ſhewing ſome ſigns of his growing inclination. He took care however to conceal it as much as poſſible, not to alarm the earl of Somerſet; nevertheleſs, he reſolved from that inſtant to have Villiers near his perſon, imagining he might eaſily keep both. So, to have time to manage the affair, he privately cauſed Villiers to purchaſe a cup-bearer's place, and to be inſtructed how to behave.

What care ſoever the king might take to conceal his new inclination, the courtiers did not fail to diſcover it. Somerſet, as moſt concerned, was harder to be deceived than the reſt. His office of lord chamberlain giving him a great authority over the king's ſervants, he did not want opportunities to vex and mortify Villiers, who bore it with all patience; and the king feigned not to perceive it. But at laſt, an accident happened which ſuffered not the king to diſſemble any longer. It was cuſtomary for the cup-bearer whoſe turn it was to be in waiting, to have the firſt place at the table where the cup-bearers dined. Villiers having begun his month, ſat at the upper-end during the whole time of his ſervice, without any oppoſition. But offering to ſit in the ſame place after his month was expired, the perſon, whoſe turn it was to wait, rudely thruſt him from thence, which greatly confounded him. Some days after, the ſame cup-bearer carrying a glaſs of wine to the king, let it fall accidentally or deſignedly on Villiers, who gave him a box on the ear. It is a law of a long ſtanding at court, that whoever ſtrikes another in the king's palace, is to loſe his right-hand, with many formalities. It is the lord chamberlain's buſineſs to ſee crimes of this nature puniſhed, and the earl of Somerſet failed not to do all that lay in his power to have the law executed to the utmoſt rigour. But the king granted Villiers a pardon, without enjoining any ſatisfaction to the party offended. This was the firſt public mark of his affection for Villiers.

From thenceforward, the earl of Somerſet's enemies labour-ed inceſſantly to ruin him in the king's favour, in which they could not better ſucceed, than by cheriſhing the king's new inclination by immoderate commendations of Villiers. The truth is, that even before he had ſeen Villiers, the king began to be weary of Somerſet, who was not ſo agreeable as when he was firſt taken into favour. Since his marriage with the counteſs of Eſſex, he was grown very melancholy, of which probably Overbury's death was the cauſe, and become more careleſs of his perſon and dreſs. He had loſt that vivacity which rendered him ſo agreeable to the king; and his temper, now gloomy and ſullen, induced him harſhly to oppoſe ſome wanton tricks which were now and then played in the king's anti-chamber, and wherein his majeſty took a ſingular delight. Nay, he was become ſo intereſted, that he did nothing for any one without money. His enemies did not forget to inform the king, or hint the ſame to him, knowing how much it might conduce to make him forfeit his favour, ſince there was no vice more contrary to the king's humour than avarice. The queen for her part miſſed no opportunity to do him ill offices: ſo that, in all appearance the project of making Villiers the king's favourite was formed upon the viſible ſigns of the earl of Somerſet's decline.

The whole court perceived the alteration in the king ſince he had Villiers about him, and every one ſtrove to thruſt the old favourite down the precipice. The beſt way to that end, was to oblige the king to declare for Villiers; but there was a great obſtacle to be removed. The king, by a very groſs artifice, would have no favourite but of the queen's recommending, that in caſe ſhe complained of him afterwards, he might ſay, he had received him at her hands. This was the king's turn, who fancied by ſuch a device, to impoſe upon the queen and the whole court. The buſineſs therefore was to prevail with the queen, to recommend Villiers to the king. But ſhe was already prejudiced againſt the young man, and not ſeeing with the king's eyes, perceived nothing in him worthy of ſo great an advancement. Perhaps too, ſhe had caſt her eyes on ſome other, to procure him that favour. Somerſet's enemies knowing how the queen ſtood affected to Villiers, thought the archbiſhop of Canterbury alone able to perſuade her to what they deſired. The archbiſhop, who neither loved nor valued the earl of Somerſet, readily undertook to ſpeak to the queen; but his firſt attempt was in vain. The queen, who was perfectly acquainted with the king's temper, told the prelate, that neither he, nor they who ſet him on, knew what they did; adding, "I know the king better than you all, for if this young man be once brought in, the firſt perſons he will plague, muſt be you that labour for him; yea, I ſhall have my part alſo. The king will teach him to deſpiſe and hardly intreat us all, that he may ſeem to be beholden to none but himſelf."

For this time the archbiſhop could not prevail with the queen; but afterwards he ſo preſſed her, that at length ſhe deſired the king to receive Villiers as a favourite. The king, who only waited for this, ſent immediately for Villiers, knighted him with the prince of Wales's ſword, and ordered him to be ſworn gentleman of the bed-chamber. Somerſet hearing of it, came immediately, and intreated the king to make Villiers only a groom; but the archbiſhop and other lords beſought the queen to complete the work; and at laſt Villiers was admitted to the poſt ordered him by the king [f]. As ſoon as he was out of the king's preſence he waited upon the archbiſhop, and acknowledging himſelf indebted to him for his good fortune, deſired his inſtructions how to behave. The prelate told him, he had three leſſons to give him: Firſt, To pray without ceaſing for the king's proſperity, and for grace to ſerve his maſter faithfully. Secondly, To labour continually to preſerve a good union between the king, queen, and prince. Thirdly, To tell the king nothing but truth. Then he cauſed him to repeat theſe three leſſons before him, to ſee if he retained them. The king hearing this, was extremely well pleaſed with it, and ſaid, theſe leſſons were truly worthy of a biſhop. The queen's prediction proved but too true with regard to the archbiſhop, who was one of the firſt to whom Villiers became ungrateful. Mean while, Villiers being come to court without a great ſtock of money, the king eaſily gueſſed he wanted a ſupply. Had it been in his power to follow his inclination, this ſupply would have been very conſiderable; but he was himſelf ſo deſtitute of money, that a preſent of a thouſand pounds was all he could ſpare at that time.

After Villiers was made gentleman of the bed-chamber, ſeveral courtiers adhered to him, in hopes he would ſoon have the advantage of his rival. Others continued firm to the earl of Somerſet, whether out of gratitude, or for fear of ruining their fortune by falſe conjectures. Two parties therefore were formed at court, who mutually claſhed upon all occaſions. If the king had at once diſmiſſed Somerſet, all would have been quiet: but he intended to keep both, not ſo much out of love to Somerſet, of whom he was tired, as to avoid the imputation of inconſtancy. Thus the king ſtill affecting to ſhew he loved his old favourite as well as ever, the courtiers were greatly embarraſſed. But Villiers daily ſtole the hearts of the courtiers and petitioners from his rival, by his noble and generous way of promoting their ſuits.

Mean while, the earl of Somerſet perceiving, he daily declined in favour, before all things thought of ſecuring himſelf from the danger to which he might be expoſed by Overbury's murder. Though he knew the king had not the ſame affection for him as formerly, he hoped however, as it was not entirely extinguiſhed, to obtain what at leaſt would free him from uneaſineſs. So, ſpying a favourable opportunity, he caſt himſelf at the king's feet, and repreſented to him, that having ſerved him ſome years in a very dangerous poſt, it was difficult not to fall into ſome miſcarriages, and therefore beſought him to grant him a general pardon, which might ſecure him from the malice of his enemies. The king very readily complied with his requeſt, and ordered as ample a pardon as poſſible to be drawn. This was accordingly done; but, whether through the ignorance or malice of the perſon who drew the inſtrument, the king was made to ſay in it, that "He pardoned not only all manner of treaſons, murders, felonies, and outrages whatever, already committed, but alſo thoſe which ſhould be hereafter committed by the earl of Somerſet [g]." The king ſigned the pardon without any ſcruple, and perhaps without reading it. But the lord chancellor Egerton refuſed to put the ſeal to it [h]; ſaying, as there had never been an inſtance of ſuch a pardon, he ſhould incur a præmunire if he paſſed it: and when he told the king the reaſon of his refuſal, he eaſily ſatisfied him, he could not anſwer ſetting the ſeal to the pardon. Nothing was more eaſy than to draw another pardon, without the clauſe diſliked by the chancellor; but whether the queen was againſt it, as ſome affirm, or Somerſet did not care to diſcover too plainly the occaſion he had for a pardon, or the king was now informed of the circumſtances of Overbury's death, nothing more was ſaid of it. Indeed, it is likely the king had now ſome knowledge of Overbury's treatment, but perhaps not ſufficient to ſatisfy him of the earl's guilt. However, he began his ſummer progreſs before the affair became public.

The king's diſſimulation with reſpect to his two favourites held the court in continual ſuſpence. Many were afraid of adhering to Villiers, leſt his credit might not yet be firmly eſtabliſhed. Others declared openly againſt Somerſet, in order to make a merit of it with the new favourite. Winwood was one of theſe, and affected, upon all occaſions, to oppoſe the earl of Somerſet, who had it not in his power to be revenged. During the whole progreſs, there were many diſputes and quarrels between the two parties, to the king's great diſguſt. At length the fatal blow was given, at the court's return to Royſton.

Franklin, who adminiſtered the poiſoned clyſter to Overbury, made uſe, to compoſe it, of one Reeve an apothecary's boy, who was afterwards ſent into Flanders, or perhaps run away from his maſter. This Reeve being at Fluſhing, where ſome buſineſs had brought ſir William Trumbull his majeſty's envoy at Bruſſels, got acquainted with ſome of his ſervants, and whether unadviſedly, or with deſign, informed them of what he knew concerning Overbury's death [l]. The ſervants telling their maſter what they had heard, he examined Reeve himſelf, and drawing from him what he deſired, found means to detain him at his houſe. Then he wrote to Winwood, deſiring him to obtain the king's leave for him to come to England, becauſe he had ſome things to reveal, which he could not truſt to paper. Leave being granted, he acquainted Winwood with what he had learned [k], and Winwood told it the king, who commanded them both to keep it private till further orders.

Some time after, the king being returned to London, wanted to reconcile his two favourites, to be freed from the continual importunities occaſioned by their conteſts, and thoſe of their adherents. He thought he had found a notable expedient, by obliging Villiers to make the firſt advances, and deſire the earl of Somerſet's favour and protection. To that purpoſe, he ordered ſir Humphrey May, Somerſet's creature, but who ſhewed great reſpect for Villiers, to tell the earl, as of himſelf, that he was credibly informed, Villiers would come and deſire his friendſhip and protection, and adviſed him to receive him civily, and that by giving the king this token of his compliance, he would ſtill be very much in favour, though he was not to flatter himſelf with reigning alone in the king's affection. Sir Humphrey May having diſcharged his commiſſion, and perceiving the earl of Somerſet unwilling to follow his advice, was at length forced to tell him in plain terms, that what he had ſaid was by the king's order, and warned him to conſider ſeriouſly the conſequence of a refuſal. About half an hour after, Villiers came to the earl's, and uſed theſe very words: "My lord, I deſire to be your ſervant and creature, and to take my court preferment under your lordſhip's favour, and your lordſhip ſhall find me as faithful a ſervant as ever did ſerve you." To this ſo ſubmiſſive a compliment, the earl returned this ſhort and quick anſwer, "I will have none of your ſervice, and you ſhall have none of my favour. I will, if I can, break your neck, and of that be confident." Theſe words very much exaſperated the king, who from that inſtant reſolved to be rid of the earl of Somerſet.

It is hard to gueſs, whether, ſuppoſing the earl of Somerſet had behaved with more condeſcenſion to the king, and been reconciled to Villiers, Overbury's affair would have been buried in eternal oblivion. This ſeems at leaſt to be the courſe the king had reſolved to take, if the earl had been inclined to do what he deſired. Be this as it will, the king being come to Royſton, to begin his winter progreſs, expreſſed no diſpleaſure againſt Somerſet, but lived with him as he was wont, without the leaſt ſign of any alteration in his friendſhip. But ſome days after, he ſent in the night a meſſenger to lord chief juſtice Coke, with a letter, ordering him to make a warrant to apprehend the earl of Somerſet at Royſton, and his counteſs at London, with Franklin, Weſton, Mrs. Turner, and ſir Gervaſe Elweys, lieutenant of the Tower. The meſſenger was ſent back to Royſton at four o'clock in the morning, with an officer of juſtice to execute the warrant. At his arrival, the officer found the king with his arms about Somerſet's neck, who was juſt going to London, and affectionately ſaying to him, "When ſhall I ſee thee again, Somertſet [l]?" At that very inſtant the officer arreſted the earl by Sir Edward's warrant, who exclaimed, that ſuch an affront was never offered to a peer of the realm in the king's preſence. The king feigning ignorance, and aſking what was the matter, ſaid jeſtingly, "Nay, man, there is no remedy, for if Coke ſends for me I muſt go." Then accompanying him to the ſteps before the door, he deſired him as he was going down, to return ſpeedily, ſaying, he could not live without him. As ſoon as Somerſet was in his coach, the king ſaid, in the hearing of ſome perſons, who told it again afterwards, "Now the deel go with thee, I will never ſee thy face more." If this be true, it muſt be owned, it was a needleſs and very ſtrange diſſimulation; but king James took delight in things of this nature.

At his coming to London, the earl of Somerſet was ſent to the Tower [m], his counteſs, and the reſt of the accomplices, having been arreſted and committed, whilſt he was on the road. The ſame day, chief juſtice Coke going to Royſton, the king told him all he had heard from Trumbull, and enjoined him, with all poſſible ſcrutiny, to ſearch into the affair, without partiality or reſpect of perſons. He concluded with ſaying, "God's curſe be upon you and yours, if you ſpare any of them: And God's curſe be upon me and mine, if I pardon any one of them."

Coke receiving ſuch ſtrict orders, was very active in the affair. Nay, ſome pretend, he was too active, and that finding in the earl of Somerſet's papers, indications of his being concerned in the death of prince Henry, he had not the prudence to conceal them. However this be, moſt of the parties accuſed were tried in October and November, and being found guilty, were condemned and executed [n]. Sir Thomas Monſon, who was alſo arreſted, appeared twice before the judges, and at the ſecond time Coke received a note from the king, which obliged him to ſend back the priſoner to the Tower, with theſe words, "Take him away, we have other matters againſt him of a higher nature." It is affirmed, Coke ſaid aloud one day, as he was ſitting on the bench, "God knows what became of that ſweet babe prince Henry, but I know ſomewhat," and then ſtopped ſhort. This gave occaſion to think, he had made ſome diſcovery concerning the prince's death [o].

Simon Maſon, ſervant to Monſon, who had been employed to carry a poiſoned tart to Overbury, being likewiſe brought before the court, the judge ſaid to him, "Simon, thou hadſt a hand in this poiſoning buſineſs." "No, my good lord (anſwered Simon), I had but one finger in it, which coſt me all my hair and nails." He had, it ſeems, out of liqueriſhneſs, as he was carrying the tart, taſted with his finger a little of the ſyrup. This ingenious anſwer cauſed him to be acquitted: for it was thought he would not have taſted the ſyrup, had he known it to be poiſoned.

The trial of the earl of Somerſet and his counteſs was deferred to May the next year 1616 [p]: but not to be obliged to return to this affair, I ſhall relate here the circumſtances of the trial. If we may believe Sir Anthony Weldon, author of a little book, entitled The Court and Character of King James, which is properly but a ſatire, the king had aſſured the earl of Somerſet he ſhould not be brought to a trial. For that reaſon, when George More, lieutenant of the Tower, came and told him, he muſt prepare for his trial on the morrow, he anſwered, That poſitively he would not appear unleſs he was carried by force in his bed. The ſame author adds, the king being informed of it, ſent him word, he could not hinder his appearing before the judges, but would prevent the paſſing any ſentence upon him [q]. By this artifice, ſays

[l] The words at length, as related by Weldon, were, "For God's ſake when ſhall I ſee thee again? On my ſoul, I ſhall neither eat nor ſleep, until you come again." The earl told him, on Monday (this being on Friday), "For God's ſake, ſhall I, ſhall I?" Then lolled about his neck; then, "For God's ſake, give thy lady this kiſs for me," In the ſame manner at the ſtairs head, and at the middle, and foot of the ſtairs, p. 102, 103.

Weldon, the earl was prevailed with to appear in court, where he pleaded in his defence from eight in the morning till ſeven in the evening, when, contrary to his expectation, ſentence of death was paſſed upon him, as guilty of Overbury's murder. The ſame author ſays, the king was terribly uneaſy all the day, neither was he at reſt till the news came of his condemnation. This author's aim, in relating theſe and may other circumſtances, was to inſinuate, that the king was afraid the earl of Somerſet, to ſave his life, would reveal ſome ſecrets he had a mind to conceal. But theſe ſecrets are not explained, and probably are only chimeras. If the king had feared any thing from the earl of Somerſet, he would never have brought him to a trial, or commanded the judge to examine him ſtrictly. Nevertheleſs, though Weldon be ſatirical, and there is no depending upon his teſtimony, ſome truth however appears in what he relates, ſince the king's conduct, after the earl of Somerſet's condemnation, ſhews there was in this affair ſome circumſtance by which he was embarraſſed.

The counteſs of Somerſet being brought before the court, pleaded only with a ſhower of tears, which raiſed ſome compaſſion in her judges, but however, hindered her not from being condemned to die as well as her lord. The king granted them a reprieve, which was often renewed till the year 1621, when they had liberty to go and live at a country-ſeat, without however being releaſed from their ſentence. At laſt, in 1624, about four months before the king's death, a pardon was granted them. After the earl of Somerſet was condemned, the king gave him four thouſand pounds a year in land, which he took in his ſervants names. This noble preſent, the pardon granted the earl, notwithſtanding the curſe denounced by the king againſt himſelf and poſterity if ever he pardoned the guilty, his reſtleſſneſs during the trial, the note ſent to the chief juſtice whilſt he was trying ſir Thomas Monſon, Coke's imprudent words concerning prince Henry, and his diſgrace which ſoon followed, all theſe things, I ſay, have given occaſion to king James's enemies to inſinuate, he was conſcious of ſome guilt, and they have been pleaſed to apply the whole to prince Henry's death. But, beſides that all theſe circumſtances could at moſt only form a bare preſumption, who can affirm them to be all preciſely true? Amidſt the perpetual contrarieties in the authors who wrote of king James I. it is hard to know diſtinctly the truth. Some paſs over in ſilence particulars which are chiefly inſiſted upon by others, or abſolutely deny facts, which the others advance as inconteſtible. Some there are whoſe aim was to give a very ill idea of the manners and qualities of this prince, whilſt others repreſent him as a very wiſe, juſt, and religious king. Some penned his reign while the civil wars raged in England, or when the monarchy was changed into a commonwealth. Theſe thought to do their country ſervice, in demonſtrating that the project of enſlaving England was begun in the reign of king James I. and purſued in that of Charles I. Others wrote after the reſtoration of Charles II. when the civil wars were ſtiled an unnatural rebellion, and when the fear of falling under an arbitrary government was termed chimerical. Hence ariſes the difficulty of making a choice amidſt all the contrarieties between the hiſtorians. Unhappily the ſame parties ſtill ſubſiſt with the ſame prejudices. So there is little hopes of ſeeing an impartial hiſtory of England from the beginning of king James I.'s reign to our time. Let a hiſtorian turn which way ſoever he pleaſes, he will be looked upon as partial by one or other of the two factions. This is a remark abſolutely neceſſary as well for the fact juſt mentioned, as for the whole reign of James I. and ſtill more for the following.

To finiſh what relates to the earl and counteſs of Somerſet, I ſhall briefly add, that their love, which had engaged them to commit ſuch abominable deeds, turned at laſt to hatred. They lived together many years in one houſe as ſtrangers to each other, and at laſt the counteſs died of an uncommon diſeaſe [r]. The earl lived long enough [s] to ſee his daughter married to the duke of Bedford, who had by her the lord Ruſſel, beheaded in the reign of Charles II.

Arabella Stuart, firſt couſin to the king, died in the Tower the 27th of September 1615, a little before the trial of the accompliees of Overbury's murder. Many ſeeing that, on occaſion of theſe trials, prince Henry's death began to be talked of afreſh, imagined this kinſwoman of his majeſty might alſo be poiſoned. This is what ſome hiſtorians, enemies to king James, have advanced, or at leaſt inſinuated, without any other foundation than this malicious report, grounded upon the chimerical project in the beginning of the preſent reign, of ſetting Arabella on the throne. She was daughter of Charles Stuart, younger brother to Henry, his majeſty's father. Conſequently, ſhe could have but very remote pretenſions to the crowns of England and Scotland, which James enjoyed not by the title of the Stuart family, of which he was by the father's ſide, but by his mother queen Mary's right, to whom Arabella was only a very diſtant relation. The king therefore muſt have carried his ſuſpicions beyond all imagination, to reſolve to poiſon this relation at a time when there was no commotion, either in England or Scotland, and when ſhe was actually in priſon. The cauſe of her diſgrace was, her privately eſpouſing without the king's conſent ſir William Seymour, grandſon of the earl of Hertford, for which the king ſent them both to the Tower, from whence ſome time after they made their eſcape with intent to fly into France. Seymour had the good fortune to eſcape, but Arabella was taken and ſhut up in the Tower, where ſhe died [t].

[1616] The earl of Somerſet's affair ending the diſpute between the two favourites, the court was reſtored to its former tranquillity, under the management of Villiers, who engroſſed the king's affection without a rival [u]. The new favourite behaved in much the ſame manner as his predeceſſor. He ſuffered himſelf at firſt to be guided by ſuch as he thought wiſer and more experienced than himſelf: but in time he thought himſelf the moſt able perſon in the kingdom. His firſt care was to diſmiſs by degrees the earl of Somerſet's creatures, and confer the places on his own relations and friends. Nothing more material was tranſacted at court for ſome years, except the two uſual affairs of this reign, wherein the promotion of the new favourite made no alteration: I mean the advancement of the prerogative-royal, and the methods of raiſing money without the parliament. The firſt of theſe two points produced in the year 1616, between the king and the judges, a ſharp conteſt, the occaſion whereof was this:

The king deſigning to give in Commendam a vacant church [w], it was diſputed in the court of Common-Pleas, not only whether the king might give a Commendam to a biſhop, either before or after his conſecration, but alſo whether Commendams were to be granted without neceſſity. The chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas finding the caſe difficult to be decided, deſired to have it farther argued by all the judges, as is uſually done in nice points. The king, who was at Royſton, being informed of it, commanded his attorney-general Bacon, to ſignify by letters to all the judges, that they ſhould defer the determination of the affair till his return. Notwithſtanding this order, the judges met and argued the caſe. After which, they unanimouſly ſigned a writing, declaring they could not obey the king's order, becauſe they were ſworn to have no regard to the king's orders or letters, in matters concerning private perſons [x]. The king, provoked at their proceeding, wrote to them, that it was not his intent to ſtop the courſe of juſtice; but however he would not endure, that under colour of determining caſes between private perſons, they ſhould attack the prerogative royal, or "That any perſon ſhould be allowed to diſpute or argue on that head." That the argument drawn from their oath was impertinent, ſince the oath was enjoined by the kings his predeceſſors, only to prevent the importunities of ſuitors to the prince, and not to give the judges authority to determine in points of prerogative. He concluded with a peremptory command not to proceed "till they had conſulted him."

It muſt be obſerved, that in this letter, the king ſuppoſed two or three principles, which neither the judges, nor the generality of the nation did admit. The firſt, that no perſon thou ſhalt find thou doſt it for a thankful maſter." Whereupon More aſſures the king, he would do his utmoſt to ſerve his majeſty, and leaving him, went and uſed the ſtratagem above mentioned. This relation, the author ſays, he had from More's own mouth. Court of King James, p. 115---117.

[s] He died in July 1645, and was buried in the pariſh church of St. Paul, Covent-Garden. Dugdale's Baron. vol. II. p. 426.

[t] Sir William Seymour upon his marriage was committed to the Tower, but Arabella was confined to her houſe at Highgate. After ſome time they appointed to meet at a certain place on the Thames, in order to fly beyond ſea. He leaving his man in his bed to act his part with his keeper, got out of the Tower in diſguiſe, and came to the place appointed. She, dreſſed like a young gallant, followed him from her houſe; but happening to ſtay beyond the limited time, he went away, leaving word, if ſhe came, he was gone before to Dunkirk. She, full of tears, and lagging in her flight, was apprehended and ſent to the Tower. After her death ſir William got leave to come home, and married afterwards the lady Frances, ſiſter to the earl of Eſſex. Wilſon, p. 702.

[x] They told the king their oath was, "That in caſe any letters came to them contrary to law, they are not to obey them, but to proceed to juſtice." Annals, p. 17.

had a right to argue concerning the extent of his prerogative, ſince the judges of the realm, being conſidered as middle perſons between the king and people, were alone to decide, and commonly did decide the queſtions on this head. The ſecond principal was, that the oath taken by the judges at their admittance into their office, was enjoined by the kings, his predeceſſors, to avoid the ſollicitations of ſuitors; whereas it was the common opinion that the power aſcribed to the judges to diſobey the king's letters, was given them by the whole nation repreſented in parliament [y]. The third principal was, that nothing ought to be decided [z] without conſulting him; that is to ſay, their determination was to be founded upon what he ſhould himſelf enjoin. People for the moſt part affirmed, the king would thereby eſtabliſh a new prerogative unheard of in England.

The king being returned to London, ſent for all the judges to the council table, and reprimanded them ſeverely. He told them, among other things, that ſince his acceſſion to the crown of England, he had obſerved that the counſellors at the bar [a] took the liberty to argue the extent of the prerogative royal, which on that pretence was trampled upon, and it was the judges buſineſs to bridle that inſolence in their reſpective courts. Then, ſpeaking of the order he had ſent them, he imperiouſly told them, there was no reaſon that could excuſe their non-compliance [b]. The king's manner of expreſſing himſelf, terrified the judges, who choſe rather to give way than reſiſt him to his face. Coke alone conſtantly maintained, that the king's order being contrary to law, they were not to blame for refuſing to obey it. Whereupon the king ſaid, with ſome emotion, whether they had done well or ill, he would not ſuffer his prerogative to be conteſted. In fine, the judges being withdrawn, the council unanimouſly determined the caſe in favour of the king [c].

This affair made great noiſe among the people. They who were already prejudiced againſt the king, ſaid, it was evident he intended to reign with an abſolute power: that not only he contemned the determinations of the judges, but would not ſo much as endure that his prerogative ſhould be argued, and pretended to be ſole judge of the extent of his own authority. But others admired his courage, in maintaining the prerogatives of the crown.

It was not long before Coke felt the effects of the king's wrath. The chief juſtice having brought a complaint in the Star-chamber againſt the lord chancellor Elleſmere, concerning an order iſſued out of the court of chancery, and having loſt his cauſe [d], wherein he was accuſed, 1. Of having wrongfully attacked the lord chancellor [e]. 2. Of having, when attorney general, concealed a ſtatute of twelve thouſand pounds due to the king from the lord chancellor Hatton. 3. Of having ſaid in open court, that his majeſty was labouring to overthrow the common-law of England. 4. Of having behaved very inſolently to the king, in the caſe of Commendams. The lord treaſurer upbraided him likewiſe before the council, for ſuffering his coachman to drive him bear-headed, a privilege not granted even to the lord chancellor himſelf. As the king was diſpleaſed with him, this was ſufficient to turn him out of his place, which was given to Sir Henry Montague. Coke was extremely well verſed in the common laws of England, of which he wrote a book highly eſteemed, and which is daily cited in the courts of juſtice, and the high court of parliament [f]. But as he was one of thoſe who ſuſpected the king of aſpiring to arbitrary power, and thought it his duty to oppoſe it, he could not be agreeable to the court.

Preſently after, the lord chancellor Elleſmere being taken ſo ill as to deſpair of being able to continue the functions of his office, deſired the king to confer it on another [g]. But the king, without granting his requeſt, ſent for the ſeal, telling him, he would himſelf be his deputy: and indeed, he kept the great-ſeal till Elleſmere's death, which was not till March the next year. After that, ſir Francis Bacon, attorney general, was made lord keeper, and then chancellor. He was a man of great abilities, as appears in his works, but a ſervile flatterer, cringing to thoſe who were in favour, and very haughty to ſuch as he believed he ſhould not want [h].

Prince Charles, the king's only ſon, was created this year [i] prince of Wales, with the uſual ſolemnities. The king thought of marrying him, but it was not eaſy to find a princeſs fit for him. There was no proteſtant princeſs of royal extraction in Europe, and his father could not reſolve to marry him to any but a king's daughter. Several of his predeceſſors had not been ſo difficult: but for his part, he was extremely nice on this occaſion. He would have thought it a diſparagement to his ſon to marry the daughter of any German prince. He choſe rather, contrary to all the rules of good policy, to ſeek him a wife in a houſe ſworn enemy to the proteſtant religion, than to marry him to one of his own religion, who was not royally deſcended. This infatuation, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, is to be conſidered as the ſource of the reſt of the occurrences of this reign, and of all the vexations James had to endure, as well from foreigners as his own ſubjects. It may be farther added, that this made him better known than before, and in a manner not to his advantage. He would have married his eldeſt ſon prince Henry to Anne of Auſtria, who afterwards eſpouſed Lewis XIII. king of France: but having at laſt diſcovered that the court of Spain carried on the negotiation only to amuſe him, he gave over his deſign. The French king's marriage being ſolemnized this year 1616, James ſent embaſſadors to France and Spain to congratulate the two kings. The lord Hay, a Scotchman, was choſen for the French embaſſy [k], and the lord Roſs for the Spaniſh. They had both orders to ſound the two courts concerning the prince of Wales's marriage with the princeſs eldeſt ſiſter of Lewis XIII. or with the infanta Maria daughter of Philip III. The lord Hay quickly found his negotiation would be fruitleſs, ſince the princeſs of France was already promiſed to the prince of Piedmont ſon to the duke of Savoy.

Whilſt theſe things were in agitation, and before the lord Roſs's arrival in Spain, ſir John Digby, his majeſty's embaſſador to Philip III. wrote to the king, that the duke of Lerma had made an overture of a marriage between the infanta Maria and the prince of Wales, and deſired private inſtructions on that head. He adviſed him however not to break off the negotiation with France, for fear the duke of Lerma's offer ſhould be an artifice to render him ſuſpected to the proteſtants. James could the leſs doubt of Digby's ſuſpicion being well grounded, as ſir Dudley Carleton, his embaſſador at the Hague, had told him, that to weaken the good intelligence between him and the ſtates general, a report was ſpread that the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta of Spain was on foot and now far advanced. But he took no notice of this intelligence: on the contrary, he ſent orders to ſir John

They petitioned againſt him in the Star-chamber, the lord chief juſtice joining with them, and threatening the chancellor with a præmunire. The chancellor applies to the king, who ſent to ſir Francis Bacon, ſir Henry Montague, &c. to ſearch for precedents of ſuch as complained in chancery, and were relieved according to equity, after judgment at common law. Digby to begin the negotiation with Spain. At the ſame time don Diego di Sarmientos count Gondemar, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, received a commiſſion to treat with the king concerning the marriage.

After James had taken this reſolution, he could not conceal his extreme deſire to accompliſh the marriage. Hence he gave occaſion to the Spaniard, who had then no deſign to treat ſeriouſly of the affair, to feign that he paſſionately wiſhed to conclude it to his ſatisfaction, and to draw from his readineſs conſiderable advantages for the houſe of Auſtria and the catholic religion. By means of this ſame deſire it was that count Gondemar, a man of great abilities, ſo inſinuated himſelf into the king's favour, that for many years he cauſed him to do almoſt whatever he pleaſed, by putting him in fear that the marriage would miſcarry if the Spaniſh court was not managed. We may judge of the policy of that court by the length of this negotiation, which was made to laſt ſeven years. At firſt the Spaniard intended only to hinder king James from concerning himſelf in the war of Cleves, and aſſiſting the proteſtant princes; but afterwards a more important affair made it his intereſt more than ever to amuſe the king of England, and to keep him at bay.

Certainly James's conduct, who in ſome men's opinion paſſes for the Solomon of his age, was very extraordinary. Under colour of being at peace with all the world, he meddled not with any foreign affairs. He beheld without concern France openly labouring the deſtruction of the Hugonots, and the houſe of Auſtria forming projects to enſlave all Europe, and daily increaſing in power, to the juſt dread of the reſt of the ſtates, and eſpecially the proteſtant. Moreover, he expreſſed a ſtrong deſire to be allied to that houſe, by a marriage which could not but be prejudical to the eſtabliſhed religion of England. In ſhort, if his management at home be examined, the capacity, the great wiſdom he thought himſelf bleſſed with, will no where appear. Without any war upon his hands he had conſumed immenſe ſums, and alienated almoſt all the crown lands, to enrich a dozen of Engliſh and Scotch favourites, who had never done him any conſiderable ſervice. The earl of Somerſet had before his diſgrace amaſſed two hundred thouſand pounds in money, plate, and jewels, beſides nineteen thouſand pounds a year in land, though he had been but five years in favour [l]. The earl of Saliſbury, younger ſon to the lord Burleigh, who had no eſtate but what he derived from the crown, had left his ſon as rich as any peer in the kingdom. The earl of Northampton, younger brother of the late duke of Norfolk, had built a ſtately palace in London [m], ſince called Northumberland-houſe, and left a vaſt inheritance to his nephew the earl of Arundel, though he had little or nothing from his family. The earl of Suffolk, youngeſt ſon of the duke of Norfolk, had built a country-ſeat, which coſt him above two hundred thouſand pounds; and he did not, as may be judged, expend his whole ſubſtance on this ſtructure [n]. The duke of Lenox, the earl of Dunbar, the lord Hay, had remitted great ſums into Scotland; and ſir Henry Rich, afterwards earl of Holland, though a younger ſon, had found means to raiſe an immenſe eſtate. Amidſt all theſe favourites ſo rich and powerful, the king was in extreme want, continually giving more than he could afford, and running into needleſs expences without ever regulating his treaſury. To all this was added a new favourite, who being no leſs greedy than the reſt, was alſo to be enriched, and had a numerous kindred, whom he did not mean to leave in want [o]. Another effect of the king's great wiſdom was to quarrel with his parliament, in ſupport of a prerogative which he would have carried higher than any of his predeceſſors, and thereby put himſelf under a neceſſity of uſing means to raiſe money, which could not but alienate from him the love of his people. Laſtly, Let us add his weakneſs in ſuffering himſelf always to be ſo governed by his favourites, that he could not or would not ſee but with their eyes. At the time I am now ſpeaking of, his cabinet council conſiſted ſolely of the new favourite, a young man without experience, through whoſe hands never any affair of moment had paſſed, and who notwithſtanding thought himſelf the moſt able man in the kingdom [p]. The earl of Suffolk was more verſed in affairs, though he was never counted a great genius; but he was now upon the decline of his favour, Villiers being far from ſupporting the earl of Somerſet's father-in-law. Bacon, lord keeper, was well verſed in the laws of the land, and capable of giving good advice; but he made it his ſole ſtudy to adapt himſelf to the king's humour, and make his court to the favourite.

The only affair which then employed the king and his miniſters was to find money, and in plenty too, otherwiſe the king would have led a ſad life; but all means ſeemed to have been exhauſted, and a parliament could not ſafely be called, the wound of the impriſoned members being ſtill too freſh to hope it was yet cloſed. Mean while, the treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta procured the king an unexpected ſupply. Queen Elizabeth had ſettled with the ſtates of the United Provinces the arrears they owed her, amounting to eight millions of florins. This ſum was due to James, as Elizabeth's ſucceſſor. The ſtates would have paid the debt long ſince, had they not found their account in remaining debtors to England, becauſe they thereby engaged that kingdom to ſupport them. But after the twelve years truce was concluded, the face of affairs was altered. The ſtates no longer wanted the king's protection; and beſides, he held in their provinces, places which gave him opportunity to treat them with haughtineſs, as he had done in the affair of Vorſtius. It was therefore time for them to recover theſe places, ſince they had not the ſame intereſt now to leave them in the king's hands, when their dread of Spain was very much leſſened by the truce. But the ſum they were to pay was ſo conſiderable, that they waited a favourable opportunity to procure them ſome abatement. This opportunity offering not till the preſent year 1616, they embraced it the more eagerly, as they were under an urgent neceſſity to withdraw their towns from the Engliſh. The king treating of his ſon's marriage with the infanta, it was to be feared the reſtitution of theſe towns, to which the Spaniards laid claim, would be one of the articles of the marriage treaty, eſpecially as a clauſe in the treaty of 1604, between England and Spain, gave them juſt cauſe to fear. On the other hand, the preſent juncture was favourable to them, becauſe the king's coffers were quite empty, and there was no likelihood of his venturing to call a parliament, by reaſon of the people's diſcontent. All the difficulty therefore was to order it ſo, that the offer of reſtoring the towns ſhould come from the king himſelf, becauſe in that caſe the ſtates might pretend inability to pay ſo large a ſum, and that would naturally lead to a negotiation for an abatement of the debt. So to bring the king to this point, they ceaſed for a time to pay the garriſons of the places in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, though till then they had punctually executed the treaty which obliged them to pay them. The garriſons complained, and the ſtates, without however refuſing payment, found ſeveral pretences to defer it. This daily conſtrained the Engliſh forces, who were without money, to apply to the king, who was not in condition to ſatisfy them. He complained to the ſtates, who anſwered with great moderation, inſiſting upon the the ill ſtate of their affairs by reaſon of their vaſt expence during the war. In a word, this affair did not end, and the Engliſh garriſons ſtill remained without pay. At laſt, Caron, the Dutch envoy in England, intimated as of himſelf, to ſome one of the miniſters, that he believed, if the king would offer to reſtore the towns in his poſſeſſion, the ſtates would do their utmoſt to diſcharge the whole debt, by borrowing money at a high intereſt. This intimation produced the deſired effect. The king having no money, and ſeeing a near proſpect of drawing from the ſtates a large ſum, which the courtiers had already devoured in their thoughts, readily determined to ſurrender the cautionary towns. Purſuant to this reſolution, he wrote to the ſtates, "That he knew them to be his good friends and confederates, both in point of religion and policy [q], therefore he apprehended not the leaſt fear of difference between them: in contemplation whereof, if they would have their towns again, he would willingly ſurrender them." Upon this letter, they ſent penſionary Barnevelt to the king, who ſo artfully managed the affair, [o] The lord Clarendon obſerves, that Villiers exalted almoſt all of his own numerous family and dependents, whoſe greateſt merit was their alliance to him; which equally offended the antient nobility, and the people of all conditions, who ſaw the flowers of the crown every day fading and withered; whilſt the demeſnes and revenues thereof were ſacrificed to the enriching of a private family ſcarce ever heard of before to the nation; and the expences of the court ſo vaſt and unlimited, that they had a ſad proſpect of that poverty and neceſſity, which afterwards befel the crown, almoſt to the ruin of it. that they were diſcharged for two millions ſeven hnndred twenty-eight thouſand florins, in lieu of eight millions, which they had promiſed to pay to Elizabeth, beſides eighteen years intereſt. By this agreement the cautionary towns were delivered to the ſtates the 14th of June 1616 [r].

They who were not pleaſed with the court, greatly cenſured this treaty, which robbed the crown of England of the advantage of holding the United Provinces in a ſort of ſubjection [s]. It was ſaid, that indeed Elizabeth was bound to reſign theſe places upon the payment of the ſums ſhe had advanced; but there was no neceſſity to reſtore them for much leſs: that there was the leſs occaſion to haſten the reſtitution, as the garriſons were not maintained by the crown; and if the ſtates neglected to perform their agreement with the queen, the king ſhould have made them ſenſible they had not done it with impunity. Theſe things were not for the king's honour, and his proceedings on this occaſion could at moſt but confirm to him the title of Pacific [t], which he affected above all others. But it was much worſe when it was ſeen, in a very ſhort ſpace, that the money paid by the ſtates was vaniſhed, without a poſſibility to gueſs what was become of it. The king had paid none of his debts; the navy was ſuffered to decay for want of money to repair it; and nothing had been ſent to his army in Ireland, which had received no money for ſeveral years, and whoſe wants had ſerved for pretence to treat with the ſtates.

At length it was diſcovered, that the lord treaſurer Suffolk had converted to his own uſe good part of the money received for the cautionary towns. The favourite miſſed not this opportunity to ruin a man, whom he could not conſider as his friend, ſince he was father-in-law to the earl of Somerſet. The lord treaſurer was therefore accuſed in the Star-chamber of ſundry miſdemeanors in the exerciſe of his office, and eſpecially of having kept for himſelf great part of the money received of the Hollanders. Sir Edward Coke, who was reſtored to his place, or had another [u], was his accuſer. He aggravated his miſdemeanors, his extortions, his miſmanagement of the king's treaſures, his boldneſs to apply them to his own uſe, the corruptions of his counteſs, who took bribes with both hands, the artifices of his deputy Bingley [w], to enſnare ſuch as had buſineſs with his maſter. After that, he cited many precedents of treaſurers, who in former reigns had been puniſhed for ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and ſhewed the dangerous conſequences reſulting from the ill adminiſtration of the treaſurerſhip, when it was not managed by uncorrupt perſons. If the lord treaſurer had caſt himſelf upon the king's mercy, he would have been eaſily acquitted: but he ſtrove to juſtify himſelf, and not doing it to the ſatisfaction of his judges, he was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during the king's pleaſure; and Bingley was fined two thouſand pounds. Till the king ſhould make choice of a treaſurer, that office was executed by commiſſioners, the firſt of whom was ſir Henry Montague, a dependent of the favourite.

The earl of Suffolk was not the only ſacrifice to Villiers's policy, who by degrees removed Somerſet's creatures. Sir John Bennet, judge of the prerogative court, was turned out and fined twenty thouſand pounds. Sir Henry Yelverton, the king's attorney, alſo loſt his place, as well as ſeveral others whom it is needleſs to mention. Secretary Winwood dying about this time [x], Sir Robert Naunton a proteſtant, and ſir George Calvert a papiſt, were made ſecretaries.

The tranquillity enjoyed by the king might have been deemed perfect, if the fear of his prerogative being attacked had not continually diſturbed his repoſe. In vain did he preach and advance his principles upon all occaſions, he had the misfortune to be regarded by none but his courtiers and immediate dependents. For this reaſon he durſt not call a parliament, knowing the commons did not allow of his maxims. He ſeems to have thought it pure ignorance in the Engliſh, and that by a frequent repetition of the ſovereign's prerogatives, he ſhould at length ſucceed in convincing them of the truth of his principles. This he took occaſion to do in June this year, in a ſolemn aſſembly held in the Star-chamber, on pretence of making known his deſign to correct certain abuſes crept into the courts of juſtice. He made a very long ſpeech, full of diviſions and ſubdiviſions, according to his cuſtom, and took for his text theſe words of Pſalm lxxii. 1. "Give thy judgments to the king, O God, and thy righteouſneſs to the king's ſon [y]."

He begins with ſaying, "The literal ſenſe of theſe words runs upon David and Solomon, godly and wiſe, the myſtical upon God and Chriſt, juſt and righteous; and from this imitation all governments, eſpecially monarchies, have been eſtabliſhed. Kings ſit in the throne of God, and thence all judgment is derived, from the king to the magiſtrates, not privativé but comulativé. So by the council of Jethro to Moſes, the judges were deputed for eaſier queſtions, the more profound left to Moſes; and in this manner all Chriſtian kings govern, whereby appears the near conjunction between God and the king upward, and the king and the judges downward: the king to ſettle the law of God, and his judges to interpret the law of the king."

Then he teaches the judges their duty in adminiſtering juſtice; and after dwelling upon many common places, he proceeds to the limits preſcribed them: "Incroach not upon the prerogative; deal not in difficult queſtions, before you conſult with the king and council, for fear of wounding the king through the ſides of a private perſon." Whereupon he takes occaſion to commend ſome of the judges, for rebuking the popular humour of certain pleaders at the bar, who meddled with ſuch matters. "That which concerns (ſays he) the myſtery of the king's power, is not lawful to be diſputed; for that is to wade into the weakneſſes of princes, and to take away the myſtical reverence that belongs to thoſe who ſit in the throne of God [z]."

After having run through and given his opinion concerning the ſeveral courts of judicature, he goes on, "It is the duty of judges to puniſh ſuch as ſeek to deprave the king's courts, and therefore it was an odious and inapt ſpeech in Weſtminſter-hall, to ſay that a præmunire lay againſt the court of chancery. I mean not that the chancery ſhould exceed its limits, but the king only is to correct it, and none elſe; and therefore I was greatly abuſed in that attempt: and for that reaſon commanded that no man hereafter preſume to ſue a præmunire againſt that court."

He ſpeaks afterwards of the Star-chamber, and ſays, "As a ſtar is a glorious creature, next in place to the angels; ſo this court is the moſt glorious of all courts, conſiſting of privy counſellors, judges, peers of the realm, and biſhops; and conſequently the learning of both divine and human law, the experience and practice of government, are conjoined together in the proceedings of this court. He added, I have laboured to gather articles, like an index expurgatorius of novelties crept into the law; look to Plowden's caſes, and if you find it not there, away with it."

Then he addreſſes himſelf to the auditory, and gives them advice with reſpect to the law-ſuits that were carrying on in the ſeveral courts. "He chiefly adviſes them in their pleas, not to preſume to meddle with things againſt the king's prerogative or honour: if they do, the judges will puniſh them; and in caſe the judges do not, he muſt puniſh both them and the judges. "Plead not, continues he, upon new puritannical ſtrains, that make all things popular, but keep you within the antient limits of pleas."

In ſpeaking of recuſants, that is, thoſe who refuſed to be of the church of England, he ſays, "There are three ſorts: The firſt are they, who inforced by law come now and then to church; theſe are formal to the law, but falſe to God [a]. The ſecond ſort are they that have their conſcience miſled, and therefore refuſe to come to church, but otherwiſe live as peaceable ſubjects [b]. The third ſort are practiſing recuſants, who force their ſervants and tenants to be of their opinion; theſe are men of pride and preſumption [c]. He adds, I can love the perſon of a papiſt ſo born and bred, but an apoſtate papiſt I hate; ſuch deſerve ſevere puniſhment [d]. I confeſs I am loth to hang a prieſt only for his religion, and ſaying maſs; but if they refuſe the oath of allegiance, I leave them to the law."

He concludes his long ſpeech with exhorting the judges to countenance the clergy againſt the papiſts and puritans; adding, God and the king will reward their zeal.

It is eaſy to obſerve, as well in this as in the king's other ſpeeches in public, and on ſundry other occaſions, three principal deſigns which he had ever in view. The firſt was, to eſtabliſh the prerogative royal according to his own principles. The ſecond, to intimate, that the papiſts were not to be moleſted, provided they lived peaceably, and took the oath of allegiance. The third was, to expreſs his hatred of the puritans, and to create the ſame averſion for them in the people. But it would be a great miſtake, to aſcribe this hatred to their refuſing to allow of the ſurplice, the croſs in baptiſm, kneeling at the communion. Theſe were not the things that rendered them odious in his ſight. He fancied their principles with reſpect to church-government, led them to be enemies to monarchy. For this reaſon, all arguments againſt the extent of the royal prerogative, ſeemed to him to be founded on puritannical principles.

On the 27th of Auguſt the king created ſir George Villiers, baron of Whaddon and viſcount Villiers [e], and on the 1ſt of January following, he was made earl of Buckingham.

[1617] In the beginning of the year 1617, arrived in England Marco Antonio de Dominis [f], archbiſhop of Spalato in Dalmatio, who was to come to profeſs the proteſtant religion in the communion of the church of England. As he was a man advanced in years, and very corpulent, it was readily believed, no other motive but that of religion and conſcience could have induced him to undertake ſo long a voyage, and quit his archbiſhopric. He preached and wrote againſt the Romiſh religion, and at length was preferred to the maſterſhip of the Savoy, and the deanery of Windſor. After ſome years ſtay in England, he ſuffered himſelf to be gained by count Gondemar the Spaniſh embaſſador, with the hopes of a cardinal's cap, if he would go to Rome, and publicly abjure the proteſtant religion. This man, upon the brink of the grave, being ſeduced by Gondemar's promiſe, went to Rome, and abjured the religion he had embraced in England; after which, inſtead of being a cardinal, he was thrown into a dungeon in the inquiſition, where he died, and notwithſtanding his abjuration, his body was publicly burnt [g].

I have ſeveral times mentioned the king's averſion to the puritans, whoſe government, which came very near the republican, was directly contrary to the principles he was labouring to eſtabliſh. Ever ſince his coming to England, he had kept the puritans ſo low, that it was not in their power to give him any diſturbance. But the church of Scotland was ſtill preſbyterian, to his great mortification. Indeed epiſcopacy was not entirely ſuppreſſed in that kingdom; but it was in ſuch a ſtate, that the biſhops had no manner of juriſdiction. The ſeveral preſbyteries and the general aſſembly of the clergy, had engroſſed the whole eccleſiaſtical authority, and left the biſhops only an empty name without power. There were alſo many other points wherein the Scottiſh church differed from the Engliſh, ſo that puritaniſm triumphed in Scotland, at the time it was looked upon in England as a ſort of rebellion. James had therefore reſolved to put the church of Scotland upon the ſame foot with that of England; but perceiving, that to compel the Scots all at once to a perfect conformity with the Engliſh church, would be too difficult an undertaking, he meant to lead them to it by degrees. Purſuant to that ſcheme, he had now ſent to the general-aſſembly of the kirk certain articles, which he deſired might be inſerted in the canons of the church. The articles were:

1. For the future, the holy communion ſhould be received kneeling.

2. The euchariſt ſhall not be denied to the ſick, with three or four perſons to communicate with them.

3. Chriſtmas, Eaſter, Aſcenſion-day, and Whit-Sunday, ſhould be kept as holy-days, and the preachers ſhould make choice of texts ſuitable to the occaſion.

4. Confirmation ſhould be practiſed after this manner: when the children were eight years old, the miniſters ſhould catechiſe them, and then the biſhops in their viſitations ſhould bleſs them with prayer for God's grace, and the gifts of the holy ghoſt [h].

As to this laſt article, the king did not deſire that confirmation ſhould be received in Scotland, as practiſed in the church of England, becauſe he was not fully convinced of its uſefulneſs. But as confirmation was one of the epiſcopal functions, he would that the biſhops ſhould have ſomething at leaſt to do in it.

The king's deſign being to compaſs his ends by degrees, he had ſelected theſe articles as leaſt liable to give offence to the miniſters, in order to leave them without excuſe in caſe they rejected them. The general aſſembly of the Scottiſh church perceiving the king's aim, declared, if the churches of England and Scotland differed only in theſe four articles, they might be received for peace-ſake; but as they were innovations not capable of producing a perfect union, there was no neceſſity of inſerting them among the canons. The king, offended with this refuſal, reſolved to compel the Scots not only to receive theſe four articles, but alſo many more which he had not thought fit to meddle with at firſt, being perſuaded he had a right, by virtue of his royal authority, to impoſe upon his people of Scotland the religion which to him ſeemed the beſt. To that purpoſe, he reſolved to go in perſon to Scotland, under colour of viſiting his native country, where he had not been theſe fourteen years.

Before his departure, he ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed in Scotland, wherein he ſaid, he was going to viſit his old kingdom, "Not to alter the civil and eccleſiaſtical ſtate, but to reform certain abuſes in the church and commonwealth." At the ſame time, he ſent before hand ſome officers of his houſhold, all Engliſh, with orders to adorn his chapel at Edinburgh in the ſame manner as that at Whitehall; and theſe men forgot not to carry with them ſome pictures and even ſtatues of the apoſtles [i]. As ſoon as they began to adorn the chapel, the people of Edinburgh exclaimed at the ſight, ſaying, "Images were begun to be introduced, and the maſs would quickly follow."

The king being come to Berwick, prorogued the parliament of Scotland [k] to open it himſelf, as he did indeed with a long ſpeech, according to cuſtom. To conceal his real deſign, he propoſed ſeveral things, among which he did not forget the article concerning religion, the only point he was ſeriouſly labouring. He contented himſelf at firſt with requiring, that a certain number of commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to examine and ſettle the affairs of religion. The parliament conſenting to his demand, the king ſtaid not for the parliament's nominating the commiſſioners, but choſe them himſelf, and appointed the lord chancellor, the lord treaſurer, and the clerk of the rolls, who were all three his creatures. But as the parliament ſcrupled to ſtand to this nomination, he fell in a violent paſſion, thinking it very ſtrange they ſhould pretend to name others, after he had made known his pleaſure. In ſhort, as they durſt not reſiſt him to his face, he obtained whatever he pleaſed.

Theſe commiſſioners immediately ſettled an article, after which there was nothing more to be examined. The article was, "That whatſoever his majeſty ſhould determine in the external government of the church, with the advice of the archbiſhops, biſhops, and a competent number of the miniſtry, ſhould have the ſtrength of a law." The king himſelf had dictated this article, "Not (ſaid he) that I am againſt the advice of the grave and learned miniſters, but to be over-ruled as in your former general aſſemblies, I will never agree; the biſhops muſt rule the miniſters, and the king govern both in matters not repugnant to God's law." Thus the king plainly ſhewed, that ſince his acceſſion to England, he claimed in Scotland a greater authority than before.

[e] Rapin, by miſtake, ſays, that he was created baron of Branſpatch, or rather Branſpeth, which was the title of Robert Carr earl of Somerſet.—George Villiers was created Auguſt 27, 1616, lord Whaddon, the great lordſhip of Whaddon in Buckinghamſhire (then in the crown by the attainder of the lord Grey of Wilton), being given him at the ſame time. A little after he was created viſcount Villiers, and on the 5th of January 1617, earl of Buckingham. [f] He came to London December 16, 1616. Ibid. p. 1026.

[g] He returned to Rome in 1622, and died in 1625. It is ſaid, that it was by his means, and the meaſures he had concerted with father Paul before he left Italy, that archbiſhop Abbot got that father's manuſcript hiſtory of the council of Trent, tranſmitted in parcels into England. Bentivoglio ſpeaking of Padre Paolo, ſays of him, that he is ſuch another as Antonio de Dominis, who, when he was aſked by the inquiſition, which was the beſt religion to bring a man to heaven, anſwered, that of the church of England. Samſ. Spec. Europ.—De Dominis which was the firſt who uſed the word Puritan to denote the Anti-arminians of the Engliſh church. Fuller, lib. X. p. 99.

[h] There were five articles in all; the other, which is placed third, was the ſacrament of baptiſm not to be deferred longer than the next Sunday; and in caſe of neceſſity, to be adminiſtered in a private houſe, with public declaration of the ſame, the Sunday after, in the church.

[i] They carried with them the portraits of the apoſtles to be ſet in the pews or ſtalls. The biſhop of Galloway, dean of the chapel, obſerving the offence this cauſed, wrote to the king, entreating him, "for the offence that was taken, to ſtay the affixing of thoſe portraits." His letter was ſubſcribed by the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, the biſhops of Aberdeen and Brechyn, and ſeveral miniſters of Edinburgh. To this the king returned an angry anſwer; objecting ignorance unto them, that could not diſtinguiſh betwixt pictures intended for ornament and decoration, and images erected for adoration. Spotiſwood, p. 530.

[k] From May 17, to June 13. Ibid.

Mean while, the miniſters in and about Edinburgh, perceiving that by the prevarication of the commiſſioners, their church was going to be overthrown, ſince the king was impowered to make what alterations he pleaſed, met together to conſult how to prevent it. They found no other remedy than a proteſtation againſt the article paſſed by the commiſſioners, and when they had drawn it, they committed it to one Hewet, to preſent it to the king. Hewet being come into his majeſty's anti-chamber, in order to execute his commiſſion, the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's civilly accoſted him, deſiring to ſee the proteſtation, which the miniſter readily ſhewed him. As ſoon as he had it in his hands, he would have put it in his pocket, but Hewet ſeized the paper, which could not be done without making ſome noiſe. Upon which the king coming out and hearing the occaſion of the buſtle, ſpoke ſo roughly to the miniſter, that the poor man, all in a fright, fell on his knees and begged pardon, proteſting never more to meddle in the affair [l].

But though the king had obtained what he wanted of the commiſſioners, he found however he ſhould never attain his ends without the conſent of the miniſters, eſpecially as their proteſtation was public, and many copies, which continually increaſed, were already diſperſed. He addreſſed therefore to the biſhops, an order to ſummon the miniſters to meet on the 10th of July, at St. Andrews, where he would come and ſpeak to them in perſon. The miniſters obeying the ſummons, the king called them all to witneſs his great care of the church of Scotland, as well before as ſince his acceſſion to the crown; adding, he expected however no thanks for his zeal for the true worſhip of God, and for maintaining good order in the church. Then he told them, that before he departed for Scotland, he had ſent them four articles to be inſerted in their canons; which were rejected, and yet he was ſilent: that having lately deſired, it might be declared, that by virtue of his prerogative, he had power to make eccleſiaſtical laws, they mutinied and proteſted againſt him: however, he was very willing to paſs by all theſe, with many other affronts, received at their hands. "But now, continued he, the errand for which I have called you, is to know your reaſons, why this ſame power ought not to be admitted? I mean not to do any thing againſt reaſon; and on the other part, my demands being juſt and religious, you muſt not think that I will be refuſed, or reſiſted." He ſpoke theſe laſt words knitting his brows, and looking at them, ſays the author of the Annals, with a majeſtical and ſtern eye, which made them all fall down on their knees. Then continuing his ſpeech, he ſaid, "It is a power innate, and a ſpecial prerogative which we that are chriſtian kings have, to order and diſpoſe of eternal things in the policy of the church, as we by advice of our biſhops ſhall find moſt fitting. And, ſirs, for your approving or diſapproving, deceive not yourſelves, I will never regard it, unleſs you bring me a reaſon which I cannot anſwer."

The miniſters ſeeing how peremptory the king was, deſired leave to confer among themſelves. Their requeſt being granted, they returned in a few hours, with a petition for a general aſſembly, that what his majeſty propoſed might be received with common conſent. "Aye, ſays the king, but what aſſurance have I of their conſenting?" Whereupon ſome of them ſaid, they ſaw no reaſon to the contrary. "But, ſays the king, if the general aſſembly be of another mind, and your reaſon now be none of theirs then, and the articles are rejected, my difficulty will be the greater; for when I ſhall hereafter uſe my own authority in eſtabliſhing them, I ſhall be pulpited a tyrant and perſecutor; ye were wont to do ſo." Then all cried out, that none durſt be ſo mad. "Yet experience tells (ſays the king) that it hath been ſo; therefore unleſs I be made ſure, I will not give way to an aſſembly."

It was, however, eaſy to perceive, that without an aſſembly, the king could not poſſibly compaſs his ends. Though he ſhould have extorted the conſent of the miniſters then preſent, it would have been to no purpoſe, ſince they were not authoriſed. And if the king had cauſed theſe articles to be paſſed by an order flowing from his abſolute power, he ſhould have been firſt ſecure of the obedience of his ſubjects, or at leaſt of a ſufficient power to compel them, both which were equally difficult, not to ſay impracticable. So the king having conſidered the thing more maturely, agreed at length, that a general aſſembly ſhould be held at St. Andrews, in November. In this interval, Sympſon the miniſter, who drew up and ſigned the proteſtation, was committed to Edinburgh-caſtle, and Catherwood, who carried letters to other miniſters to encourage them to adhere to it, was baniſhed. After this the king returns to England.

The general aſſembly, held at St. Andrews, in November, reſolved to defer the reception of the four articles, till all the churches of the kingdom were informed of the affair, and then ſeparated. The king was extremely incenſed, and looking upon this delay as a contempt of his authority, ordered the payment of the miniſters ſtipends to be ſtopped for a year [m]. But finding this only exaſperated the people, and retarded his deſign, he gave leave at length that another general aſſembly ſhould be held at Perth, on Auguſt the 25th the next year. And there, by fair or foul means, he obtained the churches conſent to the four articles. But withal, he ſowed in Scotland the ſeeds of thoſe troubles which diſtracted the kingdom in the following reign, and deprived his ſon and ſucceſſor both of crown and life. Thus, his zeal againſt the puritans cauſed him to forſake the principles of equity and moderation, which he thought ſo reaſonable in the caſe of the catholics. He would not force the conſcience of theſe, provided they lived like good ſubjects; but the preſbyterians were to ſubmit, though ever ſo unwilling, to what he ſhould think proper. What has been ſaid upon this ſubject, is taken almoſt word for word out of the Annals, the author whereof cannot be ſuſpected of repreſenting things to the king's diſadvantage.

Before he left Scotland, the king made the earl of Buckingham privy counſellor of that kingdom, as he had been ſo for ſome time in England.

Whilſt the king was returning to London, he received a petition from ſome ſervants, labourers, mechanics, and other vulgar perſons, complaining, that they were debarred from dancing, playing, church-ales, in a word, from all recreations on Sundays after divine ſervice. Whereupon it was ſuggeſted to the king, that the puritans meant to perſuade the people, ſuch diverſions were contrary to the regard due to the Lord's-day. That theſe men went upon erroneous principles, namely, that Chriſtians were obliged to keep the day of reſt with the ſame ſtrictneſs as the Jews, and therefore affected to call Sunday the ſabbath. This was a ſufficient inducement to the king to condemn this puritannical ſcruple, and the rather, as he was not himſelf very ſcrupulous in that point. A book therefore was publiſhed in his name, wherein he maintained by ſeveral arguments, that paſtimes on Sundays, after evening ſervice, were allowable, and withal, commanded that none ſhould be hindered or diſcouraged from any lawful recreations. The book [n] made a great noiſe, neither was it exclaimed againſt by the preſbyterians alone [o]. Many churchmen diſapproved of it, and particularly the lord-mayor of London, who, notwithſtanding the prohibition, commanded the king's own carriages to be ſtopped, as they were paſſing through the city on a Sunday [p]. But the king himſelf, regardleſs of theſe murmurs, and willing to ſupport what he had done, enjoined all miniſters to read his book publicly in their churches; and thoſe that refuſed were ſeverely puniſhed by the high commiſſion. Some pretend this order was a ſnare to ſurpriſe certain miniſters, who though puritans, ſcrupled not be of the church of England, and preach their doctrines there [q].

Theſe were the moſt material affairs then in England. The king, as I ſaid, never concerning himſelf in any foreign matters, left the government of the kingdom to the care of his miniſters. The earl of Buckingham was the head manager. He ruled with an abſolute ſway both in church and ſtate, diſpoſing of all places and preferments. If we may believe certain authors, he beſtowed nothing without money or a yearly penſion [r]. As the king was always in want, the Cooling a little, he ſent a warrant to the lord mayor, ordering him to let them paſs, which he obeyed with this anſwer, "While it was in my power I did my duty, but that being taken away, it is my duty to obey." The king upon ſecond thoughts took this well, and thanked him for it. Wilſon. p. 709.

favourite was obliged to find means to maintain, and even enrich, his numerous kindred, who flocked to court to partake of his greatneſs. Not to return to theſe matters, I ſhall ſay here at once, that the favourite's elder brother was made viſcount Purbeck; his younger brother, earl of Angleſey; his mother, though a papiſt, was created counteſs of Buckingham, without her huſband enjoying the ſame honour. In a word, all his female relations were married into the richeſt and moſt noble families of the kingdom. The favourite's mother being a papiſt, and ruling her ſon, who was properly of no religion, with the ſame eaſe as he himſelf governed the king, it was not very ſtrange, the papiſts conceived great hopes, and ſwarmed in the kingdom. The king gave himſelf little trouble about it. Provided a man took the oath of allegiance, and was not puritan, every thing elſe was indifferent to him. He was almoſt wholly employed in his diverſions; and as he very frequently hunted, his admirers pretended he took thoſe times to conſider of the affairs of the government [s].

I ſhall cloſe the events of this year 1617, with the ſad cataſtrophe of ſir Walter Raleigh. He had been a priſoner twelve years [t], ever ſince his condemnation, during which time, he had employed himſelf in compiling his Hiſtory of the World. At laſt, he obtained his liberty, though without the king's pardon [u]. As his eſtate was all forfeited, and given to the earl of Somerſet, he was very much embarraſſed when he came out of priſon. The court, where he was entirely unknown, was like a ſtrange country to him. For this reaſon, he formed the project of ſeeking his fortune in diſtant climates. He had formerly traverſed the ſeas of America, and knew all the coaſts, particularly that of Guiana. Nay, it is ſaid, he ſet up marks to direct him again to a certain place, where was a gold mine, and that Keymis his old attendant [w], brought him from thence a piece of ore, which made him think the mine very rich. However, as he knew not where to lay his head, he found means to acquaint the king, that he knew of a very rich mine in America, from whence he hoped to bring mountains of gold, if his majeſty would be pleaſed to grant him a private commiſſion. The mine lying in a country belonging to the Spaniards, it could not be ſeized without breaking the peace with Spain. Nevertheleſs, the king, tempted no doubt with the golden hopes inſpired by Raleigh, granted him a commiſſion, directed to "Our beloved and faithful Walter Raleigh, knight, &c. [x]." It was ſaid afterwards, the king granted the commiſſion with this limitation, that he ſhould not injure the ſubjects of Spain. But how was it poſſible to bring away gold from a mine belonging to the Spaniards, without doing them damage?

However, Raleigh, by virtue of his commiſſion, engaged ſeveral perſons in the project [y]. He was ſupplied with money to fit out twelve ſail [z], and departed in Auguſt 1617 [a], in ſearch of the mine. At his arrival upon the coaſt of Guiana, he found not the marks he had left there, neither could he know again the place he thought he had ſo well obſerved. He detached however his ſon, and captain Keymis, with five ſhips [b], to ſail up the river Oronoque as high as poſſible, in order to diſcover the mountain where the ſuppoſed mine lay. The mountain not appearing, the Engliſh landed, and putting the Spaniards to flight who oppoſed their deſcent, purſued them to the town of St. Thomas, which they took and plundered. Sir Walter's Raleigh's ſon was killed in the aſſault. Then, leaving a garriſon in the place, they advanced farther into the country, without being able to find the ſo much deſired mine. At laſt, weary with ſearching, they returned to Sir Walter, who finding himſelf diſappointed of his hopes, threatened Keymis with the king's indignation, and ſome days after, Keymis was found dead in his cabin [c]. The ſailors, vexed at this ill ſucceſs, loudly complained of their being drawn into a chimerical project, and compelled Sir Walter to ſail back for England. When they arrived at Kingſale in Ireland, he would have perſuaded them to go with him into France; but inſtead of liſtening to his propoſal, they carried him againſt his will to Plymouth, where he was arreſted by the king's orders, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

During his abſence, don Diego de Sarmiento, count of Gondemar, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, making great complaints about Sir Walter's commiſſion, which was become public [d], the king found no better way to appeaſe him, than by diſowning it, or at leaſt by aſſuring, that Raleigh had expreſs orders not to act againſt the Spaniards [e]. Raleigh returning without gold, his cauſe was ſo much the worſe. Beſides, the embaſſador openly inſiſted upon his being puniſhed, and told the king, there was no other way to continue the treaty of the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta. Wherefore the king reſolved at length to ſacrifice Raleigh to the Spaniard. But as he could not be tried upon his late expedition, for which he had a commiſſion in form, it was determined he ſhould loſe his head by virtue of the ſentence paſſed upon him fourteen years before. In vain did he plead that his commiſſion, wherein the king ſtiled him faithful ſervant, and gave him power of life and death over thoſe who were under his command, was equivalent to a pardon. The judges told him, "That treaſon could not be pardoned but by expreſs words." So, without being called to an account for his late expedition, it was ordered that the former ſentence ſhould be executed [f].

Thus died Sir Walter Raleigh, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age. He was a man that deſerved a better fate, and had a large ſhare of merit. He had alſo ſome faults, which are leſſened or aggravated, in order to render his execution more or leſs odious, according as the hiſtorians are for or againſt king James. Moſt certain it is, he fell a ſacrifice to the mortal hatred conceived by the Spaniards againſt him in queen Elizabeth's time, and to the king's unhappy deſire to accompliſh the prince his ſon's marriage with the infanta of Spain [g].

[1618] Since James had been on the throne, the Engliſh had lived in peace with all their neighbours, without being diſturbed by any war. The king and his miniſters pretended, this was the chief point of government, and that nothing more plainly diſcovered the capacity of thoſe that ruled, than to cauſe the ſubjects to live in peace. Mean while, the people were not ſatisfied. Many affirmed, this maxim was falſe when carried too far, and that war often happens to be no leſs neceſſary than peace, for the welfare of a nation. It was diſliked, that the king ſhould let the Hollanders fiſh upon the Engliſh coaſt, without aſking leave of him, or the governor of Scarborough, as was cuſtomary, before they had recovered their cautionary towns. It was thought no leſs ſtrange that they ſhould be ſuffered to come upon the coaſt with a fleet to ſupport their fiſhermen, as if they meant to bully the king, and ſhew they would fiſh on his coaſt in ſpite of him; and it was openly ſaid, to preſerve peace by bearing ſuch affronts, was no great ſign of ability. It was alſo complained, that the king deſerted the cauſe of the proteſtant religion, at a time when France, the emperor, the king of Spain, and the pope, were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to deſtroy it, and had but too much hopes of ſucceeding, ſince the defender of the faith remained unconcerned. The king's extreme jealouſy with reſpect to his prerogative, was another and great occaſion of diſcontent. It did not appear wherein this prerogative had been infringed; but it was thought very manifeſt, he intended to ſtretch it farther than any of his predeceſſors. It was conſidered, he had impriſoned ſeveral members of parliament, ſolely for inſiſting in the houſe upon the people's grievances; had granted divers monopolies; and raiſed money upon the ſubject without conſent of parliament: That his ſpeeches to the houſes, to the judges, and in the ſtar-chamber, tended only to exalt the regal authority, and make it, as it were, equal to God's: from whence it was inferred, that he deſigned to deſtroy the conſtitution. People could not behold, without indignation, a young man of twenty-five imperiouſly governing the whole kingdom, diſpoſing of all preferments in favour of his relations and friends, inveſted with the office of lord high admiral, though he had never been at ſea, except from Dover to Calais; and laſtly, honoured with the title of marquis of Buckingham, without having ever done the ſtate any ſervice during the two years he had been at court. Theſe two dignities were lately beſtowed on the favourite, the firſt, by the earl of Nottingham's reſignation, who had amaſſed great ſums, and got a penſion for the reſidue of his life. But there was ſtill farther complaints. It was ſaid, the court gave a very ill example to the whole kingdom: Nothing was heard there but blaſphemy and oaths; and the king himſelf was not free from that vice: that one of the two ſecretaries of ſtate was a papiſt, as well as the favourite's mother; that though it was not known what religion her ſon was of, his debaucheries were public, and gave univerſal offence; the number of papiſts daily increaſed; the prince's marriage with a papiſt, daughter to the mortal enemy of the proteſtant religion, ſhewed how little the king regarded the concerns of religion; that if any one repreſented to the king or the miniſters, the inconveniencies ariſing from ſuch a marriage, he was ſilenced by being told, it was an attempt upon the prerogative royal, and that every man, who without a call, pried into the ſecrets of the government, was guilty of rebellion.

But on the other hand, the king was no leſs offended with this boldneſs in cenſuring his conduct, as if a king was to be guided by the caprice of his ſubjects. What moſt troubled him was, that the puritans were not the only perſons who dared to complain of the government, but that even the greateſt friends to the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy could not bear an arbitrary power in the ſtate. The parliament itſelf had plainly ſhewed him, how far they were from ſubmitting to any laws but thoſe which had been hitherto in uſe.

Thus the king and the people were equally diſſatisfied. It is true, the king ſeemed to have a great advantage, as there not being a parliament, no man had a right openly to arraign his conduct; but then, money did not flow into the exchequer ſo plentifully as under the kings his predeceſſors, who knew how to manage the parliament. He choſe however to be without any, or to procure it by ſuch means as increaſed the peoples diſcontent, rather than run the hazard of ſeeing the parliament queſtion his prerogative, of which he was ſtrangely jealous. He comforted himſelf with the hopes of ſpeedily concluding his ſon's marriage, by which he was to receive a dowry of two millions. It is certain the court of Spain had offered that ſum; but I have not been able to diſcover what ſort of money was meant. I imagine, the Spaniard left that undetermined, to have an opportunity of prolonging the negotiation as much as he pleaſed, and of breaking it off at laſt when he thought proper.

When the king of Spain's proceedings with reſpect to the marriage are conſidered, it muſt be thought, that he did not intend to conclude it, either at the time the negotiation was begun, or long after [h]. At firſt, his ſole aim was to amuſe king James, and hinder him from interpoſing in the affair of Cleves. The emperor had a mind either to keep that duchy for himſelf, or to give it to ſome prince of his family, under colour of holding it in ſequeſtration till the diſpute was decided. But the ſtates of the United Provinces avoiding this ſnare, ſeized part of the country in queſtion, proteſting to reſtore it to the perſon to whom it ſhould be adjudged. Beſides, they openly protected the elector of Brandenburgh, who was one of the chief claimants, and a proteſtant; as on the contrary, the houſe of Auſtria favoured the duke of Newburgh, who was turned catholic. On this pretence, prince Maurice on the one ſide, and Spinola on the other, endeavoured to become maſters of the country, and ſo a kind of religious war enſued, wherein England not interpoſing was of great conſequence to the houſe of Auſtria. For thus it was, that James was allured by the Spaniard with the hopes of the marriage and dowry of two millions.

Pretences were not wanting to prolong the negotiation. The union of a catholic princeſs with a proteſtant prince, required that care ſhould be taken to ſecure to the infanta the liberty of profeſſing her religion, in a manner becoming the princeſs of Spain. This was the only article inſiſted upon at firſt, the two courts being of opinion, that before this was ſettled, it was in vain to treat of the reſt. As it was the Spaniard's intereſt to lengthen the negotiation, ſo it was neceſſary to ſatisfy king James of his ſincerity, to keep him ſtill at bay. To that purpoſe, after a two years debate, fearing at laſt that James would be diſcouraged, he agreed with Digby and Cottington, the Engliſh embaſſadors, upon five articles; the firſt whereof facilitated the continuance or even the entire interruption of the treaty, when it ſhould be no longer his intereſt to diſſemble. The articles were theſe:

1. That the pope's diſpenſation be firſt obtained by the mere act of the king of Spain.

2. That the children of this marriage be not conſtrained in matter of religion, nor their title prejudiced in caſe they prove catholics.

3. That the infanta's family, being ſtrangers, may be catholics, and ſhall have a decent place appointed for all divine ſervice, according to the uſe of the church of Rome; and the eccleſiaſtics and religious perſons may wear their proper habits.

4. That the marriage ſhall be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the inſtructions of the council of Trent; and after the infanta's arrival in England, ſuch a ſolemnization ſhall be uſed, as may make the marriage valid, according to the laws of that kingdom.

5. That ſhe ſhall have a competent number of chaplains, and a confeſſor, being ſtrangers, one whereof ſhall have power to govern the family in religious matters.

Theſe articles being tranſmitted to England, the king in allowing and ſigning them, thus expreſſed himſelf: "Seeing this marriage is to be with a lady of different religion from us, it becometh us to be tender, as on the one part, to give them all ſatisfaction convenient, ſo on the other, to admit nothing that may blemiſh our conſcience, or detract from the religion here eſtabliſhed." I confeſs I do not ſee how this maxim agreed with the ſecond article. For the firſt, he ſuppoſed as previous, the pope's diſpenſation, which was expected ſeveral years, and at laſt came clogged with additions and limitations, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of hereafter.

Hitherto the Spaniard in prolonging the negotiation had only the ſucceſſion of Cleves in view. But this year the affairs of Germany and Bohemia began to give occaſion to fear, a religious war would be kindled in thoſe countries. This was a freſh reaſon for the Spaniard's amuſing king James, leſt he ſhould ſide with the proteſtants, and ſend them a powerful aid. For the better underſtanding of the ſequel, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to know in what ſituation the affairs of Germany and Bohemia then were.

As for Germany, it ſuffices to ſay, that for ſome time there had been great jealouſies and mutual ſuſpicions between the catholics and the proteſtants. Theſe complained, that they could not have juſtice either from the emperor or the imperial chamber. The catholics complained in their turn, that the proteſtants were continually endeavouring to extend their privileges beyond what the laws of the empire allowed; that after pretending to be ſatisfied with a bare toleration, they had aſpired to an equality, and not content with that, had plotted to baniſh the catholic religion out of all Germany. On this pretence it was that the catholics had entered into a confederacy, which occaſioned the like among the proteſtants. The proteſtants being aſſembled at Hailbrun, the emperor Matthias wrote to exhort them to diſſolve their league. But they thought not proper to ſubmit to his exhortations, by reaſon their league was only defenſive, and the catholics did not offer to break their confederacy. This was a motive for the Spaniard to amuſe king James, and hinder him from uniting with the proteſtants of Germany. But the troubles this year in Bohemia, furniſhed him with a motive of much greater conſequence, which muſt be explained as briefly as poſſible, becauſe that affair continually influences all the reſt of this reign.

In Bohemia were two religions eſtabliſhed by law the one was called "ſub una," and the other "ſub utraque." The former was profeſſed by the catholics, who communicated in one kind only, the latter by the Huſſites, who received the euchariſt in both kinds, and ſince the reformation were become true proteſtants. I have ſpoken elſewhere of the religious wars which afflicted that kingdom under the emperor Sigiſmund. It ſuffices therefore to add here, that Sigiſmund was forced, in order to be owned for king of Bohemia, to grant the Huſſites an edict, whereby among other privileges, it was decreed there ſhould be no magiſtrate or inhabitant in Prague but what was of their religion. This edict, granted in the year 1435, was obſerved till 1570, when by order of Maximilian II. a catholic was made citizen of Prague. Another of that religion obtained the ſame favour in 1599, and withal a place in the magiſtracy. From that time, Sigiſmund's edict was frequently violated, and at laſt the jeſuits were admitted into Prague, and built there a ſtately college. Thus, by degrees, the number of the catholics was conſiderably increaſed in the city, by means of the governors and the emperor's other officers, who were all of the ſame religion. The more they increaſed, the higher they carried their pretenſions, and at laſt, if we may believe the Apology publiſhed afterwards by the Bohemians, the edict of Sigiſmund was continually tranſgreſſed. However, in the reign of Rodolphus II. the proteſtants, by the interceſſion of prince Matthias, obtained of the emperor a ſecond edict, which under colour of confirming their privileges, put them upon a ſort of equality with the catholics, though they had enjoyed the ſuperiority for one hundred and fifty years. Nevertheleſs, this equality was as much as they could expect, conſidering the preſent juncture of time. But, though it was far ſhort of their antient privileges, the emperor's officers in Bohemia thinking ſuch an edict prejudicial to the catholic religion, refuſed to publiſh it, affirming, it was extorted from the emperor whilſt at war with the Turks. Very likely they were privately countenanced by the court of Vienna.

Rodolphus II. dying in 1614 [i], his brother Matthias ſucceeded him both in the kingdom of Bohemia and the imperial dignity. Under the new king the privileges of the proteſtants were violated much more openly, and with greater haughtineſs than under the laſt, if any credit is to be given to their Apology. But this was not all, Matthias having adopted his nephew [k], Ferdinand of Auſtria, had a mind alſo to ſecure him the crown of Bohemia. The execution of this project would doubtleſs have been very difficult, had not the emperor uſed artifice. Sileſia, Moravia, Upper and Lower Luſatia, being annexed to Bohemia, had a right to ſend deputies to the aſſembly of the ſtates of that kingdom. But as theſe countries were proteſtant, their deputies very probably would join with thoſe of Bohemia of the ſame religion, and fruſtrate the emperor's deſign. Wherefore he convened the ſtates of Bohemia without ſummoning the others. The proteſtants complained of the innovation, and not to authoriſe it, refuſed for the moſt part to ſend deputies to the ſtates. This was what the emperor foreſaw and wiſhed; for the catholic deputies being the majority, Ferdinand was declared Matthias's preſumptive ſucceſſor, and ſhortly after crowned at Prague; after which he reſided at Gratz. The defenders, for ſo were called a certain number of eminent perſons, choſen and appointed by the ſtates to ſee the edicts put in execution, perceiving the deſigns of the imperial court, ſummoned the ſtates purſuant to their power, and forgot not to call the incorporated provinces. This aſſembly only drew a petition to be preſented to the emperor, wherein the ſtates demanded the execution of the laws of the kingdom, and a juſt reparation for the injuries done them. Mean while, as they could come to no reſolution before the emperor's anſwer was received, they adjourned to the Monday after Rogation-week in the year 1618.

The emperor, inſtead of being inclined to ſend a favourable anſwer to the ſtates petition, ordered his lieutenant in Bohemia to hinder the next ſeſſion of the aſſembly, called without his licence. But the lieutenant was not ſtrong enough to execute the order. His oppoſition ſerving only to exaſperate the ſtates, who were aſſembled on the day appointed in the college of Charles IV. they went in a body to the chancery, and ſeizing the emperor's officers, pitched upon three, and threw them out of the caſtle-window [l]. After that, they drove the jeſuits out of Prague.

Things being come to this extremity, the ſtates publiſhed an Apology, to inform the public why they had puniſhed theſe officers. But as they believed the emperor would not hear their reaſons, they ſigned a confederacy, promiſing mutual aſſiſtance againſt all oppoſers. In the mean time, hearing the emperor was making preparations to attack them, they choſe four and twenty protectors, impowering them to raiſe forces, and lay upon the kingdom and the incorporated countries what taxes they ſhould judge neceſſary. Thus, a war being unavoidable, each took ſuch meaſures as he deemed requiſite to attack or defend.

At the time the Bohemian ſtates were taking theſe reſolutions, the cardinal infant was preparing an army in the Low-Countries to aſſiſt the emperor. Whilſt the army was levying, he ſent Charles de Bucquoy count de Longueval, to the emperor, who made him general of the army deſigned againſt Bohemia. The ſtates choſe for their generals, count Erneſt of Mansfeldt, and the count de la Tour. This war was of ſo great moment to the houſe of Auſtria, that it is not very ſtrange the Spaniards ſhould ſtill continue to amuſe king James with the hopes of ſeeing the projected marriage ſpeedily concluded. Very likely the war would at laſt become a religious war, and in that caſe, England could very much ſtrengthen the proteſtant party. Afterwards, the king of Spain had ſtill farther motives to continue this management. But the wonder is, though James had very ſtrong reaſons to ſuſpect the Spaniard of artifice, he ſtill obſtinately relied on his ſincerity. "It ſeemeth unto us here in England," (ſays one of his miniſters in a letter to Cottington) "that Conde Gondemar hath gone but very ſlowly in his journey; and divers (ſeeing how long time he hath ſpent in the way) do make conjecture, that it proceedeth from the ſmall affection that he judgeth to be there, towards the effecting of the main buſineſs.—But if the Spaniards act inſincerely, I ſhall judge them the moſt unworthy and perfidious people of the world, and the more, for that his majeſty hath given them ſo many teſtimonies of his ſincere intentions towards them, which he daily continueth, as now of late, by the cauſing ſir Walter Raleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them ſatisfaction, when by preſerving him, he might have given great ſatisfaction to his ſubjects, and had at command upon all occaſions as uſeful a man as ſerved any prince in Chriſtendom [m]." It is certain however the king was amuſed by the Spaniſh court. Count Gondemar undertaking to carry into Spain the articles ſigned by the king, was ſo very long on the road, that it was evident he fought only to delay the time. Notwithſtanding this, king James continued wilfully to ſhut his eyes, which will appear ſtill plainer in the ſequel.

Though the people of England were not informed of the contents of the articles agreed upon by the two courts, they knew however the marriage was going to be concluded, and thought it could not but be prejudicial to religion. This occaſioned many complaints and murmurs amongſt the proteſtants [n], whilſt the catholics triumphed, knowing the king of Spain would not give his daughter to prince Charles, without procuring them great advantages. At the worſt, they were ſure of having in that princeſs a powerful protectreſs, who would never forſake the intereſts of her religion. We ſhall ſee in the following years how artfully the Spaniard prolonged the negotiation, till he had drawn from it all poſſible advantages, as well for the houſe of Auſtria as for the catholic religion.

About the ſame time, doctor Williams dean of Weſtminſter, was made privy counſellor, and ſhortly after biſhop of Lincoln [p]. I purpoſely mention this prelate's promotion, becauſe he will often occur in the hiſtory of this as well as of the next reign.

The fine of 30,000l. which he had been condemned to, was compounded at 11,000l. State of the Revenue, p. 11. His daughter was the ſame lady, who, under the title of counteſs of Carliſle, made the moſt ſhining figure in the court of Charles I. as a beauty, wit, and politician. The old duke, when he came out of the Tower, hearing that Buckingham was drawn about with ſix horſes in his coach (being the firſt that was ſo) put on eight to his, and in that manner was drawn through the city in his way to Bath. In March this year[q] the king loſt his queen in the forty-ſixth year of her age. Shortly after he was himſelf ſeized with a great illneſs, which brought him, as I may ſay, to the brink of the grave. It would have been well for his reputation had he died at this time, ſince the reſt of his reign, which laſted ſix years longer, was not much to his honour. In this ſpace he more plainly diſcovered his ſettled deſign to ſtretch the prerogative-royal as high as poſſible. Beſide, he gave very convincing proofs, that though he defended the proteſtant religion by his writings, he had not its intereſt much at heart. In fine, his eager deſire to conclude the Spaniſh match diſplayed all his weakneſs, and the affair of Bohemia, in which he could not but be concerned, fully ſatisfied the world of his ſlender capacity.

The emperor Matthias dying the 20th of March 1619, Ferdinand his couſin and adopted ſon, was proclaimed king of Bohemia, as well in conſequence of his election, as in virtue of his pretended hereditary right to the crown. Mean while, as his chief aim was to obtain the imperial dignity, and as he ſtood in need for that purpoſe of the proteſtant electors, he feigned a willingneſs to end amicably the war now begun in Bohemia, by giving the ſtates a reaſonable ſatisfaction with reſpect to their privileges. But the ſtates thought not fit to truſt to his promiſes. In the mean time, he endeavoured to gain the electors, and make alliances with the catholic princes of Germany. James, who gloried in being ſtiled the pacific king, thought himſelf obliged as ſuch, to try to appeaſe by his mediation the troubles of Bohemia. To that end, he choſe the viſcount Doncaſter to go and endeavour to procure a peace between Ferdinand and the Bohemian ſtates. There was not a prince in Europe ſo improper as he for a mediation of this nature, conſidering his principles with reſpect to monarchy. This embaſſy was very expenſive, the embaſſador, who was a ſort of favourite, and extremely profuſe, having been very laviſh of his maſter's money. Mean while, I know not whether he could obtain ſo much as a ſingle audience of Ferdinand, who ſtill removed as the embaſſador approached. Thus much is certain, the embaſſy was entirely fruitleſs, and ſerved only to ſhew the little account Ferdinand made of the king of England's mediation.

The time appointed for the election of an emperor approaching, the elector of Mentz ſummoned the reſt of the electors, and particularly Ferdinand as king of Bohemia. The ſtates of that kingdom proteſted againſt the ſummons, ſaying, Ferdinand could not be received as elector in quality of the king of Bohemia, ſince he was not in poſſeſſion of that kingdom. But their oppoſition was ineffectual. Ferdinand was not only acknowledged for king of Bohemia and elector, but was alſo choſen emperor the 8-18th of Aug. 1619[r]. Then the ſtates of Bohemia, ſeeing they had not been able to hinder Ferdinand from being emperor, took an oath never to own him for their ſovereign; and at the ſame time, namely, on the 5th of September[s], choſe for their king, Frederic elector Palatine, and ſent deputies to acquaint him with his election, and pray him to repair to Prague[t]. Frederic did not want much ſollicitation to accept of a crown offered him by thoſe who in his opinion had a right to diſpoſe of it. He ſent however baron d'Aulné[u] to the king his father-in-law for his advice, but it was a mere compliment. As he knew him to be a prince not very ready to engage in great undertakings, he did not ſtay for his anſwer, but aſſembling ſome troops, came to Prague, where he was crowned the 4th of November.

Before Frederic's envoy reached England, James hearing the news of his ſon-in-law's election, called a council to debate whether the elector ought to accept or refuſe the crown of Bohemia. The archbiſhop of Canterbury not being preſent by reaſon of the gout, which confined him to his bed, wrote to ſecretary Naunton, "That it was his opinion the elector ſhould accept of the crown, and England openly ſupport him. And therefore as ſoon as there ſhould be certain news of his coronation, the bells ought to be rung, guns fired, and bonfires made, to let all Europe ſee the king was determined to countenance him." But this advice was not followed. The king maintained in the council Ferdinand's cauſe againſt the ſtates of Bohemia, and without knowing any thing of their privileges, as he afterwards owned, decided that the Bohemian ſtates were in actual rebellion[w]. As for the reaſons with which the archbiſhop ſupported his opinion in his letter to Naunton, the king rejected them as built upon puritan-principles[x]. For, as I have elſewhere obſerved, there were in this reign ſtate-puritans as well as church-puritans, whom the court took great care to confound one with another, and this confuſion of ideas has been perſerved to this day. Hence the obſcurity which ſtill occurs in the notion of the two parties of whigs and tories. It was therefore reſolved, the king ſhould admoniſh the elector to refuſe the offered crown, not only becauſe it was agreeable to the king's principles, but for another, and no leſs ſtrong reaſon, namely, the king rightly judged that the elector's acceptance could not but be extremely prejudicial to the negotiation of the Spaniſh match, conſidering the ſtrict union between the princes of the houſe of Auſtria.

But the elector Palatine had broken theſe meaſures by accepting the crown, without ſtaying for the council of England's reſolution. The king was ſo angry, that he refuſed to give baron d'Aulné an audience, who ſince his departure had received orders to excuſe the elector from the neceſſity he was under of proceeding with all poſſible expedition. If the ſtates of Bohemia had deſigned to gain king James by electing his ſon-in-law, they were very much deceived, ſince they were never aſſiſted by him. The very embaſſadors ſent by king James on this occaſion to the emperor, and ſeveral German princes, did great injury to the ſtates; for theſe embaſſadors had expreſs orders to diſavow Frederic's proceedings; and of all the proteſtant princes, James alone never gave him the title of king.

Mean while, though the elector was now crowned, the king his father-in-law fancied he could perſuade him to quit the crown, and induce the ſtates of Bohemia to acknowledge Ferdinand. To that purpoſe he ſent two embaſſadors to Prague, namely, ſir Richard Weſton a papiſt, and ſir Edward Conway a proteſtant. Conway being afterwards made ſecretary of ſtate, the king uſed to ſay to him merrily, that never prince had ſuch a ſecretary, who could neither read nor write[y]. This embaſſy was very fruitleſs, as it was eaſy to foreſee.

Mean time the king of Spain did not forget to do the emperor good ſervice in keeping king James in his pacific diſpoſition. Nothing was talked of at the court of Madrid but the king of England's generoſity, juſtice, and equity: in fine, to amuſe him the better, the negotiation of the marriage was renewed, having been interrupted in expectation of the pope's diſpenſation; nay, it was intimated to Cottington, that if the diſpenſation did not quickly arrive, the marriage ſhould be concluded without it, or means found to force the pope to grant it. Cottington, who knew the Spaniſh court, fell not into the ſnare: he ſent word to England, that nothing more was to be expected concerning the marriage; that the king of Spain's intent was only to amuſe his majeſty; and therefore he believed the negotiation ought to be broke off. But inſtead of ſeeing his advice followed, he received orders to declare to the king of Spain, that his maſter was not concerned in the acceptance of the crown of Bohemia: that his

The letter in Ruſhworth is ſomething different from this; particularly, he makes the archbiſhop ſay, "The parliament is the old and honourable way of raiſing money, and all that may be ſpared is to be turned this way. And perhaps God has provided the jewels which were laid up in the Tower by the mother for the preſervation of the daughter. Certainly, if countenance be given to this action, many brave ſpirits will offer themſelves." Tom. I. p. 12.

[y] It was a pleaſant remark of the king's, that Stenny had given him three notable ſervants: a gentleman of the bedchamber (Clark) who could not help him to untruſs a point, for he had but one hand. A chaplain (Dr. Preſton) who could not ſay prayers, for he ſcrupled the uſe of the liturgy. And a ſecretary of ſtate (Conway) who could neither write nor read. Conway had been bred a ſoldier, being governor of the Briel when England gave up the cautionary towns.

ſon-in-law had proceeded without his approbation or knowledge, and therefore he intirely diſowned him. Philip anſwered, he was glad to find the king his brother in ſo equitable a diſpoſition, and that nothing could ſooner gain his eſteem and affection than the continuance of this expreſs diſavowal of an action ſo repugnant to juſtice [z].

[1620] The affair of Bohemia put ſeveral of the princes of Europe in motion, and held the reſt in ſuſpence. Ferdinand and Frederic had each their friends and allies, who were preparing to aſſiſt them, whilſt James ſtood neuter, imagining that by making a ſhew of neutrality, he ſhould induce the two competitors to make him arbiter of their difference. But both were jealous of him: the one becauſe he was a proteſtant and father-in-law of his adverſary; the other, becauſe he had openly declared he diſapproved of his conduct: ſo, without much regarding his ſollicitations, both ſides prepared to decide the quarrel by arms.

Had England eſpouſed Frederic's cauſe, and with a good fleet kept Spain and the Netherlands in awe, the elector very probably would have preſerved his crown, in ſo good a ſituation were his affairs the beginning of the year 1620. Several princes of Germany had formed a league to ſupport him, and were now levying an army, to be commanded by the prince of Anſpach [a]. On the other hand, Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſilvania had excited the Hungarians to rebel againſt Ferdinand, and moſt part of Auſtria had followed the example of Hungary and Bohemia. All this confounded the emperor, and would have confounded him more if the elector of Saxony had ſtill remained neuter according to his firſt reſolution; but the emperor offering him Upper Luſatia, on condition he would conquer it, he could not withſtand the temptation of acquiring a country which lay ſo convenient for him. Moreover, the duke of Bavaria and the three eccleſiaſtical electors [b] declared for the emperor; the pope ſupplied him with money, and the king of Spain ordered his forces at Naples and in the Milaneſe to march to his aſſiſtance.

But this was not all the aid the Spaniard gave the emperor; he aſſiſted him ſtill more conſiderably in hindering James from aiding his daughter and ſon-in-law, and keeping him immoveable, and as it were enchanted with the hopes of the marriage and the dowry of two millions. To hold him the faſter in his chains, Philip ſent back count Gondemar under colour of finiſhing the affair. He diſſembled ſo artfully, that James, who had recalled Digby [c] from Spain, ſent thither ſir Walter Aſton, to endeavour with Cottington to finiſh the treaty, which he thought very near a concluſion. Gondemar being returned to England with great ſums of money, laid them out ſo pertinently, and made ſuch good uſe of his talents and knowledge of the court, that he became as maſter of the king, the favourite, and the miniſters, and governed them as he pleaſed.

To this aid, which was not inconſiderable, Philip was preparing to add another more effectual, to enable the emperor to get the advantage of his enemy. Frederic had drawn ten thouſand men out of the Palatinate, and ſent them into Bohemia. This inſpired the emperor with the thoughts of invading him on that ſide; and to execute the project, Philip and the archduke Albert levied in the Low-Countries an army of twenty-ſix thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, to be commanded by Ambroſe Spinola. The truce between Spain and the United Provinces not being yet near expired, it was evident theſe forces could be deſigned only againſt the palatinate. The Hollanders warned king James of it; and ſuch of the courtiers as were not bribed with Spaniſh gold, never ceaſed to repreſent to him the danger to which the elector's dominions would be expoſed, if he did not ſuddenly reſolve to prepare for their defence. But James could not think of taking ſuch meaſures on bare ſuſpicions. He contented himſelf with ordering ſir Thomas Edmonds, his embaſſador at Bruſſels, to aſk the archduke the reaſon of ſo conſiderable an armament. The archduke anſwered, it was by the king of Spain's order, and the reaſon might be known of Spinola, who had the command of the army. Spinola being aſked the ſame queſtion, replied, that indeed he was ordered by the king of Spain to raiſe forces, but did not know for what purpoſe; that his orders being ſealed, he could not open them till his march; and if the embaſſador would follow him, he might then be reſolved. A man muſt have been wilfully blind not to ſee what this myſtery tended to, and yet James ſtill continued immoveable, relying on the Spaniard's friendſhip, and Gondemar's fair promiſes.

The whole kingdom was extremely ſurpriſed at the king's inſenſibility for his ſon-in-law, his daughter, and their children; but for his part he looked upon the quarrel between the emperor and Frederic in quite another light. He was juſt going to be ſtrictly united with the houſe of Auſtria by his ſon's marriage with the infanta of Spain, and at that very time the elector his ſon-in-law had broken all his meaſures by a raſh, unjuſt, and inconſiderate action, for ſo he termed the acceptance of the crown of Bohemia. "Is it reaſonable (ſaid he) I ſhould ſuffer myſelf to be drawn by a ſon-in-law's ambition and humour into a war againſt the houſe of Auſtria, who have done me no wrong? Muſt I alter all my projects, all my meaſures, becauſe the elector Palatine has been pleaſed to accept the crown of Bohemia, without ſo much as aſking my advice [d]?" However, by much perſuaſion, he was prevailed with at length to ſuffer a regiment of two thouſand two hundred men to be raiſed, which was done moſtly at the charge of ſome lords. Sir Horatio Vere, who had long ſerved in Holland, where he had acquired great reputation, commanded this regiment, having under him Burroughs and Herbert for major-generals. The earls of Oxford and Eſſex accompanied him, and commanded each a company of gentlemen volunteers [e].

This regiment being raiſed with great expedition, was tranſported to Holland. Then they paſſed the Rhine below Weſel, to avoid Spinola, who was at Aix la Chapelle. It was not without danger that the Engliſh croſſed ſo many countries to reach the Palatinate; nay, they durſt not have attempted it, if prince Frederic Henry of Naſſau, with two thouſand horſe and ſome foot, had not conducted them to Francfort, and deceived Spinola's vigilance, who expected them on another road. It was the 1ſt of October before they joined the army of the king of Bohemia's allies [f], commanded by the margrave of Anſpach.

Spinola, who departed from Bruſſels the 8th of Auguſt, being come to Coblintz, opened his orders in the preſence of the Engliſh embaſſador, who had accompained him thus far. The orders were, to make war upon all who ſhould declare for the elector Palatine. This was all Edmonds could know of Spinola's deſigns. The reſt was eaſy to be gueſſed, conſidering which way he was marching. He arrived in the Palatinate before the Engliſh had joined the confederate army, and took ſeveral ſmall places. The two armies tried one another for ſome time, and were once in ſight of each other ready to engage, but no action of moment enſued [g]. The ſeaſon, which daily grew worſe, obliging them at laſt to retire to winter quarters, the confederate princes led home their troops, leaving the Engliſh in garriſon at Heidelbergh, Manheim, and Frankendal.

In April this year the king of France ſent to the emperor and ſeveral German princes, the duke of Angouléme, the duke of Bethune [h], and Mr. des Preaux, to endeavour to appeaſe the Bohemian and Hungarian troubles. At the ſame time James diſpatched ſir Henry Wotton [i] on the ſame errand, and to exhort to peace all the princes engaged in the quarrel between the emperor and the palſgrave. If, whilſt he ſent this embaſſador, he had armed by land and ſea, and put himſelf in a condition to ſtrike terror, his remonſtrances doubtleſs would have been hearkened to, and his mediation perhaps accepted [k]: but Wotton having traverſed moſt part of Germany, and talked with ſeveral princes of both parties, brought back only general expreſſions, which ſhewed how little the king his maſter was regarded. At laſt he came to Vienna[l], where he found the French embaſſadors. In the audience he had of the emperor, he made two propoſitions, each divided into three articles, according to the king's uſual cuſtom, who was very fond of diviſions and ſubdiviſions. It muſt be obſerved, the emperor had now publiſhed a ban againſt the elector Palatine[m], wherein he had fully ſet forth the reaſons moving him to come to ſuch extremities: that Spinola was marching to the Palatinate; that the duke of Bavaria was leading his troops to Bohemia, to join the emperor's forces[n]; and the elector of Saxony going to invade Luſatia[o]. In this juncture Wotton made his two propoſitions to the emperor.

The firſt general propoſition was, that the emperor might truſt the king, as it appeared by the three following reaſons:

1. The king was never concerned in the acceptance of the crown of Bohemia.

2. The elector Palatine did not impart the affair to him before his election, and he had diſapproved of it. This was evident from the king's never ſuffering him to be ſtiled King of Bohemia, or to be prayed for as ſuch in the churches.

3. The king never aſſiſted the elector with men or money.

The ſecond propoſition was concerning the means of procuring a peace, and contained theſe three articles:

1. He deſired the emperor to let him know whether he was content to treat of an accommodation by his maſter's and the French king's mediation: adding, if his imperial majeſty expected the affairs of Bohemia ſhould be reſtored to their former ſtate, he conceived that his ſtay at Vienna and the king his maſter's mediation would be fruitleſs.

2. He prayed the emperor to inform him of the ſtate of affairs in Bohemia.

3. And that he would be pleaſed to grant a ceſſation of arms, and let the roads be open between Vienna and Prague during the negotiation.

The emperor, ſurpriſed to hear ſuch propoſitions in the preſent ſtate of affairs, told the embaſſador he did not fully underſtand his diſcourſe, and deſired a clearer and more circumſtantial memorial, that he might be able to give him a ſuitable anſwer. Whether the embaſſador could explain the king's mind concerning the firſt article of the ſecond propoſition, or for ſome other reaſon unknown, the memorial was never preſented, at which the emperor was much diſpleaſed. Thus ended this embaſſy.

The elector of Saxony, the duke of Bavaria, and the marquis of Spinola, commiſſioned to execute the imperial ban, began all three to act in September. I have already ſpoken of what Spinola did in the Palatinate, during this firſt campaign. The elector of Saxony, at the head of twenty thouſand men, entered Luſatia, and by the end of October conquered the whole country, which he kept for himſelf according to his agreement with the emperor.

Whilſt the elector of Saxony was in Luſatia, the duke of Bavaria having ſubdued Upper Auſtria the beginning of September, joined count Bacquoy who commanded the imperial army in Bohemia. As Frederic had all his forces there, the emperor's two generals were obliged to take ſome places before ther could advance to Prague. At length, having opened a paſſage, they came in the beginning of November within ſight of that metropolis and of the enemy's army poſted between them and the city. A few days after[p] was fought the battle of Prague, wherein Frederic's army was entirely routed. This prince, who ſtaid at Prague during the battle, haſtily retired with his wife and children, leaving all his baggage and money in the city, which on the morrow opened her gates to the Imperialiſts and Bavarians. Weſton and Conway, the Engliſh embaſſadors, followed the king in his flight: but finding he intended to withdraw into Holland, they obtained a paſſport to return to Prague, where they remained not long, their ſtay being entirely needleſs[q]."

The victory lately gained by the emperor's arms produced great effects, the firſt whereof was, that the palſegrave was forſaken by moſt of the princes his confederates. The prince of Anhalt himſelf, who commanded his army, entered into the emperor's ſervice. Count Mansfeldt alone remained faithful, and was ſtill ſerviceable to him[r].

This ſame year the Hugonots of France being vigorouſly puſhed by Lewis XIII. James ſent ſir Edward Herbert[s] to ſollicit him in their behalf; nay, he had orders to uſe menaces if the court of France refuſed to regard his remonſtrances. Herbert diſcharged his commiſſion ſo bluntly, that the conſtable Luynes, being offended at it, cauſed him to be recalled. Herbert would have afterwards ſent a challenge to the conſtable for miſrepreſenting his words, but the king would not ſuffer it. The viſcount Doncaſter, lately made earl of Carliſle, was ſent to France in Herbert's room. He ſpent immenſe ſums, without effecting any thing for the Hugonots. This is not ſurpriſing, ſince the French court knew king James was neither able nor willing to aſſiſt them.

The campaign of the Palatinate was no ſooner ended, than the earl of Eſſex poſted away, to repreſent to the king the impoſſibility of ſaving that country, without a ſpeedy and powerful aid[t]. But it was not by way of arms that James meant to ſupport his ſon-in-law's intereſt. Count Gondemar ruled him as he pleaſed, by feeding him with continual hopes of the good ſucceſs of the marriage, provided he would not diſturb the negotiation by proceedings offenſive to the king of Spain: nay, he told him, that ſhould the emperor become maſter of the Palatinate, it would only be a ſurer means to put an end to the war, becauſe then it would be given to the infanta for a preſent to the prince her ſpouſe, who might reſtore it to the count Palatine. All this paſſed current with the king: he was ſo poſſeſſed with the project of ending the war by means of this match, that nothing was capable of altering his belief. Count Gondemar had bribed with preſents and penſions all thoſe who had the king's ear[u], and who took care to cheriſh him in this vain project[w]. The reſt of the world were aſtoniſhed to ſee the king take ſuch wrong meaſures; but no man durſt preſs him upon that head, knowing he did not care any but his miniſters ſhould ſpeak to him of ſtate-affairs. He verily believed there was no other way to ſave the Palatinate, than to preſerve a good underſtanding with the king of Spain and the emperor, by ſtanding neuter. This he declared himſelf to the council, adding however, if his inſtances were rejected he would have recourſe to arms at laſt. Not that he had any intent to go to war with the houſe of Auſtria let what would happen, but hoped this would be a good pretence to get money, which he wanted very much. To that end likewiſe it was debated in council, how to make preparations for the defence of the Palatinate, in caſe the king's mediation was rejected. Gondemar having notice of what had paſſed at the board, wrote to the marquis of Buckingham, deſiring to know what was the king's intention. Here is the favourite's anſwer, which plainly diſcovers the king's thoughts:

SIR,

"I ſhewed your letter to the king, who thinks your requeſt reaſonable. He has ordered me to tell you, that the ſpeech he lately made to the council, contained two principal points: firſt, whereas the world talked ſo variouſly of him, he declared, he was ſo far from adviſing the elector Palatine to accept the crown of Bohemia, that he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade him from it. For the particulars of what he ſaid upon this ſubject, he refers to the lord Digby, who being preſent, can inform your excellency. His majeſty declared moreover, he was reſolved to continue neuter for three reaſons: Firſt, Becauſe his conſcience obliged him to it. Secondly, Becauſe his honour was concerned. Thirdly, Not to give an ill example. Upon the firſt reaſon he ſaid, he was ſure the religion he profeſſed, did not allow that crowns ſhould be removed from one head to another on account of religion: that our church very juſtly oppoſed the principle of the jeſuits, who take upon them to enthrone and dethrone kings according to their fancy: that our religion enjoins us to obey our princes and ſovereigns, though they ſhould be Turks or Infidels: that the world was inclined to turn this to a religious war, to which his majeſty is entirely averſe. As to the point of honour, the king ſaid, that being ſollicited by the king of Spain to uſe all his intereſt to procure a peace between the emperor and the Bohemian ſtates, and this accident, of accepting the crown of Bohemia, happening whilſt his embaſſador was in Germany mediating an accommodation, he was obliged to make known his innocence, in order to ſave his honour: that if now he aſſiſted his ſon-in-law in this affair, his actions would be directly contrary to his proteſtation, which would be very diſhonourable. Upon the third reaſon, his majeſty declared, it was a very dangerous precedent againſt all chriſtian princes, to allow of the tranſlation of a crown by the peoples authority: that though he was king by hereditary right, yet it could not be ſufficiently conſidered how far this miſchief might reach if once it took root; and that this example might very ſenſibly affect the king of Denmark his brother-in-law, whoſe crown was elective: that as for the privileges the Bohemians might have, in this caſe, by the antient and fundamental laws of the kingdom, it would be neceſſary to turn over many volumes, read abundance of hiſtories, and carefully examine what their rights are, before this point could be determined, with which he has nothing to do, not being made judge of the diſpute. The ſecond thing, concerning which the king declared himſelf, was the affair of the Palatinate. Upon this point he firſt informed his council, that he had omitted nothing, as well by means of his embaſſadors, as by his own mouth, in ſpeaking to your excellency: that moreover, he had ſent an embaſſador to the German princes, who were concerned in the affair, to remonſtrate to them, that ſince he had with ſo much ſincerity and candor continued neuter, he had great reaſon, on the other hand, to repreſent to them how much he was concerned in the invaſion of the Palatinate, ſince he had given his daughter to the elector Palatine, bonâ fide, whilſt that prince was in poſſeſſion of his dominions, and long before theſe troubles could be foreſeen: that at preſent his grand-children were lawful heirs to it, and it was neither juſt nor reaſonable to deprive them of their inheritance, ſince they are not guilty, conſidering the ſincerity of the king their grandfather; that indeed, it cannot be denied, there was notice given from Spain, that the emperor would be forced to make this diverſion, to free himſelf from the oppreſſion he endured in Bohemia and Auſtria: that your excellency ſaid the ſame thing, which was confirmed by his embaſſadors: that the invaſion being really made, nature obliged him to provide for the defence of his grand-children by all poſſible and lawful ways: that the approaching winter allowed him to make two ſorts of preparations: Firſt, To endeavour that a peace may be concluded before ſummer; and if, as he hoped, the elector his ſon-in-law would be guided by him, and the emperor be willing to hearken to the overtures which would be made to him, he did not queſtion but a peace would enſue, and the calamities Chriſtendom was threatened with, both by a Turkiſh invaſion and an inteſtine war, would be happily prevented. But if the elector would be willing to yield to reaſonable terms, and the emperor refuſe to comply, in that caſe he would not loſe the opportunity of the winter to prepare for the defence of the Palatinate: and if, on the contrary, the elector remained obſtinate, he would then leave him to his own counſels.

"After the king had thus ſpoken, it was debated in council concerning the means of defending the Palatinate, as the lord Digby could have informed your excellency. To conclude this letter, his majeſty commands me to aſſure you, upon the honour of a Chriſtian king, that this is all that he has paſſed in this affair either in public or private. He is perſuaded, not only your excellency, but the king of Spain alſo, will believe it, ſooner than all the informations which through ignorance or malice may be given you from any other place."

The king's whole conduct, whether at the time this letter was wrote or afterwards, agrees ſo exactly with the ſentiments therein expreſſed, that it would be in vain to queſtion its being genuine [x]. It is certain, the king never intended to defend the Palatinate by arms, whilſt he had any hopes of concluding his ſon's marriage with the infanta. He uſed however that pretence to draw money from his ſubjects, and to ſend a letter ſigned by the council to all the nobility, and to the lord mayor of London, for benevolence [y]. But probably this method was unſucceſsful, ſo much were the people diſſatisfied with the government. At the very time he ſeemed deſirous to defend the Palatinate, invaded by the Spaniards, count Gondemar governed England by his influence over the king [z]. All who had any expectations from the court, were extremely careful not to offend him in any thing whatever, knowing how much it was in his power to prejudice ſuch as he was diſpleaſed with. Secretary Naunton failing on ſome occaſion to uſe this policy, loſt his place, which was given to Conway.

On the other hand, the marquis of Buckingham ruled in the king's name, without bearing the leaſt contradiction. He abſolutely diſpoſed of all offices, or rather his mother, ſince he could not deny her any thing [a]. As ſhe was extremely greedy of money, and a great bigot of the Romiſh religion, none were preferred but ſuch as could make large preſents to the favourite's mother, and were well inclined to Rome, or at leaſt indifferent in point of religion. Nay, places were frequently taken from thoſe who had paid dear for them, in order to diſpoſe of them to new purchaſers. Montague having given twenty thouſand pounds for the office of lord treaſurer, was removed before the year expired [b], and ſir Lionel Cranfield put in his place, and created ſoon after earl of Middleſex [c]. Cranfield had been a merchant in London, and afterwards a cuſtom-houſe officer, from whence he was introduced into court as a projector: a name given to ſuch as ſuggeſted to the miniſters expedients to bring money into the king's exchequer, when there was no parliament.

The marquis of Buckingham, about the end of the year, married the earl of Rutland's only daughter, the richeſt heireſs in the kingdom. Some ſay, he debauched her before marriage, and the earl of Rutland ſent him word, if he did not eſpouſe her, the king's favour ſhould not ſcreen him from his revenge. Buckingham readily complied, ſince it was a very advantageous match for him. But as the young lady was bred a papiſt by her mother, ſhe muſt, for form's ſake, be inſtructed by Dr. White, who, as it is pretended, made her a good proteſtant. However, ſhe was brought by her mother-in-law into the old way again.

The affairs of the proteſtant religion in Germany and France were in a very ill ſituation. On the other hand, the king of Bohemia being driven out of his kingdom, ſaw himſelf upon the point of loſing alſo the Palatinate. All the world murmured to behold the king's extreme indolence with reſpect to theſe two affairs, wherein he was particularly concerned as a father, as a king of England, and as a proteſtant. Theſe murmurs produced at length a parliament. Not that the court's intent was to ſatisfy the people: but it was judged, ſince they were ſo deſirous, that proper meaſures ſhould be taken for the defence of religion and the Palatinate, the houſe of commons would be ready to grant the king an aid anſwerable to ſo important a deſign. A parliament was therefore ſummoned to meet on the 20th of January 1621 [d]. But the better to perſuade the public the king was really bent upon a war, the council nominated, a few days before the parliament met, a certain number of the moſt noted lords and officers, who had orders to meet and give their opinion concerning the means of vigorouſly carrying on the war. Mean while, as the people talked too freely of the king's and his miniſtry's conduct, they were forbid by proclamation to diſcourſe of ſtate-affairs. But this prohibition produced a quite contrary effect, it being hardly poſſible to ſtop people's tongues by ſuch means.

[1621] The king, no doubt, wiſhed to preſerve the Palatinate for his ſon-in-law. All he could be blamed for was, his taking a wrong courſe to that end. Amuſed, or as it were bewitched by Gondemar's charm, he believed the prince's marriage with the infanta was the moſt proper means, not perceiving that this marriage was only a decoy to deceive and hinder him from taking better meaſures. It will doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that James ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be thus managed by a Spaniſh embaſſador, in an affair which ſo much concerned the houſe of Auſtria: but it will be the leſs ſurpriſing, if his ſituation be conſidered. Firſt, He had an averſion to war; and though he would have made believe, it was out of reaſon and choice, it is certain however, this averſion was ſo natural, that it was almoſt impoſſible for him to overcome it.

In the next place, his opinion concerning the extent of the regal power, made him dread all occaſions of cauſing his prerogative to be queſtioned. If he engaged in a war, he muſt call a parliament, and the parliament had already convinced him, they were not of his ſentiment concerning the extent of the prerogative royal, of which he was ſo jealous. It is therefore no wonder, that of the two ways which offered to preſerve the Palatinate, namely, war and the prince's marriage, he ſhould chuſe that which was moſt agreeable to his temper and inclination. What is more ſtrange is, that in comparing theſe two ways, he ſhould be ſo blind as to think the marriage the eaſieſt and moſt proper, and would not ſee that it was only a ſnare to deceive him. On the other hand, he was not ſatisfied with reſolving to take this method rather than the other, but even affected to intimate to the houſe of Auſtria, that he ſhould not, till the laſt extremity, think of having recourſe to arms, and thereby marred all his affairs. The emperor and the king of Spain knew how to improve theſe wrong proceedings. Gondemar having eaſily diſcovered the king's ſcheme, failed not to encourage him to purſue it ſteadily, by putting him in hopes of ſucceſs. There was another and very ſtrong reaſon for Gondemar's keeping the king in this ſituation. The truce between Spain and Holland being about to expire, if the king ſhould reſolve to ſupport his ſon-in-law by arms, he would be able to make ſuch a diverſion in the Low-Countries, as would make Auſtria pay dear for the conqueſt of the Palatinate. For this reaſon chiefly the courts of Vienna and Madrid flattered him with the hopes of obtaining an honourable peace for the prince Palatine. But theſe were only words, which James, too credulous, took for deeds.

Though the king did not intend to declare war with Spain, he was very glad however that the people were inclined to ſupport by arms the elector's intereſt. He hoped the parliament would grant him large ſums to enable him to make himſelf feared, and then he fancied, it would be eaſy for him to determine his ſon-in-law's affairs without drawing the ſword, and conſequently without employing the money which ſhould be given him by the parliament. Herein he meant to imitate his great-grandfather Henry VII. who often uſed this expedient to fill his coffers. But he ſhould alſo have imitated his addreſs in concealing his deſigns, whereas, on the contrary, James's intentions were known to all.

The parliament being aſſembled, the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, which he divided into three heads. In the firſt, he told them what a parliament was, under colour of reminding them of ſo neceſſary and fundamental a point. The ſecond contained the reaſons for their meeting. In the third, he ſpoke of the grievances which the people thought to have cauſe to complain of, and endeavoured to juſtify his conduct. As this ſpeech is very long, I ſhall only cite ſuch paſſages as may ſerve to diſcover both the king's principles and deſigns. He begins thus:

"My lords ſpiritual and temporal, and you the commons. IN multiloquio non deeſt peccatum, ſaith the wiſeſt man that ever was; and this experience I have found in mine own perſon: for it is true there have been many ſeſſions of parliament before this, wherein I have made many diſcourſes to the gentlemen of the lower houſe, and in them delivered a true mirror of my heart; but as no man's actions are free from cenſure, in regard of the excellency of perfection, ſo, it may be, it pleaſed God, ſeeing ſome vanity in me, to ſend back my words as wine ſpit into my own face, ſo as I may truly ſay, "I have piped unto you, and you have not danced; I have mourned, and you have not lamented."

Concerning the conſtitution of a parliament.

"What is a parliament? It is an aſſembly compoſed of a head and a body; the monarch is the head, and the three eſtates[e] the body, which are called in a monarchy a parliament, 'which was uſed and created by monarchs; for kings were before parliaments, who as ſoon as they had ſettled a form of government, and were willing that the people ſhould be governed by laws, called their parliaments,' &c.---Only this I would have you to obſerve, that it is a vain thing for a parliament to preſs to be popular; there is in no ſtate a parliament without a monarchy.---This I put you in mind of, that you ſerve under a monarchy, and that we muſt ſtand and fall with it. Now conſider, firſt, Who called you? Your king. Secondly, Whom he calls? The peers, who in reſpect of the eminency of their places and highneſs have an intereſt therein by birth and inheritance, becauſe they are to aſſiſt the king in his great affairs. In the next, the church, the clergy, not all, but the principal heads thereof, the biſhops.---The knights ſtand for the ſhires, and the other gentlemen for the burroughs: of theſe is the whole body compact.

"Thirdly, Why are ye called? To give the king your advice in ſuch errands as he ſhall aſk of you, or you ſhall think fit to aſk his advice in.

"The king makes laws, and ye are to adviſe him to make ſuch as will be beſt for the commonwealth. There is another cauſe for which the houſe of commons is called, for that they beſt know the particular eſtate of their country; and if the king ſhall aſk their advice, they can beſt tell what is amiſs, as being moſt ſenſible, and alſo petition him to redreſs and amend it: they are the authors of ſuſtenance alſo to him, to ſupply his neceſſities; and that is the proper uſe of a parliament. Here they are to offer what they think fit to ſupply his wants, and he is in lieu thereof to afford them mercy and juſtice.

"And this I dare boldly ſay, and am not aſhamed to ſpeak it, that all people owe a kind of tribute to their king, as a thankfulneſs for his love to them; and where there is this ſympathy between a king and his people, it breeds a happy parliament."

Concerning religion.

"As for religion there are laws enough, ſo as the true intent and execution follow:———

"As touching the rumour which is ſpread, that I ſhould tolerate religion in reſpect to the match which hath been long in treaty with Spain for my ſon; I profeſs I will do nothing therein which ſhall not be honourable and for the good of religion, elſe am I not worthy to be your king; and if any thing break off this match, it ſhall be the cauſe of religion. The trial which you have had of my words and writings, wherein I have been a martyr, tortured in the mouths of many idle fellows, may give you ample teſtimony of my integrity, in ſuch ſort, as I hope you will truſt the wiſdom of your king ſo far, as I will never do one thing in private and another in public: 'but if after this my declaration any ſhall tranſgreſs, blame me not if I ſee them ſeverely puniſhed.'

Concerning the reaſons of calling a parliament.

"Now the major errand (I ſpeak the truth) for which I have called you, is for a ſupply of my urgent neceſſities in urgent cauſes: ye can all bear me witneſs, that I have reigned above eighteen years among you; if it hath been a fault in me that you have been at peace all this time, I pray you pardon it; for I took it for an honour unto me, that you ſhould live quietly under your vines and fig-trees, reaping the fruits of your own labours, and myſelf to be a juſt and merciful king among you. You have not been troubled with preſſing of men, nor with other inconveniencies which the diſaſters of war produce, and yet in theſe eighteen years have I had leſs ſupplies than any king before me. The late queen, of famous memory, was ſo far ſupplied in her time, that it grew to an annual contribution of one hundred thirty-five thouſand pounds a year: I had never above four ſubſidies and ſix fifteenths. I challenge not more of deſert than ſhe; but ſure I am, I have governed as peaceably. The time ſince my ſupply hath been as the time of women with child, 'Quæ decem tulerint faſtidia menſes,' who after ten months longings, are delivered of their burthens; but I have travelled ten years, and therefore full time to be delivered of my wants.

"Now you have ſeen a trial of my late care in divers years laſt paſt in looking into the particulars of my eſtate, wherein I muſt confeſs I have found my revenue (as Job's friends)

[e] As in the following reign there were great diſputes, whether the biſhops were a ſtate or a body apart by themſelves in the parliament, each ſide grounded their aſſertion upon theſe words of this ſpeech; the one affirming the king ſaid, the Three Eſtates, and the other maintaining he mentioned only Two Eſtates: This is the reaſon of the difference which occurs in the ſeveral copies. Ruſhworth and Wilſon have Two Eſtates. Franklin, Nelſon, &c. Three Eſtates.

Theſe

forſaking me [in my houſhold expences I have abated ten thouſand pounds per annum; in my navy I have abated twenty-five thouſand pounds; and ſhortly I hope to abate ten thouſand pounds more. In my ordinary I have brought the expence from thirty-four thouſand to fourteen thouſand pounds], and yet I was loth to believe at firſt that theſe were ſo much out of order; but at laſt, by the information of ſome private gentlemen, I was induced to enter into a particular ſurvey; and herein was the love of my young admiral to me, as he took the envy of all upon himſelf for my ſake: and though he be but young, yet I find him true in faith, and an honeſt man, and hath had the beſt ſucceſs in all he hath taken in hand: he appointed under himſelf divers commiſſioners, as a young commander ſhould do, the better to preſerve himſelf from errors, and yet ſought no reward but my good and ſervice, nevertheleſs went through with great diligence and good ſucceſs: and therefore I hope the kingdom ſhall ſay I have now a true care of my eſtate, not taking from others by violence, houſe or land, but governing my own with good huſbandry."

Concerning the affair of Bohemia, he ſaid much the ſame things as the marquis of Buckingham wrote in his letter to count Gondemar, after which he added:

"I am now to take for a worſe danger againſt next ſummer, albeit I will leave no travel untried to obtain a happy peace; but I thought good to be armed againſt the worſe time, it being beſt to treat of peace with the ſword in my hand: Now I ſhall labour to preſerve the reſt of the Palatinate, wherein I declare, That if by fair means I cannot get it, my crown, my blood, and all ſhall be ſpent, with my ſon's blood alſo, but I will get it for him: and this is the cauſe of all, that the cauſe of religion is involved in it, for they will alter religion where they conquer, and ſo perhaps my grandchild may ſuffer, who hath committed no fault at all. But this is nothing without a ſpeedy ſupply, 'Bis dat qui citò dat.'

"Conſider who it is that moves you? your king; and the care of the reformation, and the charges which he hath diſburſed, beſides forty thouſand pounds upon the pyratical wars; and conſider if I deſerve not your reſpects.

"It is ſtrange that my mint hath not gone this eight or nine years, but I think the fault of the want of money is in the uneven balancing of trade; for other things I confeſs I have been liberal, but the main cauſe of my wants has been the ill government of thoſe whom I have truſted under me, for I will not make every day a Chriſtmas; and yet it may be in ſome grants I have hurt myſelf, and in others my ſubjects; but if I be truly informed, I will rightly reform them.

"But for you to hunt after grievances to the prejudice of the king and yourſelves, is not the errand: deal with me as I ſhall deſerve it at your hands: I will not leave anything undone that becomes a juſt king, if you deal accordingly.

"I know this parliament hath ben of great expectation, and ſo was that at my firſt coming: You I knew, but not the laws and cuſtoms of this land. I was led by the old counſellors I found, which the old queen left, and it may be there was a miſtaking and miſunderſtanding between us, which bred an abruption. And at the laſt parliament there came up a ſtrange kind of beaſt called Undertakers [f], a name, which in my nature I abhor, which cauſed a diſſolution.

"Now you have that advantage that I call you out of my own free motion, and my truſt is in your good offices: For my good ſtates, even all and every one ſhall find an honeſt king of me.

"How happy a fame will that be, that he is reverenced and loved of all his people, and he reciprocally loves them. So ſhall I then be honoured by my neighbour princes, and peradventure my government be made an example for poſterity to follow [g]."

Many remarks and reflections might be made upon this ſpeech; but as that would lead me too far, I ſhall content myſelf with making one ſingle obſervation. This ſpeech contained ſome maxims concerning the regal power, which certainly the Engliſh in general did not then admit, as they do not even at this day. If ſince king James's acceſſion, the parliament, or the commons in particular, had endeavoured to incroach upon his prerogative, it might not be thought ſtrange that he ſhould let them know his reſolution to maintain it, and mark out the bounds they were not to exceed. But if we conſider what paſſed in the two firſt parliaments of this reign, the commons did not begin to attack the king, but the king himſelf gave the parliament cauſe to complain. And ſuppoſing the grievances complained of by the lower-houſe were groundleſs, to repreſent them to the king was no attempt upon the prerogative royal; and yet this was the only reaſon of diſſolving the two firſt parliaments. It appears moreover, not only in this to the preſent parliament, but alſo in his former ſpeeches, that he made his prerogative to conſiſt in an unlimited power, ſince he ſaid in expreſs terms, "That as to diſpute what God may do, is blaſphemy; ſo is it ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute what a king may do in the height of his power [h]." Hence it was eaſy to infer, he ſet no bounds to the prerogative royal.

The occaſion of calling the parliament was ſo plauſible, that the commons eaſily perceived, if they began, according to cuſtom, with the conſideration of the grievances before they gave the king money, he would not fail to ſay, that a delay in ſo important a juncture was the ſame as a denial.

The people were extremely incenſed againſt Spain for invading the Palatinate. They dreaded the prince's marriage with the infanta, and the deſtruction of the proteſtant religion abroad. So to deny the king money on this occaſion, would be juſtifying his indolence. Some members, however, believing the king had no deſign to make war, were deſirous to ſpare the people's purſes. But the reſt demonſtrated to them, the neceſſity of ſacrificing a ſum of money, whether the king employed it in defence of the Palatinate, or put it to other uſes. In the firſt caſe, the public would have what they wiſhed, and the money given the king, would be only a ſmall part of what was farther to be expended in ſupport of the war. In the ſecond caſe, the king's intentions would be manifeſtly known, and that would afford a juſt motive to refuſe him money hereafter for imaginary undertakings. So, without any ſollicitation, the commons granted the king two entire ſubſidies [i], with which he was ſatisfied, in expectation of obtaining much more hereafter on the ſame account.

Not long after, the king ſent the lord Digby to Vienna, to endeavour to adjuſt the elector Palatine's affair, or at leaſt, to obtain a truce which ſhould ſecure the Palatinate from the danger it was threatened with in the next campaign. I ſhall ſpeak of this negotiation, after the recital of what paſſed in the parliament.

The ſubſidy act was no ſooner paſſed, but many petitions were received by the houſe of commons, as well againſt the increaſe of popery, and impunity of recuſants, as againſt monopolies, informers, or projectors. Of the monopolies, three were chiefly complained of. The firſt was concerning inns, which no man could keep without a licence from certain perſons, to whom the king had granted a patent. The ſecond was of the ſame nature with reſpect to ale-houſes. The third was the moſt enormous: It was a patent granted by the king to ſir Giles Monpeſſon and ſir Francis Michel, for the ſole making and ſelling of gold and ſilver lace. By this means, they ſold great quantities of counterfeit gold lace inſtead of real, and if any perſon preſumed to make or ſell any other, he was thrown into gaol, and fined ſeverely [k]. The two patentees being informed againſt in the houſe of commons, were immediately committed to priſon; but Monpeſſon, Buckingham's creature, found means to make his eſcape. As ſoon as he was ſafe, the king publiſhed a proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon that ſhould take him.

Mean while, the two houſes applied themſelves cloſely to the affair of monopolies. The commons would know how theſe two perſons obtained their patent, whilſt the lords were diligently forming their proceſs. In the mean time the king was very uneaſy. He ſaw the affair was examining in ſuch a manner, that the odium could not but fall upon himſelf or favourite. Wherefore, to prevent the conſequences, he came to the houſe of lords, and made a ſpeech full of tender and affectionate expreſſions. He affirmed, he was ignorant of the ill effects his patent had cauſed, and charged them to bring the offenders to ſpeedy and ſevere juſtice: adding, his intention was to revoke all his patents which had been ſo injurious to the people, and particularly that of gold and ſilver lace, [f] Theſe were the earl of Somerſet, and ſome others, who undertook to procure the king a parliament at his devotion.

[g] This ſpeech is taken out of the Annals of King James I. For the author pretends, that in Wilſon is not the true one. Rapin.—Neither Ruſhworth's, nor Wilſon's, nor Franklin's, ſeem to be the true ſpeech; but that in Nelſon's Introduction.

[i] And the clergy three. Coke, p. 111.

[k] The lace was made of copper, and other ſophiſticated materials, which were of ſo poiſonous a nature, that they rotted the hands and arms, and brought lameneſs and blindneſs upon thoſe that wrought this compoſition. Wilſon, p. 731.

And

which was a kind of falſe coin. He exhorted them moreover, to diſpatch the bill they were preparing againſt informers and projectors, ſaying, he had before, in the ſtar-chamber, ſhewn his diſlike of ſuch people, and to be rid of them would be the greateſt eaſe to himſelf, and all thoſe about him. For, continued he, Buckingham told me he never found ſuch quiet and reſt as in this time of parliament from projectors and informers, who at other times miſerably vexed him at all hours." In ſhort, he told them, he thought till then the people had never been ſo happy as in his reign; but now he was aſhamed to conſider how his people had been vexed and polled, by the vile execution of projects, patents, bills of conformity, and the like, which have more exhauſted their purſes than ſubſidies would have done. Having thus obviated the complaints which could be made againſt him, by condemning firſt the occaſion of them, he taught the lords how they were to proceed in equitably judging the matters before them, namely, not to ſuffer themſelves to be carried away with an inconſiderate zeal for juſtice, in hearkening to thoſe who accuſed the innocent as well as the guilty.

Every one knew that he meant to hinder the marquis of Buckingham from being attacked, who was reckoned the chief author of the monopolies. He had indeed the ſatisfaction to ſee that the parliament did not carry this affair very far. But though he had ordered his ſpeech to be printed, and diſperſed, he could not hinder reflections to his diſadvantage. For inſtance, he ſaid in his ſpeech, that "he aſſured them in the heart of an honeſt man, and by the faith of a Chriſtian king, if theſe grievances had been complained of to him before the parliament, he would have puniſhed them more ſeverely than perhaps the parliament intended to do," and yet he was contented with abandoning Monpeſſon and Michel, whilſt he deſired the perſon who procured them their patent ſhould be left unmoleſted.

However, the lords were ſatisfied with puniſhing Monpeſſon and Michel. They confiſcated Monpeſſon's eſtate, who had made his eſcape, and degraded him of his knighthood [l]. Michel was likewiſe degraded, fined a thouſand pounds, impriſoned for life, and carried on horſeback with his face to the tail, through the public ſtreets in London.

Shortly after, the king hearing complaints were brought before the peers againſt chancellor Bacon, came to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, made a ſpeech, wherein he chiefly inſiſted upon the neceſſity of puniſhing corruption and bribery in judges. Then he thanked the commons for the two ſubſidies, but ſaid, the money had been employed before-hand for the defence of the Palatinate, and maintenance of his children, who were fled to Holland for refuge: That he had procured a ſhort truce, and hoped ſoon to obtain a general peace; but the great charges of ſending embaſſadors over all Europe, or an army into the Palatinate in caſe his negotiations became fruitleſs, required a much larger ſum than what had been granted him. He concluded, with proteſting before God, he would not diſſolve the parliament till the affairs in agitation were finiſhed.

Mean while, the houſe of commons having demanded a conference of the lords, repreſented to them, that the chancellor being accuſed of ſeveral crimes, it was not fit he ſhould continue any longer in ſo eminent a poſt if he was guilty, or be expoſed to calumny if innocent. Whereupon the lords ſent the chancellor to the Tower, and prepared for his trial. He uſed all poſſible endeavours to avoid the ſhame of a particular and full confeſſion. To that end he preſented an humble ſubmiſſion to the houſe, confeſſing himſelf guilty in general, and imploring pardon, or at leaſt, that his puniſhment might not extend farther than the taking from him the great ſeal. But the lords were inexorable. They required him to confeſs the particulars of the charge, which conſiſted in the enumeration of ſeveral bribes he had taken. He was ſo very expreſs, that he confeſſed, one of his ſervants took a dozen of buttons as a gift, in a cauſe depending before him [m]. But this confeſſion, however full and plain it was, did not hinder him from being declared unworthy, not only of the office of chancellor, but even of having a place for the future in the houſe of peers [n], though he had been created baron of Verulam, and viſcount of St. Albans [o]. Nay, he was like to have been deprived of this dignity [p]. He was a very great genius, and one of the moſt learned men in Europe, but a ſervile flatterer, extremely haughty whilſt fortune ſmiled upon him, and cringing when ſhe frowned. After his diſgrace, he compoſed ſeveral works, and amongſt others, the Hiſtory of King Henry VII. to whom certainly he has not given a juſt character. This is not ſurpriſing; for as his eſtate was forfeited by the ſentence paſſed upon him, and as he lived only on a penſion from the king, who always ſpoke of Henry VII. his great grandfather with high commendations, he made his court to the king, by repreſenting that prince as a pattern of wiſdom and virtue [q].

It was properly in this third parliament that two parties were formed, the one for the court, the other for the people, who began from this time to oppoſe one another on all occaſions. The people had the ſtrongeſt party among the commons, and the king in the houſe of lords. Not but that the kings had always their adherents in both houſes, and the miniſters and favourites their enemies and enviers. But till this parliament, there were not properly any formed parties, or, if any, they were not long-lived. But thoſe that began to be formed this year, continually encreaſed. Theſe are the ſame parties which ſtill ſubſiſt, under the names of Tories and Whigs; the firſt of which labours inceſſantly to ſtretch the prerogative royal as high as poſſible, when favoured by the king; and the other is always inſiſting on the rights and privileges of the people. The mutual animoſity of theſe two parties, when firſt they were formed, was nothing in compariſon of what it is at this day. When all parliamentary affairs came to be tranſacted with a ſpirit of party, every thing tended by degrees to confuſion. As one of the parties was always ready to increaſe the king's power, the others uſed their utmoſt endeavours, not only to keep it within due bounds, but alſo to leſſen it, for fear the king's prerogatives might ſerve him for ſteps to mount higher. Thus both went too far. James I. gave birth to theſe two parties (who occaſioned ſo many calamities to England and his own family) by haughtily eſtabliſhing prerogatives, which perhaps would never have been queſtioned, had he not founded them upon principles that opened a door to arbitrary power. He met however, with great oppoſition, not only in the houſe of commons, but among the peers themſelves, ſeveral of whom did not ſcruple to contradict him openly. Of this number were the earls of Eſſex, Oxford, Southampton, and Warwick; the lord Say and Seal, the lord Spenſer, and ſome others. It was then become cuſtomary, that when one lord had ſpoken for or againſt the government, he was anſwered by another of the oppoſite party, and very often with a heat and paſſion unbecoming the dignity of the houſe. One day, as the lord Spenſer was ſpeaking about the government, and alleging ſeveral examples of their great anceſtors, Arundel ſuddenly interrupted him, ſaying, "My lord, when theſe things you ſpeak of were doing, your anceſtors were keeping ſheep [r]." Spenſer inſtantly replied, "When my anceſtors (as you ſay) were keeping ſheep, your's were plotting treaſon." Whereupon the houſe ordering them both to withdraw, it was reſolved, in ſpite of the moſt zealous courtiers, that the earl of Arundel, as aggreſſor, ſhould give the lord Spenſer ſatisfaction, which he refuſing, was ſent to the Tower, and not releaſed till he had ſubmitted to the commands of the houſe.

Mean while, the commons finding the king made no preparations for war, but only ſent Digby to the emperor, were not forward to give him a freſh ſupply, eſpecially as they knew the two ſubſidies already granted had been put to other uſes. They were not ignorant moreover, that the king built all his hopes upon the Spaniſh match, and conſequently would not eaſily reſolve to take up arms againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and the more, becauſe Gondemar had ſtill a great influence over him. The truth is, had the king really intended to wreſt from the Spaniard what was taken from the Palatinate, it was not natural for the Spaniſh embaſſador to have ſo much power at court. The people were extremely diſpleaſed with it, and looked upon the Spaniſh marriage as a very great misfortune to the nation and the proteſtant reli-

[l] And alſo outlawed, and condemned him to perpetual baniſhment. See Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 27.

[m] That dozen of buttons was valued at fifty pounds. The reader may ſee an account of the proceedings againſt him (which continued from March 15 to May 3), in State Trials, tom. I. p. 353, &c.

[n] He was alſo condemned in a fine of forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure; and declared for ever incapable of any office or place. State Trials.

[o] He was created ſo July 11, 1617. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVII. p. 17.

[p] To heighten his miſery the more, many others were cruſhed by his fall, for he was vaſtly in debt, and notwithſtanding his penſion, he wanted to his laſt, living obſcurely in his lodgings at Grey's-Inn. Wilſon, p. 735.—His too great indulgence to his ſervants was the cauſe of his ruin; he connived at their takings, and they were profuſe and expenſive, and had at command whatever he was maſter of. His decrees in chancery, were generally made with ſo much equity, that never was any one of them reverſed as unjuſt. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 31.

[q] He was of a middling ſtature, his countenance indented with age before he was old; his preſence grave and comely, of a high-flying and lively wit, ſtriving in ſome things to be rather admired than underſtood; yet ſo quick and eaſy where he would expreſs himſelf, and his memory ſo ſtrong and active, that he appeared the maſter of a large and plenteous ſtore-houſe of knowledge. Wilſon, p. 736.

[r] The lord Spenſer, it ſeems, took great delight in a country life, and eſpecially in flocks of ſheep, which made Wilſon ſay, "He was more vigilant to keep the people's liberties from being a prey to the incroaching power of monarchy, than his harmleſs and tender lambs from foxes, and ravenous creatures." p. 737.

Gondemar

gion. Of this they gave Gondemar himſelf a ſenſible proof, who was reviled and inſulted by the populace of London ſtreets [s]. The king hearing of it, ordered one of the inſolent mob to be publicly whipped by the hangman.

The king perceiving the commons would never think of granting him a freſh aid, before it was more certainly known whether there would be peace or war, ordered the lord treaſurer to go in his name, on June 4, and adjourn the parliament to the 14th of November. The ſpirit of jealouſy, which then reigned among the commons, cauſed them to conſider the adjournment as an incroachment upon their privileges. They pretended, the king had indeed power to prorogue and diſſolve the parliament, but that adjournment was the peculiar privilege of each houſe. So they deſired a conference with the lords, to perſuade them to concur with them in preſenting a petition to the king upon the occaſion. But the king acquainting the lords, that ſuch a petition would be very diſpleaſing to him, and that he would not ſuffer his power to call, adjourn, prorogue, and diſſolve the parliament, to be diſputed, the lords refuſed to join with the commons. Whereupon the commons declared, that they were extremely concerned at the king's reſolution, becauſe it deprived them of the means of finiſhing what was begun for the public good.

This declaration brought the king to the houſe of peers, and after thanking their lordſhips for acknowledging his prerogative, and refuſing to join with the commons, he told them, if they deſired it, he would grant them a delay of eight or ten days, but would not do it at the requeſt of the commons. Upon this offer the lords, after a conference with the commons, moved the king to continue their ſitting for fourteen days, which was granted. Some days after, a committee of both houſes attending the king, he took occaſion to tell them, how ill he took it that the commons ſhould diſpute his undoubted right to adjourn the parliament. Probably, this power was not confirmed by cuſtom, ſince the commons conſidered it as an invaſion of their privileges, whereas they never thought of queſtioning his right to prorogue and diſſolve the parliament. Be this as it will, the commons, ſeeing the lords, who were equally concerned in the affair, refuſe their concurrence, proceeded no farther. Nevertheleſs, on the day they were to break up, they drew the following declaration, "That taking into moſt ſerious conſideration the preſent ſtate of the king's children abroad, and the generally afflicted ſtate of the true profeſſors of the ſame Chriſtian religion, profeſſed by the church of England in foreign parts, and being touched with a true ſenſe and fellow-feeling of their diſtreſſes, as members of the ſame body, they do with unanimous conſent declare———They ſhall be ready to the utmoſt of their power, both with their lives and fortunes, to aſſiſt his majeſty, ſo, as that he may be able to do that with his ſword, which by a peaceable courſe ſhall not be effected."

Preſently after, the king publiſhed a proclamation, wherein he ſet forth, That as many great affairs debated in parliament, could not be brought to perfection in ſo ſhort a time, "the commons thought it convenient to continue the ſame ſeſſion in courſe of adjournment:" That as for the grievances, they were ſuch as he needed not the aſſiſtance of parliament to reform the ſame, and would have redreſſed them himſelf, had they been ſooner made known to him. Adding, that by his own regal authority, he annulled and revoked the patent for gold and ſilver thread, and ſome others mentioned in the proclamation. At the ſame time a ſecond proclamation was publiſhed againſt ſuch as were ſo bold as to talk of ſtate-affairs, notwithſtanding his majeſty's former command, with threats of ſevere puniſhment, as well againſt the concealers of ſuch diſcourſes, as againſt audacious tongues and pens.

On the 20th of July, John Williams dean of Weſtminſter was ſworn lord keeper of the great ſeal of England, the chancellorſhip having been vacant ever ſince Bacon's condemnation.

I muſt now briefly relate what paſſed in Bohemia and the Palatinate, after the battle of Prague. This knowledge is abſolutely neceſſary for the clear underſtanding of the affairs of England.

The day after the battle, the city of Prague ſurrendered at diſcretion, and the duke of Bavaria returned to Munich, leaving his army in Bohemia under the command of count Tilly his general. On the other hand, count Bucquoy departed the 12th of December for Moravia, which voluntarily ſubmitted, as deſpairing of aſſiſtance. After Bucquoy had ſpent part of the winter in Moravia and at Vienna, he went and commanded the imperial army in Hungary, where he was ſlain, after ſome progreſs. A little before, Sileſia had likewiſe ſubmitted to the emperor.

Mean while, count Mansfeldt had fortified himſelf in Bohemia, from whence the imperialiſts, would have found it difficult to drive him. But the king of Bohemia, who was ſtill in Holland, hearing the duke of Bavaria was preparing to invade the Upper Palatinate, cauſed Mansfeldt to march his army thither, having obtained of the Hollanders a hundred and fifty thouſand florins to pay his troops. Mansfeldt was not however in condition to withſtand Tilly, who being entered the Upper Palatinate with twenty-five thouſand men, had taken Bamburgh and ſome other places. Mean while as Mansfeldt had intrenched himſelf behind a moraſs, where it was impracticable to attack him, count Tilly, to make him quit the country, concluded a treaty with him, by which he promiſed to ſupply him with two hundred thouſand florins. The treaty was concluded the 27th of September 1621, but ſome difficulty ariſing, it was not executed. So Mansfeldt kept his poſt till the lord Digby's arrival, who paſſing that way in his return from Vienna, prevailed with him to march into the Lower Palatinate, which was in extreme danger. By that means the Upper Palatinate was really loſt and ſubdued by the duke of Bavaria.

In the year 1620, Spinola, as I ſaid, began his conqueſts in the Lower Palatinate. Since the ſubmiſſion of the king of Bohemia's allies to the emperor after the battle of Prague, Spinola had continued his conqueſts with rapidity, for there was no army to ſtop him, and the Engliſh were too weak to oppoſe his progreſs. However, on the 2d of Auguſt 1620, a five weeks truce was concluded at Haguenau, which was the truce mentioned by king James in his ſpeech to the parliament. The archduke had made him believe he agreed to the truce purely on his account; but in reality it was only to give the emperor time to ſend forces into the Lower Palatinate in the room of thoſe Spinola was leading back to the Netherlands, becauſe of the expiration of the twelve years truce between Spain and Holland. Spinola leaving but very few troops with don Gonſales de Cordova, who was come to command in the Palatinate, the truce was as much for the Spaniard's advantage as for the king of Bohemia's. Shortly after, the Spaniſh army being ten thouſand ſtrong, Vere was forced to retire to Wormes. Mean while, the Spaniſh general became maſter of Stein, Ladenburg, and Keiſers-Lautern, and in October beſieged Frankendal, where Vere had retired. There was no other way to ſave that important place, than, as I ſaid, by cauſing Mansfeldt to come from the Upper Palatinate. Upon Mansfeldt's approach, Gonſales raiſed the ſiege of Frankendal. But preſently after, Tilly arriving in the Lower Palatinate with the Bavarian army, and ſome troops of Mentz and Wirtzburgh, Mansfeldt was forced to retire into Alſatia. This campaign ended with the loſs of all the towns in the Lower Palatinate, except Manheim, Heidelburgh, and Frankendal, which were the moſt important. Vere continued at Frankendal, Herbert commanded in Manheim, and Borroughs in Heidelbergh.

Philip III. king of Spain, died the 31ſt of March this year, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Philip IV.

In France, Lewis XIII. vigorouſly preſſed the Hugonots and inveſted Montauban, but the long reſiſtance of the beſieged, compelled him to deſiſt.

The twelve years truce between Spain and the United Provinces being about to expire, the archduke was afraid James would ſend a ſtrong aid to the ſtates, in order to oblige the Spaniards to reſtore what was taken in the Palatinate. To divert him from ſuch a thought, he intimated to him, that a peace between the elector Palatine and the emperor was not ſo difficult as was imagined, and the emperor doubtleſs would agree to it upon reaſonable terms. Nay, he ſent the emperor in the elector's behalf a very preſſing letter, which was ſhewn to the king. This was attacking him on his weak ſide; for he was ever of opinion, that juſtice, honeſty, and the regard the world had for him, were ſufficient to determine this affair. To inſnare him the more eaſily, the emperor wrote to the archduke, that at his inſtances, and out of his great reſpect to the king of England, he was ready to embrace all proper methods for a peace with the elector Palatine. On the other hand, the king of Spain told the emperor, that if he gave the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria, as was reported, he muſt expect no farther aſſiſtance from Spain. All theſe letters were communicated to the king or his embaſſadors, which confirmed him in his opinion, that there would be no occaſion for war, and to ſhew the leaſt miſtruſt would ſpoil all. Thus the princes of the houſe of Auſtria amuſed the king, to induce him to remain in his fatal neutrality. Upon theſe hopes therefore, without queſtioning in the leaſt their ſincerity, he diſpatched the lord Digby to Vienna, the ſucceſs of whoſe negotiation I muſt now relate.

[s] Gondemar uſed all poſſible methods to weaken this nation. For he cauſed ordnance, and other warlike proviſions, to be conveyed from England, to furniſh the Spaniſh arſenals. And procured, under-hand, the ſending of ſir Robert Manſel into the Mediterranean, to deſtroy the Algerines, which ſecured the Spaniſh coaſts and ſhipping, and diverted to another uſe that money and ſtrength which ſhould have been employed for the defence of the Palatinate. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 3.

This embaſſador having an audience of the emperor the 15th of July, confined his demands to theſe two heads: Firſt, That the elector Palatine ſhould be reſtored to the ſame ſtate he was in before he was choſen king of Bohemia. Secondly, That the imperial ban ſhould be revoked, or at leaſt ſuſpended, for which the king his father-in-law would undertake to oblige him to give the emperor due ſatisfaction.

The emperor, who only ſought to gain time, anſwered in writing, that at the requeſt of the king of England, and ſome other princes who had wrote to him in the Palſgrave's behalf, he was ready to pardon him. That the difficulty of the affair conſiſted in two principal points: the firſt was, that the Palſgrave ſhould pay him the obedience due to the head of the empire; the ſecond, that he ſhould give him a reaſonable ſatisfaction. As this was exactly James's ſcheme for an accommodation, a peace ſeemed not to be very remote. But the term, Satisfaction, being capable of a more or leſs extenſive meaning, it was eaſy for the emperor to prolong the negotiation, as he pleaſed. However, for fear he ſhould be taken at his word, he added in his anſwer, that as he had undertaken the war, with the advice and aſſiſtance of divers princes, he could do nothing without their conſent, but had called a diet at Ratiſbon, the reſolutions whereof ſhould be communicated to the king of England. It muſt be obſerved, this diet did not meet till January 1623.

A few days after the emperor had delivered this anſwer to the embaſſador, he received a letter from the infanta Iſabella, notifying the death of her huſband the archduke at Bruſſels the 13th of July, and repeating withal her inſtances in the elector's behalf. Whereupon Digby preſented a freſh memorial, demanding a truce for the Lower Palatinate on three conditions: 1. That count Mansfeldt ſhould obſerve the truce, otherwiſe the elector Palatine ſhould revoke his commiſſion. 2. That the commiſſion of John-George de Brandenburg, marquis of Jagerndorf, who ſerved the elector, ſhould be likewiſe revoked. 3. That as ſoon as the truce was publiſhed, the elector ſhould deliver to the emperor, Tabor and Witigaw, the only places he ſtill held in Bohemia.

The emperor receiving theſe propoſals, communicated them to the elector of Saxony and the duke of Bavaria, who returned both the ſame anſwer, as if they had given each other the word, namely, they adviſed him to omit nothing to reſtore peace to Germany: looſe expreſſions without any meaning, but which however gave occaſion to believe they were inclined to peace. After that, the emperor wrote a letter to the infanta, which was imparted to Digby, telling her, that at her requeſt, and out of his great regard for the king of England, who had ſhewn ſo much prudence, ſincerity, and moderation, he was reſolved to treat of a truce, on the conditions propoſed by the Engliſh embaſſador himſelf. Adding, that during the truce, conferences might be held, to try to come to a peace. Thus James was obliged either to ſit ſtill and expect the event of theſe conferences, or to break with the emperor and Spain, when the peace ſeemed to be upon the point of concluſion, to which it was well known he would not eaſily be determined.

Some time after, the emperor, whether to gain time, or to be freed from Digby's importunities, told him, he intended to grant a truce for the Palatinate, if the duke of Bavaria would conſent to it. Nay, he adviſed him to go and negotiate the truce with the duke. Digby leaving Vienna the 11th of September, came into the Upper Palatinate, where the duke of Bavaria then was, at the time Mansfeldt was concluding the forementioned truce with Tilly. When Digby talked of a truce, the duke told him, "There was no need to labour for a truce, for the wars were at an end, in that he had agreed with count Mansfeldt; nor did he doubt of keeping both Palatinates in peace, till the emperor and Palſgrave were agreed," The emperor hearing by Digby this anſwer, wrote him word, that the face of affairs being altered in the Upper Palatinate by Mansfeldt's fault, who had entered that country with his troops, the duke of Bavaria was under a neceſſity of raiſing an army to drive him thence, and it was not reaſonable he ſhould be at that charge to no purpoſe. Then it was that Digby, having informed the king of the ſtate of affairs in Germany brought Mansfeldt into the Lower Palatinate, where his coming ſaved Frankendal. After that, he borrowed upon his own credit ten thouſand pounds ſterling to pay the Engliſh troops, who had for a long time received nothing.

The king being informed, by his embaſſador's letter, of the duke of Bavaria's anſwer, wrote to the emperor, to complain of the invaſion of the Palatinate, and to tell him in what manner he conceived the elector Palatine was to give him ſatisfaction, in order to fix the ſenſe of the word. 1. That he ſhould renounce the crown of Bohemia. That as prince of the empire he ſhould ſubmit to his imperial majeſty. 3. That he ſhould aſk pardon on his knees. 4. That for the future he ſhould remain quiet, and raiſe no diſturbance in the empire. 5. That he ſhould be reconciled to all the princes. 6. That if this was not ſufficient, he would undertake to procure what other terms ſhould be deemed reaſonable. Laſtly, He told him, that if he could not obtain his ſon-in-law's pardon by fair means, he was reſolved to have recourſe to arms. The emperor, without being frighted at this menace, ſtill continued to amuſe him; and the better to perſuade him he was inclined to peace, he diſpatched count Schwatzenburgh to ſettle with him the conditions of a truce. The count was very magnificently received at London. But before I ſpeak of the ſucceſs of his embaſſy, I muſt relate what paſſed in England till the end of the year.

The king had farther adjourned the two houſes from the 14th of November to the 8th of February 1622. But Digby's return occaſioned his ordering them to meet the 20th of November. As he was a little indiſpoſed, he commanded the lord keeper, the lord treaſurer, and the lord Digby, to acquaint the parliament with his intentions. The lord keeper ſaid, that ſince the laſt adjournment the king had taken great care of the nation, reforming by his proclamations thirty-ſeven ſeveral grievances complained of by the people, without demanding any thing in return for theſe favours, as was uſual in former times. That he had re-aſſembled the parliament, upon the declaration of the commons to aſſiſt him powerfully in the recovery of the Palatinate. That he had uſed his endeavours to procure a good peace, but with little ſucceſs, as the lord Digby would inform them. Then, he put them in mind, that the king had advanced forty thouſand pounds to keep together an army in the Lower Palatinate: "But, continued he, unleſs the parliament take farther reſolution, and imitate rather antient than modern principles, and be more expeditious in what they do, his majeſty's endeavours will fall to the ground." He concluded, with ſaying, the king had reſolved to continue the ſeſſion till ſeven or eight days before Chriſtmas, and renew it the 8th of February.

The lord Digby ſpeaking next, gave a brief account of his embaſſy to Vienna, and ſaid, he plainly diſcovered, it was the emperor's intent to give the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria. Adding, that a good ſum of money was abſolutely neceſſary, both to keep count Mansfeldt's army together, and to ſend a ſtrong ſupply of Engliſh troops to the Palatinate.

The lord treaſurer ſaid, the king's coffers were empty, his treaſure being exhauſted by the ſums employed in the defence of the Palatinate. Nevertheleſs, though the king declared for war, he was reſolved to conclude the Spaniſh marriage, hoping by that means to heal the breach.

It is certain, the king had no deſign to go to war, ſince it could be only with the Spaniard, whom he conſidered as his beſt friend, and with whom he was going to be allied by his ſon's marriage with the infanta. But he made as if he intended to take up arms, in caſe he was obliged to it. To that end, it was neceſſary, in his opinion, to prepare betimes, and begin with ſending money to Mansfeldt to pay his troops and continue the war in the Palatinate, till the ſucceſs of the negotiations at Vienna and Madrid ſhould be known. The king would therefore have it ſuppoſed, as a thing certain, that in caſe theſe negotiations were fruitleſs, he was bent to begin the war and vigorouſly ſupport it. Conſequently, he demanded money to enable him to make the neceſſary preparations, and required that the affair ſhould be left entirely to his management. Indeed parliaments are wont to act thus, when they think the king is undertaking a juſt and neceſſary war: ſo James proceeded upon the uſual cuſtom and method of the parliament. There was only one objection to be made, on which however no man durſt ſpeak his mind freely, namely, that the conduct of the former parliaments was grounded upon their good opinion of their kings, and their confidence in them. But the commons had no ſuch confidence in James I. He demanded money for a war, to which they were perſuaded he had no inclination; and therefore they could not help fearing, that the money which ſhould be granted him, would be employed other ways than in a war with

with Spain. On the other hand, the commons were taken in their own ſnares: to ſhew that the delay of a war, deemed neceſſary by all the world, did not proceed from them, they had promiſed to put the king in a condition to begin and purſue it vigorouſly; but when this promiſe came to be performed, their little confidence in the king made them very reſerved: it was neceſſary however to ſatisfy the public, and ſhew they meant to keep their promiſe, provided they could be certain it would be for the advantage of the ſtate. To that end they reſolved to make a remonſtrance to the king, and repreſent to him what they thought requiſite in the preſent juncture: not that they expected the king would grant their requeſts, but to leave him without excuſe in caſe he refuſed them, which was ſcarce to be doubted. Such were the effects the diſtruſt between the king and the parliament began to produce: inſtead of uſing their joint endeavours for the public good, each ſtrove to take advantage of the other. For the better underſtanding the events of this reign, which were the origin and ſpring of the troubles in the next, it will not be improper to inſert the whole remonſtrance, notwithſtanding its length.

"Moſt gracious and dread ſovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, now aſſembled in parliament, who repreſent the commons of your realm, full of hearty ſorrow, to be deprived of the comfort of your royal preſence, or the rather, for that it proceeds from the want of your health, wherein we all unfeignedly do ſuffer; in all humble manner, calling to mind your gracious anſwer to our former petition concerning religion, which, notwithſtanding your majeſty's pious and princely intentions, hath not produced that good effect, which the danger of theſe Times doth ſeem to us to require: and finding how ill your majeſty's goodneſs hath been requited by princes of different religion, who, even in time of treaty, have taken opportunity to advance their own ends, tending to the ſubverſion of religion, and diſadvantage of your affairs, and the eſtate of your children; by reaſon whereof, your ill-affected ſubjects at home, the popiſh recuſants, have taken too much encouragement, and are dangerouſly increaſed in their number, and in their inſolencies. We cannot but be ſenſible thereof, and therefore humbly repreſent what we conceive to be the cauſes of ſo great and growing miſchiefs, and what be the remedies.

"I. The vigilancy and ambition of the pope of Rome, and his deareſt ſon, the one aiming at as large a temporal monarchy, as the other at a ſpiritual ſupremacy.

"II. The deviliſh poſitions and doctrines, whereon popery is built, and taught with authority to their followers, for advancement of their temporal ends.

"III. The diſtreſſed and miſerable eſtate of the profeſſors of true religion in foreign parts.

"IV. The diſaſtrous accidents to your majeſty's children abroad, expreſſed with rejoicing, and even with contempt of their perſons.

"V. The ſtrange confederacy of the princes of the popiſh religion, aiming mainly at the advancement of theirs, and ſubverting of ours, and taking the advantages conducing to that end upon all occaſions.

"VI. The great and many armies raiſed, and maintained at the charge of the king of Spain, the chief of that league.

"VII. The expectation of the popiſh recuſants of the match with Spain, and feeding themſelves with great hopes of the conſequences thereof.

"VIII. The interpoſing of foreign princes, and their agents, in the behalf of popiſh recuſants, for connivance and favour unto them.

"IX. The open and uſual reſort to the houſes, and, which is worſe, to the chapels of foreign embaſſadors.

"X. Their more than uſual concourſe to the city, and their frequent conventicles and conferences.

"XI. The education of their children in many ſeveral ſeminaries and houſes of their religion in foreign parts, appropriated to the Engliſh fugitives.

"XII. The grants of their juſt forfeitures intended by your majeſty, as a reward of ſervice to the grantees; but, beyond your majeſty's intention, transferred or compounded for, at ſuch mean rates, as will amount to leſs than a toleration.

"XIII. The licentious printing and diſperſing of popiſh and ſeditious books, even in the time of parliament.

"XIV. The ſwarms of prieſts and jeſuits, the common incendiaries of all Chriſtendom, diſperſed in all parts of your kingdom.

"And from the cauſes, as bitter roots, we humbly offer to your majeſty, that we foreſee and fear there will neceſſarily follow very dangerous effects both to church and ſtate.

For,

"I. The popiſh religion is incompatible with ours in reſpect of their poſitions.

"II. It draweth with it an inviolable dependency on foreign princes.

"III. It openeth too wide a gap for popularity, to any who ſhall draw too great a party.

"IV. It hath a reſtleſs ſpirit, and will ſtrive by theſe gradations; if it once get but a connivance, it will preſs for a toleration: if that ſhould be obtained, they muſt have an equality; from thence they will aſpire to ſuperiority; and will never reſt till they get a ſubverſion of the true religion.

"The remedies againſt theſe growing evils, which, in all humility, we offer unto your moſt excellent majeſty, are theſe:

"I. That ſeeing this inevitable neceſſity is fallen upon your majeſty, which no wiſdom or providence of a peaceful and pious king can avoid, your majeſty would not omit this juſt occaſion, ſpeedily and effectually to take your ſword in your hand.

"II. That once undertaken upon ſo honourable and juſt grounds, your majeſty would reſolve to purſue, and more publicly avow the aiding of thoſe of our religion in foreign parts, which, doubtleſs, would reunite the princes and ſtates of the union, by theſe diſaſters diſheartened and diſbanded.

"III. That your majeſty would propoſe to yourſelf to manage this war with the beſt advantage, by a diverſion or otherwiſe, as in your deep judgment ſhall be found fitteſt, and not to reſt upon a war in theſe parts only, which will conſume your treaſure, and diſcourage your people.

"IV. That the bent of this war, and point of your ſword, may be againſt that prince (whatſoever opinion of potency he hath) whoſe armies and treaſures have firſt diverted, and ſince maintained the war in the Palatinate.

"V. That for ſecuring our peace at home, your majeſty would be pleaſed to review the parts of our petition, formerly delivered unto your majeſty, and hereunto annexed, and to put in execution, by the care of choice commiſſioners to be thereunto eſpecially appointed, the laws already, and hereafter to be made, for preventing of dangers by popiſh recuſants, and their wonted evaſions.

"VI. That to fruſtrate their hopes for a future age, our moſt noble prince may be timely and happily married to one of our own religion.

"VII. That the children of the nobility and gentry of this kingdom, and of others, ill affected and ſuſpected in their religion, now beyond the ſeas, may be forthwith called home by your means, and at the charge of their parents or governors.

"VIII. That the children of popiſh recuſants, or ſuch whoſe wives are popiſh recuſants, be brought up during their minority, with proteſtant ſchool-maſters and teachers, who may ſow, in their tender years, the ſeeds of true religion.

"IX. That your majeſty will be pleaſed ſpeedily to revoke all former licences for ſuch children and youth to travel beyond the ſeas, and not grant any ſuch licence hereafter.

"X. That your majeſty's learned council may receive commandment from your highneſs, carefully to look into former grants of recuſants lands, and to avoid them, if by law they can; and that your majeſty will ſtay your hand from paſſing any ſuch grants hereafter.

"This is the ſum and effect of our humble declaration, which we (no ways intending to preſs upon your majeſty's undoubted and regal prerogative) do, with the fulneſs of our duty and obedience, humbly ſubmit to your moſt princely conſideration: the glory of God, whoſe cauſe it is; the zeal of our true religion, in which we have been born, and wherein (by God's grace) we are reſolved to die; the ſafety of your majeſty's perſon, who is the very life of your people; the happineſs of your children and poſterity; the honour and good of the church and ſtate, dearer to us than our lives, having kindled theſe reflections, truly devoted to your majeſty.

"And ſeeing, out of our duty to your majeſty, we have already reſolved to give, at the end of this ſeſſion, one entire ſubſidy, for the preſent relief of the Palatinate only, to be paid in the end of February next, which cannot well be effected but by paſſing a bill in a parliamentary courſe before before Chriſtmas; we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty (as our aſſured hope is) that you will then alſo vouchſafe to give life by your royal aſſent to ſuch bills as before that time ſhall be prepared for your majeſty's honour, and the general good of your people: and that ſuch bills may be alſo accompanied (as hath been accuſtomed) with your majeſty's gracious pardon, which proceeding from your own mere grace, may, by your highneſs's direction, be drawn to that latitude and extent, as may beſt ſort with your majeſty's bounty and goodneſs. And that not only felons and criminal offenders may take benefit thereof, but that your good ſubjects may receive eaſe thereby. And if it ſhall ſo ſtand with your good pleaſure, that it may extend to the relief of the old debts and duties to the crown before the firſt year of your majeſty's reign, to the diſcharge of alienations without licence, and miſuſing of liveries, and ouſtre le maine, before the firſt ſummons of this parliament and of concealed wardſhips, and not ſuing of liveries, and ouſtre le maines, before the twelfth year of your majeſty's reign: which gracious favour would much comfort your good ſubjects, and eaſe them from vexation, with little loſs or prejudice to your own profit.

"And we by our daily and devout prayers to the Almighty, the great King of Kings, ſhall contend for a bleſſing upon our endeavours; and for your majeſty's long and happy reign over us: and for your children's children after you, for many and many generations."

The king had taken great care, at the opening of the parliament, to mark out the bounds which the commons were not to exceed: above all things he intimated to them, that they ought not to give him advice without being aſked. They neglected this charge very much in their remonſtrance, and plainly ſhewed they did not believe it belonged to the king to determine how far the duty of the people's repreſentatives in parliament reached. The king's principles were ſo different from thoſe of the commons, that it is no wonder their inferences were directly contrary. The king did not expect the commons ſhould adviſe him, and the commons pretended it was their indiſpenſible duty to repreſent to him the dangers of the church or ſtate, with the propereſt remedies. The king reſted upon the prerogative royal; but the commons did not agree to the extent he gave this prerogative, by virtue whereof he pretended to hinder them from taking care of the church and ſtate when they were in danger, or their concerns neglected. It is very difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, to mark out the bounds of the royal prerogative, as well as of the privilege and duty of the nation's repreſentatives, in all caſes which may occur. So, without undertaking to decide this point, I ſhall only ſay, the commons diſtruſt made them take an extraordinary courſe, which doubtleſs they would not have followed, had they been to deal with a prince more eſteemed. On the other hand, it cannot be denied the king gave great occaſion of ſuſpicion and jealouſy, in affecting to eſtabliſh his prerogative upon general principles, which will never be received in England, without the proper reſtrictions to the nature of the Engliſh conſtitution.

But the attempt upon the royal prerogative was not the only thing that offended the king. The remonſtrance contained what could not but be very diſagreeable to him, ſince, in obſcure terms, he was taxed with neglecting the welfare of religion and the nation; with tolerating recuſants; with having no deſign to engage in a war for the recovery of the Palatinate, though he deſired money for that purpoſe; with granting licences prejudicial to the kingdom; and laſtly, having little or no concern for the intereſt of religion, in marrying the prince his ſon with a Spaniſh princeſs. The commons not daring to ſpeak their thoughts freely on this occaſion, were contented with giving intimations. The king perceived it, but forbore in his own vindication to enter into particulars, which would not have been for his advantage. It was much more agreeable to his intereſt and dignity to hinder ſo ungrateful a remonſtrance from being preſented to him. And that was the courſe he took. As ſoon as he heard the remonſtrance was ready, he ſent the following letter to the ſpeaker:

To our truſty and well-beloved ſir Thomas Richardſon, knight, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

"Mr. Speaker,

"We have heard by divers reports, to our great grief, that our diſtance from the houſes of parliament, cauſed by our indiſpoſition of health, hath emboldened ſome fiery and popular ſpirits of ſome of the houſe of commons, to argue and debate publicly of the matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high diſhonour, and breach of prerogative royal. Theſe are therefore to command you to make known, in our name, unto the houſe, that none therein ſhall preſume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our government, or deep matters of ſtate; and namely, not to deal with our deareſt ſon's match with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honour of that king, or any other our friends and confederates; and alſo not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary courts of juſtice. And whereas we hear they have ſent a meſſage to ſir Edward Sandys, to know the reaſons of his late reſtraint, you ſhall in our name reſolve them, that it was not for any miſdemeanour of his in parliament; but to put them out of doubt of any queſtion of that nature that may ariſe among them hereafter, you ſhall reſolve them in our name, that we think ourſelf very free and able to puniſh any man's miſdemeanours in parliament, as well during their ſitting as after: which we mean not to ſpare hereafter, upon any occaſion of any man's inſolent behaviour there that ſhall be miniſtred unto us; and if they have already touched any of theſe points, which we have forbidden, in any petition of theirs, which is to be ſent unto us, it is our pleaſure that you ſhall tell them, that except they reform it before it comes to our hands, we will not deign the hearing, nor anſwering of it."

"Dated at Newmarket, Dec. 3, 1621.

This letter being read and examined in the houſe, the commons did not think proper to keep ſilence, but to let the king ſee his threats ſhould not deter them from doing their duty, as they pretended. They drew therefore a petition, which was preſented to the king, with the foregoing remonſtrance. The petition ran thus:

"Moſt dread and gracious ſovereign,

"We your moſt humble and loyal ſubjects, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, aſſembled in the commons houſe of parliament, full of grief and unſpeakable ſorrow, through the true ſenſe of your majeſty's diſpleaſure expreſſed by your letter lately ſent to our ſpeaker, and by him related and read unto us: yet comforted again with the aſſurance of your grace and goodneſs, and of the ſincerity of our own intentions and proceedings, whereon with confidence we can rely, in all humbleneſs beſeech your moſt excellent majeſty, that the loyalty and dutifulneſs of as faithful and loving ſubjects as ever ſerved or lived under a gracious ſovereign, may not undeſervedly ſuffer by the miſinformation of partial and uncertain reports, which are ever unfaithful intelligencers: but that your majeſty would in the clearneſs of your own judgment, firſt vouchſafe to underſtand from ourſelves, and not from others, what our humble declaration and petition (reſolved upon by the univerſal voice of the houſe, and propoſed with your gracious favour to be preſented unto your ſacred majeſty) doth contain. Upon what occaſion we entered into conſideration of thoſe things which are therein contained, with what dutiful reſpect to your majeſty, and your ſervice, we did conſider thereof, and what was our true intention thereby. And that when your majeſty ſhall thereby truly diſcern our dutiful affections, you will, in your royal judgment, free us from thoſe heavy charges, wherewith ſome of our members are burthened, and wherein the whole houſe is involved.

"And we humbly beſeech your majeſty, that you would not hereafter give credit to private reports, againſt all or any of the members of our houſe, whom the whole have not cenſured, until your majeſty have been truly informed thereof from ourſelves: and that in the mean time, and ever, we may ſtand upright in your majeſty's good grace and opinion, than which no worldly conſideration is or can be dearer unto us.

"When your majeſty had reaſſembled us in parliament by your royal commandment, ſooner than we expected, and did vouchſafe, by the mouths of three honourable lords, to impart unto us the weighty occaſions moving your majeſty thereunto, and from them we did underſtand theſe particulars:

"That notwithſtanding your princely and pious endeavours to procure peace, the time is now come, that Janus's temple muſt be opened.

"That the voice of Bellona muſt be heard, and not the voice of a turtle.

"That there was no hope of peace, nor any truce to be obtained, no not for a few days.

"That your majeſty muſt either abandon your own children, or engage yourſelf in a war, wherein conſideration is to be had, what foot, what horſe, what money will be ſufficient.

"That

"That the Lower Palatinate was ſeized upon by the army of the king of Spain as executor of the ban there in quality of the duke of Burgundy, as the Upper Palatinate was by the duke of Bavaria.

"That the king of Spain, at his own charge, had now at leaſt five armies on foot.

"That the princes of the union were diſbanded, but the catholic league remained firm, whereby thoſe princes ſo diſſevered, were in danger, one by one, to be ruined.

"That the eſtate of thoſe of the religion in foreign parts was miſerable; and that out of theſe conſiderations we were called to a war, and forthwith to adviſe for a ſupply of keeping the forces in the Palatinate from diſbanding, and to foreſee the means for raiſing and maintaining the body of an army for the war againſt the ſpring. We therefore, out of our zeal to your majeſty and your poſterity, with more alacrity and celerity than ever was precedented in parliament, did addreſs ourſelves to the ſervice commended unto us. And although we cannot conceive that the honour and ſafety of your majeſty and your poſterity, the patrimony of your children invaded and poſſeſſed by their enemies, the welfare of religion and ſtate of your kingdoms, are matters at any time unfit for the deepeſt conſideration in time of parliament; and although before this time we were in ſome of theſe points ſilent, and yet being now invited thereunto, and led on by ſo juſt an occaſion, we thought it our duties to provide for the preſent ſupply thereof, and not only to turn our eyes on a war abroad, but to take care for the ſecuring of our peace at home, which the dangerous increaſe and inſolency of popiſh recuſants, apparently, viſibly, and ſenſibly did lead us unto. The conſideration whereof did neceſſarily draw us truly to repreſent unto your majeſty, what we conceive to be the cauſes, that we feared would be the effects, and what we hoped might be the remedies of theſe growing evils; among which, as incident and unavoidable, we fell upon ſome things which ſeem to touch upon the king of Spain, as they have relation to popiſh recuſants at home, to the wars by him maintained in the Palatinate againſt your majeſty's children, and to his ſeveral armies now on foot; yet, as we conceived, without touch of diſhonour to that king, or any other prince your majeſty's confederate.

"In the diſcourſe whereof, we did not aſſume to ourſelves any power to determine of any part thereof, nor intend to encroach or intrude upon the ſacred bounds of your royal authority, to whom, and to whom only, we acknowledge it doth belong to reſolve of peace and war, and of the marriage of the moſt noble prince your ſon; but as your moſt loyal and humble ſubjects and ſervants, repreſenting the whole commons of your kingdom (who have a large intereſt in the happy and proſperous eſtate of your majeſty, and your royal poſterity, and of the flouriſhing eſtate of our church and commonwealth), did reſolve, out of our cares and fears, truly and plainly to demonſtrate theſe things to your majeſty, which we were not aſſured could otherwiſe come ſo fully and clearly to your knowledge; and that being done, to lay the ſame down at your majeſty's feet, without expectation of any other anſwer of your majeſty, touching theſe higher points, than what at your good pleaſure, and in your own time, ſhould be held fit.

"This being the effect of what we had formerly reſolved upon, and theſe the occaſions and reaſons inducing the ſame, our humble ſuit to your majeſty and confidence is, that your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to receive, at the hands of theſe our meſſengers, our former humble declaration and petition, and vouchſafe to read, and favourably to interpret the ſame: and that ſo much thereof as containeth our humble petition concerning jeſuits, prieſts, and popiſh recuſants, the paſſage of bills, and granting your royal pardon, you will vouchſafe an anſwer unto us.

"And whereas your majeſty, by the general words of your letter, ſeemeth to reſtrain us from intermeddling with matters of government, or particulars which have their motion in the courts of juſtice, the generality of which words, in the largeneſs of the extent thereof (as we hope beyond your majeſty's intention) might involve thoſe things which are the proper ſubject of parliamentary occaſions and diſcourſe.

"And whereas your majeſty doth ſeem to abridge us of the antient liberty of parliament, for freedom of ſpeech, juriſdiction, and juſt cenſure of the houſe, and other proceedings there (wherein, we truſt in God, we ſhall never tranſgreſs the bounds of loyal and dutiful ſubjects), a liberty which we aſſure ourſelves ſo wiſe and ſo juſt a king will not infringe, the ſame being our antient and undoubted right and inheritance received from our anceſtors; without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly diſcern of things in queſtion before us, nor truly inform your majeſty; in which we have been confirmed by your majeſty's moſt gracious former ſpeeches and meſſages. We are therefore now again inforced in all humbleneſs to pray your majeſty to allow the ſame, and thereby to take away the doubts and ſcruples your majeſty's late letter to our ſpeaker hath wrought upon us.

"So ſhall we your loyal and loving ſubjects ever acknowledge your majeſty's juſtice, grace, and goodneſs, and be ready to perform that ſervice to your majeſty, which in the true affection of our hearts we profeſs, and pour out our daily and devout prayers to the Almighty for your majeſty's long life, happy and religious reign, and proſperous eſtate, and for your royal poſterity after you for ever."

This petition, with the remonſtrance annexed, was ſent to the king by twelve members, at the head of whom the houſe affected to ſet ſir Richard Weſton, a privy counſellor, a known papiſt, and thought to be the perſon that moſt incenſed the king againſt the commons. Then the houſe reſolved to proceed to no other affair, till they had an anſwer to their petition. The king received the twelve members very roughly. Some ſay, he called for twelve chairs for them, ſaying, 'Here are twelve kings come to me.' He received from them the laſt petition, but rejected the remonſtrance, with the copy of the petition already preſented to him againſt the recuſants. Some days after, he ſent the commons an anſwer in writing. As nothing can better diſcover that prince's deſigns and character than his ſpeeches, though generally very long, the reader perhaps will be glad to ſee the anſwer at length.

"We muſt here begin in the ſame faſhion that we would have done, if your firſt petition had come to our hands, before we had made a ſtay thereof; which is to repeat the firſt words of the late queen of famous memory, uſed by her, in an anſwer to an inſolent propoſition made by a Polonian embaſſador unto her; that is, 'Legatum expectabamus, heraldum accipimus.' For we had great reaſon to expect, that the firſt meſſage from your houſe ſhould have been a meſſage of thankſgiving for our continued gracious behaviour towards our people, ſince your laſt receſs, not only by our proclamation of grace, wherein were contained ſix or ſeven and thirty articles, all of ſeveral points of grace to the people, but alſo by the labour we took for the ſatisfaction of both houſes, in thoſe three articles recommended unto us in both their names, by the right reverend father in God the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and likewiſe for the good government of Ireland, we are now in hand with at your requeſt: but not only have we heard no news of all this, but contrary, great complaints of the danger of religion within the kingdom, tacitly implying our ill-government in this point. And we leave you to judge, whether it be your duties, that are the repreſentative body of the people, ſo to diſtaſte them with our government; whereas by the contrary it is your duty, with all your endeavours, to kindle more and more a dutiful and thankful love in the peoples hearts towards us, for our juſt and gracious government.

"Now whereas, in the very beginning of this your apology, you tax us in fair terms of truſting uncertain reports and partial informations concerning your proceedings, we wiſh you to remember, that we are an old and experienced king, needing no ſuch leſſons, being in our conſcience freeſt of any king alive from hearing or truſting idle reports, which ſo many of your houſe as are neareſt us can bear witneſs unto you, if you would give as good ear to them, as you do to ſome tribunitial orators among you: and for proof in this particular, we have made your own meſſengers confer your other petitions ſent by you, with the copy thereof, which was ſent us before; between which there is no difference at all; but that ſince our receiving the firſt copy, you added a concluſion unto it, which could not come to our hands till it was done by you, and your meſſenger ſent, which was all at one time. And if we had no copy of it beforehand, we muſt have received your firſt petition, to our great diſhonour, before we had known what it contained, which would have enforced us to return you a far worſe anſwer than now we do; for then your meſſengers had returned with nothing, but that we have judged your petition unlawful and unworthy of an anſwer: for as to your concluſion thereof, it is nothing but Proteſtatio contraria facto; for in the body of your petition, you uſurp upon our prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach; and then in the concluſion you proteſt the contrary; as if a robber would take a man's purſe, and then proteſt he meant not to rob him. For firſt, you preſume to give us your advice concerning the match of our deareſt ſon with ſome proteſtant (we cannot ſay princeſs, for we know none of theſe fit for him), and diſſuade us from his match with Spain: urging us to preſent war with that king: and yet in the concluſion, forſooth, ye proteſt ye intend not to preſs upon our moſt undoubted and regal prerogative; as if the petitioning of us in matters that yourſelves confeſs ye ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling with them.

" And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited to this courſe by the ſpeeches of three honourable lords; yet by ſo much as yourſelves repeat of the ſpeeches, nothing can be concluded, but that we were reſolved by war to regain the Palatinate, if otherwiſe we could not attain it. And you are invited to adviſe forthwith upon a ſupply, for keeping the forces in the Palatinate from diſbanding, and to foreſee the means for the raiſing and maintenance of the body of an army for that war againſt the ſpring. Now, what inference can be made upon this, that therefore we muſt preſently denounce war againſt the king of Spain, break our deareſt ſon's match, and match him to one of our religion, let the world judge. The difference is no greater, than if we would tell a merchant, that we had great need to borrow money from him for raiſing an army; that thereupon it would follow, that we were bound to follow his advice in the direction of the war, and all things depending thereupon: but yet not contenting yourſelves with this excuſe of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, ye come after to a direct contradiction to the concluſion of your former petition, ſaying, that the honour and ſafety of us and our poſterity, and the patrimony of our children, invaded and poſſeſſed by their enemies, the welfare of religion, and ſtate of our kingdome, are matters at any time not unfit for your deepeſt conſiderations in parliament. To this generality, we anſwere with the logicians, that where all things are contained, nothing is omitted. So as this plenipotencie of yours, inveſts you in all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the pope's to have the keys alſo both of heaven and purgatory: and to this vaſte generality of yours, we can give no other anſwer; for it will trouble all the beſt lawyers in the houſe to make a good commentary upon it: for ſo did the puritan miniſters in Scotland bring all kinde of cauſes within the compaſſe of their juriſdiction, ſaying, that it was the church's office to judge of ſlander, and there could no kinde of crime or fault be committed, but there was a ſlander in it, either againſt God, the king, or their neighbour; and by this means they hooked in to themſelves the cognizance of all cauſes: or like Bellarmine's diſtinction of the pope's power over all kings, in ordine ad ſpiritualia, whereby he gives them all temporal juriſdiction over them.

" But to give you a direct anſwere to the matter of war for which you are ſo earneſt. We confeſs, we rather expect you ſhould have given us great and heartie thanks, for the long maintaining a ſettled peace in all our dominions, when all our neighbours about are in a miſerable combuſtion of war; but, 'Dulce bellum inexpertis.' And we indeed find by experience, that a number of our ſubjects are ſo pampered with peace, as they are deſirous of change, though they know not what.

" It is true, that we have ever profeſſed, and in that minde with God's grace we will live and die, that we will labour by all means poſſible, either by treaty or by force, to reſtore our children to their antient dignity and inheritance: and whatſoever chriſtian princes or potentates will ſet themſelves againſt it, we will not ſpare any lawful means to bring our ſo juſt and honourable purpoſe to a good end; neither ſhall the match of our ſon, or any other worldly reſpect, be preferred to this our reſolution. For by our credit and intervention with the king of Spain, and the archduchеſs and her huſband, now with God, we preſerved the Lower Palatinate one whole year from any further conquering in it, which in eight days ſpace, in that time might have eaſily been ſwallowed up by Spinola's army without any reſiſtance. And in no better caſe was it now at our embaſſador the lord Digby's coming through Heidelburgh, if he had not extraordinarily ſuccoured it.

" But becauſe we conceive that ye couple this war of the Palatinate with the cauſe of religion, we muſt a little unfold your eyes herein.

" The beginning of this miſerable war, which hath ſet all Chriſtendom on fire, was not for religion, but only cauſed by our ſon-in-law his haſty and harſh reſolution, following evil counſel, to take to himſelf the crown of Bohemia.

" And that this is true, himſelf wrote letters unto us at that time, deſiring to give aſſurance both to the French king, and ſtate of Venice, that his accepting of the crown of Bohemia, had no reference to the cauſe of religion, but only by reaſon of his right of election (as he called it). And we would be ſorry that that aſperſion ſhould come upon our religion, as to make it a good pretext for dethroning of kings, and uſurping their crowns; and we would be loth that our people here ſhould be taught that ſtrange doctrine: no, let us not ſo far wrong the jeſuits, as to rob them of their ſweet poſitions and practice in that very point.

" And upon the other part, we aſſure ourſelf ſo far of your charitable thoughts of us, that we would never have conſtantly denied our ſon-in-law both the title and aſſiſtance in that point, if we had been well perſwaded of the juſtice of his quarrel. But to conclude; this unjuſt uſurpation of the crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria from the emperor, hath given the pope and all that party too fair a ground, and opened them too wide a gate for curbing and oppreſſing of many thouſands of our religion, in divers parts of Chriſtendom.

" And whereas you excuſe your touching upon the king of Spain, upon occaſion of the incidents by you repeated in that place, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his honour; we cannot wonder enough that you are ſo forgetful both of your words and writs, for in your former petition ye plainly affirm, that he affects the temporal monarchy of the whole earth; than which there can be no more malice uttered againſt any great king, to make all other princes and potentates both envy and hate him; but if ye liſt it may eaſily be tried, whether that ſpeech touched him in honour or not, if ye ſhall aſk him the queſtion, whether he means to aſſume to himſelf that title or no, for every king can beſt judge of his own honour. We omit the particular ejaculations of ſome foul-mouthed orators in your houſe, againſt the honour of that king's crown and ſtate.

" And touching your excuſe of not determining any thing concerning the match of our deareſt ſon, but only to tell your opinion, and lay it down at our feet. Firſt, we deſire to know, how you could have preſumed to determine in that point, without committing of high treaſon. And next, you cannot deny but your talking of his match after that manner, was a direct breach of our commandment, and declaration out of her own mouth, at the firſt ſetting down of this parliament, where we plainly profeſſed that we were in treaty of this match with Spain; and wiſhed you to have that confidence in our religion and wiſdom, that we ſhould ſo manage it, as our religion ſhould receive no prejudice by it: And the ſame we now repeat unto you, profeſſing that we are ſo far engaged in that match, as we cannot in honour go back, except the king of Spain perform not ſuch things as we expect at his hands. And therefore we are ſorry, that you ſhould ſhew to have ſo great diſtruſt in us, as to conceive that we ſhould be cold in our religion, otherwiſe we cannot imagine how our former public declaration ſhould not have ſtopped your mouths in this point.

" And as to your requeſt, that we would now receive your former petition; we wonder what could make you preſume that we would receive it, whereas in our former letter we plainly declared the contrary unto you.

" And therefore we have juſtly rejected that ſuit of yours: For what have you left unattempted in the higheſt points of ſovereignty, in that petition of yours, except the ſtriking of coin? For it contains the violation of leagues, the particular way how to govern a war, and the marriage of our deareſt ſon, both negative with Spain, nay, with any other popiſh princeſs; and alſo affirmatively, as to the matching with one of our religion; which we confeſs is a ſtrain beyond any providence or wiſdom God hath given us, as things now ſtand.

" Theſe are unfit things to be handled in parliament, except your king ſhall require it of you: For who can have wiſdom to judge of things of that nature, but ſuch as are daily acquainted with the particulars of treaties, and of the variable and fixed connexion of affairs of ſtate, together with the knowledge of the ſecret ways, ends, and intentions of princes in their ſeveral negotiations? Otherwiſe, a ſmall miſtaking of matters of this nature may produce more effects than can be imagined; and therefore, 'Ne ſutor ultra crepidam.' And beſides, the intermeddling in parliament with matters of peace or war, and marriage of our deareſt ſon, would be ſuch a diminution to us, to our crown in foreign countries, as would make any prince neglect to treat with us, either in matters of peace or marriage, excepting they might be aſſured by the aſſent of the parliament. And ſo it proved long ago with the king of France [a], who upon a trick procuring his ſtate to diſſent from ſome treaty which before he had made, was after refuſed treating with any other princes, to his great reproach, unleſs he would firſt procure the aſſent of his eſtates to their propoſition. And will you caſt your eyes upon the late times, you ſhall find that the late queen, of famous memory, was humbly petitioned by a parliament to be pleaſed to marry: But her anſwer was, That ſhe liked their petition well, becauſe it was ſimple, not limiting her to place or perſon, as not befitting her liking to their fancies; and if they had done otherwiſe, ſhe would have thought it a high preſumption in them. Judge then what we may do in ſuch a caſe, having made our public declaration already (as we ſaid before) directly contrary to that which you have now petitioned.

"Now to the points in your petition, whereof you deſire an anſwer, as properly belonging to the parliament: The firſt and greateſt point is that of religion; concerning which, at this time, we can give you no other anſwer than in general; which is, that you may reſt ſecure, that we will never be weary to do all we can for the propagation of our religion, and repreſſing of popery: But the manner and form you muſt remit to our care and providence, who can beſt conſider of times and ſeaſons, not by undertaking a public war of religion through all the world at once (which how hard and dangerous to taſk it may prove, you may judge). But this puts us in mind, how all the world complained the laſt year of plenty of corn; and God ſent us a cooling card this year for that heat: And ſo we pray God, that this deſire among you of kindling wars (ſhewing your wearineſs of peace and plenty) may not make God permit us to fall into the miſeries of both. But as we already ſaid, our care of religion muſt be ſuch as on the one part we muſt not, by the hot perſecution of our recuſants at home, irritate foreign princes of contrary religion, and teach them the way to plague the proteſtants in their dominions, with whom we daily intercede, and at this time principally, for eaſe to them of our profeſſion that live under them; yet upon the other part, we never mean to ſpare from due and ſevere puniſhment any papiſt that will grow inſolent for living under our ſo mild government. And you may alſo be aſſured, we will leave no care untaken, as well for the education of the youth at home, eſpecially the children of papiſts, as alſo for preſerving at all times hereafter the youth that are or ſhall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous places, and ſo poiſoned in popiſh ſeminaries. And as in this point, namely, the good education of popiſh youth at home, we have already given ſome good proofs, both in this kingdom and in Ireland, ſo will we be well pleaſed to paſs any good laws that ſhall be made, either now, or at any time hereafter to this purpoſe.

"And as to your requeſt of making this a ſeſſion, and granting a general pardon; it ſhall be in your defaults, if we make not this a ſeſſion before Chriſtmas.

"But for the pardon, ye crave ſuch particulars in it, as we muſt be well adviſed upon, leſt otherwiſe we give you back the double or treble of what we are to receive by your entire ſubſidy without fifteenths. But the ordinary courſe we hold fitteſt to be uſed ſtill in this caſe, is, That we ſhould of our free grace ſend you down a pardon from the higher houſe, containing ſuch points as we ſhall think fitteſt, wherein, we hope, ye ſhall receive good ſatisfaction.

"But we cannot omit to ſhew you, how ſtrange we think it, that you ſhould make ſo bad and unjuſt a commentary upon ſome words of our former letter, as if we meant to reſtrain you thereby of your antient privileges and liberties in parliament. Truly, a ſcholar would be aſhamed ſo to miſplace and misjudge any ſentences in another man's book. For, whereas in the end of our former letters, we diſcharge you to meddle with matters of government, and myſteries of ſtate, namely, matters of war or peace, of our deareſt ſon's match with Spain; by which particular denominations we interpret and reſtrain our former words: And then, after we forbid you to meddle with ſuch things as have their ordinary courſe in courts of juſtice; ye couple together theſe two diſtinct ſentences, and plainly leave out theſe words, 'Of myſteries of ſtate;' ſo as ye err, 'à bene diviſis ad male conjuncta:' For of the former part concerning myſteries of ſtate, we plainly reſtrain our meaning to the particulars that were after mentioned; and in the latter, we confeſs we meant it by ſir Edward Coke's fooliſh buſineſs [b]. And therefore it had well become him, eſpecially being our ſervant, and one of our council, to have complained unto us, which he never did, though he was ordinarily at court ſince, and never had acceſs refuſed unto him.

"And although we cannot allow of the ſtile, calling it 'your antient and undoubted right and inheritance;' but could rather have wiſhed, that ye had ſaid, 'That your privileges were derived from the grace and permiſſion of our anceſtors and us' (for moſt of them grow from precedents, which rather ſhew a toleration than inheritance): yet we are pleaſed to give you our royal aſſurance, that as long as you contain yourſelves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preſerve your lawful liberties and privileges, as ever any of our predeceſſors were; nay, as to preſerve our own royal prerogative, ſo as your houſe ſhall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown; which would enforce us, or any juſt king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative, and flowers of the crown: But of this, we hope, there ſhall never be cauſe given."

"Dated at Newmarket the 11th day of December, 1621 [c]."

The laſt part of the king's anſwer was ſo clear, as to want no explanation. He had contented himſelf hitherto with inſinuating certain principles, the conſequences whereof he had carefully concealed, and thereby ſeemed to reſerve to himſelf the power either of admitting theſe conſequences, in their utmoſt extent, or with reſtrictions, or of denying them, according as occaſion ſhall require. But now, whether he gave way to his paſſion, or was glad at laſt to ſpeak his thoughts clearly, not to be conſtrained any longer to uſe doubtful expreſſions, which very often were pretended not to be underſtood, he put the commons under a neceſſity either of granting his pretenſions, or oppoſing them openly. But if I may venture to ſay it, he committed an inexcuſable error, in not diſſolving the parliament, before the commons had time to debate upon his anſwer. He would thereby have eſtabliſhed his pretenſions without incurring the vexation of an open and public oppoſition, which he muſt have expected, unleſs he was wilfully blind. The commons having read the anſwer, the conſequences whereof they plainly perceived, and knowing the parliament was going to be diſſolved or prorogued, drew up the following proteſtation:

"The commons now aſſembled in parliament, being juſtly occaſioned thereunto concerning ſundry liberties, franchiſes, and privileges of parliament, amongſt others here mentioned, do make this proteſtation following; that the liberties, franchiſes, privileges, add juriſdiction of parliament, are the antient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the ſubjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, ſtate, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England, and the maintenance and making of laws, and redreſs of miſchiefs and grievances which daily happen within this realm, are proper ſubjects and matter of counſel and debate in parliament; and that in the handling and proceeding of thoſe buſineſſes, every member of the houſe of parliament hath, and, of right, ought to have, freedom of ſpeech, to propound, treat, reaſon, and bring to concluſion the ſame; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of theſe matters in ſuch order, as in their judgments ſhall ſeem fitteſt; and that every member of the ſaid houſe hath like freedom from all impeachment, impriſonment, and moleſtation (other than by cenſure of the houſe itſelf), for, or concerning, any ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliament-buſineſs: And that if any of the ſaid members be complained of, and queſtioned for any thing done or ſaid in parliament, the ſame is to be ſhewed to the king by the advice and aſſent of all the commons aſſembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information."

The king being informed of the proteſtation, called a council, and came in perſon, to cauſe what is contained in the following memorial, to be ordered.

Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1621.

"His moſt excellent majeſty coming this day to the council, the prince his highneſs, and all the lords, and others of his majeſty's privy council ſitting about him, and all the judges then in London, which were ſix in number, there attending upon his majeſty; the clerk of the commons houſe of parliament was called for, and commanded to produce his journal-book, wherein was noted, and entries made of moſt paſſages that were in the commons houſe of parliament; and amongſt other things, there was written down, the form of a proteſtation, concerning ſundry liberties, privileges, and franchiſes of parliament; with which form of proteſtation his majeſty was juſtly offended. Nevertheleſs, his majeſty, in a moſt gracious manner, there expreſſed,

[b] This fooliſh buſineſs was a deſign formed by chancellor Bacon, one Lepton, and Goldſmith, againſt ſir Edward Coke, after he was diſcharged from being chief juſtice, namely, to exhibit an information againſt him in the ſtar-chamber, or ſend him into Ireland. This buſineſs was debated in the houſe of commons. Coke, p. 118.

[c] The lord keeper Williams adviſed, that the harſhneſs of this anſwer might be mitigated and ſoftened, for he could never bear that there ſhould be a miſunderſtanding between the king and his people, if it were poſſible to prevent it. Philips, p. 98.

Formerly,

that he never meant to deny that houſe of commons any lawful privileges that ever they had enjoyed, but whatſoever privileges or liberties they had by any law or ſtatute, the ſame ſhould be inviolably preſerved unto them; and whatſoever privileges they enjoyed by cuſtom, or uncontrolled and lawful precedent, his majeſty would be careful to preſerve. But this proteſtation of the commons houſe, ſo contrived and carried as it was, his majeſty thought fit to be razed out of all memorials, and utterly to be annihilated, both in reſpect of the manner by which it was gained, and the matter therein contained. For the manner of getting of it, firſt in reſpect of the time: for after ſuch time as his majeſty, out of his princely grace, and to take away all miſtakings, had directed his letter to ſecretary Calvert, dated at Royſton, 16 Decembris, and therein had ſo explained himſelf in the point of maintaining the privileges of the houſe of commons, as that moſt of the ſaid houſe reſted fully ſatisfied, and freed from any ſcruple of having their liberties impeached; and after that, by his majeſty's letters, directed to the ſpeaker, dated 18th December, being Tueſday, his majeſty, at the humble ſuit of the houſe of commons, condeſcended to make this meeting a ſeſſion before Chriſtmas, and for that purpoſe had aſſigned Saturday following. Now upon this very Tueſday, and while the meſſengers from the houſe of commons were with his majeſty at Theobalds, to return thanks unto his majeſty, and therewith an excuſe from them not to make it a ſeſſion, in reſpect of the ſtrait of time whereunto they were driven; which deferment his majeſty admitted of at their deſires, and thereupon gave orders for the adjournment of the parliament until the 8th of February next, which was the firſt day formerly appointed by his majeſty for the meeting together of the parliament; and whilſt their meſſengers were with his majeſty, and had received a gracious anſwer to return unto their houſes; even that afternoon, a committee was procured to be made for taking their liberties into conſideration; and this afternoon a proteſtation was made (to whom appears not) concerning their liberties; and at ſix a clock at night, by candle-light the ſame proteſtation was brought into the houſe by the committee, and at that time of night it was called upon to be put to the queſtion, there not being the third part of the houſe then preſent; whereas in all matters of weight, their uſual cuſtom is, to put nothing of importance to the queſtion, till the houſe be full; and at this time many of them that were preſent, expected the queſtion would have been deferred to another day, and a fuller houſe; and ſome then preſent ſtood up to have ſpoken to it, but could not be ſeen or heard in that darkneſs and confuſion. Now for the matter of the proteſtation, it is penned in ſuch ambiguous and general words, as may ſerve for future times to invade moſt of the rights and prerogatives annexed to the imperial crown; the claim of ſome privileges being grounded upon the words of the writ for aſſembling the parliament, wherein ſome words, viz. 'Arduis Regni,' are cunningly mentioned; but the word 'quibuſdam,' which reſtraineth the generality to ſuch particular caſes as his majeſty pleaſeth to conſult with them upon, is purpoſely omitted [d].

"Theſe things conſidered, his majeſty did, this preſent day, in full aſſembly of his council, and in the preſence of the judges, declare the ſaid proteſtation to be invalid, annulled, void, and of no effect; and did farther, 'manu ſuâ propria,' take the ſaid proteſtation out of the journal-book of the clerk of the commons houſe of parliament, and commanded an act of council to be made thereupon, and this act to be entered in the regiſter of council cauſes."

Six days after, the king diſſolved the parliament by proclamation, declaring, he was not obliged to give an account thereof to any, ſince the diſſolving of the parliament, when he pleaſed, was confeſſedly in his power [e]. That however, he was willing to inform the public, it was becauſe the commons took the liberty not only to treat of his high prerogatives, which belonged not to them, but alſo to ſpeak diſreſpectfully of foreign princes; that they ſpent the time in diſputing about their privileges, without regarding the public wants; that ſome ill-tempered ſpirits ſowed tares among the corn, and by their cunning devices, had impoſed upon him a neceſſity of diſcontinuing the preſent parliament, without putting it to the name or period of a ſeſſion. Then he declared, that though the parliament was broken off, he intended to govern well, and ſhould gladly embrace the firſt occaſion to call another at a proper ſeaſon.

This proclamation was followed by another, forbidding under ſevere penalties, to talk of ſtate affairs, and charging the judges in their circuits, to put the laws in force againſt licentious tongues.

But the king's reſentment did not end here. Some of the commons, who had appeared moſt zealous to maintain the privileges of the houſe, as ſir Edward Coke [f], ſir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, were committed to priſon. Likewiſe ſir Dudley Diggs, ſir Thomas Crew, ſir Nathaniel Rich, and ſir James Perrot, were ordered into Ireland, to execute a certain commiſſion, the king intending thereby to remove them from their homes, and puniſh them with a ſort of baniſhment. On the other hand, the earls of Oxford and Southampton were ſent to the Tower on ſome ſtudied pretence [g]; but it was eaſy to ſee, it was for ſpeaking too freely in the houſe of peers of the king's conduct.

Till the laſt parliament, the king and the commons had only mutually tried each other, the one to enlarge his prerogative, the other to preſerve privileges, which they looked upon as inconteſtable. But on the preſent occaſion, there was a neceſſity of declaring and acting openly. The king pretended, as appears by his anſwer to the petition of the commons, that their privileges having no other foundation than the conceſſion of the kings his predeceſſors, it was in his power to revoke them if they gave juſt occaſion. The commons, on their ſide, pretended, they enjoyed theſe privileges by antient and undoubted right, had received them by inheritance from their anceſtors, and the king had no power to take them away. I paſs over in ſilence the conſequences which may be drawn from both theſe principles, if carried as far as the general terms will allow; they are obvious to the meaneſt capacity. I beg leave not to determine ſo difficult a point, but only to make ſome remarks, which I hope will be of uſe for the ſequel of the hiſtory.

Firſt, It is very difficult, in my opinion, and perhaps impoſſible to eſtabliſh upon fixed principles, as well the royal prerogatives of the kings of England, as the privileges of the parliament and the houſe of commons in particular. We muſt except ſuch as are allowed on both ſides, ſince this mutual conſent is of no leſs force than a law. Cuſtom therefore and precedent are the only foundation on which to eſtabliſh their reſpective rights.

The Anglo-Saxons, who conquered Britain, had no kings in thoſe parts of Germany where they inhabited before their coming into England: their government was ariſtocratical. Seven of their chiefs, by whom Britain was conquered, aſſumed the title of Kings, which was never before in uſe among them.

It muſt be obſerved, as a very neceſſary point, that the dominion of theſe new kings did not properly extend over the conquered people, namely, the Britons, who were almoſt all driven into Wales and Cornwal, but over the conquerors themſelves, among whom the ſubdued country was divided. Hence it is evident that the right of conqueſt, which might be alleged in favour of theſe firſt kings and their ſucceſſors, is wholly excluded.

It is very likely, not to ſay certain, that the parliament of England is as antient as the monarchy, though ſome diſpute it, but in my opinion without any foundation [h]. At leaſt, the time cannot be aſcertained when the parliament firſt began. But it is very difficult to prove the commons were ſummoned to parliament and voted there.

On the other hand, it cannot be doubted theſe firſt kings had great prerogatives, which were much increaſed by their ſucceſſors. But I believe it may be taken for granted, that in general, neither the king's prerogatives, nor the peoples privileges, owe their original to the laws; conſequently, they can neither be limited nor enlarged, but as warranted by examples and precedents. Now theſe precedents are ſo contrary one to another, that there is no forming any fixed and cer-

[d] Formerly, parliaments ſat but a few days, and took into conſideration ſuch affairs only as the king had before ſet forth in the writs of ſummons. But this method being altered, parliaments were called without the occaſion of their meeting being known, and were not limited to the affairs mentioned by the kings in their firſt ſpeeches; and this made their ſeſſions hold ſo long. Rapin. See Elſyng's Manner of Holding Parliaments, p. 7, &c.

[e] His proclamation began with theſe words, "Albeit the aſſembling, continuing, and diſſolving of parliaments, be a prerogative ſo peculiarly belonging to our imperial crowne, and the times and ſeaſons thereof ſo abſolutelie in our own power, that wee neede not give an account thereof unto any; yet, &c."

[f] Orders were given for ſealing up the locks and doors of ſir Edward's chambers in London, and in the Temple, for the ſeizing of his papers; and it was debated in council how he might be excluded from the benefit of the general pardon that ſhould have paſſed this laſt parliament. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 55. Annals, p. 66. Sir Edward it ſeems had called the king's prerogative an over-grown monſter. Wilſon, p. 749.

[g] The earl of Oxford was accuſed by one White a papiſt, of having ſpoken ſome words to the diſhonour of the king, and diſparagement of his government, for which he was ſent to the Tower; but the earl of Southampton was committed to the cuſtody of the dean of Weſtminſter, for his freedom of ſpeech, and for rebuking Buckingham in the houſe of lords. tain rules; and what cauſes moſt difficulty in the matter, is the ambiguity of the terms: and firſt, in the word Parliament.

If the parliament is conſidered as compoſed of the king and the two houſes, an unlimited power, with reſpect to the affairs of the kingdom, may without fear be aſcribed to it. But if the parliament is ſuppoſed to conſiſt only of the two houſes without the king, it cannot be denied that its rights are limited. The two houſes are properly the whole nation, excluſive of the king. They have their privileges; but it belongs not to them to extend them as they pleaſe: the king's conſent is neceſſary to that end. This is ſtill more true, when one of the houſes acts alone, without the concurrence of the other: for then it repreſents but part of the nation, who cannot lawfully claim any other rights than thoſe which are granted either by ſome law, or by the tacit conſent of the king and the other houſe. It is very certain, that to each of the two houſes belong ſeparate rights and privileges; and that the two houſes together, though parted from the king, have alſo their privileges: but the queſtion is, to know how far they reach, and whether the king alone ought to be judge.

The term Prerogative-royal is liable to no leſs ambiguity than the word Parliament. It is a looſe and general term, which gives only a very confuſed idea of the thing ſignified. If it is a right common to all that bear the title of King, the prerogative-royal muſt be the ſame every where, and the kings of England and Poland will be as abſolute as the king of Perſia. If it has bounds, by whom were they ſet? Or, what are the bounds which it cannot exceed? I believe it is no leſs difficult to reſolve theſe queſtions, than thoſe concerning the privileges of the parliament. But as the prerogative-royal includes many particular rights, let us examine, for inſtance, the power challenged by James, of revoking the privileges of the houſe of commons. From whence had he this particular prerogative? Was it a right common to all kings? But there are in the world kingdoms without parliaments or a houſe of commons. Was this prerogative as antient as the Engliſh monarchy? But he himſelf would not grant the houſe of commons to be ſo antient. Was it from ſome law? But he produced none. Was it by a tacit conſent, or by uſurpation? But the thing had never happened before. Was it, in fine, upon this general maxim, that whatſoever is granted by one king, may be revoked by another? But, beſides that this no undeniable principle, eſpecially after an uninterrupted poſſeſſion of many ages, the king would have been very much puzzled to name the kings who had granted the commons their privileges. Thus king James ſuppoſed, that the prerogative was a thing fixed, inconteſtible, known to all the world, though nothing was more indeterminate, or of leſs known extent and limits.

Let us conſider now what were thoſe rights, liberties, privileges, claimed by the commons as their antient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance. Theſe are all uncertain and general terms, of which we cannot have a clear and diſtinct idea, without applying them to particular caſes. But what was ſaid concerning the royal prerogative, may be applied here. How came the commons by theſe rights? How far did they reach? Where were their bounds? This would be very difficult to fix. James perhaps went too far, when he would have entirely deprived the commons of the right of repreſenting to him the nation's grievances, and of the liberty to debate, reaſon, and ſpeak in the houſe what was thought proper. But if, under colour of theſe rights, the commons would take upon them to adviſe the king upon all occaſions, and ſpeak injuriouſly of his majeſty in their houſe, upon what would they ground ſuch privileges?

Since therefore it is ſo difficult to decide the queſtions concerning the prerogative-royal, and the privileges of both houſes, or of each in particular, prudence and good policy require that kings and parliaments avoid as a rock the engaging in ſuch diſputes. Accordingly, we may have obſerved in the perſual of this hiſtory, that the wiſeſt, the moſt illuſtrious kings, thoſe whoſe merit is moſt univerſally acknowledged, as Edward I. Edward III. Henry V. Edward IV. Henry VIII. Elizabeth, never had any conteſts of this nature with their parliaments. On the contrary, thoſe that were leaſt eminent for their prudence and capacity, ſuch as Henry III. Edward II. Richard II. were ruined for raiſing ſuch ſorts of diſputes. James is the firſt who in thoſe latter days engaged in this quarrel. He was followed by his ſon and grandſons, and theſe princes, inſtead of ſucceeding in their projects, only rendered themſelves moſt unhappy. A wiſe and prudent king of England, who knows his own intereſt, will never quarrel with his parliament; and a parliament, whoſe ſole view is the kingdom's welfare, will take care never to queſtion the king's juſt prerogative; nay, they will rather chuſe to ſee it ſtretched a little too far, than run the riſk of breaking a union which is the ſole foundation of the public happineſs. I hope I ſhall be forgiven this digreſſion, which to me ſeems of uſe to inform the reader, and help him to judge impartially of the difference, which aroſe in this, and produced ſo many calamities in the following reign.

[1622] The diſſolution of the parliament, and the little likelihood of the king's ever calling another, could not but be attended with ill conſequences. The king forfeited, by this proceeding, not only the love and eſteem of great part of his ſubjects, but alſo the regard of foreigners. When he was thus embroiled with his people, it was univerſally concluded he could be no longer either a friend to be relied on, or an enemy to be feared. On the other hand, the nation could not reflect without terror, that they were going to be expoſed to an arbitrary power, ſince there were to be no more parliaments to keep the prerogative-royal within due bounds. But the worſt effect produced by the rupture between the king and the parliament, was the diviſion among the ſubjects, who continually joined with the two oppoſite parties, which ſubſiſt to this day, with ſome difference, under the names of Tories and Whigs.

Theſe two parties, which began to be formed, were contented at firſt with mutual diſputes, in defence of the king's or the peoples rights, in reſpect of what had cauſed the diſſolution of the parliament. The royaliſts ſaid, the commons meant to make the Engliſh monarchy a republic: that in meddling with ſtate-affairs, and adviſing the king concerning the management of the kingdom and his own family, they ſhewed they aſpired to no leſs than governing the ſtate, ſince they would never want pretences to give the king counſel, which if he refuſed to comply with, he would, by that very thing, be deprived of the neceſſary aids for defence of the realm, and conſtrained to receive law from foreign princes: that England was originally a monarchy, and had ever continued upon the ſame foot; but the foundations were going to be undermined, by making the king ſubject to the parliament; that at firſt, remonſtrances were only made to the king, afterwards councils were added; but theſe councils would ſoon be converted into inſtructions, and the inſtructions into orders and commands; in a word, if the commons were ſuffered to proceed, the king would quickly become a mere doge; that the commons had the leſs right to pretend to the government of the ſtate, as the ſtate had ſubſiſted five hundred years without them, ſince it was about the end of Henry III.'s reign, and during the earl of Leiceſter's uſurpation, that the repreſentatives of the people were firſt admitted into the parliament. In ſhort, that it was a ſtrange thing, that under a monarchical government, the people, or their repreſentatives, ſhould tell the king how he was to govern his kingdom: that ſuppoſing the people had ſuch a right, it would be neceſſary to impart to them all the ſecrets of the ſtate, and conſult them about alliances and treaties, peace and war; but as this had never been practiſed, it followed of courſe that the ſuppoſition was falſe, and the people were called to parliament only to ſupply the king's wants, and to ſettle the taxes and impoſitions in a manner the leaſt burthenſome to the ſubjects: that indeed as to the laws concerning the internal government of the ſtate, it was thought proper to enact them with the conſent of the people who were to be ſubject to them, that they might be the better executed; but no conſequence could thence be drawn, either for foreign affairs, or for the execution of theſe laws, which was left to the king alone, or for the general government of the realm.

The favourers of the people ſaid in their turn, that the king was not ſatisfied with England's being a monarchy, but would make it an abſolute monarchy: that he affected to confound the ſeveral kinds of monarchies, whereof ſome were more, others leſs abſolute, in order to acknowledge but one ſort, to which he aſcribed an unlimited power: that the Engliſh monarchy was not of this kind, but began with the parliament, which being as antient as the royalty, formed, together with the ſovereign, the abſolute power, the king would aſſume to himſelf alone: that the parliament had their privileges, as the king had his, nor could be deprived of them, without deſtroying the nature and conſtitution of the Engliſh government: that the parliament repreſented the whole nation, who were as much or more concerned in the welfare of the ſtate than the king himſelf: that indeed the king had his undoubted prerogatives; but they were intended for the welfare and preſervation, and not for the ruin, of the ſtate: that whilſt he kept within theſe bounds, and acted only for the benefit of the kingdom, he anſwered the end and intent of his prerogatives; but it was deſtroying the conſtitution, to pretend that his prerogative-royal gave him power to ſubvert the laws, to make alliances repugnant to the good of the realm, to render the nation contemptible in the eyes of foreigners, to expoſe religion to the danger of being ruined, through an extreme careleſſneſs and condeſcenſion for its enemies: that in ſuch a caſe, as he ſwerved from the end and deſign of his prerogative, it was the peoples or their repreſentatives buſineſs to ſhew him the inconveniencies of his conduct, propound means to prevent them, and give him proper advice for their cure: that if this were not ſo, it would follow that the king would be abſolute and arbitrary, might ruin and deſtroy the kingdom at his pleaſure, trample upon the eſtabliſhed laws, oppreſs the ſubjects, take away their lives and fortunes, which was directly contrary to the conſtitution of England: that as to the reſt, it evidently appeared, the king was labouring to reduce the privileges of the parliament to little or nothing. Does the parliament repreſent to him the peoples grievances? It may, ſays he, from thence be inferred that the king governs ill, and this tends to alienate from him the love of his ſubjects. Is he deſired to put the laws againſt recuſants in execution? He anſwers, that affair muſt be left to his care, he knows what is proper to be done: he is an old experienced king, who has no need to be taught, and yet he is not ſeen to do the leaſt thing towards redreſſing the grievances complained of. Do the commons repreſent to him that the prince his ſon's marriage with the Spaniſh infanta may be of very ill conſequence to religion? He replies, they have no buſineſs to meddle with his family-concerns. Do they ſtrive to make him ſenſible that the proteſtant religion is in danger of being deſtroyed throughout Europe, for want of aſſiſtance, and that the king of Spain amuſes him with fair promiſes, whilſt he is over-running the Palatinate? He anſwers, theſe are matters of ſtate, too high for the peoples repreſentatives, who have neither wiſdom nor capacity enough to comprehend the myſteries of government: "Ne ſutor ultra crepidam." In a word, he reduces the privileges of the commons to adviſing the king when he ſhould do them the honour to aſk it, and to ſupplying him with money when he demands it on any pretence, though the pretence be evidently falſe, ſince he will not ſuffer his reaſons to be examined. But this is not all: he plainly tells the commons, their privileges are only conceſſions of himſelf and predeceſſors, and intimates that they ſhall keep them no longer than their ſubmiſſion makes them worthy of them. Is it poſſible, ſay they, to give plainer marks of a ſettled deſign to uſurp an arbitrary power? Suppoſing the commons were not called to parliament till the reign of Henry III. which however cannot be proved, have they not been ever ſince an eſſential part of parliament, and conſequently have they not an udoubted right to all parliamentary privileges?

This is part of what was then ſaid on both ſides, and is what ſerved to cheriſh diviſion between the two parties, who have not ceaſed ever ſince to revile one another. It is eaſy to gueſs which of the two parties the puritans joined with: they loved not the king, who, on his part, diſcovered on all occaſions that he was their mortal enemy. But, as I ſaid, there were two ſorts of puritans, ſtate-puritans and church-puritans. Before the king declared himſelf ſo openly with reſpect to his prerogative-royal, the ſtate-puritans were few, becauſe the king having gone no great lengths, his intention was yet only ſuſpected: but after the diſſolution of the third parliament, their number greatly increaſed; and the king, through a policy very deſtructive of his intereſts, always affected to confound theſe two ſorts of puritans: he thereby forced them to make but one party, though they were united only in a ſingle point, namely, in oppoſing the maxims of the court. The church-puritans, who before made no figure in the kingdom, ſuddenly formed a very conſiderable party by the junction of the ſtate-puritans. This party grew in the end ſo powerful, that they overthrew the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy, and the monarchy itſelf: but this happened not till the following reign.

On the other hand, the king's party was ſtrengthened by the junction of the Arminians, who were very numerous. Arminius's doctrine had bred diſputes in England, though with leſs noiſe than in Holland. Many clergymen had embraced this doctrine, though condemned by the ſynod of Dort, whoſe authority they did not acknowledge, and notwithſtanding the king's open profeſſion to reject Arminius's tenets. Theſe men improving the opportunity ariſing from the diſcord between the two parties, readily joined with the royaliſts, and from that time were as much careſſed at court as they were hated before. By this means William Laud, a clergyman of great parts and learning, was qualified, though Arminian, to be promoted to the ſee of St. David's by the marquis of Buckingham's intereſt, who deſired the biſhop of Lincoln [i] to recommend him to the king. It was however with ſome difficulty that the king agreed to his preferment, being prejudiced againſt him on account of his proud and turbulent ſpirit [k]. After the Arminians had liſted themſelves in the king's party, they were, in the height of proſperity, favoured by the courtiers, who were labouring to hinder the growth of puritaniſm. On the other hand, the papiſts alſo declared openly for the king, becauſe it was by an abſolute power alone that they could obtain their deſires, whereas the parliament was their profeſſed enemy. In fine, moſt of the clergy eſpouſed likewiſe the king's ſide, looking upon him as the only perſon capable of ſupporting them againſt the attempts of the puritans, whoſe number continually increaſed.

The two parties being thus compoſed of men of different kinds and ſentiments, mutually upbraided one another with what was moſt odious in each party. The royaliſts confounded, under the name of puritans, all who oppoſed the king; and the puritans taxed all the royaliſts with being papiſts or Arminians [l].

This diviſion, which began to be remarkable in England, did not ſerve to eſtabliſh the king's reputation abroad. It was now two years ſince his ſon-in-law's dominions were invaded by the Spaniard and the duke of Bavaria, and he was not ſeen to take any effectual courſe for their recovery. Embaſſies and ſollicitations were the only arms he employed for that end [m]. The king of Spain had amuſed him for four or five years with the hopes of a marriage, which advanced not, and by that means tied up his hands, whilſt he ſeized the Palatinate. In ſhort, when all Europe expected he would ſee the intereſts of his kingdom, his family, and his own, and take ſome vigorous reſolution, it was heard that he was irreconcileably fallen out with the parliament. Whereupon he was deſpiſed abroad, and inſults quickly followed contempt. In the Netherlands he was publicly ridiculed on their ſtages: comedies were acted, with meſſengers haſtily bringing news that the Palatinate was going to be loſt, conſidering the numerous forces that were ſending thither by the king of Spain's enemies; the king of Denmark was to find a hundred thouſand pickle-herrings; the Hollanders a hundred thouſand butter-boxes; and the king of England a hundred thouſand embaſſadors. In one place king James was pictured with a ſcabbard without a ſword, in another with a ſword which could not be drawn, though divers perſons ſtood pulling at it [n]. In England itſelf the almoſt forgotten ſtory of David Rizzo was revived. But what moſt troubled the contrary party to the king, was to ſee Buckingham govern ſo abſolutely, that the king ſeemed to have made his favourite his maſter. None were admitted to places but papiſts, Arminians, or ſuch as were reckoned to have little or no religion. In ſhort, ſuch only paſſed for proteſtants with the court, as were for the royal prerogative in its utmoſt extent, let their religion be what it would. All the reſt were puritans. Abbot himſelf, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was reckoned among the puritans, becauſe he approved not of the court-maxims. He had the misfortune, in the year 1622, to kill a man with an arrow as he was ſhooting at a buck [o]; and this accident occaſioned his being deemed incapable of performing any longer the functions of a biſhop. Wherefore he reſolved alſo to ſave himſelf the trouble of going to the council, where his advice was little regarded, as coming from a perſon of puritan principles.

Whilſt the people were in this ſort of fermentation, the king wanted money. He had a mind to ſend Digby to Spain,

[i] The lord keeper Williams.—Archbiſhop Abbot had repreſented him to the king as unſound in religion, becauſe he was an Arminian. Hacket, p. 63.

[k] The king told the lord keeper, "I keep Laud back from all place of rule and authority, becauſe I find he hath a reſtleſs ſpirit, and cannot ſee when matters are well, but loves to toſs and change, and to bring things to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain," &c. Ibid. p. 64.

[l] The lord Clarendon rightly obſerves how much theſe two parties miſrepreſented one another: the puritans endeavoured to perſuade the people that all who held with Arminius did intend to introduce popery: and the other ſide was no leſs willing to have it thought, that all who adhered to Calvin, in the controverſies about predeſtination, did in their hearts likewiſe adhere to him with reference to the diſcipline, and deſired to change the government of the church; though in truth the one ſide was not inclined to popery, and very many of the other were moſt affectionate to the peace and proſperity of the church, and very pious and learned men. Clarendon, tom. I. p. 72.

[m] Whereupon it was ſaid, that the king might almoſt have purchaſed ſuch a country as the Palatinate, with the money ſpent on embaſſies. Wilſon, p. 748.

[n] In Bruſſels they painted him with his pockets hanging out, and not one penny in them; and his purſe turned upſide down. In Antwerp they painted the queen of Bohemia like a poor Iriſh mantler, with her hair hanging about her ears, her child at her back, and king James carrying the cradle after her; and every one of theſe pictures had ſeveral mottos expreſſing their malice. Coke, vol. I. p. 126.

[o] On July 24, in Barnſhill-park in Hampſhire, belonging to the lord Zouch, who had invited the archbiſhop to a buck-hunting. Peter Hawkins, the keeper, running among the herd of deer, to bring them to a fairer mark the archbiſhop ſitting on horſeback, let fly a barbed arrow from a croſs-bow, which unfortunately ſhot the keeper in the fleſhy part of his left arm, who died immediately of the wound. Hacket. p. 65. The king granted the archbiſhop a pardon for this, November 22 this year. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVII. p. 337.

and Weſton to Bruſſels [p], to finiſh at once the marriage and the affair of the Palatinate. Beſides, Buckingham and his relations were a gulph which could not be filled. There was no likelihood of a new parliament, after the king's late proceedings. Though a parliament could have been perſuaded to give the king money, it would not have been till after their privileges were ſecured at the expence of the prerogative-royal, and the king thought the remedy worſe than the diſeaſe. Recourſe therefore was to be had to extraordinary methods. The ſpeedieſt and moſt ſure ſeemed to be the exacting from the people a contribution, under the name of benevolence. As the court knew, if ſome conſtraint were not uſed, the peoples liberality would not go very far, the judges were ordered in their circuits to demand a benevolence, and to intimate withal, that the king would not be ſatisfied with what ſhould be voluntarily offered, if it was not proportionable to the giver's abilities. To that purpoſe the council directed a circular letter to the judges, concluding with theſe words: "Nevertheleſs, if any perſon ſhall, out of obſtinacy or diſaffection, refuſe to contribute herein, proportionably to their eſtates and means, you are to certify their names unto this board. And ſo recommending this ſervice to your beſt care and endeavour, and praying you to return unto us notes of the names of ſuch as ſhall contribute, and of the ſums offered by them [q]." The excuſe for this levy of money, was the king's pretended reſolution to recover the Palatinate by arms, after having in vain tried gentle means. It will hereafter appear how this reſolution was executed.

The king's project was to conclude the prince his ſon's marriage, and receive the dowry of two millions, before he demanded the reſtitution of the Palatinate, for fear the Spaniard ſhould pretend that the reſtitution was to be in compenſation of the dowry. After that, he hoped the king of Spain, out of friendſhip, and in conſideration of their alliance, would ſurrender the Lower Palatinate to his ſon-in-law, and oblige the emperor and the duke of Bavaria to reſtore him the Upper. This was all he intended to do for his daughter and ſon-in-law. That this was his deſign, manifeſtly appears in his inſtructions to the lord Digby, before his departure for Spain, wherein he was expreſly ordered, "not to make the affair of the Palatinate one of the marriage-articles." The king however would have the public believe, that his chief aim in the Spaniſh match, was to procure his ſon-in-law the reſtitution of the Palatinate. This doubtleſs was one of thoſe myſteries of ſtate which could not be comprehended by the commons. Perhaps he really hoped, the reſtitution would immediately follow upon the marriage: but this hope was built upon a very ſandy foundation. In all appearance Gondemar inſpired him with ſo chimerical an expectation.

However, James, being entirely bent upon this project, ſent Digby embaſſador extraordinary to Spain, to conclude the marriage-treaty, jointly with ſir Walter Aſton, who had been ſome time at the court of Philip IV [r]. The articles concerning religion were already ſettled, but the reſt were not to be talked of, till the pope's diſpenſation was obtained, for fear of labouring in vain. This was an artifice of the Spaniſh court, to prolong the affair, in order to have time to finiſh the conqueſt of the Palatinate, whilſt the diſpenſation was expected, which to haſten or delay was, probably, in the king of Spain's breaſt. Mean while, the hopes of a ſpeedy concluſion of the marriage, of the dowry of two millions, and of the reſtitution of the Palatinate, ſo tied up the king's hands, that he durſt not take the leaſt ſtep to offend the Spaniard, for fear of defeating ſo noble a project. Therefore, whenever he talked of engaging in a war for the recovery of the Palatinate, it was always with this reſtriction, if he could not obtain it by fair means, becauſe he thought himſelf ſure of the ſucceſs of his negotiations. It is therefore certain, that when he demanded money of the parliament, or exacted the benevolence on the people, it was not with deſign to prepare for war, though that was the pretence, ſince a breach with the houſe of Auſtria was inconſiſtent with his project.

When Digby, who was this year created earl of Briſtol [s], ſet out for Spain, the king ſent Gage to Rome, to ſollicit the diſpatch of the diſpenſation, without which the new embaſſador could not proceed at Madrid. But to render Gage's inſtances more effectual, it was neceſſary to ſhew the pope, the king was not a perſecutor of the catholics. Not but that he had already given very convincing proofs: however he thought he ſhould on this occaſion give a ſtill ſtronger one, by releaſing all the impriſoned recuſants [t]. This was done publicly and openly, by writs under the great ſeal to the juſtices of aſſize, with a letter from the lord keeper Williams, exhorting them punctually to obey the king's orders. Theſe writs, contrary to the law, to the commons remonſtrance, and to the king's own anſwer to their petition, occaſioned many ſevere cenſures upon the king's conduct. As this affair made a noiſe among the people, the lord-keeper was ordered to vindicate the king by a public writing. This vindication begins with this noble compariſon: "As the ſun in the firmament appears to us no bigger than a platter, and the ſtars but as ſo many nails in the pummel of a ſaddle, becauſe of the enlargement and diſproportion between our eye and the object; ſo is there ſuch an immeaſurable diſtance between the deep reſolution of a prince, and the ſhallow apprehenſions of common and ordinary people, that as they will ever be judging and cenſuring, ſo they muſt needs be obnoxious to error and miſtaking." Then he gives two reaſons, both very falſe, of his conduct. The firſt is, that as the king was now ſolliciting very zealouſly for ſome eaſe to all the proteſtants in Europe, it would be unreaſonable to execute at the ſame time the laws againſt the Roman catholics. The ſecond, that the Engliſh jeſuits had publiſhed a book to excite the French king to execute in his kingdom againſt the Hugonots, the ſame laws as thoſe enacted in England againſt the papiſts. "But, added the biſhop, to conclude, from the favour done to the Engliſh papiſts, that the king favours the Romiſh religion, is a compoſition of folly and malice little deſerved by a gracious prince, who by word, writing, exerciſe of religion, and acts of parliament, hath demonſtrated himſelf ſo reſolved a proteſtant."

I obſerved that about the latter end of the laſt year, the emperor ſent count Schwartzemburg to the king, to treat of the affair of the Palatinate. This embaſſador being pompouſly received at London, as witneſſing the emperor's regard for the king, could produce no powers when he came to talk of affairs. It was the archduchеſs Iſabella that was impowered by the emperor to conclude the truce deſired by the king. There was a neceſſity therefore of going to negotiate at Bruſſels with the archduchеſs and the envoys of ſome proteſtant princes. The king choſe for this employ ſir Richard Weſton, chancellor of the exchequer, probably becauſe he thought his religion would advance the negotiation. But, to gain the infanta's favour, he made uſe of another means alſo. He permitted the lord Vaux, a papiſt, to raiſe two thouſand men [u] in England, to ſerve the infanta againſt the United Provinces, and the proteſtant princes their allies. By ſuch means as theſe, the king hoped to ſucceed in his negotiations. We ſhall ſee preſently the event; but it will be neceſſary firſt to mention what paſſed in Germany during the year 1622.

The king of Bohemia, plainly perceiving the king his father-in-law uſed very ineffectual methods to reſtore him to his dominions, believed it adviſeable to proceed ſome other way. He was ſtill maſter of Manheim, Heidelberg, and Frankendal; and count Mansfeldt, though withdrawn into Alſatia, had it ſtill in his power to re-enter the Lower Palatinate. In order to improve this laſt remedy, he agreed with prince Chriſtian of Brunſwick, adminiſtrator of the biſhopric of Halberſtadt, who had accompained him to the Hague, to raiſe an army in Weſtphalia, and join Mansfeldt. At the ſame time he made the like agreement with the prince of Baden-Durlach, who promiſed alſo to raiſe an army for the ſame purpoſe. It is likely, the Hollanders ſupplied the money for theſe levies, on account of the advantage they ſhould reap from this powerful diverſion. Theſe two princes kept promiſe with the king of Bohemia, and each headed ten or twelve thouſand men. The difficulty was how to enter the Lower Palatinate, where the Spaniards were very ſtrong. However, the thing not appearing impracticable, the prince of Brunſwick took the field in Weſtphalia, and ſeized ſome places in the county of Marck. This drew upon him a detachment of the Spaniſh army from the Low-Countries, commanded by count Henry de Bergh, who was joined by the count of Anhalt with another detachment of the army of Bavaria, commanded by count Tilly in the Palatinate. By this means, prince Chriſtian ſaw himſelf detained ſome time in Weſtphalia,

The

;th, the count of Bergh being recalled, he was at , to advance. On the other hand, it was not eaſy for the prince of Baden to enter the Palatinate, all the paſſages being ſtopped by count Tilly and Gonſales de Cordova.

Mean while, the king of Bohemia departing privately from the Hague, on board a ſmall veſſel, and landing at Calais, travels through France and ſafely arrived at Manſfeldt's army, who was advanced to Germerſheim. Here they impatiently expected the approach of the two armies coming to their aſſiſtance. It would be needleſs to give a particular account of the march of theſe two armies, and the obſtacles they met with from the Spaniards and Bavarians. It will ſuffice to ſay, the prince of Baden was defeated the 6th of May: that afterwards the king of Bohemia and Manſfeldt marching to prince Chriſtian, met count Tilly, who put them to rout, and forced them to retire to Manheim. This battle was fought the 12th of June. Eight days after, Tilly alſo attacked prince Chriſtian, who was advanced to the borders of the Palatinate; and though he gained ſome advantage over him, could not however prevent his paſſing to Manheim with good part of his troops.

Some time after, the Spaniards and Bavarians were ſo ſtrongly recruited, that their army conſiſted of above fifty thouſand men, with which they almoſt ſurrounded their enemies, who were encamped between Manheim and Heidelberg. Wherefore the king of Bohemia, deſpairing ever to recover what he had loſt, returned to Holland. After his departure, the prince of Brunſwick and count Mansfeldt reſolved to join prince Maurice in the Low-Countries, and marched through Lorrain. As they were obliged to take a compaſs, Gonſales de Cordova parting from Tilly, went and expected them at Brabant, to hinder their paſſage. The two armies meeting between Namur and Bruſſels, fought with equal ſucceſs; but the prince of Brunſwick loſt an arm by a cannon ball. After the Battle Mansfeldt continued his march towards Holland.

Mean while, count Tilly having no enemy to oppoſe him in the Lower Palatinate, carried Heidelberg by ſtorm [w] took, Manheim by a long blockade, and then beſieged Frankendal [x].

Whilſt the king of Bohemia was in the Palatinate, conferences were held at Bruſſels, to procure a truce for that unfortunate country, according to the king of England's deſire, though he was not impowered by the king his ſon-in-law, for whom at this juncture a truce was not convenient. In the negotiation two difficulties immediately occured, which ſerved to prolong it. The firſt was, the Engliſh embaſſador had not ſufficient powers from the king of Bohemia and his allies. James had doubtleſs imagined, that ſince this truce was negotiating on his account, it ſufficed to treat with him. But the Spaniards gave to underſtand, they could only treat with the principal parties. There was occaſion therefore to ſend to the Palatinate for full powers from the king of Bohemia, who was not in haſte to diſpatch them, whilſt he had any hopes of ſucceeding in his enterpriſe. But at laſt, ſending theſe powers when he ſaw his affairs declining, another difficulty of the ſame nature occurred at Bruſſels. The archduchеſs had no other power than the emperor's bare letter, deſiring her to conſult with the Engliſh embaſſador concerning a truce for the Lower Palatinate [y]. From that time the king of Bohemia's affairs daily growing worſe, the archduchеſs and count Schwartzemburg prolonged the affair on divers pretences, till Heidelburg was taken, and Manheim cloſely blocked up. Then James wrote to the king of Spain, to deſire him to order that the affairs of the Palatinate might remain in their preſent ſtate, till the concluſion of the truce, and the blockade of Manheim was raiſed. Philip feigned to have this condeſcenſion for him, but before his letter to the archduchеſs was received, Manheim was taken. Nay, it did not hinder count Tilly from beſieging Frankendal, which he would have alſo taken without ſcruple, had not the overflowings of the rivers forced him to raiſe the ſiege. Thus was the king amuſed with vain hopes, whilſt the conqueſt of the Palatinate was completing. He perceived it at laſt, but at the ſame time was told, the prince his ſon's marriage was ſo near a concluſion, that he could not think of hazarding a miſcarriage in that affair, by inſiſting too ſtrenouſly on the reſtitution of the elector's dominions. This may be clearly ſeen in his letters to the earl of Briſtol, his embaſſador in Spain, of which I ſhall here give ſome extracts.

Sept. 9, 1622.

"Right truſty, and well-beloved,

"Your diſpatch of the 9th of Auguſt, gave us ſo much contentment, and ſo great hopes of ſatisfaction in all thoſe buſineſſes, which you have there to treat with that king, as we could not expect any further difficulties; notwithſtanding by that which has come to our hands immediately after, as well by George Gage from Rome, as by our embaſſador ſir Richard Weſton at Bruſſels, and our miniſters in the Palatinate, we find that neither the diſpenſation is granted for the match, nor the treaty of ceſſation ſo near a concluſion, as we conceived it would have been, now that the auxiliaries and all other obſtacles are removed. But on the contrary ſide, that new delays and excuſes are invented, our garriſons in the Palatinate in the mean time blocked up, Heidelberg itſelf actually beſieged---

"Therefore our pleaſure is, that you ſhall immediately, and with as much ſpeed as you may, crave audience of that king, and repreſent unto him the merit which we may juſtly challenge unto ourſelf, for our ſincere proceedings with the emperor and him in all the courſe of this buſineſs, notwithſtanding the many invitations and temptations which we have had, to engage ourſelf on our ſon-in-law's part. That we have had both from the emperor and him hopes given us from time to time of extraordinary reſpect, howſoever our ſon-in-law had deſerved, which we have attended and expected even to the very laſt, with much patience, and in deſpight (as it were) of all the oppoſition that hath been made to ſhake our reſolution in that behalf. If now, when all impediments are removed, and that the way is ſo prepared, as that the emperor may give an end unto the war, and make ſome preſent demonſtration of his reſpect towards us, in leaving us the honour of holding thoſe poor places which yet remain, quietly and peaceably until the general accommodation, the ſame ſhall nevertheleſs be violently taken from us, what can we look for, when the whole ſhall be in his hands and poſſeſſion? Who amuſing us with a treaty of ceſſation, and protracting it induſtriouſly (as we have reaſon to believe), doth in the mean time ſeize himſelf of the whole country; which being done, our embaſſador ſhall return with ſcorn, and we remain with diſhonour.

"I ſhall not need to furniſh you with arguments for the unfolding and laying open this unfriendly dealing more plainly unto them; your own reaſon and obſervation will find enough out of the diſpatches, whereof copies are ſent unto you; as namely, the withdrawing of the Spaniſh forces, and leaving the buſineſs wholly in the hands of the emperor and the duke of Bavaria; the ſtile of the infanta, in anſwering our embaſſador with recriminations, which was not her manner heretofore; the ſlight and frivolous anſwer given by the marquis of Bedmar unto our embaſſador, when he acquainted him with the ſiege of Heidelberg; the quarrellous occaſion taken by the emperor for calling the diet at Ratiſbon, contrary to his own promiſe, which, in his diſpatch to us, he confeſſeth to have broken, as you will ſee by the copy: All which, and many more, which your own judgment (in the peruſal of the diſpatches) will ſuggeſt unto you, do miniſter unto us cauſe ſufficient of jealouſy on the emperor's part, as you ſhall plainly tell that king; although we will not do him that wrong, as to miſtruſt that he gives the leaſt conſent to it. In this confidence, with much earneſtneſs, we ſhall ſtill ſollicit him, that for the affection he bears us, and the deſire which we ſuppoſe he hath, that there may continue for ever a perfect amity betwixt us and the whole houſe of Auſtria, he will not ceaſe to do all good offices herein; letting him know directly, that in theſe terms we cannot ſtand with the emperor; but that if Heidelberg be won, or the ſiege continue, or the ceſſation be long unneceſſarily delayed, we muſt recal our embaſſador from Bruſſels, and treat no more, as we have already given order; hoping, that whatſoever unkindneſs we ſhall conceive againſt the emperor upon theſe occaſions, it ſhall not be interpreted to reflect in any ſort upon the entire affection that is at this preſent, and as we hope ſhall always continue, betwixt us and the crown of Spain. And therefore, as we have heretofore ſundry times promiſed, in teſtimony of the ſincerity of our proceedings, and of our great deſire to preſerve the amity inviolable between us and the whole houſe of Auſtria, That in caſe our ſon-in-law would not be governed by us, that then we would not only forſake him, but take part, and join our forces with the emperor againſt him; ſo you may fairly repreſent unto that king, That in like manner we have reaſon to expect the ſame meaſure from him, that (upon the emperor's averſeneſs to a ceſſation and accommodation) he will likewiſe actually aſſiſt us for the recovery of the Palatinate, and electoral dignity, unto our ſon-in-law, as it hath been oftentimes intimated from Spain [z].

" To conclude, we ſhall not need to ſay any more unto you touching this point, but to let you ſee that our meaning is, to carry all things fair with that king, and not to give him any cauſe of diſtruſt or jealouſy, if you perceive that they intend to go really and roundly on with the match."

Notwithſtanding all this, Heidelberg and Manheim were taken by the emperor's forces, and Frankendal beſieged.

In another letter to the ſame embaſſador, dated October 3, the king ſaid, " That while he was amuſed with treaties at Madrid and Bruſſels, Heidelberg had been taken by force, the Engliſh garriſons put to the ſword, and Manheim beſieged: That the infanta (having an abſolute commiſſion to conclude a ceſſation and ſuſpenſion of arms), when all objections were anſwered, did not only delay the concluſion of the treaty, but refuſe to lay her command upon the emperor's generals to abſtain from the ſiege of his garriſons during the treaty, upon a pretext of want of authority. And therefore, for avoiding of further diſhonour, he had been forced to recal both his embaſſadors, as alſo the lord Chicheſter [a], whom he intended to have ſent unto the emperor to the diet at Ratiſbon." After which he added:

" Seeing therefore, that merely out of our extraordinary reſpect to the king of Spain, and the firm confidence we ever put in the hopes and promiſes which he did give us (deſiring nothing more than for his cauſe principally to avoid all occaſions that might put us in ill underſtanding with any of the houſe of Auſtria), we have hitherto proceeded with a ſtedfaſt patience; truſting to the treaties, and neglecting all other means, which probably might have ſecured the remainder of our childrens inheritance, and by this confidence and ſecurity of ours, are now expoſed to diſhonour and reproach. You ſhall tell that king, That ſeeing all thoſe endeavours and good offices which he hath uſed towards the emperor in this buſineſs, on the behalf of our ſon-in-law, have not ſorted to any other iſſue than to a plain abuſe, both of his truſt and ours; we hope and deſire, that he will faithfully promiſe and undertake upon his honour (confirming the ſame alſo under his hand and ſeal), either that the town and caſtle of Heidelberg ſhall, within threeſcore and ten days after your audience, and demand made, be rendered into our hands, with all things therein belonging; and the like for Manheim and Frankendal, if both or either of them ſhall be taken by the enemy, while theſe things are in treaty: As alſo, that there ſhall be within the ſaid term of ſeventy days, a ceſſation and ſuſpenſion of arms in the Palatinate for the future, upon the ſeveral articles and conditions laſt propounded by our embaſſador ſir Richard Weſton; and that the general treaty ſhall be ſet a foot again: Or elſe, in caſe all theſe particulars be not yielded unto, and performed by the emperor, that the king of Spain do join his forces with ours: Or if ſo be his forces be otherwiſe employed, yet that at the leaſt he will permit us a free and friendly paſſage through his territories and dominions, for ſuch forces as we ſhall ſend and employ in Germany for his ſervice. Of all which, if you receive not from the king of Spain (within ten days at the fartheſt after your audience) a direct aſſurance under his hand and ſeal without delay, that then you take your leave, and return to our preſence, without further ſtay; otherwiſe to proceed in the negotiation for the marriage of our ſon, according to the inſtructions we have given you."

This letter plainly ſhews, the king was convinced, he had hitherto been only amuſed. And yet he wrote the next day to the earl of Briſtol, to this effect: " Though you have order to come away without farther delay, in caſe you receive not ſatisfaction to your demands from the king of Spain; yet we would not have you inſtantly come away upon it, but advertiſe us firſt, letting us know privately (if you find ſuch cauſe) that there is no good to be done, nor ſatisfaction as you judge, intended us (though publicly and outwardly you give out to the contrary), That we may make uſe thereof with our people in parliament, as we ſhall hold beſt for our ſervice."

It is evident by theſe letters how much the king was miſtaken, in expecting to adjuſt his ſon-in-law's affairs, by the method he had followed, and how he had been triſled with in his ſeveral negotiations: That he himſelf knew it, and all the vengeance he took was to recal his embaſſador from Bruſſels. It is true, he ſeemed to intend to be revenged by arms; but he would have the king of Spain join with him, to oblige the emperor and the duke of Bavaria to reſtore a country which he had himſelf delivered to them. At leaſt he hoped, the king of Spain would grant him a paſſage through his territories; projects as chimerical as that of recovering the Palatinate by fair means and ſollicitations alone. In ſhort, it is viſible in theſe letters, that the king made the reſtitution of the Palatinate and concluſion of the marriage two diſtinct affairs, and did not conſider the laſt as dependent of the other. Indeed, though there was manifeſtly a colluſion between the emperor Philip IV. and the infanta, James ordered his embaſſador to do nothing offenſive to the king of Spain, for fear of prejudicing the marriage, which he was always made to conſider as upon the point of concluſion.

In fine, after a long expectation, Gage was ſent back from Rome, where he had been ſolliciting the diſpenſation, with nineteen articles, to each of which the pope had put a poſtil or ſhort note, after the manner practiſed in the capitulations of places. Probably, the ſenſe of the three material articles which were agreed on, was explained, and the nineteen following ones were formed by common conſent:

I. That the pope's diſpenſation ſhall be firſt obtained at the ſole inſtance of his catholic majeſty.

Note. " The two parties are agreed on this point."

II. That the marriage ſhall be celebrated in Spain, according to the rites practiſed in the church of Rome; and afterwards in England, with ſuch ceremonies as ſhall tend moſt to the advantage of the king of Great Britain; yet ſo, as that nothing be done contrary to the religion profeſſed by the moſt excellent infanta. But as to this point, they ſhall agree about the ceremonies to be performed in both kingdoms.

Note. " The marriage ought to be celebrated but once in Spain; and if any ceremony is to be performed in England, notice muſt be given beforehand, and let this ceremony be agreed on."

III. That the moſt gracious infanta ſhall have free exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion.

Note. " This article is granted."

IV. That all the domeſtics and ſervants belonging to the moſt gracious infanta, ſhall be appointed by his catholic majeſty, ſo as the king of England ſhall not have the liberty of nominating any one.

Note. " Granted."

V. That the moſt gracious infanta ſhall have an oratory, where divine ſervice ſhall be celebrated in ſuch manner as ſhe ſhall appoint.

Note. " This article is granted."

VI. That this oratory ſhall be in her palace, and there maſſes to be celebrated at the pleaſure of the infanta.

Note. " A church ſhall be built in London, beſides that in the palace, and divine ſervice ſhall be celebrated in each, and the word of God preached, and the ſacraments adminiſtred."

VII. That all the officers and domeſtics belonging to the infanta, of what ſort ſoever, as alſo her ſervants and family, may be freely and publicly catholics; which is ſo to be underſtood, as that each of them in particular ſhall be obliged to profeſs the Roman catholic religion.

Note. " The men and women ſervants of the moſt ſerene infanta, their children and poſterity, with their whole families, what office ſoever they bear, ſhall have the free exerciſe of the catholic religion."

VIII. That the exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion ſhall be in form following: The moſt gracious infanta ſhall have in her palace a chapel ſo ſpacious, that her ſervants and family may enter and ſtay therein; in which there ſhall be an ordinary and public door for them, and another inward door, by which the infanta may have a paſſage into the chapel, where ſhe and others may be preſent at divine offices.

Note. " All the ſervants muſt conform to this."

IX. That the chapel may be beautified with decent ornaments, and other things neceſſary for divine ſervice, according to the cuſtom of the holy Roman church; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſervants and others to go to the ſaid chapel at all hours.

Note. " Granted."

X. That the keeper and guardians of the chapel ſhall be appointed by the lady infanta, and they ſhall take care no body may enter into it to do any indecent thing.

Note. "The keeper and guardians of the chapel and church ſhall be Spaniards."

XI. That to ſerve in the chapel, there ſhall be a convenient number of prieſts as to the infanta ſhall ſeem fit. And if any of them be natives of Great Britain, they ſhall not be admitted to ſerve, without her conſent firſt obtained.

Note. "His holineſs wills and means that this be a true church."

XII. That among the prieſts, there ſhall be one ſuperior miniſter or rector, with authority to decide the caſes of religion and conſcience.

Note. "His holineſs will have this ſuperior to be a biſhop."

XIII. That this ſuperior miniſter may exerciſe eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction upon all who ſhall offend in the infanta's family: And moreover, the lady infanta ſhall have power to turn them out of her ſervice, whenſoever it ſhall ſeem expedient to her.

Note. "He muſt be a biſhop."

XIV. That it may be lawful for the lady infanta to procure from Rome indulgences and jubilees, and all graces, as ſhall ſeem fit to her religion and conſcience.

Note. "This article is granted."

XV. That the ſervants and family of the lady infanta ſhall take the oath of allegiance to the king of Great Britain; provided there be no clauſe therein contrary to their conſciences and the Roman catholic religion, and that the form of the oath be firſt approved of.

Note. "The men and women ſervants ſhall be Spaniards."

XVI. That the laws made againſt the Roman catholic religion in England, ſhall not extend to the ſervants of the moſt gracious infanta; but they ſhall be exempted from the ſaid laws, and the penalties annexed, and of this a declaration ſhall be made.

Note. "The laws already made, or to be made in England concerning religion, ſhall not extend to the ſervants, who ſhall be exempted from them as well as from the penalties, &c. and for this reaſon the eccleſiaſtics ſhall not be liable to any but their eccleſiaſtical laws."

XVII. That the children of the moſt illuſtrious prince, and the moſt gracious infanta, ſhall not be conſtrained in point of conſcience, and in that caſe, the laws made againſt catholics in England ſhall not extend to them; and though any of them be catholics, they ſhall not loſe the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdom and dominions of Great Britain.

Note. "This article is granted by his holineſs."

XVIII. That the nurſes which ſhall give ſuck to the children of the lady infanta, ſhall be choſen by the lady infanta, and accounted part of her family.

Note. "The nurſes ſhall be catholics, choſen by the moſt ſerene infanta, and reckoned among her domeſtics."

XIX. That the rector or ſuperior miniſter, and other eccleſiaſtical and religious perſons of the family of the lady infanta, ſhall wear their uſual veſtments and habits.

Note. "Granted."

At the end of theſe articles, which were long debated and canvaſſed by the congregation of the propagation of faith, the congregation ſubjoined their opinion in the following terms:

"As to the terms offered by the moſt ſerene king of England, it ſeems to us they are deſigned only to ſecure the moſt ſerene infanta's religion. But to the end his holineſs may grant the diſpenſation, there are other things neceſſary to the privilege, increaſe, and welfare of the Roman catholic religion. Theſe things are to be propoſed by the moſt ſerene king, that his holineſs may conſider, whether, upon ſuch offers, he can grant the diſpenſation."

It is eaſy to ſee, the pope's poſtils tended not only to the benefit of the Roman catholic religion, but alſo to cauſe the affair to be prolonged, purſuant to the court of Spain's intentions. Beſides that James was not expected to agree to the contents of the notes, another expedient was ready to ſtop the concluſion of the marriage, namely, to oblige the king to make offers for the advancement of the Roman religion, with which the pope, if he pleaſed, might never be ſatisfied. Thus, after a ſix years expectation, James was no farther advanced than when the affair was begun, except that he was willing to grant whatever the pope did or might demand. And indeed, this was the courſe he took. He found now of what conſequence the firſt article was, which he had been made to ſign, that the diſpenſation ſhould be firſt procured by the endeavours of the king of Spain; for by this means, the Spaniard could advance or entirely break off the negotiation as he pleaſed, by cauſing the pope to delay or refuſe the diſpenſation. It is certain, as I ſaid, the court of Spain's intent at firſt was only to make uſe of the project of this marriage, to allure James into their ſnare, for fear he ſhould join with the German-proteſtants, and afterwards, for fear he ſhould ſend a powerful aid to the king of Bohemia.

When Gage came from Rome with the articles, the king was terribly embarraſſed. The Palatinate was almoſt quite loſt. The negotiation at Bruſſels did not advance, and he could not but perceive he was impoſed upon by the emperor and king of Spain: ſo that he ſaw no other way to procure the elector's reſtoration, but the prince's marriage with the infanta. It is true, England was ſufficiently powerful to moleſt the houſe of Auſtria; but a parliament muſt have been called, which the king could not think of. On the other hand, the pope annexed to the marriage ſuch terms as the king could not grant, without giving occaſion to his domeſtic enemies to repreſent him as a prince regardleſs of the intereſts of the proteſtant religion, to which imputation he was already but too liable. In this perplexity, rather than break with Spain, and ſo loſe the deſired dowry of two millions, with the hopes of recovering the Palatinate, he choſe to be expoſed to the reproaches of his ſubjects, which he did not ſeem much to regard. He drew therefore a memorial which he ſigned with his own hand, containing his offers in favour of the catholic religion, and ſent it to the earl of Briſtol, with the letter of the 9th of September, of which I have already given an extract. The concluſion of the letter, which I reſerved for this occaſion, becauſe the marriage is there mentioned, was as follows:

"Nevertheleſs we muſt tell you, that we have no great cauſe to be well pleaſed with the diligences uſed on that part, when we obſerve, that after ſo long an expectance of the diſpenſation, upon which the whole buſineſs (as they will have it) depends, there is nothing yet returned but queries and objections. Yet becauſe we will not give over our patience a while longer, until we underſtand more certainly what the effect thereof is like to be, wherein we require you to be very wary and watchful, conſidering how our honour is therein engaged; we have thought fit to let you know, how far we are pleaſed to enlarge ourſelf, concerning thoſe points demanded by the pope, and ſet down by way of poſtil unto the articles agreed upon betwixt Spain and us, as you ſhall ſee by the power which Gage brought us from Rome, whereof we have ſent you a copy, and our reſolutions thereupon ſigned with our own hand, for your warrant and inſtruction. And further than that, ſince we cannot go without much prejudice, inconveniency, and diſhonour to ourſelf and our ſon, we hope and expect the king of Spain will bring it inſtantly to an iſſue, without farther delay, which you are to preſs with all diligence and earneſtneſs, that you may preſently know their final reſolution, and what we may expect thereupon. But if any reſpite of time be earneſtly demanded, and that you perceive it not poſſible for them to reſolve until an anſwer come from Rome, we then think it fit that you give them two months time after your audience, that we may underſtand that king's final reſolution before Chriſtmas next at the fartheſt."

Though the king affirmed he could go no farther, yet means were found to perſuade him to a greater compliance, as will hereafter appear.

Hitherto the Spaniard had fed the king's hopes concerning the marriage, only to amuſe him. But ſince he plainly ſaw, by the articles and offers ſigned with his own hand, that James was reſolved to conclude at any rate, he thought ſo fair an opportunity ſhould not be miſſed to reſtore the catholic religion in England, which very probably might be accompliſhed by means of the match. So Philip ſuddenly altering his mind, appeared as eager to conclude, as he had ſeemed unwilling before [b]. From that time, that is, from the end of the year 1622, the marriage was reſolved at the court of Madrid. The point was only to extort from the king ſuch terms as ſhould lead to what was intended. All the king of Spain's proceedings, from the time I am ſpeaking of, evidently ſhew that he was inclined to the marriage, in caſe he could obtain what he promiſed himſelf for the advancement of the Roman religion in England, and which James's impatience gave him room to expect. But it is no leſs certain, that before this, he was entirely averſe to it. This manifeſtly appears in king Philip the fourth's letter to the condé d'Olivarez, and from that miniſter's anſwer. The letters were as follow:

The king of Spain's letter to the condé d'Olivarez.

Nov. 5, 1622.

"The king my father declared at his death, that his intent was never to marry my ſiſter, the infanta Donna Maria, with [b] The earl of Briſtol ſent word to king James, that if the Spaniſh court intended not the match, they were falſer than all the devils in hell; for deeper oaths and proteſtations of ſincerity could not be made. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 69.

The

the prince of Wales, which your uncle don Balthazar underſtood, and ſo treated this match ever with intention to delay it; notwithſtanding, it is now ſo far advanced, that conſidering all the averſeneſs of the infanta unto it, it is time to take ſome means to divert the treaty, which I would have you find out, and I will make it good whatſoever it be. But in all other things, procure the ſatisfaction of the king of Great Britain (who hath deſerved much), and it ſhall content me, ſo it be not in the match."

The condé d'Olivarez, in his anſwer, agreed, That the late king never intended to conclude the marriage, but only to amuſe the king of England, by reaſon of the ſituation of affairs in the Palatinate and Netherlands. He ſaid moreover, the infanta was determined to retire to a convent, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be preſſed upon that head.

After that he repreſented to his majeſty, "That the king of England found himſelf equally engaged in two buſineſſes at that time, namely, the marriage, and the reſtitution of the Palatinate. Suppoſing then, added the Condé, that the marriage be made, we muſt come to the other affair, and then your majeſty will find yourſelf engaged with the king of England in a war againſt the emperor, and the catholic league: a thing, which to hear, will offend your ears; or if you declare yourſelf for the emperor, then you will find yourſelf engaged in a war againſt the king of England, and your ſiſter married with his ſon. If your majeſty ſhould ſhew yourſelf neutral, what a great ſcandal will it be, for Spain to ſtand neuter, in a buſineſs wherein religion is ſo much concerned?

"On the other hand, ſaid the Condé, ſuppoſing we could ſatisfy the king of England, by having the Palatinate reſtored to his ſon-in-law, yet we muſt conſider whether it is in our power to have it reſtored; ſince the duke of Bavaria is poſſeſſed of all thoſe dominions, and the emperor, who hath promiſed to transfer to him the Upper Palatinate, with the electoral dignity, is now in the diet, where that tranſlation is to be made. Beſides, the emperor hath given us to underſtand, how difficult it will be to wreſt the Palatinate out of the duke of Bavaria's hands, ſince it appears by the memorial, which was yeſterday preſented to your majeſty by the emperor's embaſſador, that the duke of Bavaria alone can maintain more troops than all the reſt of the allies joined together."

Upon theſe difficulties, the Condé propoſed in the ſame letter, "to ſet on foot two other marriages, namely, between the emperor's eldeſt daughter, and the prince of Wales, and between the prince Palatine's ſon, and the emperor's ſecond daughter; by which means the buſineſs (ſays he) may be accommodated, and afterwards, I would reduce the prince elector to the obedience of the church, by breeding his ſons in the emperor's court with catholic doctrine."

If it be conſidered, that the king of Spain's letter is dated the 5th of November, and that probably the anſwer was made within a few days, it will be eaſy to perceive, that till then the Spaniard never intended to conclude the marriage. But preſently after, as I have obſerved, he came to another reſolution.

[1623] The late alteration of the projects in the Spaniſh court, procured the earl of Briſtol a letter from Philip IV. to the infanta Iſabella, to deſire her to raiſe the ſiege of Frankendal, and renew at London the conferences for a truce, which were broken off at Bruſſels. This requeſt was a real order, which the infanta obeyed, and the negotiation of the truce was begun at London, where it ended the 27th of March 1623 [c]. The ſole point was to hinder, by means of this truce, Frankendal, the only place in the Palatinate where was an Engliſh garriſon, from falling into the emperor's hands. But on the other ſide, the emperor had reaſon to fear, if James remained maſter of this place, he would make uſe of it to carry war into the Palatinate, and the more, as he had ſometimes threatened to have recourſe in the end to arms. To adjuſt the different intereſts of the emperor and the king, this rare expedient was deviſed. Frankendal was to be delivered to the infanta Iſabella, and a truce made for fifteen or eighteen months, after which, the infanta was to reſtore the place to the Engliſh. But withal, the elector was to break his alliance with the prince of Brunſwick and count Mansfeldt.

This treaty gives no great idea of the capacity of king James and his council. Not only was Frankendal delivered to the infanta, as if ſhe had been a third perſon entirely intereſted, though ſhe had ſhewn the contrary in this very treaty; but the elector was alſo deprived of all hopes of re-entering his country. Moreover, the emperor and duke of Bavaria were at liberty either to diſmiſs their troops, or to aſſiſt the king of Spain in the Low-Countries, ſince there was no farther danger of a war in the Palatinate. But what advantage accrued to James by this treaty? Indeed, he hindered the emperor from taking Frankendal. But at the ſame time, the place was delivered to Spain. On the other hand, the truce, which would have been for his advantage, had he kept Frankendal, turned to his prejudice, ſince it deprived him of the power to carry the war into the Palatinate, in favour of his ſon-in-law. It is true, upon ſuppoſition of the infanta's ſincerity, he was to have the place again when the truce was expired; but this was a very doubtful ſuppoſition, ſince the infanta was entirely guided by the directions of the courts of Vienna and Madrid.

Before the truce was concluded at London, the emperor, going to the diet at Ratiſbon, inveſted the duke of Bavaria with the electoral dignity and the Upper Palatinate, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of ſeveral princes who were poſſeſſed of hereditary dominions, and to whom ſuch a precedent was a juſt occaſion of fear. Such was the effect of king James's three years negotiations in favour of his ſon-in-law, who was at length ſtripped of his dominions and dignities [d]. But the Spaniſh match was to recover all. We muſt ſee now the ſucceſs of that tedious negotiation, the only remarkable event of the year 1623.

The only obſtacle of the marriage, were the articles concerning religion. The earl of Briſtol had been diſputing the ground inch by inch, ever ſince his arrival in Spain, and Philip IV. was not diſpleaſed with it, becauſe it gave him an opportunity to gain time. In Auguſt 1622, the Spaniards demanded certain articles in favour of the Engliſh catholics, to which the embaſſador only anſwered, he would acquaint the king his maſter therewith. At the ſame time, the pope put his poſtils or notes to the articles that were agreed on. Hence, it is eaſy to perceive, that the courts of Rome and Spain acted in concert, both tending to the ſame end. The king received, about the ſame time, the popes poſtils and the court of Madrid's demands in favour of the catholics. He kept theſe out of ceremony ſome months, without giving an anſwer, but at length ſigned all the 5th of January 1623, and having made the prince ſign them alſo, ſent the articles to the earl of Briſtol, who received them the 25th of the ſame month. I believe the full and entire reſolution of the Spaniſh court to conclude the marriage, may be fixed to this time. From the year 1616, to November 1622, the Spaniard's ſole intent was to amuſe king James. From thence to the 25th of January 1623, he ſeems to have reſolved upon the marriage, provided certain advantages, could be obtained for the Roman religion. In fine, after the articles, ſigned by the king and prince, had ſecured him what he deſired, his reſolution was fixed. Theſe three epocha's are to be carefully obſerved and diſtinguiſhed, for want of which, moſt hiſtorians are very obſcure in their recital of this affair.

The Spaniard being ſatisfied with the articles ſent from England, which were much more advantageous to the catholics than thoſe agreed upon with the earl of Briſtol, demanded time to ſend them to Rome, and obtain the pope's diſpenſation. It was thought, the diſpenſation might come n March or April at fartheſt, and it was agreed, the nuptials ſhould be ſolemnized four days [e] after its arrival; that the infanta ſhould ſet out within twenty days after the celebration of the marriage; and whilſt the diſpenſation was expected, the other articles, which were called temporal, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe concerning religion, ſhould be ſettled. Purſuant to this agreement, the earl of Briſtol and ſir Walter Aſton, jointly with the Spaniſh miniſters, prepared theſe articles by the beginning of March, to the mutual ſatisfaction of both parties. The 22d of March, the condé d'Olivarez and Gondemar came to the Engliſh embaſſadors, and ſhewed them a writing with the king of Spain's hand to it, whereby he approved of the temporal articles, and ordered them to finiſh the affair. Theſe articles concerned only the portion and dowry, without any mention of the Palatinate. Beſides that he had commanded the earl of Briſtol, in his inſtructions, not to make the reſtitution of the Palatinate one of the marriage articles, this command was repeated in the king's letter to him of the 30th of December 1622, that is, two or three months before. Moreover, at this very time, the truce and ſequeſtration of Frankendal were negotiating at London.

[c] The Engliſh commiſſioners were, Lionel earl of Middleſex lord, treaſurer; Ludwic earl of Lenox, ſteward of the houſhold; James marquis of Hamilton; Thomas earl of Arundel and Surry, earl marſhal; William earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain; Oliver viſcount Grandiſon; Arthur lord Chicheſter, treaſurer of Ireland; Sir George Calvert, ſecretary of ſtate; and ſir Richard Weſton, chancellor of the exchequer. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVII. p. 461.

[d] Thus by king James's amaſing negligence, was the proteſtant religion entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the electoral dignity transferred from the Palatinate family, and the liberty of Germany overthrown. And all this chiefly through Gondemar's artful management; who wrote in one of his letters to the duke of Lerma, that he had lulled king James ſo faſt aſleep, as he hoped neither the cries of his daughter, nor her children, nor the repeated ſollicitations of his parliament and ſubjects in their behalf, ſhould be able to awaken him. Welwood, p. 27, 28.

Who

The affair of the marriage being in this ſituation, and very probably near a concluſion, the end of April was to be expected with patience, to ſee whether any new difficulty would occur, for thus far every thing ſeemed to be ſettled to the king's ſatisfaction. But the face of the affair was ſuddenly changed, by a very odd and moſt extraordinary adventure. The marquis of Buckingham perſuaded the prince of Wales to go to Spain, and bring home his miſtreſs the infanta himſelf. He told him, "the more uncommon ſuch a gallantry was among princes, the more it would redound to his honour: the infanta herſelf would be charmed with it: his preſence would immediately put an end to all formalities, and remove whatever difficulties might yet occur: as after the marriage, there was an affair of moment to be negotiated, namely, the reſtitution of the Palatinate, an interceſſor like him, would do more in three days than embaſſadors could do in as many months." In a word, he ſo artfully repreſented this project, that the prince, tranſported with the thoughts of ſo noble an adventure, never reſted till he had accompliſhed it. The difficulty was to obtain the king's conſent [f]. The prince aſked it before Buckingham, and expreſſed ſo earneſt a deſire to make the journey, that the king granted his requeſt without much heſitation, and put off till next day to conſider of means to effect it. But after he had more ſeriouſly reflected on the affair, his mind was quite changed on the morrow, when the prince and Buckingham came to him. He repreſented to them, how fruitleſs ſuch a journey would be in the preſent ſituation of the marriage affair, and the inconveniences it might be attended with. But inſtead of anſwering his reaſons, Buckingham rudely told him, he had given his word, and if he broke it, would be never more credited [g]. The reader may ſee in the lord Clarendon's hiſtory this converſation at large, which ended with the king's permiſſion, extorted by the prince and Buckingham, for this ſtrange, raſh, and very dangerous journey. It was reſolved, that Buckingham ſhould accompany the prince, with two more only, namely, ſir Francis Cottington, who had been the king's agent in Spain, and came from thence in September, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince, who had been bred at Madrid: that they ſhould go poſt through France, and the ſecret be kept, that they might be at a diſtance before their departure was known. This reſolution being taken, the prince and Buckingham deſired only two days to prepare.

The motives of this journey are variouſly related, according to the intereſt and prejudices of the ſeveral writers. Some ſay, the court of England, ſtill doubting the Spaniſh court's ſincerity, thought proper the prince and Buckingham ſhould be ſatisfied with their own eyes, in order to know what could be depended upon. But ſuppoſing this doubt, was it not extremely imprudent to put the king's only ſon into the hands of a prince, whoſe ſincerity was believed to be juſtly ſuſpected? The king, prince, and favourite, muſt have been all three void of underſtanding, to be guilty of ſuch an error. This therefore ſeems to be altogether improbable.

The lord Clarendon ſays, Buckingham, out of envy that the earl of Briſtol ſhould have the ſole management of ſo great an affair, had a mind to have the glory of ending it. But he ſhould have thought of it ſooner, ſince every thing was now concluded in Spain, at or about the time of the prince's departure for Madrid. So the marquis could not acquire much honour. Beſides, the event ſhewed, this was not his motive, ſince inſtead of promoting, he was the ſole cauſe of the unexpected difficulties, and final breach of the marriage.

Others pretend, Buckingham's aim was inſenſibly to induce the prince to change his religion, by expoſing him to all the temptations which of courſe he would meet at the court of Madrid. Of this he was afterwards accuſed before the parliament, by the earl of Briſtol, who ſaid, the project was formed ſeveral months before the prince's departure between Buckingham and Gondemar, by means of Endymion Porter, who had been ſent to Spain for that purpoſe. But the proofs on which the earl of Briſtol grounded his accuſation, where but preſumptions at moſt, and as he was a profeſſed enemy to the marquis of Buckingham, I do not know whether his teſtimony may be relied on.

But whatever were the favourite's real motives with reſpect to this journey, it can hardly be denied, that it was a ſign of great levity in the prince, and of no leſs weakneſs and imprudence in the king. The affair of the marriage was in ſuch a ſituation, that it was entirely needleſs to ſollicit afreſh the court of Spain, with whom every thing was agreed. Two months patience would have ſhewn the king, whether he could rely on them, without expoſing his only ſon and heir apparent to ſo imminent danger, by ſuffering him to execute a romantic project, which could procure no advantage. But the king's condeſcenſion for the prince and Buckingham prevailed above all theſe conſiderations. They ſet out poſt the 17th of February [h], and came to Paris, where they ventured to appear at court, and be preſent at a ball, at which, though diſguiſed, they were in ſome danger of being diſcovered. However, they arrived ſafely at Madrid the 7th of March, and alighted at the earl of Briſtol's, who was not a little ſurpriſed to ſee the prince [i]. I ſhall not ſtay to deſcribe the magnificent reception of the prince by the court of Spain, when he made himſelf known. I ſhall only ſay, he met with all the reſpect due to his birth, and all poſſible careſſes to teſtify the ſatisfaction at his gallantry to the infanta, and his candour in confiding in the king's generoſity. The only thing in which great ceremony was uſed, was his not being permitted to viſit the infanta in private. The Spaniſh way did not admit of ſuch a familiarity, and the more becauſe the diſpenſation not being yet come, he could not in ſtrictneſs be conſidered as the infanta's future ſpouſe.

No ſooner was the prince arrived in Spain, but all the Spaniards thought he was come to change his religion before he eſpouſed the infanta, no one imagining there could be any other motive of his journey. Nay, count Gondemar very ſeriouſly deſired the earl of Briſtol, not to oppoſe ſo pious a deſign; and if the earl is to be credited, the count intimated to him, that the marquis of Buckingham was not againſt it [k]. The earl of Briſtol perceiving, if the court of Spain had any ſuch hopes, it would be apt to retard the marriage, ſpoke of it to the prince, and conjured him to impart the ſecret to him, if there was really any thing in it. But the prince firmly denied it, and expoſtulated with the embaſſador for having ſo ill an opinion of him [l]. Whereupon the earl of Briſtol intreated him, neither to do nor ſay any thing whatever that might feed the hopes of the Spaniſh court in that reſpect, for fear of obſtructing the marriage. Nevertheleſs he was attacked ſeveral times, one while by eccleſiaſtics, who took all occaſions to diſpute with him about religion, another while by courtiers, who repreſented to him how powerful England would grow if ſhe would return to the obedience of the pope. He even received a long letter from Gregory XV. exhorting him to come into the boſom of the church, and imitate his glorious anceſtors, who had done ſo great things for the defence of religion. The prince anſwered this letter the 20th of June. But becauſe the two printed copies of this anſwer are very different, it will not be amiſs to inſert them both.

Prince Charles to pope Gregory XV.

"Moſt Holy Father,

"I received the diſpatch from your holineſs with great content, and with that reſpect which the piety and care wherewith your holineſs writes doth require. It was an unſpeakable pleaſure to me to read the generous exploits of the kings my predeceſſors, to whoſe memory poſterity hath not given thoſe praiſes and elogies of honour that were due to them. I do believe that your holineſs hath ſet their

[g] The king conjured them, with ſighs and tears, not to purſue their reſolution. But Buckingham told his majeſty, "That no body could believe any thing he ſaid, when he retracted the promiſe he had ſo ſolemnly made; that he plainly diſcerned, it proceeded from another breach of his word (for he had promiſed to keep the thing ſecret), in communicating with ſome raſcal, who had furniſhed him with thoſe pitiful reaſons he had alleged, and he doubted not, but he ſhould hereafter know who his counſellor had been." Clarendon, tom. I. p. 14.

[h] They went privately, on February 17, from the court, which was then at Newmarket, to Newhall in Eſſex, a houſe of Buckingham's, purchaſed by him from Robert earl of Suſſex; and from thence the next day to Graveſend, and ſo to Dover, attended only by ſir Richard Graham, maſter of the horſe to the marquis. Wilſon, p. 763. Hacket, p. 114.

[i] The prince and marquis of Buckingham put on falſe beards, to cover their ſmooth faces, and travelled under the borrowed names of Jack and Tom Smith. The mayor of Dover ſtopped them, thinking they were going to France to fight; ſo that Buckingham was forced to diſcover himſelf, pretending he was going to viſit the fleet, as admiral. The ſame day they embarked, they landed at Boulogne, and from thence rode poſt to Paris. At Paris, they both wore large buſhy perriwigs that ſhadowed their faces. Here the prince ſaw, at a maſking dance, the princeſs Henrietta Maria, whom he afterwards married. Wilſon, p. 763. They narrowly eſcaped being ſeized in France. See Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 75. Weldon, p. 144.

[k] The condé d'Olivarez ſpeaking to the prince about this, in his firſt viſit, the prince replied, That he came not thither for religion, but for a wife. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 78.

The

example before my eyes, to the end that I might imitate them in all my actions; for in truth they have often expoſed their eſtates and lives for the exaltation of the holy chair. And the courage with which they have aſſaulted the enemies of the croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, hath not been leſs than the care and thought which I have, to the end that the peace and intelligence, which hath hitherto been wanting in Chriſtendom, might be bound with a bond of true concord: for like as the common enemy of peace watcheth always to put hatred and diſſention between chriſtian princes, ſo I believe that the glory of God requires that we ſhould endeavour to unite them. And I do not eſteem it a greater honour to be deſcended from ſo great princes, than to imitate them in the zeal of their piety; in which it helps me very much to have known the mind and will of our thrice honoured lord and father, and the holy intention of his catholic majeſty, to give a happy concurrence to ſo laudable a deſign; for it grieves him extremely to ſee the great evil that grows from the diviſion of chriſtian princes, which the wiſdom of your holineſs foreſaw, when it judged the marriage, which you pleaſed to deſign between the infanta of Spain and myſelf, to be neceſſary to procure ſo great a good; for it is very certain, that I ſhall never be ſo extremely affectionate to any thing in the world, as to endeavour alliance with a prince that hath the ſame apprehenſions of the true religion with myſelf. Therefore I entreat your holineſs to believe, that I have been always far from encouraging novelties, or to be a partiſan of any faction againſt the catholic, apoſtolic, Roman religion: But on the contrary, I have ſought all occaſions to take away the ſuſpicion that might reſt upon me; and that I will employ myſelf for the time to come to have but one religion, and one faith, ſeeing that we all believe in one Jeſus Chriſt: Having reſolved in myſelf to ſpare nothing that I might have in the world, and to ſuffer all manner of diſcommodities, even to the hazarding of my eſtate and life, for a thing ſo pleaſing unto God. It reſts only, that I thank your holineſs for the permiſſion which you have been pleaſed to afford me, and that I may pray God to give you a bleſſed health here, and his glory, after ſo much travel which your holineſs takes within his church.

Madrid, June 20, 1622. "CHARLES STUART."

The other copy of the ſame letter, is as follows.

Prince Charles to pope Gregory XV.

"Moſt Holy Father,

"WE have received your letter, with no leſs thankfulneſs and reſpect than is due to the ſingular good-will and godly affection wherewith we know it was written. It was moſt acceptable unto us, that the never-enough renowned examples of our anceſtors were propoſed to us by your holineſs for our inſpection and imitation; who though they often hazarded their lives and fortunes to propagate the chriſtian faith, yet did they never more cheerfully diſplay the banners of the croſs of Chriſt againſt his moſt bitter enemies, than we will endeavour to the utmoſt, that the peace and union which ſo long triumphed, may be reduced into the chriſtian world, after a kind of elimination or exile. For ſince the malice of the father of diſcords hath ſowed ſuch unhappy diviſions amongſt thoſe who profeſs the chriſtian religion, we account this moſt neceſſary, thereby to promote with better ſucceſs the glory of God, and Chriſt our Saviour, nor ſhall we eſteem it leſs honour to tread in their footſteps, and to have been their rivals and imitators in holy undertakings, than to have been deſcended of them. And we are very much encouraged to this, as well by the known inclination of our lord and father, and his ardent deſire to lend a helping hand to ſo pious a work, as by the anguiſh that gnaws his royal breaſt, when he conſiders what cruel deſtructions, what deplorable calamities, ariſe out of the diſſentions of chriſtian princes. Your holineſs's conjecture of our deſire to contract an alliance and marriage with a catholic family and princeſs, is agreeable both to your wiſdom and charity; for we would never deſire ſo vehemently to be joined in a ſtrict and indiſſoluble bond with any mortal whatſoever, whoſe religion we hated. Therefore your holineſs may be aſſured, that we are, and always will be of that moderation, as to abſtain from ſuch actions, which may teſtify our hatred againſt the Roman catholic religion; we will rather embrace all occaſions whereby, through a gentle and fair procedure, all ſiniſter ſuſpicions may be taken away; that as we confeſs one individual trinity, and one Chriſt crucified, we may unanimouſly grow up into one faith. Which that we may compaſs, we little value all labour and watchings, yea, the very hazard of our lives. It remains that we render thanks to your holineſs for your letter, which we eſteem as a ſingular preſent, and wiſh your holineſs all proſperity and eternal happineſs."

Dated at Madrid, 20 Junij 1623.

It muſt be obſerved of theſe two letters, which are very different, that as they did not appear till after the civil wars, it is equally probable that one of the parties qualified, whilſt the other aggravated, the expreſſions. And therefore it is needleſs to make any reflection upon them.

Mean while, after the prince's arrival in Spain, the ſtate of the marriage treaty was a little altered. The diſpenſation arrived about ſix weeks after, that is, about the beginning of May. But the pope had annexed certain conditions, without which it was to be of no force. Very probably, had not the prince been in Spain, the diſpenſation would have come ſooner, and without any reſtriction: but it is not very ſurpriſing, that the pope, knowing the prince was in Spain, ſhould deſire to make an advantage of that imprudence. He ſent therefore the diſpenſation, but it was to be delivered only on theſe terms, That the infanta ſhould have a church in London: That the children by this marriage ſhould be left to their mother's care till they were ten years old: That the nurſes ſhould be catholics, and appointed by the mother: That the king of England ſhould give ſecurity for the performance of the articles agreed upon concerning religion.

The article relating to the education of the children had been debated in November, and the pope and the king of Spain had inſiſted that the children ſhould be educated by their mother till marriageable. The king at firſt offered ſeven years, and the courts of Rome and Spain came to twelve. Then the king allowed nine, and the pope ten. At laſt, the earl of Briſtol received the king's orders, not to diſpute for a year more or leſs.

After the prince and the marquis of Buckingham came to Madrid, they managed the affair of the marriage excluſive of the earl of Briſtol. There was ſome debate upon the articles annexed to the pope's diſpenſation. The prince of Wales ſaid, he had no power to make the leaſt addition to the articles ſigned by the king his father; and the Spaniſh miniſters maintained, his Catholic majeſty could not reject the conditions on which the pope had granted the diſpenſation: That it lay in the pope's breaſt to grant his favours on what terms he pleaſed, and that the diſpenſation was void without theſe conditions. In ſhort, it was thought proper to conſult the king of England by letter, and to aſk withal, what ſecurity he would give for the performance of the articles. James made no ſcruple concerning the time of the education of the children, or about the nurſes, becauſe theſe things were now ſettled. As to the ſecurity, he replied, he could give no other than his own, and the prince's royal words and oaths, confirmed by his council of ſtate, and exemplified under the great ſeal of England. All this not ſatisfying the pope's nuntio, who pretended to have particular orders upon that point, the king of Spain offered to become ſecurity himſelf; but it was firſt to be determined by a committee of eccleſiaſtics, that Philip might lawfully ſwear for the king of England. Some believe this to be a Spaniſh device, to make the king of Spain guarantee of the articles granted to the catholics. This difficulty being removed, the prince ſent Cottington to England with the articles concerning religion, newly drawn according to the pope's intentions, and with ſome other ſecret articles, which were not to be publiſhed ſo ſoon.

It muſt be remarked, that hitherto there was no other writing concerning the infanta's dowry, than a rough draught, approved indeed by the king of Spain in a forementioned letter directed to his miniſters, but which remained in the hands of Olivarez. Much leſs had there been any care taken about the reſtitution of the Palatinate, James being unwilling to make this one of the marriage articles, for fear it ſhould be in recompence of the two millions promiſed him for the infanta's dowry. But he was very willing to receive the Palatinate, from the king of Spain's bounty, when the marriage ſhould be conſummated. This at leaſt was his project, and, no doubt, at the time the court of Spain ſought only to amuſe him, he was made to expect the reſtitution of the Palatinate, though without any written engagement. Mean while, James depended upon this verbal promiſe, as if it had been a treaty ſigned with the Spaniard's own hand [m].

Cottington being come to England with the articles both public and private, it was rumoured, that the pope and the king of Spain demanded a toleration for the Engliſh papiſts. The king himſelf occaſioned the rumour, by aſking his council, Whether it would be convenient to grant ſuch a toleration? Whereupon, Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had withdrawn to his own houſe ever ſince the fatal accident of killing the park keeper, and came no more to the council, thought it is duty to write the following letter to the king:

[m] See King James's Inſtructions to the earl of Briſtol, and the earl's defence, in Ruſhworth, and the Annals.

"May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

"I have been too long ſilent, and I am afraid by my ſilence I have neglected the duty of the place it hath pleaſed God to call me unto, and your majeſty to place me in: But I now humbly crave leave I may diſcharge my conſcience towards God, and my duty to your majeſty; and therefore I beſeech you freely to give me leave to deliver myſelf, and then let your majeſty do with me what you pleaſe. Your majeſty hath propounded a toleration of religion; I beſeech you take it into your conſideration what your act is, what the conſequence may be. By your act you labour to ſet up the moſt damnable and heretical doctrine of the church of Rome, the whore of Babylon: How hateful it will be to God, and grievous to your good ſubjects, the profeſſors of the goſpel, That your majeſty, who hath often diſputed, and learnedly written againſt thoſe hereſies, ſhould now ſhew yourſelf a patron of thoſe wicked doctrines, which your pen hath told the world, and your conſcience tells yourſelf, are ſuperſtitious, idolatrous, and deteſtible. And hereunto I add what you have done in ſending the prince into Spain without conſent of your council, the privity and approbation of your people: And although you have a charge and intereſt in the prince, as ſon of your fleſh, yet have the people a greater, as ſon of the kingdom, upon whom next after your majeſty are their eyes fixed, and welfare depends; and ſo tenderly is his going apprehended, as (believe it) however his return may be ſafe, yet the drawers of him into this action, ſo dangerous to himſelf, ſo deſperate to the kingdom, will not paſs away unqueſtioned, unpuniſhed. Beſides, this toleration which you endeavour to ſet up by your proclamation, cannot be done without a parliament, unleſs your majeſty will let your ſubjects ſee that you will take unto yourſelf ability to throw down the laws of your land at your pleaſure. What dread conſequence theſe things may draw afterwards, I beſeech your majeſty to conſider; and above all, leſt by this toleration and diſcountenancing of the true profeſſion of the goſpel, wherewith God hath bleſſed us, and this kingdom hath ſo long flouriſhed under, your majeſty do not draw upon this kingdom in general, and yourſelf in particular, God's heavy wrath and indignation.

"Thus in diſcharge of my duty towards God, to your majeſty, and the place of my calling, I have taken humble leave to deliver my conſcience. Now, ſir, do what you pleaſe with me."

It may be ſeen by this letter, it was not without reaſon that the archbiſhop paſſed for a puritan, at leaſt, according to the notions of the court, where all were conſidered as puritans who refuſed to aſcribe to the king an unlimited power. Wherefore his counſels were not regarded.

The king did not long detain Cottington in England. As it was not now time to diſpute, and he was required to ſign the articles as brought by Cottington, without any alterations, he choſe to do it rather than hazard a breach of the marriage, when the prince his ſon was in the hands of the Spaniard. He ſigned them therefore, and ſolemnly ſwore to them. As theſe articles were new drawn, explained, and increaſed to twenty-three, beſides four ſecret articles, the reader, perhaps, will be glad to view them in their new form, and ſee withal how far the king carried his compliance.

I. That the marriage be made by diſpenſation of the pope, but that to be procured by the endeavour of the king of Spain.

II. That the marriage be once only celebrated in Spain, and ratified in England, in form following: in the morning, after the moſt gracious infanta hath ended her devotions in the chapel, ſhe, and the moſt excellent prince Charles, ſhall meet in the king's chapel, or in ſome other room of the palace, where it ſhall ſeem moſt expedient; and there ſhall be read all the procurations, by virtue whereof the marriage was celebrated in Spain; and as well the moſt excellent prince, as the moſt excellent infanta, ſhall ratify the ſaid marriage celebrated in Spain, with all ſolemnity neceſſary for ſuch an act: ſo as no ceremony, or other thing intervene, which ſhall be contrary to the Roman catholic apoſtolic religion.

III. That the moſt gracious infanta ſhall take with her ſuch ſervants and family as are convenient for her ſervice; which family, and all perſons to her belonging, ſhall be choſen and nominated by the catholic king: ſo as he nominate no ſervant which is vaſſal to the king of Great Britain, without his will and conſent.

IV. That as well the moſt gracious infanta, as all her ſervants and family, ſhall have free uſe and public exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion, in manner and form as is beneath capitulated.

V. That ſhe ſhall have an oratory and decent chapel in her palace, where, at the pleaſure of the moſt gracious infanta, maſſes may be celebrated: and in like manner, ſhe ſhall have in London, or whereſoever ſhe ſhall make her abode, a public and capacious church near her palace, wherein all duties may be ſolemnly celebrated, and all other things neceſſary for the public preaching of God's word, the celebration and adminiſtration of all the ſacraments of the catholic Roman church, and for burial of the dead, and baptizing of children. That the ſaid oratory, chapel and church, ſhall be adorned with ſuch decency, as ſhall ſeem convenient to the moſt gracious infanta.

VI. That the men ſervants and maid ſervants of the moſt gracious infanta, and their ſervants, children, and deſcendants, and all their families, of what ſort ſoever, ſerving her highneſs, may be freely and publicly catholics.

VII. That the moſt gracious infanta, her ſervants and family, may live as catholics in form following: that the moſt gracious infanta ſhall have in her palace, her oratory and chapel ſo ſpacious, that her ſaid ſervants and family may enter and ſtay therein; in which there ſhall be an ordinary and public door for them, and another inward door, by which the infanta may have a paſſage into the ſaid chapel, where ſhe and others, as aboveſaid, may be preſent at divine offices.

VIII. That the chapel, church and oratory, may be beautified with decent ornaments of altars, and other things neceſſary for divine ſervice, which is to be celebrated in them, according to the cuſtom of the holy Roman church; and that it ſhall be lawful for the ſaid ſervants and others, to go to the ſaid chapel and church at all hours, as to them ſhall ſeem expedient.

IX. That the care and cuſtody of the ſaid chapel and church, ſhall be committed to ſuch as the lady infanta ſhall appoint, to whom it ſhall be lawful to appoint keepers, that no body may enter into them to do any indecent thing.

X. That to the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, and to ſerve in chapel and church aforeſaid, there ſhall be four and twenty prieſts and aſſiſtants, who ſhall ſerve weekly or monthly, as to the infanta ſhall ſeem fit; and the election of them ſhall belong to the lady infanta, and the catholic king, provided that they be none of the vaſſals of the king of Great Britain; and if they be, his will and conſent is to be firſt obtained.

XI. That there be one ſuperior miniſter or biſhop, with neceſſary authority upon all occaſions which ſhall happen belonging to religion; and for want of a biſhop, that his vicar may have his authority and juriſdiction.

XII. That this biſhop or ſuperior miniſter may correct and chaſtiſe all Roman catholics who ſhall offend, and ſhall exerciſe upon them all juriſdiction eccleſiaſtical: and moreover alſo, the lady infanta ſhall have power to put them out of her ſervice, whenſoever it ſhall ſeem expedient to her.

XIII. That it may be lawful for the lady infanta and her ſervants to procure from Rome diſpenſations, indulgences, jubilees, and all graces as ſhall ſeem fit to their religion and conſciences, and to get and make uſe of any manner of catholic books whatſoever.

XIV. That the ſervants and family of the lady infanta, who ſhall come into England, ſhall take the oath of allegiance to the king of Great Britain: provided, that there be no clauſe therein which ſhall be contrary to their conſciences, and the Roman catholic religion; and if they happen to be vaſſals to the king of Great Britain, they ſhall take the ſame oath that the Spaniards do.

XV. That the laws which are or ſhall be in England againſt religion, ſhall not take hold of the ſaid ſervants; and only the foreſaid ſuperior eccleſiaſtical catholic may proceed againſt eccleſiaſtical perſons, as hath been accuſtomed by catholics: and if any ſecular judge ſhall apprehend any eccleſiaſtical perſon for any offence, he ſhall forthwith cauſe him to be delivered to the aforeſaid ſuperior eccleſiaſtic, who ſhall proceed againſt him according to the canon law.

XVI. That the laws made againſt catholics in England, or in any other kingdom of the king of Great Britain, ſhall not extend to the children of this marriage; and though they be catholics, they ſhall not loſe the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdom and dominions of Great Britain.

XVII. That the nurſes which ſhall give ſuck to the children of the lady infanta (whether they be of the kingdom of Great Britain, or of any other nation whatſoever), ſhall be choſen by the lady infanta, as ſhe pleaſeth, and ſhall be accounted of her family, and enjoy the privileges thereof.

XVIII. That the biſhop, eccleſiaſtical and religious perſons of the family of the lady infanta, ſhall wear the veſtments and habit habit of their dignity, profeſſion, and religion, after the cuſtom of Rome.

XIX. For ſecurity that the ſaid matrimony be not diſſolved for any cauſe whatſoever, the king and prince are equally to paſs the word and honour of a king; and moreover, that they will perform whatſoever ſhall be propounded by the catholic king for further confirmation, if it may be done decently and fitly.

XX. That the ſons and daughters which ſhall be born of this marriage, ſhall be brought up in the company of the moſt excellent infanta, at the leaſt, until the age of ten years, and ſhall freely enjoy the right of ſucceſſion to the kingdoms, as aforeſaid.

XXI. That whenſoever any place of either man ſervant or maid ſervant, which the lady infanta ſhall bring with her (nominated by the catholic king her brother), ſhall happen to be void, whether by death, or by other cauſe or accident, all the ſaid ſervants of her family are to be ſupplied by the catholic king, as aforeſaid.

XXII. For ſecurity that whatſoever is capitulated may be fulfilled, the king of Great Britain and prince Charles are to be bound by oath; and all the king's council ſhall confirm the ſaid treaty under their hands: moreover, the ſaid king and prince are to give their faiths in the word of a king, to endeavour, if poſſible, that whatſoever is capitulated may be eſtabliſhed by parliament.

XXIII. That conformable to this treaty, all theſe things propoſed, are to be allowed and approved of by the pope, that he may give an apoſtolical benediction, and a diſpenſation neceſſary to effect the marriage.

The king ratified theſe articles in the uſual form, and ſwore to obſerve them, before the two Spaniſh embaſſadors and twenty [n] privy-counſellors, who all ſigned the treaty. When the king came to take the oath, he had ſome diſpute with the embaſſadors. His majeſty would not give the pope the title of Holy Father, or His Holineſs, ſaying, he had wrote againſt this title, and it was unreaſonable to make him retract. But the embaſſadors inſiſting upon it, the king yielded at laſt, not thinking he ought, for ſuch a trifle, to retard a treaty, which had now been ſeven years on foot.

After publicly taking the oath, he withdrew into his cloſet, where, in preſence of the ſame embaſſadors, and ſome privy-counſellors, he ratified and ſwore to theſe four ſecret articles:

I. That particular laws made againſt Roman catholics, under which other vaſſals of our realms are not comprehended, and to whoſe obſervation all generally are not obliged; as likewiſe general laws, under which all are equally compriſed, if ſo be they are ſuch which are repugnant to the Romiſh religion, ſhall not at any time hereafter, by any means or chance whatſoever, directly or indirectly, be commanded to to be put in execution againſt the ſaid Roman catholics; and we will cauſe that our council ſhall take the ſame oath, as far as it pertains to them, and belongs to the execution, which by the hands of them and their miniſters, is to be exerciſed.

II. That no other laws ſhall hereafter be made anew againſt the ſaid Roman catholics, but that there ſhall be a perpetual toleration of the Roman catholic religion, within private houſes throughout all our realms and dominions, which we will have to be underſtood as well of our kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as in England; which ſhall be granted to them in manner and form, as is capitulated, decreed, and granted in the article of the treaty concerning the marriage.

III. That neither by us, nor any other interpoſed perſon whatſoever, directly or indirectly, privately or publicly, will we treat (or attempt) any thing with the moſt renowned lady infanta Donna Maria, which ſhall be repugnant to the Romiſh catholic religion; neither will we by any means perſuade her, that ſhe ſhould ever renounce or relinquiſh the ſame in ſubſtance or form, or that ſhe ſhould do any thing repugnant or contrary to thoſe things which are contained in the treaty of matrimony.

IV. That we and the prince of Wales will interpoſe our authority, and will do as much as in us ſhall lie, that the parliament ſhall approve, confirm, and ratify all and ſingular articles in favour of the Roman catholics, capitulated between the moſt renowned kings by reaſon of this marriage: and that the ſaid parliament ſhall revoke and abrogate particular laws made againſt the ſaid Roman catholics, to whoſe obſervance alſo the reſt of our ſubjects and vaſſals are not obliged: as likewiſe the general laws under which all are equally comprehended; to wit, as to the Roman catholics, if they be ſuch as is aforeſaid, which are repugnant to the Roman catholic religion: and that hereafter, we will not conſent that the ſaid parliament ſhould ever, at any time, enact or write any other new laws againſt the Roman catholics [o].

Theſe are the four articles which ſerved for foundation to the pope's diſpenſation: for, as the Congregation de Propagandâ ſaid, "The other articles are only to ſecure the infanta's religion; but there muſt be ſomething more for the catholics in general, before the diſpenſation can be granted." Nelſon and others pretend, thoſe four ſecret articles are fictitious, groundleſs, and even improbable. But, beſides that they follow very naturally from what was demanded by the Congregation de Propagandâ, and are manifeſtly alluded to in the archbiſhop's letter to the king, we ſhall ſee preſently a paper which leaves no room to doubt that the king had engaged to perform the contents of the four articles.

It is pretended, all theſe articles, as well public as private, ſigned by the king and privy council, with the great ſeal annexed, being brought to Spain, the prince of Wales made the following additions. But I confeſs, I do not find ſo ſtrong proofs of theſe additions, as of the foregoing articles. This depends upon the degree of credit, which the reader is willing to give the firſt publiſhers.

"Moreover, I Charles prince of Wales engage myſelf (and promiſe, that the moſt illuſtrious king of Great Britain my moſt honoured lord and father, ſhall do the ſame both by word and writing), that all thoſe things which are contained in the foregoing articles, and concern as well the ſuſpenſion as the abrogation of all laws made againſt the Roman catholics, ſhall within three years infallibly take effect, and ſooner, if it be poſſible, which we will have to lie upon our conſcience and royal honour: that I will intercede with the moſt illuſtrious king of Great Britain my father, that the ten years of the education of the children which ſhall be born of this marriage, with the moſt illuſtrious lady infanta their mother, accorded in the 23d Art. (which term the pope of Rome deſires to have prorogued to twelve years) may be lengthened to the ſaid term: and I promiſe freely and of my own accord, and ſwear, that if it ſo happen, that the entire power of diſpoſing of this matter be devolved to me, I will alſo grant and approve the ſaid term. Furthermore, I prince of Wales oblige myſelf, upon my faith to the catholic king, that as often as the moſt illuſtrious lady infanta ſhall require, that I ſhould give ear to divines or others, whom her highneſs ſhall be pleaſed to employ in matter of the Roman catholic religion, I will hearken to them willingly without all difficulty, laying aſide all excuſe. And for further caution in point of the free exerciſe of the catholic religion, and the ſuſpenſion of the law above named, I Charles prince of Wales, promiſe and take upon me in the word of a king, that the things above promiſed and treated concerning thoſe matters, ſhall take effect, and be put in execution, as well in the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as of England."

This was the effect of the prince's and Buckingham's journey to Spain; a journey not only needleſs, but even pernicious, as may eaſily be ſeen by all the additions made to the articles ſettled by the earl of Briſtol. The king was ſo glad that he had finiſhed the affair of the marriage, that he defied all the devils in hell to break it [p]. As a grateful acknowledgment for his favourite's great ſervices, he ſent him a patent creating him duke of Buckingham. There was no other duke at that time in England [q].

The king's compliance in every thing he had ſigned and ratified was ſo great, that the Spaniards could hardly believe it ſincere. Some who knew the Engliſh conſtitution maintained, it was not in the king's power to perform his promiſes, or in caſe he attempted it, a rebellion would infallibly follow. Wherefore the king of Spain appointed a committee to take the matter into conſideration. The reſult of the debate was, that it was not proper to ſend the infanta to England before the next ſpring; that in this interval, the performance of the articles granted to the catholics, and their effects, might be aſſured. Upon this the Spaniſh embaſſadors

[q] He was created earl of Coventry, and duke of Buckingham: his patent bears date May 18. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVII. p. 497. James Hay, earl of Carliſle brought over the patent. The lord Kenſington, captain of the king's guard, came alſo to ſee the prince, as did the earl of Denbigh, Edward ſon and heir to Henry Montague viſcount Mandeville, the viſcount Rochford, and divers others of the nobility; and the prince was ſo incircled with a ſplendid retinue of his own nation, that it might be ſaid, there was an Engliſh court in the king of Spain's palace. The in England had orders to desire the king to begin to execute his engagements in favour of the catholics. This demand embarrassed him. What he had promised was secret, and not to be performed till after the marriage, and he was pressed to make it public by the execution, whilst the prince was still in Spain, This was a sort of menace that the marriage should not be solemnized, before he had given public marks of his sincerity. He knew a proclamation for granting the papists a toleration might be attended with ill consequences; that these consequences might break off the marriage, and the prince his son would be in danger of being detained in Spain. To free himself from this perplexity, he resolved to give the embassadors some satisfaction, by putting into their hands a declaration of his council, containing his intention about this affair. In all appearance, the embassadors were prevailed with to consent that the performance of it should be deferred, by reason of the accidents that might follow. The declaration was thus:

Salisbury, Aug. 7, 1623.

A declaration touching the pardons, suspensions, and dispensations, of the Roman catholics.

"FOR the satisfaction of their excellencies, the marquis Ynojosa and Don Carolus de Colonia, the lords embassadors for the king of Spain; and to the end it may appear that his majesty of Great Britain will presently and really put in execution the grace promised and intended to the Roman catholics his majesty's subjects, and of his own grace more than he is tied to by the articles of treaty of marriage [r].

"We do declare in his majesty's name, that his majesty's will and pleasure is, that a legal and authentical pardon shall be passed under the great seal, wherein shall be freely pardoned all those penalties, forfeitures and seizures, indictments, convictments and incumbrances whatsoever, whereunto the Roman catholics are liable, or have been proceeded against, or might be, as well priests as others, for matters of conscience only, and to which the rest of his majesty's subjects are not liable. And to the end his majesty may make himself clearly understood, where it shall happen that any of these forfeitures and pecuniary mulcts have been given away under his majesty's great seal, his majesty will not hide that it is not in his power so to made void those letters patents, except they be voidable by law; and then his majesty is well pleased that all Roman catholics may in those cases plead in law, if they find it good, and shall have equal and legal trial. And his majesty is likewise pleased, that his general pardon shall remain in being five years, to the end all that will may in that time take it out; and his majesty will give order for the comfort of the poorer sort, that the pardon shall not be costly, but such like course shall be taken as was in a like occasion at his majesty's coming into England; and that it shall be lawful to put as many as can be possible into one pardon.

"And we do farther declare, that his majesty's will and pleasure is, to the end the Roman catholics, his majesty's subjects, may have a present and a free fruition of as much as is intended them by the articles of treaty of marriage, to cause a present suspension under his majesty's seal of all those penal laws, charges, and forfeitures, whereunto the Roman catholic subjects of his majesty have heretofore been subject, and to which the rest of his majesty's subjects have not been liable; and in the same grant, and under the same seal, to give a dispensation and toleration to all the Roman catholics his majesty's subjects, as well priests, as temporal persons and others, of and from all the penalties, forfeitures, troubles, and incumbrances, which they have been or may be subject to, by reason of any statute or law whatsoever, to the observation whereof the rest of his majesty's subjects are not bound. We do likewise declare, that his majesty hath promised his royal word, that the execution shall be no ways burthensome or penal to the Roman catholics, but that for the manner of privileging and freeing them from that, he must confer with bishops and advocates, into which he will presently enter and expedite by all means.

"And we do further declare, That his majesty's intention is presently to pursue his former directions (which had been before executed if their excellencies had so thought good) to put under his seal severally the said pardon, and suspension, and dispensation; and that his majesty's attorney, and learned counsel, shall have referred to them the charge to pen them with all those effectual words, clauses, expressions, and reservations, which may presently give fruition to the Roman catholics his majesty's subjects, and make them inviolable in the fruition of all that is intended and promised by his majesty in the articles of marriage, and his majesty's further grace.

"And we do declare, That his majesty's further will and pleasure is, for the better satisfaction and discharge of the care and endeavour of their excellencies the embassadors, that it shall be lawful to them to assign a discreet person to entertain such sufficient lawyers as shall be thought fit to take care to the strength, validity, and security of the said grants: and his majesty's attorney shall have charge to receive and admit the said lawyers to the sight and judgment of the said draughts, and in any doubts to give them satisfaction, or to use such legal, necessary and pertinent words and phrases, as he the said lawyers shall propound for the security of the Roman catholics, and sure making of the said grants.

"And we do further declare, That his majesty's pleasure is, to make a dispatch into Ireland unto his deputy there, by the hands of the lord treasurer and secretary of state sir George Calvert, for the present confirming and sealing the things concerning the Roman catholics, answerable to the articles of treaty, his royal promise and proceedings here: And for Scotland, that his majesty, according to the constitution of his affairs there, and regard to the public good, and peace of that kingdom, and as soon as possible, will do all that shall be convenient for the accomplishment of his promise in grace and favour of the Roman catholics his subjects, conformable to the articles of treaty of marriage."

This declaration, signed by secretary Conway and some privy counsellors, who were most trusted by the king, was very probably sent to Spain as a pledge of the king's intention to perform his engagements. There it was that the earl of Bristol found means to wave either the original itself, or a copy, which he produced before the parliament in 1626, to shew what the duke of Buckingham had negotiated in Spain without his privity. It is manifest, first, That this declaration supposes the secret articles; secondly, That the earl of Bristol would not have ventured to produce it before the parliament, had he not been able to prove it no forgery [s].

Whilst these things passed in England, news came to Madrid of pope Gregory XV.'s death, which was a fresh obstacle to the conclusion of the marriage. When Cottington arrived from England with the ratification of the articles, the nuntio refused to deliver the dispensation, affirming, as the marriage was not yet celebrated, the deceased pope's dispensation was of no force, and therefore it was necessary to stay till there was a new pope, who might grant a valid dispensation. By this accident the prince of Wales saw himself detained in Spain till the election of a new pope. The 29th of August however was appointed for the celebration of the marriage, in a supposition, that before that time there would be a pope and a new dispensation.

Mean while, the restitution of the Palatinate was not talked of, or if mentioned, it was only by way of conversation, without any positive demand on the king of Spain, or his ministers. I have already shewn the reason. As to the temporal articles, they were in the same state as when the prince came to Madrid, and nothing signed on either side; so that if the dispensation arrived before the 29th of August, the marriage must have been either deferred, or solemnized before these articles were settled.

But the court of Spain was intent upon a project of greater consequence, namely, to endeavour to persuade the prince of Wales to turn catholic; and it is not very strange, they should hope to succeed, after what had passed. Besides, if we may believe the earl of Bristol in the impeachment he brought before the parliament against Buckingham, that duke gave the Spaniards too much reason to expect this pretended conversion. And to this alone is to be ascribed the delay of the dispensation. Urban VIII. who was chosen the 6th of August, would not have failed to send it, had he not waited for this happy event, which he strove to advance by his letters to the prince and the duke of Buckingham. This occasioned at last the breach of the marriage, after having been so long deferred.

I have very carefully searched after the real cause of this breach, but could never meet with any thing satisfactory. All agree, it was the duke of Buckingham that first inspired the prince, and afterwards the king, with the thought, but it is difficult to guess his motive, and what caused him to break his first measures and pursue a contrary course, so obscurely

[r] The treaty of the twenty-three articles contained no grant at all in favour of the catholics in general. Consequently this must relate to the secret articles of the same treaty. Rapin.

[s] In pursuance of this declaration, there was a general pardon drawn in as full and ample a manner as the papists themselves could desire; and two general commands were issued out, one to all judges, justices of peace, &c. and the other to all bishops, chancellors, and commissaries, not to execute any statute against recusants. But to this some stop was put, by the advice of the lord keeper Williams. See Rushworth, tom. I. p. 101. Cabala, p. 297. The bishop of Chalcedon came also into England to exercise jurisdiction over the catholics of that kingdom, and a chapel began to be built at St. James's for the infanta. Annals, p. 81.

The

is this point explained by the hiſtorians. Some ſay, the duke rendered himſelf contemptible and odious to the court of Spain, by affecting to follow the French faſhions, in almoſt every thing oppoſite to the Spaniſh: that for this reaſon, foreſeeing the infanta and the Spaniards would have great power at the court of England, he thought they might in the end do him ſome ill turn, and therefore reſolved to break off the match. Others ſay, Olivarez, favourite of Philip IV. reminding the duke of his promiſe that the prince ſhould turn catholic, the duke gave him the lye to his face, and from that time ſought means to retire from the Spaniſh court, for fear of the Condé's revenge. Some ſay, the queen of Bohemia, perceiving there was no likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by this marriage, and having much more reaſon to expect great advantages from a rupture between England and Spain, ſent a truſty meſſenger [t] to the duke, with certain offers, in caſe he would procure a breach. This is not improbable, and the Hollanders, to whom the union between Spain and England muſt have been prejudicial, might well be concerned in the project. In fine, the duke of Buckingham's greateſt favourers pretend, the duke having ſounded the king of Spain's intentions concerning the reſtitution of the Palatinate, found there was nothing to be expected, and therefore reſolved to break off a marriage, which was intended for no other purpoſe. It is certain at leaſt, the king, prince, and duke, made uſe of this pretence to juſtify the breach.

However, the duke of Buckingham having taken this reſolution, ſoon prevailed with the prince to agree to it, over whom he had now a very great aſcendant. There were two difficulties to be ſurmounted in the execution of this deſign. The firſt was, to obtain the king's conſent. The ſecond, to get the prince out of Spain. The duke muſt have been fully perſuaded of his power over the king, to hope to incline him at once to deſiſt from a deſign, he had ſo conſtantly purſued for ſeven years, at the very time all was concluded, and nothing wanting but the nuptial ceremonies. He deſpaired not however of ſucceeding, and therefore ſent him word, he had at laſt diſcovered the king of Spain's inſincerity; that not only he had no inclination to cauſe the Palatinate to be reſtored, but alſo was far from having the leaſt thought of accompliſhing the marriage, and the prince was in danger of being detained in Spain all his life. To ſupport what the duke ſaid, the prince himſelf wrote to the king his father, telling him, "He muſt now look upon his ſiſter and her children, never thinking more of him, and forgetting he ever had ſuch a ſon." The king fell, or rather threw himſelf into this ſnare, without the leaſt reflection, and immediately wrote to Buckingham to bring away the prince by all means. At the ſame time, he ſent ſome ſhips to St. Andero in Biſcay to take them on board.

The firſt difficulty being overcome, means were to be deviſed to quit Spain, and not give the court any ſuſpicion, which could not be done without wounding the prince's honour and conſcience. Happily for them, Urban VIII. had not yet ſent the diſpenſation, nor even fixed any time for it. So Buckingham notified to his catholic majeſty the order he had received to bring back the prince to England, his return being abſolutely neceſſary to remove the nation's jealouſy of his ſo long ſtay in Spain. Adding, his departure would cauſe no conſiderable alteration, ſince he would leave a proxy in the hands of any perſon his majeſty ſhould pleaſe to appoint, to eſpouſe the infanta in his name, as ſoon as the diſpenſation ſhould come. The king of Spain was a little ſurpriſed at the prince's deſign. However, as he did not deſire the infanta his ſiſter ſhould go before ſpring, he imagined, that after the eſpouſals, it would be more eaſy to detain her, than if the prince of Wales was actually in Spain, and therefore he very readily conſented to the prince's departure [u].

The only point therefore was to be aſſured of the celebration of the marriage, and the king himſelf deſired to be the prince's proxy jointly with prince Edward of Portugal. The proxy was drawn by the king's ſecretary, and the prince of Wales ſigning it in the preſence of ſeveral witneſſes, left it in the hands of the earl of Briſtol, with orders to deliver it to the king of Spain, ten days after the diſpenſation ſhould be received. This done, the duke of Buckingham departed firſt, under colour of preparing for the prince's reception on board the Engliſh fleet at St. Andero. The court ſaw him depart without any concern, or rather with a ſatisfaction equal to his impatience to be in a place of ſecurity. After his departure all imaginable honours were paid to the prince. The king himſelf conducted him to the Eſcurial [x], where he received and feaſted him as a prince that was to be very ſhortly his brother-in-law. I ſhall not give a particular account of all the civilities that were ſhown him. It will ſuffice to ſay, that on the very day of his departure, he ſolemnly ſwore again to the articles of the marriage, and then left the proxy with the earl of Briſtol, of which one of the ſecretaries of ſtate made an authentic act, which was ſigned by ſeveral witneſſes.

The prince went away, loaded with honours, careſſes, preſents, and attended by ſeveral lords of the court, who waited upon him to the fleet [y]. He was no ſooner come there, but he diſpatched to the earl of Briſtol Mr. Edward Clarke, one of Buckingham's creatures, with poſitive orders not to deliver the proxy till ſecurity was given him that the infanta, after the eſpouſals, would not betake herſelf to a cloyſter, and to ſend him word before the delivery of the proxy what ſecurity was offered, that he might be judge himſelf, whether it was proper to accept it. This was the firſt artifice uſed by the prince to gain time, in the fear that the diſpenſation would come, and the marriage be ſolemnized before the king his father was determined to break it. The earl of Briſtol not yet perceiving the intent of the order he had received, was afraid if he ſhould ſtay to the laſt, it might be an obſtacle to the conſummation of the marriage. He thought proper therefore to take care before the diſpenſation ſhould arrive, to know what ſecurity the court of Spain would give concerning the prince's ſcruple. He received as ſatisfactory an anſwer as he could wiſh, which he conveyed to the king and the prince by a letter.

The prince and the duke arrived on the 5th of October at Portſmouth, and from thence poſted to Royſton, where the king was. It ſeems they durſt not immediately diſcover their deſign to the king about the breach of the marriage, but thought fit to take ſome precautions, to render it leſs ſtrange to him. What makes me think this, is that the earl of Briſtol's letter coming ſoon after, the king wrote to him the 8th of October, that he was ſatisfied with the ſecurity offered by the court of Spain. The prince, who probably had not yet prepared all his batteries, concealing his deſign, wrote likewiſe to the earl of Briſtol the following letter, which no doubt was to be ſeen by the king his father:

"Your letter to the king and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Lawrence, hath ſo ſatisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to ſtick upon it, but leave it to your diſcretion to take what ſecurity you ſhall think fitting."

The prince however was in danger of the diſpenſation's arriving at Madrid, before the earl of Briſtol ſhould have received a poſitive order not to deliver the proxy, ſince in that caſe, he would have been forced to execute what was enjoined him by the prince himſelf when he left the Eſcurial. But this riſk was to be run, there being no avoiding it, before the king was determined to a breach. It is true, himſelf and the duke had now begun to fill the king with doubts concerning the reſtitution of the Palatinate. Wherefore the king, in his letter of the 8th of October, wrote to the earl of Briſtol, that he hoped to receive before Chriſtmas the agree-

[u] It has by ſome been wondered at, that the king of Spain ſhould be ſo willing to let the prince go, when it was in his power to have kept him as long as he pleaſed, and make what advantage of it he had a mind to. But this point is cleared by the remark with which Spanhemius ſums up what relates to the Spaniſh affair, "That never prince was more obliged to a ſiſter, than king Charles the firſt was to the queen of Bohemia; ſince it was only the conſideration of her and her children, who were then the next heirs after him to the crown of England, that prevailed with the court of Spain to permit him to ſee England again." Welwood, p. 28. There is to this purpoſe a pleaſant jeſt in Coke's reign of King James I. His majeſty, a little after the prince's departure for Spain, being in one of his penſive modes, Archy his buffoon comes in, and tells him, he muſt change caps with him: Why? ſays the king. Why, who (replies Archy) ſent the prince into Spain? But what (anſwered the king) wilt thou ſay if the prince comes back again? Why then (ſaid Archy) I will take my cap from thy head, and ſend it to the king of Spain: which it is ſaid troubled the king ſore. But his catholic majeſty did not care to do any thing that ſhould help the elector Palatine or his heirs to the crown of England. Coke, p. 131.

[x] The Eſcurial lies about eighteen miles from Madrid. It is reckoned one of the moſt magnificent ſtructures in Europe. The Spaniards call it the eighth wonder of the world. This mighty fabric was built by Philip II. in the form of a gridiron (the emblem and inſtrument of St. Lawrence's martyrdom, to whom it was dedicated) the handle whereof is the king's palace, and the ſquare of the gridiron is divided into twelve ſpacious quadrangles, in which are arched cloyſters, one above, the other below, all dedicated to religious orders, who live like princes rather than prieſts, with each his man and his mule. In the middle of the ſquare ſtands a magnificent cathedral, to which Philip IV. added a chapel for the ſepulchre of ſuch kings and queens as leave iſſue behind them, who lie in curious coffins of black marble, which are placed in arches round the marble wall. The chapel is built in the form of the Pantheon. See Wilſon, p. 775.

[y] The prince departed from Madrid September 9, and came to St. Andero the 11th. The fleet (ſent to convoy him over to England, and which conſiſted of eight men of war and two pinnaces, whereof Edward earl of Rutland was admiral) ſailed from St. Andero the 18th, and put into Scilly iſlands the 29th. able news both of his ſon's marriage, and ſon-in-law's reſtoration [z]. Though this was not an expreſs order to demand the Palatinate before the eſpouſals, the earl of Briſtol thought proper however to take ſome care of an affair, ſo much neglected during the prince's ſtay in Spain, and even ſince the marriage articles were ſettled. He mentioned it therefore to Olivarez, and made him engage, the proxy ſhould not be demanded till a written promiſe was put into his hands that the Palatinate ſhould be reſtored. Of this he informed the king in a letter of the 23d of November, wherein he told him he hoped by Chriſtmas, he ſhould congratulate the prince his ſon and the princeſs his daughter, the one upon his marriage, the other upon the end of her ſufferings.

It muſt be obſerved, the prince of Wales, before he left Spain, had uſed an artifice to gain time, knowing he could not break off the marriage without the king's conſent. He had cauſed it to be inſerted in the proxy, that it ſhould remain in force only till Chriſtmas. He hoped the diſpenſation would not arrive before that time, or if it came but a few days before, the proxy would be uſeleſs. And indeed, as the earl of Briſtol was not to deliver it till ten days after the arrival of the diſpenſation at Madrid, if the tenth day was after Chriſtmas-day, the proxy would be of no force, by virtue of the inſerted clauſe. But this precaution was not ſufficient, becauſe the diſpenſation might happen to be at Madrid above ten days before Chriſtmas. This obliged the prince and the duke at length to diſcover their minds to the king. Whether James yielded to their reaſons, or, out of an exceſſive condeſcenſion for his ſon and favourite, would not grieve them by a denial, he wrote to the earl of Briſtol the 13th of November, expreſly ordering him not to deliver the proxy till after Chriſtmas: that is, when it was no longer valid. Moreover, he enjoined him not to diſcover this order to the court of Spain till the very laſt. This letter was ſent to the earl by three [a] ſeveral meſſengers, two by land, and one by ſea, for fear of accidents. It came in a critical time, for the diſpenſation arrived at Madrid the beginning of December, new ſtile [b], and the king's letter the 13th of November, old ſtile. Upon the receipt of the diſpenſation, Philip immediately ordered all the neceſſary preparations for the eſpouſals to be made [c]. But when the ten days were expired, and the marriage was expected to be ſolemnized, the earl of Briſtol notified to him the king his maſter's orders, not to deliver the proxy till after Chriſtmas. He eaſily perceived the king of England's intention, ſince the proxy would then be invalid. That very day he ſent to the earl of Briſtol to demand no more audience, and ordered that the infanta ſhould be no longer called the princeſs of Wales, as ſhe had been ever ſince the arrival of the diſpenſation, and cauſed all preparations for the marriage to ceaſe. Mean while, to caſt all the blame on the king of England, he ſent the earl of Briſtol on the 8th of January 1624, a written promiſe, ſigned with his own hand, whereby he engaged to cauſe the Palatinate to be reſtored to the elector Palatine. This the earl of Briſtol, in the following reign, affirmed before the parliament in his defence.

There is ſcarce an Engliſh hiſtorian but what affirms, the want of this reſtitution was the cauſe of the breach of the marriage, and that the earl of Briſtol having demanded it of his catholic majeſty, as a condition without which the marriage could not be accompliſhed, Philip coldly anſwered, "The Palatinate was none of his to give, and the emperor might be applied to." But this is directly contrary to the earl of Briſtol's own account, who doubtleſs knew more of the affair than any other. The earl of Clarendon took care not to ſpeak like the reſt. He contents himſelf with aſcribing the breach to ſome ſecret deſign of Buckingham.

Thus ended the affair of the Spaniſh marriage, which had wholly employed king James for ſeven years. During all that time, he moſt earneſtly ſollicited the concluſion of it, and to ſucceed, ſcrupled not to ſacrifice the intereſts of his ſon-in-law, his own reputation, the religion he profeſſed, the good of his people, and the laws of his realm. But when at laſt it was going to be concluded, he ſuddenly broke it off, for reaſons which were never yet clearly known. It can only be aſcribed to his weakneſs for his favourite. The earl of Clarendon ſays poſitively, the king was compelled to it by the duke of Buckingham, "who, in breaking the marriage, reſumed the ſame impetuoſity, he had indulged to himſelf in the debate of the journey into Spain." He adds, "the king plainly found the prince and duke were reſolved upon a breach, with or without his approbation, and that he never forgave the duke what he had done, but retained as ſharp a memory of it as his nature could contain." It is to be preſumed, the earl of Clarendon was well acquainted with this affair, and the more, as he is not the only writer that intimates, the king had neither the power nor the courage to withſtand the prince and duke, who were ſtrictly united ſince their journey to Spain [d].

[1624] Mean time, for fear the earl of Briſtol ſhould by ſome means renew a treaty broken with ſo little reaſon, they cauſed him to be recalled. The king conſented the more readily to his return, as he ſaw no perſon in his court able to give him good counſels to free himſelf from the ſlavery he was under, but the earl of Briſtol, who never yielded to Buckingham's haughtineſs. This had drawn upon him the favourite's enmity to ſuch a degree, that ever after he was continually expoſed to his perſecutions and the prince's indignation, who following Buckingham's ſuggeſtions, forgot nothing to ruin him, even when he had mounted the throne, though without being able to ſucceed.

After the return of the prince and duke, the king no longer ruled, all his affairs were managed by them, and he only executed their counſels. The king ſaw about him none he could truſt. All his officers, all his courtiers, were the duke's creatures, and the more attached to him, as they ſaw him ſtrictly united with the prince. In this ſituation, the king ſaw no other remedy than to ſurrender himſelf entirely to them, and do whatever they pleaſed, whether he feared an increaſe of their boldneſs by reſiſtance, or waited for ſome favourable opportunity to throw off their yoke. Not only the breach of their marriage had been reſolved between them, but alſo a war with Spain, and the king durſt not contradict them, notwithſtanding his averſion to arms. Their firſt project was to demand for this war a benevolence of every ſubject; nay, they made the king ſign an order to levy it. Baker ſays, in his Chronicle, he himſelf paid fifty pounds on this occaſion. But on a ſudden, the king, by advice of the prince and Buckingham, gave over the project, and reſolved to call a parliament. That was indeed the moſt proper way to juſtify the breach of the treaty with Spain, and to procure money, which he wanted extremely.

There was not one good Engliſhman but what had ever conſidered the Spaniſh match as very prejudicial to the kingdom. It was known in general, that the king, in favour of this marriage, had made large conceſſions with reſpect to religion, though the particulars, and eſpecially the ſecret articles, were known to very few. But the king's condeſcenſion to the Roman catholics was a plain indication, the court of Spain had greatly prevailed with him. The duke of Buckingham not being ignorant of the people's averſion to the marriage, the breach whereof was not yet well known, doubted not to gain their affection, by cauſing a parliament to be called, and declaring himſelf the author of this happy breach, ſo paſſionately deſired by all true Engliſhmen. To compaſs his ends, he rendered himſelf popular, and affected to careſs both the church and ſtate-puritans; nay, he conſulted with Dr. John Preſton, head of the puritan party, how the king might ſeize the dean and chapter lands. Nothing

[c] The king of Spain had ſent into England, Don Mendoſa de Alcorcana, to congratulate the prince's ſafe return, and from thence he had inſtructions to go and make known to all princes and potentates, allies to Spain, how near the marriage was. When the diſpenſation came, bonfires were made throughout all Spain, the 19th of December was fixed for the wedding-day, preſents were provided for our king and prince, the infanta's family was ſettled, and the beginning of March appointed for her coming over into England, &c. Wilſon, p. 776.

[d] In February this year, a cruel ſcene was acted at Amboyna in the Eaſt-Indies, of which this account is given. A treaty was concluded in 1619, between England and the United Provinces, whereby, among other things, it was agreed, that in regard of the great blood-ſhed and coſt, pretended to be beſtowed by the Hollanders, in winning the trade of the iſles of the Moluccaes, Banda, and Amboyna, from the Spaniards and Portugueſe, the Hollanders ſhould enjoy two-thirds of that trade, and the Engliſh the other third. (See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XVII. p. 170, &c.) In purſuance of this agreement, Engliſh factories were placed at the Moluccaes, and at Banda, and Amboyna. This laſt iſle is the principal place in the Eaſt-Indies, where nutmegs, mace, cinnamon, cloves, and ſpice grow. Here the Engliſh had been ſettled but about two years, when the Dutch, in order to deprive them of their ſhare of the ſpice trade, pretended a plot was formed between the Engliſh and the natives, to get poſſeſſion of the Dutch fort at Amboyna. Whereupon the Engliſh were tortured by the Dutch, both with fire and water, in a moſt cruel and barbarous manner; and, on February 27, captain Gabriel Towerſon, and nine other Engliſh, with nine Japaneſe, and one Portugueſe, were ignominiouſly executed for this pretended conſpiracy, though they proteſted their innocency to the laſt. For this inſolent affront, no reparation was obtained till the year 1654, when Cromwell made the Dutch pay 300,000l. upon that account. See Relation of the Proceedings againſt the Engliſh at Amboyna, printed in 1624, and Coke, p. 141.

The

could be more proper to procure him the love of the people, moſt of the clergy having rendered themſelves odious, by their zeal in maintaining the prerogative-royal [d]. So, the juncture being very favourable, the duke cauſed the king to call a parliament, notwithſtanding his reſolution never to ſummon another; nay, ſuch was his power over the king, that he made him ſpeak to the parliament in a manner the moſt repugnant to his opinions and principles.

Mean while, the prince and the duke had contrived another project, namely, the prince's marriage with Henrietta-Maria, the king of France's ſiſter, to which his majeſty readily conſented. He was ſo proud of his grandeur, that he could not think of marrying his ſon to any but a princeſs of royal extraction, and the third daughter of Henry IV. was the only princeſs then in Europe of that character. It is very probable, the perſon ſent by the queen of Bohemia to Buckingham in Spain, made him the firſt overture of this match, and that the duke thereupon reſolved to break the marriage the prince was going to conſummate with the infanta. However this be, the king approving the project, Henry Rich, baron of Kenſington, was, on ſome pretence, ſent to France, in order to ſound the court concerning this marriage; and before his departure, he was created earl of Holland. I ſhall ſpeak preſently of the ſucceſs of this negotiation; but muſt firſt ſee what paſſed in the parliament which met the 19th of February [e]. The king made a ſpeech to both houſes ſo different from thoſe to the two former parliaments, that ſuch oppoſite expreſſions could hardly be thought to come from the mouth of the ſame prince, if it was not known how great an aſcendant Buckingham had over him, and how neceſſary it was to the favourite's deſigns that the king ſhould talk in this manner. As the ſpeech is not ſo long as the others, the reader perhaps will be glad to ſee it.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have aſſembled you at this time, to impart to you a ſecret, and matter of as great importance, as can be to my ſtate, and the ſtate of my children; wherein I crave your beſt and ſafeſt advice and council, according as the writ whereby you were aſſembled, imports, 'That the king would adviſe with you in matters concerning his eſtate and dignity.' And as I have ever endeavoured, by this and the like ways, to procure and cheriſh the love of my people towards me, ſo I do hope, and my hope is exceeded by faith; for I fully now believe, that never any king was more beloved of his people; whom as you, my lords and gentlemen, do here repreſent, ſo would I have you truly to repreſent all their loves to me; that in you, as in a true mirror or glaſs, I may perfectly behold it, and not as in a falſe glaſs that repreſents it not at all, or otherwiſe than it is indeed. Give me your free and faithful counſels in the matter I propoſed, of which you have often heard, the match of my ſon: wherein, as you may know, I have ſpent much time with great coſt in long treaties, deſiring always therein (and not without reaſon hoping to have effected my deſires) the advancement of my ſtate and children, and the general peace of Chriſtendom, wherein I have always conſtantly laboured, depending upon fair hopes and promiſes. At the earneſt inſtance of my ſon, I was contented (although it was of an extraordinary nature) to ſend him to proſecute his deſires in Spain; and for his more ſafety, ſent Buckingham (in whom I ever repoſed moſt truſt of my perſon) with him, with this command, 'continually to be preſent with him, and never to leave him, till he had returned again ſafely unto me.' Which he performed, though not with that effect in the buſineſs that I expected, yet not altogether without profit; for it taught me this point of wiſdom, 'qui verſatur in generalibus,' is eaſily deceived, and that generality brings nothing to good iſſue; but that before any matter can be fully finiſhed, it muſt be brought to particulars: for, when, as I thought, the affair had been, before their going, produced to a narrow point, relying upon their general propoſitions, I found, when they came there, the matter proved to be ſo raw, as if it had never been treated of; the generals giving them eaſy way to invade, and affording them means to avoid the effecting of any thing [f].

"The particulars that paſſed in the treaty, I mean not now to diſcover to you, the time being too ſhort; I refer you to Charles and Buckingham, and the ſecretaries reports, who ſhall relate unto you all the particulars. And after that, 'Super totam materiam', I deſire your beſt aſſiſtance to adviſe me what is beſt and fitteſt for me to do, for the good of the commonwealth, and the advancement of religion, and the good of my ſon, and my grandchildren of the Palatinate. And of our eſtate, I know you cannot but be ſenſible, conſidering that your welfare conſiſts in ours, and you ſhall be ſure to have your ſhare in what miſery ſhall befal us: and therefore I need to urge no other arguments to you in this behalf, in offering me your wiſeſt and ſureſt counſel and furtherance. And I aſſure you in the faith of a chriſtian king, that it is 'res integra,' preſented unto you, and that I ſtand not bound, nor either way engaged, but remain free to follow what ſhall be beſt adviſed.

"To plant is not ſufficient, unleſs like good gardeners, you pluck up the weeds that will choak your labours: and the greateſt weeds among you are jealouſies; root them out. For my actions, I dare avow them before God; but jealouſies are of a ſtrange depth. I am the huſband, and you the wife, and it is ſubject to the wife to be jealous of her huſband: let this be far from you. I can truly ſay, and will avouch it before the ſeat of God and angels, that never king governed with a purer, ſincerer, and more uncorrupt heart than I have done, far from all will and meaning of the leaſt error or imperfection of my reign.

"It hath been talked of my remiſſneſs in maintenance of religion, and ſuſpicion of a toleration; but as God ſhall judge me, I never thought nor meant, nor ever in word expreſſed any thing that ſavoured of it [g]. It is true, that at times, for reaſons beſt known to myſelf, I did not ſo fully put thoſe laws in execution, but did wink and connive at ſome things, which might have hindered more weighty affairs: but I never in all my treaties ever agreed to any thing to the overthrow and diſagreeing of thoſe laws, but had in all a chief preſervation of that truth which I have ever profeſſed; and as in that reſpect I have a charitable conceit of you, I would have you have the like of me alſo, in which I did not tranſgreſs: for it is a good horſeman's part, not always to uſe his ſpurs, and keep ſtrait the reins, but ſometimes to uſe the ſpurs, and ſuffer the reins more remiſs; ſo it is the part of a wiſe king, and my age and experience in government hath informed me, ſometimes to quicken the laws with ſtreight executions, and at other times, upon juſt occaſions, to be more remiſs. And I would alſo remove from your thoughts all jealouſies, that I might or ever did queſtion or infringe any of your lawful liberties or privileges, but I proteſt before God, I ever intended you ſhould enjoy the fulneſs of all thoſe that former times give good warrant and teſtimony of, which, if need be, I will enlarge and amplify.

"Therefore I would have you, as I have in this place heretofore told you, as St. Paul did Timothy, avoid genealogies and curious queſtions, and nice querks and jerks of law, and idle innovations; and if you miniſter me no juſt occaſion, I never yet was, nor ever ſhall be curious or captious to quarrel with you; but I deſire you to avoid all doubts and hindrances, and to compoſe yourſelves ſpeedily and quietly to this weighty affair I have propoſed; for that I have found already, delays have proved dangerous, and have bred diſtraction of this buſineſs; and I would not have you by other occaſions to neglect or protract it. God is my judge, I ſpeak it as a chriſtian king, never any wayfaring man, that was in the deſerts of Arabia, and in danger of death for want of water to quench this thirſt, more deſired water, than I thirſt and deſire the good and comfortable ſucceſs of this parliament, and bleſſing of your councils, that the good iſſue of this may expiate and acquit the fruitleſs iſſue of the former. And I pray God, your counſels may advance religion, and the public weal, and the good of me and my children."

This ſpeech, like the reſt made by the king to his parliament, was liable to many cenſures which reflected on his ſincerity. It could not be conceived that he really believed he was more beloved by his people than any of his predeceſſors, ſince no king had ſo frequently quarrelled with his parliament, which ſurely is no proper way to gain the peoples affection.

[d] The duke of Buckingham propoſed alſo the ſelling the remainder of the crown-lands; but this project was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the lord-keeper Williams, and accordingly laid aſide. Hacket, p. 202.

[e] The parliament it ſeems was to meet the 12th of February, but the king that morning miſſing Lodowick Stewart duke of Richmond (created ſo May 17, in the 21ſt of James I.) and ſending in haſte for him, his ducheſs goes to his bedſide to wake him, and drawing the curtain, found him dead in his bed. Upon news whereof the king would not adorn himſelf that day, and put off the parliament till the 16th, and afterwards till the 19th. His body was interred in Henry VII.'s chapel: leaving no iſſue, his eſtate and honours deſcended to his brother Eſme Stuart. Howes, p. 1035. Dugdale's Baron. vol. II. p. 426. Wilſon.

[f] All this can relate only to the Palatinate, for the treaty of marriage was really concluded before the prince's voyage to Spain. Rapin.

[g] The archbiſhop's letter to the king, and the council's declaration to the Spaniſh embaſſadors, not to mention the marriage articles, public and private, evidently ſhew the contrary. But the king has this hole to creep out at here; that he conſidered what he had done, and what he intended to do for the catholics, only as a ſuſpenſion of the penalties, and not as a real toleration. Rapin.

The

Thoſe who were acquainted with the ſtate of affairs, thought it very ſtrange, the king ſhould tell the parliament, that at the prince's arrival in Spain, the affair was ſo raw as if it had been never treated of, ſince he had already ſigned the marriage articles, and as to the Palatinate, would not have it mentioned before the marriage was accompliſhed. The ſame perſons could not forbear wondering, he ſhould take God to witneſs, he never ſo much as thought or intended to grant a toleration to the papiſts, ſince it was one of the ſecret articles of the marriage, and ſince without being informed of ſuch an article, it was eaſy to perceive, Philip gave his ſiſter to the prince of Wales ſolely with that view. In fine, ſome malicious perſons obſerved, that when the king ſaid, he never intended to invade the peoples liberties, the ſimile might very juſtly be applied to him, which himſelf had uſed on another occaſion, of the perſon who took a man's purſe, aſſuring him he had no deſign to rob him.

A few days after the king had delivered his ſpeech, the two houſes reſolving upon a conference to examine the affair recommended by the king, the prince and Buckingham came and informed them of all particulars. After the prince had ſaid a few words, the duke of Buckingham began and made a long ſpeech, which he divided into ſix heads, under colour of more clearly explaining the affair, but in reality to confound it, and conceal the mutual coherence of the particulars he was to relate. Under the firſt head, he ſet forth the motives of the prince's journey to Spain. In the ſecond, he ſpoke of the negotiation of the marriage apart by itſelf. In the third, he joined together the two affairs of the marriage and Palatinate. In the fourth, he declared the reaſons of the prince's return. In the fifth, he informed the parliament of his majeſty's ſubſequent proceedings in the affairs of the marriage and Palatinate ſince the prince's return. In the ſixth and laſt, he ſtated the queſtion, wherein both houſes were to offer to his majeſty their advice and council. Whilſt he was ſpeaking, he turned, at the end of every point, to the prince, aſking him whether what he was ſaying was not true, to which the prince did not fail to anſwer, "Yes, it is true," or to the like effect. The intent of this whole ſpeech was to ſhew, the king had been unadviſedly engaged in the treaty of the marriage by the falſe hopes given him by the earl of Briſtol: that the court of Spain never intended the marriage, much leſs the reſtitution of the Palatinate, though the earl of Briſtol aſſured the contrary: that the prince had been ill uſed in Spain, and much preſſed to turn catholic: in a word, he intimated that the earl of Briſtol was only to blame, who had abuſed his majeſty's confidence. Nothing is more eaſy than to accuſe an abſent perſon. It is only concealing what makes for him, giving an ill turn to his moſt innocent actions, aggravating his faults he may have committed, and loading him with crimes he is not guilty of. This is preciſely what the duke of Buckingham did in reſpect to the earl of Briſtol, with the prince's approbation and aid. This is ſo true, that two years after, the prince being in the throne, and having himſelf accuſed the earl of high-treaſon, the earl in his defence to the parliament, gave a quite different narrative of the Spaniſh negotiation from that of the duke of Buckingham. He proved what he ſaid by unexceptionable papers, and defied the duke to anſwer them. He not only affirmed, that the duke's whole narration was falſe, but alſo impeached him in form, and gave in his impeachment to the houſe of lords, which remained unanſwered. This is ſufficient to ſhew the falſeneſs of the duke of Buckingham's narrative. So I think it needleſs to enlarge any more upon the ſubject [h].

The duke of Buckingham's ſpeech was received however with applauſe, for ſeveral reaſons: Firſt, he had made a party in the two houſes. Secondly, he had prevented the conſummation of the marriage in Spain, which was very grateful to the nation and parliament. In the third place, he had brought home the prince, contrary to all expectation, and ſo removed the juſt fears of the Engliſh. Finally, the duke of Buckingham's narrative being atteſted by the prince himſelf, it could not be thought falſe. As the public was not informed of the ſecret circumſtances of the negotiation, it is no wonder the parliament ſhould believe what they were told by the king, prince, and duke. But afterwards, when all was diſcovered, people were of another ſentiment.

The Spaniſh embaſſador being informed of what paſſed at the conference between the two houſes, demanded an audience of the king, and boldly complained, that the duke had reflected on the king of Spain's honour [i]. Adding, if a ſubject of his maſter had ſpoken thus of the king of England, it would coſt him his head. Probably, the embaſſador had been miſinformed, ſince the duke had not uſed any offenſive expreſſions againſt the king of Spain. He had only inſinuated, that Philip's intention was always to amuſe the king and the prince. As the duke of Buckingham was now the parliament's favourite, as well as the king's and prince's, both houſes openly took his part, and preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, declaring, the duke had ſaid nothing which could give offence to the king of Spain, and thanked the duke for his faithful relation atteſted by the prince. The king was ſo pleaſed with this addreſs, that he went and thanked the two houſes in a ſpeech, where he forgot not to proclaim the praiſes of his favourite. He ſaid, he could not doubt the truth of his narrative, becauſe he made the ſame to himſelf at his return from Spain. But the king muſt have been wilfully blind not to ſee the falſeneſs of the duke's narrative, or been ſtrangely kept under by the favourite, if he was made to atteſt before the parliament what he knew to be falſe.

The parliament was extremely pleaſed to ſee the king diſpoſed to break the Spaniſh match, not knowing, or feigning not to know, it was really broken, by the affront put upon the king of Spain. But the king having affirmed, it was yet Res integra, the two houſes could not ſay otherwiſe. So forgetting all former occaſions of diſcontent, and applying themſelves wholly to the affair propoſed by the king, they jointly preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, to adviſe him to diſcontinue the treaty begun with Spain, as well for the reſtitution of the Palatinate as for the marriage. They grounded their advice upon four principal reaſons: the firſt was, that in the beginning of the treaty, the Spaniards inſiſted only upon liberty of conſcience to the infanta and her family, with the free exerciſe of religion. But that afterwards, taking advantage of the prince's being in their power, they importuned a general toleration, contrary to the uſage of other catholic princes in the like treaties. That beſides, the popiſh faction had increaſed to ſuch a degree, during the negotiation, that there was no way to ſuppreſs them as long as the treaty continued.

The ſecond reaſon was, that, during the treaty, the proteſtant party in Germany was oppreſſed, and the Palatinate invaded: that the Spaniards had deluded the king, and offered indignity to the prince, by importuning him to change his religion, contrary to the law of hoſpitality and the privilege of princes.

The third was grounded upon the inſincerity of the Spaniards, as well in the former overture of marriage for the late prince Henry as in this; upon the ſcornful propoſition made to the king, of the prince's turning catholic; and upon the deceit uſed in the treaty of Bruſſels, the ſole end whereof was to cauſe Heidelberg to be taken.

Laſtly, the parliament added as a fourth reaſon, the tranſlation of the electorate to the duke of Bavaria; the king of Spain's letter to Condé Olivarez, with the Condé's anſwer, which plainly imported, that the Spaniards never intended to accompliſh the marriage; the ſhift deviſed by a junto of divines, to ſend home the prince without the lady.

All theſe reaſons were ſo many indirect reproaches to the king for ſuffering himſelf to be ſo long amuſed. But his majeſty, feigning not to perceive it, came to the parliament, and made a ſpeech to ſhew he could not break off the treaties, without knowing how to maintain the war which would unavoidably follow, ſince the Palatinate was to be recovered by arms. He declared therefore, if they thought proper to engage in a war with Spain, he would readily conſent the ſupply to be granted ſhould be managed by commiſſioners appointed by the parliament. Moreover he promiſed the two houſes, he would not make peace without their advice. He concluded with ſaying, "I am ſo deſirous to forget all rents in former parliaments, that it ſhall not be my default, if I am not in love with parliaments, and call them often, and deſire to end my life in that entercourſe between me and my people, for the making of good laws, reforming of ſuch abuſes as I cannot be well informed of but in parliament, and maintaining the good government of the commonwealth."

How different is this ſpeech from thoſe the king made to the former parliament! But the king's thoughts are not ſo viſible in theſe expreſſions as the duke of Buckingham's policy, who, after breaking the prince's marriage, had a mind to puſh his point, and proclaim war with Spain. To ſucceed, a parliament muſt be called, and to gain their affection, the king muſt talk after this manner.

Some days after, the commons preſented an addreſs to the king, offering to grant him three entire ſubſidies, and three fifteenths, upon his public declaration for diſſolving the treaties of the marriage and the Palatinate. But they took him at his word, concerning his offer that the money ſhould be diſpoſed of by commiſſioners of their own chuſing. The king thanked them for their affectionate expreſſions, and told them, he was reſolved for the future ſolely to confide in his parliament. After which, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the court of Spain, with his laſt reſolution to break off the treaty. But upon notice that a ſharp petition againſt the popiſh recuſants, framed by the commons, was going to be preſented to him, he wrote the following letter, with his own hand, to ſecretary Conway.

" I Doubt not but you have heard what a ſtinging petition againſt the papiſts the lower-houſe have ſent to the higher-houſe this day, that they may jointly preſent it unto me. You know my firm reſolution, not to make this a war of religion; and ſeeing I would be loth to be conycatched by my people, I pray you ſtay the poſt that is going to Spain, till I meet with my ſon, who will be here to-morrow morning: do it upon pretext of ſome more letters you are to ſend him; and if he ſhould be gone, haſten after him to ſtay him upon ſome pretext; and let none living know of this, as you love me. And before two in the afternoon to-morrow, you ſhall without fail hear from me. Farewel."

Probably the king imagined, the parliament in this petition would have demanded things he had no intention to grant: and therefore, for fear of being forced to diſſolve the parliament, he would not haſten the rupture with Spain. But afterwards, being told the petition [k] contained nothing of what he dreaded, he ſuffered the meſſenger to depart. As ſoon as the people knew the breach with Spain was reſolved, the whole city of London ſhone with bonfires, which denoted the public diſlike of the Spaniſh match, and the danger to which religion had been expoſed. It was not yet known, that another and no leſs dangerous marriage was now treating in France.

The petition, preſented to his majeſty by both houſes, contained the ſeven following articles:

" I. That all jeſuits and ſeminary prieſts may be commanded forthwith to depart out of the realm, and not to return or come hither again, upon peril of the ſevereſt penalty of the laws now in force againſt them.

" II. That his majeſty would be pleaſed to give charge to the juſtices of the peace, that they take from all popiſh recuſants all ſuch armour, gun-powder and munition of any kind, as any of them have.

" III. That all popiſh recuſants be commanded forthwith to retire themſelves from or about London, to their ſeveral dwellings, or places by the laws appointed, and there to remain confined within five miles of their dwelling places: and for that purpoſe to diſcharge all bye-paſt licences granted unto them; and that they preſume not at any time hereafter to repair to London, or within ten miles of London, or to the king's court, or to the prince's court whereſoever.

" IV. That his majeſty would forbid and reſtrain the great reſort of his own ſubjects, for the hearing of maſs, to the houſes of foreign embaſſadors.

" V. That his majeſty would be pleaſed to diſcharge popiſh recuſants from thoſe places of truſt [as lords lieutenants, juſtices of peace, &c.] by which they have that power in the country where they live, as is not fit to be put into the hands of perſons ſo affected.

" VI. That his majeſty would be pleaſed generally to put the laws in due execution againſt popiſh recuſants; and that all his judges, juſtices, &c. may be commanded to do their duty therein.

" VII. That ſeeing they were happily delivered from that danger which the treaties with Spain would certainly have drawn upon England, his majeſty would be pleaſed to engage his royal word, that upon no occaſion of marriage or treaty, or other requeſt in that behalf from any foreign prince or ſtates whatſoever, he will take off, or ſlacken the execution of the laws againſt popiſh recuſants [l]".

To which petition his majeſty returned this anſwer.

" My lords and gentlemen of both houſes,

" I cannot but commend your zeal in offering this petition to me; yet on the other ſide, I cannot but hold myſelf unfortunate, that I ſhould be thought to need a ſpur to do that which my conſcience and duty binds me unto. What religion I am of, my books do declare, my profeſſion and behaviour doth ſhew; and I hope in God I ſhall never live to be thought otherwiſe; ſurely I ſhall never deſerve it; and for my part, I wiſh it may be written in marble, and remain to poſterity as a mark upon me, when I ſhall ſwerve from my religion; for he that doth diſſemble with God, is not to be truſted with men.

" My lords, for my part I proteſt before God, that my heart hath bled when I have heard of the encreaſe of popery; God is my judge, it hath been ſuch a great grief to me, that it hath been as thorns in my eyes, and pricks in my ſides; and ſo far have I been, and ſhall be from turning another way. And, my lords and gentlemen, you ſhall be my confeſſors, that one way or other it hath been my deſire to hinder the growth of popery; and I could not be an honeſt man if I ſhould have done otherwiſe. And this I may ſay further, that if I be not a martyr, I am ſure I am a confeſſor; and in ſome ſenſe I may be called a martyr, as in the ſcripture Iſaac was perſecuted by Iſhmael by mocking words; for never king ſuffered more ill tongues than I have done, and I am ſure for no cauſe; yet I have been far from perſecution; for I have ever thought that no way more encreaſed any religion than perſecution, according to that ſaying, 'Sanguis martyrum eſt ſemen eccleſiæ.'

" Now, my lords and gentlemen, for your petition, I will not only grant the ſubſtance of what you crave, but add ſomewhat more of my own: for the two treaties being already annulled (as I have declared them to be), it neceſſarily follows of itſelf, that which you deſire, and therefore it needs no more; but that I do declare by proclamation (which I am ready to do), that all jeſuits and prieſts do depart by a day; but it cannot be as you deſire by our proclamation, to be out of all my dominions; for a proclamation here extends but to this kingdom.

" This I will do and more; I will command all my judges when they go their circuits to keep the ſame courſes, for putting all the laws in execution againſt recuſants, as they were wont to do before theſe treaties; for the laws are ſtill in force, and were never diſpenſed with by me: God is my judge, they were never ſo intended by me; but as I told you in the beginning of the parliament, you muſt give me leave, as a good horſeman, ſometimes to uſe the reins, and not always to uſe the ſpurs: ſo now there needs nothing but my declaration for the diſarming of them; that is ready done by the laws, and ſhall be done as you deſired: and more, I will take order for the ſhameful diſorder of the reſorting of my ſubjects to all foreign embaſſadors; for this I will adviſe with my council how it may be beſt reformed. It is true, that the houſes of embaſſadors are privileged places; and though they cannot take them out of their houſes; yet the lord-mayor, and Mr. recorder of London, may take ſome of them as they come from thence, and make them examples. Another point I will add concerning the education of their children, of which I have had a principal care, as the lord of Canterbury, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, and other lords of my council can bear me witneſs, with whom I have adviſed about this buſineſs; for in good faith it is a ſhame, their children ſhould be bred here as if they were at Rome. So I do grant not only your deſire, but more. I am ſorry I was not the firſt mover of it to you, but had you not done it, I would have done it myſelf.

" Now for the ſecond part of your petition, you have here given me the beſt advice in the world; for it is againſt the rule of wiſdom, that a king ſhould ſuffer any of his ſubjects to tranſgreſs the laws, by the interceſſion of other princes; and therefore aſſure yourſelves, that (by the grace of God) I will be careful that no ſuch conditions be foiſted in upon any other treaty whatſoever; for it is fit my ſubjects ſhould ſtand and fall to their own laws."

What a happy harmony is here between the king and his parliament! Nothing can be more affable, more obliging than this anſwer, and the free and eaſy manner wherewith he came into the meaſures of the two houſes. To render their happineſs complete, nothing was wanting but the performance of the king's promiſes, which, how carefully he obſerved, will preſently appear.

The king had artfully avoided to anſwer the two principal articles of the petition, namely, the IIId and Vth, where the parliament required, that all papiſts ſhould be removed from London and the court, and diſcharged from all places of truſt. Had he conſented to theſe two requeſts, the face of the court would have been entirely changed. The duke of Buckingham's mother, who, by her ſon's means, diſpoſed of all offices, muſt have been removed. His ducheſs would [k] The ſtinging petition, which was framed by the commons, and ſent to the lords, was afterwards reduced to another form, and preſented to the king. This which follows here, ſeems to be an extract of the firſt before it was reduced, the other being reduced to two petitions. See Wilſon, p. 784.

[l] This petition, after it was reduced to another form, and ſo preſented to his majeſty, conſiſted only of two articles, which were much the ſame with the three firſt and the laſt of theſe.

alſo have been of the number, as well as one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, with many others who had conſiderable places at court, and in the country [m]. The king's ſilence on this head, cauſed the parliament to draw a liſt of fifty-ſeven popiſh lords and knights, who were in public offices, and preſent it to the king. But it does not appear that he took much notice of it. As it nearly concerned the duke of Buckingham, very probably he hindered the king from giving the parliament any ſatisfacton in this point, and the houſes did not much inſiſt upon it, that they might not too openly offend a lord, whoſe credit was ſo great both with the king and the prince.

But though no Engliſhman dared to attack the favourite directly, a foreigner however undertook to ruin him in the king's favour, namely, the marquis of Inoioſa the Spaniſh embaſſador, who being enraged at the unworthy manner of the duke's breaking off the marriage, burned with deſire to revenge the king his maſter and the infanta. One day, as the king had few about him, he took an opportunity to give him a paper, with a wink to conceal it. The king put it into his pocket, and withdrew to his cloſet to read it. He was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee the following particulars.

"I. That he was kept from all faithful ſervants, that would inform him, by the miniſters of the prince and duke, and was a priſoner as much as king John of France in England, or king Francis at Madrid, and could not be ſpoken with, but before ſuch as watched him.

"II. That there was a ſtrong and violent machination in hand, which had turned the prince, a moſt obedient ſon, to a quite contrary courſe to his majeſty's intentions.

"III. That the counſel began laſt ſummer at Madrid, but was lately reſolved on in England, to reſtrain his majeſty from the exerciſe of the government of his kingdoms; and that the prince and duke had deſigned ſuch commiſſioners under themſelves, as ſhould intend great affairs, and the public good.

"IV. That it ſhould be effected by beginning of a war, and keeping ſome companies of foot in this land, whereby to conſtrain his majeſty to yield to any thing, chiefly being brought into ſtraits for want of monies to pay the ſoldiers.

V. That the prince and duke's encloſing his majeſty from the ſaid embaſſadors, and others of his own loyal people, that they might not come near him in private, did argue in them a fear and diſtruſt of a good conſcience.

"VI. That the emiſſaries of the duke had brought his majeſty into contempt with the potent men of this realm, traducing him for ſlothful and unactive, for addiction to an inglorious peace, while the inheritance of his daughter and her children is in the hands of his foes; and this appeared by a letter which the duke had wrote into Holland, and they had intercepted.

"VII. That his majeſty's honour, nay his crown and ſafety, did depend upon a ſudden diſſolution of the parliament.

"VIII. They loaded the duke with ſundry miſdemeanors in Spain, and his violent oppoſition to the match.

"IX. That the duke had divulged the king's ſecrets, and the cloſe deſigns between his majeſty and their maſter king Philip, about the ſtates of Holland, and their provinces, and laboured to put his majeſty out of the good opinion of the Hollanders.

"X. That the duke was guilty of moſt corrupt dealing with the embaſſadors of divers princes.

"XI. That all theſe things were carried on in the parliament with an head-ſtrong violence, and that the duke was the cauſe of it, who courted them only that were of troubled humours.

"XII. That ſuch bitterneſs and ignominies were vented in parliament againſt the king of Spain, as were againſt all good manners and honour of the Engliſh nation.

"XIII. That the puritans (of whom the duke was head) did wiſh they could bring it about, that the ſucceſſion of the kingdom might come to the prince Palatine and his children, in right of the lady Elizabeth."

In a poſtſcript, the paper prayed the king, That the ſecretary to the marquis Inoioſa, might be brought to the king, when the prince and the duke were ſitting in the lords houſe, to ſatisfy ſuch doubts as the king might raiſe.

The king talked with the ſecretary, and diſcourſed likewiſe in private with Padre Maeſtro, a Spaniſh jeſuit. It is not known what theſe men told him [n]; but the king was perceived, after theſe converſations, to grow very melancholy, and his temper to be entirely altered. He affected, in ſpeaking to the prince and duke, to uſe broken and myſterious expreſſions, which ſhewed that ſomething lay heavy upon his mind [o]. At laſt, the king going one day to Windſor, and taking coach at St. James's, ordered the duke [p], on ſome ſlight pretence, to ſtay behind. Then the duke no longer doubting his diſgrace, beſought him for God's ſake, to tell him what was laid to his charge. The king only anſwered, he was the unhappieſt man alive, to be forſaken of thoſe who were moſt dear to him [q], and taking the prince his ſon with him, left Buckingham at London. The duke retired to his own houſe, overwhelmed with grief, and thinking himſelf irrecoverably ruined. But by the advice of the lord-keeper Williams, he went immediately to Windſor, where he found means to remove the king's ſuſpicions. At leaſt, the king feigned to be cured of them. But the earl of Clarendon confirms in his hiſtory, what is aſſured by others, that the duke had entirely loſt the king's favour. Mean while, James was naturally ſo timerous, that, inſtead of freeing himſelf from a favourite, whom he might eaſily have diſcarded, he gave himſelf up more to him, ſo apprehenſive was he of his union with the prince. He impatiently expected the earl of Briſtol's arrival, to uſe his advice; but means were found to prevent him from declaring his mind to him, and even of ſpeaking to him.

Before the parliament broke up, the king received a freſh mortification from the prince and duke. Whilſt they were in Spain, Lionel Cranfield, lord treaſurer, lately created earl of Middleſex, having the courage to refuſe them ſometimes the exorbitant ſums they demanded, they reſolved to ruin him at their return. They made uſe for that purpoſe of their credit with the parliament, and cauſed him to be accuſed by their creatures, of miſmanagement in the diſcharge of his office. The king knowing this came from them, deſired them for God's ſake, to uſe their intereſt with the two houſes to drop the impeachment; but they remained inflexible and unmoved at the king's intreaties. So the lord treaſurer was condemned in a fine of fifty thouſand pounds, and declared incapable of ever ſitting in the houſe of peers. All the hiſtorians agree, he did not deſerve ſo rigorous a treatment. But the duke, who had raiſed him from the duſt, had a mind to ſhew he was powerful enough to reduce him to his primitive ſtate, for an example to all who ſhould dare to reſiſt him. After this, it muſt not be thought ſtrange, if the king, when he ſpoke to this parliament, appeared ſo different from what he was with reſpect to the two former. Not that he had changed his ſentiments and maxims, but he durſt not do any thing without the direction of the prince and the duke, who had formed projects to which a parliament was neceſſary. The earl of Clarendon affirms, the king was extremely ſurpriſed in the beginning of this parliament, when he was informed of the contents of the duke of Buckingham's narration, concerning the treaty of marriage: a narration, ſays that famous hiſtorian, which, for the moſt part, the king knew to be untrue. Mean while, he had the weakneſs, as I ſaid, to atteſt the truth of it, and to aſſure, the duke had ſaid the ſame things to him. There cannot be a clearer evidence of his ſubjection to the prince and favourite.

Here is alſo another remarkable proof of the king's weakneſs or fears. He ſaw no remedy but in the earl of Briſtol's counſels, whoſe return he impatiently expected. And yet, no ſooner was the earl arrived in England, but the king was conſtrained to ſend him expreſs orders at Dover, not to come to court, but remain at his own houſe till he had anſwered certain queſtions, which ſhould be put to him by ſome of the council. The parliament being prorogued ſhortly after, the earl frequently wrote to the king, to deſire he might be examined. The king wiſhed it; but it was not the prince's or Buckingham's intereſt, who ſtill found freſh excuſes to defer the examination. The earl was however examined at laſt, after much ſollicitation, and returned ſuch anſwers, that his examiners could not help declaring, his conduct was un-

[m] This obſervation is built upon our author's miſtake, in imagining the petition, containing the ſeven articles, was preſented to the king; whereas it was new modelled, and the IIId and Vth articles left out. So it is no wonder the king ſhould not take notice of them in his ſpeech. The petition, as is was preſented to the king, is to be ſeen in Wilſon, p. 784.

[n] Weldon ſays, Maeſtro had learned under confeſſion, that the king was by Buckingham, or his procurement, to be killed; but whether by poiſon, piſtol, or dagger, he could not tell, p. 153. Whereupon the king told Buckingham at the next interview, "Ah Steiny, Steiny, wilt thou kill me?" The duke, aſtoniſhed at this expreſſion, endeavoured with the ſtrongeſt proteſtations to juſtify his integrity, which the king readily believed. Wilſ. p. 783.

[o] The king required of them particular proofs; but all their anſwers conſiſted of arguments againſt declaring the names of the conſpirators; whereupon the king's privy-council, and others of the principal men of the nation, were examined upon oath; but nothing was diſcovered. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 144.

It

blameable. But this could not procure him his liberty or admittance into the king's preſence. Some time after, the duke ſent him word, he was much miſtaken, if he imagined his anſwers were ſatisfactory to the king, the prince, or to him the duke; but his only way to come into favour again, was to make the confeſſion he had ſent him. The earl refuſed it, and the king told Buckingham, it was horrible tyranny to make an innocent perſon confeſs faults, of which he was not guilty. Notwithſtanding all this, it was not in his power to ſpeak with the earl, becauſe the prince and duke did not think it proper.

The parliament being prorogued [r], it was neceſſary to think of the war. The aid granted the king was very conſiderable [s]. It was computed that with this money he might ſend twenty-five thouſand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an Engliſh general. But the court had already taken other meaſures. Six thouſand men only were ſent into Holland [t] to ſerve in the army of the ſtates, under the command of the prince of Orange, and other troops were levied for count Mansfeldt, who was, during the winter, to open himſelf a paſſage into the Palatinate.

Mean while, Henry Rich, earl of Holland, who had been diſpatched into France, having ſent word that Lewis XIII. was inclined to liſten to the overture of a marriage between the prince of Wales and his ſiſter the princeſs Henrietta Maria, the king appointed James Hay earl of Carliſle, to negotiate the affair jointly with him. The two embaſſadors repairing to Compeigne, where the court of France was, commiſſioners were nominated to treat with them, of whom the marquis de la Vieuville, ſuperintendant of the finances, was the firſt. The conferences began a few days after the prorogation of the parliament, when the king, according to his promiſe, was putting the laws in execution againſt popiſh recuſants, particularly againſt friers and prieſts, ſome of whom were thrown into priſon.

This ſeverity cauſed the catholics to exclaim, who expected a very different treatment a few months before. They could not forbear complaining, that whereas the negotiation of the Spaniſh match had procured them great eaſe, this with France ſeemed on the contrary to ſerve only to increaſe their miſeries. Several wrote to France in that ſtrain, intimating they had nothing to truſt to but the piety, zeal, and protection of Lewis. Among others, a Scotch Franciſcan wrote upon the ſubject to Hugo archbiſhop of Ambrun, who had been general of the order, and to whom he was known. The archbiſhop ſhewed the letter to the king, and aggravated the ſufferings of the Engliſh catholics, who expected relief only from his interceſſion. The king of France had already done his utmoſt to pacify the Engliſh catholics, aſſuring them by Tilliers his embaſſador at London, that he would not forget them. But their repeated complaints obliged him at length to take ſome ſtep in their favour, and the rather, as he was afraid, they would obſtruct the pope's diſpenſation, which would ſoon be wanted. He reſolved therefore to ſend to James a ſecret agent to intercede for the catholics, and choſe for that purpoſe the archbiſhop of Ambrun, who came to London in diſguiſe, and paſſed for a counſellor of the parliament of Grenoble. At his arrival he waited upon Buckingham, who ſeemed very much inclined to countenance his negotiation. The counteſs of Buckingham, the duke's mother, the earl of Rutland, and ſome other catholics, did the archbiſhop great ſervices, and acquainted him with many things neceſſary to be known, in order to ſucceed in his deſigns. The king being informed that the archbiſhop deſired to ſpeak with him, ſent for him to Royſton, where he then was, confined to his bed with the gout. The archbiſhop's firſt conference with the king was followed by the releaſe of ſeveral popiſh recuſants, impriſoned ſince the parliament's petition. Moreover the king gave the archbiſhop leave to adminiſter confirmation in the French embaſſador's houſe, to all that ſhould apply for it. This was done in ſo public a manner, that not only the houſe, but the ſtreet itſelf, was crowded with people. If the archbiſhop's own narrative may be credited, he confirmed above ten thouſand perſons, which ſeems to be a little exaggerated. However, the number muſt have been great, ſince the magiſtrates of London complained of it to the king, who owned it was done with his leave. And yet he had very lately told the parliament, it was a ſhame to ſuffer ſuch crowds of papiſts at embaſſadors houſes.

From that time, the king had ſeveral conferences with this prelate; and one day as he was expreſſing his earneſt deſire to live in ſtrict union with the king of France, the archbiſhop took occaſion to tell him, that one of the beſt means to that end, was to grant a full toleration to the catholics. Whereupon the king ſqeezing him by the hand, ſaid theſe words to him: "I perceive you are the man ſent me from God, to whom I may freely open my mind." Adding, "He had always a good opinion of the catholic religion, and for it had often been in danger of aſſaſſination during his minority: He intended to grant a full toleration to the catholics; and in order to ſucceed, meant to cauſe an aſſembly of divines, as well foreign as Engliſh, to be held, and therein to be decided, that it was neceſſary to grant an univerſal liberty of conſcience; and he had already caſt his eyes on the Engliſh divines to be ſent thither: If the aſſembly could not be held at Dover, he would agree it ſhould be at Boulogne, as ſoon as his ſon's marriage ſecured him the aſſiſtance of France: He thought proper that the archbiſhop ſhould now return to France, under colour of waiting on the princeſs, and he would ſend him two letters under his own hand, one for the pope, the other for the king of France, wherein his project ſhould be more fully explained: He would alſo give him a memorial on the ſame ſubject, that being armed with theſe two papers, he might go and negotiate at Rome with the pope, for whom he had a very great reſpect, being obliged to him for a copy of verſes he had formerly, when cardinal, made upon the queen his mother and the houſe of Stewart." At the ſame time he ſhewed the verſes to the archbiſhop, and then ſaid, "If he returned from Rome with the pope's approbation, concerning the aſſembly, it ſhould be immediately held, and he did not queſtion, it would be very advantageous to the catholic religion. In the mean time, he intended to negotiate with the proteſtant princes of Germany, and endeavour to gain ſome of the chief puritan lords in England and Scotland."

On ſuppoſition of the truth of this extract from the archbiſhop of Ambrun's narrative, at the end of Deageant's Memoirs, all that can be inferred from it is, that James had formed a chimerical project of a mutual toleration throughout Chriſtendom, and thought himſelf qualified to effect it, with the aſſiſtance of France. But Deageant ſays ſomething more. He affirms, James wrote a letter to the pope, and ſent it by an Engliſh Roman catholic gentleman. In this letter, according to that author, "He owns the pope for Chriſt's vicar upon earth, and head of the church univerſal. He aſſures him, he intends to declare himſelf a catholic, as ſoon as he has provided againſt ſome inconveniences which he foreſees his declaration may cauſe. He promiſes, the prieſts ſhall not be diſturbed who are ſent into England by his holineſs or the king of France, unleſs they are jeſuits. Moreover, deſires the pope not to think of cauſing to be reſtored to the church, the abbey-lands granted or ſold to the principal families in the kingdom, for fear of ruining the whole project. He ſays farther, nothing hinders him from openly profeſſing the catholic religion, but his hopes of gaining firſt his brother-in-law the king of Denmark, to whom he had ſent to deſire him, on ſome other pretence to come to England. And when they two ſhall be cloſely united in the ſame deſign, he does not doubt but they ſhall prevail upon moſt of the other proteſtant princes."

Deageant aſſures, no body knew of this letter but Buckingham and the bearer: however, he does not ſay how he himſelf came to know the contents. To ſpeak the truth, I can hardly believe, James really intended to declare himſelf a catholic; or if he did intend it, would write ſuch a letter to the pope, in his preſent circumſtances. In ſhort, I think it very unlikely this letter ſhould fall into Deageant's hands. So I ſuſpect, this author's relation was only communicated to him by ſome Engliſh catholic, on whoſe teſtimonies whether we may rely, cannot be known.

The archbiſhop of Ambrun's narrative is much more probable; firſt, Becauſe that prelate relates only what he had himſelf from the king's own mouth: ſecondly, Becauſe he ſays nothing but what is agreeable to that prince's conduct through the whole courſe of his life. His religious notions were very particular, and not embraced by the proteſtants.

[r] It was prorogued on May 20, to November 2. Journ. Par.

[s] It was three entire ſubſidies, and three fifteenths and tenths from the laity; and four entire ſubſidies from the clergy. Of the laity's aid, eight citizens of London were appointed to be treaſurers, and ten other perſons to be of his majeſty's counſel for the war; without whoſe warrant no money was to be iſſued out by the treaſurers, nor upon any other account, but for the war: and both were to be accountable to the commons in parliament. See Rotul. Parl. and Statut. 21 Jac. c. 34.—The acts made in this parliament were theſe: 1. One concerning monopolies, and diſpenſations with penal laws, and the forfeitures thereof. 2. For the better repreſſing of drunkenneſs, and inordinate haunting of inns, alehouſes, &c. 3. That not above eight pounds per cent. intereſt ſhall be given for money. 4. For the relief of creditors againſt bankrupts. 5. That prophane ſwearers and curſers ſhall pay twelvepence for every oath, to the uſe of the poor. 6. For making the river Thames navigable as far as Oxford. The reſt being too long to be inſerted here, may be ſeen in the Statute-Book.

He

He believed that difference of opinion, with reſpect to the doctrines of tranſubſtantiation, invocation of ſaints, and the other tenets which diſtinguiſhed the two religions, and were by him conſidered as ſchool-queſtions, were not ſufficient to juſtify a ſchiſm. Conſequently, the Roman and proteſtant churches were one and the ſame church; from whence he inferred, it was incumbent upon all Chriſtians mutually to ſupport one another, and live like brethren. It followed equally from this principle, that the proteſtants ought not to perſecute or moleſt the catholics, nor the catholics the proteſtants. He obſerved this rule himſelf very punctually, but without any juſt foundation that the catholic princes would follow the ſame maxim. So the ſcheme of an univerſal toleration, which he meant to eſtabliſh among all Chriſtians, was properly but a chimera, ſince he had not ſufficient authority to make all the world come into his meaſures. Mean while, as his maxims obliged him to look upon the catholics with a different eye from what other proteſtants did, it is no wonder that he paſſed, with the proteſtants and papiſts themſelves, for a prince well affected to the catholic religion. And indeed, ſo far was he from having any averſion to that religion, that he conſidered the church of Rome as the mother-church, from whence the proteſtant church was ſprung, and doubtleſs, had it been in his power to unite them, he would have given the preference to the firſt, leaving every one free to believe what he pleaſed concerning the doctrines. There was but one thing that embarraſſed him, namely, the exorbitant power aſcribed to the pope, and the damnable maxim of the lawfulneſs of murdering kings on account of religion. To free himſelf from this embarraſſment, he endeavoured to deceive himſelf, by imagining, there were but very few catholics who were poſſeſſed with the pope's unlimited power, and that the king-killing doctrine was peculiar to the jeſuits. On the other hand, puritaniſm in the proteſtant religion was ſo odious to him, that, probably, he would, if he could, have excluded the puritans from the general toleration he was willing to grant all other Chriſtians. King James had the misfortune to govern himſelf by general maxims, without conſidering, ſuch maxims could not be always adapted to particular caſes. His notions concerning religion were of the ſame nature with his opinions about monarchy, the general principles whereof he applied to the government of England, contrary to the particular conſtitution of that kingdom.

Whilſt the archbiſhop of Ambrun was in England, the negotiation of the marriage was continued in France, between the Engliſh embaſſadors and the French commiſſioners. The Engliſh propoſed at firſt the continuation of the treaty, formerly begun for prince Henry's marriage with the princeſs Chriſtina, who eſpouſed the duke of Savoy. But this motion was rejected by the French commiſſioners; firſt, Becauſe that negotiation was properly but juſt ſet on foot; ſecondly, Becauſe France would not be contented with leſs than was offered by the king of England, for the prince of Wales's marriage with the infanta of Spain. So the French commiſſioners demanded in their turn, that the articles concerning religion granted to Spain, ſhould ſerve for foundation to the preſent treaty. The embaſſadors expected this demand, and by their private inſtructions knew how to proceed, but pretended, they could not grant what was demanded, without freſh orders. They ſent therefore a courier to London, but the court of France knew it was not upon that account, ſo they were preſſed the more earneſtly to declare what they would grant with reſpect to religion. At laſt, after ſome ſollicitation, they offered the articles agreed upon with Spain, except four, namely, liberty of conſcience to the catholics; a church in London; the education of the children by the queen till ten years old; a biſhop with eccleſiaſtical authority over the princeſs's family. Theſe four articles were much debated, and at length, the embaſſadors yielded the two laſt. But for the two firſt, they ſaid, they could not abſolutely grant them, becauſe of the king's ſolemn promiſe to the parliament. This reaſon appeared ſo ſtrong to the French commiſſioners, that they thought it fruitleſs to inſiſt any more upon theſe two articles. The portion was ſettled without much trouble. The king of France offered eight hundred thouſand crowns, on condition the prince aſſigned a jointure of ſixty thouſand crowns a year; which offer, with the condition, was accepted. So, in all appearance, the affair was to be ended in a very ſhort ſpace, but two things retarded the concluſion.

In the firſt place, the pope did not approve of the marriage, becauſe, hearing that the Engliſh embaſſadors had propoſed a league to the king of France, he was afraid, the deſign of it might be to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Bavaria of the Palatinate and electoral dignity. For which reaſon he endeavoured at firſt to diſſuade Lewis XIII. from giving his ſiſter to an heretical prince. But finding Lewis did not much regard his arguments, he declared he would not grant a diſpenſation, unleſs the marriage was made upon the ſame terms as were granted to Spain. Whereupon the king of France reſolved to ſend father Berulle, general of the fathers of the oratory, to ſollicit the diſpenſation. His inſtructions, ſigned the 31ſt of July, imported among other things, "That by the articles already agreed on, the princeſs, as well as all her domeſtics, were very ſecure as to religion: ſhe had a biſhop, with twenty-eight prieſts, or monks; and a chapel in every place where ſhe ſhall reſide; ſhe was to educate her children till the age of thirteen years, whereas in the Spaniſh articles, the time was fixed to ten years. In fine, ſhe was well inſtructed and very firm in the faith: and inſtead of having any thing to fear for her, it was to be hoped, conſidering how well-inclined the king of England was to be a catholic, ſhe would convert him as well as the prince her ſpouſe, after the example of Bertha of France, who made a convert of king Ethelbert."

The marquis de la Vieuville's diſgrace, which happened at this time, was the other cauſe of the delay of this affair, and ſtopped father Berulle, who was about to depart. Cardinal Richelieu, who was commiſſioned to treat with the Engliſh embaſſadors, in the room of the diſgraced ſuperintendant, pretended, that la Vieuville had acted without orders, or at leaſt without the approbation of the king or council. James being informed of this new obſtacle, believed the court of France uſed this pretence to break off the treaty, and made great complaints to the marquis d'Effiat, who was lately come to his court in the place of Tilliers. But cardinal Richelieu was far from breaking off a negotiation ſo advantageous to France upon many accounts. So, contenting himſelf with diſparaging la Vieuville by this accuſation, he renewed the treaty.

The late change in the miniſtry inſpired the nuntio with freſh hopes. He repreſented to the cardinal, that his own and the pope's honour obliged him not to abate any thing of the Spaniſh articles, and that aſſuredly the diſpenſation would not be granted upon any other terms. The cardinal told him, the king of England and prince of Wales had complied with whatever they really intended to grant the king of Spain, though not with what was extorted from them, whilſt the prince was a priſoner at Madrid, and what was not in their power. Moreover, he intimated to him, that there was no abſolute occaſion for a diſpenſation; and though it was deſired, it was not ſo much out of neceſſity as reſpect for the pope's perſon. So father Berulle departed with his inſtructions, notwithſtanding the nuntio's oppoſition.

If the court of France had ſhewn leſs reſolution, this affair would never have been accompliſhed. The pope's behaviour on this occaſion plainly ſhewed, he only wanted a pretence to refuſe the diſpenſation, or at leaſt, to delay it as long as poſſible. He retarded the affair by laying it before a congregation, where freſh difficulties were continually ſtarted. They were not ſatisfied that the king of England and the prince of Wales ſhould ſwear to the articles; they would have alſo the king of France to be guarantee, like the king of Spain, and Lewis was forced at laſt to promiſe it. They inſiſted particularly upon demanding a public church in London for the catholics, though they were told, it was not in the king of England's power to perform ſuch an article, if it was granted. In a word, there was no delay, no artifice, but what was practiſed by the pope to gain time, till at laſt the French embaſſador had orders to declare, if the diſpenſation was much longer deferred, the affair might be tranſacted without it. This menace making the pope apprehenſive that he might very unſeaſonably expoſe his authority, he promiſed the diſpenſation, after a tedious ſollicitation which would have held longer, had it been the court of France's intereſt to prolong it. But cardinal Richelieu was afraid, a farther delay would bring with it alterations that might cauſe a breach of the marriage, as happened in Spain: ſo the treaty was ſigned at Paris the 10th of November. It contained thirty public, with three ſecret articles, wherein much the ſame advantages were ſtipulated for the catholics, as in thoſe of Madrid. The articles of the treaty were:

I. His moſt chriſtian majeſty, to diſcharge what his dignity and piety oblige him to, and that he may treat of this marriage with a ſafe conſcience, undertakes to procure the pope's diſpenſation, within two months at fartheſt.

II. The articles and conditions of the marriage being ſigned, the king of Great Britain ſhall appoint ſuch perſons of quality as he ſhall think proper, to eſpouſe madame in the prince his ſon's name, according to the uſual form in the Roman catholic-apoſtolic church.

III. The

III. The nuptials ſhall be celebrated in France, after the manner obſerved in the marriage of the late king with queen Margaret, and in that of the ducheſs of Bar.

IV. After the celebration of the marriage, madame ſhall be conducted at his moſt chriſtian majeſty's charge, as far as Calais, where ſhe ſhall be delivered to the perſon commiſſioned by the king of Great Britain to receive her.

V. From Calais to England, her expences ſhall be borne by the king of Great Britain, and every thing ſhall be done on both ſides, as is ſuitable to a princeſs of the royal family of France, joined in marriage to the heir of Great Britain.

VI. The marriage being celebrated in France, and madame arrived in England, a day ſhall be fixed, on which the king of Great Britain, the prince his ſon, and madame his wife, being in ſome convenient room of the palace, dreſſed in their royal robes, the contract and authentic inſtrument of the celebration of the marriage ſhall be publicly read, together with the procurations, by virtue whereof the marriage was celebrated. Which done, the ſaid contract ſhall be ratified anew by the king and the prince his ſon, in the preſence of ſuch as the moſt chriſtian king ſhall commiſſion to that end, and of the lords of Great Britain who ſhall be preſent on this occaſion, without the intervention of any church ceremony.

VII. The free exerciſe of the Roman catholic-apoſtolic religion ſhall be granted to madame, as likewiſe to all the children that ſhall be born of this marriage.

VIII. To that end, madame ſhall have a chapel in all the royal palaces, and in every place of the king of Great Britain's dominion's where ſhe ſhall be or reſide.

IX. The ſaid chapel ſhall be beautified with decent ornaments, and the care and cuſtody thereof ſhall be committed to ſuch as madame ſhall appoint. The preaching of God's word, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments ſhall be entirely free, and the maſs, and the other parts of divine ſervice, ſhall be celebrated according to the cuſtom of the holy Roman church, with all jubilees and indulgences which madame ſhall procure from Rome. There ſhall be alſo a church-yard allowed in the city of London, where, according to the cuſtom of the Roman church, ſuch of madame's attendants ſhall be buried, as ſhall happen to die, which ſhall be done in a modeſt manner. The ſaid church-yard ſhall be encloſed that it may not be profaned.

X. Madame ſhall have a biſhop for her almoner, who ſhall have all neceſſary authority and juriſdiction in all things belonging to religion, and ſhall have power to proceed according to the canons againſt ſuch as ſhall be under his charge. And in caſe the civil court ſhall lay hold on any the ſaid eccleſiaſtics, for ſome ſtate crime, and information be made againſt him, he ſhall be ſent to the ſaid biſhop, with the informations and proceedings; and the ſaid biſhop, after degrading him, ſhall put him again into the hands of the ſecular court. For any other crimes, the civil court ſhall ſend back the ſaid eccleſiaſtic to the biſhop, who ſhall proceed againſt him according to the canons. And in caſe of abſence or ſickneſs, the biſhop's vicar ſhall have the ſame authority.

XI. Madame ſhall have in her houſe twenty-eight prieſts or eccleſiaſtics, almoners and chaplains included, to ſerve in her chapel, and if there are any regulars, they ſhall wear the habit of their order.

XII. The king and prince ſhall oblige themſelves by oath not to attempt by any means whatever to perſuade madame to change her religion, or to engage her in any thing repugnant to it.

XIII. Madame's houſhold ſhall be ſettled with as much dignity, and conſiſt of as many officers as any princeſs of Wales ever had, and in the ſame manner as was agreed upon for the marriage of the moſt ſerene prince with the infanta of Spain.

XIV. All the domeſtics madame ſhall bring into England ſhall be French catholics, choſen by the moſt chriſtian king; and in the room of thoſe that ſhall die, ſhe ſhall take other French catholics, with the conſent however of the king of Great Britain.

XV. Madame's domeſtics ſhall take the following oath to the king, prince, and madame:

"I promiſe and ſwear to be faithful to the king of Great Britain, to the moſt ſerene prince Charles, and to madame Henrietta Maria daughter of France, and to keep truly and inviolably this my promiſe. And if I know of any thing to be attempted againſt the perſons of the ſaid king, prince, and madame, or againſt the ſtate, or public of the ſaid king's realms, I will diſcover the ſame to the ſaid king, prince, and madame, or to thoſe who ſhall have charge thereof."

XVI. Madame's portion ſhall be eight hundred thouſand French crowns; one half to be paid in London by his moſt chriſtian majeſty on the day before the eſpouſals, and the other half within a year after the firſt payment.

XVII. If the prince die before madame, without iſſue, the whole portion ſhall be reſtored to madame, to be diſpoſed of as ſhe pleaſes, whether ſhe ſtays in England, or returns to France; in which laſt caſe, it ſhall be in her power to bring the money with her.

XVIII. But in caſe there are children, only two-thirds of the portion ſhall be reſtored, the other third remaining for the children, whether madame goes back to France, or ſtays in England: but in this caſe, ſhe ſhall be paid the intereſt at five per cent.

XIX. The children which ſhall be born of this marriage, ſhall be brought up by madame their mother, till the age of thirteen years.

XX. The children ſhall inherit alſo the two-thirds reſtored to their mother, unleſs ſhe marries again: and then, the children of the ſecond bed, ſhall have an equal ſhare with thoſe of the firſt.

XXI. If madame die firſt without children, his moſt chriſtian majeſty grants, that in ſuch caſe, only half of the portion ſhall be paid back to him, but if there are children, the whole ſhall go to them.

XXII. Madame's jointure ſhall be ſixty thouſand French crowns, which ſhall be aſſigned her by the king of Great Britain.

XXIII. The king of Great Britain ſhall preſent madame, on account of the marriage with fifty thouſand crowns-worth of jewels and diamonds, which ſhall be madame's own property, as well as thoſe ſhe has now, or which ſhall be given her hereafter.

XXIV. The king of Great Britain ſhall be obliged to maintain madame and her houſhold; and in caſe ſhe becomes a widow, ſhe ſhall enjoy her portion and jointure with all other things to her granted.

XXV. In caſe the prince die firſt without iſſue, madame ſhall freely enjoy, wherever ſhe pleaſes to live, her jointure, which ſhall be aſſigned her in lands, caſtles, or houſes, whereof one ſhall be fit for her to reſide in, and furniſhed ſuitably to a princeſs of her quality.

XXVI. Madame ſhall have the free diſpoſal of the offices and benefices of the ſaid lands, part of which ſhall bear the title of duchy or earldom.

XXVII. Madame ſhall be at liberty, whether ſhe have children or not, to return to France with her houſhold goods, jewels, diamonds, and portion, as ſpecified in the articles above. And in this caſe, the king of England ſhall be obliged to conduct her at his charge to Calais, in a manner ſuitable to her quality.

XXVIII. Madame ſhall renounce all paternal, maternal, and collateral inheritance as to the lands of the royal domain ſubject to reverſion, by appennage or otherwiſe.

XXIX. The contract of marriage ſhall be enrolled in the court of the parliament at Paris, and ratified by the parliament of England, and regiſtered in the uſual courts. And the ſaid king and prince ſhall promiſe not to act contrary to any clauſe or condition of the ſame.

XXX. Moreover, it is agreed, that he of the two kings which ſhall refuſe to accompliſh the preſent treaty, ſhall be obliged to pay the other the ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns, as a penalty for the ſaid refuſal.

Private or Secret Articles.

1. That the catholics, as well eccleſiaſtics as temporals, impriſoned ſince the laſt proclamation, which followed the breach with Spain, ſhould all be ſet at liberty.

2. That the Engliſh catholics ſhould be no more ſearched after, nor moleſted for their religion.

3. That the goods of the catholics, as well eccleſiaſtical as temporal, that were ſeized ſince the forementioned proclamation, ſhould be reſtored to them.

In this, as well as the Madrid treaty, we ſee the great care of the French and Spaniſh courts for the intereſt of the catholic religion, and the little zeal of king James, the prince, and the duke of Buckingham, for the proteſtant. The XIXth article concerning the education of the children, was of very ill conſequence to England. It almoſt proved the ruin of church and ſtate.

If it be aſked what could induce the king to purchaſe this marriage with ſuch hard terms to the religion profeſſed by himſelf, and almoſt the whole kingdom, there can be, in my opinion, but two motives aſſigned. The firſt was, to give the prince his ſon a wife of royal extraction, thinking any other princeſs beneath him. The ſecond was, the portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns, which might excite his deſire. As to the prejudice this treaty might bring to the proteſtant religion, it troubled him not, for he never had the intereſt of that religion much at heart.

The treaty being ſigned at Paris, M. de Lomenie, ſecretary of ſtate, was ſent to London to ſee it ſworn by the king and prince. Immediately after, all the proſecutions againſt the papiſts ceaſed, and the king promiſed all the priſoners ſhould be releaſed, as ſoon as the marriage was conſummated.

When the earl of Carliſle was ſent to France to haſten the treaty of marriage, he had orders to propoſe to that court a league againſt the houſe of Auſtria. This was the prince's and Buckingham's grand aim. There was then a diſpute about the Valteline, between the kings of France and Spain, which made the court of England imagine Lewis would readily liſten to ſuch a propoſal. And indeed he did ſo; but it was only to frighten the pope and the Spaniard, and not with deſign to conclude the league. The duke of Bavaria had friends in the French court, who cauſed him to be much more regarded than the elector Palatine, expelled his dominions, and ſheltered in Holland. So Lewis's miniſters told the Engliſh embaſſadors, that the league and marriage were two diſtinct affairs, which could not be negotiated together; but after the concluſion of the marriage, the league ſhould be treated of. By this anſwer, they kept the Engliſh in hope, and the Spaniards in fear. On the other hand, the count of Manſfeldt ſtayed at or near Paris, and the Spaniards knew he had frequent conferences with the miniſters.

Some time after, Manſfeldt came to England, where he was received with extraordinary careſſes, and lodged by the prince in his palace at St. James's. Here, after ſome conferences, he agreed with the king, the prince, and the duke, that he ſhould have twelve thouſand men, to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. This project being formed, the king preſſed the court of France with reſpect to the league: but his propoſal was artfully evaded on divers pretences, though without an abſolute denial. He was forced therefore to be contented, till the league was concluded, with demanding of the French king, a paſſage through his dominions for Manſfeldt's army. Lewis, in general or ambiguous terms, made him hope, not only that he would grant a paſſage, but alſo ſtrengthen this army with a body of his own troops. The event ſhewed, he meant after the concluſion of the league, whereas the Engliſh took it for a poſitive promiſe, whether the league ſhould be concluded or not. Purſuant to this project, the forces to be commanded by Manſfeldt were levied in England.

Whilſt this army was preparing to march, James cauſed a memorial to be preſented to the infanta Iſabella, demanding the city of Frankendal, which ſhe held in ſequeſtration, and, by the treaty of London, was to keep but till the end of the truce, which was to expire the 26th of October. Moreover, he demanded in the ſame memorial, a free paſſage for the garriſon he was to ſend to Frankendal, not only through the infanta's and his catholic majeſty's dominions, but alſo through the territories of their friends and allies. The infanta anſwered, ſhe would order the governor of Frankendal to ſurrender the place on the day appointed, to ſuch as ſhould produce a power from the king of England: that ſhe would grant a paſſage through her own, and the king of Spain's dominions, to the fifteen hundred foot and two hundred horſe, which, according to the treaty of London, were to take poſſeſſion of Frankendal, and, in general, would punctually execute the treaty. But as to the king's farther demand, to procure him a paſſage for his troops through the empire, ſhe declared it was not in her power, neither was ſhe obliged to it. Thus the court of England found by experience their error, in not inſerting in the treaty of London, what they were afterwards forced to demand, and what the infanta might juſtly deny. It is very true, in withdrawing the Engliſh garriſon from Frankendal, James met with no obſtacle; but he could not expect the ſame thing when he ſhould come to ſend them back. Some ſay, that on the 25th of October, the governor of Frankendal marched out of the city with his garriſon, but finding none of the king of England's forces ready to take poſſeſſion, inſtantly re-entered.

This was not the only error of the court of England, the moſt impolitic then in Europe. The twelve thouſand men to be conducted by Manſfeldt to the Palatinate were embarked in December, in extreme cold weather, without the leaſt doubt of their paſſage through France. Nevertheleſs, when the army came before Calais, the French would not ſuffer them to land. Much time was ſpent in going from Calais to the court, and from the court to Calais, even ſeveral times, and all to no purpoſe. The king of France conſtantly aſſerted, he had never poſitively promiſed to grant theſe troops a paſſage. The Engliſh authors call this a real breach of faith. I do not know whether they are in the right, and whether the court of England is not rather to be blamed, for not taking better meaſures, and ſecuring a paſſage through France, before the embarkation of the forces. However, the army ſuffering greatly on board the ſhips, where the ſoldiers were cloſely pent up, Manſfeldt was forced to ſail for Zealand, where he met with the ſame difficulties. The Zealanders ſaid, they had not proviſions for ſuch a number of troops, having had no notice of their coming. Much time was employed in negotiating. Meſſengers were ſent to the Hague, and afterwards to London. In the mean while, the peſtilence raging among the ſoldiers, above two-thirds periſhed before they were ſuffered to land. Moſt of thoſe that eſcaped, either deſerted, or liſted among the ſix thouſand Engliſh which were in the ſervice of the ſtates. Thus, by the court's wrong meaſures, this army became uſeleſs, and the money ſpent in raiſing it, was loſt [u].

[1625] It was February 1625, before pope Urban's diſpenſation arrived; when it came to Paris, two new conditions, not mentioned in the treaty, were ſeen in it with ſurpriſe, namely, 1. That the domeſtics of the children, born of this marriage, ſhould be catholics. 2. That the princeſs ſhould appoint them: and the pope abſolutely required the king of England, and the prince his ſon, to ſwear theſe two articles, otherwiſe the diſpenſation was void. The king of France was very angry with father Berulle for accepting ſuch a diſpenſation. But the father was ſo far from thinking it a fault, that he himſelf, as it is ſaid, inſinuated to the pope, that it would be proper to add theſe two articles, as having been forgotten in the treaty. The court of France therefore was under a freſh concern, fearing king James would reject theſe new conditions. But he was far from breaking for ſuch a trifle. He accepted them without being much importuned, and only refuſed to ſwear again, ſaying, his word was ſufficient. But without the oath, the diſpenſation was not valid. To ſatisfy the pope therefore, the king of France and the princeſs his ſiſter were forced to write to him, that they would warrant the performance of the two laſt articles. Notwithſtanding this, a new diſpenſation was to be ſollicited, which was ſome months in coming, and in that interval died king James, without having the pleaſure of ſeeing the marriage conſummated.

About the middle of March he was ſeized with a tertian ague, of which he had ſome fits. But though commonly ſuch agues are not dangerous in the ſpring, this brought him to his grave. He died at Theobalds the 27th of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of two and twenty years in England.

His death happening, as I may ſay, ſuddenly and unexpectedly, cauſed many ſuſpicions, which fell on the duke of Buckingham. When one of the king's fits was going off, the duke cauſed certain plaiſters to be applied to his ſide and wriſts, and gave him twice with his own hands a medicine to drink, in the abſence of the phyſicians. Nay, he would have given it a third time, but could not perſuade him to take it. The king finding himſelf much worſe, ſent for the phyſicians, who ſaid poſitively, they would not preſcribe, if the plaiſters were not immediately removed. However, the king died within a few days. The duke was afterwards impeached by the commons, not directly for poiſoning the king, but for daring to apply remedies without the advice of his phyſicians [w].

James left only a ſon and a daughter. His daughter was married to a prince who had now loſt his dominions, and was fled for refuge to Reenen, in the province of Utrecht, where he kept his little court very poorly. King James, who [u] Theſe twelve thouſand foot were divided into ſix regiments, the colonels whereof were Theophilus Clinton earl of Lincoln, the lord Doncaſter ſon to the earl of Carliſle, the lord Cromwel, Sir Charles Rich, Sir John Burroughs, and colonel Grey a Scotchman, who had been an old German commander, and affected to wear buff in time of peace, and at court, with a brace of piſtols at his girdle, which the king never liked to ſee. There were likewiſe two troops of horſe raiſed for this ſervice; one of which was commanded by the earl of Lincoln, and the other by one Gunter. Ruſhworth, tom. I. p. 153. At their winter quarters at Roſendale, the earl of Southampton, and his ſon the lord Wriotheſly, where both ſeized with burning fevers. The ſon died, and the father overcoming the fever, departed from Roſendale, with intention to bring his ſon's body to England, but died of a lethargy at Berghen-op-Zome, ſo were both in one ſmall bark brought to Southampton, and buried at Tichfield. Wilſon, p. 789.

[w] Wilſon ſays, one of Buckingham's chief motives was thought to be his fear the king would ſet up Briſtol his deadly enemy againſt him, to pull him down. And if what Burnet ſays be true, he had reaſon likewiſe to fear the king's old favourite Somerſet. He ſays, the king being reſolved to bring the earl of Somerſet into favour again, met him in the night in the gardens at Theobalds: two bed-chamber men were only in the ſecret: the king embraced him tenderly, and with many tears: the earl of Somerſet believed the ſecret was not well kept, for ſoon after, the king was taken ill with an ague, and died at Theobalds. Burnet ſays, he had this from ſome who were told it by the earl himſelf. Dr. Craig, the king's phyſician, was diſgraced, for ſaying, he believed the king was poiſoned. Burnet, p. 17.

was ſo liberal, is accuſed of having but moderately contributed to the maintenance of this diſconſolate family. I do not know whether there be any ground for this accuſation. Charles, prince of Wales, who ſucceeded his father, was ſtill more unfortunate than his ſiſter.

James I. as I have elſewhere obſerved, has had for hiſtorians men very much prepoſſeſſed in his favour, or extremely prejudiced againſt him. This naturally followed from the diviſions to which he himſelf had given birth. Some repreſent him as a perfect pattern of a good king: others blacken his reputation as much as poſſible, by aggravating his failings. The reaſon of this diverſity proceeds from the hiſtory of his reign being penned at a time when the animoſity of the two parties was at the height, whence both have happened to leave in their writings evident marks of their paſſion. Therefore the character of this prince muſt not be formed, either upon the praiſes of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon his manner of governing, upon his ſpeeches and actions. This might be done by recollecting the principal circumſtances of his reign. But to ſave the reader the pains, I ſhall briefly relate what is ſaid on both ſides, of which he will be able to judge.

The principal ingredients in king James's panegyric is the conſtant peace he cauſed his ſubjects to enjoy. This cannot be ſaid to be the effect of chance, ſince it clearly appears to have been his ſole, or, at leaſt, chief aim in his adminiſtration. Nothing, ſay his friends, is more noble or more worthy a great king than ſuch a deſign. But this deſign loſes all its merit, if the prince is diſcovered by his conduct, to preſerve peace only out of fear, ſupineneſs, exceſſive love of eaſe and repoſe; and king James's whole behaviour ſhews he acted by theſe motives, though he coloured it with the pretence of affection for his people.

If ſome take care to extol his knowledge in philoſophy, divinity, hiſtory, polite learning, others affirm, it was but real pedantry, and that from all his acquired knowledge he learnt only to talk very impertinently on every ſubject, inſtead of framing ſolid rules for the government of his dominions.

His liberality, which ſome praiſe, is exclaimed againſt by others as prodigality. Theſe pretend, he gave without meaſure and diſcretion, without any regard to his own wants, or the merits of thoſe on whom he heaped his favours.

The ſame contrariety occurs between king James's hiſtorians with reſpect to his capacity. Some call him for his wiſdom, the Solomon of the age. Others endeavour to diſplay all his errors, particularly in the two ſole important affairs of his reign, wherein he came off very ill, namely, the prince his ſon's marriage, and his ſon-in-law's election to the kingdom of Bohemia.

Some extol him for maintaining the prerogative royal in its full luſtre, in ſpite of the efforts of thoſe who were continually attacking it. Others pretend, he had conceived very wrong ideas of the Engliſh conſtitution, and by aiming to carry the regal authority too high, and inſtilling the ſame principles into his ſucceſſor, he was the prime cauſe of his family's ruin.

As to his manners, writers are no leſs divided. Some deſcribe him as a very wiſe and virtuous prince, whilſt others ſpeak of him as a prince of a diſſolute life, given to drinking, and ſwearing in common converſation, eſpecially when he was in a paſſion. He is likewiſe reproached for diſſolving the earl of Eſſex's marriage, pardoning the earl and counteſs of Somerſet, for the death of ſir Walter Raleigh, and for confidently calling God to witneſs, in full parliament, that he never had any thoughts of granting the Papiſts a toleration, which he could not affirm but by means of ſome mental reſervation.

In fine, whilſt ſome praiſe his moderation and equity to the catholics, others pretend to demonſtrate he was a papiſt in his heart, and only profeſſed the proteſtant religion out of fear of what might follow, in caſe he openly declared for the catholic. If ſome ſay, in proof of his being a good proteſtant, that he made conſtant profeſſion of the eſtabliſhed religion, perſevered in it to his death, and when dying, charged the prince his ſon to protect the church and clergy; others anſwer this is far from a demonſtration. They pretend, the point is not to know what he would appear to be, but what he was in reality, and that his actions belied his outward profeſſion: that the ſame thing had happened to him in Scotland, where till the age of thirty-ſix years, he had profeſſed a religion which he mortally hated, as plainly appeared afterwards [x]. That when he came to England, he declared himſelf openly the protector of the papiſts: took their part on all occaſions: promoted them to honours, dignities, public offices: that in his reign the laws againſt them were never duly executed, of which he boaſted to the catholic princes in his apology concerning the oath of allegiance: that in all his ſpeeches, whether in the parliament or the ſtar-chamber, his conſtant aim was to move his ſubjects to conſent to a full toleration for the catholics: but not finding the parliament inclined as he wiſhed, he granted, by his ſole authority, a toleration in effect, by hindering the execution of the laws, and diſcharging the condemned recuſants from fines, and other penalties; that in his conventions with Spain and France, he poſitively promiſed to cauſe no more laws to be enacted againſt the papiſts, and thoſe already in force not to be executed: that on all occaſions, he affected to ſhew he found nothing amiſs in the Roman religion, but the pope's exorbitant power over princes: that by giving the pope the titles of holy father, his holineſs, and by conſenting that his ſon's children ſhould be educated in the Roman religion till the age of thirteen years, he plainly diſcovered ſhe ſhould not be ſorry for their continuance in that religion: laſtly, His engagements with the archbiſhop of Ambrun is a freſh and manifeſt proof of his being a true papiſt. To this the others reply, it is not poſſible to conceive, that if king James had been a papiſt in his heart, he would have ſpent a conſiderable part of his time in writing books againſt the popiſh religion, and combating the arguments of Bellarmine and Du Perron [y].

Having related what is ſaid for and againſt king James, with reſpect to his religion, I ſhall take the liberty to offer my opinion or conjecture, which is, that this prince was truly neither a ſound proteſtant, nor a good catholic. One can hardly help owning, that he had never much at heart the intereſt of the proteſtant religion, as on the other hand, it cannot be denied, he made public and conſtant profeſſion of the ſame to his dying day. This induces me to think he had formed a ſcheme of religion different from that of others, according to which he counted of no moment, what the proteſtants and catholics looked upon as eſſential. The difference between the two religions, with reſpect to the tenets, was not what affected him moſt. He believed, probably, that every religion was good, provided it taught obedience to ſovereigns, and preſerved the hierarchy, which he conſidered as a fundamental article. It is therefore no wonder, that, agreeably to this ſcheme, he ſhould refuſe to enter into the meaſures of the Engliſh proteſtants to hinder the growth of the Romiſh religion in England, or not ſcruple to continue in the religion he profeſſed, ſince, according to his notions, the two religions were equally good, provided the pope's deſpotic power was aboliſhed. I ſcarce doubt that in his conferences with the archbiſhop of Ambrun, he had in view the chimerical project of reconciling the two religions, without troubling himſelf about the tenets which divided them, and which, in one of his ſpeeches, he called ſcholaſtic queſtions. But, very probably, if he could have executed this project according to his ideas, all the advantage would have been on the ſide of the Romiſh religion. This, in my opinion, is the only way to excuſe his condeſcenſion to the catholics, and his zeal to protect them. Otherwiſe, I do not ſee how his doubtful behaviour, with regard to religion, can well be accounted for. This may alſo ſerve to diſcover the reaſon of his rejecting with ſo much animoſity the religion of the puritans, whoſe principles he believed directly contrary to the ſcheme he had formed.

But whatever may be ſaid for and againſt James's perſon, it is certain, England never flouriſhed leſs than in his reign, and the Engliſh ſaw themſelves expoſed to the inſults and railleries of other nations, whilſt the blame was generally caſt on the king [z].

[x] Of king James's diſſimulation in point of religion, there is a clear evidence in a ſpeech of his to the kirk of Scotland, which he is ſaid to ſpeak ſtanding, with his bonnet off, and his hands lifted up to heaven, wherein among other things, "He bleſſed God that had honoured him to be king over ſuch a kirk, the ſincereſt kirk in the world. The church of Geneva, what are they? They keep Paſche and Yule [i. e. Eaſter and Chriſtmas]. What authority have they in God's word, and where is their inſtitution? As for our neighbour church in England, their ſervice is an evil maſs, ſaid in Engliſh; they want nothing of the maſs but the liftings," &c. Calderwood, Hiſt. of Ch. of Scot. p. 246.

[y] As to the king's perſon, though his father and mother were eſteemed the handſomeſt couple of the age they lived in, yet he was himſelf but homely, nor in any of his features was to be found the leaſt reſemblance of the beautiful Mary Stewart, or lord Darnly. Welwood, p. 17.

[z] The following epigram made in France in his time, is the clear evidence in what eſteem he was with his neighbours.

Tandis qui' Elizabeth fut roy,
L'Anglois fut d' Eſpagne l'effroy.
Maintenant, deviſe et caquette,
Regi par la reine Jaquette.

That is literally in Engliſh,
Whilſt Elizabeth was king,
The Engliſh were of Spain the terror.
But now, govern'd by queen Jaquet,
They only talk and prattle.

The gold coins of this king (as appears from the indentures above) are roſe-rialls, and ſpur-rialls, angels, unites, crowns, and half crowns, of ſeveral denominations. The roſe-riall has on one ſide the king upon his throne, in his robes, with crown, ſcepter, and ball, at his feet a portcluſe, IACOBVS. D. G. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIBER. REX. Reverſe, the roſe and arms, which are quarterly, France and England in the firſt and fourth quarters; ſecond, the lion within the double treſſure fleury, for Scotland; third, the harp for Ireland, A. DNO. FACTVM. EST. ISTVD. ET. EST. MIRAB. IN. OCV. NRIS. The unite has on one ſide the king's figure, IACOBVS. DEI. GRA. MAG. BRIT. FRAN. ET. HIBER. REX. Reverſe, FACIAM. EOS. IN. GENTEM. VNAM. Of theſe unites there are ſeveral ſorts, as may be ſeen in Nummi Britann. Hiſtoria, p. 84, 85. One in particular has the king's buſto laureate on one ſide, and XX. behind the head, a ſcarf croſs the ſhoulder, inſcriptions and arms as the former unites, HENRIC. ROSAS. REGNA. IACOBVS. There is a half, with X. behind the head, and a quarter with V. The crowns have on the reverſe the arms, and HENRICVS. ROSAS. REGNA. IACOBVS. The thiſtle crown has on one ſide a roſe crowned, and IA. D. GRA. MAG. BR. FR. ET. HIBER. REX. On the other ſide a thiſtle flower crowned, TVEATVR. VNITA. DEVS. (Fig. 1.) The half crowns have, on one ſide, the king's figure, and IA. D. G. ROSA. SINE. SPINA. Reverſe, the arms, and TVEATVR, &c.———The ſilver coins of this king are crowns, half crowns, ſhillings, ſixpences, twopences, pence, and halfpence. The crown repreſents the king on horſe-back in armour, and crowned, holding a ſword in his hand; the roſe and crown upon the trappings of the horſe. IACOBVS. D. G. ANG. SCO. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. Reverſe, the arms, EXVRGAT. DEVS. DISSIPENTVR. INIMCI. Another crown is inſcribed, IACOBVS. D. G. ANG. SCO. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. Reverſe, the arms, QVÆ DEVS. CONIVNXIT. NEMO. SEPARET. The ſhillings have XII. (Fig. 2.) and the ſixpences VI. behind the king's head crowned, with legends as on the crowns. The pence and twopences are inſcribed I. D. G. ROSA. SINE. SPINA. with I. or II. behind the king's head crowned (Fig. 4.) Reverſe, the arms fill up the whole area. The Iriſh monies are in all reſpects like the Engliſh, only have a harp crowned on the reverſe (Fig. 3.) The copper money of Ireland has two ſceptres through the crown.

THE

A Genealogical Table of the Posterity of James I. King of England.

1. We have in this Genealogical Table as in the foregoing taken care to place on the same Horizontal line all the Princes & Princesses equally distant from the same common Stock, viz.t from William the Conqueror: Thus James I. being on the 18 Line & the 24th King his Descendants are placed on the following Lines in proportion as they are more or less removed.
2. We have carefully distinguished the different Branches that are formed by the Posterity of James I. So that the Fathers and Mothers are placed on the Line above their Children as near the middle as possible
3. As the Males are in the Order of Succession preferred to the Females we have placed the Males before their Sisters tho' the last were older that the Reader might more easily discern what Pretension each of them may have to the Crown of England But except this we have placed both Male & Female according to the time of their Birth
4. That this Table might not be carried to an excessive length on both sides we have in some places been obliged to put the Children of the same Father & Mother one above another especially between Lines 23 & 24.
5. We have set down in small Characters under each Prince the name of his Wife and under each Princess the name of her Husband together with the time of their Birth and Death as far as was necessary.
